But most of the popular writers of these times pictured life with an engaging optimism in order to be enjoyed by conventional readers. It would be wrong to condemn these poets, novelists, short-story writers, and playwrights as mediocre; some were endowed with ability above the average—for instance, Jenő Rákosi, Lajos Dóczy, Károly Eötvös, Géza Gárdonyi (q.v.), Ferenc Herczeg (q.v.), Victor Cholnoky, Béla Tóth, Gyula Krudy—yet most merely had an aptitude for facile writing. Episodes from Hungarian history, the life of the nobles, the rich, the bourgeoisie, the peasants, and the gypsies, were portrayed sentimentally, anecdotically, or with a restraint of "gentlemanly" humor or superiority. Ferenc Csepreghy, Ede Tóth, Gergely Csiky, Ede Szigligeti, Victor Rákosi, Árpád Berczik, Adolf Ágai, István Tömörkény, István Szomaházy, Antal Váradi, Gyula Pekár, István Bársony, Dezső Malonyai, playwrights and novelists, either ignored or did not understand complex social and aesthetic problems. The archaic usage of a patriotic vocabulary by Sándor Endrődi and Kálmán Thaly was rather an adroit control of a poetic pattern than an organic revelation of the Hungarian spirit in poetry (see Thaly's Régi magyar vitézi énekek, Old Hungarian Battle Songs). The religious poems of Gedeon Mindszenty, the rhetorical poems of Emil Ábrányi, the bucolic poems of Mihály Szabolcska, the political poems of Andor Kozma, the patriotic poems of Miklós Bárd and József Léway, the sentimental poems of Ödön Jakab, Gyula Szávay, and Sándor Sajó, the love poems of Imre Farkas, the cabaret poems of Jenő Heltai, the literary histories of Zsolt Beöthy and Ferenc Badics, all bear witness of an age in which optical illusion was the most successful inspiration and material of creative or pseudo-creative activities.

In the first decade of the 20th century a literary periodical, Nyugat (West), edited by the critic and poet Ignotus (q.v.) and by Ernő Osvát, brought into its orbit writers and poets dissatisfied with the smugness and conventionalism of the preceding generation. They believed that a work of literature should be a work of art and that love for one's country should not interfere with the freedom of the creative mind. Not all good writers joined Nyugat, but the majority did. Some were influenced by French symbolism (q.v.), others by the sensualism and the social implications of German, Scandinavian, Italian, and Russian writers, others by the humanitarianism and camaraderie of Walt Whitman. In their social and historical views several of the contributors were inclined to be Marxists. After the experiment of the communist revolution in 1919, many of the communists and their fellow travelers repudiated Marxism; some of the dogmatic communists or socialists indeed remained faithful to their principles and became political refugees. The pragmatism of Nyugat, in the service of literary integrity and social progress, became the source of an eclectic literature in which the most contradictory tastes found an opportunity to meet on the common ground of respect for artistic ability. As to workmanship this generation ranks among the foremost in Hungarian literature. The poets Endre Ady, Mihály Babits (q.v.), Dezső Kosztolányi (q.v.), Gyula Juhász, Árpád Tóth, Zoltán Somlyó, Ernő Szép, Oszkár Gellért, Milán Füst, Anna Lesznai, and among the younger ones, Lőrinc Szabó, Tivadar Raith, and Sophie Török; the novelists and short-story writers Zsigmond Móricz (q.v.), Géza Csáth, Gyula Szini, Margit Kaffka (q.v.), Béla Révész, Dezső Szabó (q.v.), Géza Laczkó, Mihály Földi, Ferenc Móra, Irén Gulácsy, Miklós Surányi, Lajos Nagy, Frigyes Karinthy; the playwrights Ferenc Molnár (q.v.), Kálmán Harsányi, Dezső Szomory, Lajos Bíró, Menyhért Lengyel; the critics and literary scholars Aladár Schöpflin, György Lukács, Lajos Katona, Robert Gragger, János Horváth, Lajos Hatvany, György Király, Zsolt Alszeghy, Jenő Dóczy, József Nagy, Károly Kerényi—all these, irrespective of the conspicuous differences of their talent, must be considered as creators and interpreters who rate high. Naturally the quality of their intentions was sometimes nobler than their execution. Nonetheless their sense of literary orientation was extraordinary, and their spirit loyal to humanity, to art, and to their country.

Among the avant-garde poets an iron molder, Lajos Kassák, excelled in manifestoes and sometimes in good free verse (Máglyák énekelnek; Singing Pyres). Géza Gyóni, who lost his life in the First World War, and Gábor Oláh were somewhat sidetracked by the conservative pressure of Jenő Rákosi, the powerful jingoistic publicist; but these poets, too, practiced their art with a structural sensitivity unknown to poets of corresponding ability in the preceding generation. It should be said that most of the poets were also story writers, playwrights, novelists, or critics. In significance and influence Endre Ady towered for some time over the rest of the poets (Szeretném ha szeretnének, 1909; I Should Like to Be Loved); after his death in 1919 Mihály Babits symbolized creative maturity in Hungary. It is also important to say that while the Nyugat generation was often slandered by the writers of the older generation and was considered "international" in its outlook the really gifted poets and writers never betrayed their Hungarianism. As a matter of fact Ady recaptured the verbal music and spirit of the Reformation in many of his poems, and Kosztolányi (Erős váruunk a nyelv; Our Language Is Our Fort of Strength) taught his countrymen to distinguish between a "pure" and "impure" Hungarian language. The feverishness of the Nyugat generation and of some of the writers independent of Nyugat suggested a crisis of the Hungarian spirit and the approach of an upheaval which indeed reached the country in 1918.

The ominous tone that characterized Hungarian literature in the second decade of the 20th century implied need of a revision of the Hungarian spirit; it also implied a Cassandra anxiety about the future. The Trianon peace treaty (June 4, 1920) mutilated Hungary. Hungarians in Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Rumania (Transylvania), confronted with an alien political and cultural world, learned to attach importance to their regionalistic literature. They soon discovered that their native tongue, used artistically by writers and poets and refreshed by the fecund idioms of the people, might be the main source of their pride and self-confidence as Hungarians in a non-Hungarian world. Meanwhile, in Hungary proper, writers of peasant stock (some exceptionally well educated) rediscovered the richness of folklore and also propagated the need of land reform. What Béla Bartók and Zoltán Kodály did for Hungarian music as an expression of folk characteristics, Gyula Illyés, József Erdélyi, Pál Szabó, János Kodolányi, Péter Veres, and István Sinka did or tried to do in poetry, fiction, plays, and biographies. Attila József, despite his strongly personal voice, expressed the plight of the proletarians and the social outcasts with a sans-culottic temper and authentic poetic ability. Various small literary magazines reflected the need of understanding the "isms" of the West. Urbane sensitiveness and social conscience came out in the poetic works of Miklós Radnóti and István Vas; Sándor Weörös, Zoltán Jékely, Pál Toldalaghy, Pál Gulyás, and Ferenc Jankovich registered the civilized and weary sensibilities of the lost generation. Lajos Zilahy as a playwright and novelist and Sándor Márai as a novelist and writer of sophisticated travel sketches hold to the belief that taste, though expressed in Hungarian, is not incompatible with a cosmopolitan culture. Influenced by Mihály Babits the discursive essay found intelligent exponents in the works of Gyula Ortutay, György Buday, Albert Gyergyai, László Mátrai, Tibor Joo, László Németh, Dezső Keresztury, László Cs. Szabó, Gábor Halász, and Antal Szerb. Some writers concentrated on "racial" questions in literary reference; Gyula Farkas as a literary historian and Cecile Tormay as a novelist accentuated an ideology that seemed to confirm certain "racial" theories of Germany. There was a Catholic renaissance, influenced chiefly by Sigrid Undset (q.v.) and Jacques Maritain (q.v.), without works of paramount merit. Sándor Sik was the most notable Catholic poet of these years, and he belonged rather to the preceding generation; Zsolt Aradi represented the Catholic point of view in fiction and journalism. In the realm of literary criticism Elemér Császár, related to the older generation, represented the academic point of view, and in the realm of literary history Jenő Pintér was the voice of traditional nationalism. Many biographies were written; Zsolt Harsányi, in the manner of Emil Ludwig, compiled biographical material (e.g., És mégis mozog a föld, The Stargazer) not less interesting because romanticized.

In the Succession States, circumstances and cultural awareness led to the creation of very substantial regionalistic literature; the most admirable work was done by Transylvanian writers centering around a literary periodical, Erdélyi Helikon (Transylvania Helicon), first edited by Aladár Kuncz, later by Lajos Áprily, and finally by László Kovács. The folklore collections of János Kriza in the 19th century (Vadrózhák; Wild Roses), the "Main Street" stories of István Petelei (Vidéki emberek; Men of the Countryside), the fables of Elek Benedek (Szülőföldem; My Native Soil), determined the kind of framework within which the writers of the 20th-century Transylvania, though under foreign rule or because of it, remained. The genuine cultural past of Transylvania functioned like a centripetal force, made more powerful by the crucial demands of post-war conditions. In Transylvanian literature as well as in the Hungarian literature of Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia there were also distinct tendencies of "leftist" character.

The spiritualism of Sándor Remenyik's poetry, the local color of Lajos Áprily, the exquisite imagination of Jenő Dzsida, the disturbing intellectual intensity of Ferenc Szemlér, the pensive energy of László Tompa, afforded poetic experience to those who knew how to differentiate between provincialism and regionalism; the historical novels of Sándor Makkai and Károly Kós, the memoirs of Miklós Kisbán and Aladár Kuncz, the delightful and shrewd folk stories of Áron Tamási and József Nyirő, the enterprising tales of János Kemény and Ernő Ligeti, the critical dissertations of Károly Molter, Miklós Krémer, Géza Tabéry, indicated that the Hungarian language as a medium of creative and critical expression remained authentic in new Transylvania. Hungarian literary regionalism in Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia seemed less rich. One of the characteristic features of recent Hungarian literature has been a rather abundant translation of foreign works; Árpád Tóth, Lőrincz Szabó, Géza Kepes, György Rónay, György Faludy, and others, with varied ability and poetic sensibility, have reproduced in Hungarian the choicest works of Western Europe and America, ancient and modern alike. In the late 19th century János Csengeri, Antal Radó, Károly Szász, and Béla Vikár excelled in this field.

In Hungary proper as well as in the Succession States, especially since 1918, the economic lot of the literati has been anything but enviable. The merciless and frantic logic of poverty offset a great many creative dreams. It was hard to expect writers to have a "healthy" view of life when the disastrous and desolate conditions of their environment ridiculed their private visions. There were scores of "one book" writers and "splendid promises" in modern Hungary and in the Succession States. Nevertheless it is remarkable that they were able to produce as much as they did. Literary work did not necessarily enhance their reputation. The Hungarian spirit, imbued with sorrow, is not decadent in its essence; it is on the contrary vital, chiefly in its indignation and tenderness. But one cannot dismiss from the discussion of Hungarian writers and poets the political and historical intangibles that affect them, and the political, social, and economic tangibles that occupied too much of their energies. The creative instinct that knows how to eliminate unnecessary interferences has its limits; the pressure of political unfairness and poverty almost constant in the past two decades has been apt to destroy the aesthetic zest of very able men and women and compel them to find other objectives in life in order to remain alive.

See: Zs. Beöthy, Magyar irodalomtörténet (1900); A. Polignac, Notes sur la littérature

hongroise (1900); J. Kont, Geschichte der ungarischen Literatur (1906); Fr. Riedl, A History of Hungarian Literature (1906); H. Horváth, Neue ungarische Lyrik (1918); R. Cragger, Bibliographia Hungariae (1923); B. Bartók, Hungarian Folk Music (1931); K. Viski, Hungarian Peasant Customs (1932); J. Pintér, Magyar irodalomtörténet (1935); J. Reményi, "Hungarian Writers and the Tragic Sense," Books Abroad, XIV (1940), 361-364.

J. R.

Hurban Vajanský, Svetozár (1847-1916, Slovak poet and novelist), was, after Hviezdoslav (q.v.), the leading literary figure of Slovakia in the later 19th century. He was the son of the patriot and writer Jozef Miloslav Hurban (1817-1888). He was born at Hlboká, practiced law in different Slovak towns, and later became a journalist and editor. He was frequently fined and even imprisoned by the Magyar authorities. He died in Turčanský Svätý Martin.

Hurban inherited from his father, an associate of L'udevít Štúr, founder of the new Slovak literary language, a strong Slovak nationalism which led him to criticize the Czechs as "Westerners" who had abandoned the true Slavic character. Hurban hoped that the liberation of his nation from the Magyar yoke would be accomplished by Russia. His literary affiliations were largely Russian, especially with Russian Byronism and with Turgenev (q.v.) and Goncharov. As a poet Hurban remained in the tradition of Byronic romanticism. A collection entitled Tatry a more (1880; The Tatra Mountains and the Sea) expressed his love of Slovakia and her natural beauties as well as his hatred of the Magyar oppressors. In his later poetry (e.g., Verše, 1890, Verse) Hurban shows the influence of the Czech poet Vrchlický (q.v.): his style has become more rhetorical and decorative. But Hurban Vajanský's prose is far superior to his poetry. His stories and novels give an excellent though somewhat idealized picture of Slovak society, in the style of a moderate realism. Hurban Vajanský depicts the Slovak landed gentry especially in very favorable colors, since he put all hopes of a national regeneration in this class. The titles of his principal novels are: Letiace tiene (1883; Flying Shadows), Suchá ratolest (1883; The Dry Branch), and Koreň a výhonky (1895-1896; The Root and the Shoots). Hurban Vajanský also wrote travel books, reminiscences, and much political and literary journalism, which secured him the position of a leading man of letters in his nation for many decades.

See: A. Pražák, Studentská léta S. H. Vajanského (1925); A. Mráz, Svetozár Hurban Vajanský (1926).

R. W.

Huysmans, Joris Karl (pseud. of Charles Marie Georges Huysmans, 1848-1907, French novelist and art critic), was born in Paris. He was descended from Dutch painters through his father and from middle-class Burgundians through his mother. In 1866 he became a civil servant at the Ministry of the Interior and remained a "model government officer" until 1898. The only true events in his life are those of his literary achievements, the object of his constant concern, and his reconversion to Catholicism in 1892. With the latter are connected his various sojourns in Benedictine monasteries, particularly at Igny ("Notre-Dame de l'Atre" in En route) and Ligugé ("Val des saints" in L'Oblat). Apart from a few short journeys taken with his novels in view, he remained a confirmed Parisian (e.g., Croquis parisiens, 1880) deeply rooted in the Saint-Sulpice quarter of the capital which is inseparable from his novels. After the Drageoir aux épices (1874), in which Banville found him able "to depict by means of harmony and rhythm," he joined the naturalists and contributed "Sac au dos" to the Les Soirées de Médan (1880). To this period belong Marthe; histoire d'une fille (1876), on the houses of prostitution; Les Sœurs Vatard (1879), on the low life of women book stitchers; En ménage (1881), relating the pitiful love affairs of drab characters soon stifled by the social structure; A vau-l'eau (1882; Eng. tr., Downstream, n.d.); and En rade (not published before 1887). During this phase Huysmans adhered faithfully to the naturalists' creed as put forth in his apology (1876) of Zola (q.v.) which, however, brushed aside the latter's political and scientific preoccupations. On the other hand, he acknowledged Gautier, Flaubert (q.v.), the Goncourts (q.v.), and later Barbey d'Aurevilly (q.v.) as his masters in style. In L'Art moderne (1883), his collected "Salons," Huysmans opened up new art vistas, extolled impressionism, and, as later in Certains (1889), praised the genius of Degas, Renoir, Whistler, and others through keen analyses and lively descriptions giving proof of an original, inquisitive flair.

In 1884 A rebours (Eng. tr., Against the Grain, with introduction by Havelock Ellis, 1922) came as a thunderbolt. In this "minute panorama" (preface to the 1903 edition), richly colored and fashioned like a Persian carpet, he remained far from Baudelaire (q.v.) though claiming him for his master. His hero, Des Esseintes, whose traits were borrowed from Ludwig II of Bavaria, Robert de Montesquiou, and the author himself, disgusted with his times and his own personality, vainly tries to find a reason to live and a new orientation by searching art and literature. Huysmans's use of "artifice" in this work as a specific for disgust inspired Oscar Wilde in the writing of The Picture of Dorian Gray. In A rebours Huysmans does for the Latin writers of the decadence and for the new French poets, Corbière, Mallarmé, (qq.v.), et al., what in L'Art moderne he had done for the impressionists. Zola upbraided Huysmans bitterly for his betrayal of naturalism, but the enthusiastic symbolists opened wide the Revue indépendante to him and Barbey's famous review of the book remains an important document for historians of the modern French novel. All the tendencies and "intellectual atmosphere of that period" were embodied in Huysmans's masterpiece, the source of all his future novels (preface to the 1903 edition).

Là-Bas (1891; Eng. tr., Down There, 1924), concerning black magic from the Middle Ages to our day, preceded the Catholic tetralogy comprising En route (1895; Eng. tr., 1896), which caused many conversions to Catholicism; La Cathédrale (1898; Eng. tr., The Cathedral, 1898), on the Christian symbology at Chartres; L'Oblat (1903; Eng. tr., Oblate, 1924), on liturgy; and Les Foules de Lourdes (1905; Eng. tr., Crowds of Lourdes, 1925). To the end Huysmans prided himself on remaining true to the descriptive, naturalistic method, apparent in Sainte Lydwine de Schiedam (1901; Eng. tr., 1923). He has created a single but famous type bearing in turn the names of Folantin, Des Esseintes, and Durtal, whose main prototype was himself, with his hypersensitivity, pessimism, harsh humor, devotion to art, and genuine religious convictions (see his autobiography signed A. Meunier in Les Hommes d'aujourd'hui No. 263, 1885). His hero anathematizes what sickens, irks, or scandalizes him with crude, coarse words, in a highly colored, intricate style teeming with picturesque treasure troves, and by his "syntactic irony." He enjoys bringing into relief the oddities, sins, and absurdities of the quaint characters for whom he kept on the lookout. Paul Valéry said of Huysmans in Variété II: "He has revealed to many a reader the existence of a hidden, exceptional art, and he derived from mysticism and occultism . . . a somewhat precious literary matter."

See: Havelock Ellis, Affirmations (1898); Barbey d'Aureville, Le Roman contemporain (1902); James Huneker, "The Pessimist's Progress: J.-K. Huysmans," North American Review, CLXXXVI (1907), 41-54; L. Descaves, introduction and postfaces in Huysmans, Œuvres complètes (1928-1934); R. Dumesnil, La Publication d'En route (1931); Fr. Lefèvre, Entretiens sur J.-K. Huysmans (1931). There is a Société J.-K. Huysmans.

M. M.

Hviezdoslav (pseud. of Pavol Országh, 1849-1921, Slovak poet), was the most prominent Slovak verse writer of the later 19th century. He was born at Vyšný Kubín (in the district of Orava), studied law, was a district judge for some time, and then practiced law in different Slovak towns. He became a member of the first National Assembly after the founding of the Czechoslovak republic. He died in his native village.

Hviezdoslav was fundamentally a romantic in his love for the simple people and the beauties of Slovak nature. In distinction from the usual Slovak verse of the time, however, he did not imitate the style of folk poetry; he developed a highly literary and decorative manner which represents an analogue to the diction of Vrchlický (q.v.) and Čech (q.v.) in contemporary Czech writing. Hviezdoslav introduced the most difficult stanzaic forms of the West into Slovak and translated much great foreign poetry into excellent Slovak verse. Versions of Shakespeare's Hamlet and A Midsummer Night's Dream, Madach's The Tragedy of Man, Pushkin's Boris Godunov, as well as excerpts from Goethe represent a solid achievement which demonstrated that Slovak could be used for the most sublime flights of the imagination. Hviezdoslav also wrote much poetry drawn from Old Testament subjects: two epical poems, Agar (1883) and Ráchel (1891), and a verse drama, Herodes a Herodias (1909). In spite of these systematic moves to escape provincialism in subject matter and form, Hviezdoslav remained an ardent Slovak patriot who strongly believed in the common people and democracy. This democratic outlook made him sympathetic to the Czechs, and he hailed the union of the Czechs and Slovaks after 1918 with genuine enthusiasm. All told, his best work is in the poems with Slovak settings. Hájniová žena (1886; The Gamekeeper's Wife) is a simple story of a gamekeeper's wife who shoots the son of her master when he forces his attentions on her and who then pays with temporary madness. A versified family chronicle, Ežo Vlkolinský (1890), and its continuation, Gábor Vlkolinský (1899), depict the regeneration by peasant blood of a gentry family and give a vivid picture of Slovak country life. Here Hviezdoslav's power of observation and description, his sonorous verse, his love for his people, have full play and compensate for a lack of deeper powers of characterization or more original handling of ideas and forms.

See: P. Bujnák, P. Országh-Hviezdoslav (1919).

R. W.

I

Ibsen, Henrik (1828–1906, Norwegian dramatist and poet), was born in the small town of Skien, in southeastern Norway, of wealthy merchant parents. When he was eight years old, however, his father went bankrupt, and before he was 16 he was apprenticed to a pharmacist in the still smaller town of Grimstad, where he worked for more than six years. He had high ambitions, prepared himself for the university, and went to Christiania in 1850 in order to take his entrance examinations, but did not finish them. When, later in life, he had a doctor's degree, it was an honorary title granted him by the University of Uppsala in 1877.

The characteristic qualities observable in him in his childhood and youth are a vivid sensitiveness and a rebellious mind. Ibsen was early drawn to literary production and tried his hand at many literary forms—poems, novels, dramas—imitating authors of different styles but at the same time strongly self-assertive, endeavoring to protect himself against the pressure of surroundings and satirizing them. He felt his efforts toward mental liberation strengthened by the revolutions of 1848 and in the winter of 1848–1849 wrote the first work that revealed something of his deepest tendencies, the drama Catiline. This glorifies the fight of a rebel, and the reason for Catiline's defeat is sought in his failure to keep faith with himself, in the betrayal of his own true personality.

Catiline was published anonymously in 1850, but without the slightest success. An opposition weekly on which Ibsen was collaborating during the next year, still anonymously, had no more success. He was happy to be called as a stage manager to the new Norwegian theatre established at Bergen in 1850 for the purpose of liberating the theatrical art from the Danish traditions, and he worked there for six years (1851–1857). Later he was called as a director for the Norwegian theatre at Christiania, set up with the same program, and there he worked for five years until the theatre went bankrupt (1862).

Meanwhile he had published, now under his own name, three new dramas, all of them complying with the demand of the age for reviving national traditions. But he felt ever more unhappy in all this "servant's work" and at last rebelled. In 1862 was published his first modern drama, Kaerlighedens komedie (The Comedy of Love), satirizing the contemporary conventions of betrothal and marriage and thereby scandalizing bourgeois society. The next year he used a theme of history as a call to his nation for truly national action in the drama Kongs-emnerne (1863; The Pretenders). But he felt he could not write in full freedom as long as he stayed at home, and in the spring of 1864 he left Norway and went to Rome.

Ibsen remained abroad until 1891, making only short visits to Norway in 1874 and 1885. He was not assimilated in any way by the foreign countries where he lived during all those years, mostly Italy and Germany. His need was to keep free of all influences and pressures that might tend to suppress his mental independence, and the works he sent home from abroad were belligerent dramas intended to raise his nation to moral truth and freedom. He devoted his life to dramatic authorship with a singular pertinacity, feeling that the drama form was the natural expression of battles within himself.

The volcanic drama Brand (1866), with its transcendental ethical demand for faithfulness to the mission of providence, stirred profoundly the whole Scandinavian world and made Ibsen the moral prophet of these nations. The Norwegian state authorities honored him by an annual stipend like that given to Björnson (q.v.). In the next year, 1867, was published the counterpart of Brand, the fanciful satire of moral faithlessness and self-betrayal, Peer Gynt. This character was pictured as the Norwegian type, and the work was received with both anger and enthusiasm combined. And in a merry comedy, De unge forbund (1869; The League of Youth), he pictured a Peer Gynt in politics, representing the traits of several Norwegian politicians.

In an interval after these plays there was published a selection of his poems (Digte, 1871; Poems) and a philosophical double drama, Kejser og Galilaer (1873; Emperor and Galilean), in which Ibsen tried to clarify his own ideas about the future, in a dialectical way predicting a kind of unity between paganism and Christianity which virtually amounted to a demand for personal moral unity.

Then followed, from 1877 on, the new series of combat dramas which at once won world fame for him. They continued what Björnson had begun in 1875, but with still more dramatic energy and consistency, one work after the other attacking the moral conventions of modern society. In Samfundets stötter (1877; The Pillars of Society) Ibsen presented the businessman who betrayed his love and himself for wealth and social power. Et dukkehjem (1879; A Doll's House) showed the falseness of a marriage that did not rest upon true comradeship. In Gengangere (1881; Ghosts) he pictured the tragic consequences of a marriage enforced by social considerations, not by love. The comedy En folkefiende (1882; An Enemy of the People) satirized gaily all the people who did not want to listen to truth that came athwart their personal interests. All these dramas were brilliantly constructed, virtually on the same plan as the Greek tragedies, rushing direct into the catastrophe. They were performed in innumerable theatres and in many languages all over the world, and everywhere they roused heated discussions by virtue of their appeal to the conscience of every individual. At the same time they were profound psychological studies, deeply searching into the secret forces of man's character. In fact, the deepest craving of Ibsen was the moral honesty of man toward himself, and his dramas more and more became purely psychological, seeking the battle and the victory within the souls of man. Such above all were Vildanden (1884; The Wild Duck), Rosmersholm (1886), Hedda Gabler (1890), certainly eminent creations of dramatic authorship, the favorite plays of the greatest actors and actresses.

In 1891 Ibsen returned to Norway and remained at Christiania until his death. Here he wrote a series of dramas of a more introspective nature and finished his life work by what he called a dramatical epilogue, Nar vi döde vågner (1899; When We Dead Awaken), a final account of his whole authorship, charging himself with having devoted all his efforts to aesthetical production instead of direct action and thus failing himself to appreciate the far-reaching moral effects of his literary works. His nation and the whole world felt the impact of his insistence upon new moral values and what he himself called the moving of mental boundaries. Ibsen's works have been translated into the principal European languages and into Japanese; an English edition of his collected works by William Archer was published 1906–1912.

See: H. Jaeger, Ibsen (1888; Eng. tr., 1890); G. Brandes, Ibsen (1898, in Danish); Ibsen, Breve, ed. by H. Koht and J. Elias (2 vols., 1904); E. Gosse, Ibsen (1907, in English); R. Woerner, Ibsen, 2d ed. (2 vols., 1912, in German); Ibsen, Samlede verker; hundreårs-utgave, ed. by F. Bull, H. Koht, and D. A. Seip (1928–); H. Koht, Henrik Ibsen (2 vols., 1928–1929; Eng. tr., 1931); A. E. Zucker, Ibsen, the Master Builder (1929).

H. K.

Icelandic literature. As in no other Germanic country, tradition in Icelandic literature is unbroken, from the time of the Eddic poems (800–1200) and the sagas (13th century) to the present day. From the time of the settlement of the island (874) there is no break in the language; hence people, even children, read the Eddas and sagas with little more difficulty than the daily newspaper. Modern poets still compose their poems according to the alliterative rules valid in Eddic poetry and Beowulf, and the saga style is much in evidence in popular literature. Even the heroic spirit of the sagas, though sorely beset through the ages by the church on the one hand and by escapist French romances in prose and in rhyme (rimur) on the other, has never quite lost its hold on the people, and in the romantic revival of the 1830's it flared up with renewed vigor.

The romantic movement, of Danish-German origin, had two aspects: admiration for the golden age of the sagas and hopes and demands for increased political independence of the country. Both ideas are still potent in Icelandic literature, though the latter lost its actuality after 1918, when Iceland gained national independence. The pioneers of the romantic movement were Bjarni Thórarensen (1786–1841) and Jónas Hallgrímsson (1807–1845). The tradition was continued by Grímur Thomsen, Benedikt S. Gröndal, Steingrímur Thorsteinsson, and Matthías Jochumsson (qq.v.), who was for half a century the leading poet of Iceland. The romanticists created a puristic prose with patterns from the sagas and from popular speech; this style may be called, however paradoxically, classical style of the 19th and 20th centuries. Its greatest early monuments were Sveinbjörn Egilsson's translations of the Iliad and the Odyssey, Jón Árnason's Íslenzkar þjóðsögur og æfintýri (1862–1864; Eng. tr., Icelandic Legends, 2 vols., 1864–1866), and Jón Thóroddsen's novels Piltur og stúlka (1850; Eng. tr., Lad and Lass, 1890) and Maður og kona (1876; Man and Wife). Though partly idyllic, these abound, too, in humorous characters. Thóroddsen wrote under the influence of Scott. The playwright Indriði Einarsson (1851–1939) wrote romantic and realistic dramas and worked indefatigably for the stage in Reykjavík.

Under the influence of Georg Brandes (q.v.) Icelandic students in Copenhagen inaugurated a movement of realism with the periodical Verðandi (1882; The Present). Its individualistic liberalism broke with the narrow fundamentalist outlook of the Lutheran State Church. Social and intellectual criticism marked its beginnings, and Gestur Pálsson (1852–1891), one of Verðandi's editors, a brilliant short-story writer, never outgrew this attitude. But Hannes Hafstein (1861–1922), a spirited singer of love, life, and liberty, became a national romantic, and Einar H. Kvaran (q.v.) became an apostle of Christian humanitarianism and spiritualism after the turn of the century. Of the realists none were more important than the Icelandic-Canadian Stephan G. Stephansson and Þorsteinn Erlingsson (qq.v.). They had similar views, but were of different poetic genius: Erlingsson was a perfectionist in the art of simplicity, while Stephansson was ornate. Stephansson towers over most of his contemporaries, not only in Iceland, but also in Canada.

In the 1870's and 1880's Icelanders flocked to America, especially to Canada, with the greatest settlement in and near Winnipeg. Many others besides Stephansson belong to this group, among them the writer of adventure stories Jóhann Magnús Bjarnason (1867–1945), the humorous poet Kristján Niels Júlíus (1859–1936), the poet and playwright Guttormur J. Guttormsson (1878–), and the poetess Jakobína Johnson (1883–).

In the 1890's reaction set in against the more negative aspects of realism: faith was reborn in a new form (Kvaran), and nationalism was reasserted. The leader of nationalism was Einar Benediktsson (q.v.), who ranks with Stephansson as a poet. He was a progressive nationalist as well as a natural philosopher, even a mystic, and a consummate artist. The two geniuses had deep roots in Old Icelandic and were at the same time completely modern. Stephansson was the greater man, Einar Benediktsson the greater artist.

Two farmers emerged as novelists of note. Þorgils Gjallandi (pseud. of Jón Stefánsson, 1851–1915) and Guðmundur Friðjónsson (q.v.). While both began as realists, the latter—who wrote mostly short stories and poetry—became a leading interpreter of the farmer's point of view as well as a national romanticist. His style is rich and individualistic. But the greatest novelist of the first two decades of the century, except for Kvaran, was Jón Trausti (q.v.). A progressive national romanticist, he was the first to depict social changes on a large canvas (Halla-Heiðarbýlð, 4 vols., 1906–1911, Halla and the Heath Cottage; Leysing, 1907, Thaw). Later he wrote romantic historical novels. His style is uneven, but his characters are full blooded and sound. Apart from the others stands the Catholic Jón Svenson (q.v.), who went to France, became a Jesuit, and later was one of the most important writers of youth literature in Catholic Europe.

At the turn of the century Icelandic writers were shifting their interest from social, national, and political progress to concern with their art, themselves, and man's soul as well as man's dreams. Nationalism remained, to be sure, but it took the form of devotion to folk poetry and folklore and, later, of scrutiny of the national character. In this neo-romantic movement French "decadent" tendencies were mixed with Nietzsche's (q.v.) ideas about the genius and the superman. The movement gained momentum in the first two decades of the century. Among the first to reflect the new tendencies were Guðmundur Guðmundsson (1874–1919) and Hulda (pseud. of Unnur Benediktsdóttir, 1881–), lyric poets, the latter more recently a romantic novelist.

A group of writers wrote in Danish to win a wider public. They were led by the gifted playwright Jóhann Sigurjónsson (q.v.), whose tragedy Fjalla-Eyvindur (1912; Eng. tr., Eyvind of the Hills, 1916) instantly won European acclaim. The lyric poet Jónas Guðlaugsson (1887–1916) wrote some short stories as well. Guðmundur Kamban (q.v.) turned cosmopolitan social critic in the 1920's, but returned to Icelandic subjects in the 1930's. Gunnar Gunnarsson (q.v.) has been strictly loyal to his homeland in choice of subjects. After a romantic start, he wrote somber problem novels during the First World War. But in the post-war period he expressed his faith in the race in a series of autobiographical and historical novels which have won him a European reputation.

Meanwhile there appeared in Iceland the realistic and humorous poets Jakob Thórarensen (1886–) and Örn Arnarson (pseud. of Magnús Stefánsson, 1884–1942) and the pure lyric poets Sigurður Sigurðsson frá Arnarholti (1879–1939), Jakob Jóhannesson Smári (1889–), and Stefán (Sigurðsson) frá Hvítadal (1887–1933). Under Norwegian influence the last named wrote some of the most original lyrics of the second decade of the century (Söngvar förumannsinnis, 1918; The Songs of the Wanderer); later he turned Catholic. Important as a leader of literary opinion was Sigurður Nordal (q.v.), essayist and professor of Icelandic literature since 1918. His exquisite lyric prose fragments have had few imitators, but his interpretation of neo-romantic ideals in contrast to the reigning humanitarianism and liberalism (of Kvaran) as well as his revaluation of the Old Icelandic heritage have both been epoch-making (see the remarkable synthesis in Íslenzk menning, 1942-, Icelandic Culture).

A new generation of writers, starting under neo-romantic auspices in the early 1920's, later turned modernistic in various ways which perhaps might be termed neo-realistic. Davíð Stefánsson (q.v.) is the most representative and popular poet of this generation—fiery, sensual, with a considerable strain of folk poetry in his lyrics. Of late he has also won acclaim as a novelist and a playwright. Other poets are the ardent nationalist Jón Magnússon (1896–1944) (see his Bláskógar, 1925, Blue Forests), the fervid socialist Jóhannes (Jónasson) úr Kötlum (1899–) (Ég læt sem ég sofi, 1932, I Pretend to Sleep) as well as the two perfectionists Tómas Guðmundsson (1901–) and Jón Helgason (1899–), who is professor of Old Norse-Icelandic at the University of Copenhagen. Guðmundsson, a humorist, also knows how to endow the commonplace with a romantic tinge (Fagra veröld, 1933; Fair World), while Helgason, a satirist, also broods in beautiful verse over his exile and over the rushing away of this our fleeting life (Úr landsuðri, 1939; From the South east).

Recent novelists are Guðmundur G. Hagalín, Kristmann Guðmundsson, and Halldór Kiljan Laxness (qq.v.). The first two have remained more or less unchanged: Hagalín excels in depicting heroes in homespun, not least the sailors of his home district; Guðmundsson, writing in Norwegian, is a master of the modern romance and a consummate storyteller. Laxness, the most gifted, is the real creator of present-day literary style, reflecting the storm and stress of the turbulent modern age. After a Catholic intermezzo, Laxness turned socialistic, thus joining a movement of the leftists that had been launched by the essayist Þórbergur Þórðarson (q.v.) with his Bréf til Láru (1924; Letter to Laura). Þórðarson had also rebelled against the lyrical effusions of his romantic contemporaries, and later he was to write a most interesting autobiography in which meet the countercurrents of the sagas and the modern psychological novel (Íslenzkur aðall, 1938, Icelandic Nobility; Ofvitinn, 2 vols., 1940–1941, The Eccentric). His rich and varicolored writing was a forerunner of a new style in direct contrast to the classic one that had held sway for a century. But it was the privilege of Laxness actually to create the new style in his great novels, beginning with Vefarinn mikli frá Kasmír (1927; The Great Weaver from Kashmir). The impact of his work on his contemporaries has been such that not only the beginners imitated him, but older men like Kamban (Skálholt, 4 vols., 1930–1935; Eng. tr., of Vols. I and II, The Virgin of Skálholt, 1935) and Hagalín (Kristrún í Hamravík, 1933) began to experiment with a new, though different, style. In the middle 1930's there was also a flocking to the leftist banner among the younger writers (none of whom is here mentioned). A new literary society, publishing the periodicals Rauðir pennar (1935; Red Pens) and Timarit Máls og menningar (1940–; The Journal of Language and Culture), was formed to propagate their ideas. But in spite of their communistic ideals, they were also so nationalistic that they published Nordal's Íslenzk menning, the greatest work of the national romantic school. Thus old and new, as always, clasp hands in present-day Iceland.

See: J. C. Poestion, Isländische Dichter der Neuzeit (1897); H. Hermannsson, Icelandic Authors of To-day (1913), Vol. VI of Islandica; R. Beck, ed., Icelandic Lyrics (1930) and Icelandic Poems and Stories (1943); G. Finnbogason, "Literature," in Thorsteinn Thorsteinson, ed., Iceland (3d ed., 1936), pp. 151–176; R. Beck, "Icelandic Literature [and] Icelandic-American Literature," in Frederika Blankner, ed., The History of the Scandinavian Literatures (1938), pp. 231–287, 368–377; S. Einarsson, "Five Icelandic Novelists," Books Abroad, XVI (1942), 254–259.

S. E.

Iglesies, Ignasi (1871–1928, Catalan dramatist), brought a new manner to the Catalan theatre—that of individualistic materialism. Born in San Andrés de Palomar (Barcelona) of a laboring family, he knew from childhood the sufferings of this social class, whose representatives he glorified in his work; he came to be known as the "poeta dels humils." Iglesias began his education in Lérida, but soon abandoned his studies in order to dedicate himself to literature. Still very young, he produced Fructidor (1897), and L'escorço (1902; The Scorpion), works in which one can discern the influence of Ibsen (q.v.). The struggles of the workingmen, their economic plight, were presented by Iglesias in numerous works, among which the drama Els vells (1903; The Old Ones) is outstanding, and enjoyed an extraordinary success in Barcelona and, translated into French, in Paris. Lari and La mare eterna (1902; The Eternal Mother) were translated into Italian. Another successful work of Iglesias, also social in nature, is the drama Les Garces (The Herons). Still other pieces are: La Resclosa (The Canal Lock), in which the routine concept of morality is combated; El cor el poble (1897; The Heart of the Humble); Foc nou (New Fire); and the comedy of manners Girasol (Sunflower). His last productions include L'encis de la gloria (The Charm of Glory) and La llar apagada (The Cold Hearth). The theatre of Iglesias, while it represented a novelty in the Catalonia of the beginning of the 20th century, seems antiquated today. The plot, which is the crux of his work, is extremely simple, at times even puerile. His desire for social justice, inspired to a certain extent by the thesis-plays of the French theatre, suffers from an exaggerated ingeniousness and is encumbered, moreover, by a special form of depressing sentimentality.

See: R. Darío, "Films fe Paris," Nación (Buenos Aires), May 2, 1912; J. Bernat i Duran, Historia del teatro en Cataluña y Valencia (1924); R. Tasis i Marca, La literatura catalana moderna (1937).

J. M. M. i V.

Ignotus (pseud. of Hugo Veigelsberg, 1869–, Hungarian critic, poet, publicist) was born in Budapest. Son of a noted journalist, he grew up in intellectual surroundings. He contributed to A Hét (The Week), a literary weekly published and edited by the poet József Kiss (q.v.); he wrote political articles and essays for Világ (World), a radical daily, and for its successor, Magyar Hírlap (Hungarian Journal). Nyugat (West) was established in 1908; Ignotus was one of the editors, and later editor in chief, of this literary periodical. Nyugat was considered a rebellious literary publication by the conservatives and by those who lacked ability, and in many respects it did attack static views. In 1919 Ignotus became a political refugee; since then he has sought shelter in Rumania (Transylvania), Czechoslovakia, Austria, and finally America. He arrived in New York in 1941.

The place of Ignotus in modern Hungarian literature is unique. His name is synonymous with critical mobility; he considered eclectic insight indispensable for the proper understanding of creative work and insisted upon the freedom of creative expression. He accepted the right of the poet and the writer to remain true to his own manner or mannerisms; since his own Hungarian was not sufficiently consistent with certain traditions of the Hungarian language, he was unyielding in his view that style is inevitably personal and that verbal idiosyncracies or innovations, if artistically exciting, do not constitute an aesthetic crime. Through the creative spirit he endeavored to find that freedom of man to which the whole of humanity is entitled—and that human dignity. Therefore while he excluded politics from literature, his literary abilities were used to serve politics when progress as he understood it was being furthered.

His critical jottings, aphorisms, and elucidations show wit, knowledge, cultured sensibility, liveliness, universality. Olvasás közben (1902; While Reading), Kísérletek (1909; Experiments), and other critical or reflective writings of Ignotus have a pioneering significance in Hungarian literature; his Változatok a G húron (1907; Variations on a G String) unfold a soul unwilling to compromise with drudgery, dullness, stupidity, pettiness, and conceit. His poems and stories are authentic expressions of a creative spirit; wisdom, feeling, and delight are reflected with urbane sophistication and a somewhat distraught sensitiveness. Ignotus was always a conscientious craftsman, but his own phrasing was often somewhat involved. As a crusader of good literature, he helped many Hungarian writers and poets to become recognized. The aesthetics of Ignotus were really the ethics of a very gifted critic, poet, and literary editor.

J. R.

Ilf, Ilya Arnoldovich (pseud. of Ilya Arnoldovich Fainzilber, 1897–1937, Russian humorist and journalist), was born in Odessa; his father was a Jewish white-collar worker. The son received a technical education and for a time tried various occupations. Reaching Moscow after the Revolution, Ilf became connected with different satiric magazines. A chance suggestion made by Valentin Katayev (q.v.) began the well-known collaboration of Ilf with Petrov (q.v.), Katayev's brother. Together they wrote Dvenadtsat stulyev (1928; Eng. tr., Diamonds to Sit On, 1930), a picaresque novel of the adventures of some would-be "capitalists" who seek the diamonds hidden in one of 12 chairs. The plot gives the authors excellent opportunities to poke fun at the various weaknesses of socialist society. The novel ends with the murder of Ostap Bender, "the great combinator," and the revelation that the secret had already been discovered and the diamonds used to build a workers' club. In Zolotoi telyonok (1933; Eng. tr., The Little Golden Calf, 1932) a resurrected Ostap leads a band of lesser crooks in pursuit of the millions mulcted from Soviet enterprises by another representative of private initiative. The ingenious Bender succeeds, but discovers that money has no power in a socialist state. Here, the vignettes of various types are equally amusing, but the plot is firmer, and the undercurrent of serious satire is more noticeable. After their first novel, Ilf and Petrov wrote and traveled together. A trip to the United States resulted in Oднотазһная Америка (1937; Eng. tr., Little Golden America, 1937); it is the work of experienced observers, but its chief interest for us is in its point of view. The two friends also contributed short stories and feuilletons to Pravda and the humorous magazines, using many pseudonyms including Fyodor Tolstoyevski. The best of these short pieces may be found in Kak sozdavalsya Robinson (1933; How Robinson Was Created), Chudesnyie gosti (1935; Wonderful Guests), and Tonya (1937; Tonya). As in the novels, the targets for satire are vulgarity, pettiness, greed, hostility to the Soviet state, and bureaucracy; but there is less humor, and the attacks are often direct. With Petrov and Katayev, Ilf collaborated in a scenario and wrote Bogataya nevesta (1936; The Rich Bride), a satiric comedy on an old subject in a new setting. After Ilf's death from tuberculosis, Petrov published his friend's notes (Zapisnyie knizhki, 1939; Notebooks), adding an illuminating preface.

See: "Ilf," in Literaturnaya entsiklopediya, Vol. IV (1930); obituary notices in Literaturnaya gazeta, April 15, 1937; L. Levin, "Zametki o satiricheskoi proze," Molodaya gvardiya, 1939, No. 9, pp. 151-158.

P. A. P.

Ilić, Vojislav J. (1862-1894, Serb poet), son of the renowned poet Jovan Ilić, had many educational advantages in his father's home in Belgrade, but he was difficult and unadaptable. Later, as a civil servant, he was still undisciplined, and his career was often interrupted by his instability—as well as by his fierce opposition to Serbian administrative authorities.

Ilić wrote a certain amount of prose (notably Shakespeare-ov Koriolan, 1882, Shakespeare's Coriolanus; Shakespeare i Bacon, 1883, Shakespeare and Bacon), but he is important chiefly as a poet. He started in early youth, and a first volume, Pesme (Poems), appeared in 1887, followed by a second volume in 1889; posthumous collections of his verse were published in 1907 and 1909. Ilić broke away, or intended to break away and sometimes did, from romantic conventions both of form and substance; he hated pathos, rhetoric, and subjectivity and tried to make his poems as impersonal, pure, and serene as fine sculpture. He turned to remote countries and above all to classical antiquity whose beauty he deeply felt. He is indeed in some moods a modern classicist and treated such themes as Pythia, the death of Pericles, the Argonauts. He also produced, however, quite subjective, freedom-inspired patriotic ballads and romances. His visual and auditory perceptiveness was exceptional; his poems abound in images and musical effects. Had he lived longer his work might have been of an incomparable variety and richness. The harmony between idea and form in Ilić's best poems is absolute. His art has not been surpassed in Serbia, and he has had a profound influence upon Serb poets.

See: L. Nedić, In novije srpske lirike (1893); J. Skerlić, Vojislav J. Ilić (1907).

P. A.

Iłakowicz, Kazimiera (1892-, Polish poet), was born in Wilno of good Polish-Lithuanian gentry stock and reared, after the early death of both parents, by the family of the Counts Plater-Zyberk. Despite her aristocratic upbringing, she was attracted during her student days at the Jagiellonian University (Cracow) to socialism. After finishing her formal education at Oxford, she served as a nurse at the Russian front in the First World War, and from this experience came the passionately humanitarian verses of Trzy struny (1917; Three Strings). From 1918 to 1926 she was a clerk in the Foreign Office of the new Polish government, and after the May coup (1926), private secretary to Marshal Piłsudski.

Iłakowicz strikes in poetry the same note brought by Piłsudski himself to politics: the warm, romantic, expansive, land-loving spirit of the Border gentry. She is a superb lyricist, and whatever shortcomings her poetry may possess are due to carelessness and haste rather than to any lack of the poetic gift. Of her many published volumes, the following should be noted: Rymy dziecięce (1923; Childlike Rhymes), charming and whimsical verses written for her nieces; Placzący ptak (1927; Weeping Bird); Z głębi serca (1928; From the Heart's Depth); Popiół i perły (1930; Ashes and Pearls); Ballady bohaterские (1934; Heroic Ballads); and Wesołe wierszyki (1934; Gay Little Verses), a new collection of children's rhymes. In 1939 Iłakowicz won wide notoriety with her Ścieżka obok drogi (A Lane alongside the Highroad), an intimate, personal memoir of Marshal Piłsudski. The Second World War found her in Hungary, employing her time there in the translation of Hungarian classics.

See: K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 118-124, 695-696; A. P. Coleman, "Kazimiera Iłakowicz," Books Abroad, XI (1937), 292-294.

A. P. C.

Ilyin, Mikhail Andreyevich, see Osorgin, Mikhail Andreyevich.

Iorga, Nicolae (1871-1940, Rumanian historian, literary critic, and statesman), born in Botoșani, studied in Jassy, Paris, Berlin, and Leipzig, and became a professor of world history at the University of Bucharest in 1885 and a member of the Rumanian Academy in 1900. He was also the director of the Rumanian school in Fontenay-aux-Roses near Paris and a visiting professor at the Sorbonne for several years. In 1903 he took over the editorship of Sămănătorul (The Sower) and created a literary movement of national and traditional character. Iorga took part in politics, was a member of the Chamber of Deputies, and for a short time premier of Rumania. In 1940 he was assassinated by Iron Guardists.

Romantic at heart and a historian in his outlook, Iorga glorified the past and emphasized the importance of the peasantry. Opposed to socialism and populism because they preach class antagonism, he believed he had established a brand new school of thought. His "sămănătorism" advocated above everything that the writer should seek inspiration in the villages, where the aboriginal people with their lore and poetry have survived all the vicissitudes of time. Yet the result of this current was a literature impregnated with French and other foreign influences, following a line bordering on Maiorescu's and Dobrogeanu-Gherea's (qq.v.) schools.

Iorga was an amazingly prolific writer, and his historical treatises and published documents, literary works and collections of political articles and speeches, pamphlets and translations from world literatures, amount to almost two thousand titles. He mastered several languages, was exceptionally versatile and a spectacular orator. He visited the United States in 1929; My American Lectures appeared in English in 1932.

See: S. Metes, Ce a scris N. Iorga (1913).

L. F.

Italian literary criticism (see also Italian literature) is often considered the most significant contribution of Italy to letters since 1900. An eminent Austrian scholar, Schlosser, without nationalistic or political bias, wrote in 1924: "Italy, cradle of every theory and history of art, has become as formerly the teacher of the rest of Europe." Schlosser thinks that only future generations will be aware of the importance of the new theories. One may at least record them now as a special feature of recent Italian literature, and apart—as indeed the new doctrines more or less require—from the biographies of recent Italian critics.

The dominance of the ideas of Croce (q.v.) becomes immediately apparent. Not a great artist, but certainly a great thinker, he is the hero of this intellectual scene. It is to him that the new criticism is to be attributed—with proper deference to his forerunners Vico and De Sanctis (q.v.). Vico and De Sanctis are brilliantly and thoroughly clarified, revised, and brought to life by Croce. The termination of the division between form and content, a heritage of the classical criticism initiated by Plato and Aristotle, is the central idea of the new criticism. In the Vico to Croce sequence, form and content become one and the same unique spiritual act.

The consequences of the principle are many, and here the credit must go entirely to Croce. A mere list of them is bound to seem scholastic and mechanical, especially since what is vital is the spirit. But certain classifiable recommendations do become a part of the new canon, and it is useful to know what they are. Adherence to these recommendations can never by itself make one an expert of the new criticism; the critic must, as in the past, be first of all a man of sensitivity and good taste. The recommendations may then prevent him from attacking artificial problems or entering into futile discussions, in the same way that hygienic measures are an aid to the surgeon against infection even though they will not teach him how to perform an operation.

Here are the new doctrines, which come directly from and are explained by the philosophy of Croce and especially by his concept of intuition. (1) A work of art must be considered in terms of its interior significance, from its auroral birth in the mind of the poet, not in terms of its final and material results. No question of success, of money, of fame, of pleasure, of opportunity, must enter into literary criticism. (2) External to the work of art are all details concerning the times, the personal life, or even the psychology of the artist. The wine of which Carducci (q.v.) wrote is not the wine he actually drank. (3) The work of art may be thought of as a historic document, or even as an economic fact, a proper subject for sermons, a good piece of pedagogy, an example of patriotism, but these things do not enter into literary criticism, which must concern itself only with the aesthetic value. In this new criticism art is not indifferent to morality, as in the formula "art for art's sake," but pre-existent and therefore independent of it. (4) The work of art represents an individual moment in the life of the spirit, a form of intuition, and must therefore be studied in itself, not in connection with works similar in external forms. In this criticism, literary genres or forms do not exist. The tragedies of Alfieri, e.g., are to be studied as a moment in the history of Alfieri, not Alfieri as a moment in the history of tragedy. Further, the autobiography of Alfieri must be studied in connection with his other works and not with works similar in subject matter, such as the autobiographies of Cellini or of Goethe. It is perfectly futile to ask if a work of art is a novel or a short story, a lyric or an epic: the only thing that matters is whether it possesses a lyrical feeling, and the nature of this feeling. (5) A work of art is a synthesis, i.e., a new moment of the spirit; and however interesting it may be to consider separately the elements which the synthetic act organized in a new life, this research does not enter into literary criticism, which therefore does not include any study on sources, imitations, and influences. Stones, if they once belonged to an artistic building, or were even already sculptured or made ornate, are again stones when used in a new edifice. (6) Comparison being a general method of research, so-called comparative literature is not to be considered as a science apart, but a method to be used in appropriate cases. Comparisons founded on the "same" subject are false. The Satan of Dante is not the Satan of Milton; there is never the "same" subject under different forms. (7) The ideas of the poet, and especially what has been called his "poetics," are a very interesting subject of study, but cannot be used to determine what the art of the poet is; on the contrary, the artist often arrives where he had no intention of going—like Tasso, who started writing a heroic religious poem and ended by writing instead an amorous, sensuous melodrama. Sometimes poetics are a hindrance to lyricism, as in the case of Dante. (8) Since each author has his own language or technique, literary criticism consists in showing the individual creation, selecting and commenting upon the special characteristic expressions of the artist. One of the critics, Giulio Bertoni (1878–1943), here distinguishes between lingua, which is language as expression, and linguaggio, which is language as communication. No history of technique (of sonnets, canzoni, etc.) is therefore permitted in this literary criticism; and consequently there are no such things as schools of poetry. (9) The principal business of literary criticism is to find the unifying sentiment which underlies the synthesis. The new critics, therefore, have made frequent studies on the unity of important works, but have avoided finding unity in plots, intrigues, characters, events, and have consistently found it in a certain feeling or tone (e.g., the unity of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso lies in the feeling of world harmony, and not in the war between Saracens and Christians, or in the love of Ruggero and Bradamante, or in the folly of Orlando, etc.) (10) The work of the critic consists in selecting the pure form from the impure, the living from the dead, in short, what is real art from what is bombastic, or pedagogical, or abstract truth from what is an instant of fatigue or a morality or an arid moment of the poet. (11) New experiences and the development of humanity renovate literary criticism, which can never be final. In many cases the real life of the author begins with his actual death. Every new generation will have its own interpretation of the past, but it will not be disconnected from preceding criticism. Like every scientific work, literary criticism is similar to a chain. Studies on the so-called "fortune of an author," therefore, have been popular with the school of Croce. A successful example is that of Vittore Branca on the fortune of Boccaccio's Decameron (Linee di una storia della critica al "Decameron," 1939). (12) Finally, the consideration of a work of art as individual unique intuition makes it impossible to write a history of literature. A connection between different intuitions does not exist, and any effort to establish it provokes, in the end, a mixture of criticism with the history of culture or of religion or of national feeling which is the too obvious defect in De Sanctis's Storia della letteratura italiana (2 vols., 1871; Eng. tr., History of Italian Literature, 1931). A history of literature can only be conceived in the form of essays devoted to single authors.

It is easy to see that these tenets run counter to most of the previous criticism and are highly antiprofessional. They reduce all criticism to an aesthetic judgment. It is true that this aesthetic judgment is a historic one, and therefore every fact may be useful in its formation, but the preparation of the judgment is not the judgment itself. Men with little historical preparation, such as De Sanctis by comparison with Carducci, may possess an insight superior to those with a great deal of such erudition—as is evident in the writings on Dante by these two critics. It is quality not the quantity of the documents that is of value.

The new criticism calls for concentration, brevity, search for unity. Generally all appearances of erudition vanish, and several of the best books of this kind have no footnotes. (See Francesco Gaeta, Salvatore di Giacomo, 1911; Eugenio Donadoni, Antonio Fogazzaro, 1913; Luigi Russo, Salvatore di Giacomo, 1921; Piero Nardi, Antonio Fogazzaro, 1938.) Some of these critics even write well, which since the generation of the 80's was considered if not actually a sin, at least a luxury. Some do not belong to the professional set, except that they write for newspapers and magazines.

Whatever one may think of this philosophy of art and of this radical rebuilding of the house of criticism, it is a historic fact that after Croce Italian literature has been completely renewed by these ideas. Little by little at the beginning, and more rapidly later, partly through Croce, partly through his disciples, partly even through those who opposed Croce but could not help following in his footsteps, new values enter into the history of literature. There are new names, new characteristics, new problems, new answers to old questions, new shifts of emphasis on authors or periods. These changes were not the result of the discovery of fresh facts and the publication of unknown documents, as was believed by the critics of historic positivism, but came through the critical vigor of Croce.

Many have had a part in this movement, but none perhaps are so outstanding, compared with the master, as to justify extensive treatment here. The best are those nurtured in the new atmosphere created by Croce in those universities where the old system had dominated (see, e.g., the recollections of a Gentile, q.v., in Pisa at the school of D'Ancona, or of a Casella in Florence at that of Rajna). Eugenio Donadoni (1870–1924) in his writings on Foscolo and Fogazzaro (q.v.) and Attilio Momigliano (q.v.) on Manzoni come first to mind.

A category apart must be made for those writers who were influenced by the criticism of Croce when their minds had already been somewhat definitely formed along traditional lines: such men, Vittorio Rossi (1865–1938), Francesco Flamini (1868–1922), Ernesto Giacomo Parodi (1862–1923), et al., made adjustments.

Another category could be made up for those who tried to go beyond Croce. The most important is certainly Gentile, who insisted on the unity of the spiritual act against the divisions made by Croce between the aesthetic and the philosophic moments. For Gentile the work of art is always also a work of thought. The results of this point of view as seen in his literary essays of more recent years (on Dante, Manzoni, Leopardi) show that to Gentile—and likewise to Mario Casella in his essays on Provençal poets, Dante, and Cervantes—the authors under discussion emerge as if lacking really distinctive personal qualities.

Several trends of course have conflicted with those of Croce. The most original and at times successful among these has been that represented by Renato Serra (q.v.). For him and his followers, there are only lyrical fragments in each work of art. Criticism consists in a sensuous reading of these fragments savoring each chosen word to get its flavor. The tendency here is to forget the world of the author for his words; and however much of a display of virtuosity in analyzing single expressions this may provide, the final result today seems aridity and boredom.

See: Luigi Russo, "Richtlinien der literarischen Kritik und der Literaturgeschichte in Italien," Deutsche Vierteljahrschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte, X (1932), 534–547.

G. P.

Italian literature. Between 1860 and 1940 Italian culture has in general followed the course of European culture. Like the rest of Europe, Italy adopted the positivistic doctrines and the ingenuous religion of science, with its related agnosticism, which spread over the continent between 1860 and 1890. Then came the swift disappointments and the reactions of the idealists and the historically minded at the outset of the 20th century (1890–1914). In Italy as elsewhere the First World War released an utter confusion of thought rather than new currents of ideas, and it would seem that Italy still lies in the midst of this confusion today. Naturally enough, European transformations had in Italy special aspects, national representatives, and characteristic local problems; though in communion with Europe, Italy lived her own intellectual life, as a brief summary will make abundantly clear.

In 1861 the first kingdom of Italy was formed, still without Venetia (added in 1866) and Rome (taken in 1870); it was formed by virtue of European combinations rather than by the strength, will, and self-sacrifice of the Italians themselves, although they indeed, since 1848, had given evidence of having at least a ruling class endowed with a certain measure of ability and determination. The rural classes were untouched by the political movements and intellectual life of the country; the directing minds (Cavour, Mazzini, Gioberti, Manzoni) disappeared; and after a kind of unity was achieved Italy went through a period of sadness, mediocrity, turmoil, and lack of faith. The beneficial effects of unity began to be felt only with the rising of a new generation, about 1880.

A French traveler, Hippolyte Taine (q.v.), who came to the Peninsula to explore his own country's new political neighbor, thus describes the atmosphere of Naples in his Voyage en Italie (1866): "There is the same activity, the same exuberance, in science and religion as in politics. . . . German scholarship and ideas are current, Hegel is widely read, Véra, his most zealous and most highly reputed interpreter, holds an important professorship. Spaventa is trying to discover an Italian philosophy, to reveal Gioberti as a kind of Italian Hegel; national pride enters even the field of pure speculation. . . . The public, especially the younger public, is deeply interested in these investigations. Naples, the home of Vico, has always had an aptitude for philosophy. There has recently been a rush to expositions of the Phenomenology of Hegel. They have no trouble in translating the special words, the abstractions, and Heaven knows what these abstractions are! There are various repercussions. Law studies especially, it is said, are well done, and carried on in a thoroughly German manner. The students are still held in by the formulas and classifications of Hegel, but the professors begin to go beyond this, and each in his own way and following his own tendencies. Ideas are still vague, nothing is formed, definitions are only beginning."

Intellectual Italy, at the time of the formation of the kingdom, was indeed Hegelian and romantic, with a somewhat mechanical Hegelianism and a very weary romanticism. As soon as freedom of the press (which only Piedmont had had as early as 1848) opened the gates to foreign publications, the country was quickly overrun by the doctrines which were having their vogue abroad, particularly in France and Germany: positivism in philosophy, realism in literature, the historical method in literary criticism. In a weak Italy, dissatisfied with herself and lacking original thinkers, European vogues met no serious resistance, and just as the chroniclers of the 15th century wrote at the time when Charles VIII made his military promenade from the Alps to Naples, that he "had conquered Italy with chalk," so it may be said that those doctrines conquered Italy with "vulgarization pamphlets."

It is interesting that the first period of political unity seems for the time to have deprived Italy of any capacity for a literature with a universal character. In an Italy divided up into little states and oppressed by foreign nations, Alfieri, Foscolo, Manzoni, and Leopardi had been European voices; in the new united Italy the only real poet, Carducci (q.v.), found no echo, then or later, in foreign lands. And whereas Italy coming back to life had aroused enthusiasm in Byron and Hugo, Italy now restored merely aroused interest among journalists, suspicions among politicians, and irony among historians; Mommsen created an epigram about the new Italians who are like flies born from the putrefaction of Rome. The Italians themselves were conscious of inferiority, and their only desire was to look abroad, to set up foreign models, to try to make Italy march with the German goose step, or dress with sober English elegance, or sing with the French spirit of raillerie; everything seemed good, save home products. The Italians even forgot that they had altogether superior native talents in such men as the great critic De Sanctis (q.v.); if Anglo-Saxon nations gave only belated recognition to De Sanctis (not until 1931 was there an American translation of his chief work), his Italian contemporaries were prompt to forget or deride him.

So for 20 years people spoke of nothing but evolution, realism, naturalistic novels, heredity, and physiology; the god of the period seems to be the "fact." It may be agreed that facts must be the basis of science and history, but surely only on condition that they be not torn from ideas and from life, which confer upon them value and meaning. What seems to dominate in this drab period is the cult of the "little fact" for its own sake. People really thought that it was enough to put "facts" together in order to have science, literary history, and even philosophy. The movement, in literature, had no eminent leadership in Italy. In a university thesis devoted to a minute study of the mediocre polemics of the period, Paul Arrighi is compelled to discuss the theories in terms of De Sanctis, an opponent of the cult, and of Luigi Capuana (q.v.), a vague, mediocre advocate who variously imitated French books and articles of uncertain value. The name of Ardigò, the philosopher of Italian positivism, is not even mentioned in the thesis, and rightly so, because in his meditations Ardigò never deigned to take art into consideration.

With the "social-question" emphasis of these years when verismo was popular, it was assumed that one could really conceive "experimental" novels and poems that were "social works"; even serious and profound writers like Verga (q.v.) believed this. What they actually wrote, to be sure, were pure works of art, neither scientific nor social; only in some little impurity, in the better writers' prefaces or correspondence, can traces of the current mood be perceived. In connection with these delusions, the question of morality in art, or of "art for art's sake," was debated 30 years after it had been considered in France, and without originality; Olindo Guerrini (pseud. Lorenzo Stecchetti, 1845-1916) published the most scandalous of his poems, in which one finds, as in many Italian poets of the period, a taste reminiscent of Heine for irreverence and sentimental irony.

Carducci was Italy's only true poet of the period. He stood indeed for a reaction against the period, he went counter to the official Italy of the moment and, at first in proud solitude, prepared the way for the coming Italian generation. He revealed and restored tradition; he was inspired by a powerful patriotic feeling, he possessed an exact knowledge of every form of literary art and profound understanding of every historical period and of innumerable figures of Italian life. A simple, austere morality of the common people is voiced in every one of his verses. He was not a thinker; indeed he is weaker in his critical writings, where he attempts to found a literary history of Italy based on what he supposes to be its three elements: chivalric, religious, and popular; and in his respect for documents and painstaking documentary research he is positively obsequious. Carducci was more of a historian in his poetry than in his historical writings, a more profound political student in his dreams than in his manifestations, now related to the Masonic mentality, now merely oratorical; he was more of an educator in his example than in his often partisan attempts to influence the school system. All this led to his having as disciples many Italians who did not follow his school or belong to the narrow circle of his so-called students: he was the teacher of the new Italians in general. Very well known in his own day through the abundant polemics, his figure has loomed even larger since his death, and he still appears far superior to any of his contemporaries.

Carducci's fundamental creed was paganism and anticlericalism; from his "Inno a Satana" to his "Fonti del Clitunno" the anti-Christian note is ever-present; in this respect Carducci represented a mood common in his period to scientists, men of learning, men of letters, and politicians. Paradoxically the Italians who were devoting their attention to the Middle Ages showed a profound antipathy for ideas that are either medieval or attributed to the Middle Ages, for asceticism, mysticism, theology, scholasticism, and religious sentiment in general; from Bartoli to D'Ancona, from Comparetti to Novati, the Middle Ages are studied only to find and exalt, as it were, what is antimedieval or least medieval about them, namely, the echoes of classicism and paganism.

Dreams and programs of "reconciliation" between the church and the state, or of "modernization" of the church, had no practical outcome, but in their suppressed hopes, vague idealism, and occasional nostalgia they had literary consequences. The disturbed consciences of believers, who also felt themselves to be patriots and were collaborating with the political organizations of the liberal state, is sensed in the poetry of the priest Giacomo Zanella (q.v.) and in the novels of his disciple Antonio Fogazzaro (q.v.).

Meanwhile, a particularly important if slow cultural transformation was taking place: the formation of an everyday language, for everyday needs and exchanges; and this language was extending over the entire Peninsula. Powerful factors in its spread were the school system, the newspapers, and compulsory military service with its attendant scattering of youthful recruits over all of Italy and the consequent mingling of their dialects.

The reform of the language, which was part of Manzoni's program, may have been debatable in terms of scientific philology. At all events it brought about (with the support of the schools and of weeklies with an aesthetic leaning, which, from the Fanfulla della domenica to the Rassegna settimanale, had great importance in Italy) the adoption of a clear, simple, modest prose-form. This lasted until the vogue of D'Annunzio (q.v.), about 1900, and even then it was only corrupted rather than destroyed. This reform was a great step forward and meant that Italy's unity, formed in a material way by the political and military class, was now being cemented in the souls of the middle classes and the people.

The school system set up by the Casati Law in 1860 remained generally unchanged until 1923 (when it was fundamentally revised by the Gentile Reform; see Gentile). Its efficiency, very high in the secondary schools, very low in the universities, varied in the elementary schools according to the financial means of the local governments to which it was long entrusted, and these means were abundant in the north and distinctly limited in the south. The Daneo-Credaro Law of 1910 brought in state aid everywhere. The effects of liberal-arts schools in Italy were the creation of a ruling class with a common cultural foundation based upon the classics and a satisfactory and progressive decrease in illiteracy, which in some regions of Italy ran above 90 per cent in 1860 and now is somewhere around 15 per cent of the total population.

While the unification of the kingdom led to a certain unification of prose writing, it also saw the resurrection of regional and dialectal forms in poetry, in the novel, and in the artistic consciousness. Even before Italian unity there had existed great dialectal authors, e.g., Meli, Belli, and Porta; but their reading public was limited to their own regions, and few Italian histories of literature looked upon them as artistic writers. With Italian unity the people of Milan learned to love the creations of Angelo Musco's (1872-1937) Sicilian theatre, and the public of Palermo began to listen to Giacinto Gallina's (1852-1897) Venetian comedies. The dialects were modified, and while the school transformed them or dispersed them throughout the younger generation, among the cultured classes they became refined into forms capable of being understood by all Italians. Even novels written in the normal Italian, since realism was in favor, were forced to reproduce the sonorousness, occasionally the syntax, and even the words of dialects. The early short stories of D'Annunzio, the novels and short stories of Capuana, Deledda, Serao, Fucini, and Pirandello (qq.v.) are full of local references. Sicilian syntax makes itself felt in Verga's novels, and, used as a realistic and humorous element, lines of dialect make their appearance in the utterances of certain minor characters of Fogazzaro; one great Neapolitan poet, Salvatore Di Giacomo (q.v.), made his way to public fame through the medium of a greatly refined and elaborated dialect.

Along with this resumption of regional and dialectal literature went the intellectual and publishing activities of the various Italian centers; in spite of unity, Italy did not become centralized like France, and each great city retained, as in Germany, its own characteristics. One may say that practical matters dominated in Milan, intellectual and artistic things in Florence, official government work in Rome; all centers, indeed even extremely small ones, contributed to maintain that historical Italian variety which goes back to the time of the communes and the oligarchic states (signorie).

The first sign of a reaction against realism, positivism, and the historical method came to Italy with a current of aestheticism which had its greatest exponent in Gabriele D'Annunzio. One may or may not admire his art, but one cannot deny his enormous influence in Italy, which could hardly have been so great were it not related to a national quality, a leaning toward rhetoric that ever since Humanism had been very much alive in the Italian upper classes and had been kept in operation by a type of education predominantly classical and Ciceronian in character. D'Annunzio's influence was not merely literary; it extended to social and political life, perhaps in inverse ratio to its artistic originality; the less the originality, the more the oratory grew and affected Italian culture. With an amazing talent for assimilation, a positive genius for imitation, D'Annunzio drank deep at all sources of European culture, from L. N. Tolstoy to Nietzsche (qq.v.). Consequently, he was appreciated by foreigners far more than was Carducci, because in his works they found the flavor of their own countries' creations. But fundamentally unchanged by whatever he had acquired from abroad, which never essentially affected his Abruzzian nature, D'Annunzio developed within himself a literary virtuosity almost without precedent, and under the magic of his words, as under a sirocco wind, all forms of corruption grew; the national sentiment degenerated into imperialism, love into sensuality, ornament into the merely baroque, music into exhaustion, literary criticism into love of words, war into a passion for slaughter, politics into dilettantism. His imprint appeared on every phase of the nation's life, and his brand was upon men that one would suppose quite immune to rhetoric, such as bankers and professional soldiers.

There were no such repercussions in the case of another, in his way important, Italian poet of this period, Giovanni Pascoli (q.v.); his aestheticism (he wanted to turn the poet into a "little child") started no new movement, his not very definite sense of the mystery of death never assumed a really religious form, his political ideas were limited to borrowing from Enrico Corradini (q.v.) the nationalistic concept of an Italy that was a proletarian among the nations.

The time of the reign of King Humbert I (1878-1900) had been throughout Europe, and especially in Italy, a period of bad taste: buildings, paintings, statues, eloquence, dress, everything was awkward and bourgeois. Then the wave of aestheticism throughout the cities of Italy resulted in a great eagerness to save from the destruction of the industrial epoch the buildings that bore some sign of artistic nobility; and this preoccupation spread to all fields of human activity. Unfortunately, for a certain length of time nearly all writers, in imitation of D'Annunzio, wrote well, that is to say too well, even when they had nothing to say.

A resumption of studies of the history of art is also due to this aesthetic current; the land of Cennini, Vasari, and Lanzi had allowed the field to be taken over by the Germans (Winckelmann), by the English (Ruskin), by the Americans (Berenson), and even by the French (Muntz). In the general renewal there appear a series of writers, some of whom are artists even with the brush, others simply historians of art, who have given through their research and above all through their interpretation of ancient, modern, and ultramodern art a series of excellent monographs and theories on artistic method. These range from Giovanni Morelli's (1816-1891) studies to the artistic writings of Soffici (q.v.), the keen investigations of Roberto Longhi (1890-), the daring explorations of Umberto Boccioni (1882-1916), and even to the uncertain but vast syntheses of Lionello Venturi (1885-).

One of the first signs of awakening from the paralysis which positivism had brought to Italian thought was the interest of the younger elements in socialistic doctrines. It is well known that the Italians favored extreme solutions, including on occasion anarchy (the only section of the First International to support Bakunin was the Italian). After the Socialist Party had made its first conquests, Italy adopted as her favorite writer Georges Sorel (q.v.), the theorist of violence as the midwife of a new social order, whom France had already relegated to secondary periodicals and minor publishers. In literature, pink socialism had an echo only in the modest and gentle works of Edmondo De Amicis (q.v.).

Young Italians at the beginning of the 20th century eagerly set about the task of renewing culture. This was a period of fervent activity, of innumerable translations, collections, reviews, programs, and polemics; it was the period of the Leonardo, futurism, the Voce, modernism, of syndicalistic hopes, and of the first appearance of nationalism. Voices of hope, of daring, were sometimes indefinite, often insolent; results did not always come up to the talk about them, realities did not correspond to promises, there was much that was vague and pretentious. But it is certain that Italy in those years underwent radical and rapid changes, at the core of which, one may say, was the importance given to ideas, philosophy, and religion, in contrast with the negation of these values which had been characteristic of positivism.

Of these movements, irregular and confused but significant and full of promise, the most talented representative was Giovanni Papini (q.v.), with his autobiography Un Uomo finito (1912; Eng. tr., A Man—Finished, American title, The Failure, both 1924). In this one feels the uncertainty of the period, and the confused aspirations, the spiritual trials sometimes tinctured with dilettantism, of a romantic soul reaching for the absolute and forever dissatisfied with what it achieves from moment to moment. Later, after the First World War, Papini was to write a life of Christ, less pure from a literary standpoint than the autobiography of his youth, but which, with its proclamation of a Catholic faith in the post-war period of uncertainty, struck and even astounded the public and was widely translated all over the world. In other writings, on occasion rich in content, in polemics, or in research, he played a role, sometimes a leading one, in the renewal of Italian culture.

Fundamentally related to Papini, whatever the differences in form, was the sentimental temper of the youthful poetry of the same years, which by reason of its character of uncertainty, nostalgia, reticence, sadness, solitude, fragile style, and opposition to Carducci's magniloquence and D'Annunzio's open sensuality, was called "crepuscular." The important names here are Corazzini, Moretti, Palazzeschi, Gozzano (qq.v.); the last two are the more outstanding, Palazzeschi with at times a sharp sense of irony and even malignity, Gozzano with harmonies of sweet resignation and nostalgic memories of women.

Futurism was a noisy phenomenon, important as a sign of the times. Its theories were far from new; they were gathered together with no other desire than to start a clamor. The works to which it gave rise were of varying worth, and the more serious artists who were temporarily affiliated with it, such as Soffici, Palazzeschi, Papini, left it as they had entered it, without contributing anything to it or taking anything from it. As evidence of a desire for an Italy renewed even at the cost of destroying her entire past, futurism struck a responsive chord in the new generations. Its founder, F. T. Marinetti (q.v.), having completed his task as herald of the catastrophic times that were to interrupt the peace dating from 1870, survived like the pagans in Roman villages after the triumph of Christianity—as a provincial phenomenon. The war he had prophesied buried his literary movement, which now belongs in a museum showcase.

Both futurism, with its revolutionary and ephemeral vogue of “parole in libertà” (“words at liberty”), and the group of Voce writers, with their love for the “fragmentary,” contributed to a change observable in contemporary Italian literary prose, a severance from the classical rhythms which had been kept even during romanticism and realism. An important factor in bringing about this change has been the novels, short stories, and plays of Luigi Pirandello, who created the most “spoken” form of prose and dialogue.

In the theatrical field, where two generations of Italian playwrights had done nothing but repeat the formulas of the French bourgeois drama, with a few rare attempts at imitating Ibsen (q.v.), the only original Italian figure is in fact Pirandello. Extremely sensitive to the duplicities and secretiveness of the human mind whenever it feels society's eyes fixed upon it, he constructed on that theme an entire series of plays, sometimes tragic, sometimes fantastic, sometimes baldly ironical. They are built up with economy of dialogue and consummate stagecraft; Pirandello is the only recent Italian theatrical creator whom foreign audiences have applauded and foreign playwrights imitated. Sem Benelli (q.v.) has also been frequently applauded and imitated, but he brought no original contribution to the theatre.

Partly contemporary, partly subsequent, and essentially opposed to what D'Annunzio represented was the influence of Benedetto Croce (q.v.). This influence first emerged in the national life in 1903 with the periodical Critica, which began to appear shortly after the publication of Croce's now famous Estetica (first in Atti dell' Accademia Pontaniana, 1900; first published as a volume in 1902). Here one finds a complement to the political, economic, and intellectual renewal which coincides approximately with Victor Emanuel III's accession to the throne (1900) and with the predominance of the semi-dictator Giolitti. During this period Italy enjoyed an economic prosperity never before experienced, felt the throbbings of a national consciousness at last full-grown, permitting her to look at foreigners with a feeling of independent pride, and now developed an intellectual activity in which she rapidly overtook the contemporary cultures of Europe and America in the fields of philosophy and literary and historical criticism.

No philosopher since the time of Gioberti has had as much influence in Italy as Croce. To explain this phenomenon it must be recalled that this philosopher is also a writer, a man of letters, that his thought, always of a controversial and provocative nature, has reached with originality into the most varied fields. He has treated not only aesthetics (practically the only Croce known abroad), but Marxism and morality, law and economics, history, political life, offending and favoring living passions and interests, with immediate consequences for both individuals and political parties. Furthermore, in the form of his thinking, Croce presses on fearlessly to final conclusions, set forth with great lucidity, accompanied by interesting anecdotes, quickened by quips and paradoxes, and fortified by uncommonly profound learning. In spite of controversies, which have sometimes been extremely personal, he has displayed great honesty and impartiality, and it is understandable that for years he has been in the position of a man superior to parties, whose support was often sought by the most opposed. Although attacked for his resistance to the war against Germany and more recently for his hostility to Fascism, he has maintained his views and his prestige.

A powerful organizer as well as a thinker, Croce is to be credited with the most productive and truly organic cultural work performed during this period. He is mainly responsible for two great collections, the Scrittori italiani and the Classici della filosofia moderna (which surpasses, in many respects, the older and better-known undertaking of the same nature in Germany).

Among the greatest changes brought about by Croce has been the revival of the writings of Francesco De Sanctis, his own immediate precursor in aesthetic doctrines and literary criticism. De Sanctis now reappears as a great historian of the moral and religious life of the Italian people, the thinker who has drawn from Vico the fundamental germ of a new aestheticism, the literary critic who has been able to make the best use of this aestheticism to interpret authors and place them in a new light, the severe, thoughtful educator whose preoccupation it is to rebuild the character of the Italians. Editions of his works and studies of his life multiplied; from De Sanctis all commentators who were really of any account in the renewal of literary criticism drew their inspiration, even where they did not actually follow Croce's leadership (Serra, Gentile, Momigliano, Borgese, qq.v., equally with Giuseppe De Robertis, Eugenio Donadoni, 1870–

1924, Giulio A. Levi, Luigi Russo, 1892-, et al.).

Of secondary importance, but interesting by reason of its political implications, was the vindication of Alfredo Oriani (q.v.), a novelist and historian whom the generation of positivism had relegated to comparative obscurity and who after his death (1909) came to be regarded as a pioneer by reason of his concept of the function of aristocracies in national life. There was also a revival of interest in two other writers who had lesser historical and lyrical sense, but greater political precision, Vilfredo Pareto (q.v.), the economist, and Gaetano Mosca (1858-1941).

In the educational field, too, there was a new fervor. The secondary school teachers were particularly active. Among a very select minority of these, the criticisms of the agnostic school made by one of their number (Giovanni Gentile) had especial effect. From him and his views on pedagogy there was to spring a complete program of renewal for the schools—which for political reasons could be translated into action only in 1923, and then only in part. The fundamental idea of Gentile, that teacher and pupil are not separate entities and that learning cannot be poured by the one into the other but must be a contemporaneous recreation in both, was developed in innumerable practical applications in the elementary school, where he wanted religious teaching to be reintroduced, in the university, made for professional training, and in the secondary school, the preparer of men. Gentile later worked out a system of idealism called “actualism,” which clashed, partly for personal and political reasons, with the ideas of Croce.

The First World War halted or threw into confusion all movements of higher culture. During that period the so-called “war of ideas” became rather a “war against ideas,” and, as was natural, passions perturbed rather than clarified mental processes. Fascism, which came immediately after the war, accentuated the nationalistic note without bringing in any new doctrines; even the corporative state had had its precursors in Catholic thought (Giuseppe Toniolo, 1845-1917).

It is not difficult to relate what Fascism's effect has been upon culture, because it is quite similar to that of other totalitarian regimes. The effects have been of a democratic nature in the sense that they have been for the benefit of the greatest number, and not in terms of quality. Elementary education spread, to the detriment of higher culture. The secondary system does not seem to have suffered unduly. If this period has been without great artistic or philosophical personalities comparable to the ones of earlier periods, possibly one cannot in good faith blame Fascism, but only Providence. The cultural policy of the government, beyond the ever more strict application of Fascist political teachings in the schools, in the press, in books, in official manifestations, was to provide economic means for the outward activities of culture, such as the Fascist-founded Italian Academy, the multiplication of literary and dramatic prizes, the distribution of grants and pensions to writers. The failure of the system is a matter of historical record, even though, as happened in a few rare cases, the awards and pensions were granted to writers of merit independently of their political views.

The “racial” policy inaugurated in 1939 has had no immediate consequences in the literary field, where no writer of the Jewish race had distinguished himself in recent times (the last Jewish writer who aroused considerable interest, but who was deplored by many from an artistic viewpoint, was Guido da Verona). In the field of academic culture, on the contrary, there were serious losses, because here the so-called non-Aryans, especially in the sciences, had many men of value, fully recognized as such by Fascism itself before it adopted the racial policy. In literary criticism racialism has cost Italy the loss of the activities of Attilio Momigliano and Giulio A. Levi, authors of two of the best works on Manzoni and Leopardi.

The poetry and literature of the very youngest writers has not taken on heroic or rhetorical forms (relegated apparently to journalism and official speeches); they have preferred delicate lyricism, have deliberately chosen critical labyrinths, as seen in the so-called “Hermetic” group of poets and critics, gathered in the periodicals Campo di Marte and Letteratura, whom one might describe as lineal descendants of Mallarmé and Rimbaud (qq.v.).

A small number of writers left Italy on account of Fascism, but this emigration had neither the extent nor the importance of the one caused by Bolshevism in Russia or by Nazism in Germany. A single important writer, Borgese, who after the First World War had written a very well-received novel, Rubè (1921; Eng. tr., 1923), came to the United States where he has published one, nonliterary, work (Goliath, 1937). Ignazio Silone (q.v.) is a new writer whose books have had a considerable success due in some measure perhaps to their political tendencies.

See: B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia (4 vols., 1914-1915; 5th vol., 1939; 6th vol., 1940) and Storia d'Italia (1928); G. Prezzolini, La Cultura italiana (1923); L. Russo, I Narratori (1923); G. Papini and P. Pancrazi, Poeti d'oggi (1925; an anthology); B. Crémieux, Panorama de la littérature italienne contemporaine (1928); G. Volpe, L'Italia in cammino (1928); C. Pellizzi, Le Lettere italiane del nostro secolo (1929); E. Falqui and E. Vittorini, Scrittori nuovi (1930; an anthology); G. Mazzoni, L'Ottocento (1934); A. Galletti, Il Novecento (1935); P. Arrighi, Le Vérisme dans la prose narrative italienne (1937).

G. P.

Ivanov, Vsevolod Vyacheslanovich (1895 or 1896–, Russian short-story writer, novelist, and dramatist), is the most colorful of the “fellow travelers” and a characteristic exponent of the first decade of Soviet literature, when formlessness, local color, extreme outspokenness, and violent paradox supplanted traditional realism. Like Babel, Ivanov owes his start in literature to Gorky (q.v.). In its fantastic variety of experience Ivanov's life tallies with the exotic originality of his art. He is a Siberian, born in Lebyazhie on the edge of the Kirghiz steppes. “Ivanov” is a self-chosen name. His father was the illegitimate son of a governor general of Turkestan, and his mother came of mingled Polish and Kirghiz stock. He ran away from the village school to join a circus, and later from an agricultural school, first to wander, then to work as a clerk in a trading outpost. From 1912 to 1918 he alternated a winter job as a typesetter with summer peregrinations; under the name of Ben Ali Bey he posed as dervish and fakir; by turns he was sword swallower, organ-grinder, clown, acrobat, street singer, wrestler. He almost died of typhus, twice he was nearly shot by Red guerrillas and the Cheka, several times he was captured by rival armies. Once in Novonikolayevsk he supervised a labor battalion charged with the burial of 40,000 White soldiers.

His first poems appeared (1916) in a Siberian newspaper. Gorky printed his first story, “Po Irtyshu” (Along the Irtysh River), in Letopis (Chronicle), but rejected the next 20 with the advice to live and learn more. Ivanov thereupon took an active part in the Revolution, making speeches, setting type, writing articles, even supervising a school, and helping the Red Guard defend Omsk from the advancing Czechs. He managed to reach Petersburg, where he nearly died of hunger until Gorky rescued him and installed him in the House of Scientists. He joined the Serapion Brothers, a group of young Petersburg writers who staunchly affirmed art's independence from political regimentation. His first literary success came with Partizany (1922; The Partisans), Siberian civil-war tales, journalistic, uninhibited, and powerful. A novel, Bronepoyezd 14-69 (1922; Armored Train 14-69), placed him in the front rank of Soviet writers and remains his best-known work. It deals with an episode of Japanese intervention in Siberia in 1919 and proclaims the ideal of social solidarity on a plane equivalent to religious martyrdom. One line became a watchword: “It is for the sake of truth that our Russia is burning!” It was given a brilliant production by the Moscow Art Theatre (1927), thereby marking the Theatre's successful shift from traditional realism to socialized realism. An American version was given in New York (1931) and published in 1933.

Ivanov has since produced more than 25 volumes of tales, novels, and plays, often at the rate of three or four a year. Among the best are Tsvetnye vertry (1922; Colorful Winds), Golubye peski (1923; Blue Sands), Puteshestvie v stranu kotoroi yeshcho net (1930; Journey to a Country That Does Not Yet Exist), and Povesti Brigadira M. M. Sinitsyna (1930; Tales of Brigadier Sinitsyn). His last major work is Pokhozhdeniya fakira (1935; Eng. tr., abridged, The Adventures of a Fakir, 1935), a picaresque semi-autobiographical novel in which the fantastic and the commonplace are exuberantly mingled. His early depiction of man “without a soul” is replaced by a more humanized conception, and his abundant gifts of humor, observation, and narrative skill are revealed at their best. Ivanov has miraculously retained a pristine sense of wonder at life, unmarked by bitterness. Some passages attain a rare quality of aerial ease and freedom, something of a riddle in view of his statement (1934) at a Pan-Soviet literary congress when he avowed the necessity for Bolshevik “tendentiousness,” thereby repudiating his Serapion affiliation. Little is known of his work in recent years.

Several early short stories appear in anthologies in English—“The Child” (1925), “'Merican” (1925), “On the Rails” (1925), “When I Was a Fakir” (1929), “Unfrozen Water” (1932), “The Desert of Toub-Koy” (1933).

See: L. M. Polyak and E. B. Trager, “V. V. Ivanov,” in Literatura XX veka (1934), pp. 134-140; G. Struve, Soviet Russian Literature (1935), pp. 27-31.

N. S.

Ivanov, Vyacheslav Ivanovich (1866–, Russian poet, critic, essayist, and translator), was born in Moscow into the family of a government official. After graduating from the First Moscow Gymnasium, Ivanov spent two years at the University of Moscow, studying classical antiquity under Vinogradov and Guerier. After that he went to Germany, where he studied under Mommsen in Berlin. During his university days he became absorbed in the works of Nietzsche and Vladimir Solovyov (q.v.). In 1895 Ivanov married L. D. Zinovyeva-Hannibal, a distant relative of Pushkin, who made Ivanov conscious of his own poetic ability. He began publishing verse in 1898. During the years 1898–1903 the Ivanovs traveled abroad, visiting London, Athens, Cairo, and Alexandria. In 1903 he delivered a series of lectures in Paris on Dionysus. After they had returned to Russia, the Ivanovs took up residence in St. Petersburg, where their "tower" soon became famous for its "Wednesdays"—informal gatherings of the literary élite. Through the medium of these gatherings Ivanov came to be recognized as leader of the Petersburg symbolists. His eruditeness won him general respect, and in 1909 he was invited to give a course on Roman and Greek literature at the Women's College courses of Rayev. After the October Revolution of 1917 he, like many another poet, took an active part in the Soviet cultural program. In 1921 he was appointed professor at Baku University and in 1924 was sent on a mission to Italy, where he remained.

Ivanov's poetic works, Kormchiya zvezdy (1903; Guiding Stars), Prozrachnost (1904; Transparency), Eros (1907), Cor Ardens (1911), are characterized by a ponderous magnificence of language that harks back to the best works of Derzhavin; at the same time they present a curious blend of the literature of ancient Alexandria with that of the most recent modernists. In his collected essays, Po zvezdam (1905; Following the Stars) and Borozdy i mezhi (1916; Furrows and Borders), Ivanov reveals his belief that art is a mystical religious activity, and he propagandizes for collective art on a monumental scale. His views on culture and civilization are included in the volume written in collaboration with Gershenzon, Perepiska iz dvukh uglov (1921; Correspondence from Two Corners), and in the long philosophical poem, Chelovek (1939; Man). His translations include the works of Aeschylus, Dante, Petrarch, Byron, Nietzsche (q.v.), and E. T. A. Hoffmann.

See: V. Bryusov, Dalekiye i blizkiye (1912); L. Shestov, "Vyacheslav Velikolepni," Russkaya mysl, 1916, No. 10.

O. M.

Iwaszkiewicz, Jarosław (pseud. Eleuter, 1894–, Polish poet, novelist, and playwright), was born near Kalnik, Kievan Ukraine, of Polish gentry stock. Educated at home and in Kiev University, he was early associated, at first through common family interests, later through common tastes, with the composer Karol Szymanowski, for whose opera King Roger of Sicily he wrote the libretto. After making his début as a poet in Kiev, Iwaszkiewicz moved at the end of the First World War to Warsaw, where he became one of the founders of Skamander (see Polish literature). He was often abroad, from 1922, as a state official, in Paris and Copenhagen and at one time in Persia. An artist to the core, called sometimes the Polish Oscar Wilde, Iwaszkiewicz brought to each literary form he essayed the fine poetic sense and feeling for rhythm and color born and bred in him as a son of the Ukraine. Siedem bogatych miast nieśmiertelnego Kościej (1924; The Seven Rich Towns of the Immortal Kościej) and Księżyc wschodzi (1925; The Moon is Rising) are among his important early works, and among the later ones Czerwone tarcze (1934; Red Shields), a fictionized life of the 12th-century Piast prince, Henry of Sandomierz, must be noted. In the 30's Iwaszkiewicz was led, as a result of the many pitfalls facing a writer on contemporary themes, to seek material in the past; from this came two unusual plays, the highly successful Lato w Nohant (1936; Summer in Nohant), a series of scenes from the last chapter of the Chopin–George Sand partnership, and the less finely executed Maskarada (1939; Masquerade), an improvisation on the life of Pushkin. All Iwaszkiewicz's writings are infected with disillusionment and marked by decadence, especially his last novel, Pasje Błędomierskie (1938; The Passions of Błędomierz), but all are redeemed by their style.

See: E. Breiter, review of Czerwone tarcze in Wiadomości literackie, 1934, No. 48; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 181–192, 696–698; A. P. Coleman, "The Literary Scene in Poland," New York Times Book Review, June 5, 1938, pp. 8, 18.

A. P. C.

J

Jacob, Max (1876–1944, French poet, prose writer, illustrator, and painter), was born at Quimper in Brittany. He attended the Ecole Coloniale, took his law degrees, became a journalist, accompanist, piano teacher, “nursery-maid tutor,” “dimestore” salesman, shop sweeper, wanderer in back alleys starved with cold and hunger, honored guest of high aristocracy and wealthy circles, expert in palmistry, horoscopy, and card telling, learned in occultism and astrology. He shared the dire poverty, strenuous work and pursuits, rollicking or rough relaxation of his friends Apollinaire (q.v.), Picasso, Salmon (q.v.), et al., “that dear gang,” during the epoch-making days of the “Rue de Ravignan” at Montmartre, the most celebrated haunt of the post First World War pioneers who were then building “the ascetic provisional shed of the cubist Acropolis.” Long before futurism, Freudianism, and surrealism, Max Jacob introduced his “nocturnal nightmares (and) day hallucinations” into poetry which should, in his eyes, express what is deepest and most intimate in man.

The capital event in his subsequent life was his conversion to Catholicism, following two apparitions of Christ, at the Rue de Ravignan in 1909 and at the movies in 1914, which greatly enriched and vivified his poetry. His writings are as surprising as his proteiform life and personality with their variety and many-faceted composition and birdlike mobility. He took a definite stand against Rimbaud (q.v.) and also the symbolists, insisting that everything should be given order and place: “Everything that exists is situated, and so is all that transcends matter.” To him “gaiety, especially when sad, is divine fire”; and he has the whole range of it from an imperceptible smile to facetiousness, buffoonery, fantastic drolleries, and the joyous, free interplay of mind and imagination. His intellect seems always about to devour the inspired lyricism it lights up. He has experimented with all literary forms. One finds art criticism, biography, translation; a children’s book, Histoire du roi Kaboul et du marmiton Gauvain (1903); novels, such as Saint Matorel (1909), Le Terrain Bouchaballe (1923), and Filibuth, ou la Montre en or (1924); short stories, Cinématoma (1919), Le Cabinet noir (1922), and Le Tableau de la bourgeoisie (1930), in which the humorist and poet in him classify the bourgeois in families presenting “veiled stupidity, silent cruelty, rivalries, unending backbiting, and illegitimate ambitions.” He has done verse portraits in Le Laboratoire central (1920); short comedies acted on provincial stages, the work of a born mimic; an operetta, Isabelle et Pantalon (1923); a dramatic fantasy, Le Dos d’Arlequin; petit drame portatif, “an unactable play, illustrated by the author” (1919); a chronicle of 20th-century painting and literature, “Le Tiers transporté” (Feux de Paris, No. 7–8, 1935), including unforgettable portraits of Apollinaire and Marinetti (q.v.). There are prose poems like the Cornet à Dés (1906), imitated ad nauseam, “the subject or picturesqueness of which does not matter,” with a preface to its 1916 edition which remains the vade mecum of all experimenters in this form, or like the Visions infernales (1924), where the devil appears insistently familiar and menacing under the masks of unexpected characters placed in prosaic or fantastic scenes, or again like the Ballades (1939), where miracle insensibly spreads over nameless houses and commonplace streets, through the least “distinguished” souls.

His verse poems are even more important, notably those inserted in Le Siège de Jérusalem; drame céleste (1912–1914), a hermetic masterpiece which was the author’s favorite work; in the prose and verse collection entitled La Défense de Tartufe (1919), touching the period of his conversion; and in the “Chansons de Bretagne” (some unpublished), Fond de l’eau (1927), Le Sacrifice impérial (1928), and Rivages (1932), besides an infinite number of uncollected poems, which embody Max Jacob’s wish to “recreate earth in the atmosphere of Heaven.” His Art poétique (1922) expresses the author’s loves, hatreds, and intentions as well as the aims and tendencies of modern poetry. While neither strictly built nor metaphysical like Claudel’s (q.v.), it is the freest, most suggestive treatise on poetical aesthetics published since Baudelaire and Banville (qq.v.). The variety of Max Jacob’s works is exemplified also in grim dramas shot with sudden flashes of light; in burlesque scenes or cruel, compressed satires contrasted with subtle songs distilling popular ditties of town and country; in heroic actions halted by odd remarks or axioms and proverbs; in celestial or sweet visions blending the crosscurrents of spirit and matter; in harrowing confessions interspersed with shrewd observations; finally in lofty verse sustained as plain song like that of "Le Christ au cinéma" (in La Défense de Tartufe), created by the deft juggler of Les Pénitents en maillot rose (1926). There is untold variety of interchangeable planes, spaces, and points of view due to the "ubiquity" that this poet demands and possesses. Variety again exists in the synchronism of multiple measures, tones, and accents. Max Jacob hourly works new miracles for "where there is no miracle there is no genius," new soundings of the upper and lower depths, and makes new use of silence and vacuity. He can even renew syntax and the magic of words taken from every manner of speech, with all their pranks, "wanton wiles," and mirages.

In sum, Max Jacob has given a new birth to poetry, which owes him acceleration, translocations, transfigurations, together with new combinations of movements, even explosions. His greater poems vanish into vision. Their darting lightness is accounted for by his saying that "a personality is but a persisting error" and "inspiration is the passing of one world into another, from earth into heaven, from heaven into another heaven." A number of younger poets have named him "the father of modern poetry," and Cocteau (q.v.) "that great inspired master of elegance." His influence is felt in Spain, Italy, England. Exhibitions of his paintings in New York in 1930, 1938, and later were greatly admired. There is an anthology of his works (Morceaux choisis, 1936). According to R. Lannes, Max Jacob's unpublished works, among which are the important Méditations, will provide the matter of at least 10 volumes, and his correspondence, when brought out, will rank among the chief epistolary treasures in French literature.

Since the death of Max Jacob at the Drancy concentration camp a number of his unpublished poems and many articles concerning his work and personality have appeared in the Arche, Cahiers du sud, Confluences, Orbe, Poésie 44, and other French literary reviews and newspapers.

See: "Max Jacob," Disque vert (Brussels) November, 1923 (issue devoted to Jacob); André Salmon, Max Jacob, poète, peintre mystique et homme de qualité (1927); Robert Guiette, "Vie de Max Jacob," Nouvelle Revue française, XLIII (1934), 5-19, 248-259; A. Billy, Max Jacob (1946), with an anthology including previously unpublished letters and poems.

M. M.

Jacobsen, Jens Peter (1847-85), Danish novelist), was born in Thisted, Jutland. His childhood was not unlike that described in his autobiographical novel Niels Lyhne (1880; Eng.

tr., 1919) in which the hero and a playmate invent endless stories and act them out. Like Niels Lyhne, again, he was divided in allegiance between a practical father and a mother who cherished poetic yearnings. Jens Peter's favorite study was botany—newly introduced into the schools—and he studied it in the open till he knew every plant in the neighborhood. At the same time he read all the Danish classics. In Copenhagen he continued both pursuits; his reading now included Goethe and Schiller, Shakespeare, Kierkegaard, Heine, Byron, Tennyson, and Feuerbach, besides the Bible. He won a gold medal at the university for his thesis on a microscopic marsh plant, and in the same year (1872) his first tale, Mogens (Eng. tr., Mogens and Other Stories, 1921), was published. Still in the same year he published a translation of Darwin's The Origin of Species, following it three years later with a translation of The Descent of Man. We know from Jacobsen's words to a friend that the abandonment of all religious faith early in life caused him an agonizing struggle. He embraced evolution as a new faith. For a long time he was in doubt as to whether he would make science or literature his lifework. At 20 he wrote in his diary that if he could "bring into the realm of literature the eternal laws of nature" he felt that his work would be "more than ordinary." These words give the key to his attitude toward life as well as literature.

In Mogens Jacobsen first essayed his unique nature descriptions, based on minute, even scientific observation and clothed in a poetic and beautiful language. But it is always nature leading its own life, without the elves and trolls with which the romanticists had peopled the woods and dells and without any sentimental idea of nature as sympathizing with man. Fru Marie Grubbe; Interiører fra det 17. Aarhundrede (1876; Eng. tr., Marie Grubbe; a Lady of the Seventeenth Century, 1917) was based on a careful study of old documents, and its language is enriched by archaic words and phrases. The heroine was a historical person, a woman who was first married to a king's son and finally found happiness in marriage with a poor ferryman. Jacobsen does not, however, make her last husband a model of rural virtue and does not for a moment take him out of his class, but Søren has that in him which satisfies the woman looking for her master. Marie Grubbe is the first of the women in whom Jacobsen embodies his reaction against the traditional bloodless ideal of femininity. This reaction is more consciously expressed by the modern women in the already-mentioned Niels Lyhne. They chafe under the tyranny, disguised as chivalry, which forces into rank growth the qualities once for all established as proper to "the sex," while the qualities they actually possess are crushed out or forced inward by ignoring them. Jacobsen once wrote to a friend that the only subject worthy of literary treatment was "the struggle against that which exists for the right to exist in one's own way." This "right to exist in one's own way" he conceded also to women and endeavored to understand them as individuals instead of projecting his own preconceived ideal of them as the romanticists had done. The hero of Niels Lyhne, who "cannot find a handle to life," is in some respects a self-portrait. When Niels tells his mother that nothing but flawless work will satisfy him, it expresses Jacobsen's own ideal, to which he adhered at the cost of labor that is sometimes too apparent in the final result. But unlike his creator Niels never wrote the books he conceived. Not only in the person of his hero but also in the other persons of the book, in Niels's mother and the tutor Bigum—a caricature of himself—Jacobsen scourged himself for "the fair vice of dreams" and reminded himself that "the fairest dreams and the deepest longings do not add an inch to the stature of a human soul." The dogma may be questioned, but it stemmed from his belief in the inexorability of law. This was at the bottom of his revolt against religion; he refused to think that a supernatural power would somehow juggle away the consequences of wrongdoing provided the sinner repented.

In his own life Jacobsen tested his stoical faith, living a life of proud rectitude, patiently bearing poverty and illness, a lovable friend to the few people whom his failing strength allowed him to receive. In his short story Fru Fønss (Eng. tr. in Mogens and Other Stories), the last in his slender production, there is a letter from a woman who knew she was soon to die. It was his own farewell to "this beautiful earth" and his plea to be remembered. When his illness could no longer be fought off, he went home to his mother in Thisted, where he died, only 38 years old.

See: Georg Brandes, Det moderne Gennembruds Mænd (1883); Georg Christensen, J. P. Jacobsen (1910); Alrik Gustafson, Six Scandinavian Novelists (1940).

H. A. L.

Jahier, Piero (1884–, Italian poet), born in Genoa, has worked most of his life as a railroad employee. He is the author of only three small books, composed between the years 1909–1919, and since then has remained silent. But these slender volumes, while never popular, have won for him the high esteem of critics. What Jahier has written is of a concentrated lyricism, reflects deep experiences of life, reveals strong and original convictions imbued with a high ideal of poetry and humanity. It is not surprising that the name of Jahier is to be found in almost all anthologies and histories of contemporary Italian literature. He is connected with the movement of the Voce (see Prezzolini); this review discovered him in 1909, and he was one of its most faithful contributors. His three books have that autobiographical flavor that appealed to the Voce group (cf. Uomo finito of Papini, q.v., Il Mio Carso of Slataper, q.v., Lemmonio Boreo of Soffici, q.v.). They also disclose an inclination towards a fragmentary form of writing, which gives to his art an intensity and a sincerity free of some of the handicaps of more orthodox literary construction. Jahier's lyrical fragments reveal three fundamental life experiences. The first publication, Ragazzo (1909), concerns his family, which belonged to that small minority of aboriginal Protestants called Waldensians who have inhabited the western Alpine border of Italy since approximately the 12th century. The second, Gino Bianchi (1915), deals with Jahier's work in a railroad office; he gives an excellent, if at times slightly heavy, satire of red tape. The third, Con me e con gli Alpini (1919), is dedicated to Jahier's soldiers during the First World War and especially to the most humble and poor of them. Generally these fragments begin with some very simple sentences like notes from a diary, but very soon moral warmth brings them to incandescence. Every word becomes an ethical judgment: Jahier champions the poor, the underdog, the peasant, the mountaineer. At times he goes from prose to a form of poetry, with rhymes and assonances—a very original mixture of church canticle and popular song. Jahier also has made a collection of soldiers' songs, Canti di soldati (1919).

His books should not be confused with sketches or memoirs; their high poetic value lies in the power of concentrating in a sentence, and often in a single word, a moral situation, distilled from long repressed feelings of injustice and deprivation. Descriptions, merely incidental details, do not appeal to Jahier, who is more of a sculptor than a painter. Sometimes he may chisel his marble awkwardly, but always with energy. Not often does he find entirely adequate expression for his torment, but when he does his art attains a purity and loftiness that are rare.

See: P. Pancrazi, Ragguagli di Parnaso (1919-1920), (1920), pp. 127-139; G. Prezzolini, Amici (1922), pp. 37-59; C. Bo, Frontespizio (1938), pp. 297-302.

G. P.

Jaloux, Edmond (1878-, French novelist and critic), was born and educated in Marseille. At the early age of 18 he founded a modest periodical, Revue méditerranéenne. Stirred by the ambition to enter upon a literary career, he went to Paris and soon began to contribute articles to such reviews and dailies as the Mercure de France, Revue hebdomadaire, Candide, Nouvelles littéraires, Revue universelle, Gaulois, Temps, Echo de Paris. Like many other writers at the beginning of their careers, he wrote verse and in 1906 had accumulated enough material to publish a slender volume of poems, Une Ame d'automne. But it was as a novelist that Jaloux was destined to win the esteem of a cultured public. His books, at the same time romantic and realistic, reveal the hidden life of restless souls. This is already true of his very first novel, L'Agonie de l'amour (1899), the story of a young man who dreamed of a great love which his own limitations made impossible of attainment. States of mind like this, which are melancholy but can never be characterized as morbid, are analyzed in Les Sangsues (1904), L'Incertaine (1918), Au-dessus de la ville (1920), L'Alcyone (1925), and La Fugitive (1926). At times a subtle note of symbolism (see French symbolism) in the manner of Henri de Régnier (q.v.) creeps in, as in Le Reste est silence (1909), the tragedy of an ill-matched couple, seen through the eyes of a child. A more pessimistic accent is heard in such novels as Laetitia (1929), La Chute d'Icare (1936), and L'Oiseau-lyre (1938). The last is the story of a young poet who, after being magnificently inspired by the "Lyre Bird" (Violette), meets an adventuress and from that moment is powerless to produce anything but platitudes—life has smothered genius. Among other novels of some importance are Fumées dans la campagne (1918) and La Fin d'un beau jour (1921), the scenes of which are laid mostly in Aix-en-Provence and in Versailles respectively. The constant avoidance by Jaloux of emphasis, the subdued atmosphere he creates, are in sharp contrast with the vigor and downrightness of writers such as Zola, Bourget, and Barrès (qq.v.).

In addition to his novels, Jaloux has written short stories (La Branche morte, 1928; Dessins aux trois crayons, 1934; Trois Nouvelles, 1935) and several volumes of criticism (L'Esprit des livres, 1923-1931; Figures étrangères, 1926; Rainer-Maria Rilke, 1927; De Pascal à Barrès, 1928; Vie de Goethe, 1933). He composed an important preface in 1935 for the catalogue of the exhibition held at the Bibliothèque Nationale to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the birth of symbolism.

From 1917 to 1923 Jaloux held a responsible position in the Office of Information at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. In 1909 he was awarded the Prix Femina for Le Reste est silence, and in 1920 the Grand Prix de Littérature of the French Academy. He was elected to the Academy to succeed Bourget in 1936 and was received the following year by Lecomte. In 1941 he took refuge in Switzerland; in Fribourg Le Vent souffle sur le flamme was published, and in Geneva Le Pouvoir des choses.

See: Georges Girard, "Notes bio-bibliographiques: Edmond Jaloux," Bulletin de la Maison du Livre Français, June 15, 1922, pp. 223-224.

A. Sz.

Jammes, Francis (1868-1938, French poet), although born in Tournay, Hautes-Pyrénées, came of a colonial family from Guadeloupe. After some years of school at Pau and Bordeaux he served for a time as notary's clerk at Orthez, Basses-Pyrénées, where most of his life was to be spent. These years were marked by inner torment, from which he found relief in poetic composition. Several slender volumes, privately printed at Orthez and entitled simply Vers (1891-1894), won him the friendship of a discerning few, among them André Gide (q.v.); but it was the publication by the Mercure de France of De l'angelus de l'aube à l'angelus du soir (1897) which first revealed to the general public an original and, in many respects, a unique poetic talent. It proved to be a prolific talent as well. Le Deuil des primevères (1901), Le Triomphe de la vie (1902), and Le Roman du lièvre (1903) assured him a place in the first rank of the writers of his day. Jammes has been called a réussite du bon Dieu. What he brought to French poetry was an entirely fresh "pastoral" note, a new simplicity, a rustic artlessness (and often awkwardness) of which his more self-conscious contemporaries would have been incapable, a sensual, pagan, childlike delight in humble, natural, and minute details which he somehow rendered significant. His literary successes did not alter his way of life. He married (1906), he continued to live in the country; and when finally, after many years, he left Orthez for the Basque village of Hasparren, it was to lead the same patriarchal existence as before.

With Clairières dans le ciel (1906) his writing took on a more militantly Christian and Catholic tinge. Religious themes had, it is true, attracted him from the very beginning; he had written eloquent prayers along with his elegies; but it had always seemed that, to a poet so passionately attached to the visible universe, the Catholic themes must have appealed rather for their picturesque and poetic values than because of their doctrinal implications. Closer contact, however, with the other great Catholic poet of his generation, the unyielding Paul Claudel (q.v.), resulted in a stiffening of Jammes's attitude in matters of dogma. His fervor burned more and more brightly. A semi-estrangement from Gide ensued; but Jammes became the darling of the devout. The poet of the elegies now aspired to the role of "Christian Vergil": his "eclogues," Les Rayons de miel (1908), were succeeded by the three volumes of Les Géorgiques chrétiennes (1911–1912). His gifts as storyteller, always remarkable, won him some reputation as a Catholic novelist with M. le curé d'Ozeron (1918) and Le Poète rustique (1920), the latter created in Jammes's own likeness as he saw it. The First World War appears to have changed him very little: he remained unswervingly naïve, rustic, and Catholic. It failed to diminish his fecundity. He wrote many more books—poetry, novels, and, finally, three delightful volumes of Mémoires (1922–1923). In his four Livres de quatrains (1923–1925) he essayed, with varying success, stricter form, greater concentration. Almost up to the moment he died, full of years and piety, he was still writing. But these later books, whatever their merits, do not add much that is essential. Very often they merely repeat, less successfully, the usual themes in the usual rural setting. The poet is engaged, one feels, in putting the finishing touches to his lifelong attitudes, in arranging his image for posterity. It is not an unworthy image.

Jammes is one of the most personal of French poets. Whatever lies outside himself, the world beyond his village, leaves him indifferent or even hostile. But his own world is less limited than it might appear because his sense perceptions are so extraordinarily acute and his imagination so vivid. His familiar country landscape always remained for him an enchanted land. A regional poet, he transcends simple regionalism. An occasional exotic note, reminiscent of his colonial heredity, makes itself heard. But he is above all the poet of the humble: people, animals, things. The essentials of the good life consist, for him, in birth, marriage, procreation of children, faithful performance of a few simple tasks and religious duties. Granted all its limitations, Jammes's poetic vision is by no means timid. He dared do the impossible with apparently "unpoetic" subject matter—what other poet has ever prayed to go to heaven in the company of asses? His animals are exquisite creations. So are his jeunes filles, Clara d'Ellébeuse, Almaïde d'Etremont, Pomme d'Anis (Jammes remained faithful all his life to his cult of the jeune fille). One might trace his literary descent from Rousseau and Bernardin de Saint-Pierre. He is not exempt from the sentimentality in which they habitually overindulge. His vocabulary is extremely rich, especially in terms designating the humbler creatures and objects; his verse is a very flexible instrument. Few vocations have been more authentic. Inspired poet par excellence, he once confided to Gide that he felt he had no right to tamper with a verse after it had been written. Such a method of composition naturally begets blemishes; naïveté becomes coquetry and simplicity turns to artifice. The poet regards his own bearded and patriarchal figure with a too evident complacency. He often becomes monotonous. Devoid of humor, his irony (whenever, in the interest of righteousness, he essays it) is heavy-handed. His Antigyste (1932), an attempted satire on the "immoral" influence of Gide, is a case in point. He is too proud of his humility. His later books are often more edifying than satisfying; his poetic wine is diluted with too much holy water. These strictures notwithstanding, he remains one of the chief minor poets of his generation.

See: T. Braun, Des poètes simples: Francis Jammes (1900); E. Pilon, Francis Jammes et le sentiment de la nature (1908); A. de Bersaucourt, Francis Jammes, poète chrétien (1910); L. Moulin, "Etude sur Francis Jammes," in Jammes, Choix de poèmes (1922); A. Gide, Journal (1939).

J. Me.

Jändel, Ragnar (1895–1939, Swedish poet), born in Jämsjö, Blekinge province, began his literary career as an extremist proletarian poet during the unsettled political years just before and after the close of the First World War. But he very soon outgrew the more excessive phases of his youthful radicalism, and he took no direct polemic part in the social and political program of organized labor in Sweden in the last 20 years, though he maintained throughout these years a warm sense of solidarity with the working classes. His published work is rather extensive, including, besides 13 volumes of poetry, three autobiographical works (Det stilla året, 1923, The Quiet Year; Den trånga porten, 1924, The Narrow Way; and Barn-domstid, 1936, Childhood), two volumes of essays on literary and general cultural subjects (Vägledare, 1921, Guides; Jag och vi, 1928, I and We), and a volume of nature studies (Blommor, 1937, Flowers). Neither his prose nor his poetry bear the mark of real greatness; but at their best they give sensitive individual expression to a fine spirit's searching for ultimate values in human life, and even in their less inspired moments they may serve the historian as valuable documents in his investigation of the literary-proletarian contribution to contemporary Swedish cultural trends. Jändel's first two volumes of poems, Till kärleken och hatet (1917; To Love and Hatred) and De tappra (1918; The Courageous Ones), give a pathos-filled, at times almost hysterical expression to the class consciousness of a small extremist group of the Swedish proletariat fanned into temporary fury by political developments on the Continent, particularly the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia. In these early volumes there is to be found also, however, poems conceived in a quiet, personal, confessional strain, concerned with less urgent social themes—with the home, the Swedish countryside, and with nature in some of its more unassuming idyllic moods. It is this strain that rapidly gains dominance in Jändel's later verse, though on occasion he gives indignant, direct expression to his fundamental social feeling (see "Två dikter till minnet av Sacco och Vanzetti" in Kämpande tro, 1928, Fighting Faith). The serene confessional strain which is the mark of most of Jändel's later poetry borders at times dangerously on the sentimental, but for the most part the poet manages to retain a healthy sense of realism, a warm, intimate closeness to the folk and to the earth. With the years he became increasingly concerned with religious problems, a tendency which he had in common with other modern Swedish poets of proletarian origins such as Dan Andersson (q.v.). His religious poetry, however, has in it none of the brooding primitive mysticism of Dan Andersson, nor does it find expression in an heroic or ascetic religious idealism. On the negative side it reacts strongly against institutional religion (especially as represented in the Swedish State Church), and it seems equally suspicious of the phenomena of miraculous "conversion" and of modern sectarianism of all kinds. In its positive contents it finds its most characteristic expression in a quiet nondogmatic acceptance of a religious-ethical interpretation of life not without its points of contact with Quakerism on the one hand and Emersonian religious idealism on the other.

A. G.

Janson, Kristofer Nagel (1841–1917, Norwegian author, pastor, and teacher), born in Bergen, is now remembered for but little of his voluminous and once popular production, though he was the first New Norse (Landsmaal) writer to win a poet's stipend (1876). A close friend and imitator of Björnson (q.v.), he is said to have been a model of the latter's heroic Pastor Sang in Beyond Our Power—and also of Ibsen's (q.v.) phrasemaker Hjalmar Ekdal in The Wild Duck. His saintly beard, melodious voice, and messianic manner made him a popular reader and lecturer. He taught at Christopher Bruun's folk high school from 1869 to 1878, but his religious development led him into Unitarianism, for which he labored against fearful odds among Lutheran Norwegian immigrants in the United States (1881–1893). His best-known books were the story Han og ho (1868; He and She) and the fictionized historical studies Fraa Dansketidi (1875; From the Danish Period) and Vore bedsteforældre (1882; Our Grandparents); the only important one available in English is Den bergtekne (1876; Eng. tr., The Spell-bound Fiddler, 1880). He was a sincere, warmhearted, courageous personality, selflessly seeking to urge men "away from strife and wrangling, and forward to brotherhood," but his writings lack artistic power.

See: H. H. Boyesen, "Kristofer Janson and the Reform of the Norwegian Language," North American Review, CXV (1872), 379–401; K. Hamsun, Ny jord, II (1888), 371–386; Janson, Hvad jeg har oplevet (1913), his autobiography; R. B. Anderson, Life Story of Rasmus B. Anderson (1915).

E. H.

Jarnés, Benjamín (1888–, Spanish novelist and essayist), was born in Aragon and bears the imprint of this province and of his countryman and guide, Baltasar Gracián. He completed almost all his studies for the priesthood, but then turned to a literary career, to which he brought a genuine predisposition and extraordinary capacity for work. He lived in Madrid until the outbreak of civil war. He went to Valencia and Barcelona in the service of the government; later, with Franco's victory, he went to Mexico, where he now collaborates on newspapers and journals and continues his literary work with undiminished fruitfulness.

The long list of his works, among the most abundant of his period, begins with Mosén Pedro (1924), a biographical essay. He became better known with El río fiel, which appeared in the Revista de Occidente in 1925, and especially with El profesor inútil (1926). In the following works, also of novelistic cast, he develops as a stylistic artist and a penetrating psychological analyst, capable of poetic delicacy: El convidado de papel (1928); Paula y Paulita (1929); Salón de estío (1930); Teoría del zumbel (1930); Escenas junto a la muerte (1931); and Lo rojo y lo azul (1932). His introversion also produces essays similar to his novels: Ejercicios (1927); Rúbricas (1931); Fauna contemporánea (1933); and Cartas al Ebro (1940), which appeared in Mexico and wherein he announces plans for the publication of numerous other works. He has also cultivated with success the Christian and the pagan legend, as in Vida de San Alejo (1928) and Viviana y Merlin (1929), both of which were amplified subsequently. His biographical works are important: Sor Patrocinio, la monja de las llagas (1929); Zumalacárregui, el caudillo romántico (1931); Castelar, hombre del Sinaí (1935); and Doble agonía de Bécquer, in which the literary critic can be seen in his full stature. He has translated into Spanish La Chanson de Roland (El cantar de Roldán, 1924), Bubu de Montparnasse of C. L. Philippe (q.v.), and various other works.

At a time when the literary scene was dominated by lyric poetry with such writers as Salinas, Guillén, García Lorca (qq.v.)—and the other genres suffered a passing eclipse, Jarrys proclaimed an earnest desire for a renovation of prose writing. He belongs to a revolutionary generation although, according to his own declaration in Cartas al Ebro, "he was the least rebellious of them. . . . Many years of cloistered seclusion drew the sting." In his books, well balanced, poetic, and penetrating, there predominates the student of vast culture, formed by the unhurried reading of Latin authors and Spanish classics and a discriminating appreciation of the foreign literatures of his time.

A. I.

Jarry, Alfred (1873–1907, French dramatist, novelist, and humorist), was born at Laval in central Brittany. To his paternal ancestors—artisans and petty tradesmen—he owed a robust constitution which served for a time to counterbalance a legacy of eccentricity and brilliance from his mother, in whose family there existed a pronounced strain of insanity. He received his early education in the schools of Saint-Brieuc and Rennes before going to Paris in 1891 to pursue his studies at the Lycée Henri IV. After a term of military service he returned to the capital to devote himself to literature. His earliest productions in prose and verse appeared in periodicals of the literary vanguard and were collected in 1894 in a small volume (Les Minutes de sable mémorial) remarkable for imaginative intensity and verbal resourcefulness. Lautréamont's (q.v.) influence can be discerned; and many passages have the nightmare quality of surrealist texts. In this same year his portrait, complete with parrot and chameleon, was painted by Henri Rousseau and hung in the Salon of the Independents. Jarry undertook to spread the fame of this childlike fellow townsman: brevetted him "Douanier" and commissioned a lithograph—Rousseau's only known print—which appeared in the second issue (January, 1895) of a de luxe quarterly, Ymagier, founded by Jarry in conjunction with Rémy de Gourmont (q.v.).

Sudden and shattering celebrity befell Jarry with the production, on the evening of December 10, 1896, at the experimental Théâtre de l'Œuvre, of his satirical drama Ubu Roi. Written at the age of 15 in collaboration with a classmate at the Lycée of Rennes, with the purpose of ridiculing a pompous mathematics teacher, Jarry had recast and expanded the play, while retaining its original Punch and Judy character. This effect he sought to heighten by providing masks for the players, by assigning special voices to each, and by insisting on stylized performances. These innovations, together with the coarseness of the language and the anarchistic implications of the action, outraged the traditionalists in the audience, and the ensuing tumult was later described as "la bataille d'Hernani des décadents." In the figure of the ignoble Père Ubu, Jarry created a literary type. Ubu has become the symbol, even in the popular imagination, of bourgeois stupidity grown complacent and irresponsible through abuse of authority. But as if in revenge, this monstrous creation took possession of the personality of its creator; and for the rest of his life Jarry adopted the gestures and intonation of his super-marionette, speaking in clipped, nasal accents, always employing the royal "we."

Until his modest inheritance was exhausted, Jarry continued to write in an involved, strongly personal style characterized by the subtle interplay of humor and lyricism. This manner culminated in L'Amour absolu (1899), a novel of almost impenetrable obscurity. Faced finally by the necessity of supporting himself by his writings, he published Ubu enchainé in 1900. Though inferior in verve to the earlier play, the quality of its humor is more cerebral, less gross. It was acted for the first time, with considerable success, at the Paris Exposition of 1937. Like Ubu Roi it is in essence a parody of tragedy; together these plays constitute the entire contribution of the symbolist movement (see French symbolism) to the field of comedy. More rewarding financially was his novel of ancient Rome, Messaline, which appeared in the pages of the Revue blanche in the course of the same year (1900). A feat of impeccable and effortless erudition, its sumptuous and richly figured language matched the splendor of its setting and caused it to be regarded by Jarry's contemporaries as his masterpiece. It now seems inferior to its modern counterpart, Le Surmâle (1902), the last and best constructed of his novels. Here the style is sober, lucid, and balanced—perfectly adapted to supporting the lurid fantasy of a machine that falls in love with its creator. It has been called the only strictly surrealist novel of our age. With his health undermined by poverty and the systematic overuse of alcohol, Jarry was at length able to contribute only an occasional essay to the reviews. His humor, like that of Swift and Poe, is metaphysical and mathematical, involving the logical demonstration of an absurd proposition. It is displayed to best advantage in Spéculations (1911), collected and published after his death, together with an earlier "neo-scientific" novel in the vein of Rabelais, Les Gestes et opinions du docteur Faustroll.

The importance of Jarry's literary contribution was for a while obscured by the persistence of the personal legend he had so deliberately cultivated. Interest in his work was revived by the writers of the 20's, who discovered in him a precursor. His books were reissued and reappraised, and his position now seems secure as a writer of remarkable gifts of imagination and verbal facility and as a humorist of the highest order.

See: A. Breton, Les Pas perdus (1924), pp. 47-65; Apollinaire, Il y a (1925), pp. 223-234; P. Chauveau, Alfred Jarry (1932); F. Lot, Alfred Jarry (1934).

A. McV.

Jasnorzewska, Marja (known also as Marja Pawlikowska, née Kossak, 1899-1945, Polish poet and playwright), was born in Cracow, the daughter of the well-known painter Wojciech Kossak. Called the queen of Polish lyricists and the Polish Sappho, Jasnorzewska occupies a unique place among Polish poets: she is the one who has brought the short, sensuous lyric close to perfection. Her poems often have the quality of a Japanese flower arrangement, and her ability to communicate the peculiar beauty of her native tongue is remarkable. Of her many volumes, the collections Śpiąca załoga (1933; The Sleeping Crew), Krystalizacje (1937; Crystallizations), and Róża i lasy płonące (1941; The Rose and the Burning Forest) are representative.

As a dramatist Jasnorzewska is more prolific and feminine than deep or universal. She occupies herself generally with artificial situations and bloodless people; yet because of her reputation as a poet and her position in society she was always able to obtain a hearing for her plays, and many of them were staged with a brilliance they did not deserve. Her principal dramas are: Szofer Archibald (1924; Chauffeur Archibald); Egipska pszenica (1932; Egyptian Wheat); Niebiescy załotnicy (1933; Heavenly Coquettes); Powrót mamy (1935; The Mother's Return); Dowód osobisty (1936; Personal Evidence); Nagroda literacka (1937; Literary Award); the allegorical Mrowki (1936; The Ants); and Baby-Dziwo (1939), a satire on dictators. Jasnorzewska went to England during the Second World War.

See: K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 393-403, 704-705; K. W. Zawodziński, review of Krystalizacje in Wiadomości literackie, 1937, No. 42; A. P. Coleman, "Polish Literature in Exile," New York Times Book Review, June 1, 1941, pp. 8, 18.

A. P. C.

Jensen, Johannes Vilhelm (1873-, Danish author), was born in the village of Farsø, Himmerland (Northwest Jutland), where his father was the veterinary and his grandfather a farmer and weaver. Jensen studied medicine in Copenhagen, and, although he did not become a doctor, his interest in biological science was one of the two mainsprings of his authorship. The other was his spiritual affiliation with the community, unbookish and close to nature, from which he sprang. In it ancient graves and folkways pointed to the past; his grandfather had a spear hanging over the loom.

After two novels, Danskere (1896; Danes) and Einar Elkjær (1898), in which he dissected youthful emotions in the manner of the 90's, came the book which he himself regards as his first mature work, Himmerlandshistorier (3 vols., 1898-1910; Himmerland Stories). Drawn from his native countryside, their sparkling vigor, freshness, humor, and unsentimental sympathy caused him to be recognized at once as a writer of spontaneous and poetic originality. Stimulated by travels in Europe and voyages to the Far East, he wrote Exotiske Noveller (1907-1909; Exotic Stories), Intermezzo (1899), and Skovene (1904; The Forests) without departing from his own standard; and, beginning his journeys into the past, he wrote Kongens Fald (1899-1902; Eng. tr., The Fall of the King, 1933), a vivid psychological study of the inner lives of the unfortunate King Christian II and of a simple soldier, a keen experiencer of life. Then, after visiting America, the extravert in Jensen burst forth in the brilliant tales of Chicago and New York, Madame d'Ora (1904) and Hjulet (1905; The Wheel), rockets of delighted amazement at man's giant efforts in technique and at metropolitan vitality.

After the publication in 1906 of Digte (Poems), a book of profound beauty and of great influence in Danish literature (as indeed all his work has been), a new period began for him. Affected in his youth by The Origin of Species, his interest in anthropology and biology had concentrated with fervor in the theory of evolution. This resulted in six novels, Det tabte Land, Braen, Cimbrernes Tog, Norne-Gæst, Skibet, and Christopher Columbus (1909-1920). In 1938 these were combined in two volumes under the title Den lange Rejse (an Eng. tr., The Long Journey, had appeared in three volumes, 1922-1924). The main idea, as usual more important to the author than the reader, is the evolution of man from his survival through mere brute force to man as the ship and cathedral builder and man as the yearning, ever-seeking discoverer. The theme centres about the Northmen, but it is not about "Nordics." It is an epic of people who developed hardihood, inventiveness, and even gentleness through pitting themselves against nature, either battling the cold of the ice age or defying the dreaded volcano and bringing down fire from it. Journeys to Norwegian glaciers and Javanese volcanoes gave him his settings; the primitive northern communities were known to him, so to speak, from his childhood countryside. These books are not novels in the usual sense, but they are full of memorable human beings, prehistoric man brought into our comprehension and feeling, individualized convincingly for the first time. The whole work is an ever-playing geyser of beauty, humor, living history, and cosmic fantasy.

Not to be contained in any conventional form, Johannes V. Jensen has published six or seven collections of "myths." A myth is, he says, "every description which brings a bit of nature into relationships with the times"; it is also "the essence and marrow of things." Critics claim that in the myth he has created a form as much his own as the fairy tale was Hans Christian Andersen's. Into it he has poured his observations of landscapes, animals, men, travels, art, and literature, creating many unclassifiable little masterpieces.

Other volumes of poetry and essays have come from his hand, Dyrenes Forvandling (1927; The Transformation of Animals) and Aandens Studier (1928; Stages in the Development of Mind) being two of the more important collections of essays. In 1933 a bibliography (by Aage Marcus and Frits Johansen) of all he had written included 950 items, most of them having been published in the daily press. He was awarded the Nobel prize in literature in 1944.

Johannes V. Jensen has been criticized for bringing science into the domain of imagination, and inaccuracies in his scientific conclusions have been pointed out, although in some cases he turned out to be right. But it is rather his deep sense of science, or all-including nature, which has aroused his imagination. He has said, "I never felt I was an author," adding that the material meant more to him than the working of it into literature. How is one to classify a writer who is not "literary"? His imitators work in vain; theirs is not his supernatural power of sense perception, nor the gift of conveying what he feels so that we experience it as if we had been just introduced to it in the Garden of Eden. He is at times dogmatic, and no man could attempt to cover what he does without leaving some bare patches, but his philosophy includes both fortitude and tenderness, while as a writer he gives us treasures unsurpassed for their fusing of rare sight and rarer insight.

See: Otto Gelsted, Johannes V. Jensen (1913); Alf Henriques, Johannes V. Jensen (1938).

S. T.

Jiménez, Juan Ramón (1881-, Spanish poet), outstanding among contemporary poets in the Spanish-speaking world, was born in Moguer, a small Andalusian town whose simple and delicate, dreamlike atmosphere permeates his lyrical work from his very first poems. He studied in a religious college in Santa María, near his home town, and at the University of Seville. His deeply romantic soul was nourished with readings of the Spanish romancero, of Góngora and Bécquer, and of the French, English, and German poets of the romantic school, all of whom opened to him the wonders of fantastic imagination and exalted expression of feelings. His early life was burdened with illness, and as a result he developed a love for silence and solitude. At that time he was interested in painting and music; all through his life these two forms of art have been a background to his poetry. In 1901 he went to live in Madrid, where he met the great Latin American poet Rubén Darío, whose role as leader of the modernista movement profoundly influenced his work. Several trips and sojourns in France and Switzerland enabled him to become better acquainted with the poetry of the French symbolists (see French symbolism). Familiarity with the work of his favorite authors—Verlaine, Samain, Récgnier (qq.v.), Shakespeare, Keats, Shelley, Browning, Goethe, Hölderlin—added to his poetry that touch of the universal which, together with a deep, true sense of the Spanish lyrical tradition, is the most remarkable feature of his style. After some years spent in Madrid the poet returned to his native Moguer, where he lived until 1912, again in friendly contact with his beloved Andalusian atmosphere. Once more he left Moguer for Madrid, remaining there until 1916, when he journeyed to New York to marry Zenobia Camprubí Aymar, since then his devoted wife and companion in life and letters. In 1917 he wrote Diario de un poeta recién casado, of the greatest importance in the development of modern Spanish poetry and still a landmark in Spanish literature because of its freshness of style. The work of this poet has since deepened into a perfect understanding of the inmost sense of the lyrical, being at the same time simple and elaborate, clear and obscure, youthful and mature, as Poetry itself must be. In 1936 Jiménez returned to America after another sojourn in his native land, first living in Puerto Rico and Cuba, where his presence was accepted with great enthusiasm by writers and lovers of poetry and where his direct contact with the young poets deeply influenced their work. He has more recently been living in Washington, D.C., writing and lecturing.

Jiménez's style, both in prose and in verse, differs from that of any other writer in Spanish. A true and independent aesthete, he has never compromised with current fashions in writing. His is a personal pen, always faithful to itself, always sincere to the inspired moment, always translating the profound or even the naïve thoughts of the poet. His treatment of poetical words is appropriate, each of them being a universe of signification. His verse, somewhat ornamental and decorative at its beginning, achieved later an almost naked simplicity; indeed he seemed to reach the very soul of Poetry, whose devoted lover he has always been.

Jiménez has never considered his Obra, as he passionately names the entirety of his writings, completed or definite and designates as one of his most interesting tasks the correcting and rewriting of his own work—always in a process of purification. In a sense it is all one diary, for his lyrical, philosophical, or pictorial daily impressions are recorded with a faithfulness, a regularity, that give to the whole an appearance of continuity seldom found in any other poet. This continuity is also shown by the sequence of his publications, which have been almost annual and without interruption since 1900.

The first books of Jiménez, Almas de violeta (1900), Ninfeas (1900), and Rimas (1902), written in his early life, depict what might be called an unrevealed inquietude that, as it develops in maturity, produces the originality of Arias tristes (1903), Jardines lejanos (1904), and Pastorales (1905), together with a dislike for the modernista aesthetics. Pastorales indeed is written in the Spanish ballad form as a reaction against his own first work. After Jiménez had returned to Moguer, his verse gained in richness and variety. In Olvidanzas (1907) and Baladas de primavera (1907) the poet is won again by the enchantment of nature; in La soledad sonora (1909) and Poemas mágicos y dolientes (1909) is found elaborate and often impressive thought; in Elegías puras (1908) and Laberinto (1913) the variety and richness of expression, still more pronounced, are finally enhanced by depth and intensity. These two qualities are revealed also in Estío (1917) and Sonetos espirituales (1917), written in Madrid and representing the end of an epoch in his work. The same year, 1917, is marked by the publication of Jiménez's book Platero y yo, the best collection of prose poems yet written in Spanish, and by the appearance of the Diario, with its new style and final maturity. Since then his work—contained mainly in booklet or broadside form such as Unidad (1925), Sucesión (1932), and Presente (1935) and in such books as Segunda antología poética (1922), Canción (1936), and Verso y prosa para niños (1937)—has reached the pinnacle of literary and human value and has made Jiménez one of the few great figures of contemporary literature.

The Hispanic Society of New York published in 1917 an anthology of Jiménez's lyrical work, Poesías escogidas, chosen by the author.

See: A. González-Blanco, "Juan R. Jiménez," in Los contemporáneos, Ser. 1 (1906); R. Cansinos-Asséns, La nueva literatura (2 vols., 1917); F. de Onís, "Juan Ramón Jiménez" in Jiménez, Platero y yo, ed. by G. M. Walsh (1922); A. F. G. Bell, Contemporary Spanish Literature (1925); Carmen Gómez Tejera and Juan Asencio Alvarez-Torre, preliminary note in Jiménez, Verso y prosa para niños (1937).

E. Fl.

Jirásek, Alois (1851–1930, Czech novelist and dramatist), is the most popular novelist of Bohemia. He was born at Hronov near Náchod (northeastern Bohemia), the son of a baker. He studied history at the Czech University of Prague and was a history teacher at a Gymnasium, first in Litomyšl and from 1888 in Prague. During the First World War, Jirásek inspired the manifesto of the Czech writers (1917). After the war he became a member of Parliament and later a senator. He died at Prague.

Jirásek was a historical novelist in the tradition of Sir Walter Scott and roughly comparable to Sienkiewicz (q.v.). He was a real scholar who knew a great deal about the past of his nation, especially its customs and folklore. As an artist he excelled in the evocation of scenes and moods, but was, like Scott, weak in psychology and composition. His novels and stories, which fill 47 volumes, cover practically all periods of Czech history. Three groups of novels, Mezi proudy (3 vols., 1891; Between the Currents), Proti všem (1894; Against the Whole World), and Bratrstvo (3 vols., 1899; The Brotherhood), paint a vivid picture of the events leading to the Hussite wars and the wars themselves. The last cycle especially, which tells about the fortunes of the bands of Taborites roaming Hungary and Slovakia, makes a good story. Another group of novels is placed in the time of the Czech defeat after the Battle of the White Mountain (1620). Psolhlauci (1886; Men with Dog's Heads) was Jirásek's first great success; it is the moving story of a peasants' revolt in western Bohemia and of the heroic death of their leader, Kosina. Temno (1915; Darkness) deals in bold fresco-like manner with the later triumph of the Jesuits in Bohemia, the underground Protestant movement, and the Austrian oppression. Another group of novels treats of the Czech national awakening late in the 18th and early in the 19th century. A loosely composed series, F. L. Věk (5 vols., 1888–1906), centers round a minor writer of that time whose actual name was Hek, and U nás (4 vols., 1896–1903; At Home) is a chronicle of national developments in the district of Jirásek's birth. Among the many short stories, Filosofická historie (1878; A Story of Philosophers) is a charming idyl which has achieved great popularity.

Jirásek also wrote Z mých pamětí (2 vols., 1911–1913; Memoirs) and several books for young readers. His retelling of old Czech legends, Staré pověsti české (1894; Old Czech Myths), is one of the most widely read Czech books. Jirásek was less successful as a dramatist, though some mass scenes in the historical plays (e.g., Jan Žižka, 1903), one symbolic play (Lucerna, 1905; The Lantern), and several comedies are effective on the stage.

Jirásek must be judged as a great national patriot whose evocation of Czech history has done much to strengthen national feeling and a sense of the national tradition. His novels about the Middle Ages suffer from a lack of imaginative understanding of religion, but the pictures of Bohemia during the ages of serfdom and during the national awakening are both substantially accurate and artistically successful. Jirásek is especially good in genre pictures; his tragic figures and passionate women are still in the conventional romantic manner.

See: Jan Frič, Alois Jirásek (1921); M. Hýsek, ed., Alois Jirásek (1921); Zdeněk Nejedlý, Alois Jirásek (1921); J. Borecký, "Alois Jirásek", in Almanach České Akademie, 1933. Several of Jirásek's novels have been translated into German and French.

R. W.

Jochumsson, Matthías (1835–1920, Icelandic poet and playwright), was born at Skógar in Þorskaftjörður, of excellent stock. His parents were too poor to send him to school, and he was to become a merchant. But leading men of the cultural center of Flatey, Breiðfjörður, helped him so that he could graduate (1863) from the Latin school in Reykjavík and later (1865) from the school of theology. After that he served as a parson, except for the period from 1874 to 1880 when he edited a newspaper. During the last 20 years of his life he held a government grant as poet laureate of the land. He married three times; the circumstances under which he lost his first two wives caused him great pain. He traveled widely, he visited the United States and the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893, and he made friends with prominent men in many lands.

Though Jochumsson composed verse as a boy, it was with the play Útilegumennirnir (1864, The Outlaws; later called by the proper name Skugga-Sveinn) that he won standing as a poet. It was the first romantic play written in Iceland. Later Jochumsson was to write historical pageants and one historical play, Jón Arason (1900), in the manner of Shakespeare, whose Macbeth, Hamlet, Romeo and Juliet, and Othello he had already turned into excellent Icelandic. He was a great translator; Tegnér's Friðþjófs saga, Byron's Manfred, and Ibsen's (q.v.) Brand were among his many poetic translations. His own poems were first published in 1884, his complete poetic works in 1936 (Ljóðmæli). He also wrote Grettisljóð (1897), a romantic epic on Grettis saga, and Sögukaflar af sjálfum mér (1922; Stories from My Life), an autobiography.

Jochumsson's lyric poetry ranges from hymns to humorous verse, from eulogies of Iceland to praise of other countries. He witnessed two great national celebrations, the millenary of Iceland in 1874 and the turn of the century in 1900; both occasions he celebrated in odes, hymns, and pageants. He outlived two generations, and every important figure and most of his friends were paid his final respects in a commemorative poem.

The genius of Matthías Jochumsson is at once broad and profound. The essence of his personality is, perhaps, his trust in God or a good Providence and his sympathy with his fellow man. His religion was from an early stage inclined to be nonconfessional; he was influenced in turn by the Unitarian Channing, the philosopher Paul Carus, the "new" German theology, and, at the end of his life, by American-English spiritualism. His hope revolts at atheism and denial of afterlife. His faith has found expression in some of the finest hymns of the Icelandic tongue, including the national hymn of Iceland. As a patriot he loved the nation more than the country—an attitude contrary to that of all his contemporaries. Among his commemorative poems and memorials of historical personages are some of the finest in this common Icelandic genre. His command of the history, literature, and language of the country is phenomenal, and he wields Scaldic and Eddic meters and diction with as much ease as modern mediums. He has written a magnificent eulogy of the language in stately Scaldic measure. The sagas and its figures live again in his work; yet he is no blind admirer of the saga age, and his sympathy with the suffering hero of the Christ type is probably more constant than his love of the brilliant hero of the sagas. Not consistently a good artist, Jochumsson is always an inspired poet. Occasionally his poems sink to mediocrity, but seldom do they lack a flash of genius.

See: S. Nordal, "Matthías við Dettifoss," Eimreiðin, XXVII (1921), 1-6; R. Beck,

"Matthías Jochumsson—Icelandic Poet and Translator," Scandinavian Studies and Notes, XIII (1934-1935), 111-124; S. Einarsson, "Shakespeare in Iceland; an Historical Survey," ELH; a Journal of English Literary History, VII (1940), 272-285.

S. E.

Johst, Hanns (1890-, German dramatist, poet, and essayist), was born in Saxony, the son of a grade school teacher. At first he wanted to be a missionary; but then he studied medicine and finally philology and the history of art. His first novel, Der Anfang (1917), tells of his youth and early development. By affinity of temperament he was drawn into expressionism; however, contrary to its prevailing ethos of limitless love for all humanity, Johst preached intensity and limitation of personality and came to stress more and more national and ethnic values. The war furnished substance for his first dramatic attempts. His ecstatic Der junge Mensch (1916), influenced by Wedekind (q.v.), is confessional and full of pathos. Of the same year are the lyrics Wegwärts, in which the haste of modern life became the symbol of Johst's dynamics. The play Der Einsame (1917) shows in the fate of the poet Grabbe divine redemption after a life of confusion and guilt; it is influenced by Büchner, Wedekind, and Strindberg (q.v.). The poems in Rolandsruf (1918) and Mutter (1921) were expressions of Johst's ethnic consciousness. The drama Der König (1920) is the picture of a utopian idealist who perishes because he conceives of action only in the abstract. Maturity gained through stern education by fate is the goal reached in the novel Der Kreuzweg (1921), while the drama Propheten (1923) shows Luther as the incarnation of the German soul, who with the help of the sword brings about the victory of the spirit. The same year brought also the light comedy of the inflation era, Wechsler und Händler. The drama Die fröhliche Stadt (1925) scores and satirizes modern materialism disguised as progress. Theoretical writings of a confessional nature were Wissen und Gewissen (1924) and Ich glaube (1928). Thomas Paine (1927) is made the dramatic symbol of the creative leader who, after inspiring the fight for independence, goes to ruin, lonely and forgotten. Johst believed that he had created a German version of this story in Schlageter (1933), the symbol of resistance against the enemies of Germany. Fanaticism and unbridled emotions, however, do not replace reasonable motivation. The play is dedicated in "unchanging loyalty" to Hitler. A novel, Torheit einer Liebe (1930), is not without some idyllic charm. After 1933 Johst was given practically all the positions of honor that the Third Reich would bestow upon a writer. He even became a brigade leader in Hitler's "SS." For the same period nothing noteworthy can be reported of Johst in the field of literary creation.

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Neue Folge: Im Banne des Expressionismus, 4. Auflage (1927), pp. 717-728; S. Casper, Der Dramatiker Hanns Johst (1935); H. Franke, "Hanns Johst," Die neue Literatur, XXXVI (1935), 459-469.

W. K. P.

Jókai, Móricz (1825-1904, Hungarian novelist and short-story writer), was born in Komárom and died in Budapest. He received his elementary and secondary education in his birthplace, then went to school in Pozsony and in Pápa where he befriended Petöfi, the lyric poet. He studied law at the Academy of Kecskemét. His first novel, Hétköznapiak (Weekdays), appeared in 1846. In 1848 he played an important part in the revolutionary movement of Hungarian youth. That same year he married Róza Laborfalvi, a distinguished actress, who died in 1866. After the collapse of the War of Independence Jókai had to play hide-and-seek in Hungarian villages in order to elude the Austrians; finally, however, he was given amnesty. In 1854 he assisted in the publication of Vasárnapi Ujság (Sunday News), a belletristic weekly, and in 1858 he founded a comic paper, Üstökös (Comet). He never lost faith in the ability of the nation to regain its independence. In his political activities he scorned the doubters, and as a member of the Hungarian Parliament and later of the House of Magnates he represented the liberal point of view. In recognition of his literary work he was elected to the Hungarian Academy of Sciences and to various literary organizations. He edited several daily newspapers, in 1849 in Budapest Pesti Hírlap (Pest Journal) and that same year in Debrecen Esti Lapok (Evening News); later, in Budapest, Magyar Szó (Hungarian Press), Hon (Nation), and other newspapers were also under his editorial leadership. His collected works appeared in 100 volumes, and he was the recipient of 120,000 gulden presented to him by the nation. In 1899 Jókai married a second time, again to an actress, Bella Nagy. His career was distinguished and successful; he was idolized by his countrymen. His reputation indeed became world wide. No Hungarian writer before him or since has had such an immense public as Jókai.

In Jókai the universe, dreams, ideals, love, heroic deeds, fantastic possibilities and achievements, historical and contemporary problems, were mingled with pseudoscientific or scientific information, with musings that reached for the infinite, with tones, forms, colors, that were symbolic of an inexhaustible imagination. He found plots where the unimaginative would not have seen even the beginnings of one. His imagination hurdled the obstacles that the Hungarian language, isolated in relationship to the rest of the world, imposes on its writers. His optimism was unbounded, and while the quality of his art is uneven, his most carelessly written stories, his most superficial tales, contain the indubitable sign of narrative genius. Somewhat influenced by French and English romanticists, he very soon was awakened to the demands of his own individuality and followed the voice of his creative temperament. He discovered new provinces for fiction, like Jules Verne and H. G. Wells; natural sciences always interested him, and with an imagination that could be fantastical he also knew how to be scientific. His bent was toward the amazing, the extraordinary; and when necessity and conviction required realism, e.g., in Az új földesúr (1868; The New Squire), it was his romanticism that determined the atmosphere of the story. Generally he was irresistibly attracted to the world of miracles, of magic, of spiritual nobility; consequently the peculiar quality of his art lies not in characterization, not in psychological veracity, not in style, but in the strange universe he was able to create with the freshness and perennial youthfulness of his spirit.

Many of Jókai's themes are Hungarian, but his abundant imagination returned to foreign themes, ancient and modern alike. The gates of the impossible were never closed to him. That was the law of his creative temperament. By nature he was friendly, some sort of survivor of an Atlantis world; he had a voice for the interpretation of sorrow, but he preferred joy. Many of his novels appeared in English; in fact there are translations of Jókai's novels in every civilized tongue. His most popular novels in the English-speaking world are the following: Erdély aranykora (1852; Eng. trs., Midst the Wild Carpathians, 1894, The Golden Age in Transylvania, 1898); Egy magyar nábob (1853-1854; Eng. tr., An Hungarian Nabob, 1898); A Janicsárok végnapjai (1854; Eng. tr., The Lion of Janina, 1897); Szomorú napok (1856; Eng. tr., The Day of Wrath, 1900); A közsivü ember fia (1869; Eng. tr., The Baron's Sons, 1900); A fekete gyémantok (1870; Eng. tr., Black Diamonds, 1896); Az aranyember (1872; Eng. tr., A Modern Midas, 1885); Nincsen ördög 1891; Eng. tr., "There Is No Devil," 1891). Indeed in the realm of the imagination Jókai's spirit was never homeless, and even when, as a publicist, he was concerned with realistic problems, he sought union between the exotic world of his imagination and the rational responsibilities of common sense. He was the magnificent storyteller, the creator remembered for his dreams, the illusionist whose ideas and ideals guarded the freedom of his fancy against the encroachments of everyday life. His humor was simple, fostering smiles rather than laughter; his understanding of the people showed an ability to assimilate the images and anecdotes of folklore; his vocabulary was rich, if undisciplined, and always concrete; his sense of composition was uncertain, yet he could shape the unfathomable and could give unimportant experiences the appearance of meaningfulness. As to wealth of imagination, Jókai is unexcelled in Hungarian literature, and here even in world literature he has few competitors.

See: Jókai Mór önmagáról (1904); K. Mikszáth, Jókai Mór élete és kora (2 vols., 1907); Z. Ferenczi, Jókai idegen nyelvre fordított műveinek jegyzéke (1925).

J. R.

Jørgensen, Jens Johannes (1866–, Danish poet, novelist, essayist, and hagiographer), was born in Svendborg, Fyn, the son of a sea captain. After a pious and harmonious home life the youth was rudely jolted in Copenhagen where, in 1886, as a student of zoology, he came under the influence of Brandesian naturalism. Making his debut with Vers (1887; Verses), he soon befriended like-minded young poets, of whom Sophus Claussen (q.v.) and the couple Ingeborg and Viggo Stuckenberg (q.v.) were the most important. This group soon outgrew the social radicalism of Brandes (q.v.), following him indeed in his cult of Nietzsche (1888), but parting ways with him in their admiration of the French symbolists (see French symbolism). In Nietzsche (q.v.) it was not the superman, but his sense of the depth of the world that appealed to them. In the French symbolists it was the keen introspection, the reveling in decadent moods, which struck a responsive chord in their hearts. Jørgensen was even affected by their guilty sense of sin.

Jørgensen's first poetry and prose was in the naturalistic vein, but the note of symbolism was already present in Stemninger (1892; Moods) and Livets Træ (1893; The Tree of Life). Symbolism was formally launched with the periodical Taarnet (1893–1895; The Tower), edited by Jørgensen and supported by his friends. But the new romantic cult of beauty and mysticism as well as the worship of ego failed more and more to satisfy Jørgensen. In the turmoil of financial and spiritual worries he was glad to accept the invitation of a converted Jewish friend, Mogens Ballin, to go with him to Assisi in Italy. This journey, described in Rejsebogen (1895; The Book of the Journey), the first of many to the sunny South, was decisive for his spiritual development; he became a Catholic in 1895.

The zeal of the convert, striving for religious truth and the ascetic ideal, is evident in many books of the next five years. But some of his finest poetry also dates from these times—Digte, 1894–98 (Poems)—and Lignelser (1898; Parables) is beautiful prose. A quieter period, after 1900, is marked by the great biography, Den hellige Frans af Assisi (1907; Eng. tr., Saint Francis of Assisi, 1912), the first in a series of saints' lives (Catherina of Siena, 1915; Don Bosco, 1929; etc.). On the basis of this and his aesthetical writings, including Essays (1906) on the symbolistic movement, and Goethebogen (1913; The Book on Goethe), he was in 1913 called to the chair of aesthetics at the University of Louvain in Belgium. Forced out by the First World War, he wrote on German atrocities in Belgium (Klokke Roland, 1915; Eng. tr., False Witnesses, 1916). This estranged him from friends in Germany, but forged his friendship with France and Italy; he once more returned to the latter country, taking up his abode in his beloved Assisi.

In continuation of Rejsebogen, Jørgensen has written a great number of books on his journeys and pilgrimages through the length and breadth of Catholic Europe. One of the best is Pilgrimsbogen (1903; Eng. tr., Pilgrim Walks in Franciscan Italy, 1908). Its popularity in France alone may be judged by the fact that, by 1936, it had appeared in 36 editions.

Jørgensen's chief prose work, however, is Mit Livs Legende (6 vols., 1916–1919, 7th vol., 1928; Eng. tr., Jørgensen, An Autobiography, 2 vols., 1928–1929). This confessional life is not only valuable for Danish intellectual history in the 1890's, but, like much of Jørgensen's prose, it is rich in lyric beauty, especially in the passages describing the moods of his youth.

Since 1900 Jørgensen has published some five collections of poetry, among which Blomster og Frugter (1907; Flowers and Fruits) and Brig Marie af Svendborg (1926; The Brig Marie of Svendborg) are notable. His poetry, always simple in form, is a perfect expression of his melancholy moods and continual yearning. It moves from the early nature mysticism, reveling in moonlight and nocturnal romanticism, to the penitential Catholic lyric, stoic in resignation to God's providence. On his long pilgrimage Jørgensen often feels with Odysseus the pangs of nostalgia, for his old home, his old way of life, and his native Denmark. But often, too, he is inspired with his friend Saint Francis to sing the praises of sister nature, the white cell, and the peace that he has finally won in God.

See: Oscar Geismar "Johannes Jørgensen," in Ejnar Skovrup, ed., Hovedtræk af nordisk Digtning i Nytiden, I (1920), 140-151; H. G. Topsøe-Jensen, Scandinavian Literature from Brandes to Our Day (1929), pp. 126-130; Helge Kjærgaard, Die dänische Literatur der neuesten Zeit (1871-1933) (1934), pp. 83-92.

S. E.

Jouhandeau, Marcel (pseud. Marcel Provence, 1888-, French novelist), was born at Guéret in central France. He has been a teacher at the Collège de Passy in Paris. Among contemporary writers he is conspicuous for the bitterness and the cynicism with which he views the world in general and himself in particular. Some of his books are the product of a pitiless introspection—Monsieur Godeau intime (1926), Monsieur Godeau marié (1933), Chroniques maritales (1938); others are cruel portraits of the inhabitants of his native town which appears in his work under the name Chaminadour—Les Térébinte (1926), Tite-le-Long (1932), Binche-Ana (1933), Chaminadour I (1934), Chaminadour II (1936), L'Arbre de visages (Chaminadour III; 1941).

Jouhandeau not only studies the conflicts of man with his own self, but his struggles with God and Satan. At times his stories, detached from the earth, give an impression of unreality due in part to the use of symbolic devices. The ferocious portraits of the citizens of Chaminadour are sketched with the utmost simplicity. He generally ignores nonessential psychological elements and stresses what seems to him the dominant trait of the characters. The same economy of means is noticeable in the plot of his short stories: Les Pincengrain (1924), Prudence Hautechaume (1927), Astaroth (1929), Le Journal du coiffeur (1931), Images de Paris (1934), Le Saladier (1936). These tales are built around insignificant events, and they owe their depth and their intensity to the author's fearless probings into the darkest mysteries of the human soul and to his constant unveiling of the cruelty of life.

Jouhandeau's work includes also La Jeunesse de Théophile (1921), Opales (1928), L'Amateur d'imprudence (1932), Véronicane (1933), Elise (1933), and a few essays. Under the name Marcel Provence he has written Les Allemands en Provence (1919) and Bauxite et aluminium (L'Allemagne et l'après-guerre) (1920) and has produced an anthology of poems entitled Amour.

See: Claude Mauriac, Introduction à une mystique de l'enfer (1938).

M. E. C.

Jouve, Pierre Jean (1887-, French poet, novelist, and essayist), was born at Arras in Artois. From the scientific studies of his youth he turned to poetry; he founded with Paul Castiaux, and directed for three years (1907-1910), the magazine Bandeaux d'or, which supported the newly formed "Abbaye" group. In the first series of his poems, Les Muses romaines et florentines (1910), Présences (1912), Parler (1913), Jouve already showed a tendency to mingle philosophy and photographic glimpses of reality and dream in a manner somehow foreshadowing surrealism. Although poor health prevented his mobilization in 1914, he volunteered as a hospital orderly, thus gleaned the stories which formed his later book, Hôtel-Dieu; récits d'hôpital en 1915 (1920). His failing health, however, compelled him to spend the next four years in Switzerland. There his pacifist views, freely aired in the impassioned poetical protests of Vous êtes des hommes (1915), Poème contre le grand crime (1916), and Danse des morts (1917), were fortified by his personal contact with the great figure of Romain Rolland (q.v.), to whom he later devoted a book which he himself termed "a poem and act of faith," Romain Rolland vivant, 1914-1919 (1920). Two collections of a deeper character, Heures, livre de la nuit (1919), and Heures, livre de la grâce (1920), were later combined with the poetical notations of new trips to Florence, Austria, and Germany, in Tragiques, suivis du voyage sentimental (1923). At this point in his poetical evolution he truly was a poet of revolt, whether he evoked the "bitter maze" of his youth, shouted his despair, or cried out his call to love, friendship, art, and beauty. Then his passionate quest for an absolute answer to the mysterious union of contradictory forces in man made him turn to the revelation of the Roman Catholic faith as well as to the study of psychoanalysis, both of which permeate his later work. While still producing poetry, Prière (1923), Les Mystérieuses Noces (1925), Nouvelles Noces (1926), La Symphonie à Dieu (1930), Sueur de sang (1935), and that moving poem of the birth of anguish in man, Le Paradis perdu (1929; new and definitive ed., 1942), Jouve began to write novels and short stories, Paulina 1880 (1925), whose heroine, a tortured prey to eroticism and mysticism, set the pace for most of his succeeding work, Le Monde désert (1926), Beau Regard (1927), Hécate (1928), Vagadu (1931), Histoires sanglantes (1932), La Scène capitale (1935).

Instead of reviving his pacifist tendencies, the Second World War seems to have intensified Jouve's concern with the ultimate values of life and religion, as is evident in his books recently arrived from Switzerland. His Porche à la nuit des saints (1941) reflects the anguish of earlier poems and echoes the tragic destiny of our time, but brings out the true peace that comes only from total submission to God. Two late works of criticism reveal a similar preoccupation, his Tombeau de Baudelaire (1941) and, above all, that magnificent piece of music criticism, Le Don Juan de Mozart (1942). In it Jouve has succeeded not only in recreating without undue technical language the atmosphere of Mozart's music, but also in giving a new understanding of the musician's genius and a deep insight into the very problem that has haunted the poet himself throughout his life. It is as if, after attempting to further through fiction and poetry his conceptual comprehension of the tragic fate of man dominated by the coupled impulses of love and death, he had found its supreme revelation in the formal product of an art form closely bound to physical necessities and mystical intuition. Mozart's treatment of the myth of love and death as exemplified by Don Juan has become for Jouve the deepest and truly "divine" expression of this excruciating mystery which is the guiding thread of his own inquest and which makes his work an authentic mirror of the tragedy of modern man.

See: S. A. Rhodes, "William Blake and Pierre Jean Jouve," Romanic Review, XXIV (1933), 147-149, and "Disciple of William Blake," Sewanee Review, XLI (1933), 287-290; Cahiers du sud, CLXXXII (April, 1936), 272-304 (number in honor of Jouve).

C. L. B.

Jouvet, Louis (1885-, French actor, theatrical director, and metteur en scène), born at Crozon, Finistère, began his career in Paris. Beyond two failures at the Conservatoire, he had had little experience when Jacques Copeau (q.v.) established the Théâtre du Vieux Colombier (1913) and found Jouvet indispensable as actor, property man, electrician. When in 1922 Jouvet went to the Comédie des Champs-Élysées (of which he became sole director in 1924), he took many of the best of Copeau's discoveries—Valentine Tessier, Lucienne Bogaert, Michel Simon. He moved his company to the Athénée in 1934, the same year that he became a professor at the Conservatoire. Building his reputation on the total work of such contemporary dramatists as Jean Giraudoux, Jules Romains, Marcel Achard, and Stève Passeur (qq.v.), Jouvet has indulged in but few revivals (e.g., Molière and Mérimée) and even fewer foreign plays (e.g., one by the Alvarez Quintero brothers, q.v., and an adaptation of Margaret Kennedy). His taste for original and often complicatedly mechanical sets has necessitated the collaboration of painters like Christian Bérard and the resurrection of 17th-century machinery. In acting as in staging, his striking stylizations have won the enthusiasm of the fashionable world, but if he had done nothing except reveal the dramatic talent of Giraudoux, the literary world would still owe him a great debt. Since he began devoting his vacations to the cinema, Jouvet has been seen in such films as La Kermesse héroïque, La Fin des jours, and Carnet de bal.

See: C. Cézan, Louis Jouvet et le théâtre d'aujourd'hui (1938), with introduction by Jean Giraudoux; Jouvet, Réflexions du comédien (1938).

J. O'B.

Jünger, Ernst (1895-, German novelist and essayist), brother of the poet and essayist Friedrich Georg Jünger, was born in Heidelberg. He volunteered at the outbreak of the First World War and, in the course of a distinguished military career, was awarded the highest German order, Pour le Mérite. During the years between the wars he devoted himself to writing and was a widely respected contributor to a number of conservative reviews and newspapers. In 1940 he took part in the French campaign.

The technological and social changes of the last century have not, so it seems to Jünger, decreased the perennial threat with which irrational forces confront the unstable life of man. Only the constant and total exercise of all human virtues, physical as well as moral and intellectual, will establish the vital harmony which can and must sustain a culture. This sense of the perpetual and fearful elemental fascination of the world is one of the most striking qualities of Jünger's work, for which his experience as an officer in the First World War supplied the early substance and material. His first book, In Stahlgewittern (1920; Eng. tr., Storm of Steel, 1929), struck the characteristic theme of extreme action coupled with insight and soldierly pathos. There followed several volumes essentially observational and reflective rather than narrative in nature. A semi-autobiographical account of earlier experiences in southern France and northern Africa, Afrikanische Spiele (1936), suggests the manner of Emil Strauss (q.v.); his own proper form, however, is not the novel but the contemplative essay (Das abenteuerliche Herz, "Figuren und Capriccios," 1929, new ed., 1938; Blätter und Steine, 1934), in which his "stereoscopic" perception is rendered through imagery of extraordinary "perspective" power.

The political implications of his attitude, in some respects reminiscent of T. E. Lawrence, have had considerable influence upon the present generation. On one occasion he examined in detail the social and emotional structure of the contemporary worker (Der Arbeiter, 1932); but it is in the soldier and his reflective counterpart, the poet, that Jünger recognizes the human type in which the supreme qualities of alertness, discipline, intelligence, and sensitiveness appear most strikingly. Jünger is an individualist, and although much of his work is drawn from his experiences of the wars (e.g., Der Kampf als inneres Erlebnis, 1922; Feuer und Blut, 1925; Das Wäldchen 125, 1925, Eng. tr., Copse 125, 1930), he should not be accused of the kind of German militaristic thinking that is so justly suspected. Indeed, in two of his recent books, the mythological parable, Auf den Marmor-Klippen (1939), and the diary of his months in 1940 as an officer in France, Gärten und Strassen (1942), Jünger writes most urgently and with much concern (though not without resorting to an occasional elliptical paraphrase) of the threat to deep-rooted cultural values offered by the forces of undisciplined inhumanity and barbarian dissolution. Yet the vigor of Jünger's philosophical intelligence does not emerge in the bald terms of philosophical propositions. His thought is always conveyed with the precision of one to whom the distinction between the observable fact and the irrational perspective is only one of degree and intensity. Dream imagery is, therefore, one of his most frequent devices, and his vision of nature has, at times, the puzzling coherence of a surrealist landscape. By his devotion to the civilized and civilizing qualities of language (e.g., Geheimnisse der Sprache, 1934, revised ed., 1939), he has produced, in a series of successively more significant works, some of the finest prose now being written in Germany; it is lithe, resolute, unsentimental, and radiant. If the term "magic realism" should be applied at all, Jünger's work would most properly deserve it.

See: E. G. Winkler, Gestalten und Probleme (1937), pp. 94-133; K. Kamp, Die Haltung des Frontkämpfers (1940); W. K. Pfeiler, War and the German Mind (1941), pp. 109-116; E. Guerster-Steinhausen, "The Prophet of German Nihilism—Ernst Juenger," Review of Politics, VII (1945), 199-209.

V. L.

Junqueiro, Abílio Guerra, see Guerra Junqueiro.

K

Kaden, Juljusz, see Bandrowski, Juljusz.

Kafka, Margit (1880-1918, Hungarian poet, novelist, and short-story writer), was born in Nagykaroly and died in Budapest during the influenza epidemic at the end of the First World War. Having been reared among the landed gentry, the boldness of her spirit seemed in sharp contrast with traditions that expected women to be interested only in home life. She was educated in the town where she was born and in Budapest. Later she taught in a girls' secondary school in Miskolcz and also in the capital of the country. She was married twice. Her first poems and stories appeared in A Hét (The Week) and in Nyugat (West). Margit Kafka ranks among the foremost Hungarian writers, not only compared with Lenke Beniczkyne Bajza, Minka Czobel, and Fruzina Szalay, women writers of the preceding generations, but also compared with her literary contemporaries, regardless of sex. She had an arresting personality; her humanitarian outlook did not permit her to be reconciled to life without protesting, and her artistic disposition made her intense in regard to moral and physical ugliness. Yet she did not write with a didactic temper; she responded passionately to beauty and expressed dissatisfaction in the manner of a creative artist. Even her juvenile stories substantiate her artistic integrity.

Her poems, Kafka Margit versei (1906; The Poems of Margit Kafka), reveal feminine subtleness and awareness. Many of them are "white" and "pure" in a conventional sense, though Margit Kafka already showed an ability to free herself from the familiar vocabulary of literary traditions. Gradually the music of her spirit became more modern, and her ideas revealed a successful emancipation from platitudes and prejudices. Her short stories Levelek a zárdából (1905; Letters from the Convent), Csendes válságok (1909; Quiet Crisis), and Nyár (1910; Summer) equal the best short stories ever written by Hungarian women writers; her delicacy recalls Katherine Mansfield, but without the mastery of form so characteristic of the English writer.

Margit Kafka's talent reached its most mature development in her novels, especially in Szinek és évek (1912; Colors and Years). It is comprehensible that a woman with her social outlook should have felt obliged to write about the problem of women in modern times. This particular novel shows Margit Kafka's ability to see beyond the horizon of a small town; she understands the reasons why people of her class in a Hungarian provincial town should believe in the division of the classes, but she does not approve of their reasons. Her attitude is disruptive of the status quo; the problems of her heroines are splendidly portrayed in lyrical and social perspective. Mária évei (1913; The Years of Maria), Állomások (1917; Signposts), and Hangyaboly (1917; Anthill) are incompletely realized novels, but their fragmentary values make them interesting. Margit Kafka shows the various aspects of human destiny in provincial or metropolitan surroundings with an enlightening understanding of selfish, naïve, or pathetic motives. Her sympathies were always with truth and beauty; it is regrettable that she died so young. Her work breaks off like an unfinished cry.

See: M. Radnóti, Kafka Margit művészi fejlődése (1934).

J. R.

Kafka, Franz (1883–1924, German novelist and essayist), was born in Prague of a well-to-do middle-class Jewish family, in an atmosphere overshadowed by his father's dominant personality (see "Brief an den Vater," 1919) and reminiscent of the earlier years of Proust. After rigid schooling he took, in 1906, his law degree at the German University of Prague and eventually obtained a position in the workmen's compensation division of the Austrian government. Devotion to literature was nevertheless his real concern, and it was only the slowness and conscientiousness of his writing that made it impossible for him to gain a livelihood by it. Severe attacks of tuberculosis compelled him to spend several years in sanatoriums. On two occasions, hopes for a marriage that might have steadied his life failed because of his own sense of inadequacy.

Little of his work was published during his lifetime: none of his three novels, Der Prozess (1925; Eng. tr., The Trial, 1937), Das Schloss (1926; Eng. tr., The Castle, 1930), and Amerika (1927; Eng. tr., 1938), was completed. Most of his ever increasing reputation rests upon the posthumous publication (happily undertaken by his friend Max Brod against Kafka's own wishes) of an impressive number of short stories, parables, aphorisms, journals, and letters in the Gesammelte Schriften (1935–1937).

In his first published work, a collection of prose, Betrachtung (1913), and two short stories, Der Heizer (1913; later the first chapter of his novel Amerika) and Das Urteil (1913), he established the main theme of his work, which he soon elaborated in the "ecstatically conceived" story, Der Verwandlung (1916; Eng. tr., Metamorphosis, 1937). In 1918, during critical months of illness in the country, he began the first chapter of his novel Das Schloss. A collection of delicate short stories, Ein Landarzt (1919), was followed in 1919 by the significant tale, In der Strafkolonie (Eng. tr., "In the Penal Colony," Partisan Review, VIII, 98–107, 146–158), and one year before his death he completed a last volume of characteristically lucid and mobile prose, Ein Hungerkünstler.

In the words of the editor, Max Brod, Kafka's three incomplete major novels, Amerika, Der Prozess, and Das Schloss, form "a trilogy of loneliness." Like every other work of Kafka's, they reflect in a profoundly religious sense the experience of human isolation and the pathos of exclusion. Man, forever aware of an inherent sense of "guilt," is compelled to face the "trial" of life in a universe whose pattern and coherence are fundamentally uncertain and incomprehensible (see "In the Penal Colony," The Trial, The Castle). The God of Kafka's world is as terrible and fascinating as Jehovah, and however fervently the poet's Job-like characters may wrestle with "the law," there is for them no ultimate consolation. They are but troubled marionettes who can find no escape from the realization of overwhelming frustration. Man's life passes in a series of crises in which the veiled presence of "the law," acting through impersonal agencies (the government, the police, the office, the castle), demonstrates the futility of human effort (The Trial). Much of Kafka's imaginative thinking is drawn from Jewish folk literature and the Talmud; but the tenets of his belief should be related to Pascal, the existential philosophy of Kierkegaard, and the contemporary theology of crisis (Karl Barth). In its radically eschatological nature, his symbolic faith is reminiscent of Dostoevski and Strindberg (qq.v.), but it lacks the consistency of Dante's or Bunyan's theological frame. The use of minutely detailed irrational dream landscapes, in which strangely related phenomena seem suspended in an unintelligible void, indicates Kafka's nearness to the expressionist and surrealist writers. But even the laconic humor of some of his tales rests upon a powerful faith in what Kafka himself called the "indestructible"; in those grotesque scenes, in which the pathetic human being finds himself caught in the grip of an inescapable mechanism, he reminds us not only of Charlie Chaplin and Walt Disney, but of Poe and Dickens.

In spite of the subtlety and precision of his prose style (Kleist, Hebel, Flaubert, q.v.), Kafka is not, compared with his contemporaries (Proust, q.v., Joyce, Thomas Mann, q.v.), one of the accomplished novelists; he is rather, with Rilke (q.v.), the supremely religious writer of an age in which man, caught in inevitable perplexity and doubt, seems incapable of personal salvation. Ultimately Kafka's theme, like that of all contemporary literature, is the paradoxical human quest for freedom as well as responsibility.

See: M. Brod, Franz Kafka; eine Biographie (1937); P. Rahv, "Franz Kafka: The Hero as Lonely Man," Kenyon Review, I (1939), 60-74; A Franz Kafka Miscellany (1940); A. Warren, "Kosmos Kafka," Southern Review, VII (1941-1942), 350-365.

V. L.

Kahn, Gustave (1859-1936, French poet and critic), born at Metz, in the province of Lorraine, went at an early age to Paris and after completing his classical studies indulged his taste for erudition by entering the Ecole des Chartes and the School of Oriental Languages. This was followed by four years of military service in North Africa under conditions favorable to his linguistic and historical studies. Returning to Paris in 1885, he abandoned his scholarly research for the pursuit of a literary career. The review Vogue, which he founded with Paul Adam (q.v.), was a ready receptacle for his first poems, soon to be published in volume form with the title Les Palais nomades (1887). In collaboration with Jean Moréas and Paul Adam (qq.v.) he founded also at that period the Symboliste, a periodical whose avowed purpose was to encourage the symbolist movement. But Kahn's activities as a critic did not interrupt his poetic production or his experiments with a new form of verse. In the preface to his Premiers Poèmes (1897), he lays full claim to the invention of vers libre, yet in fairness that honor should be shared with Rimbaud, Jules Laforgue (qq.v.), and others. It must be granted, however, that Kahn was the first theorician of this medium of poetic expression. By methodical and scientific analysis he demonstrated that French verse is not merely constituted by a number of syllables subjected to certain rules, but rather by rhythmic units of equal temporal values governed by the emotional stress of the phrase. Since rhythm is the most adequate expression of individual feelings, the poet's task therefore is to create a form capable of interpreting his own sentiments without being hampered by the arbitrary rules of caesura, hiatus, alternation of rhymes, and other conventions.

In spite of the scholarly precision of its own theories, the verse of Kahn remains too experimental and too hesitating between the syllabic meter and a truly free form to compare favorably with the masterly technique of Vielé-Griffin, Emile Verhaeren, or Henri de Régnier (qq.v.). Neither does his poetry reach the high level of these foremost representatives of symbolism. Les Palais nomades reveals a delicate sensibility, but too often preciousity and aimless verbiage embarrass the thought and confuse the emotion. However, in Le Livre d'images (1897), by means of simple narrative reminiscent of the Germanic lieder, he creates a poetic mood which possesses charm and originality.

To the collections of poems can be added several volumes of critical essays, a genre in which Kahn excels. Of particular interest are Symbolistes et décadents (1902), an appreciative survey of the literary movement in which he took part, and Charles Baudelaire (1925), a penetrating study of the poet with whom he felt some affinities. A distinguished art critic, he is the author of treatises on Boucher, Fragonard, Félicien Rops, Rodin, and other artists.

See: André Barre, Le Symbolisme (1912); Tancrède de Visan, L'Attitude du lyrisme contemporain (1921); John Charpentier, Le Symbolisme (1927); Adolphe van Bever and Paul Léautaud, Poètes d'aujourd'hui (1929).

M. D.

Kaiser, Georg (1878-1945, German playwright), was the son of a Magdeburg merchant. He too went into business and eventually established himself in Buenos Aires, but found the climate unhealthy and came back home, where he soon turned to writing. The most sensational event in his career was his trial in 1921 for embezzlement; his plea that as an exceptional man he could not be expected to observe the civil code failed to save him.

His literary career was meteoric. Some of his plays were written as early as 1905, but the first to be published was Die jüdische Witwe (1911), a satirical treatment of the Judith theme, and it was not till 1914 that theatregoers made his acquaintance. For the next 10 years Kaiser was the sensation of the German stage; no less than 26 of his dramas were staged. This was the decade of expressionism, and Kaiser was not only the most prolific but also the most representative playwright of that movement. With the passing of expressionism his star waned.

Kaiser spoke of Plato, Schopenhauer, and Nietzsche (q.v.) as his spiritual guides. He professed to see in the dialogues of Plato, for instance, the ideal drama. Under this philosophic aegis Kaiser wrote, not Schauspiele, but Denkspiele, a term reminiscent of Shaw's plays. Despite this designation, however, Kaiser's work does not have the flash of Shaw's wit, nor is it the meditative book drama: it is fast moving theatre, more effective in the acting than in the reading, tense and, at its best, well able to stir human emotions. But each play is the elaboration of an idea developed at the expense of the dramatic form. This formula was a commonplace among the expressionists, who certainly did not need to go back more than two thousand years to find it. In fact, Kaiser's prototypes were Strindberg and Wedekind (qq.v.).

The peculiarities of Kaiser's work are essentially those of expressionism. In one of his first successes, Von Morgens bis Mitternachts (1916; Eng. tr., From Morn to Midnight, 1920), the cashier of a bank, a slave of routine, filches 60,000 marks and runs amuck: a whiff of perfume and the rustle of silk skirts start him off on what he feels to be the first day of his life and what fatefully proves to be the last. His excesses, portrayed in language that has the rhythm of machine-gun fire, make palpitating theatre. But the cashier remains a stranger to us and the other characters are but wraiths. The thought that such abnormal happenings might be expected if suppressed natures acted out their dreams is the chief residue when the fire of the action has burned itself out. The technique of starring the main character and blurring the rest of the cast is perfectly fitted to the Denkspiel, which thus becomes practically a monodrama. Even the main character submerges his individuality to become a type without so much as a name:

except for some notable historical personages, such as Socrates and Alcibiades (Der gerettete Alkibiades, 1920) and Joan of Arc (Gilles und Jeanne, 1923), most of the characters in Kaiser's plays are designated merely by rank or function.

The socialistic tendencies of expressionism are found in Kaiser's trilogy on capitalism, Die Koralle (1917; Eng. tr., The Coral, 1929), Gas I (1918; Eng. tr., 1924), and Gas II (1920). In the middle member of this trilogy the author has caught very effectively the spirit of the mechanized age and, in posing a great social problem, has created true drama. Less far reaching but equally dramatic is Die Bürger von Calais (1917), in which the playwright enhances the tragedy of Froissart's narrative, made famous in Rodin's statuary, by having seven citizens rather than the required six volunteer for death.

Within the atmosphere of expressionism, which is the only environment thinkable for his products, Kaiser evolved a fitting dramatic style of his own which reduces language to a minimum and makes action the real medium for his ideas. In his more ambitious works these ideas became utopian, without, however, carrying true conviction.

Kaiser wrote two novels, Es ist genug (1932) and Villa Aurea (1940; Eng. tr., A Villa in Sicily, 1939).

See: H. F. Königsgarten, Georg Kaiser (1928); B. Diebold, Der Denkspieler Georg Kaiser (1924); M. Freyhan, Georg Kaisers Werk (1926); M. J. Fruchter, The Social Dialectic in Georg Kaiser's Dramatic Works (1933).

H. W. P.

Kamban, Guðmundur (1888–1945, Icelandic dramatist and novelist), born on Álfanes near Reykjavík, of poor but enterprising parents, was one of a large family. While working his way through school, Kamban came in contact with the cosmopolitan and humanitarian E. H. Kvaran (q.v.); but he went to Copenhagen to study literature and dramatics, and there he joined the group of Jóhann Sigurjónsson (q.v.) with enthusiasm and wrote his first play, Hadda-Padda (1914; Eng. tr., 1917), under that influence. Hadda-Padda is a woman whose love is her moral guide, a recurrent figure in Kamban's work. The play was a success at the Royal Theatre, but another play in the same national romantic vein was not so successful. After a visit to New York (1915–1917), Kamban turned social critic. In Marmor (1918; Marble), a play, and Ragnar Finnsson (1922), a novel, he criticized the treatment of convicts in prisons in America. During the 1920's Kamban revolted—as was the fashion of the times—against the conventional morals of love and marriage in a series of plays. Vi Mordere (1920; We Murderers) was the most successful of the group. Sendiherrann frá Júpiter (1927; The Ambassador from Jupiter) closes this period in Kamban's work with a general challenge to the corruption in Western civilization.

After a decade of cosmopolitan subjects, Kamban returned to native themes and wrote the historical novel Skálholt (4 vols., 1930–1935; Eng. tr. of Vols. I and II, The Virgin of Skálholt, 1935), about the unhappy love of the proud daughter of Bishop Brynjólfur Sveinsson (1605–1675) and about his mala domestica. In monumentality of design this work is reminiscent of Undset's (q.v.) novels, but the philosophy is totally different: again, as in Kamban's first work, the woman's love is her only conscience. The affinity of this proud type with the women of the sagas is obvious, and in Jeg ser et stort skønt Land (1936; Eng. tr., I See a Wondrous Land, 1938), Kamban had an opportunity to portray the saga women themselves in his retelling of the stories of the discovery of Greenland and Vínland (America).

Kamban was connected with theatres in Scandinavia and Germany. His stay in Iceland (1927–1930) resulted in the novel 30. Generation (1933; The Thirtieth Generation), a description of the modern emancipated and cosmopolitan bourgeoisie of Reykjavík, with which Kamban obviously was in sympathy.

During the Second World War, Kamban was in Denmark and Germany, writing several plays. He was killed by mistake by Danish patriots on May 5, 1945.

See: Ø. Ree, "En islandsk dramatiker," in Nordisk tidskrift för vetenskap, konst och industri utgiven av Letterstedtska Föreningen, 1921, pp. 39–42; S. Einarsson, "Guðmundur Kamban," Tímarit Þjóðræknisfélags Íslendinga, XIV (1932), 7–32.

S. E.

Kamenski, Vasili (1884–, Russian poet, novelist, and dramatist), born aboard a steamboat on the River Kama, was one of the founders of Russian futurism. With Mayakovsky (q.v.) and Burlyuk he toured the country on the eve of the First World War, shocking the philistines with unheard-of prose and verse and with outlandish array; Kamenski himself, who was an aviator at the time, appeared with an airplane painted on his brow. Like Khlebnikov (q.v.), he took liberties with the Russian language, coined numerous neologisms, and deliberately obscured the meaning of his verse, to produce zaum (beyond reason) poetry. His dominant note is carefree exuberance and the joy of living. He refers to himself as "cloudlessly skyey . . . a fierce eagle born in the Urals," whose "narcotic lyricism . . . rings like the carotid aorta" and who knows "no other morals than: Be free and forge ahead!" Aside from his numerous lyrics, Kamenski wrote a long poem, Stepan Razin (1916), in which, defying the war censorship, he glorified the spirit of rebellion among 17th-century Cossacks. The poem was dramatized in 1919. A novel of his, Tango s korovami (1911; Tango with Cows), gained temporary notoriety. In 1931 was published his autobiographical Put entuziasta (The Road of an Enthusiast), valuable for its intimate glimpses at the Russian futurists.

A. K.

Karlfeldt, Erik Axel (1864–1931, Swedish lyric poet), born in Karlbo, Folkärna, was graduated from the Gymnasium at Västerås in 1885 and studied at Uppsala, where he passed his licentiate examination in 1898. He was elected to the Swedish Academy in 1904, became a member of the Nobel committee in 1907 and permanent secretary of the Academy in 1912. In 1917 he received a Ph.D. (honoris causa) from the University of Uppsala. The Nobel prize in literature, which he had declined in 1920, was awarded him posthumously in 1931.

Karlfeldt's first work, Vildmarks- och kärleksvisor (1895; Ballads of the Woodlands and of Love), with its dedicatory "Fäderna" (My Forefathers) and admirable lyrics like "Sagan om Rosalind" (Rosalind's Saga), suggested the greater things soon to come. In Fridolins visor (1898; Fridolin's Ballads) and Fridolins lustgård och dalmålningar på rim (1901; Fridolin's Pleasure Garden and Dalecarlian Frescoes in Rhyme) his lyric orchestration is fully developed. The poet now achieves universal popularity; in the person of Fridolin, his alter ego, Karlfeldt becomes a classical figure, and the ballad collection is considered by many to be his masterpiece. Flora och Pomona (1906; Flora and Pomona) shows a tendency to loftier diction, to deepening of thought. Notable are poems of personal tone such as "I passionsveckan" (Easter Week), the masterly Dalecarlian rococo "Värdshuset" (The Tavern), and the burlesque "Ode till den höstlige Neptunus" (Ode to the Autumnal Neptune). Flora och Bellona (1918; Flora and Bellona) is rich in mirth ("Julia Djuplin"), transcendent beauty ("Zephyrs serenad till Ölands solvända," Zephyr's Serenade to the Öland Rockrose), and satire ("Till Bellona," Ode to Bellona).

The fundamental strains in this collection come from the deeper recesses of the poet's soul: there is a deep, religious undertone in "Systrar i lustgården" (Sisters in the Pleasure Garden), and a logical culmination in "Höstpsalm" (Psalm of Autumn), where the poet reaches the pinnacle of his art. Skalden Lucidor (1912; The Poet Lucidor) and Tal och tankar (1931, posthumous; public addresses, etc.) reveal a brilliant prose style and genuine oratorical power.

Karlfeldt's major inspiration is nature. Out of the attachment to the soil his song rises and finds unity in the glorification of the seasons and the calendric festivals of the year. The poet at his best is a consummate artist and virtuoso. His astounding mastery of the vernacular, creative imagination, range and intensity of emotion, virility, humor, and pathos have but few parallels in Swedish lyrics. The purely intellectual plays a subordinate part. His magic depends upon immediacy of approach. He appeals to the emotions through the senses by means of color, word witchery, archaisms, varieties of strophic structure, rhyme and rhythm, melody, and delicate and profuse use of the floral pictures. His felicity of metaphor recalls Shakespeare, the lilt of his lines suggests Swinburne.

See: A. M. Carlsson, Erik Axel Karlfeldt (1924); T. Fogelqvist, Erik Axel Karlfeldt (1931); Carl Mangård, En bok om Karlfeldt (1931); Karlfeldt, Arcadia Borealis, poems tr. by C. W. Stork (1938).

A. J. U.

Kasprowicz, Jan (1860–1926, Polish poet), was born in Szymborz, a little village in western Poland not far from the celebrated Lake Gopło. His parents were peasants deeply rooted in this historic and almost legendary Polish soil. By birth and ancestry Kasprowicz inherited a cultural tradition which lies at the bottom of almost every Polish peasant's thinking—a firm religious faith and an intuitive, apolitical, almost tribal consciousness of Polish nationality. Upon these two fundamental cultural factors the poet built an imposing intellectual superstructure of erudition in philosophy, classical philology, and comparative literature during his studies in the universities of Leipzig, Breslau, and Lwów. In 1909 he became professor of comparative literature at the University of Lwów. Unlike the great Polish romanticists who first stimulated his poetic spirit, Kasprowicz drew his inspiration from springs deeper than personal or even national fortune and misfortune. True to his peasant tradition he looked at life in the universal and saw man's fleshly existence as a God-ordained mystery of birth and death, as a transient moment between the material eternities of sun and soil and the moral eternities of good and evil, God and Satan. The philosophic depth of Kasprowicz's poetry precluded broad popularity for him in Poland. Yet his position as one of Poland's greatest poets is firmly entrenched, and although he is relatively unknown abroad, he is undoubtedly one of the foremost poets of universal human life and conscience in 20th-century Europe.

It is perhaps because Kasprowicz lived long enough to express himself completely that his poetic output (22 volumes, 1930 ed.) divides itself readily into periods and gives the impression of a drama constructed in logically consecutive acts leading to a climax and a swift inevitable conclusion. Even in his earliest cycles of lyrics in the first published volume of his poetry (1889) and in his sociological tales in verse, Z chłopskiego zagonu (1891; From a Peasant's Field), the poet's preoccupation with sociological phenomena assumed a deep moral tone and betrayed the first stirrings of spiritual revolt. This latter is especially noticeable in Chrystus (1890; Christ). Kasprowicz's second period marks his departure from sociological themes. Philosophic considerations of good and evil absorb him completely in the cycles collected under the titles Miłość (1895; Love) and Krzak dzikiej róży (1898; The Wild Rose). Amid doubts, despair, desperate clutchings at faith, and shining moments of decision and strength the poet wrestles with evil, and in Ginącemu światu (1902; To a Dying World) he plunges into a tremendous Promethean struggle against God himself. The soaring hymns of this cycle mark the poet's third and climactic period. In Polish literature poetry of comparable lyric intensity, sincerity, and power can be found only in the inspired "Improvisation" of Mickiewicz's Forefathers' Eve. The volume Ballada o słoneczniku (1908; Ballad of the Sunflower) marks the end of Kasprowicz's revolt and points toward the spiritual calm and consummate artistic simplicity of Księga ubogich (1916; The Book of the Poor) and his last book, Mój świat (1926; My World). The drama, Marchoń, written in 1913 but not published until 1920, is a concentrate of the poet's entire spiritual odyssey from his earliest sociological agitation through his painful philosophic searchings and Promethean revolt to his final, peasantlike, irrational reconciliation with God. Like Marchoń, the poet had fought in earnest without giving or asking quarter and, like Marchoń, was conquered only by God.

Kasprowicz was also a prolific and inspired translator. Among his translations are the complete works of Aeschylus, Euripides, and Shakespeare, Shelley's Alastor, The Cenci, and Prometheus Unbound, Byron's Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, Swinburne's Atalanta in Calydon and Laus Veneris, Wilde's Ballad of Reading Gaol, not to mention copious selections from Marlowe, Blake, Rossetti, Browning, and Yeats. The total of his translations from the German, Italian, and French is scarcely less impressive.

See: Z. Wasilewski, Jan Kasprowicz; próba wizerunku (1923); Wiadomości literackie, 1926, No. 147 (entire issue); Z. L. Zaleski, Attitudes et destinées (1932), pp. 116-138; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, I (1934), 190-206, 308-313.

E. Z.

Kästner, Erich (1899-, German journalist, poet, and novelist), was born in Dresden. Originally intending to be a teacher, he entered normal school, but left it to be a bank clerk. This was during the post-war inflation, and again he changed his plans and studied literature, taking a Ph.D. degree in 1925. After some years of journalism, he found the income from his collected verse (Herz auf Taille, 1928; Lärm im Spiegel, 1929; Ein Mann gibt Auskunft, 1930) sufficient to set him free, and thereafter he devoted himself to writing. Meanwhile appeared the most popular of all his books, Emil und die Detektive (1929; Eng. tr., Emil and the Detectives, 1930), which was filmed in the United States; it was followed by Fabian; die Geschichte eines Moralisten (1931; Eng. tr., 1932), Drei Männer im Schnee (1934; Eng. tr., Three Men in the Snow, 1935), also filmed, Die verschwundene Miniatur (1936; Eng. tr., The Missing Miniature, 1936), and others. The bitterness of the post-war years with their chaos and confusion crops out in his more satiric passages and poems.

Kästner is a versatile and charming writer, whose humor deserves to be given more serious attention, for especially in Germany there has not been too much of it. In his best vein, he writes with a smile which is not frivolous, but merely the obverse of the tragic; he can also produce at will that releasing laughter which is one of the rarest gifts of letters to man.

B. Q. M.

Katayev, Valentin Petrovich (1897-, Russian novelist, short-story writer, and playwright), was born in Odessa, son of a high school teacher. In 1915 Katayev volunteered in the First World War, was wounded and gassed. During the civil war (1918-1920) he was equally ill-treated by the Whites and the Reds. Since 1922 Katayev has lived in Moscow, publishing novels, short stories, and plays. He started his literary career as a poet, but soon gave up poetry and turned definitely to prose. Already in his first books he showed his craftsmanship as a storyteller, both in lighter vein (Ser Genri i chort, 1923, Sir Henry and the Devil; Bezdelnik Eduard, 1923, The Loafer Eduard) and in serious, realistic portrayal (Otets, 1924; Father). His satirical novel Rastratchiki (1927; Eng. tr., The Embezzlers, 1929), devoted to the period of NEP (New Economic Policy), ranked him as one of the foremost Soviet writers. In Vremya vperyod! (1932; Eng. tr., Time, Forward! 1933, title in England, Forward, Oh Time! 1934) he gave one of the best pictures of the hardships and the pioneer spirit of the first Five-Year Plan. Beliet parus odinoki (1936; Eng. tr., Lonely White Sail, American title, Peace Is Where the Tempests Blow, both 1937) is a delightful story of children's adventures in Odessa during the revolutionary days of 1905-1906, while Ya syn trudovogo naroda (1937; I Am the Son of the Working People) is a highly patriotic novel evoking the struggle of Ukrainian partisans during the German occupation of their country in 1918. Katayev's war novel Zhena (1944; The Wife) is a strong and pathetic description of a woman who seeks to forget her personal misfortunes in productive work.

Katayev has been influenced by Bunin and Aleksei Tolstoy (qq.v.). He carries on successfully the tradition of Russian neo-realism. His novels and short stories have always an interesting plot, a vigorous construction, a sharp sense of humor, a warm humanity, and are written in colorful style. As a playwright Katayev is an amusing and caustic satirist. He drew general attention by his comedies and jests, the best of which are Kvadratura kruga (1929; Eng. tr., Squaring the Circle, 1934) and Doroga tsvetov (1934; The Road of Flowers). Soviet critics reproached Katayev for his comedy Sini platochek (1942; Blue Kerchief) because of its dealing with the war situation in a too farcical manner. Several of Katayev's novels and plays have been filmed in the U.S.S.R. Katayev certainly belongs to the most gifted and independent representatives of the Soviet prose of today.

M. †

Katayev, Yevgeni Petrovich, see Petrov, Yevgeni Petrovich.

Kaverin, Venyamin Aleksandrovich (1902–, Russian writer and littérateur), born in St. Petersburg, began to write while still under 20 years of age. He was associated with Vsevolod Ivanov, Mikhail Slonimski, Yevgeni Zamyatin (qq.v.), and others in the formation (1921) of the Petersburg literary group known as the Serapion Brothers, which resisted current tendencies toward the regimentation of literature. His first short stories, e.g., “Mastera i podmasterya” (Masters and Apprentices) and “Bubnovaya mast” (The Diamond Suit), were romantic in tendency. In two longer fictional efforts, Konets Khazy (The End of Khaza) and Devyat desyatykh sud’by (Nine Tenths of Destiny), Kaverin adhered to the so-called formalist school which, in the earlier days of the revolutionary period, made a concerted effort to wall off art from the Revolution itself and, in fact, from all burning political and social problems of the day. In his subsequent novel, Skandalist (1928; The Brawler), Kaverin satirized routine middle-class scholars totally cut off from life and, in the author’s view, intellectually bankrupt. He approached still closer to Soviet ideology in Prolog (The Prologue), written after an extensive visit to the state and collective farms of the steppe country, though he interprets the economic reconstruction of the country as a technical attack by man upon nature. In his story “Khudozhnik neizvesten” (Artist Unknown) Kaverin again remained faithful to his early formalistic convictions and practice, but in his later works, e.g., Dva kapitana (1940; Eng. tr., Two Captains, 1942), he came nearer to the current Soviet ideal of socialist realism. Kaverin has also experimented with drama in Ukroshcheniye Robinzona ili Poteryanny Rai (The Taming of Robinson or Paradise Lost) and wrote the literary monograph Baron Brambeus: Istoriya Osipa Senkovskogo (Baron Brambäus: The Story of Osip Senkovski), discussing a fertile but qualitatively insignificant Russian journalist of Pushkin’s day.

See: V. Sayanov, “Put V. Kaverina,” in Kaverin, Sochineniya, I (1930), 5–16; G. Reavey and M. Slonim, Soviet Literature; an Anthology (1934), pp. 181–190; G. Struve, 25 Years of Soviet Russian Literature (1944), pp. 49–55, 271–272.

S. H. C.

Kazin, Vasili (1898–, Russian poet), born in Moscow, comes from a family of peasants and workers and has himself engaged in such crafts as roofing and carpentry. His verse began to appear in print in 1914, but his fame came with the publication of his first slim volume, Rabochi mai (1922; The Workers’ May). Kazin sees everything through the prism of physical labor, which is evidenced by his similes and images. Such a threadbare theme as a blonde sweetheart is given a new angle in “Rubanok” (Jack Plane), in which the rustling of fragrant shavings reminds the workman of the curls of his beloved, and the grief of parting is like a splinter driven into his heart. Labor is free from drudgery and enslavement when depicted by Kazin. Poetry and the joy of creative effort are in his description of physical exertion, and even fatigue “oozes sweetly down his spine.” He regards nature anthropomorphically, and always from the worker’s point of view. Thus he sees the sun with the eyes of a bricklayer (“Morning hoisted its brick”), the sounds of awakening spring he perceives in terms of a tin-roofer, while evening is to him an apiarist whose bees are stars. He presents a thunderstorm as a gigantic foundry, with throngs of blacksmiths nimbly setting furnaces aflame and thundering reverberating blows. Kazin is primarily a lyricist, who contemplates the world somewhat sentimentally, even if the sentiment is robust and proletarian. His attempts at longer poems of a broader scope have not been successful.

A. K.

Keller, Gottfried (1819–1890, Swiss novelist), born in Zurich, one of the greatest writers in German of the whole post-Goethian period, is considered by the German Swiss, if not by the whole of Switzerland, to be the most representative national author. Keller’s influence among his countrymen in the 20th century is undiminished. His earlier, most productive years coincide with the reconstruction of Switzerland after the Napoleonic Wars, when a vigorous democratic spirit reasserted itself and found expression in numerous progressive measures. Keller took an active part, first, in bringing about some of these measures and, secondly, in fostering, through his writings, the attitude necessary for maintaining and developing democratic standards. Fortunately he combines with such social responsibility a high degree of artistic sensibilities and a sovereign imagination.

Keller for 15 years served his country faithfully as secretary of the cantonal government, a position which entailed many painstaking duties. During these years he had no time to write though ample occasion to gather material and to sift his observations on human life and nature. His best works were either wholly executed after this period or at least then revised and put into final shape. His greatest contribution, Der grüne Heinrich, a novel of nearly a thousand pages, was first published 1854–1855, only to be completely recast 25 years later. With the advantage of a seasoned outlook on life Keller was now able to raise this autobiographical account to the level of a representative educational novel; as such it takes its place beside Grimmelshausen's Simplicissimus and Goethe's Wilhelm Meister.

It is not too much to say that in Der grüne Heinrich the Swiss cultural tradition has been developed and refined to a degree which makes this work a model of life among European forms of culture. Man's duty is here conceived by Keller as being first of all towards the reality of this world; his religious, transcendental impulses have to be converted into practical ethics. With that Keller proclaims the sacred duty of making spirit concrete and nature ethical. Hence his joyful abandonment to the physical beauty of our earth, from which we must draw strength and enthusiasm. The fruit of intimate contact with nature and deep confidence in mankind appears in Der grüne Heinrich as the hero's decision to devote himself wholly to the social task. He accepts a modest position in the civil service, a step which assumes symbolic significance: in some form or other we must all turn our activities, be they what they may, towards a socially useful purpose. This definition of man's ultimate obligation is repeated in the fate of one of the principal women characters who, likewise after having passed through a period of exuberant naturalism, fulfills her destiny by attending to the poor and sick, sacrificing even her life in the discharge of such duties. Group life, too, has its own characteristic aims and forms; its foremost function is to guarantee freedom, economic well-being, and progress. The emphasis in Der grüne Heinrich is, however, less on the acquisition of freedom than on its protection against abuse and deterioration. Progress is something which Keller ardently believes in, though he can by no means be accused of irresponsible optimism. He is enough of a clear-sighted realist to know that constant watchfulness is needed to prevent the exploitation by greed or sly cunning of our human rights. The hero's deceased father, whose memory lives among the neighbors, leaves a shining example of a sturdy, progressive-minded craftsman and citizen; through him the son remains forever pledged to the idea of progress, of a slowly expanding area of good will and reason. Finally, the cornerstone of a sound social structure is education, both in the sense of a solid training in crafts or professions and of keen interest in cultural activities. Less conspicuous for foreign readers but highly interesting for his countrymen is the way in which Keller, in Der grüne Heinrich, discusses the relationship between Switzerland and Germany.

Inexhaustible as the vitality and wisdom of Der grüne Heinrich proves to be, the reader should turn to other works of Keller, above all to Das Sinngedicht (1881) and "Der Landvogt von Greifensee" in Die Züricher Novellen (1877), for complementary aspects of his Christian humanism. In these shorter stories Keller takes up some of the more intimate problems of human conduct, reiterating his belief in the absolute value of such qualities as honesty, serenity, mutual sympathy, and castigating as the one unpardonable sin man's inclination to conceit and brutality. A writer of such inner strength cannot fail to produce significant works even in his lighter mood or when giving free rein to humor and imagination, as he does in the two volumes of Die Leute von Seldwyla (1856–1874; Eng. tr. of selections, Seldwyla folks, 1919).

Recent critics have made much of Keller's last novel, Martin Salander (1886), which they declare to be his stern appraisal of democratic institutions. It would, however, seem that Keller's frank criticism takes to task not democracy as such but those of us who through lack of inner effort invite abuse of freedom and of harmonious community life.

See: E. F. Hauch, Gottfried Keller as a Democratic Idealist (1916); E. Ermatinger, Gottfried Kellers Leben, Briefe und Tagebücher (1924–1925); E. Ackerknecht, Gottfried Keller (1939).

H. B.

Kessel, Joseph (1898–, French novelist and journalist), was born in Argentina, in the city of Clara, where his father, a Russian refugee who had completed his medical studies at Montpellier in France, practiced medicine. Kessel himself studied in France, first at the Lycée of Nice, then at the Lycée Louis-le-Grand in Paris. The First World War broke out while he was still studying at the Sorbonne. He enlisted and saw active service as an aviator, receiving the Croix de Guerre. He was then sent to the United States and left France the day the armistice was signed. From New York he went to Los Angeles, crossed the Pacific Ocean, and joined the French general staff in Siberia. It was here he became acquainted with the hetman Semenov and his Cossacks. Upon his return to France La Steppe rouge

(1923) was published, a group of short stories dealing with the Terror which accompanied the Russian Revolution. The following year he wrote L'Equipage, a war and aviation story, probably his best novel. As a reporter he attempted to reenter Russia and narrowly escaped being shot by the Bolsheviks in Riga. Les Captifs (1926), a somber study of the victims of tuberculosis, was awarded the Grand Prix du Roman by the French Academy in 1927. His succeeding works have been, for the most part, inspired by his numerous travels. A vivid book concerning the Second World War, L'Armée des ombres, was published in 1944 (Eng. tr., Army of Shadows, 1944).

There is in the writing of Kessel a certain savage quality, modified by a classic style of expression. His works echo the world-shaking events to which he has been a witness.

P. B.

Kesten, Hermann (1900–, German novelist and playwright), born in Nuremberg, was educated at Erlangen and Frankfurt am Main. An attack upon Hitlerism in his novel Der Scharlatan (1932) made it necessary for him to leave Germany. In Amsterdam, where he fled, he was, from 1933 until 1940, literary editor to the publisher Allert de Lange. In 1940 the German invasion forced him to emigrate to America.

Kesten's talent was early recognized; his first novel, Joseph sucht die Freiheit (1927; Eng. tr., Joseph Breaks Free, 1930), won for its author the Kleist citation. Its theme—a youth's painful realization that the supposed virtues of his family existed only in his affectionate imagination and his desire to escape from actuality—is, in Kesten's next novel, Ein ausschweifender Mensch (1929), enlarged to a man's attempt to break away from his fatherland. His next book, Glückliche Menschen (1931; Eng. tr., Happy Man! 1935), sentimentally melodramatic at the beginning and fantastic and arbitrary in its sequence of events, is nevertheless characteristic of its author, a moralist disguised as a grim joker. His fictionalized biographies (Ferdinand und Isabella, 1936, Eng. tr., Spanish Fire, 1937; König Philipp der Zweite, 1938, Eng. tr., I, the King, 1939) lose none of the reader's interest by Kesten's attention to historical detail and correctness. The confusion and stupidity of the recent Spanish civil war are vividly portrayed in Die Kinder von Gernika (1939; Eng. tr., Children of Guernica, 1939).

Several of Kesten's plays were produced before he left Germany, Maud liebt beide (1928), Admet (1929), Die heilige Familie (1930), Babel (1930), Einer sagt die Wahrheit (1931), and, in collaboration with Ernst Toller (q.v.), Wunder in Amerika (1931; Eng. tr., Mary Baker Eddy, in Toller's Seven Plays, 1935). In Germany, in the Netherlands during his literary editorship with De Lange, and in America, Kesten published several anthologies of European literature: 24 neue deutsche Erzähler (1929); Neue französische Erzähler (1930), in collaboration with F. Bertaux; Novellen deutscher Dichter der Gegenwart (1933), his preference here being, on the whole, for the grim and melancholy, even gruesome aspects of life; and Heart of Europe (1943), in collaboration with Klaus Mann (q.v.). Kesten has edited, both in German and in English, the poems of Heine (1939, 1943) and has translated Julien Green's (q.v.) Léviathan, Romain's (q.v.) Le Capitaliste, Giraudoux's (q.v.) Les Aventures de Jérôme Bardini, John Gunther's Inside Asia, and short prose works of E. Bove, H. Michaux, and Ester Riwkin.

See: F. Bertaux, A Panorama of German Literature from 1871 to 1931 (1935), pp. 256–257.

V. L.

Key, Ellen (1849–1926, Swedish essayist and moralist), was one of the most provocative cultural personalities in modern Sweden. Her long career as a teacher, popular lecturer, and essayist was punctuated by a number of strenuous cultural controversies because of the frankness with which she spoke her mind on subjects of a highly controversial nature (religion, patriotism, sex, feminine emancipation). All except the most reactionary sections of Swedish society came ultimately to admire her courage and hail her as one of the great feminine cultural forces in Swedish history, a kind of modern St. Birgitta. She has written some 30 volumes of essays, based for the most part directly on lectures which she delivered in Sweden or in various parts of the Continent. These essays develop primarily social, pedagogical, and moral themes of broad, general human interest, but they include also, especially in Ellen Key's early years, a number of extended biographical and critical essays on such Swedish literary figures as C. J. L. Almqvist, Victoria Benedictsson (q.v.), and Anne Charlotte Leffler-Cajanello.

Much of Ellen Key's central work has been translated into English as well as into German, French, Italian, and other languages. She has had enthusiastic disciples in many countries, particularly in Germany and Italy. In England her work has been highly regarded, though with certain reservations among more critical

English students of modern morals like Havelock Ellis. Herself a product of the movement toward feminine emancipation in the late 19th century, and an enthusiastic champion of some of its ideas, Ellen Key has proved nevertheless to be one of this movement's most severe constructive critics. She reacted particularly strongly against the extreme trend within the movement which sought to deny (by implication at least) any fundamental emotional and physical differences between the sexes. In Missbrukad kvinnokraft (1896; Misused Feminine Power) she insists that woman by nature is primarily the mother, and that if she pursues her modern claims of "individualism" and equal rights with man to the point where she denies her fundamental natural function as a mother, she will not only distort her own natural physical and spiritual development but also endanger the whole future of the race. In Barnets århundrade (1900; Eng. tr., The Century of the Child, 1909) she emphasizes the place of the home as the primary educational and moral institution and in general stresses a natural as opposed to a traditional academic education, in a manner reminiscent of Rousseau. Two other works of central importance in Ellen Key's production are Tankebilder (2 vols., 1898, Thought Images) and Livslinjer (3 vols., 1903-1906; Life Lines), in which she develops a kind of religious-evolutionary "philosophy" which sharply rejects a traditional Christian asceticism and projects in its place a somewhat vaguely defined, highly optimistic livstro (faith in life) as the basis of a new religion. The outbreak of the First World War, with its materialistic motivations and its mass murder, did not destroy Ellen Key's faith in life and humanity, though it made her clothe her ideas henceforth in a somewhat less exuberant prose.

Ellen Key herself is not to be counted among Swedish literary figures in the strictly creative sense, but her ideas have certain undeniable points of contact with the neopaganism of Heidenstam (q.v.) and others in the 1890's, and her characteristic prose style, with its lyric effusiveness and its colorful elaboration of imagery, affects one, as a recent Swedish critic has put it, "as an unintentional parody of what the Swedish 1890's meant by a beautiful style." But though her prose style seems to us today stilted and false, and her ideas overoptimistic if not in considerable part actually naïve, Ellen Key as a personality, warm, unselfish, courageous, intensely alive, full of a contagious energy and enthusiasm, has been a very real force in Swedish cultural life in the last half century. The force of her personality has already outlived, and will apparently continue to outlive, details of the specific program of reform for which she fought ceaselessly throughout a long and active life.

See: L. Nystrom-Hamilton, Ellen Key: en livsbild (1904, 2d ed., 1917; Eng. tr., Ellen Key; Her Life and Work, 1913); J. Landquist, Ellen Key (1909); G. Brandes and others, En bok om Ellen Key (1919).

A. G.

Keyserling, Eduard, Graf von (1855-1918, German novelist), was born at Paddern, the ancestral estate in the Baltic province of Courland; his distinguished family traced its descent from the Teutonic Knights who had brought Christianity and Western culture to this region in the 13th century. His early education was at the Gymnasium in Hasenpoth, and he attended the university at Dorpat before going to Vienna to live. After some years at Paddern administering the family estate and further travel in Italy, he settled in Munich in 1899, where he lived with two sisters. An invalid since 1897, he was blind the last 10 years of his life.

Keyserling's literary career began late. His first works, the novels Rosa Herz (1883) and Die dritte Stiege (1890) as well as his dramas, Frühlingsopfer (1899), Der dumme Hans (1901), Peter Hawel (1903), and Benignens Erlebnis (1906), influenced by early naturalism, are almost forgotten. His later stories show Keyserling at his best and place him high in the ranks of modern German novelists. His style is reminiscent of Fontane and Turgenev (qq.v.). The somber landscape, the melancholy isolation of the baronial estates, reflect the passive mood and aristocratic restraint so fundamental to an understanding of his characters. His delineations are concise and accurate, his narratives realistic and objective. His own social and cultural heritage determined his work. The German nobility in the Baltic provinces had enjoyed a unique position of influence for centuries and controlled internal affairs completely despite the nominal political dependence upon Russia. Even in the late 19th century, after serfdom had been abolished and basic human rights granted to the Lett peasantry, the landed aristocracy dominated. The wide gulf between the masses of people and this small group of cultivated leaders remained unbridged. Keyserling portrayed the life of this select circle. His characters and their outlook are best characterized by Fontane's famous remark that while a weaver may live to be 60 at the most, an aristocratic squire may really be 300 years old. Among Keyserling's best works are the novels Beate und Mareile (1903; Eng. tr., The Curse of the Tarniffs, 1928), Dumala (1907; Eng. tr., Man of God, 1930), Wellen (1911; Eng. tr., Tides, 1929), Abendliche Häuser (1913), Am Südhang (1916), Fürstinnen (1917), and Feiertagskinder (1919) and the collections of stories Schwüle Tage (1906), Bunte Herzen (1908), and Im stillen Winkel (1918). His stories are documents of the gradual crumbling of a society that had once been the bulwark of European civilization, but was now an anachronism. He ignored the problems of his time and seemed unaware of the significance of the revolt among the Letts in 1905-1906, which was really a prelude to the final collapse of German supremacy in the Baltic. He portrayed only the daily routine of his own set, "whom life passed by" without actually touching. Its conduct was determined by custom and tradition and had been molded centuries ago. For Keyserling human relationships were significant only within the accepted pattern. His characters feel their position, their privileges, and their duties. Their lives are not easy because custom and tradition dictate procedure in every situation, yet they cannot exist in any world but their own. They have lived too long in an artificial atmosphere and have lost vigor and initiative. They are delicately sensitive and highly cultivated, but their refinement has reached the point of decadence. Love is the motivating factor in Keyserling's narratives, but it is not an elemental passion. Keyserling pictured love as an irrational desire that dislocates the ordinary relationships of life. The scenes are laid on aristocratic estates where gracious living has become a fine art. Against a background of dinners, hunting parties, garden fêtes, and five o'clock teas the disturbing domination of an irrational love affair is pictured. Every story deals with the destructive influence of illicit love in conventional aristocratic circles, yet Keyserling never becomes tiresome in handling such limited materials. He portrays his characters so skillfully with a minimum of detail and artifice that the reader is charmed with the naturalness of his narratives and the economy of his art.

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, 19. Auflage (1928), pp. 840-845; K. Knoop, Die Erzählungen Eduard von Keyserlings (1929).

W. A. R.

Khlebnikov, Velemir (pseud. of Victor Khlebnikov, 1885-1922, Russian poet), born at Kalmytzkaya Step in the former Government of Saratov, was the most prominent member of the cubo-futurist group on the eve of the Russian Revolution. Absent-minded, slovenly, and impractical, he published only a small portion of his voluminous output and died in wretched poverty. A collection of his poems garnered from various publications and from extant manuscripts (he was in the habit of scattering and losing his verses) was issued in 1936 (Izbrannyye stikhotvoreniya; Selected Poems). He influenced both his fellow futurists and other poets with his innovations in prosody and especially in language. His intimate knowledge of old and modern Russian, coupled with his inherent penchant for linguistics and his interest in folklore, enabled him to create neologisms free of the absurd trickery that lent unenviable notoriety to such of his associates as Kruchonykh. Khlebnikov's language has its logic and is essentially Russian morphologically, even when the words he uses are nonexistent and have no meaning. A celebrated poem of his, "Zaklyatiye smekhom" (Conjuration by Laughter), is delightful nonsense verse, in which the word smekh, laughter, gives birth to nearly a score of fanciful variations—invented nouns, adjectives, verbs, and adverbs—whose total effect on one's risibles is inevitable. His coinage of zaum (beyond reason) language is closer to James Joyce's efforts than to the whimsies of Gertrude Stein. Like Joyce, Khlebnikov had a catholic interest in words and linguistics. Hence his preoccupation with Slavic and non-Slavic folklore, epos, and authentic national poets. Among the works that had an influence on him were the Kalevala, Hiawatha, oriental epics, the poetry of Pushkin and Walt Whitman.

A mystic megalomania was evidenced in his letters and literary declarations. He took his futurism seriously and referred to himself solemnly as "king of the poets" and "chairman of the globe." His poetry after the Revolution was rather pedestrian.

A. K.

Khodasevich, Vladislav Felitsyanovich (1886-1939, Russian poet and critic), was born and educated in Moscow. In his first book of verse, Molodost (1908; Youth), he appears as a minor disciple of symbolism. Although he was an ardent admirer of Andrei Bely (q.v.), his poetry came to lean much more toward classicism and reflects rather the influence of Bryusov (q.v.)—and through him, of Pushkin. Khodasevich's Putem zerna (1920; The Way of Grain) first brought him general recognition as a poet. His finest book of poetry is Tyazholaya lira (1922; The Heavy Lyre), in which he appears as a master of classical form. His book of memoirs, Nekropol (Paris, 1935; Necropolis), gives brilliant, although not always reliable, sketches of leading personalities of contemporary Russian literature.

See: A. Bely, "V. Khodasevich," Zapiski mechtatelya, Vol. V (1922); S. Rodov, "Original-naya poeziya gosizdata," Na postu, 1923, Nos. 2-3.

O. M.

Kielland, Alexander Lange (1849-1906, Norwegian novelist, short-story writer, and dramatist), is reckoned as one of the "big four" of Norwegian classic writers, along with Ibsen, Björnson, and Lie (q.v.). He was at one with his contemporaries in attacking the abuses of social life, but he stood apart by virtue of his great personal charm, his brilliant wit, and his unfailing clarity of form. He burst meteorically upon the literary scene in 1879, worked feverishly for a decade, and then stopped writing as suddenly as he had begun. Björnson and Brandes (q.v.) hailed him enthusiastically as an ally in the battle for social and intellectual freedom in the North. They were not accustomed to finding men of his caliber on their side, the scion of a wealthy merchant family, "favorite of the gods," large, handsome, elegant. Kielland's attacks on social prejudice did not stem from personal disappointments or disharmonies, but from a deeply founded sincerity of ethical purpose, a logical, rationalistic view of the world, and an absolute conviction of the importance of the cause for which he fought.

His life was outwardly uneventful. After receiving a law degree in 1871, he operated a brick factory (1872-1881) and then spent literary periods in Copenhagen (1881-1883), in his native town of Stavanger (1883-86), and in France (1886-88). He was editor of a Stavanger daily (1889-1890), mayor of Stavanger (1891-1902), and district governor of Romsdal (1902-1906). The really crucial event in Kielland's literary life was his visit to the Paris Exposition in 1878, when he wrote his first short stories and met Björnson. A climax came in 1885, when the Norwegian Storting refused to grant him a poet's stipend, a cause célèbre which split the Liberal Party into two irreconcilable wings.

His basic tastes were developed in a pre-capitalistic, patriarchal economy, an atmosphere of small-town merchant princeliness. These are reflected in his courtly manners, the pride and reticence of his character, the deep reverence he nourished for the cultural tradition of his family, and the touch of foppery and dolce far niente which he often regretted but never denied. His loving delineation of the ancestral house stands among the high points of his authorship. But Kielland broke decisively with the political and religious tradition of this background. His years as a factory owner opened his eyes to the position of the laboring man; his reading after 1870 gave direction to his life by awakening his anger over the exploitation and inequalities of modern life. The satirical spirit which had been nourished in his student days by Heine and Kierkegaard was now captivated by the ideas of Brandes and John Stuart Mill and inspired by the narrative art of Dickens, Daudet (q.v.), Hans Christian Andersen, and Balzac. The theme of his writing, infinitely varied, became the glaring discrepancies between wealth and poverty, the respectable and the outcast. He felt a deep aversion to the anticultural effects of the incoming industrial capitalism and parted company with his own class by sympathizing with its victims instead of its beneficiaries, by seeking to strengthen those who lacked power and encouraging their dissatisfactions. Kielland poured his satiric vitriol above all on the representatives of conservative, institutionalized life, the clergy, the bureaucracy, and the schoolmen. He began with rapier thrusts, but ended with good, hefty blows of the broadsword. He opened with a collection of short stories, Novelletter (1879; Eng. tr., Tales of Two Countries, 1891; Norse Tales and Sketches, 1897); his fame rests chiefly on these and the novels Garman og Worse (1880; Eng. tr., Garman and Worse, 1885) and Skipper Worse (1882; Eng. tr., 1885). The most distinguished of his contemporary satires were the novels Arbeidsfolk (1881; Laborers), Else (1881; Eng. tr., Elsie, 1894), and Gift (1883; Poison).

His literary qualities include a cultivation of language that is reminiscent of Flaubert (q.v.), a deft, discreet handling of detail which is often loving in its maliciousness, and a lyric vein that grew out of a passionate fondness for the gray, low-lying shores of southwestern Norway and the sea that incessantly pounds them. Kielland's writings offer the most thoroughly and delicately seasoned dish that Norwegian literature has produced, a remarkable blending of the Norwegian milieu with the European outlook. For all the indignation that made him a "partisan of utilitarian poetry" and sometimes misled him to one-sided characterizations, the final impression of his work and his character is that of breadth

—a breadth that included self-irony, tenderness, and an almost sybaritic enjoyment of life's amenities. In Björnson's words, "he was the most perfect representative of Norwegian culture in our day." He has himself joined the characters of his books as a figure in Norwegian literature, living still in the several volumes of his letters published after his death. In them, even more directly than in his works, is reflected a manly soul, gentle, honest, witty, and wise.

See: J. B. Halvorsen, Norsk forfatterlexikon, III (1892), 228-246; G. Brandes, Samlede Skrifter (1900); M. Schjødt, A. L. Kielland (1904); Kielland, Breve (1907), Breve til hans datter (1909), and Samlede digterverker, ed. by P. L. Stavnem (5 vols., 1919); G. Gran, Alexander L. Kielland og hans samtid (1922); O. Storstein, Kielland på ny (1936); V. E. Lynner, "Hvem var Alexander Kielland?" Edda, XXXVII (1937), 304-337.

E. H.

Kinck, Hans Ernst (1865-1926, Norwegian short-story writer, novelist, dramatist, and essayist), born in Øksfjord in Loppa, was a physician's son who received the determining impulses of his art among the "medieval" country folk of Setesdal (from the age 7 to 11) and the "salty rationalists" of Hardanger (from the age 11 to 17). A classical schooling crowned the development of one of the most original, temperamental, and startling writers in Norwegian letters. Independently, yet in step with other writers and thinkers in the neo-romantic era, he worked his way back to the Middle Ages, seeking there the roots of the nation, "the mystery of a people." Like Bergson (q.v.) he praised human vitality, the impulse, the unreflective, the flame of heart and temper. Like Nietzsche (q.v.) he saw in history "a series of vast undertakings resulting from the self-willed craving for action of individual personalities." After taking a university degree he won honorable mention for a thesis on the relation between medieval ballad poetry and the mythical-heroic poetry of northern antiquity (1892). This was the first of his many attempts to reach by a magnificent scholarly intuition (too often without adequate support in facts) a conception of Norse "folk psyche" in modern and medieval times. His entire work was founded in mysticism, but he approached it by way of an ironic, almost corrosive wit and a fantastically imaginative intellect. His earliest novels, Huldren (1892; The Half-Wit) and Ungt folk (1893; Eng. tr., A Young People, 1929), were outwardly naturalistic, but their purpose was to reveal the unconscious urges of the soul. A residence in Paris (1893-1894) led to his first genuinely original creation, Flaggermusvinger (1895; Bats' Wings), and the two novels about Herman Eek, Sus (1896; Soughing) and Hugormen (1898; The Adder). He left the public cold, bewildered, or antagonistic; but among authors and connoisseurs he won a faithful, even a frenzied support.

In 1896 Kinck visited Italy for the first time and was so captivated by its charm that he made it his second homeland. From then on his writings in the various genres which he mastered swung back and forth between a Norwegian peasant or medieval background and the Italian Renaissance. His masterpieces in the former include the novel Emigranter (1904; Emigrants), the unrhythmical dramatic poem Driftekarren (1908; The Drover), numerous volumes of short stories and essays, and the monumental Sneskavlen brast (3 vols., 1918-1919; The Avalanche Broke). Class conflicts, the relation of heritage and environment, of race and individual, are their basic themes. His Italian studies led him to set up two polar types in the racial mixture of Italy, the satirist Pietro Aretino, in the drama Den sidste gjest (1910; The Last Guest), and the mystic nationalist, Niccolò Machiavelli, in the drama Mot karneval (1915; Toward Carnival). Although Kinck was close to Pareto (q.v.) in his views on emotion and was affected by the writings of German racialists, he did not follow them into political fascism, remaining sharply opposed to all mechanistic philosophies and mass movements. In his presentation he swung constantly between the lyric and the grotesque, with an overpowering, baroque fantasy which could flare into burlesque or sadism without warning. His style was a Dano-Norwegian such as no one had written before him, shot through with the riches of his childhood dialects, concentrated, impulsive, and difficult of access. Kinck's work flashes with the sovereignty of authentic genius, even when it reveals an incapacity for sustained narrative or dramatic characterization. The best of his extraordinarily prolific work is found in the short stories; less burdened by racial theories, he was here free to be the "pure artist" that Gunnar Heiberg (q.v.) once called him.

See: C. Gierløff, Kinck (1923); J. Bukdahl, "Hans E. Kinck," American-Scandinavian Review, XV (1927), 589-594; A. Harbitz, ed., Hans E. Kinck; et eftermæle (1927); H. Jæger, "Hans Ernst Kinck," in Norsk biografisk leksikon, VII (1936), 316-329.

E. H.

Kirk, Hans Rudolf (1898–, Danish novelist and journalist), was born the son of a doctor in Hadsund, a fishing town on the Mariager Fjord in Northeast Jutland. Matriculating in 1916 from the old and aristocratic Sorø Academy, he took his degree in law in 1922, entered the civil service for two years, then left abruptly to write. His book reviews for a provincial paper attracted attention. In 1930 he joined the staff of the Copenhagen daily Social-Demokraten. From 1938 he was associated with the communistic Arbejderbladet (Workers' Journal). He contributed also to radical magazines, including Clarté and Nordahl Grieg's (q.v.) Veien frem (The Road Ahead). With Fiskerne (1928; The Fishermen) he won immediate recognition as a novelist of rank. His second novel, Daglejerne (1936; Day Laborers), confirmed his position. In both he uses the collective method, substituting for the traditional hero the group—pietistic fishermen forming a new community, farm laborers in the process of becoming factory workers and trade unionists. But groups consist of individuals, and there are few more vivid and memorable in modern literature than Mariane of Fiskerne or Cilius of Daglejerne, to mention only two of the many characters Kirk has drawn with sympathy and humor in strong, clear prose. His latest novel, Borgmesteren gaar af (1942; The Mayor Retires), is a brilliant but not unkindly satire of the officialdom he once so briefly served.

See: O. Friis, "Hans Rudolf Kirk," in Dansk biografisk Leksikon, XII (1937), 461–462.

J. B. C. W.

Kirshon, Vladimir Mikhailovich (1902–1937, Russian dramatist), born in St. Petersburg into a family of the Menshevik intelligentsia, became a Bolshevik in 1920, went to Sverdlovsk University in 1921 and to Rostov-on-Don in 1923. He moved to Moscow in 1925 and became one of the leaders of the Association of Proletarian Writers. In 1925 a murder was committed by a Communist student named Korenkov, and a violent discussion arose as to whether the murderer should be pardoned on account of his past services and his possible future usefulness to Communism. Kirshon took this famous case as the subject of his first play, Rzhavchina (1927; Eng. tr., Red Rust, acted by the Theatre Guild Studio in 1929 and printed in New York in 1930), of which he later changed the title to Konstantin Terekhin, the fictitious name of his hero. In the play Kirshon and his collaborator, A. Uspenski, showed the degeneration of a young hero of the Russian Revolution under the corrupting influence of the Nepmen of the New Economic Policy. Kirshon's next play, Relsy gudyat (1928; The Rails Are Humming), showed the difficulties of a Communist director in a locomotive repair shop in conflict with reactionary engineers and the final triumph of the workers at the end of the play when the repaired steam engine, giving forth real steam, is set in motion. In Gorod vetrov (1929; The City of Winds) Kirshon turned to the Revolution in Baku in 1918 and the story of the 26 Communists who were put to death. The play was made into an opera called Severnny veter (1930; The North Wind), with music by Leo Knipper. In his next play, Khleb (1930; Eng. tr., Bread 1934), he turned to the collective farm and the struggle to prevent the kulaks from hoarding wheat and causing starvation. Sud (1933; The Trial) took up the struggle in Germany between Social Democrats and Communists. In Chudesny splav (1934; The Miraculous Alloy) Kirshon told the story of a brigade of young students who successfully invented a new kind of alloy to be used in making airplanes. In Bolshoi den (1937; The Big Day) he depicted the eve of a fascist attack on the Soviet Union and showed a young aviator saving the life of his older rival.

See: A. V. Gurvich, "Kirshon," Krasnaya nov, 1934, No. 6; I. Altman, Dramaturgiya (1936); A. Gurvich, Tri dramaturga (1936), pp. 181–268; Kirshon, "A New Chapter in Dramatic Thought," Theatre Arts Monthly, XX (1936), 673–678.

H. W. L. D.

Kiss, József (1843–1921, Hungarian poet), was born in Mezőcsát and died in Budapest. He received rabbinical education and as a young man taught in Hebrew schools in the provinces. In 1868 he went to Budapest and shortly afterwards established his reputation with a volume of poems entitled Zsidó dalok (1868; Hebrew Songs). With the exception of Gyula Reviczky (q.v.) and János Vajda (q.v.), József Kiss was the most genuine poet of his generation. His contemporaries who wrote poetry, e.g., Kálmán Tóth, Árpád Zempléni, Gyula Rudnyánszky, Lajos Palágyi, Lajos Pósa, Elek Londes, Lajos Bartók, lacked the evoking magic which Kiss sometimes possessed. Yet compared with János Arany (q.v.), whom as a poet of ballads he imitated, Kiss was a minor poet; and though he was first acclaimed by Ferenc Toldy who was "the father of Hungarian literary history," he never qualified as a really outstanding creator in terms of comparative literature. In 1890 he founded A Hét (The Week), a literary weekly, which influenced the trend of modern Hungarian literature. For some time his assistant editor was Emil Makai, a minor poet and playwright who died in 1901 at the age of 30. Another assistant editor, Tamás Kóbor, was a realistic novelist and writer of short stories of some merit, but chiefly an able journalist. Kiss himself was a member of the Petőfi Társaság (Petőfi Society) and of the Kisfaludy Társaság (Kisfaludy Society).

Influenced by János Arany, Kiss wrote ballads, of which "Simon Judit" (Judith Simon) became the best known. His poems were published in 1876, under the title Kiss József költeményei (The Poems of Joseph Kiss). A volume entitled Ünnepnapok (1888; Holidays) contained his interpretation of Jewish psalms and other Jewish religious poems. His compassion and imagination was stirred by the plight of girls who had to earn their living in cities. Because of this intense interest in them, he wrote a poetic narrative, Mese a varrógépről (1884; A Tale of the Sewing Machine), which found many sympathetic readers. One of his most ambitious attempts was another poetic narrative, Legendák a nagyapámról (1888; Legends of My Grandfather). Kiss was fascinated by certain phases of the Jewish past, and it was easy for his imagination to convert these into poetry. His patriotic and pacifistic poems written during the First World War were mediocre ventures of an aging poet who probably thus hoped to regain the fervor of some of his earlier poems.

Kiss was no cosmopolitan. He remained a Hungarian, unable and unwilling to break with his Jewishness; in the world of his spirit and in the world of his emotions both symbols were present. His poetry is a mixture of Hebrew themes, proletarian subjects, Hungarian ideas, and the general topics of love, life, and death. It is rarely inferior poetry, but seldom does it represent highest excellence. Kiss conquered the danger of spiritual uprootal with an understanding of his own place in Hungarian life and literature.

See: M. Rubinyi, Kiss József stilusa, nyelve, technikája (1925); W. Kirkconnell, The Magyar Muse; an Anthology (1933).

J. R.

Kistemaekers, Henry (1872–, Belgian dramatist and novelist), was born in Floreffe, in the Walloon section of Belgium, the son of a Brussels publisher. Leaving his own country, he settled in Paris where he devoted himself to writing. Interested mainly in the social drama, he followed the trend of quick wit, irony, and equivocal morality which typified the so-called current "Parisian" literature and lost all traces of the originality which might have linked him with his native country. However, leaving aside the superficial "Parisianism" of plays like Marthe (1899), La Blessure (1905), La Rivale (1907), one finds in them a keen observation of life, a subtle and true psychology, and lyrical outbursts of romantic passion. His masterpiece is L'Instinct (1905), a tragically terse and powerful drama. He wrote more than 20 plays, and as many novels, the most successful of which were L'Illégitime (1898), Les Amants romanesques (1899), and La Femme inconnue (1901). At times he used the pseudonyms Janine, Kist, or Kistemaekers fils.

L. V.

Klabund (pseud. of Alfred Henschke, 1890–1928, German novelist, dramatist, and poet) was born in Crossen on the Oder, the son of an apothecary, and enjoyed all the advantages of a good education. At the age of 24 an attack of tuberculosis forced him to abandon his studies. From then on until his death his time was spent, with ever shorter intervals, in the sanitariums of Davos and other health resorts. He married twice. After the early death of his first wife, the "Irene" (peace) of his poems, he wrote the exquisite Totenklage (1918–1919).

The critic Alfred Kerr discovered the young Klabund, whose poetry he printed in his periodical Pan and whom he staunchly upheld against a scandalized public. Klabund was primarily a lyricist; he was at the same time an expressionist although he never belonged to any of the expressionist groups. He commanded a great variety of types of expression, from the vulgar to the mystic. He was at his best in poems in the popular vein and in songs of a worldly religiosity clothed in the style of Chinese lyrics. Most of his "Chinese" poems are not translations but works of his own imagination. His style, diverse in form, is always restless and impatient. His poetry expresses itself preponderantly in contrasts ("Klabund" means "transformation"), which often led to the grotesque and to satire. Klabund was never a radical. He wrote patriotic war songs as well as pacifist poems. He was attracted by the genuine and the elemental, an inclination evidenced in the subject matter of his novelettes, of which he wrote some 10 and which have, perhaps more than any of his other works, established his popularity. The best known are Bracke (1918; Eng. tr., Brackie the Fool, 1927), Pjotr (1923; Eng. tr., Peter the Czar, 1925), and Borgia (1928; Eng. tr., The Incredible Borgias, 1929). Klabund was also a successful dramatist, particularly with his version of the Chinese Kreidekreis (1924; Eng. tr., Circle of Chalk, 1929) and the social comedy X Y Z (1926). His work shows indebtedness to Heine, Wedekind, and Rilke.

See: H. Grothe, Klabund; Leben und Werk eines Poeten (1933); W. Paulsen, "Klabund", German Life and Letters, III (1938-1939), 222-230.

W. P.

Kloos, Willem (1859-1938, Dutch poet and critic), was born at Amsterdam, attended high school there, and studied classical philology at the university of his native city. In 1885 he helped found De Nieuwe Gids (The New Guide), of which he was editor in chief and the leading literary critic. Figures of speech, he taught, should never be stereotyped. Each poet has his own way of visualizing thoughts in images. That is why he denied the name of poetry to most of the verse of the preceding generation, which used clichés for their metaphors instead of self-created images. His own poetry was a demonstration of imagery that is seen and not copied. Verzen, his first book, was published in 1894. The sonnets it contains are among the finest in the language and assured him at once a high place in Dutch literature. His diction revolutionized the language. Passion and anger and defiance were translated into images that startled by their novelty and unexpectedness. Readers of the present day may still find them beautiful but no longer defiant. What sounded revolutionary in the late 80's set the style for ensuing generations. There is a distinct cleavage between the literary language of present-day Holland and the Dutch that was written before the 90's of the past century. This profound change was brought about by Kloos and his fellow editors of De Nieuwe Gids. The success of the "Eightiers," as the rebels were called, was followed by dissension within their own ranks. His colleagues became more and more interested in social rather than literary reform. Kloos alone, staunch individualist and never strongly social-minded, remained all through life the self-expressionist of his poetic début. The definitive edition of his collected verse appeared in 1933 (Verzen). His literary critiques and essays were published in Nieuwere Literatuurgeschiedenis (5 vols., 1904-1914; Recent Literary History) and Letterkundige Inzichten en Vergezichten (22 vols., 1928-1938; Literary Insights and Perspectives).

See: A. Verwey, "Willem Kloos," in Stille

Toernooien (1901); K. H. de Raaf, Willem Kloos, de Mensch, de Dichter, de Criticus (1934); J. A. Russell, Dutch Poetry and English (1939), pp. 156 ff.

A. J. B.

Knudsen, Jakob (1858-1917, Danish novelist, philosopher, and educator), was born at Rødding, Jutland. He was the son of a folk high school teacher who later became parish priest in Aggershus, North Jutland, and here Knudsen spent the formative years of his childhood. Ultimately of a solid stock of Jutland farmers, his father was the son of a sturdy bourgeois family, while his mother was of a nobler but weakened strain. We meet these two families in Knudsen's To Slægter (1910; Two Families). His father, who from a timid youth grew up to be a self-righteous man, gave his son a strict puritanical upbringing, managing at the same time to inculcate the essence of Grundtvigianism in the boy, i.e., love for the living word of Christianity and love of his native country. The young man lived up to his father's wishes. Having passed the theological examinations at the University of Copenhagen (in 1881), he became first a teacher at the folk high school at Askov (1881-1890), then a pastor near Randers, Jutland (1890-1897), and finally an itinerant lecturer, mostly for different folk high schools in Denmark.

In his lectures (Christelige Foredrag, 1898, Christian Lectures; Livsfilosofi, 1908, Philosophy of Life), as well as in his novels, Knudsen evolves his views on life and education. He is a Christian mystic, taking Christ in the orthodox Christian sense; "were he not the Son of God in that sense, but only a human being, he would be, to me, a repulsive type, an anemic wretch, without natural joy in fighting, without eroticism—a megalomaniac." And he has no use for Christian morality as exemplified in the Sermon on the Mount or in Leo Tolstoy's (q.v.) teachings; modern humanitarianism is for him an abomination. He favors authority of the few who are able and willing to support not only themselves but also the rest of humanity. The democratic state has too little authority and is far too lenient in its attitude towards lawbreakers and criminals; hence citizens with a feeling of responsibility should not be afraid to take the law into their own hands. But in one point there is too little freedom: children should never be forced to take the subjects which are to mold their character (religion and history of native country), and teachers should be given a free hand in dealing with them. Otherwise children should be brought up in the old-fashioned way, under authority, the stricter the better. In this philosophy of life there may be much inherited farmer's wisdom, but it is also a reaction against the moral laxness of the times, the radical nihilism of the 90's from which Jørgensen escaped into the Catholic Church. Its Nietzschean affinities are obvious (see Nietzsche).

Knudsen's first works (1887-) are not significant, but he won instant fame with Den gamle Præst (1899; The Old Pastor). Here appear the two types so common in his novels: the criminal moron, dangerous in humanitarian society, and the born nobleman, represented by the too quick-tempered count, and the old pastor, Knudsen's ideal—firm of character, religious, strict, and just, above the law. There followed Gæring and Afklaring (1902; Ferment and Clarification), dealing with education and the intellectual situation of Knudsen's own generation, and Sind (1902; Grit), a fine story of the Jutland lad who, though timid of nature, is so obsessed with asserting his own rights that it carries him directly to a fatal clash with the corrupt authorities. Inger (1906) is a novel of married life; Fremskridt (1907; Progress) contrasts the old and new peasant culture; and Lærer Urup (1909; Schoolmaster Urup) is a bitter indictment of education and lenience towards criminals in modern society. In the family saga To Slægter (1910) and Rodfæstet (1911; Firmly Rooted), personalities strong by nature and upbringing are set off against weaklings spoilt as children by a Rousseauian education. Morality is the affair of two persons at least, since the moral person must follow an ideal outside himself. Whoever is allowed to follow his own nature becomes an introvert weakling, unable to go through life. It does not matter where a person has his roots, in a faith in God or in the authority exercised by his own family, just so it is outside of himself. It is not always clear whether Knudsen attributes the superiority or the inferiority of persons and families to inheritance or to education, but the two types of people are forever contrasting in his books.

The two-part novel Angst (1912; Fear) and Mod (1914; Courage) depicts the religious development of Martin Luther and, incidentally, that of Knudsen himself, who not only as an adolescent but also later in life suffered much from depressions and fear. A few more novels and the collection of short stories entitled Jyllanders (2 vols., 1912-1917; Jutlanders) complete Knudsen's output.

Artistically Knudsen excels in delineation of characters, often by giving their speech a dialectal tinge. His prose otherwise is straightforward and plain. He is a fine dialectician who drives home his ideas with uncompromising paradoxes. After Grundtvig and Kierkegaard he is by many considered the greatest religious genius that Denmark has fostered. He is still largely unknown outside of Scandinavia and Germany.

Sec: H. Begtrup, Jakob Knudsen (1918); J. Byskov, "Jakob Knudsen" in Ejnar Skovrup, ed., Hovedtræk af nordisk Digtning i Nytiden, I (1920), 195-216; Helge Kjærgaard, Die dänische Literatur der neuesten Zeit (1871-1933) (1934), pp. 119-130.

S. E.

Koch, Martin (1882-, Swedish novelist and journalist), is the first Swedish author who has depicted Swedish life from below, i.e. from the point of view of the proletariat. Born in Stockholm, Koch early had the opportunity of observing the life of the less fortunate lower classes, though he himself came from the lower middle class and his childhood was on the whole a happy one. Upon approaching young manhood, however, he had to become a painter's apprentice instead of taking the coveted "student examination" for entrance to Uppsala; and from this time on his sense of class distinction became acute and his sympathy for the oppressed classes in the city was strongly aroused. Since beginning his literary career in 1911 with an unimportant novel, Ellen, he has been reasonably prolific in a number of semi-journalistic literary forms. Though his novels bear undeniable traces of the influence of such Americans as Jack London and Upton Sinclair, and the Russians Gorki and Dostoevski (qq.v.), Koch is no mere imitator of earlier foreign literary interpreters of the proletarian scene. He goes to considerable trouble to develop lower-class conditions and themes peculiarly Swedish, and both his local color and the social psychology which forms the interpretative basis of his novels are conceived particularly with immediate Swedish conditions in mind.

His first two important proletarian novels, Arbetare: en bok om hat (1912; Workers: a Book about Hatred) and Timmerdalen: en historia om kultur (1913; The Timber Valley: a Story about Culture), both draw their materials directly from episodes in the rising class struggle of the day in Sweden, the first apparently from the general strike of 1909, the second from the bloody Sandö Revolt in Norrland. Though the author's sympathies are obviously on the side of the working classes in the new struggle for power in the years just before the First World War, Koch does not overidealize his picture of the proletariat. He is aware of the brutal primitive instincts which too often motivate the actions of workers, and he has a sharp eye for the degenerate sides of lower-class life. This aspect he develops particularly in Guds vackra värld (1916; God's Beautiful World), a ghastly picture of the lowest of lower-class life, of social parasites and criminal types from the Swedish "underworld," who batten filthily on petty degeneration of all kinds and who have not the least desire to improve their lot. This completely disillusioned picture has little if anything in it of a type so frequently present in proletarian fiction, the partly idealized lower-class individual who manages somehow to rise at moments above the filth and degradation of his immediate environment. Koch's last important novel, Fromma människor (1918; Pious People), is a study in popular religious psychology, an analysis of the conditions which create cheap and sensational sectarianism in various parts of Sweden. He accounts for these curious religious phenomena in terms of various physical and geographical circumstances, much as he had accounted for proletarian excesses in the class struggle depicted in his earlier novels in terms of unhappy economic and social conditions. Because of this broad interpretative basis of his novels, Koch may perhaps be called the first serious social-psychologist in Swedish fiction.

In the last 25 years Koch's literary output has been rather miscellaneous in both form and content, and none of it has been as challenging in its ideas or as vigorous and powerful in its art as are the proletarian novels which he wrote just before and during the First World War. Among the better things in his later work is Mauritz (1939), a quiet, objective autobiographical document which outlines with both charm and insight the events of Koch's childhood and youth.

A. G.

Kolbenheyer, Erwin Guido (1878–, German novelist and dramatist), was born in Budapest. His father was for a time a Hungarian government architect. After the father's early death, his widow went with the two-year-old boy back to her home town, Karlsbad. Here Kolbenheyer spent the most impressionable years of his life. Later he moved to Vienna to study philosophy and natural sciences at the university.

Today Kolbenheyer is considered the spiritual exponent of the Sudeten German region. His one-sided overemphasis on Teutonism, which was in tune with the trend of Hitlerism in Germany, was largely the result of his early years in the atmosphere of a German minority group. Not only in his historical novels but also in his theoretical studies (above all Die Bauhütte, 1925) he anticipated many ideas of National Socialism.

His work is mainly historical. The heroes of his novels and dramas are what he considers "typical Germans," maintaining themselves against a hostile world. This "typical German" is always a mystic revolting against some form of scholasticism, an exponent of the Reformation rebelling against the fetters of an international church. All Kolbenheyer's historical heroes are in some way or other proclaimers of the spirit of Reformation; such are the central figures in his two most important historical dramas, Giordano Bruno (1893; later reissued as Heroische Leidenschaften, 1929) and Gregor und Heinrich (1934), the Spinoza novel, Amor Dei (1902; Eng. tr. God-intoxicated Man, 1933), the novel Meister Joachim Pausewang (1910; Eng. tr., A Winter Chronicle, 1938), evoking the time of Jakob Böhme, and the three-volume Paracelsus (1917–1923).

Kolbenheyer does not make any concessions to his reader. His best novels are not only profound historical and philosophical works, permeated with a Germano-mania—even in normal times difficult to appreciate—but in addition some of them are philological experiments. In Pausewang and Paracelsus Kolbenheyer has tried to reproduce the spirit of the times by creating a semi-archaic language. He has also experimented in his dramas and evolved the theory of a "third stage." In his dramatic conception the stage is to extend over the entire theatre and make the spectator in the audience an integral part of the play. This demand is a continuation of expressionist tendencies, though on a different intellectual and political level. Many other elements have influenced his dramatic development, most of all the work of Ibsen (q.v.) and Hebbel.

See: C. Wandrey, Kolbenheyer, der Dichter und der Philosoph (1933); L. Schlötermann-Kuffner, Erwin Guido Kolbenheyers "Dritte Bühne" (1939).

W. P.

Konopnicka, Marja (née Wasilowska, 1842–1910, Polish poet and publicist), was born in Suwałki, Russian Poland, the daughter of a government official. She is important chiefly as the archrepresentative of the "free woman" of the positivist era (see Polish literature) and as the outstanding poet of militant patriotism in an epoch of appeasement and disillusion. Konopnicka's verses, especially those in which the peasant is fortified in his determination to hold his land and to refuse its sale to the Germans, had much to do with keeping the national faith and the national soil intact in the face of the German Drang nach Osten. Like Marja Dąbrowska (q.v.) in a later generation, Konopnicka was a passionate partisan of the peasant. She was also a pioneer in the use of peasant themes in literature. Her long pseudo-epic Pan Balcer w Brazylji (1892; Mr. Balcer in Brazil) is an idealization of the peasant emigrant based on a work of Dygasiński (q.v.). Like countless other items in her vast output, it seemed important when it appeared and when its author, thanks to her "emancipation," was in the public eye, but neither this nor any of her more ambitious works is very highly regarded today.

See: G. Korbut, Literatura polska (1931), IV, 101-107.

A. P. C.

Korneichuk, Alexander Yevdokimovich (1910-, Ukrainian dramatist), is the Ukrainian commissar of foreign affairs and the husband of Wanda Wasilewska. He writes in Ukrainian, but his work is best known through Russian translations. He first attracted attention as a playwright with his Gibel eskadry (1934; The Sinking of the Squadron), which won second prize at the All-Union Competition for Dramatists (1933). The play is a melodrama concerning the scuttling of the Black Sea fleet in 1918 and was hailed as a blow to Ukrainian nationalism. A more convincing work is Platon Krechet (1935), a drama about a doctor who exemplifies the aspirations of the new Soviet intelligentsia and is almost frustrated by a bureaucratic administration. In Bankir (1937; The Banker), the story of a self-sacrificing Soviet official, and in V stepyakh Ukrainy (On the Ukrainian Steppes) Korneichuk continued to explore contemporary problems, but in Bogdan Khmelnytsky, 1648-1654 (1939; Part I of a trilogy) he turned to a historical theme. This play, however, has its modern implications, for Khmelnytsky championed the cause of the Ukrainians against the Poles. Since the outbreak of the Second World War, Korneichuk has written Partizany y stepyakh Ukrainy (1942; Eng. tr., Guerillas of the Ukrainian Steppes) and Front (1942; Eng. tr., The Front, both in Four Soviet War Plays, 1944), the latter attacking those older generals who had proved incompetent in modern technical warfare. Platon Krechet, V stepyakh

Ukrainy, and Front have been awarded the Stalin prize.

See: "Korneichuk," in Bolshaya sovetskaya entsiklopediya, XXXIV (1937), 318; H. W. L. Dana, Handbook on Soviet Drama (1938) and Drama in Wartime Russia (1943).

P. A. P.

Korolenko, Vladimir Galaktionovich (1853-1921, Russian fiction writer and publicist), was born in Western Russia. His father was a Russian official (a county judge), his mother a Polish woman. This fact tended to plant within the boy the seeds of tolerance and the ability to see both sides of a question. It was made particularly manifest in 1863, during the unsuccessful Polish insurrection, when the sympathies of his parents were divided. Vladimir graduated from the Russian Gymnasium at Rovno and in 1872 entered the University of St. Petersburg. At that time Russia had already entered the period of reaction from the enlightened ideas of the 1860's, and every expression of liberal ideas was persecuted. Korolenko was expelled from the university in 1875 and was later sent into Siberian exile, for what was known as "revolutionary propaganda" but what, in essence, was the expression of the liberal leanings of the man.

Upon his return from Siberia he joined a group of so-called People's Socialists—though he never officially joined that party—in a common undertaking, the editing and publishing of the monthly review Russkoye bogatstvo (Russian Wealth). Most of his works as a publicist appeared in the pages of that review. In them a mild liberal and progressive attitude was displayed, as well as a demand for basic justice and tolerance to everybody and condemnation of injustice, violence and brutality.

Korolenko welcomed the February, 1917, Revolution which deposed the tsar and wrote enthusiastic articles about it. However, with the coming of the Bolsheviks to power he turned against the new rulers and their methods and retired to his modest estate in the Ukraine. An attempt by the commissar of education, Lunacharski, to persuade the aged liberal to cooperate with the Soviet government was not successful. In a series of letters Korolenko set forth his objections to the violent and sanguine character of the Bolshevik Revolution, as well as his condemnation of the men engaged therein. Korolenko's health began to decline, and he died an invalid, in 1921.

In his fiction, Korolenko bears marked characteristics of a poet, although he did not write verse. There is delicacy of imagery and expression and a fine rhythmical touch; there is, also, much sentimentality. There can be no doubt that Korolenko's literary types and descriptions wholly originate in his abundantly loving heart and are in no way a product of cool reasoning. The gallery of his types is as vivid as if one had seen them on a canvas. There is the old chimesmaster in the sketch of that title ("Staryi zvonar," 1885), unforgettable in his little steeple, calmly and serenely awaiting the approach of death. The sketch has no social significance, in spite of some hazy symbolic meaning which the most ardent of Korolenko's admirers tried to force into it. There is Pan Tiburtsy from the somewhat autobiographical story "V durnom obshchestve" (1890; Eng. tr., "In Bad Society," with In Two Moods, 1891), with his rather confused ideas of right and wrong. There is Makar, from the story "Son Makara" (1885; Eng. tr., title story in Makar's Dream and Other Stories, 1892). The setting of this story and Makar himself are presented with rare artistry. The idea of the story—that there is more in everyone's life than appears on the surface—is neither startling nor original, for all its correctness. Just as mediocre is the idea of his novel Slepoi muzykant (1885; Eng. tr., The Blind Musician, 1890) that humility and suffering give content to art. But here again the story, the characters, the descriptions of nature and of events, as well as the psychology of a blind man, are presented with a great deal of artistry.

The extent of Korolenko's social ideas, as revealed both through his fiction and in his work as a publicist, is summarized in his little sketch "Ogni" (1888; Lights). The author tells of a night trip in a rowboat on one of the Siberian rivers. Seeing the lights which appeared to be just ahead of them, the author turned to the oarsman and commented on their proximity. "Far away," came an indifferent reply from the oarsman. Indeed, the lights proved to be far away, the author having been deceived by an optical illusion. This failed to upset him, however. "Still, there are lights ahead!" he concluded his little piece. Among the liberal intelligentsia, this served as an inspiration and a guide.

See: N. Shakhovskaya, V. G. Korolenko; opyt biograficheskoy kharakteristiki (1912); Korolenko, Polnoye sobraniye sochineni (1914) and Pisma, 1886–1921 (1922).

J. P.

Kossak, Zofja (1890–, Polish novelist), was born on the estate of Skowródki in Volhynia, of Polish gentry stock already famous through the painter Juljusz Kossak. Reared as a typical daughter of the Borderland, she was early uprooted from her pleasant and sheltered life by the Bolshevik invasion of 1917–1918. This experience she was quick to immortalize in Požoga (1922; Eng. tr., The Blaze, 1927). In 1922 she settled in Silesia and soon became deeply interested in the history, folklore, and legendry of that region. The result was a series of Silesian tales, including Wielcy i mali (1927; Great Ones and Small), Legnickie pole (1930; Legnica Field), Nieznany kraj (1932; A Land Unknown), and ultimately, through the fusion of her interest in Silesia with her no less intense interest in the Catholic tradition of her native land, the long novel Krzyżowcy (1935; The Crusaders), with its sequels Król trędowaty (1937; Eng. tr., The Leper King, 1945) and Bez oręża (1938; Eng. tr., Blessed Are the Meek, 1944). Kossak turned next to the Sandomierian region of Poland, then in the public eye because of the great, new Central Industrialization Project. A series of Sandomierian tales was in preparation when Kossak's literary activities were abruptly stopped by the Second World War. With Złota wolność (1928; Golden Freedom), Trembowla (1939), and numerous other historical novels to her credit in addition to those mentioned above, Kossak is the outstanding representative of the post-war school of historical fiction in Poland. She was also a leading figure in the Catholic literary renaissance.

See: E. Breiter, review in Wiadomości literackie, 1936, No. 26; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 169–180, 698–700.

A. P. C.

Kosztolányi, Dezső (1885–1936, Hungarian poet, novelist, short-story writer, and critic), was born in Szabadka and died in Budapest. He was educated in a secondary school of his home town, where his father was the principal, and at the University of Budapest. His first literary works appeared in A Hét (The Week), Nyugat (West), and Élet (Life). But even as a writer of daily newspapers, e.g., Budapesti Napló (Budapest Ledger), Pesti Napló (Pest Ledger), Pesti Hírlap (Pest News), he was so much the homo estheticus that he introduced into his journalistic utterances ideas and manners of literary significance. Kosztolányi traveled much, loved Latin culture, and while his human convictions were varied and sometimes downright contradictory to his "humaneness," as a literary artist he remained faithful to himself. In the moral and social earthquake that followed the First World War, in the midst of enfeebled ethical concepts, the nonpolitical Kosztolányi was distinctly a stranger; it amazed him to be alive when the secret of living was to escape death and not to enrich life. He drew sustenance for the equilibrium of his spirit from major writers and poets whose works he translated into Hungarian and from a stoic point of view which did not, however, nullify his pity for the terrible lot of mankind. One senses in Kosztolányi's art an almost childish fear of the malevolent forces of fate; one senses the expression of a soul in sore need of learning how to defend itself against the hoodlum slogans and actions of modern times. Unfortunately, in the early 20's Kosztolányi, as a journalist and in the name of patriotism, joined the persecutors; he regretted it later, and he himself became a target of attacks.

Kosztolányi is often considered a decadent poet whose intelligence and subtleness suggest artificiality. This criticism is fair only in part. He was an "art for art's sake" poet, and his relationship to French symbolism (q.v.) was undeniable. Nevertheless, since he differentiated between life and art, this does not say that he ignored life. His poems and novels, his critical dissertations and philological essays, his sketches and dialogues, his translations of French, German, English, Italian, and American poetry (published in three volumes), and his translations of Chinese and Japanese lyrics showed not merely a diligent spirit to whom creative expression was vital, but a mentality very much conditioned by the awareness of amorphous reality. Négy fal között (1907; Within Four Walls), Mágia (1912; Magic), Mák, (1916; Poppy), Kenyer és bor (1920; Bread and Wine), and his collected poems, which appeared in 1935, tell the story of a man whose poetry and humaneness were intertwined. His two most popular volumes of poetry, A szegény kisgyermek panaszai (1910; The Complaints of a Poor Little Child) and A bús férfi panaszai (1924; The Complaints of a Sorrowful Man), are, indeed, humane. His volumes of short stories, such as Boszorkánys esték (1908; Bewitched Nights), his novels, A véres költő (1921; Eng. tr., The Bloody Poet, 1927), Pacsirta (1924; Lark), Aranysárkány (1925; The Golden Dragon), Édes Anna (1926; Anna Édes), and all his other works show that Kosztolányi measured life with the yardstick of an artist, but also with a beating heart.

Works of his have appeared in German, Italian, French, and English. The Bloody Poet, a story of Nero's sadism, was published in New York. Kosztolányi was one of the best-educated writers in modern Hungary; he was restless, interested in psychology, interested in beauty, and terrified by death. Evidently it was his death complex that determined his uncompromising attachment to pure art. He lost himself in form in order not to be lost in the fear of death.

See: H. Horváth, Neue ungarische Lyrik (1918); W. Kirkconnell, The Magyar Muse; an Anthology (1933).

J. R.

Krag, Thomas (1868–1913, Norwegian novelist), was one of the leading neo-romanticists of the 1890's, and although his books no longer rouse the enthusiasm they evoked when they first appeared, they still charm by their poetic quality. He grew up in Kristiansand and, together with his brother Vilhelm Krag (q.v.), founded the southern school of Norwegian literature, to which Gabriel Scott (q.v.) also belonged. Thomas Krag was in part influenced by the Danish authors Jens Peter Jacobsen and Johannes Jørgensen (qq.v.). From Jacobsen he learned his colorful style, which now seems somewhat precious. He wrote a number of long novels which are notable for lyric, romantic moods rather than for narrative or characterization. Among them are Kobberslangen (1895; The Copper Serpent), Ada Wilde (1896), Ulf Ran (1897), and Gunvor Kjeld (1904).

H. A. L.

Krag, Vilhelm Andreas Wexels (1871–1933, Norwegian poet, novelist, and dramatist), was born into the dying bureaucracy of the gentle, dreamy South of Norway, in the "colonial" town of Kristiansand, which burned soon after his family moved away, leaving in him a trend towards melancholy nostalgia. His début with the frail, elegiac Digte (1891; Poems) heralded the neo-romantic movement in Norway and was followed by numerous volumes of romantic poetry and drama and novels from the fictitious past of the Norwegian South. These writings have swiftly faded, however; they often have a bookish taste and lack contact with a living milieu. Krag's most vigorous creation belongs to his later years, when from literary and personal disillusionments he turned to the real life of his home districts. He became their literary spokesman and champion, even in practical matters, and more and more lived there, on a small island given to him by his friends. From this attachment grew a series of sketches and plays from the life of the simple fishing population, filled with life and blood, humor and understanding. In two collections of lyrics, Sange fra min ø (1918; Songs from My Island) and Viser og vers (1919; Ballads and Verses), his sorrows are reconciled in landscape poetry of great and moving beauty. A charming autobiography also belongs to these years (4 vols., 1926-1931). He died on his island, cared for in his last days by his fishermen friends.

See: N. C. Brøgger, "Vilhelm Andreas Wexels Krag," in Norsk biografisk leksikon, VII (1936), 624-627; A. H. Winsnes, Norges litteratur fra februarrevolutionen til verdenskrigen, part 2, pp. 240-254, Vol. V (1937) of F. Bull, F. Paasche, and A. H. Winsnes, Norsk litteraturhistorie; H. Smitt Ingebreetsen, En dikter og en herre: V. Krag's liv og diktning (1942).

S. S.

Krains, Hubert (1862-1934, Belgian novelist), is almost an autodidact. Born of agricultural workers in the village of Les Waleffes (province of Hesbaye), he spent a busy life in the postal service. From 1882 to 1895, the golden age of the Jeune Belgique (see Belgian literature in French), he lived in Brussels, and the fervid literary activity of the capital awakened his genius. His first collection of stories appeared in 1891, the second in 1895. His fame rests on his subsequent works: Amours rustiques (1899), Le Pain noir (1904), Figures du pays (1908), Mes Amis (1920), and Au cœur des blés (1934). The second and last are short novels; the others, collections of tales and sketches. The intervals between publication are significant: Krains had caught Flaubert's cult of stylistic perfection and preferred silence to mediocre work. He contributed to many periodicals; a volume of essays, Portraits d'écrivains belges (1930), reveals his talent as a literary critic. He lived for 16 years in Switzerland and traveled widely on official business, but memories of his youth continued to inspire his work. Hence in fiction he chose to follow the regionalistic tradition and always dealt with the peasants of his native province. Yet nothing save the landscape is "provincial," and in it too he found a representative setting for human experience. Degrees of latitude do not change the heart, he declared.

In a striking passage of Mes Amis he names La Bruyère as his master, but if La Bruyère brought color into the austere prose of his century, Krains is sobriety itself by comparison with his friends Demolder and Eekhoud (qq.v.). His first works show occasional traces of their manners: he always shared their sympathy with the downtrodden and their contempt for the self-satisfied bourgeois. From La Bruyère he learned the secret of short, often epigrammatic phrase and of rapid characterization through salient traits rather than by detailed analysis. Then too, Belgians are born painters, and a classicist among them naturally turns to the most picturesque of the 17th-century giants. Krains's technique often recalls Maupassant (q.v.); in spite of his apparent objectivity, his choice of incident and grouping of situations reveal a deep sympathy for the wretched. He shuns the satiric trend which occasionally vitiates Maupassant's realism and observes with a poet's insight which is born of complete understanding. He is never sentimental; pathos arises from the studied objectivity of dramatic narrative. Peasants are not given to self-pity; Krains portrays them as he had known them, unconscious of the resignation they learn from nature herself. He has caught every quirk of their angular personalities which he renders with a rare harmony of vividness, sympathy, and objectivity. Acts are often violent; characters come alive by the stark portrayal of their square-headed and rancorous susceptibility. Although the dominant note is tragic, a discreet note of rugged humor offers relief. This is especially noteworthy in Mes Amis. The two pals, Colpin and Benoît, with their wives, Christine and Prudence, live before our eyes. The artist catches them at their most picturesque, and the one necessary artifice is simplicity of style.

In an essay on Eekhoud, Krains remarks that the fiery champion of outlaws lacks the sense of gradation essential to hold alert, without weariness, the reader's emotion. This feeling for architectural composition Krains possessed to an unrivaled degree. The lurid "Ame de la maison" (Amours rustiques) is an example. It recalls Flaubert's (q.v.) "Un Cœur simple" but has more warmth and intense drama, without sacrifice of objectivity. Barbe is la mater dolorosa; the torture of ever sharper pinpricks ends in irreparable disaster, leaving her in a maddened daze. Krains saw everywhere passion leading to tragedy, but of it the stuff of his art is made, and through art the springs of pity and fear are opened and man's vision widened.

See: D. Denuit, Hubert Krains (1936).

B. M. W.

Kranjčević, Silvije Strahimir (1865-1908, Croat poet), was born in Senj. His pious parents intended him for the priesthood. He studied in Rome, but turned from the Church, and moved on to Zagreb where he entered a teachers' college. He was a teacher throughout his life, mostly in Bosnia.

His first poems appeared in the reviews Hrvatska vila (Croat Fairy) and Nada (Hope) in his native Dalmatia. He began as patriotic bard, but soon became negative and pessimistic. Indeed he developed into a despairing individual, deceived by the ideas of the 19th century and inclined to withdraw into himself to brood. He is in fact representative of a certain transition from the 19th to the 20th century in Croat poetry. In the odes in a popular form called Bugarkinje (1885) and in Izabrane pjesme (1898; Selected Poems), he announced that human and social justice was a lie. Famine, slavery, and tyranny were constant phenomena; "lambs are created to feed the wolf." This conception also drove him to an unfinished satire, Efeta. He grew more and more introspective, full of doubt, convinced of the futility of all human efforts, in revolt against all he had written in earlier years. In the long dialogues of the three-part allegory Prvi grijeh (1912; First Sin), describing the pains and humiliations a man has to bear, he slowly worked himself up into a mood of cosmic rebellion which is not without dignity and poetic power.

Kranjčević's works first appeared scattered in such periodicals as Sloboda (Freedom), Balkan, Vijenac (Wreath), Novi vijek (New Era), and Sarajevska nada (Sarajevo Hope). The last-named review, Sarajevska nada, he himself directed from 1895 to 1903; under his auspices it became one of the most important literary periodicals in Croatia and Bosnia. Kranjčević came into conflict with the ruling social order in 1904, when he was promoted to school inspector. The archbishop of Sarajevo, Stadler, protested because Kranjčević was considered a free thinker by the Church. For a short while Kranjčević was excluded from teaching, but under the pressure of powerful intellectual contemporaries, he was renominated professor at the Commercial Academy in Sarajevo.

The Croat literary group Matica Hrvatska published Kranjčević's poetry under the title Trzaji i Pjesme (1908; Convulsions and Poems). The Association of Croat Poets printed after his death a selection of his writings, while the complete works were collected in 1912 by Milan Marjanović. Literary critics considered Kranjčević the foremost lyricist of his time and the model for a whole generation of Croat lyrics. His political poetry was Croat rather than Pan-Slav, but still he felt a very close affection for his South Slav brothers in Serbia.

See: A. G. Matoš, Hrvatsko pravo, 1908, Nos. 3791-3793; Ela Kranjčević, Obzor, 1909, No. 711; Miloš Savković, La Littérature yougoslave moderne (1936), pp. 162-165.

M. H.

Kraus, Karl (1874-1936, Austrian essayist, aphorist, and poet), was born in Jičín, Czechoslovakia, but lived mostly in Vienna. After a short career as a brilliant journalist and pamphleteer he was offered an important position with a leading Austrian daily, but inner scruples led him to refuse it. He saw his own intellectual and spiritual integrity as well as the public mind threatened by the corrupt pseudo-liberal press. He therefore founded his own periodical, Die Fackel (1899-1936), devoted to social and literary criticism; it was written at first largely, then entirely by himself. This review, in which most of Kraus's works first appeared, became as much admired by the younger generation as it was hated by the established representatives of the bourgeoisie. The fight against intellectual and economic corruption, carried through with devastating wit, soon took on the wider meaning of cultural criticism and grew to a confrontation of the ideal and the reality of man. The perversion of the machine from man's instrument to man's god, the enslavement of nature by commerce, the hypocritical treatment of the sexual instincts, the falsification of literary values, are Kraus's central themes. "Journalism," to Kraus a sort of Weltanschauung not confined to the newspapers, remained his chief target. Throughout the years he scathingly attacked "journalese" as the most conspicuous expression of that type of mind.

The emotional impact of the First World War on Kraus was tremendous. Remaining in Vienna, he gave running commentaries, polemic and satirical, directed against those in power who desecrated human dignity, against the unholy mixture of business and "idealism," militarism and religion. His gigantic drama Die letzten Tage der Menschheit (1918-1922), a documentary and a visionary panorama at the same time, is the supreme monument of the horror of those years. Worte in Versen, I-IX (1916-1930; Eng. tr. of selections, Poems, 1930), the embodiment of Kraus's personal experience and philosophy in lyrical, didactic, satirical verses, also began to appear during the war. Before the war Kraus's fame had already been established by two volumes of prose essays, Sittlichkeit und Kriminalität (1908) and Die chinesische Mauer (1910); to the same literary genre belong Weltgericht (1919), Untergang der Welt durch schwarze Magie (1922), and Literatur und Lüge (1929). Masterpieces of penetrating wit and precision are his books of aphorisms Sprüche und Widersprüche (1909), Pro Domo et Mundo (1912), and Nachts (1919) and his Epigramme (1927).

Among minor works in dramatic form are the parody (Literatur, 1921) of Werfel's (q.v.) Spiegelmensch, the satirical version (Wolkenkuckucksheim, 1923) of Aristophanes' Birds, and the satirical and philosophical reveries Traumstück (1923) and Traumtheater (1924). In his last book, Die Sprache (1937), Kraus discussed with his extraordinary linguistic sensitivity problems of grammar, style, poetics.

Through all his work runs the conviction of the fundamental moral and aesthetic importance of the way in which words are used; in his own style words and thoughts are inextricably interlocked. While despising the cheap pun, he has made an art of meaningful play on words, sometimes deadly serious. Literary art to Kraus resides in perfect union and mutual enrichment of form and content. This approach to literature he furthered by masterly public readings of Shakespeare, of unorthodox selections from later writers, of his own works; these readings became not only occasions of literary enjoyment, but also satirical tribunals, just as his written work was equally a moral and aesthetic undertaking, a revision of values in every respect. German polemic prose and the essay as a literary genre have won rare power and beauty through Kraus. The superabundance of verbally and factually interdependent allusions, certain mannerisms in his later writings, the revengeful suppression of his name in the press which he so persistently fought—only these have delayed his recognition as the greatest German satirist of the last 150 years.

See: L. Liegler, Karl Kraus (1921; reprinted 1933); Kraus, Poems, tr. by A. Bloch (1930), pp. 9–21; R. von Schaukal, Karl Kraus (1933).

F. H. M.

Kretzer, Max (1854–1941, German novelist and short-story writer), was born in Posen, East Prussia, the son of a prosperous restaurateur. His father's business subsequently failed, however, and the family was forced to move to Berlin, where it merged into the capital's industrial proletariat. Max, then 13, became a factory worker, later a sign painter. An accident he sustained at the age of 25 changed the course of his life, and at that time he took up writing.

Equipped with a keen sense of observation, a facile pen, and an urge to preach on social problems, Kretzer displays an intimate knowledge of Berlin's proletarian life in the 80's and 90's. His first novel, Die beiden Genossen (1880), is painted against the background of the activities of the Social Democratic Party; Die Betrogenen (1882) dwells on the evils of prostitution; Die Verkommenen (1883) describes the fate of the industrial proletariat. In contrast, Drei Weiber (1886) pictures the rottenness of high Berlin society. Meister Timpe (1888), Kretzer's most characteristic novel, traces the history of a family of artisans from economic security to destruction. A strong religious note is struck in Die Bergpredigt (1890) and Das Gesicht Christi (1896). The other novels of Kretzer deal mostly, and far less aptly, with the life of the middle class and, while entertaining enough, have but little literary importance. This may also be said of his dramas and poems.

Whether or not Kretzer was influenced by Zola (q.v.) is a moot question. Kretzer himself denied it. On the other hand, Kretzer's role as a pioneer of the German naturalistic novel was early recognized by his contemporaries, by Bleibtreu, Conradi, Holz and Schlaf, Gerhart Hauptmann (qq.v.), and others. In Kretzer's early naturalistic novels these young writers for the first time found recorded in minute detail the pressing social problems of their day.

It has been conservatively estimated that, by 1928, more than a million copies of Kretzer's works had reached the public. A perusal of catalogues of German publishers from 1928 to 1941 listing numerous reprints of Kretzer's novels would seem to indicate that his reputation as a "Volksschriftsteller" has not waned.

See: G. Keil, Max Kretzer; a Study in German Naturalism (1928); H. May, Max Kretzers Romanschaffen (1931).

G. K.

Krleža, Miroslav (1893–, Croat novelist, poet, and dramatist), was born in Zagreb. He came of a family of civil servants. His father intended to make him a soldier and placed him in a military school in Hungary where he met a military clique which closely resembled the degenerate Croat bureaucracy of his home town. This experience left a mark on most of his writing. His first inspirations were foreign (especially Nietzsche and Marinetti, qq.v.), as is seen in "Zaratustra," published in the review Savremenik (Contemporary Review) in 1914, but the truer Krleža was to represent a revolt against the Hapsburgism of the "loyal" Croat bourgeoisie and later against the reactionary ruling classes in general. In 1919 he started a literary review, Plamen (Flame), where many of his poems were published; his work was discussed with great interest by the younger reading public. His three volumes of poems, Pjesme (1919; Poems), showed Krleža abandoning Nietzschean ideas of a "superman" for a philosophy of collective humanity. He fought for the rights of his collective man in Plamen and in that review's successor, Književna republika (1924; Literary Republic). After the First World War, Krleža created a new literary school in Croatia with his Hrvatska rapsodija (1918; Croat Rhapsody).

His first novel, Tri kavalira G-djice Melanije (1920; Three Suitors of Miss Melania), definitely established him as a writer. In the suitors of this novel he interestingly described three members of contemporary Croat society: a mediocre lawyer, an artist dedicated to "art for art's sake" and remote from life, a revolutionary student whose influence becomes fatal to Melania. Krleža's cynicism was the reflection of a new mood among the young Yugoslavs. He wrote partly in the ekavski language form, which was currently used for the Serb literature from Belgrade, thus showing his broad-mindedness in the quarrel over the dialects of young Yugoslavia. Other novels, Magyar királyi honvéd (1921; Royal Hungarian Soldier), Hrvatski bog Mars (1922; The Croat God Mars), etc., followed, most of them depicting the world of 1914–1918, which was likewise the world of Jaroslav Hašek's (q.v.) famous Švejk. But unlike his Czech contemporary, Krleža was bitter and accusing; his officers were guilty fools, and his privates were sheep intended for the slaughterhouse. There is also a whole cycle of novels in which Krleža describes the decadence of the middle class in the post-war period. He created for certain stories a character named Klamfer who is spokesman for the author's views. With novels like Vražji Otok (1924; Devil's Island) and Banket u Blitvi (Banquet in Blitva) he became the most widely read novelist after the war, and, along with the earlier writer of historical novels, August Šenoa, the most widely read author in Croatia.

Up to 1917 the Zagreb theatre had received six dramas from Krleža and refused them all. In 1920 his drama Galicija (Galicia) was accepted, but—evidence of how society feared the revolutionary socialist—it was taken off the bill the very day of its opening. Yet Krleža proved too powerful a dramatist to be kept away permanently from the stage. Golgota (1922; Golgotha) was a great success. It was mass drama in a shipyard, indeed a great theatrical experiment with mass movement. In the following years Krleža produced one successful drama after another. Already by 1921 he was an undisputed leader in dramatic artistry. Agonija has been constantly played on the Yugoslav stage since its first appearance (1928) and frequently abroad. It is a two-act masterpiece; Act I presents the agony of a former officer who commits suicide because of the loss of ideals he had been taught to believe in; Act II is the agony of the officer's wife, who had stood by her husband but loved another man who proved in the face of disaster to be unworthy and a social coward. Krleža scored another success with the drama Glembajevi (1931; The Glembays), another Ibsen-like vivisection of the higher middle-class (see Ibsen).

Then for a short time Krleža's talent seemed to be in eclipse, and certain quarrels made him unpopular among many former admirers. But two other major works appeared in the midst of the political crisis that preceded the Second World War. Petar Križanić (1934) is a historical novel about the first Croat Pan-Slav. Petrica Kerempuh (1936) is about the Croat equivalent of Till Eulenspiegel; Krleža turned to the popular fool in order to compose a satire on society at the verge of Hitler's war. This second book is written in the medieval Croat kajkavski language and is a masterpiece in form and style; it was never officially on sale because the dictatorial regime in Yugoslavia tried to suppress it. Even so, at about the same time the collective works of Krleža were being published, and the public subscribed in advance to a record number of sets. The invasion of Yugoslavia caught Krleža off guard. He was repeatedly reported dead. After the liberation of Zagreb he turned up sick, broken, but still alive to mourn the heroic death of many of his pupils.

See: W. Giusti, "Miroslav Krleža," Rivista di letteratura slave, III (1928), 163–175; W. Giusti, "Miroslav Krleža," Europe Centrale, June, 1928; R. Varnier, "Agonija," Europe Centrale, June, 1928.

M. H.

Kropotkin, Peter Alekseyevich, Prince (1842–1921, Russian sociologist, scientist, and revolutionary), was born in Moscow, the son of an officer of the Guards, wealthy and of noble birth. His mother died when he was three. His father's remarriage and futile and despotic character account for the boy's hostility toward him. Kropotkin received an excellent education, first at home, then at the Corps of Pages in St. Petersburg. The radical ideas of the time found their way into this institution, aristocratic and exclusive as it was; their influence made more articulate what in Kropotkin's childhood had been a purely emotional protest against the condition of the serfs. Graduating in 1862, he declined to serve with the Guards, joined instead the Amur

Cossacks, and spent five years in the wilderness of Eastern Siberia as administrator and explorer. In 1867 he returned to St. Petersburg, entered the university to study mathematics, and began his famous work on the surface structure of northern Asia. Soon he was made secretary of the section of physical geography of the Russian Geographical Society which in 1871 sent him to explore glacial deposits in Finland and Sweden. The frenzy of political reaction he found upon his return to the capital dissipated what faith he had in "reforms from above," while his Siberian experience in administration led him to consider all forms of authority based on coercion—and especially centralized government—as an impediment to progress. During a visit to Switzerland in 1872, he established a close and lasting connection with the Jura Federation, of anarchist tendencies. Returning to St. Petersburg, he joined a secret political organization and in 1874 was arrested and incarcerated in St. Peter and Paul's fortress. After more than two years of solitary confinement, he was transferred to a military hospital. This made possible his escape. He went to England; then to Switzerland, whence he was expelled; to France, where he was imprisoned for three years (1883–1886); and finally back to England. He returned to Russia in 1917 and died in his native town.

Kropotkin's creed of anarchist communism derives from his passionate repudiation of oppression in all its forms. In his numerous books—he wrote in French and in English—such as Paroles d'un révolté (1885), La Conquête du pain (1892; Eng. tr., The Conquest of Bread, 1906), Fields, Factories, and Workshops (1899), he advocates the abolition not only of capitalism, but also of all governmental authority. He rejected even a transitory dictatorship by the working class, seeing the aim of the revolution not in the seizure, but in the destruction of government. This, he believed, would be immediately followed by the birth of a new society with changing forms of free cooperative associations and federations. This future society would be based on the principle of mutual aid, as universal in social behavior as the struggle for life; it would make full use of science and technology to increase production and thus to satisfy the needs of all.

In Memoirs of a Revolutionist (1899) Kropotkin tells the story of his eventful life. In 1901 he visited the United States and delivered a series of lectures later published as Russian Literature (1905).

See: G. V. Plechanoff, Anarchism and Social- ism (1895); E. V. Zenker, Anarchism (1897); J. F. Hecker, Russian Sociology (1915); Roger Baldwin, ed., Kropotkin's Revolutionary Pamphlets (1927).

L. S.

Kruczkowski, Leon (1900–, Polish novelist), a native of Cracow, was the leading "Marxist revisionist of the Polish historical tradition" to express himself through the novel in Free Poland. In 1932 he entered the literary scene with the controversial Kordjan i cham (Lord and Churl), a fictional reworking of the celebrated memoir of the peasant Deczyński written at the time of the 1830 uprising. Following this work, which set forth the irreconcilable conflict of interests between landlord and serf, Kruczkowski went on to sketch a portrait of the Galician village on the eve of the First World War in the episodic Pawie pióra (1935; Peacock Feathers). Later, in Sidla (1937; Snares), Kruczkowski essayed rather unsuccessfully a psychological portraiture of the unemployed in Poland.

See: reviews in Wiadomości literackie, 1935, Nos. 13, 15, and 1937, No. 41; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 623–628.

A. P. C.

Krusenstjerna, Agnes von (1894–1940, Swedish novelist), born in Växjö, is one of the most controversial figures in modern Swedish literature. Born into an old aristocratic Swedish family which on the mother's side had developed serious pathological complications, she spent her childhood and earliest young womanhood in a more or less futile attempt to break the bonds that held her captive in a spiritually sterile and physically and mentally half-degenerate high society. She finally succeeded as a young woman in effecting a complete outward break with this group; but the mark of heredity and early environment was left upon her, and she apparently never succeeded in finding any solid positive values in life outside the class in which she was born, though her marriage with the sensitive critic and translator David Sprengel seems to have been a very happy one. She became in consequence of her break with her own class a tragically isolated figure, particularly after the controversy in the late 1920's and the 1930's of which she was the storm center. This controversy arose out of the bitter attacks upon her work by certain self-appointed "guardians of Swedish morals," who singled out her work as the most patently "immoral" among a group of younger literary figures of the day.

Agnes von Krusenstjerna's novels were especially apt to arouse popular, bigoted "moralists," because these novels focused their attention with such persistent minuteness upon elements of degeneration in a fast disappearing Swedish social class, the lower nobility. Though the attack upon her did not seriously affect the amount of her literary productivity, it did leave its mark upon the tone of her work, which became with the years increasingly dark, hopeless, and brooding, not without a touch of bitterness.

Her total production includes, in addition to her novels, several volumes of short stories and one volume of verse; but she will be remembered in Swedish literature primarily for three long novels, the trilogy under the collective title Tonyböckerna (1922-1924; The Tony Books) and two long family-chronicle novels, Fröknarna von Pahlen (7 vols., 1930-1934; The Ladies von Pahlen) and Viveka von Lagercronas historia (4 vols., 1935-1938; The Story of Viveka von Lagercrona). Of these three novels Tonyböckerna is perhaps the best, chiefly because it avoids the confusing multiplicity of characters and the too great preoccupation with matters of mere outward detail that are typical of the two family-chronicle novels. All of Agnes von Krusenstjerna's novels are more or less concerned with manifestations of perversion and semiperversion in the aimless pattern of existence followed by the Swedish aristocracy as she had come to know it in her early years. But she manages usually to avoid a completely morbid effect (except, perhaps, in Fröknarna von Pahlen) by her profound understanding of and sympathy for the sensitive, idealistic, dream-loving youth of aristocratic origins who attempt so desperately to realize their ideals in a partly callous, largely degenerate outward environment. Her marvelously sensitive depiction of the childhood and budding puberty of the hapless Tony in Tonyböckerna is unique among Swedish novels which deal centrally with crucial phases of the inner life of girlhood and young womanhood. In the matter of style Agnes von Krusenstjerna is nearly always impeccable, one of the great masters of modern Swedish prose. Her sudden death in 1940, the victim of an implacable hereditary disease, suggests something of the terrible reality for herself which the central theme in her novels, degenerate heredity, had.

See: Hagar Olsson, "Agnes von Krusenstjerna," Bonniers litterära magasin, VI (1937), 515-526; Stig Ahlgren, Krusenstjerna studier (1940).

A. G.

Kuncewiczowa, Marja (née Szczepańska, 1897-, Polish novelist), was born in Samara on the middle Volga, the descendant of a Polish legionary who had fled to Santo Domingo after the 1863 uprising. With the admirable Cudzoziemka (1935; Eng. tr., The Stranger, 1943), a convincing psychological study of a Polish woman reared in Russia and later transplanted to Poland who feels herself foreign in both countries, Kuncewiczowa represents the trend towards the psychological novel which was quite marked in Free Poland. Dividing her time between Warsaw and the quaint Kazimierz-on-the-Vistula, Kuncewiczowa set forth the peculiar life of the former in Dziłans warszawski (1935; Warsaw Diligence) and represented the latter, with its contrasting populations, artistic and peasant, in the novel Dwa księżycy (1933; Two Moons). During the Second World War, Kuncewiczowa served as president of the Polish P.E.N. Club in England.

See: K. Czachowski, Najnowsza twórczość literacka (1938), pp. 40-43; review of Cudzoziemka in Wiadomości literackie, 1936, No. 4, and in Skamander, February, 1936.

A. P. C.

Kuprin, Alexander Ivanovich (1870-1938, Russian short-story writer and novelist), born in Narovchat, Penza, was perhaps the last of the traditional realists and one of the few pre-revolutionary writers of established reputation to continue in exile their literary productivity in characteristic and undebilitated form. Educated in the Cadet School and the Military School of Moscow, he was commissioned lieutenant (1890), but resigned (1894) to devote himself to writing. For some years he led a vagabond life as dock worker, hunter, fisherman, agronomist, choir singer, actor, and journalist. He entered literature as one of the Znaniye ("knowledge") group led by Gorky, who headed the publishing house of that name. Kuprin's first stories (Moloch, 1896), about factory life, and others, chiefly about army officers, made a considerable impression. Fame came with his novel Poyedinok (1905; Eng. tr., The Duel, 1916), an ironic portrayal of the stupidity and brutality of the military caste and the first uncensored work of that genre. It coincided with the wave of national protest following the Japanese War and was more widely read than Tolstoy's Resurrection. Objective and nonpolitical, it excels in characterization and narrative structure.

There followed a long and diverse series of tales and novels, some superlatively wrought, others inferior. Two of the best short stories of their time are Shtabs-Kapitan Rybnikov (1906; Eng. tr., "Captain Ribnikov," in The River of Life and Other Stories, 1916), a wonderfully told episode of a Japanese spy in St. Petersburg, and Granatovyi braslet (1911; Eng. tr., title story in The Bracelet of Garnets and Other Stories, 1917), about the love of a poor clerk for a society lady. Sulamif (1908; Eng. tr., Sulamith, 1923), a reworking of the Song of Songs, and Yama (1912; Eng. tr., Yama: The Pit, 1922), a journalistic picture of prostitution in Odessa, at first sensationally successful are now dated and neglected. Kuprin's works have been widely translated; many of his short stories appear in anthologies as examples of finished craftsmanship. English collections of his finest tales are The River of Life and The Bracelet of Garnets, already mentioned, A Slav Soul and Other Stories (1916), and Sasha (1920). His collected works were published in Berlin (1921) in 12 volumes. After the Revolution, Kuprin emigrated to Paris, where he published Novye povesti i razskazy (1927; New Stories and Tales), Razskazy dlya detei (1927; Tales for Children), and three short novels, Koleso vremeni (1930; The Wheel of Time), Zhaneta (1932-1933; Jeannette), both romantic stories of Russian émigrés in France, and Yunkera (1933; The Junkers), a masterly and charming reminiscence of cadet life in old Russia—all in his best vein. In 1937, ill and homesick, Kuprin returned to Russia, where he was given an elaborate welcome. Fourteen months later, in complete obscurity, he died of cancer.

Kuprin's benevolent, genial personality won him friends among all sorts of people, a trait reflected in the rich diversity of his subject matter. Though his materials and methods are substantially those of his great predecessors, Tolstoy, Chekhov, and Gorky (q.v.), he differs from his contemporaries in his affinity for the story of action, in which he was influenced by Jack London and Kipling. A portrayer, not a theorist, he is never political or metaphysical. Vigorous, prolific, uneven, by his excellences he makes one forget his shortcomings. At his best he is a first-rate narrator with a superlative gift of observation and a strong feeling for the lyrical, colorful elements of everyday existence.

See: Charles Ledré, Trois Romanciers russes (1935); Ivan Bunin, "Perechityvaya Kuprina," Sovremennyya zapiski, LXVII (1938), 308-324.
N. S.

Kurz, Isolde (1853-, German poet and short-story writer), was born in Stuttgart, daughter of the Swabian novelist Hermann Kurz, who numbered Paul Heyse (q.v.) and Eduard Mörike among his friends. Her mother, daringly liberal in her political as well as pedagogical views, instructed her at home and awakened in the child a lifelong love for the masterworks of literature, ancient and modern. After her father's sudden death in 1873, Isolde Kurz began earning her own living. She went to Munich, gave language lessons, and wrote her first short story, which met with considerable success but was sharply criticized on moral grounds by Paul Heyse, a fact which opened her eyes to his artistic limitations. Her conception of art was, in spite of youthful sentimentality and hero worship, fundamentally opposed to Heyse's idealized world. "Life's most beautiful flowers grow by the edge of an abyss," she wrote in Aus meinem Jugendland (1922). In 1877 she followed her mother and her brothers to Florence, drawn by a vision of the sea, to her a symbol of freedom. From then on the greater part of her life was spent in Italy until the outbreak of the First World War, when she returned to Munich. Italy became her main source of poetic inspiration. The themes of most of her short stories indicate the Italian subject matter (Florentiner Novellen, 1890, Eng. tr., Tales of Florence, 1919; Italienische Novellen, 1895; Nächte von Fondi, 1922). Like C. F. Meyer (q.v.) she was attracted by the Italian Renaissance, by the passion and drama of Southern lives, and, like him, she strove to tell about them with conscious, calm detachment. Deeply sensitive to the importance of form, she worked slowly and painstakingly to perfect composition and style, sometimes impairing the warmth and vitality of her writings. Her late novel Vanadis (1931) has been linked to the great German tradition of the Bildungsroman. Her poems (Gedichte, 1899; Neue Gedichte, 1905) tend towards excessive reflection, but are outstanding among German Frauenlyrik through their straightforward, unsentimental approach to emotions and thoughts. In this respect Isolde Kurz has often been compared to Ricarda Huch (q.v.) who is the greater writer but possesses less charm and seems less spontaneous.

See: P. Fechter, Geschichte der deutschen Literatur, III (1938), 363-366.

E. M. F.

Kvaran, Einar Hjörleifsson (1859-1938, Icelandic novelist, dramatist and poet), was born at Vallanes in East Iceland, the son of a pastor. He went to study political economy in Copenhagen, but instead he joined the Brandes (q.v.) realists among his compatriots and edited (1882) the periodical Verðandi (The Present), to which he contributed a rebellious short story. In 1885 Kvaran went to Winnipeg, Canada, where he became an editor of an Icelandic weekly and, in general, a leader of his compatriots. In 1895 he returned to Iceland, there to work as a journalist and political leader until 1906, when he was awarded a governmental grant to devote himself to literature.

The years in Winnipeg mellowed Kvaran's realistic outlook to such an extent that on his return to Iceland he was ready to preach a liberal Christian humanitarianism and to experiment with spiritualism, apostle of which he soon became. Strongly opposed at first, he and his followers gradually won the day; they still have a considerable following, in spite of attacks from the neo-romanticists (Nordal, 1925) and the communists (Laxness, 1936).

Vonir (1888; Hopes) is the first of a long series of short stories, in which Kvaran is at his best. He is especially fine when he writes about individuals least favored in life, a preferred subject with him. These stories are published in the collections Vestan hafs og austan (1901; West and East of the Ocean), Smælingjar (1908; The Insignificant), and Frá ýmsum hliðum (1913; From Various Viewpoints). In the novels Ofurefli (1908; The Unconquerable) and Gull (1911; Gold), Kvaran describes the impact of new ideas (the "new" theology) on society in Reykjavík. His later novels, Sálin vaknar (1916; The Soul Awakens), Sambýli (1918; House-mates), Sögur Rannveigar (2 vols., 1919-1922; Rannveig's Stories), and Gæfumaður (1933; The Fortunate Man), speak eloquently of his humane understanding and breathe the optimism of the convinced spiritualist. Two plays, Lénharður fógæti (1913; Eng. tr., "Governor Lenhard," Poet Lore, XLIII, 3-55) and Syndir annara (1915; The Sins of Others), are partly inspired by the Icelandic struggle for independence, but in Hallsteinn og Dóra (1931; Hallsteinn and Dora) the background is spiritualistic. Kvaran has also left a slim volume of poems, thoughtful, melancholy, composed early in life.

As no one else Kvaran represents the optimistic bourgeoisie before the First World War. His style is classical—pure, smooth, often argumentative and tinged with humor or irony. But it is somewhat lacking in vigor, color, and manliness.

See: S. Nordal, "Undir straumhvörf," Skirnir, XCIX (1925), 131-149; R. Beck, "Einar H. Kvaran, an Icelandic Novelist and Dramatist," Poet Lore, XLIII (1936-1937), 56-63; S. Einarsson, "Þættir af Einari H. Kvaran," Eimreiðin, XLIII (1937), 145-160, 287-306, XLIV (1938), 8-16, 178-180, 307-324.

S. E.

L

Lacretelle, Jacques de (1888-, French novelist), was born at Château de Cormatin in Burgundy, of a family already famous in French literature. His great uncle entered the French Academy in 1811; his grandfather, poet and novelist, was also a political figure and a friend of Lamartine. Jacques de Lacretelle studied at the Lycée Janson under André Bellessort, who subjected his romantic tendencies to strong classical disciplines. During a stay at Cambridge he acquainted himself with English literature, and in 1920 La Vie inquiète de Jean Hermelin was published. This subjective novel was followed in 1922 by Silbermann, the objective story of a Jewish boy in conflict with his classmates. La Bonifas (1925) deals with a case of abnormal psychology and definitely placed the author among the best French realists. Le Retour de Silbermann (1939) was originally part of Amour nuptial (1939), a study of conjugal misunderstanding somewhat similar to André Gide's L'Immoraliste. In 1932 was begun the publication of Les Hauts-Ponts, a novel in four volumes (Sabine, 1932; Les Fiançailles, 1933; Années d'espérance, 1934; La Monnaie de plomb, 1935) based on the passionate attachment of a woman for her family estate.

Lacretelle shows a predilection for lonely characters. He probes into their souls with a fearless interest. His minute analysis and his sense of restraint and proportion make him a true descendant of the 17th-century moralists. Besides his novels he has written short stories (Quatre Nouvelles italiennes, 1928; L'Ame cachée, 1928), essays (Lettres espagnoles, 1926; Aparté, 1927; Le Demi-Dieu, 1931; Les Aveux étudiés, 1934; L'Ecrivain public, 1936; Croisières en eaux troubles, 1939; L'Heure qui change, 1941; Libérations, 1945), and translations (Sarn by Mary Webb, in collaboration with Mme Guéritte; La Renarde by Mary Webb, with Mlle Canavaggia; Haute Plainte by Emily Brontë, with Yolande de Lacretelle). Lacretelle became a member of the French Academy in 1938.

See: A. Beaunier, "Un Romancier: M. Jacques de Lacretelle," Revue des deux

mondes, August 1, 1925, pp. 698-709; R. Bourget-Pailleron, "La Nouvelle Equipe," Revue des deux mondes, November 15, 1933, pp. 358-362; A. Hermant, Réponse au discours de réception de Jacques de Lacretelle à l'Académie Française (1938); A. Maurois, preface to Lacretelle, Morceaux choisis (1938); F. Guirand, "Lacretelle," Larousse mensuel, April, 1938, p. 84.

M. E. C.

Laforgue, Jules (1860-1887, French poet and prose writer), was born in Montevideo, Uruguay, of French parentage. His father was a teacher. At the age of six he went to France with his family and lived in Tarbes, a small town at the foot of the Pyrenees, where he attended the lycée (1869-1876). There he began to suffer from a disease which never left him—boredom. In 1876 his family moved to Paris, but sometime afterward left him there, first with his sister and then completely alone. He had secured a post as secretary to the director of the Gazette des beaux-arts, Ephrussi. That period of solitude in Paris had a great influence on Laforgue's later development. He spent it in a state of sentimental and intellectual exaltation and of physical asceticism. He discovered poetry and philosophy (Schopenhauer was then in vogue). He read furiously: "Two years of solitude in libraries, without love, without friends, the fear of death. Nights spent in meditation in an atmosphere like that of Mount Sinai." He wrote verse and prose; Le Sanglot de la terre, a philosophical poem published after his death (in the Œuvres complètes, 1903), was composed in this period. Although he was shy and retiring, he made certain friends—Paul Bourget (q.v.), Charles Henry, Gustave Kahn (q.v.), and a woman poet, Sandah Mahali.

The efforts of Ephrussi gained him the post of reader to the Empress Augusta of Germany, and for five years (1881-1886) Laforgue followed her court wherever she went; Berlin, Potsdam, Baden Baden, and Homburg became the backgrounds of his boredom. Short but frequent trips to Paris alone seemed to sustain his courage. While in Germany he wrote the Complaintes (1885) and most of the later published Moralités légendaires. His method of writing is revealed by his notebooks (some published among his posthumous works and in the Nouvelle Revue française, October, 1920, some still unpublished). His technique in literature is similar to that of the impressionist painters in painting. He was anxious to note the exact and most ephemeral touches of the outside world as well as their immediate repercussions upon his soul. Looking out of an express-train window or watching boats going down the Rhine, he jotted down sentences which he used later in his prose or his poems. The love of a woman, which in Paris had remained in the realm of his dreams, entered his life in Germany. A rather stormy love affair with a person designated in his notebooks by the letter R reached its climax in 1883. It left Laforgue expecting more from life, but he was hardly more mature emotionally. Later when, looking for an English teacher in Berlin, he met Miss Leah Lee, a slender, red-haired English girl, it was love at first sight. In September, 1886, he became engaged to her, resigned his post at the court, and went to Paris to make a living by writing. His Complaintes had already won him a certain fame. In January, 1887, he went to London to marry Miss Lee and then settled down with his wife in a small apartment in Paris where he expected to find the happiness he had waited for so long. Instead he found poverty, sickness, and finally, the following summer, death. A cold, caught in London and neglected, had developed into tuberculosis. His wife died a few months later.

Before his death Laforgue had finished the manuscript of Moralités légendaires (most of which had earlier appeared in the periodical Vogue), but he had been unable to find a publisher. The book appeared posthumously, November, 1887. Two slender books of verses, L'imitation de Notre-Dame la Lune (1886) and Le Concile féerique (1886), together with a few articles in symbolist periodicals, are all that were published during his life besides the Complaintes. His works appeared in 1901-1903 (3 vols.). Other papers appeared in 1920 (3 vols.). A new edition (5 vols., 1925) added some heretofore unpublished letters.

Laforgue's works should have been the preface to much greater accomplishments, but, as Rémy de Gourmont (q.v.) said, it is a preface which can almost make up for the lack of the work itself. He had one of the most original minds of any time. While he lived somewhat apart from the symbolist group, it is clearly seen today that he belongs among them. Following Corbière (q.v.), whom he discovered only late and when his manner was well formed, and Verlaine (q.v.), he completely renounced the structural principles of classical French verse and created modern free verse. No poet in France or elsewhere can afford to ignore his technical inventions. He also had a tone definitely his own, a sentimental irony which was perhaps the result of the clashing in him of intellectual maturity and emotional immaturity. Irony and verbalism are for Laforgue means of escape. His method consists of a notation of acute personal emotions against a background which evokes his epoch. The ironical treatment of both himself and his background (often his form is that of some refrain de faubourg) destroys the romantic strain. It is to be regretted that his poems seldom give the impression of having reached a state of perfection. Not so with his prose, however. Moralités légendaires, in which he retells some age-old stories—Perseus and Andromeda, Salome, Lohengrin, Hamlet—lending his characters the psychology of his contemporaries, shows him to be obsessed by Flaubert (q.v.). The result is writing which equals the best of the French prose tradition and at the same time deliberately ridicules and attacks that tradition.

The influence of Laforgue on French poets of the next generation, Apollinaire, Salmon (qq.v.), et al., and even on recent or contemporary groups like the surrealists, cannot be contested. In America his influence on T. S. Eliot and Ezra Pound, among others, is generally admitted.

See: F. Ruchon, Jules Laforgue (1924).

I. W.

Lagerkvist, Pär (1891–, Swedish lyric poet, dramatist, and short-story writer), born in Växjö, was the most arresting figure to appear on the literary scene in Sweden during the First World War, and his early work particularly reflects in both its form and content the half-desperate psychology of a serious, hypersensitive, and brutally frank war generation. Though his later efforts are more mature and satisfying, his work on the whole is characterized by a profound sense of continuity in its development, from his first startling visionary poems down through his late quietly expressionistic dramas. For some years the violently expressionistic form of his poems and early plays (based consciously upon contemporary trends in French painting, naïvism, cubism, and Fauvism, in addition to earlier expressionistic forms, especially those of the religious dramas of Strindberg, q.v.) marked him as an exclusive poet, to be read only by the initiated, and served to obscure the high seriousness of his message. But with time his youthful formalistic excesses gave way to a simpler, more concrete, and highly concentrated art, only in part related to expressionism; and at the same time the brutal pessimism of his earlier conception of life gradually yielded to a new, highly individual religious position, in which he comes, obviously after a severe inner struggle, to the conclusion that "good shall at the last triumph, for it is the greatest and the strongest power, however terrifying the world may seem to be."

The development of Lagerkvist's thought, the outlines of which are only partially clear in the volumes of his poetry (from Motiv, 1914, Motifs, through Hjärtats sånger, 1926, Songs of the Heart) and in his seven plays to date, is given a more precise confessional form in two central autobiographical documents, Gäst hos verkligheten (1925; A Guest in the Actual World) and Det besegrade livet (1927; Life Conquered). These two volumes express Lagerkvist's final undying faith in the imperishable spirit of man, which against all the fearful odds man faces in his struggle for existence will ultimately triumph. Of recent years Lagerkvist has brought the focus of his art to bear more and more directly upon the modern social and political scene, becoming in the 1930's, particularly in his fiction and his drama, the most eloquent and rigidly uncompromising critic of totalitarianism as a social and political philosophy. He proposes in place of the brutal pretentiousness of totalitarian ideas a kind of heroic humanitarian idealism in which the imperishable human spirit can find its finest and most permanent social and political expression. These ideas are developed most sharply in the sensational short novel Bödeln (1934; The Hangman), which has been successfully dramatized, and in the two powerful plays Mannen utan själ (1936; The Man without a Soul) and Seger i mörkret (1939; Victory in Darkness). Both in technique and themes as a dramatist Lagerkvist is the inspired disciple of the later Strindberg, the Strindberg of the expressionistic plays. In 1940 Lagerkvist was elected to the Swedish Academy, to occupy the chair vacated upon the death of Verner von Heidenstam (q.v.), the last of that group of literary figures who created the great literature of the Swedish 1890's.

See: G. M. Bergman, Pär Lagerkvists dramatik (1928); K. Strömberg, Modern svensk litteratur (1932), pp. 202–211; G. Fredén, Pär Lagerkvist (1934); R. Ljungdahl, "Pär Lagerkvist: från 'Ångest' och 'Kaos' till 'Bödeln' och 'Den knutna näven,'" Finsk tidskrift, CXVIII (1935), 336–342; H. Ahlenius, "The Dramatic Works of Pär Lagerkvist," American-Scandinavian Review, XXVIII (1940), 301–308.

A. G.

Lagerlöf, Selma (1858–1940, Swedish novelist), is incomparably Sweden's greatest storyteller. She was born on the old farmstead

Mårbacka in Värmland, the province with which most of her best fiction is intimately associated and where she lived the greater part of her outwardly uneventful life. She never married. Her first novel, Gösta Berlings saga (1891; Eng. tr., 1898), was a fascinatingly original retelling of old Värmland folk legends in an effusive, personal, spontaneously lyric prose, a style in marked contrast to the prevailing fiction of the day in Sweden. The style was suggested by a reading of Carlyle. A number of less important tales appeared from Selma Lagerlöf's pen during the 90's; but it was not until the turn of the century, with the composition of Jerusalem (2 vols., 1901-1902; Eng. tr., 1903), that she wrote anything comparable in importance to Gösta Berlings saga. In the years that followed she produced steadily (except during the First World War, when her pen was apparently palsied) a large number of novels and short stories (usually in the form of legends and fairy tales) and autobiographical sketches of all kinds. This mass of work was of rather unequal quality on the whole, the most important perhaps being the delightful pedagogical fantasy Nils Holgerssons underbara resa genom Sverige (1906-1907; Eng. tr., The Wonderful Adventures of Nils, 1907) and the three charmingly modest volumes of Värmland memories from her childhood under the collective title Mårbacka (1922-1932; Eng. tr., Mårbacka, 1924; Memoirs of My Childhood, 1934; The Diary of Selma Lagerlöf, 1936). Her last effort to write extended fiction—the trilogy about Charlotte Löwensköld—reveals a distinct falling off in creative power.

It is impossible to explain Selma Lagerlöf's undeniable eminence as a narrator except by insisting upon the direct, primitive sources of her art. Her best novels and tales spring directly from the Swedish soil, are part and parcel of the Swedish countryside. She had listened breathlessly as a child (and, for that matter, in the years of her maturity) to the whole variegated congeries of tales current on the Värmland countryside; and she has retold these tales with the same breathless naïveté with which she had first listened to them. Her art, in consequence, is scarcely creative in the usual sense. She may be called a creative listener—permitting her fancy, meanwhile, to dance and riot freely in the old folk materials related to her, until out of them come such brilliant tales as Gösta Berlings saga and Jerusalem. Such novels are probably among the closest approach to genuine folk epics that we have in modern literature. Selma Lagerlöf may thus be looked upon primarily as the infinitely skillful modern medium by which ancient and latter-day Swedish folk tales are brought to the present-day reader. In the naturalness and spontaneity with which she realizes this ideal in fiction she is perhaps unique in contemporary literature. Her conception of life is as naïve as is her art, but less satisfactory to the modern mind. Her characters are frequently oversimplified, as is her view of the forces that govern human life. There is no more insistent optimist among Scandinavian authors than Selma Lagerlöf. The First World War seemed momentarily to shake her faith in the power that goodness ultimately wields over evil on the human scene; but her latest work yields not an iota to the simple childlike optimism of her first novels and tales. There is, in a word, no intellectual development in Selma Lagerlöf's work; but perhaps one should not ask for this (or even wish it) in a narrative genius which could scarcely have come into its own unique and priceless being had it permitted itself to become dominated by what she has, not without irony, referred to in Gösta Berlings saga as "the spirit of the age."

See: Johan Mortensen, Selma Lagerlöf (1908); W. A. Berendsohn, Selma Lagerlöf (1927, in German; Eng. tr., abridged, 1931); Stella Arvidson, Selma Lagerlöf (1932); H. A. Larsen, Selma Lagerlöf (1936, in English); Alrik Gustafson, Six Scandinavian Novelists (1940).

A. G.

Lalou, René (1889-, French critic), was born at Boulogne-sur-Mer and educated in Calais and Paris and at the University of Lille. Before the First World War, in which he served, he taught at the Manchester Grammar School and at the Lycée of Oran; after the war he held a number of lycée appointments, the last being in Paris at the Lycée Henri IV. During this period he wrote several novels, of which only one has been published, Le Chef (1923), and his Histoire de la littérature française contemporaine (1922, enlarged ed., Vol. I, 1941, Vol. II, 1940; Eng. tr., Contemporary French Literature, 1924). This handbook, beginning in 1870 with a backward glance at the great romantics and extending in the most recent edition to the Second World War, provides the general public with a useful synthesis, impartial and unprejudiced. Lalou has said that he hopes his criticism can be read with the interest with which one reads a novel, and his infectious enthusiasm for literature, combined with a gift for clear statement and for keeping the main lines of development apparent through a multitude of details, has made that hope more or less a reality. A volume of critical essays, Défense de l'homme (1926), a study of Sainte-Beuve, Bertrand, Gérard de Nerval, and Baudelaire (q.v.) entitled Vers une alchimie lyrique (1927), and a history of modern English literature, Panorama de la littérature anglaise contemporaine (1927), have widened his range. His work has been marked in general by a tendency to take a middle ground, not because he hesitates to speak out strongly, but because such a position is natural to his somewhat skeptical intelligence.

See: John Charpentier, "René Lalou," Mercurie de France, CCXXIV (1930), 343-345.

C. W., Jr.

Landau, Mark Aleksandrovich, see Aldanov, Mark Aleksandrovich.

Langer, František (1888-, Czech playwright and novelist), is, next to Karel Čapek (q.v.), the most successful Czech dramatist of recent years. He was born in Prague, of Jewish parentage, and became a doctor. In 1916 he was taken prisoner by the Russians, but joined the Czechoslovak legions and took part in their crossing of Siberia as a member of the medical corps. After the First World War he served in the medical corps of the Czechoslovak army, becoming a colonel. In 1939 he succeeded in escaping to England. Before the First World War, Langer wrote a collection of short stories, Zlatá Venuše (1910; The Golden Venus), which attracted some attention because of the exquisite sense of form combined with a rather crude sensualism. His plays Svatý Václav (1912; St. Wenceslaus) and Miliony (performed 1915, printed 1921; Millions) were unsuccessful, though they were both skillfully constructed.

The war changed Langer's outlook completely: he forgot his early aestheticism and neoclassicism and discovered ordinary man and his moral problems. Velbloud uchem jehly (1923; Eng. tr., The Camel through the Needle's Eye, 1929), his greatest success on the stage, was received with acclaim at home and also in Austria, Germany, and New York. It is clever comedy in praise of victorious robust health and ordinary common sense. Periferie (1925; The Outskirts), which followed, is drama on the verge of tragedy; in a technique which imitates that of moving pictures Langer tells the story of a murderer who vainly tries to get convicted by the court. Since these two very effective plays, Langer has descended to farces and sentimental dramas of little value: Grand Hotel Nevada (1927—this is the original Czech title) is a satire on the absurdities of rich people, Obrácení Ferdy Pištory (1929; The Conversion of Ferda Pištora) presents a rogue from the slums who is converted against his will, and Andělé mezi námi (1931; Angels in Our Midst) is a sentimental discussion of euthanasia. Only Jízdní hlídka (1935; The Cavalry Watch) represents a new advance. The play is drawn from Langer's experiences as a legionnaire in Siberia and attempts, with some success, a tragedy of collective heroism. Dvaasedmdesátka (1937; No. 72) is, like Periferie, an interesting reconstruction of a crime, with the technique of a play within a play used to good effect. Langer's later prose is not important; a collection of short stories from Siberia, Železný vlk (1920; The Iron Wolf), shows his usual constructive skill, but the attempts at humorous sketches and a novel, Zázrak v rodině (1929; The Miracle in the Family), are failures.

Langer has great talent, spoiled by success. He has a flair for stage effects; he handles promising and ambitious themes, but he cannot avoid the pitfalls of sentimentality, easy-going optimism, and sheer triviality. In this respect his fate seems similar to that of the Magyar dramatist Molnar (q.v.), who is his nearest analogue in other literatures.

See: Pavla Buzková, "F. Langer," in České drama (1932).

R. W.

Lanson, Gustave (1857-1934, French literary historian and critic), was born in Orléans. He entered the Ecole Normale Supérieure in 1876 and, with the exception of some months spent as French tutor to the tsarevitch at the Russian court (1886), had an uninterrupted and most distinguished career as teacher and scholar. In 1887 his doctoral thesis, Nivelle de la Chaussée, was highly praised for thoroughness of research and for critical discrimination. When in the 90's it became obvious that university teaching of French literature was not up to the standard of work being done in other fields such as general history and the social sciences, Lanson was the natural choice to remedy the situation. He was appointed professor at the Sorbonne in 1900; he became director of the Ecole Normale Supérieure in 1919.

As an antagonist to easygoing, verbose ways of dealing with the literature of the past, this quiet, bespectacled little man with piercing black eyes was bound to emphasize painstaking exactness, judicious consideration, stubborn resistance to emotional subjectivity. At the same time the discipline and restraint which he constantly showed in his professional work, and even in the modulation of his voice (though he could be sharply sarcastic), probably came quite as much from a serious intensity about his scientific "mission" as from any native poise or calmness of temperament. Adversaries, indeed, accused him of a German dryness, a reproach which, as events proved, became quite fair as applied to certain of Lanson's disciples, all too ready to adopt the merely external aspects of methodical approach. But whoever has listened to Lanson's own impassioned pleas for the pure enjoyment of belles-lettres or to a declamation, in his vibrating voice, of a favorite piece of verse, whoever observed the intensity of his despair when his only son was killed in the First World War, could not imagine how lack of sensibility might ever be charged to him.

At the university he devoted his full effort to modern French "literary history," a study distinct from that form of "criticism" which necessarily includes a large element of personal taste and preference (as shown, indeed, in Lanson's own occasional contributions to the Paris newspaper, Matin). Explication de textes, study of corrected manuscripts and of changes from edition to edition, discovery of sources which either narrowed or emphasized the originality of a writer, exact knowledge of words in all their connotations at a given moment, thoroughly tested bibliographies where legends about the vogue of a writer yield to the pure truth—all this was simply method. There was a deeper quest. The individual quality in an author, which the theory of Taine (q.v.) could not "dissolve," which in the system of Brunetière (q.v.) was more of a disturbance than a confirmation, had been emphasized by Sainte-Beuve although often in only secondary figures. Lanson now tried—often with success—to explain the literary titan, as well as lesser personages, by an objective demonstration of his greatness however exceptional and of his style however original.

After numerous individual studies (e.g., Bossuet, 1890; Corneille, 1895; Voltaire, 1906; L'Art de la prose, 1908), the Histoire de la littérature française (1894; many editions, 17th ed., 1922) and its natural supplement the Manuel bibliographique de la littérature française, 1500-1900 (1909-1914; new ed., 1921) demonstrated the final importance of this untiring activity. He continued with an admirable hospitality of spirit to make revisions, mainly away from a too philosophical trend and towards more "delight" in the art of fine writing. Benefiting from further study and observation, he tempered his own decided devotion to a rational center of gravity in French literature, "will guided by reason." Leftist tendencies in politics prevented this indefatigable and widely influential scholar and interpreter of French letters from receiving the official recognition of membership in the French Academy.

See: "Bibliographie des œuvres de M. Lanson," in Mélanges d'histoire littéraire offerts à Gustave Lanson (1922).

F. B.

Lanza, Silverio (pseud. of Juan Bautista Amorós, 1856-1912, Spanish novelist), a writer today almost forgotten, was once highly esteemed in certain circles as a precursor of contemporary literature in Spain, especially of the Generation of '98 (see Spanish literature). Gómez de la Serna (q.v.), biographer, admirer, and self-confessed disciple of Lanza, called him "the founder, the revealer, perhaps involuntary . . . of the new literary liberty," adding that "he discovered a greater reality of the Spanish land," that he was "the true successor of Larra . . . the true successor of Goya." Azorín (q.v.) admired him greatly also. Lanza was one of the first "raros"—as Rubén Darío called all the strange personalities that carried on in the name of originality and individualism the fin-de-siècle artistic rebellion. He studied at the Spanish Naval Academy, abandoning the service shortly after becoming an officer. He was made suddenly famous among a small group of intellectuals by the publication of his first novel, El año triste (1883), and although he never attained general public recognition, he kept on writing novels and short stories—now practically unfindable—from Getafe, a small town near Madrid where he led a retired life. Some of his best works are Cuentos políticos (1890), Artuña (2 vols., 1893-1894), Ni en la vida ni en la muerte (1899), and La rendición de Santiago (1907).

See: Ramón Gómez de la Serna, ed., Páginas escogidas e inéditas de Silverio Lanza (1918).

A. del R.

Larbaud, Valery (1881-, French poet, novelist, and essayist), began his career with an erudite and sensitive verse translation of Coleridge's The Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1901). He has been ever since, in whatever he writes, a curious and very personal combination of poet and scholar. Born in Vichy, the international spa, of a wealthy family which sent him first to a private school attended chiefly by the sons of South American millionaires and later (1897) on a grand tour of Germany, Russia, and Turkey, Larbaud first distinguished himself as the poet of luxurious cosmopolitanism. By the time that his Poèmes par un riche amateur appeared in 1908, attributed to a fabulous South American, A. O. Barnabooth, he had familiarized himself with Europe and its languages and chosen his intellectual homes—the three principal Latin countries and England. The Journal d'A. O. Barnabooth (1913) continues in prose the singing of "Europe, its railways and its theatres and its constellations of cities." Endowed with an ardent idealism, a solid culture, and a shameful fortune, Barnabooth, a kind of Argentine descendant of Henri Brulard, constantly uproots himself physically and morally in a vain effort to dissociate his true personality from fortuitous circumstances.

Larbaud the poet also contains an analyst who, simultancously with Proust and Pirandello (qq.v.), seeks what he calls "self-sapience." Nor is the poet limited by the new dandyism of cosmopolitanism which he bequeaths to Paul Morand, Jean Giraudoux, Jules Romains (qq.v.), and so many others; he also delights in the poetry of childhood and adolescence, as in his delicate novel of school life, Fermina Márquez (1911), and the sensitive and sympathetic stories of Enfantines (1918). The three short novels contained in Amants, heureux amants (1924) return to the earlier vein; two of the tales use the form of the interior monologue or stream of consciousness which Larbaud, one of the first (1922) to praise Joyce's Ulysses, acclimatized in France.

In his collections of stories and essays—Jaune, bleu, blanc (1927), Technique (1932), Aux couleurs de Rome (1938)—the scholar leads the poet into strange philological byways, when the poet is not interrupting the scholar's labors to record some evanescent aspect of life. The penetrating studies of English writers contained in Ce Vice impuni, la lecture (1925), together with his translations of Walt Whitman, Landor, Sir Thomas Browne, and the Samuel Butler of Erewhon, have won Larbaud a place among the most perspicacious anglicistes of his time. He has also translated from the Spanish and the Italian. On the other hand, his articles for the Buenos Aires Nación and for the London New Weekly have introduced abroad much of the best in contemporary French literature. He has consistently striven to further intellectual intercourse among nations: the quarterly which he founded with Valéry and Fargue (qq.v.) and which abounds in his and others' translations was appropriately called Commerce (1924–1932). With characteristic modesty, he is ever ready to efface himself before another writer whom he thinks it his duty to introduce; and humbly he calls upon his patron saint, the compiler of the Vulgate, to establish "the eminent dignity of translators in the Republic of Letters." As a scholar and as a poet Valéry Larbaud is a citizen of Europe.

See: J. O'Brien, "Valéry Larbaud," Symposium, III (1932), 315–334; M. Thiébaud, "Valéry Larbaud," Revue de Paris, Année XXXIX (1932), Tome VI, pp. 822–858.

J. O'B.

Larsson, Carl Filip (pseud. Carl Larsson i By, 1877–, Swedish poet and novelist), was born in By, Kopparberg (formerly the province of Dalecarlia). Unlike many other self-made literary men of peasant stock, he has remained in his original setting as a tiller of the soil. A number of small collections of poems and short stories reflect the country life he has known from childhood, e.g., By och bonde (1907; Village and Villager), Tionde (1909; Tithes), Av jord är du kommen (1913; Dust Thou Art), Den sista härven (1914; The Last Sheaf), Bergsmanshistorier (2 vols., 1915–1918; Stories of Miners), and Lantliga historier (1925; Stories of Rural Life). He is fond of the past. His researches concerning his home region constitute a monumental chronicle, En dalasockens historia (2 vols., 1920–1939; The History of a Dalecarlian Parish). Popular education has had an enthusiastic trail blazer in Larsson. His contributions to the press on this subject are legion. In Logen 5455, Morgonvind (1916; The Lodge No. 5455, Morning Wind) he has presented in novelistic form the history of a temperance society which gives a cross section of one of the idealistic movements that characterized Swedish country life prior to the First World War. As a poet Larsson possesses no brilliant qualities, but his art of storytelling is genuine, and he has a great gift of concision. The environmental descriptions in his stories are always reliable. As both man and author he is, with his idealistic inclinations, representative of a country-wide movement which originated in Sweden as a reaction against the debasement of traditional, rural culture such as had been brought on in part by the inroads of industrialism.

A. W.

Larsson, Hans (1862–1944, Swedish philosopher and aesthetician), is a philosophical thinker by profession with strongly marked literary interests and gifts. Though most of his imposing list of published works (some 30 in all) are technical-philosophical in kind, they are not infrequently concerned with basic aesthetic problems, particularly as applied to phenomena of literary creation; and they are invariably cast in a clear, flexible, exquisitely sensitive Swedish prose. On occasion also the philosophical has given way almost entirely to the literary creative urge in Larsson's production, such volumes as På vandring (1909; Afoot), Hemmabyarna (1916; The Home Villages), and Idéerna i Stabberup (1918; Ideas in Stabberup) being works essentially literary both in form and content. These more purely literary works reveal a creative artist of real originality and of considerable ability, especially in small genre studies of human beings and places in Hans Larsson's native rural Skåne. More important in the history of Swedish literature, however, are Larsson's Intuition (1892) and Poesiens logik (1899; The Logic of Poetry), penetrating studies in the nature of the creative process, and two collections of essays, Reflexioner för dagen (1911; Contemporary Reflections) and Litteraturintryck (1926; Literary Impressions). Intuition and Poesiens logik served in their day to clarify to some extent the whole body of ideas back of the neoromantic strains in the Scandinavian literatures of the 1890's, while Reflexioner för dagen contained an essay, entitled "Huvudsak och bisak i litterära brytningar" (The Primary and the Secondary in Literary Transitions), which was perhaps the most sane and balanced contribution to the so-called "Strindbergsfejden" in 1910–1911, one of the most violent literary controversies in the history of Swedish literature. It is the rare combination of literary talents and philosophical acumen in Hans Larsson that has brought him a much larger audience than that of any other professional philosopher in Sweden.

See: Johan Mortensen, "Hans Larsson som diktare," in Människor och böcker (1917), pp. 257–269.

A. G.

Lasker-Schüler, Else (1876–1945, German poet, novelist, and essayist), was born in Elberfeld in the Rhineland, of the famous Schüler family. The Rhineland is one of the sources of her inspiration; others are her deep devotion to Judaism and her ecstatic vision of the Orient. After the dissolution of her first marriage with the physician Lasker, she went to Berlin, became the companion of the prophetlike vagabond-poet Peter Hille (q.v.), and, after his death, married Herwarth Walden, one of the leaders of the expressionist movement and the editor of the periodical Der Sturm. To some she seems always to have remained a bohemian; actually, she lived, in her writings as well as in her personal life, in a world of wonders, colorful images, and fairy-tale adventures suggestive of the Arabian Nights. Her only novel is entitled Mein Herz (1912); she is the first poet of the contemporary idiom who feels that she and all her fellow beings are crystallizations of the heart. The strength of her imagination, combined with great artistry of language, produced some of the most beautiful and profound modern German poems (e.g., "Ein alter Tibetteppich"). She also possessed the Rhenish humor which often projected her emotional fantasies into the realm of the grotesque.

All these elements caused the young expressionist generation from 1910 to 1920 to recognize in Else Lasker-Schüler a forerunner and a kind of fairy godmother. She, on her part, saw in her many literary admirers strange and fantastic figures of her own wonder world. In some of her books (Gesichte, 1911; Das Konzert, 1932) one may find a variety of literary genres—poems, essays, grotesques, biographies, fairy tales, and autobiographic novelettes. At times (Tino von Bagdad, 1907; Prinz von Theben, 1914) she transforms herself into this or that figure of the Orient. Her first book of poems, Styx, appeared in 1902; her best poems were collected in Gedichte (1914). A later book of poetry is entitled Die Kuppel (1925). The Hebraic element became most clearly visible in Die hebräischen Balladen (1913) and in the novel Der Wunderrabbiner von Barcelona (1926). Her Rhenish temperament found its strongest expression in an early social play, Die Wupper (1908), produced in the expressionistic style in Berlin in 1919, and in the autobiographical story Arthur Aronymus: Die Geschichte meines Vaters (1932). The great hero of her life was Peter Hille, to whom she dedicated the Peter Hille-Buch (1906) and whose letters she edited in 1921. There was no room for her in Hitler's world; she found her second home in Palestine, where she wrote Hebräerland (1937) and died in 1945.

See: M. Wiener, "Else Lasker-Schüler," in Juden in der Literatur (1922).

K. P.

La Tour du Pin, Patrice de (1911–, French poet), was seen by some in the years immediately preceding the Second World War as the chief hope of modern French poetry. Perhaps only those who respond temperamentally to the passionate but rather undisciplined mysticism which has characterized his work can share that opinion. La Quête de joie (1933) and Le Lucernaire (1936), though marked by an unmistakable talent, must be regarded as promises of genius to come rather than as its mature fruit. The first, a collection of lyric poems, all touching on some aspect of man's search for the answers to two perpetual questions—What is God? and What is man?—is certainly his best work. It is marked by a directness and nobility of statement that has been compared to that of Dante, and if it does not succeed in solving the problems it raises, at least it wins for itself a position among the best religious verse of the present period by its ability to clothe abstract ideas in sensuous garments. Le Lucernaire, the first book of what is to be a poem of some length, perhaps suffers from having appeared alone. Nearer to the medieval allegory than to any literary type of the present day, it recounts the soul's search for an ideal purity, more delicious than the joys of the flesh, but to be found only after having passed through these joys and rejected them. The form, the severity of technique, and the nobility of concept again recall Dante; but the poet's meaning is hard to decipher, and unfortunately the concrete sensual quality that marked the early work of La Tour du Pin has been largely replaced by a mass of intellectualized detail.

See: André Fontainas, "Les Poèmes," Mercurie de France, CCLI (1934), 351–355, CCLXXI (1936), 355–357; Raymond Schwab, "La Poésie," Nouvelle Revue française, XLII (1934), 552–554.

C. W., Jr.

Latvian literature, see Lettish literature.

Lautréamont, comte de (pseud. of Isidore Lucien Ducasse, 1846–1870, French poet), was born of French parents in Montevideo, where his father was the French consul, and went to Paris at 20 to prepare for the Ecole Polytechnique. His poverty forced him to live in a cheap hotel. His dark room was furnished with a bed, two suitcases full of books, and an upright piano. He wrote at night, consuming innumerable cups of coffee. The manuscript of Les Chants de Maldoror was sent to the printers in 1868; only one canto appeared before his death, publishers not daring to put on sale the whole book. He began to write the preface to another volume, to be called Poésies, which was never completed. Ducasse, who picked his pen name from one of Eugène Sue's novels, died as mysteriously as he had lived.

Composed under the influence of Byron, Milton, and Poe, the Maldoror work is a fantastic epic and reads like a huge nightmare, brightened here and there by beautiful mystic and poetic visions. Ghastly and gruesome, it is a most violent piece of poetic pessimism. From the very first pages of this poem in prose the forces which move the young writer are evident: he is drunk with morbid romanticism, with the funereal grandiloquence of Young and of the pseudo-Ossian, with the satanism of Byron and of the darker novels of Byron's day. A passionate desire for originality results in the exaggeration of this sadistic tendency. Amidst grotesque surroundings the author sees strange visions: in rivers of blood, among lice, vampires, and spiders, the brother of the leech speaks to the toad, apostrophizes Lohengrin, makes love to a female shark, and, transformed into an octopus, defies God. Descending sometimes to the ridiculous, the descriptions are in danger of becoming monotonous and fatiguing; effects are spoiled at times with banal explanations. To Lautréamont, may be applied the words he uses to describe his hero: "Your mind is so ill that you are not aware of the fact and that you believe yourself sane every time you mouth senseless nothings, which are nevertheless filled with an infernal grandeur."

The reader can indeed perceive in this deformed work traces of a masterful imagination. Lyricism shines forth, as in the long, sustained invocation to the ancient sea. The imagery is at times lofty; the irony creates strange, powerful effects. We are transported suddenly to the last days of the world, or we enter, already somewhat baffled, a kingdom of flickering lights and shadows. The poetry is indefinable because it is indefinite; it is in fact "pure poetry."

The influence of Lautréamont on the rising generation of poets was considerable. The surrealists (see Breton, André) flocked to his banner and saluted him, with Rimbaud (q.v.), as the leader of their revolution. His miraculous force was acknowledged by the great writers of the turn of the century. Many, such as Rémy de Gourmont and Léon Bloy (qq.v.), were afraid and declared the author of Les Chants de Maldoror a madman. Others, such as Valery Larbaud and Léon Paul Fargue (qq.v.), openly avowed their admiration. The new generation of poets after the First World War were fully aware of a debt to Lautréamont.

See: Régis Michaud, Modern Thought and Literature in France (1934); Albert Thibaudet, Histoire de la littérature française de 1789 à nos jours (1936); René Lalou, Histoire de la littérature française contemporaine, enlarged ed., Vol. II (1940).

P. B.

Laxness, Halldór Kiljan (1902–, Icelandic novelist, poet, and playwright), was born at Laxnes, near Reykjavík. His parents were farmers. Of the youngest generation of Icelandic writers he is the greatest and at the same time the most consistently modernistic. Like no other writer he represents the youthful urban population of Reykjavík, cut loose from the thousand-year-old farm culture, searching vigorously for a new mode of living among the possibilities of the post-war world. He received his first impulses in the lyric and national romantic atmosphere of the early 1920's, but soon he plunged himself into introspection, philosophy, and religion, following the line of Strindberg and Undset (qq.v.). As a youth he steeped himself in expressionism in Germany, in Catholicism in a monastery in Luxembourg, and in surrealism in France (1924–1926), after which he went to Iceland, Canada, and California (1927–1930) to fortify himself in a communism that since has served him as a leading hypothesis. He returned to Iceland in 1930. His books have been written there or wherever his extensive travels have taken him.

From his Catholic period date Undir Helgahnúk (1924; Under the Holy Mountain) and Vefarinn mikli frá Kasmír (1927; The Great Weaver from Kashmir). The latter book stands as a milestone of a new age in Icelandic novel writing; it is expressionistic and autobiographic, a true picture of the turmoil in the author's mind. In it he shifted his point of view, reducing ad absurdum the ideal of the Church, as he understood it. Having returned from California to Iceland in 1930, Laxness aired his communistic views in a book of brilliant essays, Alþýðubókin (1930; The Book of the People), and startled the public with a booklet of modernistic lyrics, Kvæðakver (1930; Poems). But his greatest work is embodied in three novels, each of many volumes, published during the 1930's. The first unit, þú útviður hreini (1931) and Fuglinn í fjörunni (1932; Eng. tr. of both, Salka Valka, 1936), treats of the small fishing village; the next, Sjálftætt fólk (2 vols., 1934–1935; Independent People), is about the poor farmer; and the third, Ljós heimsins (4 vols., 1937–1940; The Light of the World), is about the poet of the people. These novels are conceived on a grand scale, the poor but energetic village girl and the independent cottage farmer emerging as heroes of monumental stature, symbols of their class. The poet, though anything but a hero, being the lowly subject and scapegoat of a cruel world, is no less grandly conceived as a symbol of the crucified spirit forever rising in beauty as the light of this world. In these novels Laxness has created a new style, whose storms and stresses contrast vividly with the classic saga-like style of predecessors and contemporaries. A fierce social criticism runs through all his novels; this has alienated readers both at home and abroad. But even his critics have had to admit—and admire—the brilliance of his style, the vigorous symbolism, the high poetic quality of his rich lyric vein, the art with which he fuses characters and scenery into one vast panorama of intensified reality. In his most recent works Laxness has turned to historical subjects.

See: S. Einarsson, "A Contemporary Icelandic Author," Life and Letters To-day, Vol. XIV (1936), No. 4, pp. 24–30; H. Spring, review of Salka Valka in Evening Standard (London), February 6, 1936; S. Nordal, "Tvær miklar skáldsögur," Lesbók Morgunblaðsins, November 24, 1940.

S. E.

Lazarević, Laza K. (1851–1890, Serb short-story writer), was graduated from the faculty of law in Belgrade in 1871 and then studied medicine in Berlin, where he received a doctor's degree in 1876. During the Serbo-Turkish War of 1876 he served as a medical assistant in the Serbian army. Later, as a military physician, he lived in Belgrade. He died at the age of 39, before showing the full measure of a very great literary gift.

During his student days in Belgrade, Lazarević had adopted with enthusiasm the current ideas of the Russian socialist reformers, who were very popular in the Serbian milieu, and read and translated several Russian authors, such as Chernischevsky, Gogol, and Pisemsky. He exalted science as the liberator of mankind, translated Darwin and Faraday, and wrote a series of articles in the domain of popular medicine which were definitely useful to his country. But Lazarević was above all by nature a man of letters, sensitive, tender, and delicate. His first collection of tales, Šest pripovedaka (Six Stories), was published in 1886; after his death his whole narrative work was published, in 1898–1899, in two volumes (Pripovetke; Stories). He wrote about the Serbian region, Mačva, where he himself was born. Although Lazarević had some of the qualities of an excellent realistic writer, a gift for observing characteristic details, and an ability to present vividly and in high relief individuals and environments, he was in essence a poet and a Slavic idealist. In the conflict between the individual who wants liberation from all ties and the family which attempts to preserve tradition, a conflict which he admirably described, he always solved the problem as a conservative, on behalf of the family; the revolter is ever made to yield and to repent, whether or not this seems to square with normal experience. Lazarević conducted his narrative very skillfully, with lively dialogue, unexpected effects, really great art; all his work is infused with discreet emotional warmth. He raised Serbian fiction to the European level, and it was not by chance that his short stories were often translated. He has deservedly been called "the Serbian Turgenev (q.v.)."

See: J. Skerlić, Pisci i knjige, Vol. II (1907); P. Popović, Jugo-Slav Stories (1921).

P. A.

Lechoń, Jan (pseud. of Leszek Serafinowicz, 1899–, Polish poet and essayist), was born in Warsaw and educated at the Russian university in that city. At the age of 19 he burst dramatically upon the literary scene with a moving poem on the romantic poet and liberal of the 19th century, Maurycy Mochnacki, which he delivered at the gala opening of the café Pod Pikadorem (At the Sign of the Picador), the birthplace and home of Skamander (see Polish literature). Lechoń's performance on this occasion was such as to make it clear not only that Poland had a new poet, but also that the keynote of a whole new literary movement had been sounded, for the poet, while by no means repudiating the past, pleaded for emancipation from the obligation always imposed on the poets of Poland in the past to see in everything only the plight of their country. "In summer," Lechoń entreated, "let the sun be seen shining on the butterflies, and in springtime let it be the spring that I see, not Poland," and his words became the credo of the future Skamandrines.

Lechoń's poetic output was small, consisting principally of the satirical "songs from history" assembled in Rzeczypospolita Babińska (1921; The Babin Republic), the important Karmazynowy poemat (1920; "Crimson" Poem), and Srebrne i czarne (1924; Silver and Black), and for a while it was feared he had developed too quickly, leaving no room for future growth. During the Second World War, however, he returned to poetry with the publishing in 1942 of the volume Lutnia po Bekwarku (Lute to Mourning Tuned). A number of excellent critical essays also appeared from his pen in the emigration journal Wiadomości polskie (London; Polish News) and in the weekly Przegląd literacki (later Tygodnik Polski) published by the Polish writers in New York. Lechoń's influence on literary currents in Poland is much greater than the number of his published works would seem to indicate.

See: K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 103–114, 700–701.

A. P. C.

Leconte de Lisle, Charles Marie René (1818–1894, French poet), was born at Saint-Paul, on the island of Réunion. Taken to France at three, he returned to Réunion in 1828, where he spent the next nine years. The beauty of his native isle was deeply impressed on him and later inspired some of his best poetry. This period was also marked by a tragic passion for a young cousin who died prematurely and by the composition of his first verses. In 1837 he went to study law at the University of Rennes, but, more interested in poetry, he joined a group which published the short-lived literary periodical Variété. In 1843 he returned to Réunion, but two years later was offered a position with the Démocratie pacifique (Parisian Fourierist newspaper). He also contributed poems to the Fourierist monthly, Phalange, and thereby made the acquaintance of Thalès Bernard and Louis Ménard, both enthusiastic Hellenists. Through them he met Baudelaire and Banville (qq.v.).

Already a convinced republican, Leconte de Lisle was influenced by the Fourierists. He welcomed the Revolution of 1848, joined a political club, and conducted propaganda in Brittany for the république sociale. The elections of April 24 returned conservatives in that area. Leconte de Lisle's reaction was bitter; in a famous letter to Ménard he dubbed the people "stupid" and a "race of slaves." Nevertheless he appears to have taken some part in the June Days and to have spent 48 hours in prison. Thereafter he gave up politics, left the Démocratie pacifique, and took refuge in his ideal and dream of art. For years his material existence was difficult. Finally in 1864 this ardent republican yielded to "inexorable necessity" and accepted an annuity from the imperial government. When this fact was disclosed in 1870, the poet's embarrassment was acute.

Meanwhile, Leconte de Lisle achieved a commanding position in the domain of poetry. His publications include Poèmes antiques (1852; enlarged ed., 1874); Poèmes et poésies (1855); Poésies barbares (1862), later enlarged and reentitled Poèmes barbares (1872); Les Erinnyes (1872), a classical tragedy; Poèmes tragiques (1884); L'Apollonide (1888); Derniers Poèmes (1895). The first two volumes brought immediate recognition; the third definitely established him as a leader of the poets known after 1866 as the Parnassians. A group of disciples, including Catulle Mendès (q.v.), Léon Dierx, and José Maria de Heredia (q.v.), gathered about him. They met every Saturday at his apartment.

From 1852 on Leconte de Lisle turned his back on romantic lyricism and on utilitarianism (see preface to Poèmes antiques and to Poèmes et poésies). In general, holding that the poet's essential goal should be the creation of beauty and that "art and learning . . . should tend to unite," he sought his inspiration in the great civilizations and legends of the past, especially those of Greece, India, and Scandinavia. But the tropical landscapes of his native isle, the ferocious animals of the jungle, and the rapacious creatures of the ocean depths were sources of inspiration he also frequently exploited. In his evocation of animals he was perhaps influenced by the sculptors Barye and Frémiet who produced some of their best work in the 1840's and 1850's.

Many of Leconte de Lisle's poems are magnificent pictures without much intellectual content (e.g., "Les Elfes," "La Vérandah," "Les Eléphants," "Le Jaguar"); they are triumphs of plastic art or musical effect. Many contain some aspect of the poet's philosophy. His ardent belief in beauty, la sainte beauté, is seen in "Hypatie" and "Vénus de Milo." Ancient Greece he preferred to the "industrial Pandemonium" of contemporary France, and he considered the polytheism of the Greeks superior to Christianity, which he viewed as a religion of constraint. But he displayed equal interest in the religious concepts of the ancient Indian sagas (cf. the Bhagavata, tr. by Burnouf in 1840; Rig-Veda, tr. by Langlois in 1848; Ramayana, tr. by Fauché in 1854). Poems such as "Bhagavat," "La Vision de Brahma," "La Maya," and "Midi" reflect in varying degree the notions of detachment, oblivion, absorption into the néant divin, which he found in those texts. By nature and experience Leconte de Lisle tended to be disillusioned and pessimistic. The poems "Sacra fames," "Le Vent froid de la nuit," "Solvat seclum," are bitter expressions of his view of human life and his desire to escape from its woes. In such moods he aspired, not for death in the Christian sense, but for complete annihilation. These ideas are set forth in lines so carefully composed, with such precision and restraint of language, as to give the impression of impassibility to the superficial reader. The more attentive realize that genuine passion inspired them.

The Third Republic assured the poet of his material existence by appointing him as one of the librarians of the Senate. In 1886 he was elected to the French Academy to fill the chair left vacant by Hugo. His last years were, therefore, serene and triumphant.

See: J. Dornis, Leconte de Lisle intime (1895); F. Calmette, Un Demi-Siècle littéraire: Leconte de Lisle et ses amis (1902); M. A. Leblond, Leconte de Lisle, d'après des documents nouveaux (1906); E. Estève, Leconte de Lisle; l'homme et l'œuvre (1922); I. H. Brown, Leconte de Lisle; a Study on the Man and His Poetry, with Original Adaptations in English Verse (1929); P. Flottes, Le Poète Leconte de Lisle (1929).

E. M. G.

Le Fort, Gertrud, Freiin von (1876–, German poet and novelist), born in Minden of an aristocratic Huguenot family that had found refuge in Germany, enjoyed a thorough university training in history and philosophy. After editing in 1925 the theological writings of her teacher, the Protestant philosopher Ernst Troeltsch of Heidelberg, she entered the Catholic Church. Her magnificent Hymnen an die Kirche (1924; Eng. tr., Hymns to the Church, 1937) had already been published. In the novel Das Schweisstuch der Veronika (1928; Eng. tr., The Veil of Veronica, 1932) she portrays within a single German household living in modern Rome four typical attitudes toward the Church, the "good pagan," the devout daughter of the Church, and two types of conversions. Her two historical novels Der Papst aus dem Ghetto (1930; Eng. tr., The Pope from the Ghetto, 1934) and Die magdeburgische Hochzeit (1939) and one historical story, Die Letzte am Schaffott (1931; Eng. tr., The Song at the Scaffold, 1933), combine the fruits of extensive research with deep poetic insight and great literary gifts. In contrast to Enrica von Handel-Mazzetti (q.v.), Gertrud von Le Fort has chosen historical moments of wide appeal and writes a classically pure and beautiful German that lends itself to unusually fine translation into English. It has been said of her Hymns to the Church that the translation is equal to the original. Her moving Hymnen an Deutschland (1932) with its Christian appeal to the nation has not been translated, nor has her volume of essays Die ewige Frau, Die Frau in der Zeit, Die zeitlose Frau (1934). Das Reich des Kindes (1933) is but the introduction to a longer prose epic, Die drei Kronen, yet to appear.

See: T. Kampmann, Gertrud von Le Fort (1935); G. H. Danton, "Gertrud von Le Fort," Books Abroad, XIII (1939), 283-288.

C. E. F.

Léger, Alexis Saint-Léger, see Perse, St.-J.

Lemaître, Jules (1853-1914, French critic, dramatist, and short-story writer), was born in Vennecy near Orléans, of very religious parents, teachers in the local school, who sent their son to Catholic institutions, first in Orléans and later in Paris. Lemaître's ambition was to become a professor. A brilliant student, he was admitted to the Ecole Normale Supérieure in 1872 and after graduating held teaching positions in the lycées at Havre and Algiers. His doctorate obtained, he taught at the universities of Besançon and Grenoble. He does not seem to have been a good teacher; early in his career belles-lettres attracted him, and he sent contributions, mostly articles of literary criticism, to periodicals such as the XIXe Siècle and the Revue bleue. In addition two small volumes of verse, Parnassian in form, Les Médaillons (1880) and Petites orientales (1883), were published. Ironically enough, it was a satirical article on Renan (q.v.), the writer who influenced him more than any other ("I admit I was possessed by him"), which brought his name to the attention of a larger public and made him famous almost overnight. In 1885 he succeeded J. J. Weiss (q.v.) as dramatic critic on the Journal des débats. Later the Revue des deux mondes likewise invited his collaboration. The greater part of his essays were collected in a series of volumes under the title Les Contemporains (7 vols., 1885-1899; 8th vol., 1918), and his dramatic reviews in Impressions de théâtre (10 vols., 1888-1898; 11th vol., 1920). Brilliantly written, they showed strong classical preferences. Lemaître's taste, however, was catholic and his curiosity wide enough to welcome new forms, new poétiques, the French symbolists (see French symbolism) as well as the Scandinavian dramatists, for instance, although not without the reservations to be expected from a disciple of Sainte-Beuve, always commending order and clarity. In 1884 he resigned his professorship to devote himself entirely to writing.

Besides his critical articles, many original works were published. His only long novel, Les Rois (1893), was not a success. Lemaître was at his best in the short story, in which he turned for inspiration to the legends of antiquity or to classical literature. Written in the best Anatole France (q.v.) manner, these charming pieces show their author as a consummate stylist, a master of elegant and lucid prose (En marge des vieux livres, 2 series, 1905-1907; La Vieillesse d'Hélène, 1914). He also tried his hand at drama. Some of his plays, Le Député Leveau (1890), Mariage blanc (1891), L'Ainée (1898), were well received. A definite moralizing tendency in the plays reveals a very serious side to the artist and dilettante. By 1895 Lemaître's fame especially as a critic was considerable, and he was elected that year to the French Academy. When a controversy arose between impressionist and dogmatic critics, that famous debate where "strength was pitted against charm and reason against sensibility," he was the chief impressionist standard-bearer and stood with Anatole France against Brunetière (q.v.), whose ponderous blows could not dent the light Heraclitean armor of his adversaries.

The Dreyfus affair marked a turning point in the life of Lemaître. In his youth, after the collapse of the Second Empire, he had hailed the advent of the Third Republic. Now he sided with the reactionaries and put what he conceived as the national interest of France above justice and fairness to a man unjustly accused. Convinced that the nation's fate was at stake, he abandoned literature to give all his time to political action. As founder and president of the Ligue de la Patrie Française he toured the country denouncing the men of the radical bloc then in power as the enemies of France and calling on the voters to elect nationalist deputies to Parliament. It was of no avail. Disappointed and discouraged, Lemaître then went over, heart and soul, to the royalist camp, where he was made most welcome and whence he continued to inveigh against the republic and democracy (Discours royalistes, 1908-1911; Lettres à mon ami, 1909). During that period he was asked to give lectures on literary topics before the Société des Conférences and he chose to discuss the lives and works of great French writers. His lectures appeared later in book form, J. J. Rousseau (1907), Jean Racine (1908), Fénelon (1910), Chateaubriand (1912). These are not scholarly books in the strictest sense. Very readable, they bear the mark of having been prepared for Parisian and largely feminine audiences, and the author's political preoccupations weigh heavily on his judgment of Rousseau, the social revolutionary, and of Chateaubriand, the revolutionary in letters. But the book on Racine, who was a perennial favorite with the critic, is unspoiled by such prejudices and is by far the best of the four.

Lemaître died at Tavers in Touraine on August 5, 1914, just as the Third Republic was entering on a war which belied the writer's and his political friends' oft repeated assertion that a democratic France could not wage a victorious war.

See: V. Giraud, Les Maîtres de l'heure, Vol. II (1914); H. Morice, Jules Lemaître (1924); G. Durrière, Jules Lemaître et le théâtre (1934).

V. Gu.

Lemonnier, Camille (1844–1913, Belgian art critic and novelist), born in a suburb of Brussels, led an uneventful life, devoted uniquely to writing. Lovers of biographical anecdote will enjoy the monograph by his friend Maurice Des Ombiaux (Camille Lemonnier, monographie anecdotique, 1910). His first work, Salon de Bruxelles (1863), inaugurated a series of art criticism which he continued throughout his career. He spoke as a painter rather than as a littérateur and produced studies of Gustave Courbet, Alfred Stevens, Félicien Rops, and others which are still standard. Influence of plastic artists is clearly discernible in all his work. It is often easier to trace the inspiration of his novels to a painter than to any purely literary model. He prided himself on being a Proteus and always gave full vent to his lyric genius: "I have been only a creature of instinct, intoxicated by the beauty of life," he declared. His adoration of nature in all her aspects is the unifying principle of his work; it led him to commune at times with the French naturalistic school (see French naturalism), yet his Dionysiac temperament prohibited any suggestion of pessimism. Le Mdle (1881), belonging to the early period designated by Léon Bazalgette as unconscious pantheism, remains his masterpiece in fiction and offers a fair synthesis of his large output. It is realistic in the sense that it was conceived and written among the scenes and personages portrayed, but the old Flemish masters, such as Rubens, Jordaens, and Teniers, were ever guiding his eye. The theme is the free, exuberant life of forest and countryside, instinctively enjoyed with no intrusion of debatable social theories. Le Mort (dated by author 1878; published 1882), recalls Zola's (q.v.) Thérèse Raquin, yet an early essay on Courbet (1878) would seem not foreign to its inspiration. In sharp contrast to Le Mdle, it stigmatizes the physical and moral depravity of two peasants. In 1883 appeared L'Hystérique, beginning a belligerent defense of the claims of nature. It is based on pathological data and perhaps influenced by La Sorcière of Michelet, for whom Lemonnier expressed warm admiration. The subject is the misery stemming from ascetic education in a priest and the ruin of his victim in a béguinage. This novel marks the transition to what Bazalgette calls the second period, one of uncertain psychological groping.

Sociological tendencies appear in Happo-Chair (1886), dedicated to Zola, whose Germinal had appeared in 1885, but the Beligan author could claim priority of composition. He studies the wretched life of toilers in a rolling mill whom he had often visited in company with the painter Constantin Meunier. His sympathy is ever with the helots of civilization. At times he felt himself the victim and reacted vigorously. Thus, prosecuted at Paris in 1888 for a short story, he replied with Le Possédé (1890), in which he exposes the secret degradation of a magistrate, a lecherous Torquemada persecuting uncompromising art. Certain refinements of corruption here may be traced to the Diaboliques of Rops. Another trial, resulting in acquittal, inspired Les Deux Consciences (1902)—an analysis of the author's evolution as he saw it. The hero is appropriately named Wildman. There is a series of novels in which he defends the right of woman to full development of individual personality: representative are L'Arche (1894), the journal of a mother who rebuilds the family fortunes; La Faute de Madame Charvet (1895), the most successful of the psychological group; and Le Bon Amour (1900), where an estranged couple reunite in philanthropic activity. Madame Lupar (1888), with the subtitle roman bourgeois, exposes the mercenary vice of the heroine who dominates the story. La Fin des bourgeois (1893) combines naturalistic and sociological trends to conclude that society is in itself an agent of corruption; it must be retempered by a return to a state of nature.

Here then is the germ of the last period in which, led by sympathy with the naïve virtues of peasants, Lemonnier champions a conscious pantheism. Novels like L'Île vierge (1897), Adam et Eve (1899), and Au cœur frais de la forêt (1900) have something of the freshness of a Theocritean idyl combined with the majesty of biblical poetry; the immediate inspiration may well have been the Edenic scenes of Velvet Breughel and nature painters such as Emile Claus and Corot. Keeping in mind the author's relation to Zola, one may call these novels his Evangelies. With Le Vent dans les moulins (1901) and Comme va le ruisseau (1903), he returns to reality while still remaining lyric. There are reminders that he was a convinced realist and that he dabbled in psychological and sociological fiction, but this remains in the background. He writes from love of the quiet charm of rustic life which he observed closely. His last book, La Chanson du carillon (1911), inspired by Rodenbach's (q.v.) Bruges-la-morte and by the paintings of Memling, crown his work, ever a hymn to the beauty of his country.

A score of collections of short stories reveal again the variety of inspiration and technique noted in the novels. Now Lemonnier presented the national life in a sympathetic, even idyllic light as in the Contes flamands et wallons (1875), now in somber and brutal aspects (Ceux de la glèbe, 1889). He could write successful children's stories (Les Joujoux parlants, 1892), with occasional sallies for their elders, psychological contes (Dames de volupté, 1902), tales of mystery inspired by Maeterlinck (q.v.) and by Poe (La Vie secrète, 1898), and sketches of animal life, almost a national genre among the painters. Lemonnier's vocabulary is as extensive as his subject matter, but he rarely borrows from dialect—he seeks primarily picturesque expression and shades. For him a writer is a creator of forms to which all else is subordinated: "The word gives birth to the idea," he declared. His place is among the romantic colorists rather than with thinkers and moralists.

See: G. Rency, Camille Lemonnier (1922); G. Vanwelkenhuyzen, L'Influence du naturalisme français en Belgique (1930); F. Russell Pope, Nature in the Work of Camille Lemonnier (1933); H. Landau, Camille Lemonnier (1936).

B. M. W.

Lenéru, Marie (1875-1918, French playwright), was born in Brest, the daughter of a naval officer. She became deaf at an early age and died almost blind. Isolated from the world, she spent her time reading and writing. Her first essays appeared in the Mercure de France under the pen name Antoine Morsain.

Marie Lenéru conceived of drama as a means to express ideas and to discuss problems. Six plays established her reputation. She presented the right to love freely in Les Affranchis (1910), the crime of treason in Le Redoutable (1912), a case of professional jealousy in La Triomphante (1918), the question of war and peace in La Paix (written in 1915 but not produced until 1921). Two more plays were produced posthumously, La Maison sur le roc (1924) and Le Bonheur des autres (1925). These pieces belong to the "theatre of ideas" (see Curel, François de). Without avoiding entirely the pitfalls of the problem play, they are nevertheless good theatre, the earnest and sincere manifestation of a mature mind, familiar with austere thinkers such as Marcus Aurelius, Pascal, and Barrès (q.v.). A picture of Marie Lenéru's physical and spiritual life can be found in the diary she kept from the age of 10, Journal (2 vols., 1922).

See: François de Curel, "Marie Lenéru," Revue de France, Année I (1921), Tome II, pp. 715-741; Revue française, November 13, 1927 (special number); Suzanne Lavaud, Marie Lenéru; sa vie, son journal (1932).

M. E. C.

Lenormand, Henri René (1882-, French dramatist), outstanding interpreter of the théâtre de l'inquiétude, was born in Paris. He was a son of the composer René Lenormand, whose predilection for oriental music profoundly influenced him and who instilled in him the wanderlust which took the playwright all over the world in search of dramatic material. Following a brief apprenticeship as a writer of melodramatic sketches for the Grand Guignol, Lenormand's first real play, Les Possédés (1909), while still immature, gave evidence of the peculiarly searching insight into man's subconscious motivations which forms the mainspring of his theatre (e.g., Une Vie secrète, 1929, and Les Trois Chambres, 1931, also devoted to analysis of an artist's personality). In 1911 he married the Dutch actress, Marie Kalf, who has since interpreted many roles in his plays. Discharged from the army for reasons of health during the First World War, Lenormand found in the convalescent atmosphere of a Swiss sanatorium a firsthand opportunity to study the psychology of fear and its morbid effect on the human soul (see Le Lâche, produced in 1925; Eng. tr., The Coward, 1928).

In 1919 Lenormand met the actor-producer Georges Pitoëff (q.v.) in Switzerland and formed an association which later expanded to include the leading producers of the théâtre d'avant-garde, Firmin Gémier and Gaston Baty (q.v.). Pitoëff produced Le Temps est un songe (Eng. tr., Time Is a Dream, 1923) in Geneva in 1919 and in Paris later the same year. This drama, the first of Lenormand's modern prose tragedies, portrays human destiny chained to the wheel of time in which past, present, and future are telescoped into a tragic dénouement. While this play brought wide critical acclaim, it was Gémier's production of Les Ratés (1920; Eng. tr., Failures, 1923) which started Lenormand on his world-wide success. Les Ratés, later produced in New York by the Theatre Guild in 1924, depicts the tragic career of a playwright and his actress wife, their physical and moral disintegration under the pressure of adversity. Le Simoun (1920), a study of the deleterious influence of the tropics on the subconscious incestuous passion of a father for his 18-year-old daughter, develops further the theme of man confronted by the powers of evil. Herein, too, Lenormand analyzes the problem of what the critic Edmond Sée has called "a climatic fatality" which undermines the morale and sanity of its victims. To reflect the elemental in human psychology, the author here and elsewhere has resorted to elemental forces of nature (a soul-sapping desert simoon, a menacing jungle, a mountain peak). Indeed, as some of his very titles suggest (e.g., A l'ombre du mal, 1924), Lenormand's plays are bathed in an atmosphere of Baudelairean evil (see Baudelaire) where flit the lurking phantoms of the subconscious soul.

The widely acclaimed Le Mangeur de rêves (1922; Eng. tr., The Dream Doctor, 1928) opens the series of psychoanalytical plays. Although Lenormand has vehemently denied that his theatre is based on Freudian abstractions, it is true that his characters are largely psychopathic. They present remarkably dramatic material to this modern prober of the soul, personified in Le Mangeur de rêves by Luc de Bronte, the "devourer of dreams" who delves into the subconscious life of his patients in order to free them from their inhibitions. L'Homme et ses fantômes (1924; Eng. tr., Man and His Phantoms, 1928) continues the psychoanalytical theme and portrays the subconscious life of a contemporary Don Juan. Asie (1931), a reworking of the Medea legend, and Pacifique (1937) revert to the climatic theme and analyze the ethnological problem of miscegenation.

Lenormand tries continually to identify himself with an amoral system which, rejecting the ideas of God and Devil, seeks ever, and ever through disillusionment, a natural and self-sufficing truth. In crude phraseology, the conflict is one between faith and science, between conscience (which Sarterre in Une Vie secrète calls "the cholera of modern man") and reason, between the dark ages as understood by Lenormand and his interpretation of the 20th century. This is the battlefield of his tragic dramas.

See: Henry Daniel-Rops, Sur le théâtre de H.-R. Lenormand (1926); John Palmer, Studies in the Contemporary Theatre (1927), pp. 65-93; A. J. Dickman, "Le Mal, force dramatique chez Lenormand," Romanic Review, XIX (1928), 218-231.

E. S.

León-Felipe (pseud. of León Felipe Camino, 1884-, Spanish poet), born in the province of Salamanca, has been defined by an American critic, B. D. Wolfe, as "the humblest and simplest of Spain's poets . . . at once mystic and equalitarian." He became known in Madrid with the volume Versos y oraciones de caminante (1920). It is a fitting title, for he has spent his life in wandering without apparent purpose, carrying about within him two preponderant emotions which he has unified in his work—poetry and a religious sense of life. Shortly after the publication of his poems he accepted a position as pharmacist (his professional career) in the African possession of Fernando Po. At the time it seems that some of his friends thought of a repetition of Rimbaud's (q.v.) flight. Later he established himself in Mexico. He has also lived for some time in the United States (teaching Spanish at Cornell University), in Spain, Panama, and France. His second book, Versos y oraciones de caminante, Libro II (1930), was published in New York by the Hispanic Institute. Here, to the intimate lyricism of a man without faith or roots in life which characterized his early poems, was added a strong influence of Whitman, whose work he has recently translated. His poetry now had a deep concern with the destiny of man and a slightly prophetic manner, intensified afterwards in the poem Drop a Star (1933) and in the books which followed. In an age of aesthetic and intellectual poetry León-Felipe has been a poet of moral accent. His moral attitude—poetry as a redeeming force of human evils and sorrows—springs from his interior life, but is identified at the same time with an almost mystical feeling for the tormented longings, the faith, and the failures of a quixotic and eternal Spain.

León-Felipe returned to Spain during the civil war thinking that a poet like himself, devoted to the cause of truth, justice, and freedom, had a mission to fulfill in the struggle of his people. At the end he went back to Mexico. In books and poems, written at times with an elegiac, prophetic, and despairing tone, at times with a dark humor (El payaso de las bofetadas y el pescador de caña, 1938; El hacha, 1939; El español del éxodo y del llanto, 1939), he has expressed the anguish of the defeated and exiled Spaniards and mingled it with his own. Poetry has become for him, in a sort of depersonalized lyricism, an arm for the liberation of man whom he sees threatened today by the destructive forces of man's selfishness. He has published recently Ganarás la luz (1943), a poetic confession of faith summing up most of his whole work and attitude.

See: B. D. Wolfe, "León Felipe, Poet of Spain's Tragedy," American Scholar, XII (1943), 330-338.

A. del R.

Leonov, Leonid (1899-, Russian novelist), born in Moscow, began his literary career by writing short stories in which he gave marked proof of stylistic instinct and versatility, with appreciable reminiscences of Dostoevski (q.v.). His first novel, Barsuki (The Badgers), appeared in 1924 and deals with the clash between town and village. Still reminiscent of Dostoevski his second novel, Vor (1925; Eng. tr., The Thief, 1931), describes a man tortured by remorse until he no longer lives sanely and becomes a gangster. In the end he achieves some hopes of recovery by a return to agricultural pursuits. In this novel the trace of Dostoevski is to be found in Leonov's constant search for the individualizing traits in human beings, his humane attachment for his fellow men, and his realistic portrayal of outcasts from bourgeois society. But where Dostoevski's basic philosophy was "salvation through suffering," Leonov pursues a more materialistic and infallible solution.

With Sot (1930; Eng. tr., Sot, 1931, American title, Soviet River, 1932) he offered a characteristic five-year plan construction novel relating to the erection of a paper mill on a North Russian water course, covering the whole project for the electrification and industrialization of the stream. Here the conflict is between the retrograde past and the progressive present. The Communists are opposed by the monks of an adjacent monastery, neighboring peasants instinctively cling to the old and fear the new, and the work of the builders is menaced by saboteurs. In spite of the routine plot, Leonov's character-drawing is as searching as in his earlier fiction.

In Skutarevski (1933; Eng. tr., 1936) Leonov discusses the problem of integrating middle-class specialists into socialist life. Skutarevski himself, a world-famous scientist, had always thought of himself as a solitary individual without much community with the surrounding masses. While on a special mission for Lenin he is introduced to a completely new ideology which he learns to understand and love. Through his younger associates Skutarevski comes into contact with factory workers, and his crowning achievement consists in reading to a group of them a treatise he has composed. Only in socialist society has he become fully aware of his existence as a responsible member of the human race instead of an isolated atom.

Leonov's plots appear on the whole schematic, but his psychological adroitness, evidently learned from Dostoevski, lends them additional and sometimes even engrossing interest.

See: G. Reavey and M. Slonim, Soviet Literature; an Anthology (1934), pp. 195-203; G. Struve, 25 Years of Soviet Russian Literature (1944), pp. 42-49, 261-264.

S. H. C.

León y Román, Ricardo (1877-1943, Spanish novelist), was born in Málaga, the son of an officer in the Spanish army. His father's untimely death made it necessary for him to give up early plans for a military career. He found employment, instead, with the Bank of Spain, first in its Málaga branch, later in Santander and in Madrid. His duties at the bank left him some leisure for writing, and he began to contribute poems and articles to the local newspapers. In 1901 his collected poems were published in a volume called Lira de bronce. His first novel, the story of a nobly born youth who neglects his ancient heritage for the frivolous gratification of his restless desires, was completed in 1905 and given the title El alma de las ruinas. After having been repeatedly rejected by Madrid publishers, it finally appeared in Málaga in 1908 as Casta de hidalgos (Eng. tr., A Son of the Hidalgos, 1921). It had immediate, overwhelming success. It was followed during the next four years by other novels—Comedia sentimental (1909), a tale of a late-flowering passion; Alcald de los Zegries (1909), the story of a conflict between a man's political ambitions and his domestic responsibilities; El amor de los amores (1910), a demonstration of the superiority of sacred to profane love; Los centauros (1912), an indictment of the futility and shallowness of modern life—by another book of poems, Alivio de caminantes (1911), and by La escuela de los sofistas (1910), a series of Socratic dialogues dealing with literature, science, and religion. All these early works are distinguished by a carefully wrought style, a rich background of regional color, and a marked ethical tendency.

Brought up in the conservative tradition of reverence for throne and altar, León was never converted to 20th-century liberalism with its belief in scientific progress and political democracy. Unlike most Spanish writers of his generation who, shocked by the national catastrophe of 1898, thought that their country's hope for the future lay in its gradual Europeanization, León steadfastly maintained that it was Spain's destiny to restore Christian morality to Europe by a rebirth of those virtues which had graced the Spaniards of the golden age. From 1912 to 1922 he wrote no novels, but produced two volumes of essays proclaiming this creed, La voz de la sangre (1915) and Los caballeros de la cruz (1916), as well as three volumes of his impressions of the First World War, Europa trágica (1918–1920). During the war years 1914–1918 he traveled as correspondent through the belligerent and neutral countries of Europe. His political and religious convictions were strengthened by what he saw there. The novels which appeared after 1922 became increasingly works of propaganda, arguments against the evils which he believed to be destroying the world: Amor de caridad (1922), against the philosophy of cynicism; Humos de rey (1923), against the irreligious frivolity of the younger generation; El hombre nuevo (1925), against the fallacies of "progress"; Los trabajadores de la muerte (1927), against the international "war makers"; Jauja (1928), against the vulgarities of modern life; Las niñas de mis ojos (1929), against the exaggerations of feminism; Bajo el yugo de los bárbaros (1932), against the revolution of 1931; Roja y gualda (1934), against the policies of the Second Republic. The program with which the Falangist Party entered the civil war (1936–1939) embodied the principal tenets of León's creed. After the party's triumph he wrote a novel entitled Cristo en los infiernos (1942?).

See: J. Casares, Crítica profana (1915), pp.

245–348; Andrenio (E. Gómez de Baquero), Novelas y novelistas (1918), pp. 245–270; J. T. Reid, Modern Spain and Liberalism (1937), pp. 139–225.

E. H. H.

Lerberghe, Charles van, see Van Lerberghe.

Lersch, Heinrich (1889–1936, German poet and novelist), was born at München-Gladbach, learned the trade of his father, a boiler-maker, and traveled extensively in Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Italy, Belgium, and Holland. He took part in the First World War and established his literary fame with his song Soldatenabschied (1914). After the war he continued his father's business for a while, but gave it up in 1925 in order to devote himself exclusively to his writing. He died at Bodendorf.

Lersch is essentially a lyric writer with a strong tendency towards the philosophical and even the mystical. Although an ardent student of socialistic theories, he never became a member of the powerful Social Democratic Party because he did not believe in class war and revolution. Instead of preaching the destruction of the machine and of the social political system built thereupon (as the expressionistic activists did), he attempted an inner reconciliation of the individual with the machine by depriving both of their absolute power and by making them equally important factors in the creation of a national brotherhood based on love and sacrifice. The spiritual ruler in this ethical community being Jesus Christ, Lersch's original Catholicism assumed the form of a realistic mysticism which sanctifies life and makes of art, science, nature, technics, and industries creative contributors in the divine symphony. The form and style of Lersch's poetry is as undogmatic as his philosophy. Although stanzas and rhymes predominate in his earlier works (Abglanz des Lebens, 1914; Herz, aufglühe dein Blut, 1916; Deutschland, 1917), he never follows conventional patterns, but takes great liberties with rhythm and choice of words, often going to forced extremes. In his later poetic works (Mensch im Eisen, 1924; Stern und Amboss, 1926; Mit brüderlicher Stimme, 1934) he definitely finds his own musical form; the power of Luther, the sublimity of Klopstock, the impetuosity of Beethoven, and the dynamic realism of Walt Whitman are welded together into a forceful symphony. In his prose books (Hammerschläge, 1931; Mut und Übermut, 1934; Die Pioniere von Eilenburg, 1934; Im Pulsschlag der Ma- schinen, 1935) Lersch describes, sometimes with grotesque humor, but always with deep earnestness, experiences of his own wanderings and the sorrows, longings, and pleasures of his fellow workers; in Manni (1927) he portrays with striking charm and simplicity the development of his son.

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Neue Folge: Im Banne des Expressionismus, 4. Auflage (1927), pp. 531–538; W. Mahrholz, Deutsche Literatur der Gegenwart (1930), pp. 277–278, 436–437; F. Lennartz, Die Dichter unserer Zeit (1938), pp. 175–176.

E. J.

Leśmian, Bolesław (pseud. of Bolesław Lesman, 1878–1937, Polish poet), was born in Warsaw and educated in Kiev. His early poems appeared in Życie (Life), the organ of Young Poland (see Polish literature), and in its Warsaw counterpart, Chimera. A poet of the imagination, divorced from reality and embracing with passion every experience of the senses, Leśmian was one of the few living poets in Free Poland linked with the neo-romantics of the Young Poland movement. A poet not for the masses but for other poets, Leśmian won notice among the latter for his collection Łąka (1920; The Meadow). Napój cienisty (1936; Shadowy Potion) and the posthumous Dziejba leśna (1938; Sylvan Tale) are representative of Leśmian's later style. Several of Edgar Allan Poe's tales have found their way into Polish through Leśmian's translations.

See: K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, II (1934), 64–68, 380–381; A. Szczerbowski, Bolesław Leśmian (1938).

A. P. C.

Lettish literature or Latvian literature. Under the influence of the German romanticists and the ancient Latin poets studied in school, there arose in the middle of the 19th century a genuine Lettish literature in those parts of the Baltic provinces which in 1918 were to form the republic of Latvia. Launched by the patriots Christian Valdemārs (1825–1891), George Alūnāns (1832–1864), and Christian Barons (1835–1923), Lettish national romanticism (about 1850–1890), often indiscriminating and uncritical in the choice of material, drew its inspiration primarily from folk poetry and legendary antiquities. In spite of serious efforts, none of the poets of that period excelled in their achievement the natural beauty of the folk songs collected by Christian Barons in Latvju Dainas (7 vols., 1894–1915; Lettish Folk Songs). After 1890 the Russian socialist movement began to express itself in Lettish, where it was directed against the German ruling class, but German literary movements still continued their influence. The impressionistic movement reached Latvia around the turn of the century and was represented by several persons who later were to play an important role in Lettish letters (especially Aspazija, whose Sarkanās puķes, Crimson Flowers, was published in 1897). Rudolf Blaumanis (1863–1908) wrote technically efficient plays in a realistic style, e.g., the comedy Skroderdienas Silmačos (1902; Tailoring Days in Silmači) and the tragedies Pazudušais dēls (1893; The Prodigal Son), Indrāni (1903; The Indrānses), and Ugunī (1914; In the Furnace). Neo-romanticism continued the earlier national movement with which it shared a strong interest in folklore. Some of the outstanding Lettish writers are neo-romanticists, e.g., the lyrists Anna Brigadere (1861–1933) and Karl Skalbe (1879–), and, towering over all the others, Rainis (pseud. of John Pliekšāns, 1865–1929).

Rainis, the leading figure in Lettish literature, was both a poet and a political leader; he had to spend part of his life as a refugee abroad. After the establishment of the Latvian republic he was elected to Parliament and in 1927 became minister of education. His literary career began with a translation of Goethe's Faust (1898) which was followed by original verse, chiefly lyrical. However, his greatest achievement lies in the dramatic field. His first drama, Uguns un nakts (Fire and Night), appeared in 1905, to be followed in later years by Zelta zirgs (1910; The Golden Horse), Indulis un Arija (1911; Induls and Aria), Pūt, vējiņi (1913; Blow, Breeze), Jāzeps un viņa brāļi (1919; Joseph and His Brethren), Ilja Muromietis (1923; Ilja of Murom), and others. Aspazija (pseud. of Elsa Rozenberge, 1868–), the leading woman writer, was Rainis's wife, and the two shared a prestige hardly paralleled in the literature of any other nation. Aspazija, who had started out in 1894 with the drama Vaidelote (The Vestal) and soon added socialism and romantic impressionism to her activities, had enriched Lettish literature with an imposing body of poetry and drama. Representative of her later lyric poetry are Asteru laikā (1927; In Aster Time) and Dvēseles ceļojums (1933; A Soul's Journey). In the field of modern fiction, Andrew Niedra (1871–1942) and Jacob Janševskis (1865–1931) deserve mention. Niedra, a Lutheran pastor, established his reputation with excellent novels and stories dealing with pre-war Lettish life and aspirations.

Since he headed a pro-German government during the German occupation of the First World War, he had to go into exile after the establishment of the independent Latvian republic. Janševskis, who had started in 1890 as a poet in the national vein, obtained prominence as a novelist after the war with Dzimtene (1921-25; Native Earth), Bandava (1928), and Mežvidus ļaudis (1929; Mid-Forest Folk).

The nationalistic trends innate to Lettish literature were even more emphasized after 1934 when Latvia came under an authoritarian regime. A special attempt was made to put dramatic production in the service of the new system. As in Germany, the open-air theatre with gigantic pageants was especially used for this purpose.

See: T. Zeiferts, "Latviešu nacionālā literatūra," in Latvieši, Rakstu krājums (1930); U. Katzenelenbogen, The Daina; an Anthology of Lithuanian and Latvian Folk-Songs with a Critical Study and a Preface (1935); W. K. Matthews, The Tricolour Sun; Latvian Lyrics in English Versions, an Essay on Latvian Poetry, and Critical Commentaries (1936); R. Kroders, Le Théâtre des fêtes lettonnes (1937).
A. Se.

Levertin, Oskar (1862-1906, Swedish poet, critic, and writer of prose fiction), was born at Norrköping in the south of Sweden and studied at Uppsala. Later he taught in Stockholm and wrote reviews. He lived under the shadow of ill health and spent much time in Davos, where he became intimate with Verner von Heidenstam. Of Jewish extraction, he early developed the lonely, introspective mood of the Orient. Yet he exerted a wide influence in his time as poet, short-story writer and critic.

There is a rich and haunting grace in his Legender och visor (1891; Legends and Songs), although his poetry may often appear somewhat oppressive, like the perfume of hot-house flowers. He is nearly always the self-absorbed visionary, in an ivory tower. The mystic note comes out most strongly in Kung Saloms och Morolf (1905; King Solomon and Morolf). In his prose creations, especially in Rokokonoveller (1899; Stories of Rococo), he is more objective and even develops a lively wit. An accomplished scholar and teacher, he interested himself deeply in the past of Sweden, writing with charm and penetration of art, literature, and history. The realistic trend of his contemporaries did not please him, and he was slow to recognize even such a genius as Fröding. With Heiden-stam he had a greater affinity through the cosmopolitan outlook which they shared.

It is as a lover of beauty, both in prose and verse, that he stands out most conspicuously. His sensitivity is exquisite, his command of phrase and imagery unerring. His most stimulating motif is the joy of his artist solitude on a snow-clad peak lifted far above the common throng, where he "may quaff the blue disdain of the crystal ether." It is a proof of Sweden's catholicity of taste that a writer with Levertin's morbidezza is cherished in the country of his spiritual adoption.

See: C. W. Stork, Anthology of Swedish Lyrics (1917; revised and enlarged ed., 1930); J. Mortensen, Från Röda rummet till sekelskiftet (1919); F. Böök, Sveriges moderna litteratur (1921), also published as Vol. III of O. Sylwan, ed., Svenska litteraturens historia (1919-1921), pp. 212-238.

C. W. S.

Libedinski, Yuri (1898-, Russian novelist and playwright), was born in the Urals, son of a physician. After graduation from a technical school he joined the Communist Party in 1920 and devoted himself to activity in proletarian literary organizations. In the 20's Libedinski belonged to the October Group and was one of the editors of the literary review Na postu (On Guard). In his novels and short stories he attempted to portray various types of Russian Communists (Nedelya, 1922, Eng. tr., A Week, 1923; Zavtra, 1923, Tomorrow; Komissary, 1923, The Commissars; Na povorote, 1929, The Turning Point). Nedelya, which describes revolutionary events in a provincial town, with emphasis on their international implications, was hailed by Soviet critics as a transition from romantic abstraction to concrete realism in Russian modern prose. In Rozhdeniye geroya (1930; The Birth of a Hero) Libedinski tried not only to represent his protagonists as men of action absorbed in the gigantic task of reconstruction, but also as human beings, whose life is commanded by love, anxiety, or other emotions. In the controversy on methods of Soviet literature, which divided the writers of the U.S.S.R. in the early 30's, Libedinski declared himself a disciple of the Tolstoyan school (see Tolstoy, Leo) of psychological realism. He stated that "spontaneous impressions form the foundations of art." During the war Libedinski published Guardeitsy (1942; The Guards), a broad picture of heroic deeds and hardships of a Red army division on the Russo-German Southern front. Libedinski's main aim is to combine the social novel with the analysis of psychological motivations of human actions. His plays (e.g., Vysoty, 1929, The Heights) are less popular in the U.S.S.R. than his novels.

M. S.

Lidin, Vladimir (1894–, Russian novelist and short-story writer), born in Moscow, son of a businessman, was graduated from the Moscow Institute of Oriental Languages and later from the University of Moscow in law. He worked in army auxiliary services during the First World War, served four years in the Red army, traveled extensively throughout the U.S.S.R. and Europe. Lidin started to write before the Revolution. His first two books of short stories, which bore the mark of Chekhov's and Bunin's (q.v.) influence, were published in 1916 and 1917. Since 1923 Lidin has published several novels and hundreds of short stories, closely related in their style and literary devices to the Russian realism of the beginning of the 20th century. His best novels are Renegat (1927; The Renegade), a broad picture of Muscovite life during the period of NEP (New Economic Policy); Iskateli (1929; The Seekers), devoted to Siberian gold diggers; Veliki ili Tikhi (1932; The Pacific), in which the nature and social conditions of the Russian Far East are vividly represented. He is less successful in Mogila neizvestnogo soldata (1931; The Unknown Soldier's Grave), an attempt to show the decline and moral disintegration of the ruling classes in France. Lidin is at his best when he depicts the Russian extreme North and the struggle of strong willful men against inhospitable nature. His descriptions of nature also occupy an important part in his short stories. Soviet critics classify Lidin among the representatives of the old intelligentsia who knew how to adapt themselves to the new regime. A skillful and intelligent writer, Lidin however lacks power and originality; his style is heavy and slightly pompous. In 1941–1944 Lidin served as war correspondent on various sectors of the Russo-German front and wrote war stories.

M. S.

Lidman, Sven (1882–, Swedish lyric poet and novelist), born in Karlskrona, is the most striking example of the uncompromising extremist among living Swedish authors. He began his literary career with a number of volumes of poetry and drama (Pasiphaë, 1904; Primavera, 1905; Källorna, 1906, The Springs; Elden och altaret, 1907, Fire and the Altar; Imperia, 1907; and Härskare, 1918, Masters) which express in the most daring forms a philosophy of sensuality combined with a superman complex. But in the middle period of his development Lidman turned to strenuous preaching of concepts of social responsibility, moral duty, and the necessity of sacrifice in a series of genealogical novels on the Silfverstååhl family, beginning with Stensborg (1910), and closing with Tvedräktens barn (1913; Children of Dissension). This remarkable evolution ended in his becoming a fanatical convert to the present-day Swedish Pentecostal movement. Though there is a fairly obvious psychological consistency in this whirligig of extremist positions, the various rapid metamorphoses that Lidman undergoes are difficult enough otherwise to follow and explain; and the effect on his literary production has not always been happy. Of his work the novels are unquestionably best. Lidman's plays are of no importance. His lyric poetry is vivid and colorful and technically fluid and efficient; but it is frequently overflorid, wordy, and monotonous—at times, indeed, all but hysterical in its strained searching for sensual intensities of an at least half-perverse kind. It is on the whole little more than an immature Swedish rehash of Baudelaire (q.v.) and Swinburne.

The Silfverstååhl novels, on the other hand, are much more noteworthy, especially in their handling of episode and milieu, and on occasion in their treatment of character. In general construction they are weaker. It should be mentioned also that the heroic ethical theme of these novels, worked out against an immediate Swedish background, is of some interest as a contribution to a kind of activist nationalism which played a certain interesting if not very important part in internal political discussion in Sweden during the First World War, when Lidman was the publisher of Svensk lösen (Swedish Watchword), a periodical devoted to the Swedish activist program of the day. Lidman's growing religious preoccupations during these years, however, are responsible for his best novel, Huset med de gamla fröknarna (1918; The House with the Spinsters), a sympathetic and on the whole subtly penetrating account of the withdrawn existences of some elderly ladies of a disappearing gentle class, who find themselves neglected and forgotten by a thoughtless, brutal modern world which worships only material success, but who manage somehow to retain their spiritual identity in the midst of all the hostile forces about them. This quiet, pathos-filled tale is prophetic of Lidman himself, who, in 1921, withdrew from "the things of this world" and became a member of a despised religious sect, Friends of the Pentecost. Since this date his production has restricted itself to strictly religious themes, mostly in the form of devotional works and sermons.

See: O. Levertin, Svensk litteratur, I (1908); S. Söderman, Böcker och författare (1918); F. Böök, Resa kring svenska Parnassen (1926) pp. 116-141; K. Strömberg, Modern svensk litteratur (1932) pp. 122-126; G. Castrén, Den nya tiden, 1870-1914 (1932), Vol. VII of H. Schück and K. Warburg, Illustrerad svensk litteratur-historia, 3d ed., pp. 455-461.

A. G.

Lie, Jonas (1833-1909, Norwegian novelist), was born at Eiker, near Drammen, in southern Norway, but when he was only five years old the family removed to Tromsö. This arctic town, with the glamor of its nightless summers and the terror of its winter storms, with the excitement of fishing and seafaring, and with the exotic element furnished by Russian traders, Lapps, and Finns, became the inspiration of the future author. His first book, a short novel entitled Den fremsynte (1870; Eng. tr., The Visionary, 1894), is a delicate and frangible love story against a Nordland background. After some less successful books came his masterpiece, Lodsen og hans hustru (1874; Eng. tr., The Pilot and His Wife, 1876), followed by Rutland (1880) and Gaa paa (1882; Go Ahead). These were novels of the seafaring class, which in Norway is part of the middle class, but were tales of family life rather than sea stories properly speaking, though they contain magnificent descriptions of storms at sea. In Gaa paa Jonas Lie created his favorite type of hero, the young enterprising practical man who burns with lust of action and shatters traditions, somewhat on the American late 19th-century order. It was the author's reaction against the academic and bureaucratic traditions that throttled life in Norway.

In Familien paa Gilje (1883; Eng. tr., The Family at Gilje, 1920) Lie gave a sympathetic picture of life in the milieu to which he himself belonged, the professional and official class. In his early stories he had created a new type of heroine, strong, self-reliant, generous, and warmhearted—removed as far as possible from the romantic Griselda type. In The Family at Gilje he shows himself sensitively aware of how women in the educated classes were oppressed. The mother, isolated from all social contacts, is worn out by the endless tasks of a big household with its army of servants and dependents; the daughters are pushed into marriages with elderly suitors, because their young lovers have no prospect of being able to provide homes for them. But in spite of its tragic conflicts The Family at Gilje has an idyllic charm which, together with its veracity, places it at the head of Lie's production. Kommandørens døtre (1886; Eng. tr., The Commodore's Daughters, 1892) is a more bitter arraignment of the social tyranny that ruins the happiness of young girls. Et samliiv (1887; A Marriage) describes how happiness dribbles out because husband and wife are not companions. Livsslaven (1883; Eng. tr., One of Life's Slaves, 1895), a story of the slums, and Maisa Jons (1888), the tale of a poor seamstress, were Lie's contribution to the social discussion of the day. In general, however, although Lie sympathized with all who suffered, he refused to follow the lead of Copenhagen and turn his stories into a platform of debate on the problems of the day. As a consequence the Brandes brothers ignored him, and his contemporaries at home found fault with him, but to the modern reader he seems to have lost less with the passage of time than those who criticized him.

Jonas Lie won the enduring affection of his countrymen with his clear-eyed stories of everyday family life which always brought a thrill of recognition. As he grew older, however, a submerged mystical quality rose to the surface in his mind and found expression in two volumes of short stories, Trold (1891-1892; Trolls), in which Lapp magic and Norwegian superstition are strangely blended. They conceive of human beings as still in part bound by the mysterious forces of nature. Many of these little stories are classics of their kind, written in a simple epic style that contrasts with the scintillating, impressionistic style of his novels. In his later novels, written somewhat in the old manner, there is a new element of pessimism and a persistence of the belief in obscure forces working in the human mind for evil. This is true, for instance, of Onde magter (1890; Evil Powers), Niobe (1893), and Dyre Rein (1896).

Jonas Lie was very happily married to his cousin, Thomasine Lie, who collaborated in his work. They lived for many years abroad, in Rome, Paris, and Berchtesgaden, but returned in 1906 to spend their old age in Norway. It was not for long. She died in 1907, he in 1909.

See: A. Garborg, Jonas Lie (1893); H. A. Larsen, "Jonas Lie," American-Scandinavian

Review, XXI (1933), 461-471; A. Gustafson, Six Scandinavian Novelists (1940), pp. 25-72.
H. A. L.

Liliencron, Detlev von (1844-1909, German poet), was born at Kiel, spent most of his life in North Germany, and died in Hamburg. His father, a baron, lived in straitened circumstances as a customs official; his mother, Adeline von Harten, born in Philadelphia, was the daughter of a general of German origin who had served under George Washington. Liliencron fought and was wounded in the war of 1866 against Austria and in the Franco-Prussian War. To his deep regret, the young officer had to resign from the army because of debts. From 1875 to 1877 he eked out a miserable existence in the United States as a painter, trainer of horses, teacher of piano and language, and pianist in beer halls. After a few years of service as a minor governmental official, he resigned in 1885 and devoted himself to letters. Throughout much of his life he was harassed by creditors.

Liliencron never lost his enthusiasm for military life; his early experiences as a soldier made an indelible impression on him and are portrayed again and again in his writings. He was a lover of music, horses, dogs, hunting, forests, fields, moors, fens, his native North German heath, streams, and the tempestuous North Sea. A man of elemental vigor, he reveled in outdoor life; he viewed nature with senses that were keenly alert, and the impressionistic character of much of his writing is due to this sensibility and a marked gift of vivid reproduction. Although there are elements of naturalism and particularly of impressionism in his writings, he belonged to no school and was not given to theorizing on art.

Liliencron was an ardent admirer of women, of their physical charm, vitality, beauty, and strength of affection. When he wrote of love, it usually was requited love, with its exultation, healthy sensuousness, and vibrant joy. Although he chided human foibles, he had too much energy and joy of living to be a pessimist. His works reveal the repose, freedom, companionship, deepening of life and instinct, that he found in animate nature.

As a writer of longer, sustained works Liliencron had little success. His dramas (e.g., Knut der Herr, 1885; Die Merowinger, 1888) lack significant character portrayal, compelling motivation, and carefully developed plots. Although they contain occasional elements of poetic beauty, they have not proved effective on the stage. After 1888 he wrote no more plays. In the novel, too, he found it difficult to construct well-rounded, unified plots (Mäzen, 1890; Mit dem linken Ellbogen, 1899). Their structure is weak and episodic; the characters reflect the author, his experiences, traits, tastes, and desires. As a narrator Liliencron was at his best in short, vivid, impressionistic sketches such as his Kriegsnovellen (1895), in which there are momentary pictures with high lights and vivid coloring. Though he loved the life of the soldier, he portrayed its hardships, privations, suffering, and horror as well as its adventuresomeness, comradeship, heroism and stimulating excitement. His lengthy verse epic, Poggfred, written over a long period of years, from 1896 to 1906, lacks unity of form, theme, and structure. It too presents a picture of the author's own inner life, and since he often abandoned himself to the caprice of the moment, form and content are not always in harmony. Much of Poggfred represents a compensatory ideal, an escape from the shortcomings of troublesome reality.

In his ballads (Balladen-Chronik, 1906) there is much of the eerie gruesomeness of the folk ballad. Many of their themes are drawn from old chronicles and legends, from the history of his ancestors and of Schleswig-Holstein. Liliencron's highest achievement is in the lyric (Adjutantenritte, 1883; Gesammelte Gedichte, 1897). His best lyrics are spontaneous, their suggestive imagery has a warm, sensuous appeal to eye and ear, their effect is direct and immediate. He had a marked sense of rhythm, used a great variety of stanza forms, disliked impure rimes, and used embellishments of verse with considerable restraint. His wide range of diction was enriched by the vigorous dialect of his region; he derived many daring and sharply pointed verbs from nouns. Fond of music, he had a splendid ear for vowel coloring and varied sound effects. Humor and playful irony are not lacking. He brought renewed life, simplicity, and spontaneity to the German lyric and had considerable influence on minor poets like Otto Julius Bierbaum (q.v.), Carl Busse (q.v.) and Gustav Falke (1853-1916). Poems by Liliencron were set to music by numerous composers, among them Brahms, Pfitzner, Max Reger, and Richard Strauss. Wide recognition came to him rather late in life.

See: H. Spiero, Detlev von Liliencron; sein Leben und seine Werke (1913); H. Maync, Detlev von Liliencron (1920).

J. C. B.

Linares Rivas, Manuel (1867–1938, Spanish dramatist), son of a prominent politician, was born in Santiago de Compostela and prepared for a career in law and politics. He soon gave up the law, though he continued his political career as deputy to the Cortes and finally as life senator. All the while he was pouring out a considerable stream of plays. He has written several musical comedies in verse and made a translation of Franz Lehár's The Merry Widow. His highly romantic three-act play Lady Godiva (1912) is also in verse. Most of the plays of Linares Rivas, however, are brilliant, sometimes militant, and usually witty satires of contemporary Spanish life, of social or political problems. The author is commonly thought of as a follower, even an imitator, of Jacinto Benavente (q.v.). It should be pointed out that Benavente, especially in his earlier period, is pessimistic and that he usually satirizes fundamental defects in human character, whereas Linares Rivas is generally cheerful and is likely to attack external or ephemeral mistakes, which a change in a law, for example, might correct. He began with Aire de fuera (1903), more tragic in tone than most of his later works. A good woman, bound by law to a bad husband, finds her only solution in suicide, since divorce was impossible in Spain. (It was legalized by the Republic of 1931 and abolished again, of course, by Franco.) El abolengo (1904) is a satire against silly family pride. In María Victoria (1904) is portrayed a woman who sacrifices love to duty and finds contentment in resignation. La cizaña (1905) protests against slander. El caballero Lobo (1910), with animal protagonists, was actually prior to the Chantecler of Rostand (q.v.). La garra (1914) is a strong plea for divorce and created considerable excitement in conservative circles. En cuerpo y alma (1918) and La jaula de la leona (1924) amusingly but firmly teach devotion to duty. Numerous further plays show Linares Rivas as an admirable purveyor of rapidly written, graceful, though not very profound samples of the alta comedia.

See: A. González-Blanco, Los dramaturgos españoles contemporáneos, Ser. 1 (1917), pp. 171–204; A. F. G. Bell, Contemporary Spanish Literature, revised ed. (1933), pp. 178–179.

N. B. A.

Linati, Carlo (1878–, Italian novelist, critic, and translator), born in Como, was seldom far from that region during his lifetime and never separated from it in his thoughts. His first appearance on the literary scene was in magazines of a very advanced and futuristic nature, but his contributions were in marked contrast to the authors generally represented there. Where the tendency of the period was one of boldness, of breaking with tradition, of a deliberate striving for the new, of internationalism, Linati's simple, well-knit prose, his economy of expression, his searching for the right word, his respect for syntax, his nostalgic adherence to the Milanese tradition, might almost be interpreted as a form of reaction and protest. His autobiographical novel Duccio da bontà (1913), which has tender passages, shows the anguish and heartaches experienced by a youth in his first encounters with life. Renunciation is reached as a solution to the problem in Barbogeria (1917), but it is a renunciation attained more from an adherence to the social code than through any deep-seated moral conviction. In Sulle orme di Renzo (1919) Linati's interests—which are for the most part directed at a perfection of style more as a scholarly device rather than as an expression of the mind—are turned towards recapturing the spirit of the region from which Manzoni drew inspiration. His style here acquires real warmth and fervor. The value of the book consists chiefly in the penetrating study of how the characteristics of the Lombardy region affect those sprung from its soil; in the identification of the individual with the countryside, Linati approaches a form of pantheism. The Celtic blood, allegedly flowing in the veins of both the Irish and of the inhabitants of parts of Lombardy, and the Irish countryside, similar in some respects to the Lombardy region, made a strong appeal to a slightly mystic quality in Linati's nature. In the writings of Lady Gregory, Synge, and Yeats he found an answering echo of kindred spirits. He translated W. B. Yeats (Tragedie irlandesi, 1914), Lady Gregory (Commedie irlandesi, 1916), and Synge (Il Furfantello dell'Ovest, e altri drammi, 1917). His interest in Anglo-American culture has expressed itself in a series of very fine critical essays on T. S. Eliot, Ernest Hemingway, Ezra Pound, Herman Melville, Aldous Huxley, Virginia Woolf, and others (Scrittori anglo-americani d'oggi, 1932). In the Nuova Antologia (September 1, 1934), he translated into Italian poems of Emanuel Carnevali, an Italian immigrant in the United States whose verse written in English had elicited the praise of Waldo Frank, Sherwood Anderson, and others. To Linati must go a large share of the credit for first bringing many of these American authors to the attention of the Italian reading public.

Linati has not in the least changed the flow of Italian letters nor chartered any new courses, yet by faithfully following in the tradition of the Lombardy writers, he most definitely has added new life and vitality to that tradition.

See: G. Papini, 24 Cervelli (1913), pp. 179-189; P. Pancrazi, Ragguagli di Parnaso (1919-1920) (1920), pp. 31-37; L. Russo, I Narratori (1923), pp. 158-160.

G. S.

Linde, Otto zur (1873-, German poet), born in Essen, was for many years the leading figure of a literary group which centered around the magazine Charon, founded by Linde and Rudolf Pannwitz (1881-) in Berlin in the year 1904. The magazine struggled along under great difficulties and with many personal sacrifices on the part of the editors until the outbreak of the First World War; in 1920 it reappeared as the Charon-Nothefte. Although never exerting any lasting influence on the course of modern German literature, Charon was in many ways characteristic of the intellectual tendencies at the beginning of the present century. It reacted against naturalism (as did the more important circle of Stefan George, q.v.), even though the theories developed by the "Charon" group were largely derived from those of the naturalist lyric Arno Holz (q.v.). The relationship of the "Charon" poets to Holz was a mixture of hate and admiration (see Linde's Arno Holz und der Charon, 1911). It appears that the influence of Nietzsche (q.v.) was particularly strong upon these poets, as on Rudolf Paulsen (1883-), the son of the Berlin philosopher Friedrich Paulsen, on Rudolf Pannwitz and Hanns Meinke (1884-), and on Otto zur Linde himself. Here again a parallel can be drawn to George's circle, with the reservation that "Charon" radically rejected all demands for a new classicism. "Charon" at all times refused to adhere to any dogma, even that of antidogmatism. Hence these poets demanded of the lyricist genuineness and originality and tried to create a verse which would be free of all traces of traditional melodics. They were predominantly lyric poets themselves, yet with a definite interest in philosophic and theoretical problems. The most representative work of the group was Linde's Die Kugel (1906-1909; 2d ed., 1923), a "philosophy in verses."

No matter how firmly the philosophy of the "Charon" group was rooted in Nietzsche, in religious and political questions they went their own way. In fact, a deeply religious trend goes through the entire work of the "Charon" poets. This is particularly true of Karl Röttger (1877-), who considered Jesus the exemplary man, and of Rudolf Paulsen in his Christus und der Wanderer (1920), in which he tried to harmonize the philosophy of Nietzsche with Christianity. Their religious inclination often led to a modern mysticism, and the "Charon" poets have written an endless number of myths and legends. This mysticism, coupled with a one-sided emphasis on the Teutonic element in intellectual and political matters, has led some of the members of the group to the dim and semimystical ideologies of National Socialism. Karl Röttger is today probably the best known of the "Charon" poets. He has been successful with a number of books of verses and essays, a few novels, and one or two dramas.

W. P.

Lithuanian literature. During the second half of the 19th century the trends of Lithuanian literature were determined by three factors: the Russian government's official ban (1865-1904) on printing in Latin characters, the abolition of serfdom (1861), and the revolutionary movements agitating all parts of the Russian Empire. The first factor, aiming at complete Russification of the country and coupled with deportation of all "dangerous" elements, might have been successful, had it not been for the opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy who recognized in the Russification drive a serious danger to the Church. On account of this active opposition and the passive resistance of the population, the attempts to bring out Lithuanian books printed with Russian characters failed and were given up after 1871. The need for reading material was satisfied by pamphlets and books published in Tilsit, East Prussia, and smuggled into the country. The first to start this practice was Bishop Motiejus Valančius (1801-1875) who, however, had only the interests of the Roman Catholic Church in mind. Twenty years later the first political and literary magazine, Aušra (Dawn), liberal in tendency, was founded by Dr. Jonas Basanavičius (1851-1927), a refugee living in Bulgaria who became the patriarch of the Lithuanian national revival. Aušra, published in Tilsit, appeared from 1883 to 1886 and had a deep influence upon the life of the nation. Almost equal in importance was Varpas (1889-1905; The Bell), a monthly journal of leftist leanings whose guiding spirit was Dr. Vincas Kudirka (1858–1899), the author of the Lithuanian national anthem. The journals Apžvalga (1890–1896; The Review) and Tėvynės sargas (1896–1904; The Guard of the Fatherland) were organs of the Roman Catholic clergy and had among their collaborators and supporters the inspiring poet and glowing patriot, Maironis (pseud. of Reverend Jonas Mačiulis-Maciulevičius, 1862–1932); the didactic poet, encyclopedist, and literary critic, Adomas Jakštas (pseud. of Reverend Aleksandras Dambrauskas, 1860–1938); and the fiery publicist and successful novelist, Vaižgantas (pseud. of Reverend Juozas Tumas, 1869–1933), founder of Tėvynės sargas and its editor, 1897–1902. Quite independently of these magazines, Petras Vileišis (1850–1926) brought out a number of books in St. Petersburg, for which he obtained special permission from the Russian government. He also founded the first Lithuanian daily newspaper in Vilna after the ban on Lithuanian literature had been lifted. For fear of police persecution all publications of the first period had to come out either anonymously or with fictitious names. The use of pseudonyms became so common that it was carried over even into the period when danger was gone.

At the beginning of the Forty Years of Captivity (1865–1905) the Lithuanian spirit was kept alive by the poems of Bishop Antanas Baranauskas (1835–1902), such as Anykščių šilelis (1858–1859; The Grove of Anykščiai). About the turn of the century Maironis aroused the nation and became its spiritual leader with his patriotic songs composed in classical meters, the first of which appeared in Apžvalga and which were later published in the collection Pavasario balsai (1905, 5th ed., 1920, 6th ed., 1927; Voices of Spring). His longer poems include Lietuva (1888; Lithuania), Jaunoji Lietuva (1895, 1905, 1908, 1921; Young Lithuania), Raseinių Magdė (1909; Maggie of Raseiniai), and Mūsų vargai (1921; Our Trials).

The older generation is completely dominated by Russian and Polish literature. To be sure, Kudirka translated some of Schiller's dramas (e.g., Wilhelm Tell), but that was an outgrowth of the great popularity which this German classic enjoyed in Russia. Influence of Puškin, Krylov, Tolstoy (q.v.), Turgenev (q.v.), Gogol, Chekhov (q.v.), Mickiewicz, and Kraszewski is notable everywhere. The Russian populist movement with its emphasis upon service to the peasantry was accepted by virtually all, even by those who politically were not in sympathy with it (Apžvalga and Tėvynės sargas). But to the Lithuanian patriot, "peasant" meant and was identical with "Lithuanian," since the aristocracy of the country, i.e., the landed gentry, was Polish or Russian, and the city population Jewish. Vaižgantas, a most prolific producer of prose of unequal literary value, a man of inconsistency and contradictions, always giving vent to the impressions of the moment, tries to reconcile nihilistic rationalism with his Roman Catholic faith. This liberal tendency and his unbounded vivacity, together with a thoroughly sensual nature which breaks through continually in his writings, more than once earned him rebukes from the Church authorities. In his docile and naïve way he always took the reprimands as deserved and tried to follow the advice received, only to get into some new trouble very soon. In his earlier days he defended the rights of the peasants, but after the establishment of the Lithuanian republic he denounced the agrarian reform and sided with the wealthy landowners. Of permanent significance is his novel Pragiedruliai (in 3 parts and 4 vols., 1918–1929; Sunbeams), depicting in a loosely connected series of portraits (the liberal country doctor and his helpers, the Jewish book smuggler, the clergy, the peasants, the decadent aristocrats, the Russian police) the struggle for Lithuanian culture during the latter part of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th century. The introductory chapter portraying symbolically the long and severe "Lithuanian Winter" and the sudden and destructive "Spring Thaws" is a masterpiece both in effectiveness and style. The successful outcome of that battle for cultural emancipation is also presented in the novel Tėviškė (2 vols., 1926–1936; Homestead) by Vaidilutė (pseud. of Ona Pleirytė-Puidienė, 1885–1935).

Varpas printed the first literary attempts of Žemaitė (pseud. of Julija Žymantienė, 1845–1921), the first and most successful woman writer of short stories. In a realistic style she portrayed scenes, sometimes serene, but more often gloomy, of Lithuanian peasant life which was just getting free from the chains of serfdom. Three younger women, Lazdynų Pelėda (pseud. of two sisters, Sofija Ivanauskaitė-Pšibilauskienė, 1867–1926, and Marija Ivanauskaitė, 1873–) and Šatrijos Ragana (pseud. of Marija Pečkauskaitė, 1878–1930), followed Žemaitė's example, though in a more optimistic vein.

During the third and fourth decades of the present century, i.e., the period of national independence, Lithuanian literature is dominated by the towering figure of Vincas

Krėvė (Vincas Krėvė-Mickevičius, 1882–). A student of Slavic literature, Sanskrit, European, and Oriental history, and of folklore, he was strongly influenced by the Polish romanticists and the Russian populists. He first wrote poems in the style of the Lithuanian folk songs, then turned to prose, short story and drama becoming his specialty. His prose is rhythmic and melodious, his style based on the language of the folk tales and songs. In his Dainavos šalies senų žmonių padavimai (Legends Told by Old People of the Dainava Country), some of which appeared first in 1913 and a complete collection in 1921, and in the historical dramas, Sarūnas (1911), Skirgaila (1925), and Mindaugo mirtis (1935; The Death of Mindaugas), he is a romanticist. His short stories (3 vols., 1921–1922) dealing with modern rural life and his play Žentas (1922; The Son-in-Law) display a realistic approach combining fine psychological observation with a tendency to point out existing evils. Pratjekabuddha, a Hindu tale, was first published in 1913 and later included in the collection Rytų pasakos (1930; Oriental Tales). In Likimo keliais (2 vols., 1926 and 1929; On the Paths of Fate), a so-called “dramatic mystery,” depicting the struggle for cultural and political liberation from the neighboring powers (Russia, Poland, Germany) and from social suppression by the landowners, Krėvė’s art arose to greatness.

In the 20’s (1922–1929) Maironis, long famous as the leading lyric poet of the nation, tried his hand at historical dramas centering around Grand Duke Vytautas who is presented as the admired aggrandizer of the Lithuanian Empire. Ever since 1896, when J. Vilkutaitis-Keturakis made a hit with his comedy Amerika pirtyje (America in the Bathhouse), the ambition of most authors was directed toward the drama. The most successful of all was Petras Vaičiūnas (1890–) who wrote annually either a satirical comedy or a tragedy for the National Theatre in Kaunas, e.g., Tuščios pastangos (1926; Vain Efforts), Nuodėmingas angelas (1927; The Sinful Angel), Patriotai (1927; The Patriots), Sudrumstoji ramybė (1927; The Ruffled Calm), Sulaužyta priesaika (1935; The Broken Oath). Other successful playwrights are Sofija Čiurlionienė (1886–), Kazys Binkis (1893–1942), Balys Sruoga (1896–), Vincas Mykolaitis-Putinas (1893–), Vytautas Bičiūnas (1893–). Vydūnas (Vilius Storasta, 1868–), a Prussian Lithuanian dramatist, theosophist, and mystic, stands apart from the others, even in spelling. His most important plays (dramatic mysteries and tragedies) are Prabočių šešėliai (1908; Shades of the Ancestors) Amžina ugnis (1912–1913; The Eternal Flame), Pasaulio gaisras (1928; The World Conflagration).

Vincas Mykolaitis-Putinas, a Roman Catholic priest and a successful lyric poet and dramatist, caused tremendous excitement when he (unlike Vaižgantas but like many other priests) left the Church, married, and wrote the now famous novel Altorių šešėly (3 vols., 1933; In the Shadow of the Altars) in which he tried to justify his action. The novel is not only interesting on account of the problem discussed, but also significant for its aesthetic qualities and the expert drawing of the characters. One of the repercussions of this publication was another novel, Tiesiu keliu (3 vols., 1934–1935; On the Straight Road), inferior in artistry, which was brought out under the sponsorship of Adomas Jakštas for the purpose of showing how a worthy priest should behave in similar circumstances. The name of its author was given as J. Gintautas which later turned out to be a pseudonym of Bishop Justinas Staugaitis (1886–1943) of Telšiai.

Other prominent writers of fiction of recent times are Vienuolis (pseud. of Antanas Žukauskas, 1882–) with short stories and one novel (see Rinktiniai raštai, 1937, Selected Writings); Ignas Jurkūnas-Šcinius (1889–), a novelist; Petras Cvirka (1909–), novelist (e.g., Žemė maitintoja, 1935, Mother Earth; Lettish and Russian tr.); Antanas Vaičiulaitis (1906–), a master of the short story.

Lyric poetry has not reached any great height of perfection since Maironis, although there are a number of highly esteemed lyricists, among them Petras Vaičiūnas, Mykolaitis-Putinas, Balys Sruoga, Faustas Kirša (1891–), Juozas Tysliava (1906–), Jurgis Baltrušaitis (1873–1944), and Salomėja Neris (1905–1945). The reason for this lies in the slow development of the Lithuanian standard language which, through the efforts of Professor Jonas Jablonskis (pseud. Rygiškių Jonas, 1861–1930), is now based on the dialect of Northern Suvalkija. The standard form prescribed for the school was not immediately accepted by all authors, some of the older ones (Žemaitė, Krėvė) still holding on to provincial characteristics. Lack of uniformity in word accent, which varies in the main dialects, is especially obstructive in the field of verse poetry. Thus it is impossible to read the inspiring poems of the East Lithuanian Antanas Baranauskas with the accents required by Jablonskis’s Grammar without destroying the rhythm. The first collection of poems following strictly the rules of Jablonskis's Grammar is a translation by J. Talmantas of I. A. Krylov's Fables: Pasakėčios (1937).

With the First World War the doors were thrown wide open to Western ideas. Many Lithuanian writers spent long years in Western Europe, especially Switzerland (Putinas), France (Tysliava, Vaičiulaitis), Scandinavia (Jurkūnas-Šeinius), Germany (Sruoga, Binkis) where they became acquainted with Western movements and fads. Those who had to stay at home had foreign literatures interpreted to them by competent professors of the University of Lithuania at Kaunas (founded 1922) where literary subjects were taught among others by Maironis, Vaižgantas, Krėvė, Putinas, Sruoga, and Vaičiulaitis. Foreign literatures became also known through a flood of translations. As a result, foreign literary movements, especially that of the futurists (Sruoga, Binkis, Tysliava), cf. Keturi vėjai (1924; The Four Winds), temporarily took root in Kaunas during the 20's. A "Collective of Activist Writers" with the journal Trečias frontas (1930-31; The Third Front) as its organ was formed in 1930 and included the following young people, all of whom in 1940 became members of the government of Soviet Lithuania: Antanas Venclova, Petras Cvirka, Jonas Šimkus, and Salomėja Neris.

See: M. Biržiška, Mūsų raštų istorija (1920), pp. 40-110; J. Tumas (pseud. Vaižgantas), Lietuvių literatūros paskaitos (8 vols., 1924-1925) and Raštai, Vols. XI-XIV, XIX (1929-1933); A. P. Coleman, "A Survey of Lithuanian Literature," in Books Abroad, VIII (1934), 391-393; V. Mykolaitis-Putinas, Naujoji lietuvių literatūra (1936); H. Engert, Aus litauischer Dichtung: Deutsche Nachdichtungen (1935, 2d. ed., 1938); V. Jungfer, Litauen: Antlitz eines Volkes (1938), pp. 228-323; J. Maublère, Panorama de la littérature lithuanienne contemporaine (1938), pp. 91-184; I. Kisinas, Lietuviškų knygų sisteminis katalogas (1938), Nos. 4221-6629; A. Vaičiulaitis, Outline History of Lithuanian Literature (1942), pp. 22-54.

A. Se.

Løkken, Thomas Olesen (1877-, Danish novelist), was born in Alstrup. He has become one of the important exponents of the regional literature of Denmark, choosing for his special domain that upper part of Jutland known as Vendsyssel, the original home of the fierce and stubborn Cimbrians of ancient days. Modestly, Løkken had to begin life as a cowherd—there are many of them in modern

Danish literature—later becoming a cobbler, a bicycle and automobile mechanic, and a book dealer, so that although he is conscious of having wanted to become a writer ever since he was eight years old, he was 43 when his first book, Bonden Niels Hald (1920; Farmer Niels Hald), was published. This was followed by Niels Halds Hustru (1922; The Wife of Niels Hald) and Niels Halds Hjem (1924; The Home of Niels Hald). These three make up his first cycle. Two others have appeared in more recent years: Poul Dam (1925), Kampaar (1926; Years of Struggle), and Sejren (1927; The Victory), all three volumes dealing with the Dam family in Vendsyssel; and Stormosen (1929; The Great Swamp), Mosepigens Søn (1931; The Son of the Swamp Girl), and Fra Vildmosens Land (1934; From the Land of the Wild Swamp). In these trilogies Løkken has described the typical Vendsyssel cotter, the rich and haughty farmer, and the very lowest representatives of peasant life in the huts adjacent to the peat swamps immediately north of the Limfjord. In general, Løkken has confined himself to this part of Jutland (see also one of his earlier books, Klaus Bjerg og Bodil, 1923, Klaus Bjerg and Bodil). Vendsyssel-Noveller (1925; Vendsyssel Short Stories) and Sange fra Vendsyssel (1934; Vendsyssel Songs) by their very titles testify to the deep affection with which he embraces his native province, beyond which he has never had his home.

In Løkken's main works it is possible to detect reminiscences of Nexø (q.v.), Thomas Hardy, Reymont (q.v.), Zola (q.v.), but the virility of style is wholly his own. The particular patch of soil he has tilled was practically nonexistent for writers before him, and his mature perception of human values is a product of many years of rigid self-discipline practiced in the obscurity of manual labor.

See: Jørgen Bukdahl, Thomas Olesen Løkken (1927); Helge Kjaergaard, Die dänische Literatur der neuesten Zeit (1871-1933) (1934).

G. St.

Løland, Rasmus (1861-1907, Norwegian novelist), was born in the western coastal district of Ryfylke. All through his life he was hampered by neurotic sensitiveness and poor health. His earlier years were spent in shy isolation and in poverty; he suffered from a feeling of uselessness and was definitely eccentric. He found refuge in writing and in a strong intellectual life, influenced by the ideas of science and radical philosophy. His first little book came in 1891 (Folkeliiv; From the Countryside). Four years later he finally managed to break his bonds and establish himself in Christiania, where he cut his way through as a writer, translator, and editor of a newspaper for children, till disease finally overtook him.

During his short period of literary activity Løland published an astounding number of books, many of them experimental and bearing the marks of his late start as a writer. His creation is limited by his somewhat narrow circle of experience; but one finds character and a deep personal honesty in everything he has done. The real subject of his interest is the fate of the individual within the farm society which he knew from youth, especially the individual isolated within the group—the socially declassed, the weak and crippled, the queer and the gifted, those who “live in the shadow,” marked by destiny like himself. His analysis often has a tone of sad resignation toward the inexorable laws of life, but is brightened by unsentimental compassion and a subtle irony. Representative are the autobiographical novel Aasmund Aarak (1902) and the posthumous Hundrad aar (1910; Hundred Years).

Løland's great achievement, however, which has made him a classic, is his children's books, describing the life of a group of boys in his home district (there is a complete edition in three volumes, Barnebøker, 1923–1925; Children's Books). In a masterly way Løland makes the life of these farm children emerge as an autonomous world with other laws and proportions and light and shadows than the clumsy and incomprehensible world of adults, and filled within its own limits with drama and passion, tragedy and deep joy. Løland's intensity in experiencing this world as if he had the senses and soul of the child has been compared to that of the great Russians. But there is no intricacy about his analysis; the narrative is perfectly simple and natural, as is the style. He pictures no idyls. Again and again he points to the insecurity of the child's world, governed by unknown and uncontrollable powers, distorted by the transforming forces of imagination. There is the same philosophy in these books as in his novels, a conviction of lawfulness and tragic guilt, of the merciless logic of the “small things.” But the keynote is cheerful. His children have health, spontaneous friendliness, sound humor, and a creative, active imagination which promises well for them and shows how little Løland's own fate had shaken his real strength. He is the first of the great portrayals of children in recent Norwegian literature, and in many ways the greatest.

See: S. Eskeland, R. Løland (1910); J. Bukdahl, Det skjulte Norge (1926), pp. 55–61; O. Bakken, R. Løland (1938).

S. S.

Löns, Hermann (1866–1914, German novelist and poet), was born in Kulm on the Vistula, far from the Luneburg Heath which he came to love and on the poetic description of which rests his literary fame. His extensive knowledge of plant and animal life, acquired in his boyhood years, later was the foundation for his scientific investigations. However, in 1891 Löns gave up his medical studies to become a journalist in Hanover and Bückeburg. The journalistic pace is traceable in his works. While his novels are written hastily, his descriptive scenes from nature are inimitable. Never before had the thrills of the born hunter of small game been depicted so vividly and accurately as in Mein grünes Buch (1901). The scientist and huntsman are merged with the poet in Mein braunes Buch (1906), his first great literary success. Löns was the first to reproduce in literature the infinite variety of colors in the somber moorlands. His stories from animal life are a combination of scientific accuracy and poetic imagination. The former predominates in Aus Flur und Forst, originally a commentary for photographs from animal life (1907), the latter prevails in Mümmelmann (1909), humorous animal tales, partly influenced by Kipling and Jack London. In his novels on peasant life, e.g., Der letzte Hansbur (1909), inspired by Jeremias Gotthelf, Löns wishes to awaken sympathetic understanding for the reticent and proud, hardheaded and loyal peasants of the Luneburg Heath. Der Wehrwolf (1910; Eng. tr., Harm Wulf, 1931) pictures them in the terse style of an ancient peasant chronicle with many dialect words of old Germanic stock. We see how, in the Thirty Years' War, these heath dwellers are forced to turn into wolves, defending their farms and families against the marauders, killing them from ambush, or pronouncing and executing judgment on them in the old tribal way. It is an exciting though somewhat repetitious novel filled with bloodshed and cruelty. The autobiographical novel Das zweite Gesicht (1911) gives an insight into the conflicting forces in Löns's restless mind. Der kleine Rosengarten (1911; Eng. tr., Little Garden of Roses, 1929) so successfully entered into the spirit and style of the old folk song that its tunes and lyrics captured the popular fancy. More than 400,000 copies have been sold.

Löns was killed before Reims in September, 1914. He had become a favorite of the German Youth Movement. With his emphasis on national literature, race, and soil, he later became an idol of National Socialism.

See: W. Deimann, Hermann Löns (1939).

E. Hof.

Looy, Jacobus van (1855-1930, Dutch painter and short-story writer), was born in Haarlem and brought up there in the municipal orphanage. He studied painting at Haarlem, Amsterdam, and Rome and traveled extensively through Italy, Spain, and Morocco before he returned to his native land and to a life of seclusion devoted to study, art, and literature. His first story appeared in De nieuwe Gids (The New Guide), which was then in its first year (1885). Van Looy was not so much a narrator as a painter in words of picturesque scenes. Being a painter by profession, he changed his medium but not his manner when he wrote. On his first appearance in print he was recognized as a master of the exact phrase. The painter in words cannot afford to spin too long a yarn. Hence the bulk of his work consists of short stories. Even his tale Jaapje (1917), an autobiographic narrative of his boyhood in the Haarlem orphanage, is less a novel than a series of 19 unconnected sketches that have nothing in common except their hero. It is the most popular of his writings. His recollections of life as a charity boy have the air of a highly developed variety of those old-fashioned copperplate penny-prints for children that depicted episodes in the life of some childhood hero. It is not the secret workings of the heart that interest this writer most. The artist in him watches the shifting scene from day to day, and only by the manner in which his little hero's feelings are affected by the beauty and the strangeness of this spectacle is Jaapje's inner life disclosed. The house in Haarlem where Van Looy lived and died is now a museum, where his admirers can study his paintings and get an impression of the home that he guarded so jealously from the curious while he was alive.

A. J. B.

Lopes Vieira, Afonso (1878-, Portuguese poet and critic), was born in Leiria, studied law in Coimbra, and was editor for the Chamber of Deputies. He has traveled extensively in Italy, France, and Switzerland.

In Lopes Vieira's poetry and dramatic attempts as well as in his critical studies and literary reconstructions, Portuguese tradition is his guide and absorbing interest. One of the most prolific contemporary Portuguese writers, he began with books of poetry of modernistic hue, Para que? Primeiros versos (1897; Why? First Verses), O ndufrago; versos lusitanos (1898; The Shipwrecked; Lusitanian Verses), and O meu adeus (1900; My Farewell). Later he interrupted his poetic production with three books in prose showing a decided socializing tendency, Marquês; história dum perseguido (Marquês; History of a Persecuted Man), Pedro Kropotkine; a gente nova (Peter Kropotkin; the New-comers), and Conto de natal (Christmas Story), all published in 1904. He continued then with works which evoked the literature of other periods, not only that of Portugal but—in Portuguese translation—of the whole Peninsula. Outstanding works are those written to focus modern attention on Gil Vicente, the patriarch of the Portuguese theatre, e.g., A campanha vicentina; conferências e outros escritos (1910; Vicentian Campaign; Discourses and Other Writings), a book prepared by Lopes Vieira under the guidance of his teacher Carolina Michaëlis de Vasconcelos (q.v.); his adaptation of the Monólogo do vaqueiro (1910; Cowboy's Monologue) and of the Auto da barca do inferno (1911; Mystery Play of the Ship of the Inferno); and his lectures on artistic or historico-literary subjects—Inês de Castro, the Holy Grail, the paintings in the monastery of San Vicente, and studies of Camões and João de Deus (q.v.). In a magnificent, though at times too free translation, he has published in Portuguese O Amadis de Gaula de Lobeira (1922; The Amadis of Gaul of Lobeira), A Diana de Jorge de Montemôr em português (1924; The Diana of Jorge de Montemayor in Portuguese), and O poema do Cid (1925; The Poem of the Cid). The culture of his country is indebted to him for this effort toward the incorporation into Portuguese literature of works written in Spanish by Portuguese authors, of those where the primitive Portuguese version is not known, and of the great medieval epic poetry of the Peninsula. As an anthologist he collected in the Cancioneiro de Coimbra (1918; The Songbook of Coimbra) a mass of compositions about the city, its history, and its landscape.

Among his most serious studies on the Portuguese classical writers should be mentioned his critical edition, with introduction, of Poesias de Francisco Rodrigues Lobo (1941; Poems of Francisco Rodrigues Lobo) and a new attempt, in Lettres portugaises; essai de reconstitution du texte français par Charles Culmont, tentativa de texto português (1941), at reconstructing the text of the famous Cartas portuguesas of Soror Mariana de Alcofurado. His poetry is in the manner of the saüdade (longing)—he was a member of the A dguia (The Eagle) group of Teixeira de Pascoais (q.v.) and subsequently of the "integralista" group of Sardinha (q.v.)—or in the classical tradition, or along lines of folkloric sentimentalism. Of great interest for a study of his aesthetic ideas are his "Aforismos dum estudante de linguagem" (Aphorisms of a Language Student), which are incorporated in Em demanda do Graal (1922; In Search of the Grail) and continued in the Revista de filologia portuguesa of São Paulo (Nos. 14 and 18, 1925). A dreamy vagueness and verbal musicality—he translated Heine and glossed Schumann—seem to suggest his poetic ideal, but he sometimes shows an excessive formalism of language and theme which is pseudo-classic in nature and directed toward the attainment of archaic effects. His best poetry is found in Canções de saüdade e de amor (1917; Songs of Longing and Love), Ilhas de bruma (1918; Islands of Mist), and Pais lilás; desterro azul (1922; Lilac Country; Blue Exile).

See: A. da Veiga Simões, A nova geração (1911); Agostinho de Campos, Antologia portuguesa (1928).

R. M. L.

López de Ayala, Adelardo (1828–1879, Spanish politician, orator, poet, journalist, and dramatist), born at Guadalcanal in the province of Seville, always displayed an Andalusian facility with words and considerable ability along many lines. In politics he was very adaptable, switching from liberalism to conservatism with great ease. He was a cabinet minister after the accession of Alfonso XII and president of the Cortes at the time of his death.

López de Ayala is now best remembered as a dramatist, for his journalistic output was ephemeral and his poems few in number. Like Tamayo y Baus (q.v.), he was a dramatist of transition, beginning with historical-romantic plays and ending with more realistic social comedies, somewhat similar to those of Emile Augier. Before he was 21 he wrote a good historical play, Un hombre de estado, played at the Teatro Español with great success in 1851. In that play and in several following he showed himself an admirer of Calderón. His versification was supple and his dramatic intrigues well devised. His first period, up to 1856, included four zarzuelas or musical comedies.

There are four plays which show Ayala at his best, and they are at least faintly reminiscent of Ruiz de Alarcón, always greatly admired by Don Adelardo. El tejado de vidrio (1856) shows a seducer receiving a dose of his own medicine through the infidelity of his own wife. El tanto por ciento (1861) has a complicated plot involving financial skulduggery. The grasping tricksters are discomfited, and hero and heroine are happily reconciled and married. El nuevo don Juan (1863), not too well constructed, satirizes the modern Don Juan. Consuelo (1878) is usually considered Ayala's masterpiece. The protagonist, Consuelo, is presented as a type of selfish and grasping modern woman who sacrifices true love and marries for money alone. She receives condign punishment. Her character is well studied, and the action is plausible, the dénouement logical. Ayala practically always achieves the effect of naturalness, and he avoids the melodramatic exaggerations which mar the theatre of Echegaray. Harmony, balance, fidelity to life, and emphasis on moral themes are his chief qualities.

See: J. O. Picón, "D. Adelardo López de Ayala," in Pedro de Novo y Colson, ed., Autores dramáticos contemporáneos, II (1882), 377–399.

N. B. A.

Lòpez-Picó, Josep Maria (1886–, Catalan poet), extraordinarily fecund writer, has passed through a clearly defined evolution. From an initial exaggerated use of witticisms he moved on to forms of expressive concision, particularly happy in his use of epigrams, keeping, however, an enigmatic tone which in some pieces deliberately without human emotions reaches the point of noncomprehension. When he is, on the other hand, eager to express human qualities, his lyric poetry achieves this through a fine sensibility in which primordial motives remain intact. But his verse often remains cold—although never mediocre. The outstanding virtue of his poetry and that which has exerted a notable influence on the new generations of the Catalan-speaking countries is the constant renovation of images—images of material reality (the house, the landscape) or characterized by a spiritual subjectivism (love, serenity) easily grasped in effective metaphor. The poetry of Lòpez-Picó, in spite of its wide circulation in Catalonia, seems unlikely to outlast his own lifetime; his disciples, decadent symbolists, have emphasized even more the enigmatic tone, which is not in harmony with the general line of development of the race or with the ambition of other modern poets to harmonize the spirit of the authentically national tradition with the poetic gift for the sublime.

Lòpez-Picó was born in Barcelona and pursued his secondary school studies with the Jesuit fathers of that city; he prepared himself in the humanities at the University of Barcelona and received his degree of licentiate in 1902. Among his works, which are very numerous since from 1913 he had published at least a volume a year (a labor interrupted with the invasion of Catalonia in 1939), should be mentioned: Intermetzzo galant (1910; Gallant Intermezzo), Torment froment (1910; Trembling Torment), Poemes de port (1911; Harbor Poems), Amor, Senyor (1913; Love, the Lord), Espectacles i mitologia (1914; Spectacles and Mythology), Epigrammata (1911), L'ofrena (The Offering), Paraules (1916; Words), L'instant, les Noces i el càntic serè (The Instant, the Betrothal and the Serene Song), El meu pare i jo (My Father and I), Primer recull de poesies (First Collection of Poems), Moralitats i pretextos (Moralizings and Pretexts), Dietari espiritual (Spiritual Calendar), L'oci de la paraula (1927; The Leisure of Words), Epitalami (Epithalamium). Upon producing this last book, his 25th, Lòpez-Picó was honored by the Revista group, which prepared an anthology of his poetry. He has collaborated on many Catalan journals, especially on Vell i nou (Old and New), Empori (Emporium), Quaderns d'estudi (Study Cahiers), and Quaderns de poesia (Poetry Cahiers). Due to his initiative was the so-called Almanac de la Poesia (Poetry Almanac) in which, from 1912, was collected verse published in different books in the course of the year. In 1915, with Joaquim Folguera, he founded the Revista, a bimonthly publishing poetry and essays, in which was captured the aesthetic ideals of the generation. Many of the poet's compositions have been translated into English, Italian, Spanish, French, and German. More recently he has been living in Barcelona, obliged to interrupt not only his poetic production but his literary labors on the Revista because of the measures tending to blot out even the faintest manifestation of Catalan spirituality.

See: M. de Montoliu, Estudi d'història literària de Catalunya (1912-1914); A. Plana, Estudi preliminar de l'antologia de poetes catalans (1915); J. Folguera, Les noves valors de la poesia catalana (1919); R. Crossmann, Katalanische Lyrik der Gegenwart (1923); C. Giardini, Antologia dei poeti catalani contemporanei, 1845-1925, (1926).

J. M. M. i V.

López Pinillos, José (1875-1922, Spanish journalist, novelist, and playwright), was born in Seville and spent his first 20 years in this region, which was to be the principal background of many of his works. Unable to finish his law career for lack of funds, he left his native city for Madrid, where he made his living writing for well-known newspapers. By 1908 his reputation as a keen journalist was well established in the Heraldo de Madrid, in which his articles appeared under the pseudonym Parmeno, a character out of the famous La Celestina and a symbol of the observer of stark reality who expresses his views without hesitancy or cant. Whether he was writing novels, such as La sangre de Cristo (1907), Doña Mesalina (1910), Las águilas (1911), and El luchador (1916), or short stories, as in Frente al mar (1914) and Ojo por ojo (1915), or dramatic triumphs of the type of El pantano (1913), Nuestro enemigo (1913), La otra vida (1915), and El embrujamiento (1923), or newspaper articles as collected in Hombres, hombrecillos y animales (1917) and En la pendiente: Los que suben y los que ruedan (1920), the technique and the social content are the same. There are Gordian-knot-to-be-cut situations even in the farces or lighter comedies, such as Hacia la dicha (1910) or A tiro limpio (1918); the author deals always with man's struggle against himself or against man in an Othello-Iago seesaw of passions.

In Nuestro enemigo Antolín, the hero, expresses the fundamental suffering of all of Parmeno's characters: "I was deceived by my heart, which is our enemy." His characters forgive, but never forget. Years afterward a word, a gesture, will turn forgiveness into hatred, hatred into death. Most of his works deal with rural or provincial Andalusia or with the lower classes of Madrid, although there are a few exceptions, as in La otra vida which deals with the higher classes of the military caste. Between 1910 and 1923 López Pinillos had two or three great dramatic successes, as great as some of Benavente's (q.v.), but today he is hardly noticed even in histories of Spanish literature. Perhaps this is an injustice, for he was a first-rate technician comparable to the Galsworthy of Loyalties and The Skin Game.

See: R. Cansinos-Asséns, "José López Pinillos (Parmeno)," in Poetas y prosistas del

novecientos (España y América) (1919), pp. 191–202, and in La evolución de la novela (1917–1927), Vol. IV (1927) of La nueva literatura, pp. 40–52; Mario Méndez Bejarano, Diccionario de escritores, maestros y oradores naturales de Sevilla y su actual provincia (1922), I, 410–414, 469–470; Arturo Mori, Treinta años de teatro hispanoamericano (1941), pp. 59–61, 224.

F. S. y E.

López Silva, José (1861–1925), Spanish comic poet and playwright), was born in Madrid and died in Buenos Aires. His literary work and his life fit as a casting fits its pattern. Both are romantic, picturesque, full of the local color exemplifying the “roaring 90’s” of Spain and the waning of an empire. Both are full of bathos, reminiscent of the Spanish tradition of mingling tragedy and comedy, and true to a national temperament that even in moods of sheer desperation likes to play with reality. Like Arniches (q.v.) López Silva started as a clerk in a Madrid dry-goods store—unlike him he always lived among the working classes of Madrid. His early and easy successes in Madrid’s comic paper, Madrid cómico, enabled him to give up his dry-goods and accounting books in order to compose festive, descriptive poetry about the people he knew so well and loved even more.

His genuinely literary work is found in a series of volumes on passion and death among Madrid’s lower classes, written in fluid verse, and in plays on the same subjects. Included in the poetry is Migajas (1890), his first book; Los barrios bajos (1894), his definite success, in which he showed that he had mastered his own style; Los madriles (1896), and finally La musa del arroyo (1911). Many of these volumes contain eulogistic introductions by such writers as Benavente, Blasco Ibañez, and Picón, (qq.v.) López Silva’s plays belong to the género chico type. As is characteristic of this genre, he wrote almost all of them in collaboration with some other playwright. Spaniards of this time were in all too frequent disagreement on many matters, especially political and religious, but a group of them collaborated in thousands of sainetes, pasos, and zarzuelas, written approximately between 1870 and 1915. Among others the Alvarez Quintero brothers (q.v.) exemplify this tendency in the Spanish popular drama of this era.

López Silva’s three greatest successes, as well as his most representative and best plays, are Las bravías (1896); La revoltosa (1897), done in collaboration with the prolific Fernández Shaw; and El barquillero (1900), written with the no less prolific Jackson Veyán. Fecundity is in fact a characteristic of these playwrights. Their plays are a joy to the philologist and the sociologist, for they portray linguistically and culturally the whole life of a generation. They are sometimes almost photographic in accuracy; the best of them artistically are bizarre etchings, reminiscent of Goya, in which the most heated arguments then in vogue are portrayed ludicrously and sentimentally. Las bravías (The Viragoes) capitalizes on the tempest which feminism was causing in Spain; a subtitle points out that it is a lyrical sainete (i.e., with music) “based on Shakespeare’s play, The Taming of the Shrew.” While writers like Palacio Valdés (q.v.) condemned bitterly this theatre in its beginnings, there has since been a general if tempered acceptance of the género chico for what it is, for what it strives to do aesthetically. The French critic Mérimée has called López Silva the Homer of the chulapería (a chulapería is an idiom or expression characteristic of the chulapo, the Madrid tough, flashy in talk and dress).

See: Mariano Zurita, Historia del género chico (1920); N. Alonso Cortés, “López Silva,” in Quevedo en el teatro y otras cosas (1930), pp. 45–119 (also published in Boletín de la Biblioteca de Menéndez y Pelayo, Vol. XI, 1929, and in Revista de la Biblioteca, Archivo y Museo del Ayuntamiento de Madrid, 1929).

F. S. y E.

Loria, Arturo (1902–, Italian picaresque novelist), was born in Carpi, Modena province, but has spent most of his life in Florence, where he became a leading member of the Solaria group of young writers who frequented the Caffè delle Giubbe Rosse. Loria first attracted attention with the publication of a collection of short stories entitled Il Cieco e la bellona (1928). Then followed Fannias Ventosca (1929) and La Scuola di ballo (1932); La Scuola won him the coveted literary award of Italia Letteraria for the outstanding novel of the year.

In Loria’s stories he obviously turns away from such moderns as Proust (q.v.) and Joyce—and Freud—to follow such masters as Cervantes and Balzac. Rogues, beggars, prostitutes, and brigands are his protagonists. He places them, however, in a modern environment and exposes them to the exigencies of the present social order. In spite of the eccentricities of these individuals, Loria depicts their human qualities so vividly and with such delicate irony that almost invariably the reader understands and sympathizes with them. Some critics see in Loria a confirmed pessimist. There is indeed pessimism, yet at the same time few contemporary Italian writers have so vividly portrayed the underlying joys of life. Loria believes that even strange and misshapen humans should have and may have their share of gaiety and amusement. The plots of Loria's stories are thought out with a mathematical accuracy that is calculated to hold the interest of the reader. Yet there is sometimes an overabundance of detail, and the author is too often more preoccupied with minuteness of expression and stylistic effect than with intensity of feeling or action. But whatever the obvious shortcomings in his style, Arturo Loria is one of the most attractive of the younger generation of writers in Italy. His writings—all too few considering the natural talent of the author—reveal a deep and genuinely moving human affection for the unfortunate creatures of this world.

P. M. R.

Loti, Pierre (pseud. of Julien Viaud, 1850–1923, French novelist), has won recognition as a master of colorful, nostalgic descriptions of exotic scenes and as a bard of the grim poetry of the sea, the melancholy of the past, and the majesty of death. Born at Rochefort, of a distinguished Huguenot family, he decided at 15 to become a naval officer and entered the naval school two years later. At the end of a long professional career he was retired in 1910 with the rank of captain, but volunteered (for the army) at the outset of the First World War and was later cited for bravery. He died, at 73, in his solitary villa at Hendaye on the Basque coast. The French navy buried him with national pomp in the grove of his ancestral home at Saint-Pierre d'Oleron. He had been elected to the French Academy in 1891.

From the time he first knew how to write, Loti kept a diary (Journal intime, 1926), which later became the fount of his literary production. He wrote more than 40 volumes of touching memories and of impressions gleaned in endless voyages and wanderings. Among the lands he visited, those especially associated with his name are Polynesia (Rarahu, later called Le Mariage de Loti, 1880), Turkey (Aziyadé, 1879; Les Désenchantées, 1906; Suprêmes Visions d'orient, 1921), Senegambia (Le Roman d'un spahi, 1881), Brittany (Mon Frère Yves, 1883; Pêcheur d'Islande, 1886), Japan (Madame Chrysanthème, 1887), China (Matelot, 1893), Morocco, the Holy Land (La Galilée, 1895), the Basque country (Ramuntcho, 1897), India, Persia (Vers Ispahan, 1904), Cambodia (Un Pèlerin d'Angkor, 1906), and Egypt. Pêcheur d'Islande is unquestionably his masterpiece. Many of the works of Loti have been translated into English.

Religious doubts that crept into his mind at a tender age molded Loti's whole life. Bereft of a faith that had promised everlasting communion with his mother—the only woman he ever truly loved—he lived thereafter in mortal dread of losing her. A haunting presentiment of the utter solitude that must one day befall him, the sense of his own fragility and of the futility of life, affected him profoundly. He sought eagerly and enviously, in later life, the secret of the abiding faith of humble folk, through the Orient of the Prophet, in the footsteps of Jesus in Galilee, and at the shrines of the Indian theosophists in holy Benares. On the other hand his life as a sailor hardened his character in some respects—and helped the full blossoming of his talent. By simply confiding in his readers, "unknown friends," he could find a manner of solace for his chagrin and anxiety. Though fleeting as a dream, his emotions run so deep that he easily takes his place among the best of the subjective writers.

Loti is usually considered the initiator of modern exotic fiction, yet the bond between him and the many authors of exotic and regional novels, who more or less consciously derived their inspiration from him, is as slight as his connection with Bernardin de Saint-Pierre and Chateaubriand, with whom he is too readily associated. Whether we consider his works of fiction, in which his characters clearly appear to be projections of his inner self, or his travel books, in which the very universe seems to revolve around his person, we find him in every sense identical with the Loti of those gems of introspective study, Le Roman d'un enfant (1890) and Prime Jeunesse (1919). A painter of rare genius in the impressionistic style, he captured the symphonies of light with a skill that recalls Debussy's orchestration of incipient and dying harmonies. His depth of human understanding would justify placing his whole production under the title of one of his most stirring books, Le Livre de la pitié et de la mort (1890).

See: J. Lemaître, Les Contemporains (1898); V. Giraud, Les Maîtres de l'heure, Vol. I (1911); N. Serban, Pierre Loti; sa vie et son œuvre (1924).

P. A. C.

Louÿs, Pierre (pseud. of Pierre Louis, 1870–1925, French poet and novelist), was born in Ghent, of French parents. He was educated in Paris at the Ecole Alsacienne, a Protestant institution, where he became the friend of André Gide (q.v.), at the Lycée Janson-de-Sailly, and at the Sorbonne. He made his entry into the world of letters by founding La Conque (1891), a review in which were published his first poems, soon afterwards collected under the title Astarté (1891). His chief collaborators were Henri de Régnier (q.v.), Gide, and Valéry (q.v.). Five years later the same authors founded the sumptuous review Le Centaure. Pierre Louÿs was the disciple of Heredia (q.v.) and in 1899 married Louise, the youngest daughter of this leading poet of the Parnassian school.

A man of insatiable intellectual curiosity and passionate devotion to art, at once a sensuous pagan and a refined aesthete, he celebrated the free life of ancient Greece and proclaimed sensual fulfillment a condition essential to artistic creation and spiritual development. As a Greek scholar he made the translations Poésies de Méléagre de Gadara (1893) and Scènes de la vie des courtisanes de Lucien (1894), graceful, piquant works of which the subjects foreshadowed the erotic and Hellenistic tendencies of his later writings. When Les Chansons de Bilitis, traduites du grec par Pierre Louÿs (1894) was published, several scholars mistook "ce petit livre d'amour antique" (see the dedication) for an authentic work by a contemporary of Sappho. Indeed these enchanting and licentious poems in prose were harmoniously classic in style and gave evidence of sound archaeological research. When François Coppée (q.v.) publicly acclaimed Aphrodite (1896) as one of the greatest masterpieces of the French language, Louÿs became famous almost overnight. This novel of Alexandrian manners makes an appeal for the rehabilitation of physical love and the beauty of the nude; though shallow and unreal in psychology, it attests a remarkable historical knowledge and has pages luminously picturesque and exquisitely pure in form. In La Femme et le pantin (1898) the interest becomes entirely psychological. Restrained yet vigorous in expression, this Andalusian novel recounts the pathetic experience of a man to whom sensuality brought complete servitude and ruin. Among Louÿs's numerous short stories of classical or fictitious inspiration, Les Aventures du roi Pausole (1901) is especially noteworthy as a graceful and spicy bit of drollery.

Though the success of certain of his works was founded as much on their licentious character as on their literary merit, some of the poems of Louÿs (see Poésies, 1927) by their grace, by that clear imagery characteristic of the Parnassian school, and by their pure and flexible harmony of style may well become immortal; indeed few poets have ever had a more fervent worship of beauty and a more profound respect for form. The works of Louÿs have inspired several musicians, among whom the most notable is Claude Debussy. With the exception of occasional voyages, Louÿs lived in retirement in his small luxurious home in Paris and remained studious until his death.

See: E. Gaubert, Pierre Louÿs (1904) and Le Tombeau de Pierre Louÿs (1925); A. Gide, Si le grain ne meurt (1926), passim.

B. R. L.

Lugné-Poe, Aurélien François (1869–1940, French theatrical producer, director, and actor), championed the cause of young French writers and foreign masters at his Théâtre de l'Œuvre. Born in Paris, he was early attracted to the theatre and while attending the Lycée Condorcet founded the Cercle des Escholiers with Georges Bourdon. He studied at the Conservatory (1888–1892) and acted at the Théâtre Libre (1888–1890) and at Paul Fort's (q.v.) Théâtre d'Art (1891–1892). Painters like Bonnard, Denis, Vuillard, and Toulouse-Lautrec offered Lugné stimulating friendship, later contributing their art to his theatre. The production of Maeterlinck's (q.v.) Pelléas et Mélisande on May 17, 1893, at the Théâtre d'Art, for which Fort had given Lugné-Poe full responsibility, affirmed the scenic value of the Belgian's work and Lugné-Poe's leadership in avant-garde theatrical circles. Lugné and his friends determined to prolong their association and, hopeful of discovering a great French masterpiece, called their enterprise the Théâtre de l'Œuvre.

The Théâtre de l'Œuvre opened its first season on October 10, 1893, with Ibsen's (q.v.) Rosmersholm, inaugurating a vigorous campaign for foreign masterpieces, especially Scandinavian. Until Lugné severed relations with the languishing symbolist movement (1897), the character of the Œuvre remained essentially symbolist, although he always welcomed any play which might stir a sluggish public. Stormy receptions by enemies and by conservative critics merely inspired him to succeed. While still in his 20's Lugné launched playwrights like Henry Bataille (q.v.), Maurice Beaubourg, Tristan Bernard (q.v.), and Edmond Sée. Wilde's Salomé had its world première at the Œuvre on February 11, 1896, and Jarry's (q.v.) Ubu Roi was greeted there noisily on December 10, 1896. The roster of the Œuvre's authors extends brilliantly through the years, including Romain Rolland, Emile Verhaeren, André Gide (qq.v.), Jean Jullien, Albert Samain, (q.v.), and Paul Claudel (q.v.) in the period before 1914, Fernand Crommelynck (q.v.), Jean Sarment (q.v.), and Stève Passeur (q.v.) in the 1920's.

With the loyal cooperation of his actress wife, Mme Suzanne Després, Lugné-Poe supported Parisian productions with the proceeds of tours, at the same time extending the influence of his experimental venture. Eager to meet Ibsen, Lugné, in the first important tour of the Œuvre troupe (1894), dared take French versions of the writer's dramas to Scandinavia. Ibsen's kindness and advice assured in Lugné a lifelong devotion. Other tours carried the troupe to many parts of Europe, South America, and Africa. As impresario Lugné sponsored Parisian appearances of such artists as Eleonora Duse, Ermete Zaccone, Isadora Duncan, and Ruth Draper. After serving in the Intelligence Department (1914-1918), Lugné-Poe won back the important position of the Théâtre de l'Œuvre with no resources except a reputation for imposing foreign masterpieces and the works of promising young Frenchmen. The names of Lugné-Poe and Suzanne Després are interwoven with that of the Œuvre for, undaunted by constant material hardships, they persistently discovered and revealed dramatic talent. The French theatre is richer because of Lugné-Poe's vitality, fearless honesty, liberal interests, and literary discernment.

See: Lugné-Poe, La Parade (3 vols., 1931-1933); D. Knowles, La Réaction idéaliste au théâtre depuis 1890 (1934), pp. 172-208; M. Coindreau, La Farce est jouée (1942), pp. 249-262.

G. R. J.

Lundegård, Axel (1861-1930, Swedish novelist), is scarcely a figure of first importance in Swedish literature, but his work (like that indeed of his contemporary Gustaf af Geijerstam, q.v.) reflects some of the most characteristic phases of literary development in Sweden in the last 60 years. His first work, a volume of short stories I gryningen (1885; At Dawn), reveals him as an extremist exponent of the spirit of the Scandinavian 80's with its strenuous moral feeling (influenced by Kierkegaard and Ibsen's Brand) and its rigid realistic techniques. It soon became apparent, however, that this early polemic radicalism was more a half-naïve youthful reflection of the spirit of the day than it was an essential expression of Lundegård's own literary temperament. His first novel, Röde prinsen (1889; The Red Prince), provides an early accounting with the orthodoxy of the 80's. Its central character, Max von Rosenberg, is a young author who comes in the course of the novel to lose his early liberal faith in social and political democracy and the current naturalistic literature. He feels that the literature of the 80's had drawn an overidealized picture of the worker and that it had gone too far in its prevailingly dark depiction of human life in general. He calls instead for more light and sunshine in literature and champions an idealistic individualism not without its points of contact with Nietzsche (q.v.). In the new program for literature expressed in Röde prinsen, Lundegård was in line with the literary ideals of the Swedish 90's (Heidenstam, Lagerlöf, Levertin, qq.v., etc.); but Lundegård himself was not capable of making in the long series of novels that succeeded Röde prinsen a really significant creative contribution to the new neoromantic literature that flowered so richly in Sweden around the turn of the century. These novels fall loosely into two classes: first, a group of soft, quietly elegant romantic tales with sentimental erotic themes (Titania, 1892; Prometeus, 1893; Tannhäuser, 1895; Fru Hedvigs dagbok, Fru Hedvig's Diary, 1895); and secondly, a number of ambitious but only partially impressive historical novels (Struensee, 3 vols., 1898-1900; Drottning Margareta, 2 vols., 1905-1906; Queen Margaret; Drottning Filippa, 1907; Drottning Cilla, 1910; and others).

In his later years Lundegård's creative productivity feel off sharply; but during these years he wrote two pieces of biographical reminiscence (one on Victoria Benediktsson, the other on Strindberg, qq.v.) which are among the most valuable documents on literary trends during the 80's in Sweden. In these works Lundegård draws on his experiences as a literary collaborator with both Victoria Benediktsson and Strindberg, particularly with the former, whose literary executor he became.

See: S. Linder, "Axel Lundegård," Ord och bild, XL (1931), 482-490.

A. G.

M

Machado, Antonio (1875–1939, Spanish poet), was one of the leading poets of Spain following the renaissance brought about by Rubén Darío's "modernism." Always an admirer of Darío, he rejected the sensual as well as the verbal aestheticism of his school, adopting only the lyrical attitude from which it sprang. From the "modernistic" movement, or rather from its French models, Machado also derived the subjective feeling for the atmosphere of reality which replaced the descriptive representation of reality—or the romantic deviation from it prevailing in the poetry of the preceding period. Except for this debt to the art of his time, Machado's work has a non-temporal accent, the result and expression of an intense concentration in his inner life.

His biography is in perfect accord with the simple austerity of his poetry. Born in Seville, he probably owed to his father, a disciple of Sanz del Río (q.v.) and the first scholarly collector of Spanish folklore, an authentic liberalism, a preoccupation with the rebirth of Spain, and a taste for popular lore and wisdom which was—raised to a higher spiritual level—an important part of his work. He studied at the Institución Libre de Enseñanza. Afterward he went to Paris, where at the turn of the century he learned the modes of new poetry and sensibility. In 1907 he became a teacher of French, and years later a teacher of Spanish literature. He taught successively in the Institutos of Soria, Baeza, and Segovia. Meanwhile he studied philosophy, first with Bergson (q.v.) in Paris, later in Madrid. Respected always as a writer, he shunned recognition and kept aloof from literary groups and passing intellectual fashions. He preferred the friendship of obscure, modest people, appreciating in them, above all, human kindness and honesty. When the republic came, he was transferred to Madrid, elected to the Spanish Academy, and appointed a member of the Consejo de Instrucción Pública. Machado's moral quality—on which so much of the value of his poetry rests—was shown during the civil war. When many intellectuals abandoned the cause of the people, Machado, old and sick, discovered a new energy which he devoted to the struggle. He followed the government to Valencia and Barcelona. Never a prolific writer, he then wrote almost daily for the republican press. He made public appearances and endured the hardships of a chaotic situation. And yet, in a time of unbridled passions, his words were lofty and noble, without a trace of demagoguery or hate. In January, 1939, he crossed the Pyrenees afoot, with the mass of exiled refugees, and died a month later in the French village of Collioure. He became a true symbol of the moral strength and aspirations of his people, whom he had never forgotten.

Machado produced little and slowly, first publishing three short books, Soledades (1903), Soledades, Galerías y otros poemas (1907), and Campos de Castilla (1912), reprinted together with some new poems in Poesías completas (1917). Then followed Nuevas canciones (1924) and three new editions of Poesías completas (1928, 1930, 1934). In these were included, besides the later poems, his philosophic and poetic-prose aphorisms, maxims, and fragments, which he attributed to one Juan de Mairena, a creation of his own mind. Other prose fragments of the same type appeared in 1936 with the title Juan de Mairena: Sentencias, donaires, apuntes y recuerdos de un profesor apócrifo. His last writings have been collected posthumously in editions published in Mexico and Argentina. In collaboration with his brother Manuel Machado (q.v.), also a poet of distinction, he wrote several poetic plays as well as adaptations of Hugo's Hernani and of classic plays* by Lope, Tirso, and Calderón.

Machado the poet can be characterized by certain objective aspects of his work, such as his themes and ideas. He has a close relationship with the writers of the Generation of '98, especially with Azorín (q.v.), for his feeling toward the humble things of life, and with Unamuno (q.v.), for his religious and philosophical preoccupations. He is the poet of Castile, with its austere lands and men, its old cities, its history and soul. To Castile he is also bound by the gravity of his character and a deep personal experience in Soria, where he married and lost his young wife, the only love of this solitary poet. This experience had an ever present influence on him. The influence of his native Andalusia is less evident, but not less important. It can be perceived in his melancholy introspectiveness, in the fineness of his sensibility, and in the popular form and substance of his "cantares," proverbs, and maxims. He is also a poet of ideas—a political poet—who reflected in his writings the problems and hopes of modern Spain, and a poet of circumstances, who found his themes in the most immediate and common experiences. He is modern in his thought and aesthetic conception, and at the same time classic and traditional, a direct inheritor of the moral inspiration of poets such as Jorge Manrique. But his real value does not depend on his themes or ideas; it springs from a poetic comprehension of universal human emotions—time, death, and the search for God. These he sees in reality and in life because he is a realist and a stoic who turns towards himself in a continuous soliloquy to seek and find the eternal sources of man's spiritual anxiety and also the moral strength to accept with humble conformity man's destiny. The constant dialogue with himself to which he alludes in "Retrato," one of his most characteristic poems, has a double projection in his poetry, in a remembering and dreaming neither material nor fantastic, but spiritual, to such an extent that were it not for his permanent attachment to reality and vital experience he could almost be characterized as a mystic. In this combination of realism and transcendent illusion, as in everything else, Machado is profoundly Spanish and as such very difficult to classify as belonging to any school or pattern.

See: F. de Onís, Antología de la poesía española e hispanoamericana, 1882-1932 (1934), pp. 258-292; E. A. Peers, Antonio Machado (1940, in English).

A. del R.

Machado, Manuel (1874-, Spanish poet), was born in Seville, as was Antonio Machado (q.v.), his brother, from whom he differs profoundly. In Manuel the influence of Seville persists as an essential characteristic of his work, even though he has spent the greater part of his life in Madrid. For this reason, while Antonio is considered the poet of Castile, Manuel is considered a fundamentally Andalusian poet. To this basic Andalusian character there was added the influence of Madrid, and both were later to be fused and refined by the Parisian, acquired through Machado's French readings and the years he spent in Paris between 1898 and 1900. There is no incompatibility in his poetry between these three influences, at first sight so at variance. It was in Paris, under the influence of French symbolism (q.v.), that the Spanish personality of Manuel Machado—molded by the two Spanish cities that are at once the most refined and the most popular—revealed itself in its full originality, universal and modern.

The poetry of Manuel Machado, to be found in various works beginning with Alma (1902) and collected in Poesías (Opera Omnia Lirica) (1924), represents at its best one of the supreme forms of contemporary Spanish poetry. Although it seems slight—because his unfailing good taste keeps him from insistence and repetition—it offers great variety and wealth of themes and forms. More than any other Spanish poet he represents the full range of the modernist movement, by reason of his command of the French poetic technique which in him is perfectly fused with the most traditional and popular Spanish forms, by his use of the symbolist themes and sentiments, by his impressionist descriptions, his archaeological primitivism, his transcriptions of paintings, his feeling for the trivial, the commonplace, the decadent, by his abnormal sensitivity and his lack of will power, by his aristocratic interpretation of the popular. All these highly diverse elements are effortlessly combined in every moment of his work through some subtle, indefinable quality which is his originality, something that is grace, lightness, tone, bouquet, air—all contained and precise—elegance, in a word, very Spanish in character and very much of Seville in tone. Because this poetry, which is the essence of poetry, seems so light there are those who do not hold it in sufficient esteem; for this very reason it must be affirmed that it is unique and that its author must be regarded as one of the leading poets of this epoch.

See: A. González-Blanco, "Manuel Machado," in Los contemporáneos, Ser. 2 (1908), pp. 83-124; J. Chabás, Vuelo y estilo (1924), pp. 97-125.

F. de O.

Machar, Josef Svatopluk (1864-1942, Czech poet and essayist), was the leader of the realist movement in Czech poetry. He was born in Kolín and in 1891 became a bank clerk in Vienna, where he lived till 1918. In 1916 he had been imprisoned by the Austrian authorities for his anti-Austrian underground activities. He became in 1919 inspector general of the Czechoslovak army (largely charged with the educational program), but had to resign in 1924 because of a purely personal affair. This drove him into bitter opposition to his former friend, Masaryk. Machar died in March, 1942, in complete retirement.

The writing career of Machar began with lyrics in the tradition of Heine and Neruda (q.v.), later collected in the three volumes of Confiteor (1887-1892). In contrast to the decorative diction of poets such as Vrchlický (q.v.) and Čech (q.v.) Machar wrote in simple, almost prosaic style, and in distinction from their buoyant optimism he sang only of his heart's disillusionments which he bore with ironical skepticism. Many of these early poems, which were followed by a brilliant series of sonnets (1891–1893), are extremely witty as well as genuinely poetic in their sharp outlines, vivid impressionism, and slightly cynical pessimism. A later collection, Výlet na Krym (1900; A Trip to the Crimea), is a subjective travel diary in verse which shows a happier mood and an undiminished power of observation and description. But Machar soon widened his themes to include political and social questions. Tristium Vindobona (1893) is a series of satirical and skeptical meditations on the politics and ideology of his own nation. Machar suspected romantic nationalism and disliked the ineffectiveness of the Czech parliamentary opposition in Vienna. His early satirical attitude towards women changed. Now he saw them as victims of circumstances and in a volume of sketches and portraits of women called Zde by měly kvést růže (1894; Here Should Roses Bloom) pleaded the cause of their emancipation. Magdalena (1894; Eng. tr., Magdalen, 1916) is a highly amusing verse novel of a prostitute who marries respectably but is forced back to her "establishment" by the relentless persecution of small-town gossips.

With Golgotha (1901) Machar embarked on a cycle of volumes which he came to call Svědomy věků (The Conscience of the Ages), covering the whole history of the world from Babylon to the First World War. The models of Hugo and Vrchlický were obviously before his eyes. The title poem of Golgotha gives the clue to Machar's philosophy of history: Satan upbraids Christ on the Cross for having founded Christianity which will bring only suffering, cruelty, slaughter, and weakness to humanity. Another volume of the series is thus appropriately called Jed z Judey (1906; The Poison from Judaea); others glorify the virtues Machar admires—the bright intellect of the Greeks and the power of the Romans. V záři hellenského slunce (1906; In the Glow of the Greek Sun), Barbaři (1911; Barbarians), Pohanské plameny (1911; Pagan Flames), Apoštolové (1911; Apostles), Oni (1921; They), and On (1921; He) are the other titles of the cycle, which is built on the contrast, derived from Nietzsche (q.v.), between classical joy and Christian morbidity.

Machar resumed his satirical writing after the war with Tristium Praga (1926) and many epigrams and satires against Czechoslovak political conditions. Machar's prose, like his poetry, is always lucid and readable. He is a brilliant polemist and satirist as well as storyteller. Many volumes of reminiscences (e.g. Konfese literáta, 2 vols., 1901, The Confessions of a Literary Man; Krimindl, 1918, Eng. tr., The Jail, 1922; Pět let v kasárnách, 1927, Five Years in the Barracks) and portraits (Vídeňské profily, 1919; Viennese Profiles) rise above the level of good journalism. In a widely read travel book, Řím (1907; Rome), Machar expounded again his philosophy of history, but there his uncritical glorification of antiquity and superficial anticlericalism sounded even more blatant than in the more imaginative verse.

Machar's historical importance is considerable: his return to colloquial diction, his dislike of the 19th-century belief in progress, his hatred of the Hapsburgs and of Catholicism, his plea for the emancipation of woman, left a permanent impress on wide sections of Czech public opinion. But the Nietzscheism and bitter political resentments of his later years again isolated him, and his influence has been steadily on the decline. From an artistic point of view his early work is preferable; the later volumes of "The Conscience of the Ages" are frequently hasty improvisations, and his prose also displays many lapses of taste and power.

See: V. Martínek, J. S. Machar (1912); Arne Novák, Mužové a osudy (1914); P. Buzková, Žena v životě a díle J. S. Machara (1918); J. Šusta, "Macharův Řím," in Z dob dávných i blízkých (1924). There are German translations of many of Machar's works.

R. W.

Mac-Orlan, Pierre (pseud. of Pierre Dumarchais, 1883–, French novelist), was born in Péronne, Somme. He attended the lycée in Orléans. Prior to 1914 he was one of the bohemians who haunted the slopes of Montmartre, holding innumerable positions, notably one as a cartoonist. It was then he adopted the Scotch pseudonym by which he is now known. At the outbreak of the First World War he had written but a few humorous short stories for various magazines. One of these, Le Rire jaune (1914), was a parody on the Martian invasion of the world as described by H. G. Wells; in Mac-Orlan's story the invader is a strange sickness, "yellow laughter," which almost annihilates the human race. In another, La Bête conquérante (published in book form with Le Rire jaune, 1920), as the result of an operation a pig begins to speak. Thereupon man operates on all the animals, who gradually replace him in performing intellectual tasks. Centuries later man is able to regain his original sovereignty when the animals in turn succumb to their indolence. These two stories reveal the essence of Mac-Orlan's early thought and art: nothing is more unstable than civilization. It is the property of art to visualize ways of life other than the ordinary and to study people living on the margin of civilization—pirates and galley slaves of other days, soldiers of the Foreign Legion and apaches of today. The First World War, in which Mac-Orlan took part, emphasized his original leanings and clarified for him the vague notion on which his antirealism was based: where action is concerned, reality falls far short of the ideal. From this conception stem the two successive phases through which Mac-Orlan has passed in his denying the fitness of reality as subject matter. The first phase is reflected in his adventure stories, the second in his tales of witchcraft. The book he wrote on the war, Les Poissons morts (1917), bore witness to his disillusionment, to his conviction that action could never be a satisfactory substitute for dreams. Le Manuel du parfait aventurier (1920) crystallized this feeling: the true adventurer is one who without leaving his armchair dreams his adventures. Le Chant de l'équipage (1918) and A bord de l'Etoile Matutine (1920) illustrate this theory. The supernatural elements in Le Nègre Léonard et Maître Jean Mullin (1920) are drawn from various works on witchcraft which complete Mac-Orlan's library. Malice (1923) is inspired by certain Germanic legends.

Post-war materialism gave new meaning to Mac-Orlan's imaginative powers. He felt more strongly than ever that it was the duty of the poet to create a new set of legends and myths to counteract the barbaric materialism into which humanity was settling. La Cavalière Elsa (1921) and La Vénus internationale (1923) represent two episodes of this struggle.

See: Georges Girard, "Notes bio-bibliographiques: Pierre Mac Orlan," Bulletin de la Maison du Livre Français, January 1, 1922, pp. 140-142; Benjamin Crémieux, "Pierre Mac-Orlan," Revue européenne, Vol. IV, October 1, 1924, pp. 16-26.

P. B.

Madariaga, Salvador de (1886-, Spanish essayist and poet), was born at La Coruña in Galicia. Trained as an engineer at the Ecole Polytechnique in Paris, he moved to London in 1916 and devoted himself to journalism. In 1921 he entered the League of Nations Secretariat, becoming in the following year director of the disarmament section (1922-1927). From 1928 to 1931 he occupied the chair of Spanish studies at Oxford University. For the Spanish republic he served as ambassador to the United States (1931) and to France (1932-1934).

A product of three cultures, speaking and writing in Spanish, French, and English with the same perfection (all translations of his books are his own), Madariaga is, of all living Spanish intellectuals, the most cosmopolitan-minded figure. This spirit of cosmopolitanism, or call it rather humanism, is reflected in his political philosophy, based on the double principle of the liberty of the individual and the solidarity of mankind. Hence his interest in the problems of international relations and world organization as means to the realization of this double principle and the attainment of peace, subjects discussed in his political writings (e.g., Disarmament, 1929; Discursos internacionales, 1934; Theory and Practice in International Relations, 1937; The World's Design, 1938). Hence also his interest in the problems of national psychology as a political factor in the relations between countries, of which his Englishmen, Frenchmen, Spaniards (1928) is the best example. His interest in international affairs, however, has not lessened his preoccupation with Spain and things Spanish in general. Since Madariaga has lived most of the time abroad, especially in England, his task in this respect has consisted mainly in presenting and interpreting Spain—its land and its people, its problems and its values—to the outside world. That he has accomplished his aim in a brilliant manner is well illustrated in his historical essay Spain (1930; the second English edition, 1942, covers the period 1930-1942 as well) and in his several writings on different phases of Spanish literature (Shelley & Calderón, 1920; The Genius of Spain and Other Essays on Spanish Contemporary Literature, 1923; Guía del lector del "Quijote," 1926, Eng. tr., Don Quixote, 1934). Also to be mentioned in this connection are the author's two historical biographies, Christopher Columbus (1940) and Hernán Cortés (1941), which have appeared both in Spanish and in English. Finally, the same Spanish inspiration, in psychological mood as well as in technique, is to be found in Madariaga's creative work as a poet (Romances de ciego, 1922; La fuente serena, 1928) and, more recently, as a dramatist (Et Toisón de oro, 1940).

See: H. Petriconi, "Methodische Probleme der Kulturkunde (Zu den Werken Salvador de Madariagas)," Die neueren Sprachen, XL (1932), 257-263; A. Aita, "Un espíritu européo: Salvador de Madariaga," Nosotros, LXXX (1933), 62-69.

C. B.

Maeterlinck, Maurice (1862-, Belgian dramatist, poet, and essayist), was born in Ghent, studied law, and even practiced it half-heartedly for a little while. In 1886 he went to Paris, where he joined the phalanx of young symbolist poets who were lining up against the naturalistic sway in literature. In 1889 were published his dream-ridden poems, Serres chaudes, and La Princesse Maleine, a drama of thwarted love and mystery which, extraordinarily enough, the naturalistic writer Octave Mirbeau (q.v.) was the first to herald publicly, and overenthusiastically. Maeterlinck became famous overnight.

His succeeding plays, L'Intruse and Les Aveugles (1890), Pelléas et Mélisande (1892), Intérieur (1894), established his reputation. In contrast to the naturalistic theatre, which portrays realistically man's strife with the physical and tangible powers of evil in society, he created a drama which depicts symbolically the conflict the soul wages, "in the presence of eternity and mystery," against the dark and unseen forces of evil in the universe. The brooding pessimism of his early work became tempered, however, in later plays such as Aglavaine et Selysette (1896) and Monna Vanna (1902). The spell Death cast over his characters yielded gradually to the redeeming power of love, and in L'Oiseau bleu (1909), finally, Tytyl and Mytyl discover that death does not even exist. But they learn also that happiness cannot be found except in the heart of the seeker.

This dramatic evolution had been presaged in his prose work Le Trésor des humbles (1896)—especially in the chapters on Ruysbroeck, Novalis, and Emerson, whose mysticism and transcendentalism penetrate him—and parallels the evolution of his thought in his later essays, La Sagesse et la destinée (1898) and Le Temple enseveli (1902). The spirit, he came to believe, cannot be stained by the mortal sins of the flesh; misfortune, sickness, even death, are external to man's real life, which is spiritual and cannot perish. He found seeming justification for such encouraging optimism in his study of the intelligence and will to live of flowers, bees, termites, ants—L'Intelligence des fleurs (1907), La Vie des termites (1927)—which bespoke to him the presence in all things as well as in man of a spirit which religions have called divine and which protects life in an otherwise hostile and unknown universe. He holds that even if such a belief were to prove an illusion, it at least lends the heart strength to go to the end of the road. Let evil reign in the universe, justice, goodness, and love in the soul.

As for uninterrestrial immortality for the individual soul, Maeterlinck can hold out the hope of survival only in the bosom of the universal conscience, just as the body does in universal matter; he confessed stoically, in La Mort (1913), the impossibility of piercing the great secret and found comfort in the thought that a world devoid of mystery would be unbearable. He returned inevitably to the quest, however, and the certainty he could not find in pantheism or established religion he sought through the agency of the occult sciences, in L'Hôte inconnu (1917), Le Grand Secret (1921). While confirming him in his faith in the spiritual nature of life, they did not dispel his ignorance and doubts regarding the fate of man.

His ultimate attitude is one of melancholy agnosticism in the presence of destiny. His studies represent his poetic explorations in the mystery of life and death rather than a well-coordinated and original philosophical system. In his symbolistic theatre, however, he was the creator of a spiritual and idealistic art, a drama of the soul, which has had universal appeal and influence.

Maeterlinck won the Nobel prize in literature in 1911. In 1920, he came to the United States on a lecture tour. He returned in July, 1940, this time as a refugee from the Second World War. Most of his works are available in English translations.

See: H. Rose, Maeterlinck's Symbolism: The Blue Bird, and Other Essays (1911); J. Bithell, Life and Writings of Maurice Maeterlinck (1913); U. Taylor, Maurice Maeterlinck; a Critical Study (1914); A. Bailly, Maeterlinck (1931); G. Harry, La Vie et l'œuvre de Maurice Maeterlinck (1932).

S. A. R.

Maeztu, Ramiro de (1876-1936, Spanish journalist and essayist), was born in Vitoria, of a Cuban father and an English mother. A sojourn in Cuba as a lad brought him into contact with the political disturbances there, and his first articles predicted Spain's catastrophe of 1898. Maeztu came into prominence in Spain as a member of the iconoclastic group of young intellectuals later known as the Generation of 1898. His subsequent career was marked by change—change of residence, change of political faith. He traveled much on the Continent. For 15 years he was a news correspondent in London, and his articles published in Correspondencia and other Spanish periodicals were influential in arousing the interest of Spaniards in English political and social life. In 1928 the dictator, Primo de Rivera, sent Maeztu, now an arch-conservative, as ambassador of Spain to Argentina. After the fall of the monarchy he became one of the leaders of the reactionary faction, the Acción Española, working always against the liberal forces of the Spanish republic. He was imprisoned after the outbreak of the civil war and, according to report, was killed when he was taken from prison by Loyalist troops on November 7, 1936.

Although Maeztu was an important figure in the literary world of Spain during the first third of this century, much of the value of his writings may be said to be historical and political rather than literary. Their influence was augmented by Maeztu's opportunistic tendency to advocate the popular idea of the moment. From his youthful position of flamboyant anarchism he passed to that of stern defender of hierarchy and discipline. His first book, Hacia otra España (1899), urged the reform of Spain by opening its doors to the currents of contemporary European thought, a point of view which he later renounced completely. During his years in London he tended to uphold Anglo-Saxon manners and ideas as models for his fellow countrymen. In Authority, Liberty, and Function in the Light of the War (1916), later published in Spanish under the title La crisis del humanismo (1919), there is a noticeable shift from the individual to the collective ideal of government. Here he attempts to demonstrate that both authority and liberty have failed as a basis for society, and he maintains that the society of tomorrow must be founded on the principle of function. Defensa de la hispanidad (1934) is an eloquent document which the party of General Franco and the Spanish Falange in South America have used as propaganda. It is antiliberal, antidemocratic, anti-Anglo-Saxon, anti-Semitic. In it Maeztu states categorically that the hope of the future is a return to the past. He attributes to the ideals of the French Revolution all the political ills of the past 200 years and for "liberty, equality, fraternity" would substitute "service, hierarchy, brotherhood." He urges all Spanish-speaking countries to unite under the ideal of the ancient Catholic monarchy, the only road to stability and power. Don Quijote, Don Juan y la Celestina (1926) is a sociological interpretation rather than a literary criticism of these characters of fiction. Other works of Maeztu are Inglaterra en armas (1916), El arte y la moral (1932), and Cinco ensayos sobre don Juan, con un prólogo de A. Castro (1933).

See: R. Gómez de la Serna, Azorín, 1930 ed.; S. de Madariaga, Spain (1930); Félix García, Al través de almas y libros (1935).

K. R. W.

Magalhães Lima, Jaime de (1857–1936, Portuguese novelist), was born in Aveiro. He devoted himself to politics and social questions and traveled extensively. His literary formation was within the tradition of the realistic school, and he was a friend of the most outstanding figures in this movement. His writing began later, however, when new influences, such as the Russian and the Scandinavian, had come to be felt in the novel. It fell to him to incorporate the first of these tendencies into the Portuguese novel. He was so attracted by the doctrines of Leo Tolstoy (q.v.) that he visited this writer in Russia and set about to popularize his ideas in books and articles. O transviado (1899; The Misguided One) is the first attempt in Portugal in the field of the mystico-realistic thesis novel; in its pages a penetrating psychological instinct enhances its quality and interest. Later he wrote other novels and stories of the same evangelical, humanitarian type—O sonho da perfeição (1901; The Dream of Perfection), Na paz do Senhor (1903; In the Peace of Our Lord), and Reino da saudade (1904; Kingdom of Longing). His work is primarily of interest in that it represents the introduction of this new modality in the modern Portuguese novel.

See: J. Agostinho, Jaime de Magalhães Lima (1911).

E. G. D.

Magnússon, Guðmundur, see Trausti, Jón.

Maiorescu, Titu (1840–1917, Rumanian literary critic and statesman), studied in Vienna, Berlin, and Paris, and upon returning to his native land, brought with him Western European ideas. Appointed professor of philosophy in the University of Jassy in 1862, he attempted to blend Kantian and Schopenhauerean systems with Hegelianism. He soon realized, however, that in a country hardly emancipated from oriental influences the immediate task was preliminary ground work. He consequently set out to teach fundamentals. The literature of the period had not yet reached its full development, and many were the sins of minor poets. Maiorescu wrote his incisive critical investigation, Poezia română (1867; Rumanian Poetry), Beția de cuvinte (1873; Word Intoxication), and his monumental Critice (1874; Criticisms).

Maioreescu founded the society Junimea (Youth) of Jassy in 1865, and two years later the Convorbiri literare (Literary Conversations). In 1871 he was elected to represent Jassy in the Chamber of Deputies. Establishing himself in Bucharest, Maioreescu practiced law, was named professor of logic and occupied the chair until 1909, became minister of education in 1874 and 1888, minister of justice in 1900, and minister of foreign affairs in 1910. In 1912 he rose to the premiership of Rumania and dictated the Peace of Bucharest (1913), after the Second Balkan War.

An aristocrat and leader of the conservative Junimea (Youth), the former literary society which became a political party, Maioreescu could not accept the Marxian theories of Dobrogeanu-Gherea (q.v.). Hence the epochal debate on "art for art's sake" vs. "art with a tendency." The two critics exchanged the most skillful thrusts with elegance and fervor. The professor of logic and the former inmate of czarist prisons contributed considerably to the raising of literary polemics to a lofty plane.

See: N. Iorga, Oameni cari au fost (1935).
L. F.

Makuszyński, Kornel (1884–, Polish short-story writer, dramatic critic, and novelist), was born of humble parents at Stryj in the oil-bearing foothills of the Carpathians. He was educated in Lwów. His literary career began with the publication of youthful poems and theatrical reviews in Słowo polskie (The Polish Word). For 10 years (1904–1914) Makuszyński was dramatic critic for Słowo; later he became dramatic director of the Lwów Theatre. He was interned at the outbreak of the First World War and removed to Kiev, where he continued to direct plays. Returning in 1918 to Poland, he lived in Warsaw and in the Tatra mountain resort Zakopane. Within a short time he was the most popular writer in the realm. Poems, novels, short stories, translations, theatrical reviews, feuilletons, and children's tales flowed from his pen in an unending flood in response to an apparently insatiable popular craving for "the Makuszyński touch," which was a combination of whimsey and humor plus a large admixture of sincere patriotism. Time will inevitably winnow out much of Makuszyński's enormous output, but his children's stories are likely to live. Typical of his peculiar talent are Panna z mokrą głową (1932; The Girl with the Wet Pate), the Jeromesque Człowiek znaleziony w nocy (1932; The Man Found in the Night), and Szatan z siódmej klasy (1936; The Devil of Class Seven).

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, II (1928), 183–198; M. Orlicz, Polski teatr współczesny (1932), passim; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, II (1934), 278–281, 381–382.
A. P. C.

Malaparte, see Suckert, Curzio.

Malaquais, Jean (1908–, French novelist), Polish born, is said to have learned French in three years, mastering it sufficiently to write his novel Les Javanais (Eng. tr., The Men from Java, 1941, American title, Men from Nowhere, 1943) directly in that language. The work was awarded the Théophraste Renaudot prize for 1939. It concerns a community of outcasts who have drifted to a forlorn spot in southern France, where a small mining company offers them work at starvation wages. There are family rebels, international hobos, adventurers, refugees. The author reveals a gift for character analysis and the creation of a tense, somber atmosphere.

In 1939 Malaquais enlisted as a volunteer in the French army. Since his demobilization two works have been published in America, the lurid Journal de guerre (1943; Eng. tr., Jean Malaquais' War Diary, 1944) and Tentations (1943), a group of two short stories.

P. B.

Mallarmé, Stéphane (1842–1898, French poet and aesthete), was born in Paris and died in Valvins near Fontainebleau. His apparently obscure teacher's life was ruled by the same exclusive "furious vocation" as Villiers de l'Isle-Adam's (q.v.). When a child, he endlessly wrote Lamartinian verse. At the lycée in Sens, he discovered Les Fleurs du mal (see Baudelaire) which gave him his true orientation, then Poe and Gautier. About that time he became connected with the new Parnassian group and, at first, joined in their cult of vocables and their endeavor to bring more musical purity and weight to French poetry. He became Banville's admirer and friend, and Villiers appeared to him as "one of the elect." Through the latter he became acquainted with Hegel's philosophy. Having married, he went to London (1862–1864) in order to learn Poe's language—his future means of livelihood—which started him on the road to his linguistic and grammatical investigations (see Petite Philologie . . . les mots anglais, 1878). His lifelong interest in English poets and England is shown in his essay on Tennyson (Vers et Prose), his Five Letters to Swinburne (privately printed, 1922), the Oxford lecture (La Musique et les lettres), the essay on Hamlet (Divagations). Appointed to the Tournon lycée as teacher of English in 1863, he lived in the Rhone Valley (except for a year at Besançon) until 1872 and became the friend of Aubanel and Mistral (qq.v.). He contributed to Le Parnasse contemporain (1866) some poems in which reflections from Nerval and others gleam in a Baudelairean stream. In 1866, having "committed the sin of beholding Dream in its ideal nakedness," he realized the nature and scope of his poetical gifts and with the "fearful vision of the pure poem" before him "laid the foundation" of his "magnificent achievement" (Lettres à Aubanel, 1924). Unfortunately sickness and the tedium of his profession endangered the "most divine works" he had envisaged and made him despair. Nevertheless Mallarmé wrote at that time two great works—Hérodiade, a drama in verse (in Le Parnasse contemporain, 1869), and another in prose, Igitur, ou la Folie d'Elbehnon (not published until 1925), both left unfinished. The latter is the active presentation while Hérodiade, "the poem of absence," gives the passive aspect of the same theme.

In 1872 Mallarmé went to Paris, where his teaching career ended in 1893. The happier part of his last years was spent at his Valvins cottage. In 1865, at Banville's suggestion, he had written one scene in verse, "L'Après-Midi d'un faune," the first version of which, a "two-voiced poem" (unfinished) meant for the stage, differs largely from the "Eclogue" (1876; final ed., 1887), which inspired Debussy. He gave later a poetic adaptation of G. W. Cox's Mythology under the title Les Dieux antiques (1880), including an anthology of mythological poems by Banville and Leconte de Lisle.

Mallarmé remained unknown until 1884, when Huysmans (q.v.) in A rebours and Verlaine (q.v.) in his Les Poètes maudits paid him homage. Then the future leaders of French art and literature gathered around him, at the famous "Tuesdays" in the "Rue de Rome," and foreigners such as George Moore, Reyes, O'Shaughnessy, Stefan George, and, above all, Whistler, the author of a startling likeness of the poet, and later Gosse, Symons, T. S. Eliot, and others came to share the heroic "sublime madness" of the Prince of Poets.

Poems, from "Le Guignon" (1862) to "Sonnets" (1887), repeatedly revised (collected in Poésies, 1887; 2d ed., 1899; 3d ed., 1913; "Poèmes de circonstance" posthumously added, 1920); beautiful translations of Poe's poems (collected 1888); prose poems (partly published in Pages, 1891); Album de vers et de prose (1887–1888); Vers et Prose (1893); articles on the aesthetics of poetry and on style (collected in Divagations, 1897, which includes some prose poems and portraits, and in La Musique et les lettres, 1894)—these were given to small advance-guard reviews. As Mallarmé progressed, his works became more premeditated and strictly fashioned, hence his growing preference for the sonnet. Villiers said: "Each of his poems should be viewed as one architecture manifesting a concept, otherwise as a general organization." Gourmont found in them the "principle of the ideality of the universe" which had come into French poetry with Baudelaire. A poet's aim is to free the pure idea, "notion pure," from things or appearances, from the unruliness of time or "hazard." His work will be the sum total of the wizard's incantations, which act like a spell gradually transforming the reader into an exalted "diviner." The poems Mallarmé left, though but detached "shreds" of his intended work, are each a perfect symbolic whole wherein everything acts reciprocally, i.e., a complex drama imaging the other drama that is being enacted in the poet's mind. Consequently the nature and possibilities of the theatre were bound to challenge his philosophical and technical powers. His 1876 letters to O'Shaughnessy and various reported discussions prove that he was even then engaged upon a "vast dramatic work" (G. J. Aubry, "Banville, Mallarmé et leurs amis anglais, d'après des documents inédits," Figaro, June 2, 1937). His discovery in 1885 of Wagner's opera caused him to define his own position in this respect. Mallarmé claims that the poet alone may create this drame idéal, in which converge and unite all other tributary arts and which rejects "outworn" legends or anecdotes and vain scenery. The Wagnerian opera, marred by extraneous elements, remains at mid-height, but Mallarmé aims for the summit, the road to which he traces with remarkable elegance and lucidity in the "Cérémonials" (Revue indépendante, 1886–1887, republished in Vers et Prose) and in the essays concerning the theatre in Divagations. The microcosm or condensation of his ideal drama is the "Book." This throws light upon Mallarmé's famous pronouncements, "Everything in the world exists to be consummated in a book" (Divagations) and "There is but one Book" (Autobiographie, 1924), to which he had hoped to contribute 20 volumes including four generating tomes of Un Coup de Dés. His style harmonized with the Book and the ideal drama he had conceived. This style is, as he intended, new, condensed, suggestive, rich in musical qualities. It has extraordinary variety, while rejecting explanatory and imitative elements. Mallarmé's syntax with its numerous parenthetical clauses is inevitably, at first, difficult for the reader and a source of obscurity through its foreshortenings, unexpected juxtapositions, and displacements; but it has the équilibre supérieur he required. His resilient verse, which complies with the rules of traditional prosody, also has a remarkable objective ideal plasticity. The poet said of Un Coup de Dés, "Primarily prints." That is why Un Coup de Dés as well as every poem he wrote is a figure vivified by music.

In 1897, one year before his death, Mallarmé published Un Coup de Dés jamais n'Abolira le Hazard (in Cosmopolis, 1897, re-published 1914). A cast of the dice symbolizes the creation of the poem that challenges "hazard." The drowning of the ship's master, followed by the like fate of his young successor, portrays the engulfing of the poet by contingencies and the forces of time. We find here no abdication, but instead Baudelaire's exhilaration made up of joy and terror, faith and irony; and Un Coup de Dés rises on this twofold basis in the "language of lyricism and satire that lies in the very depths of poetry."

See: J. K. Huysmans, A rebours (1884); P. Verlaine, Les Poètes maudits (1884); P. Valéry, Variété II (1929); E. Noulet, La Poésie de Stéphane Mallarmé (1940); P. Beaussire, Essai sur la poésie et la poétique de Mallarmé (1942); H. Mondor, Vie de Mallarmé (1942); Mallarmé, Œuvres complètes (1945). Some of Mallarmé's poems have been freely rendered into English by Roger Fry, with commentaries by Charles Mauron (Poems, London, 1936, New York, 1937).

M. M.

Malmberg, Bertil (1889–, Swedish poet), was born at Härnösand and studied at Uppsala and in Germany on a traveling scholarship. He has published many volumes of original verse, together with translations of recent German poetry and a study of Schiller. Of his prose the charming interpretation of child life, Åke och hans värld (1924; Eng. tr., Åke and His World, 1940), is deserving of special mention. In his original poetry he stands alone among present-day Swedish writers. He is a pagan mystic, wholly detached from the life of the moment. The dominant influence in his work is the neoclassical vein of such modern German masters as Stefan George, Hofmannsthal, and Rilke (qq.v.). For his devotion to ideal beauty and philosophic introspection the volume Atlantis (1916) is typical. His mood is profoundly sad and solitary, changing from misty moonlight to the desolation of autumn, but with occasional gleams of faith in the "supernatural city of beauty" which beckons to him out of the future. In his volume Sångerne om samvetet och ödet (1938; Songs of Conscience and Destiny), however, the poet recants his aestheticism and advocates a simple acceptance of duty and human fellowship.

C. W. S.

Malraux, André (1901–, French novelist), was born in Paris, the son of a civil servant. He received his training in the Paris School of Oriental Languages, where he studied Sanskrit, Chinese, and archaeology. Malraux has become a colorful, brilliant, and profound literary exponent of the revolutionary thought and action of his generation. Deeply influenced by Nietzsche, Dostoevski, and André Gide (qq.v.), he has explored the human and philosophical meaning of the political struggles of the 20th century that have led, in a series of bloody outbreaks, from the Russian Revolution to the Second World War.

While in Indo-China in 1923 on an archaeological expedition in quest of Khmer statues, he became interested in the problems of colonial peoples and joined the Young Annam League in its fight for dominion status. As associate secretary-general of the Kuomintang, he played a leading role in the National Liberation Movement in 1925 and in the Canton general strike of that same year. In 1926 in Shanghai, Malraux became a member of the Committee of Twelve (of which Chiang Kai-shek was also a member) in a coalition of the Kuomintang and the Communist Party, and during the 1927 revolution he was given the post of propaganda commissioner for the provinces of Kwangsi and Kwantung. It was the experiences of these years and their lessons—at the same time intensely personal and of political and moral import—that Malraux poured into his first three novels, Les Conquérants (1928; Eng. tr., The Conquerors, 1929), La Voie royale (1930; Eng. tr., The Royal Way, 1935), and La Condition humaine (1933; Eng. trs., Man's Fate, Storm over Shanghai, both 1934). The last, his masterpiece, won him the Goncourt prize and world-wide fame. In the reaction that followed the successful Shanghai revolution of 1927, Malraux left China for Persia and Afghanistan, where he made important discoveries of Greco-Buddhist art. His next adventure was a flight, in company with his aviation instructor, Captain Corniglion Molinier, over the Arab desert. There, north of Ruba-al-Khali, he discovered what he claimed to be the Queen of Sheba's legendary city. In France during the troubled pre-war years he participated in numerous anti-fascist activities. His disinterestedness, his burning passion, his brilliance, his gift for crystallizing issues in phrases and slogans that were both challenging and charged with far-reaching implications (such as his famous transformer le destin en conscience), gave his voice and his writings authority among the politically progressive masses of the world.

Le Temps du mépris (1935; Eng. tr., Days of Contempt, American title, Days of Wrath, both 1936) is a brief novel dealing with the imprisonment and escape of a leader of the German underground in the days of the Nazi terror. When the Franco revolt broke out on July 18, 1936, Malraux immediately flew down to Madrid and organized an air corps for the Loyalist government. He participated in 65 flights over fascist territory, in the course of which he was twice wounded. In 1937 his novel on Spain, L'Espoir (Eng. tr., Days of Hope, American title, Man's Hope, both 1938), was published. When war came in 1939, he volunteered in the tank corps, was captured, escaped to Unoccupied France, where he completed a book on Colonel Lawrence, "Le Démon de l'absolu," as yet unpublished, and a long novel, La Lutte avec l'ange (of which the first volume, Les Noyers de l'Altenburg, appeared in Lausanne in 1943 in a limited edition), and was active as a soldier with the French Forces of the Interior.

Malraux writes, as he lives, in a mood of almost superhuman tension. The world of his novels is one of violence and death, of revolutionary upheavals, of oppressed men struggling for their lives and their "dignity." He portrays men at moments when they must face ultimate questions, and it is here that his exceptional gifts seem to come to their sharpest focus. Death and revolution are his main dramatic subjects, and they bring his characters, on both sides of the "barricades," to test their resources of courage and will, their power to endure suffering, to confront the problem of evil. Malraux's revolutionaries, in contradistinction to their bourgeois capitalist enemies, find their strength, not in themselves as individuals, but in their ideal of social purpose and human betterment, in their sense of human brotherhood. Yet, unlike so many proletarian writers, Malraux does not underemphasize individual psychology but treats it, rather, as a function of a social complex. A man of wide culture, he has brought his great resources of knowledge and of imagination to bear upon this problem of man's consciousness in the throes of crisis. Though Malraux is realistic in his respect for and vivid presentation of material reality, his exotic subject matter, the intellectual and emotional range of most of his characters, as well as the dramatic tension and the recurrent mood of exaltation that pervade his work, ally him to the romantics. A serenity, a tenderness, a feeling for the grandeur of human capacity for endurance and sacrifice, underlie the passion and the torment of his novels and lift his work at its best to heights of tragic beauty.

See: Geoffrey Stone, "André Malraux: From Death to Revolution," American Review, VII (1936), 287-300; Haakon M. Chevalier, "André Malraux: The Return of the Hero," Kenyon Review, II (1940), 35-46; Pierre Brodin, Les Ecrivains français de l'entre-deux-guerres (1942).

H. M. C.

Mandelstam, Osip (1892-, Russian poet), born at Warsaw, a graduate of the University of St. Petersburg, was one of the leaders of the Acmeists, who seceded from the symbolists about 1910. Mandelstam, in theory and practice, has stood for the expert and reverent use of words, demanding of the writer that he apply the same selective precision as does any craftsman in choosing his working material. Rejecting the verbal fancifulness of the symbolists, he has employed mostly words of common speech, characteristically giving to his first book of verse the title Kamen (1913; Stone). "We are introducing Gothic into word relations," he declared, "in the way Bach brought it into music." In a laconic style and classic meter Mandelstam has sung aloofness, indifference, and a defeatist fatalism. "I have never been anyone's contemporary," he boasted. "All has been, all will recur again. Sweet for us is the moment of recognition only." In a sense he yearned for medievalism, the "noble mixture of rationality and mysticism and the sensation of the world as a living equilibrium." The Revolution left him untouched and sad: "Broken is my spinal cord, my beautiful pitiful century." In 1922 a slim volume of his verse, Tristia, was published. He wrote some memoirs in prose, in 1925, and a novel, Yegipetskaya marka (1928; Egyptian Stamp).

A. K.

Mann, Heinrich (1871–, German novelist), born in Lübeck, shares with his younger brother Thomas Mann (q.v.) acute awareness of the painful contrast between the bourgeois and the artist. In both brothers the paternal conservatism of an old family of North German patricians battled with the inheritance of an artistic mother of Creole blood. While Thomas treated his problems with reserve and detached irony, Heinrich gave himself with intellectual passion to the full expression of his artistic and ethical impulses, whether they welled from the world of beauty-intoxicated Southern sensuality or from the wrathful ethos directed against the sham and rottenness of the society of the German Empire under William II. He studied in Berlin, spent much time in travel ing, and lived for long intervals in Italy.

He began his literary career as a disciple of Zola, Maupassant, and D'Annunzio (qq.v.), but soon developed an art and style of his own in which naturalism, romanticism, and expressionist-grotesque criticism of the time either fused or were alternately predominant. His first novel, Im Schlaraffenland (1901; Eng. tr., In the Land of Cockaigne, 1925), is pure naturalism, while the three novels about the duchess of Assy, under the general title Die Göttinnen (1902–1903; Eng. trs., The Goddess, 1918, Diana, 1929), present an orgy of the senses in the successive metamorphoses of the duchess as Diana, Minerva, and Venus. His novel Professor Unrat (1904; Eng. trs., The Blue Angel, 1932, Small Town Tyrant, 1944) shows the decline and debauching of a German schoolmaster. Disgustingly vulgar and blasphemous in parts, it nevertheless shows Mann's art of creating milieu, his ability to unfold psychologic details, and his mastery of pertinent words and phrases. This talent of Mann is turned to an aesthetically more delightful account in the novel Die kleine Stadt (1909; Eng. tr., The Little Town, 1931), the story of the visit of a company of actors to a small Italian town. One of Mann's masterpieces, it reveals the usually embittered pamphleteer as an able romancer who with benevolence and detachment brings to life the essence of human existence in the happy and tragic fate of little people. It is in glaring contrast to the confessional Zwischen den Rassen (1907), a work which attests to the author's difficulty in choosing between ethnic and moral values. This aims, for the benefit of the Germans, at formulating the ideal of a European culture, a goal from which the Germans seemed still remote, as is revealed later by Mann's powerful satire of German society under the empire, the trilogy Das Kaiserreich; not released for publication until some time after their writing, the novels Der Untertan (1918; Eng. tr., The Patrioteer, 1921), Die Armen (1917; Eng. tr., The Poor, 1917), and a few years later Der Kopf (1925; Eng. tr., The Chief, 1925) constitute a damning indictment of the ruling class, a skillful if grotesquely distorted pillorizing of the bourgeoisie, and an intellectually sympathetic sketch of the proletariat. The books are documents of political wrath and human indignation, and while their strict confinement to the empire of William II is unjust and untenable—the hypocrisy and selfishness of the Kaiserreich was only a specific form of the wave of materialism that had swept Western civilization—they are nevertheless works of a man who, fighting for a civilized humanity, describes with courage and eloquence the faults and weaknesses of his generation.

During the time of the Weimar Republic, Mann was elected president of the writers' section of the Prussian Academy. In this position he continued to work vigorously for the creation of a European culture to which all races would contribute their share. Brilliantly written essays tell of his intellectual leadership. Before Nazi persecution forced him into exile, several novels of widely divergent problems and milieus appeared, Mutter Marie (1927; Eng. tr., Mother Mary, 1928), Eugénie oder die Bürgerzeit (1928; Eng. tr., The Royal Woman, 1930), Die grosse Sache (1931), and Ein ernstes Leben (1932; Eng. tr., The Hill of Lies, 1934). Until the Nazis occupied France, Mann lived in Nice. Then he came to the United States.

In exile he continued, with numerous articles and essays, his relentless war against the enslaver of men and culture. In the field of fiction he wrote his "largest and most ambitious" works, the historical novels Die Jugend des Königs Henri Quatre (1935; Eng. tr., Young Henry of Navarre, 1937) and Die Vollendung des Königs Henri Quatre (1938; Eng. tr., Henry, King of France, 1939). Dealing with the problem of "human greatness, its questionable value and merit," Mann portrayed on the broad canvas of 16th-century France one of the most interesting figures of European history. Though magnificent in many parts, the novels are deficient in clearness of plot and sustained excellence of style. The novel Lidice (1943) is a curious amalgam of an expressionistic drama and a movie script. As a literary document which is to honor the representative greatness of the martyred Czech town, it is painfully inadequate. His autobiography, Ein Zeitalter wird besichtigt, appearing in 1945-1946, was greeted as a critical masterpiece.

Among Mann's attempts at the drama the most worthy of note is his play of the French Revolution, Madame Legros (1913); it has effective scenes and is done with a good measure of superb satire. As a champion of a new European humanism and a passionate fighter for intellectual and political freedom, as the master at times of an original, expressive, and cultured style, Heinrich Mann has secured for himself a permanent place in German literature.

See: H. Sinsheimer, Heinrich Manns Werk (1921); W. Schroeder, Heinrich Mann (1932).

W. K. P.

Mann, Klaus (1908-, German novelist, essayist, and playwright), was born in Munich, son of Thomas and nephew of Heinrich Mann (qq.v.). By his 20th year he had written a play (Anja und Esther, produced in 1925), short stories (Vor dem Leben, 1925), and a novel (Der fromme Tanz, 1926), each work promising, if slight, and representative of the diversity of his endeavors. There quickly followed the comedies Revue zu Vieren (1926), Gegenüber von China (1929), and Geschwister (1930; an adaptation for the stage of Les Enfants terribles of Cocteau, q.v.) and another volume of short stories, Abenteuer (1929). But if a certain youthful casualness marred the early works, the vivid recollection of his own childhood now lent understanding and accuracy to his characterizations of Frau Christine's youngsters in Kindernovelle (1927; Eng. tr., The Fifth Child, 1927) and to the portraits of his family and associates in his "autobiography," Kind dieser Zeit (1932). In an Anthologie jüngster Lyrik (2 vols., 1927-1929) and an equally provocative Anthologie jüngster Prosa (1928) he published characteristic specimens of his contemporaries. With his sister, Erika, he wrote gay accounts of their trips about the world (Rundherum, 1929; Das Buch der Riviera, 1931), and in 1931 appeared a collection of essays on the predicament of the European literati (Auf der Suche nach einem Weg). His next novel, picturesque and startling in its thesis concerning the success of Alexander the Great (Alexander: Roman der Utopie, 1929; Eng. tr., Alexander, 1930), indicated his interest in semihistorical themes, which he reasserted some years later in his Tchaikovsky novel (Symphonie pathétique, 1935; Eng. tr., Pathetic Symphony, 1938) and in the tale of Ludwig II of Bavaria (Vergittertes Fenster, 1937).

In 1933 Klaus Mann left Germany. Since then he has been actively interested in general cultural issues, has edited the literary anti-Nazi magazine Die Sammlung (1933-1935) and Decision (1941-1942), and has, time and again, demanded greater political awareness on the part of today's younger writers (see Escape to Life, 1939, The Other Germany, 1940, both in collaboration with Erika Mann, and his autobiographical commentary on his own generation, The Turning Point, 1942). At the same time creative writing has continued to engage him (Mephisto, 1936; Der Vulkan, 1939); and both as editor (Heart of Europe, 1943, an anthology, with Hermann Kesten, q.v.) and as critic (André Gide and the Crisis of Modern Thought, 1943) he has established himself as one of the most discriminating and intelligent of the younger Germans abroad.

V. L.

Mann, Thomas (1875-, German novelist and essayist), was born in the Hanseatic city of Lübeck, the son of a wealthy grain merchant and his wife, of German-South American extraction. After his father's death, Thomas and his family moved to Munich, where he worked first in an insurance office and later on the staff of the magazine Simplicissimus, attended the university, and wrote his early short stories (e.g., "Gefallen," 1894; Der kleine Herr Friedemann, 1898). During a stay in Rome with his older brother Heinrich Mann (q.v.) he began his first novel, Buddenbrooks, which was published in 1900 (imprint, 1901; Eng. tr., 1924). Conceived on a small scale as merely "a protracted finger practice with no ulterior advantages," the book developed into a broad account of the history of a Hanseatic family whose strength and prosperity are gradually being undermined by the disintegrating fascination which the arts, Wagner's (q.v.) music, and Schopenhauerian ideas exercise upon its successive generations. J. P. Jacobsen, Turgenev, and Maupassant (qq.v.) were some of the formal models of this brilliant naturalistic novel. Its central theme is the emerging relationship between the bourgeois life of the 19th century and the precarious modern sensibility of the artistic temperament—an issue which occupied Thomas Mann throughout his earlier work, especially in his verse drama Fiorenza (1906) and in his three superb short stories, "Tonio Kröger" (1903; Eng. tr., 1914), "Bekenntnisse des Hochstaplers Felix Krull" (1911; enlarged, 1937), and Der Tod in Venedig (1913; Eng. tr., Death in Venice, 1925), the first tale "dearest to my heart," the second, suggested by the memoirs of Manolescu, "the best and happiest thing I have done," and the third one of the most perfect and widely admired petits romans written in our time.

The first literary fruit of his marriage in 1905 to the daughter of the mathematician A. Pringsheim was Königliche Hoheit (1909; Eng. tr., Royal Highness, 1916), "a comedy in the form of a novel," in which the artistically minded aristocratic hero, preoccupied with his private problems, eventually works out his salvation within the social framework of duty and sacrifice instead of becoming a victim of life.

The years during and after the First World War drew Thomas Mann, whose tastes and cultural traditions, as he himself insists, were "moral and metaphysical, not political and social," into an ever greater concern with the issues of the day. A long essay, "Friedrich und die grosse Koalition" (1915; Eng. tr. in Three Essays, 1929), and the volume Betrachtungen eines Unpolitischen (1918) represent his "war service with the weapon of thought" and the substance of his conservative political speculations during the European conflict. Especially in the essay "Von der Tugend" (in Betrachtungen) he deplors the political ineptitude of German writers, and in this and subsequent pleas (Von deutscher Republik, 1923) he calls for a genuine mobilization of the German intellectuals in support of the new state.

In 1924 appeared Der Zauberberg (Eng. tr., The Magic Mountain, 1927), a spectacular novel of ideas, which was begun in 1912 during a three weeks' visit to Davos. The minutely detailed canvas of this characteristically German Bildungsroman catches the spiritual pattern of European civilization during the first part of the present century and projects it into the rarefied atmosphere of a Swiss sanatorium. There, drawn into many baffling relationships, a youthfully innocent and impressionable German engineer, Hans Castorp, discovers the problematical nature of life and death. In the midst of sickness and decay and surrounded by exponents of every conceivable human attitude, especially the extremes of devitalized reasoning and overrationalized living, he resolves to respect and maintain the profound distinction between life and death: "For the sake of goodness and love," he concludes in the cardinal chapter "Schnee," "man shall let death have no sovereignty over his thoughts." The breadth of its intelligence, the subtlety of its arguments, the precision of observation, and the consummate craftsmanship of its composition have made The Magic Mountain one of the most conspicuous German contributions to the modern European novel.

Work on Der Zauberberg was accompanied by the publication of a delightful prose idyl, Herr und Hund (1919; Eng. tr., Bashan and I, 1923), and the writing of several volumes of critical essays (Rede und Antwort, 1922; Bemühungen, 1925). Later collections of critical prose (Die Forderung des Tages, 1930) reaffirm the subtlety of Thomas Mann's critical perception ("Amphitryon," "Rede über Lessing") and testify to the alertness of his response to the cultural challenges of the time. Apart from frequent tributes to those writers to whom he has felt himself most closely related—Novalis, Heine, Whitman, Fontane (q.v.), Ibsen (q.v.), Tolstoy (q.v.), Joseph Conrad, Gide (q.v.)—he has devoted one volume of studies, Leiden und Grösse der Meister (1935; Eng. tr., Freud, Goethe, Wagner, 1937), to Goethe, Wagner, Platen, and Storm.

During the 20's, Thomas Mann insisted upon the spiritual and political obligations which the humanistic heritage of the European tradition imposed upon the liberal European writers (see Pariser Rechenschaft, 1926). His intellectual convictions were based upon Nietzsche (q.v.) and the German conservative tradition and sprang from a lively sense of historical continuity and spiritual order. In a delightful story, Unordnung und frühes Leid (1925; Eng. tr., Early Sorrow, 1929), he portrays, against the background of his own family and with melancholy irony, the moral and social confusion which resulted from the chaotic years of the European inflation of values. In 1930, the year after he was awarded the Nobel prize in literature, there appeared the Novelle entitled Mario und der Zauberer (Eng. tr., Mario and the Magician, 1930), a "tragedy of travel" with "moral and political implications."

In the meantime the plan was being formulated for what will certainly prove to be Mann's most profound and elaborate statement of his vision of man's timeless nature—though not, perhaps, his most pleasing work. A portfolio of illustrations depicting the story of Joseph, for which he was asked to write an introduction, suggested to him the subject of the novel Joseph und seine Brüder, the first volume of which was not published until 1933. Not unlike Der Zauberberg, this impressive tale emphasizes the cultural obligations which a purposeful life imposes upon the human being. The biblical world is seen through the ever sharpening eyes of the young Joseph, another Hans Castorp, whose environment, manners, and language are reproduced with meticulous archaeological accuracy, but who is, at the same time, endowed with the knowing perception of a modern observer. The four bulky volumes, Die Geschichten Jaakobs (1933; Eng. tr., The Tales of Jacob, American title, Joseph and His Brothers, both 1934), Der junge Joseph (1934; Eng. tr., The Young Joseph, 1935), Joseph in Aegypten (1936; Eng. tr., Joseph in Egypt, 1938), and Joseph, der Ernährer (1944; Eng. tr., Joseph the Provider, 1944), represent Mann's most positive treatment of the social frame outside of which civilized living is impossible. The broader problem of cultural unity has thus absorbed in Mann's later work the issue of the artist's personal relationship to society. In Lotte in Weimar (1939; Eng. tr., The Beloved Returns, 1940), which relates the historic visit in 1816 of Werther's Lotte to the aged Goethe, the stress is not so much upon the problematical figure of the artist as upon the humanistic achievement of a man whose self-denying and stylized life is, to the bourgeois observer, not without strangeness and tragedy. In this book and in the short novel Die vertauschten Köpfe (1940, Eng. tr., The Transposed Heads, 1941) the delicacy and refinement of Mann's detachment have become disturbing, and his style is often pedantic, pontifical, and mannered, although his talents as storyteller are as apparent as ever.

After 1933 he lived in Switzerland, where he edited the literary journal Mass und Wert (1937 ff). Since his arrival in the United States (in 1938), he has taken an active part in the discussion of current political issues (The Coming Victory of Democracy, 1938; This Peace, 1938) without, however, achieving in the New World the effectiveness of argument or speech for which his earlier German essays had made him so distinguished.

See: Mann, A Sketch of My Life (1930); James Cleugh, Thomas Mann; a Study (1933); H. J. Weigand, Thomas Mann's Novel Der Zauberberg (1933); J. G. Brennan, Thomas

Mann's World (1942); W. A. Reichart, "Thomas Mann: An American Bibliography," Monatshefte für deutschen Unterricht, XXXVII (1945) 389-408.

V. L.

Maragall i Gorina, Joan (1860-1911, Catalan poet and essayist), was born in the city of Barcelona of a well-to-do, middle-class family and received a very careful education. For some time he was a journalist, imparting to his articles a quality that sometimes gave them the value of literary essays. He revealed himself at once as a poet of lofty inspiration when he participated in the Jocs Florals of Barcelona in the year 1881. His first volume of poetry appeared in 1895 with the title Poesies, and this was followed soon by Visions i cants (1900; Visions and Songs), Les disperses (1904; The Dispersed), Enlla (1906), Seqüències (1911; Sequences). Elected president of the Ateneo of Barcelona in 1903, he read his essay "Elogi de la paraula" (Praise of the Word) which, along with his "L'elogi de la poesia," (The Praise of Poetry) stands as a minor masterpiece in this difficult genre. He translated the Ifigènia a Taurida from Goethe, who influenced his thought and work so greatly, Eridon i Amina (1904) of the same author, Enric d'Ofterdinger of Novalis (1907), and Himnes Homèrics. His complete works were published by his own sons (Obres completes, 21 vols., 1929-1935) with eloquent prologues and essays by distinguished critics.

As a literary theorist Maragall advocates an absolute spontaneity and is opposed to any subsequent retouching of works. His theory of the "living word" influences his disciples considerably, and the danger of approving all that is instinctive and undeveloped was seen when, after his death, his followers found themselves the custodians of his doctrines—without his talent. Living in the Barcelona of the beginning of the century, which was in a state of upheaval and full of class hatreds and struggles between the workers and the powerful middle class, Maragall revealed himself as a very human poet and writer although never-going beyond the limits of a broad and Christian sympathy for the humble folk. Barcelona indeed makes itself felt in all his work, is evident in his language, "characterized by a sweet Barcelonian impurity," as has been said, and in his subjects, especially the "Oda a Barcelona" which presents the great Mediterranean city in all its grandeur—and in its defects as he sees them. Verses of his are on all Catalan lips, either recited or sung to the music by distinguished Catalonian musicians. The "Cant de la senyera" (Song of the Banner), "La sardana" (Catalan national dance), "La vaca cega" (The Blind Cow), and especially the "Cant espiritual" (Spiritual Song), a vigorous and charming work, are among the best.

Maragall was one of the keenest spiritual guides the Catalonian middle class has ever had and sometimes its severe critic, though never really a radical. His pretended anarchism was purely intellectual in nature and for the most part no more than a certain rebelliousness which ambient reality aroused in his spirit. Some of his observations and intuitive deductions were brilliantly presented, as in his article "L'església cremada" (The Burned Church) when he declared that he sensed God more among the ruins of a church devastated by the fury of the revolutionists than in the churches visited by the mighty. He exerted an immediate influence on various writers. Maragall is a much-read poet in the Catalan-speaking countries. At times he treated expertly themes of extraordinary breadth, as in his "Comte Arnau"; in this traditional figure of Catalonian poetry he saw the incarnation of what for Nietzsche (q.v.) was the prototype of the superman. In translation he is much esteemed in Hispanic countries. Miguel de Unamuno (q.v.) proclaimed him at his death "the best Peninsular lyric poet."

See: Joaquim Folguera, Les noves valors de la poesia Catalana (1919); M. Sants Oliver, prologue, in Maragall, Obres completes (1929); Josep Pijoan, El meu don Joan Maragall (n.d.).

F. de P.

Marañón, Gregorio (1887–, Spanish essayist), was born in Madrid, where since his youth he has been a well-known figure in the world of science, literature, and high society and later of politics. A physician and scientist by profession, Marañón belongs to that rare type marked by destiny to attain success in several fields. He was, before the civil war, a professor in the faculty of medicine at the University of Madrid; a leading specialist in endocrinology; one of the most esteemed practitioners in Spain; a member of various academies, among them the Academy of Letters; a doctor honoris causa in some of the best-known foreign universities. He had also a great political influence in the first years of the republic, heading at the time with Ortega y Gasset (q.v.) the Agrupación al Servicio de la República. It is even said that his advice to the persons close to Alfonso XIII was instrumental in bringing about the downfall of the monarchy without bloodshed. Like Ortega, he later grew apart from the republic, left Spain at the outbreak of the civil war, and since then has been bitterly criticized by the republicans for what they term his desertion and even for his pro-Franco sentiment, a charge which he tried to repudiate indirectly in his pamphlet Liberalismo y comunismo: Reflexiones sobre la Revolución Española (1938).

As a literary figure Marañón represents, better perhaps than other Spanish scientists who entered the field of literature, a characteristic tendency in contemporary Spanish essay writing, the applying of the knowledge acquired in the study of a scientific discipline to the problems of general culture and, in the case of Spain, to its national and historical problems, the predominant subject in contemporary Spanish thought. A man of wide reading, the owner of a vast and selected library, Marañón's essays and books are numerous. Although cultural in outlook, they are based with few exceptions, on biological facts or doctrines. Some deal with problems of social behavior, such as Sexo, trabajo y deporte (1925), Tres ensayos sobre la vida sexual (1927), Amor, conveniencia y eugenesia (1931), Vocación y ética (1935), and Psicología del gesto (1937); some are interpretations of literary characters such as Don Juan; some are dedicated to the history of scientific ideas in Spain, especially Las ideas biológicas del Padre Feijóo (1934); some are of a general character, such as the essays collected in Raíz y decoro de España (1933). There is also another group of biographical and historical studies in which Marañón is probably at his best; among these are the biological essay Enrique IV de Castilla (1930), Amiel: Un estudio sobre la timidez (1932), El conde-duque de Olivares (1936), which Karl Vossler rated as an "extraordinary work of research and exposition," and the more recent Tiberio: Historia de un resentimiento (1939) and Luis Vives, un español fuera de España (1942).

A. del R.

Marcel, Gabriel (1887–, French dramatist, critic, and philosopher), has succeeded in winning distinction in two widely different fields. As a philosopher he may be accounted one of the leading contemporary idealists, and as a dramatist, though he has never won great popularity, his work has certainly stood in the front rank for the last 30 years. The gap between the two types of endeavor is not so great as it might seem at first glance.

Marcel's plays spring directly from his concept of life, but they can by no means be considered merely as vehicles for the expression of abstract ideas. Indeed, a reader knowing little about Marcel might easily put them down as continuations of Porto-Riche's (q.v.) théâtre d'amour. He himself acknowledges his technical debt to Porto-Riche and Cured (q.v.), to Ibsen (q.v.) and Schnitzler (q.v.); but he goes on to recognize an intellectual debt as well—to Meredith, Dostoevski (q.v.), Nietzsche (q.v.), and, above all, Bergson (q.v.). Marcel's work as a philosopher has dealt chiefly with epistemological problems and has stressed the importance of intuition, affirmation, and faith. It is not surprising, then, that his plays most often are investigations into the value of faith, the impulse to believe, in the lives of men and women and into the necessity for love, of God and of one's neighbor, as a catalytic agent, if a satisfactory relationship with either God or man is to be achieved. These concepts, in some form, run through all his plays, notably La Grâce (1911), Le Quatuor en fa dièse (1925), Un Homme de Dieu (1925), La Chapelle ardente (1925), and Le Dard (1938). Marcel has not attempted in these pieces to reach a definite conclusion; he views his material from many angles, making his reader aware of its richness and complexity and leaving him not so much with a moral as with a heightened perception of a spiritual atmosphere. Three books of philosophy, Journal métaphysique (1927), Etre et avoir (1935), and Du refus à l'invocation (1940), give a clear idea of his philosophical development, and numerous uncollected reviews, in particular in the Nouvelle Revue française, mark him as a sensitive and intelligent critic.

See: Jean Wahl, Vers le concret (1932); Paul Archambault, Témoins du spirituel (1933).
C. W., Jr.

Marichalar, Antonio (1893–, Spanish essayist), was born in Logroño, of an aristocratic family. A man of sensitive perception and keen literary curiosity, familiar with various foreign languages, he has devoted his life to the reading and study of literature, with special attention to contemporary authors in English and French. The fruits of his meditation on the aesthetic problems presented by this epoch are his essays on poetry and on such authors as Claudel, Gide (qq.v.), James Joyce, Lytton Strachey, and Liam O'Flaherty, among others, which comprise the volume Mentira desnuda (1933). He is guided in his analysis of contemporary aesthetics by no literary school or militant position, but by a pure, elevated understanding of the essential values of poetry in all times and all lands. In addition to these essays which have made him a guiding light and an interpreter of foreign literature, he is the author of a book on a Spanish theme with foreign contacts, a biography of the last duke of Osuna (Riesgo y ventura del duque de Osuna, 1930; Eng. tr., The Perils and Fortune of the Duke of Osuna, 1932).

See: P. Salinas, "Un libro de Marichalar," Indice literario, II (Madrid, 1933), 85–89.

F. de O.

Marinetti, Filippo Tommaso (1876–1944, Italian poet, novelist, dramatist, and critic), is best known for his revolutionary theories of criticism, for which he found the name "futurism." These embrace all the arts and invade the domain of politics, calling for war and violence, constituting before the event a program for Fascism. Born in Alexandria, Egypt, he was educated in France at a Jesuit college and at the Sorbonne. He later studied law at Pavia and Genoa, then settled in Milan. Many of his works, written in French, had to be translated into Italian.

Through the Anthologie-Revue of Milan he entered into relations with the advance guard of Paris literary circles, and his poem in free verse, "Les Vieux Marins," was awarded first prize at the samedis populaires of the Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt. His first important work was an epic poem, La Conquête des étoiles (1902), which, like Destruction: Poésies lyriques (1904), contained sea poetry of dazzling imagination. His un-French qualities of luxuriance and fury captured the French critics. Paul Claudel (q.v.), whose genius was of such an opposite kind, hailed Marinetti as one of the few great poets of his time, and Guillaume Apollinaire (q.v.) fell under his influence. In Milan (1905) Marinetti founded Poesia, which became the organ of those grands poètes incendiaires, the young futurists, raised with their help the flag of lifelong revolt against the tyranny of the past (passatismo—"past-ism"), and launched a campaign against French decadence and his own masters, the symbolists, though he was the first to translate Mallarmé (q.v.) into Italian. In Paris he was the lion of the literary salons, and the Mercure de France published (1905) Le Roi Bombance, his "hilarious satiric tragedy" dedicated to Paul Adam (q.v.), French follower of Nietzsche (q.v.), which revealed a powerful but disorganized talent, reminiscent of Rabelais by its coarseness and vitality, but with a disheartening emptiness of meaning. He revisited Africa, which acted upon him like an intoxicant (La Ville charnelle, 1908; Mafarka le futuriste; roman africain, 1909). On February 20, 1909, he published in Figaro his celebrated Manifeste du futurisme, which created a furore all over Europe by its artistic iconoclasm and its glorification of la guerre seule hygiène du monde. In Paris admiration prevailed over indignation, and on April 3, Le Roi Bombance, despite its length and unsuitability to the stage, was performed at the Théâtre de l'Œuvre. D'Annunzio (q.v.) became a convert; and when Marinetti was condemned to two months' imprisonment on charges of immorality in the Italian translation of Mafarka, Luigi Capuana (q.v.), the novelist, defended him in court, expressing regret that he himself was too old to become a futurist. But Marinetti's relentless adversary was always Benedetto Croce (q.v.), critic and philosopher, for whom the art of any given period is merely a stage in an endless human tradition that came down to us from the past and will stretch on through us into an immeasurable future. With the Manifeste the futurists turned to the methods of politics and war, preaching irreverence, Irredentismo, and free verse, despite broken heads, sidewalk affrays and arrests, and carrying their campaign even to Austrian Trieste. Fired by their sense of a mission, they planned to deliver Italy, that museum and mausoleum of the tourists, from her past. They would teach Venice to burn her gondolas and tear down her palaces to make room for factories; they would lead Italian youth to love violence and danger, to despise women and forget the Divine Comedy; they would purge Italian literature of tenderness, pity, and age-old moonlit conceptions of beauty, the sainte pourriture of romanticism and the traditions of classicism, substituting the new beauty of machinery, airships, and the "demon of speed." They wanted to divest woman of all the trappings of romantic love, religious sentiment, and poetic miasma of Fogazzaro (q.v.) and D'Annunzio, stripping her of the importance given her by the old preoccupation with adultery and pursuit, and leaving a mere object of sensuality to be sought by the hero with arrogant assurance in his hours of leisure before returning to man's real life of art and war.

When the First World War, which he had foreseen as well as invoked, came, Marinetti enlisted in the infantry and later became a bombardier, fought at Gorizia and Vittorio

Veneto, was wounded and decorated. Although in his literary doctrine he recommends l'abolizione dell'io, his poetry is highly personal, and he gives some autobiographical details in L'Alcova d'acciaio; romanzo vissuto (1921) and in the vehement and obscure 8 Anime in una bomba (1919), which analyzes those eight contradictory spirits in him which shall explode like a bomb in the face of the pedants. His style is always aggressive and extravagant, but clear in his polemic writings. In his fiction and his poetry (a mixture of audacities, defiance, crude sensualism, and splendor of imagery), it is defaced and willfully obscured by bizzarrierie of form, ellipses, and verbal eccentricities (e.g., L'Imagination sans fils et les mots en liberté, 1913). His language is often offensive, the wish to outrage always present. The straining after sensationalism betrays itself in various titles: La Momie sanglante (1904); Come si seducono le donne, Elettività sessuale, Un Ventre di donna; romanzo chirurgico (all 1919); Le Monoplane du pape (1922); Il Tamburo di fuoco; dramma africano di calore colore rumori odori (1926); Novelle colle labbra tinte (1930).

Futurism repudiates our human heritage, rejects thought and feeling, defies civilization itself. In the arts it led directly to dadism, cubism, and surrealism, in politics to Fascism. Although in 1931 in an English periodical Marinetti denied any relation between his more learned movement and "reactionary" Hitlerism, yet the links and likenesses between them soon became apparent, and futurism clearly helped shape 20th-century counter-revolutionary history.

See: H. B. Samuel, Modernities (1914), pp. 212-238; E. Settimelli, Marinetti; l'uomo e l'artista (1921); G. d'Arrigo, Il Poeta futurista Marinetti (1937); A. Simon, tr., "Poems by Marinetti," Poet Lore, XXVI (1915), 707-743.

R. S. P. M.

Maritain, Jacques (1882-, French theologian and philosopher), one of the foremost exponents of Catholic doctrine today, was born in Paris of a Protestant family; his father, who had served as secretary to the statesman Jules Favre, and his mother, Geneviève Favre, brought him up in liberal Protestantism. He was educated at the Lycée Henri IV in Paris, where he met Ernest Psichari, close friend of his youth, and at the Sorbonne, where he met Raïssa Oumançoff, who became his wife and his devoted intellectual partner. After his marriage (1904) and his graduation as agrégé in philosophy (1905), he received baptism as a Roman Catholic (1906); he completed his studies in science at Heidelberg and in philosophy under Bergson. But he was deeply dissatisfied with the scientist and phenomenalist attitude then current among philosophers and found comfort and certitude only in the system of St. Thomas Aquinas. He taught for a few years at the Collège Stanislas in Paris, then at the Institut Catholique, lectured widely in Europe and in North and South America, lived and taught in New York during the Second World War, was appointed French ambassador to the Vatican in 1945.

The chief influences on Maritain's youth were those of Léon Bloy (q.v.), whose burning faith and charity determined his conversion, of Péguy (q.v.), in spite of subsequent estrangement, and of Bergson (q.v.), who gave him back the sense of the Absolute. Maritain, however, found Bergson's metaphysics timid and deficient and severely criticized in his first work (La Philosophie bergsonienne, 1914; new ed., 1930) Bergson's "irrationalism," his "atheistic pantheism," and his "pragmatism." For several years following his enthusiastic adoption of Thomism, Maritain undertook to attack the chief sources of error of the modern world (chiefly in Antimoderne, 1922, and in Trois Réformateurs, 1925, Eng. tr., Three Reformers, 1928): the Reformation and Luther's religious individualism; Descartes as father of a philosophy divorced from theology and as sponsor of the myth of progress; Rousseau, who disfigured the religious truths which he had rediscovered and bequeathed the mistaken notions of natural goodness and of the omnipotence of the State to modern democracies. Even Pascal, as a poor theologian, a faulty metaphysician, and an empirical pessimist in his political views, has not been immune from Maritain's strictures.

After these combative works, Maritain proceeded to give a more serene exposition of his own philosophy. It is based on St. Thomas, whom Pope Leo XIII had recommended in 1879 to Catholics as the teacher whose inspiration could save intelligence and civilization; but Maritain's Thomism is a living reinterpretation and not a historical or scholarly presentation. It can be defined as Aristotelianism enriched and fulfilled by Christian revelation; it asserts the truth of realism as against Cartesian idealism, branded as "the original sin of modern philosophy." Thomism is also, in Maritain's own words, "a philosophy of intelligence and of being or more precisely of existing considered as the act and perfection of all perfections"; it denies determinism and considers freedom as the very essence of the intellect; it respects mystery as the food, and not the foe, of intelligence and views philosophical progress as a deepening penetration into mystery and not, as in science, as the substitution of some problems for others. Finally, it restores the human mind to order, is the only true and integral humanism not deifying man, but showing him as inhabited by God. Maritain's cardinal principle has been that faith and reason can and must be reconciled, reason being powerless unless it is vivified by faith: he does not contend that Thomism is a ready-made solution to all our problems and does not advocate a return to the Middle Ages, but presents the restoration of the spiritual truths of Thomism as a guiding light in our modern intellectual chaos.

Maritain's most coherent and profound exposition of Thomism is to be found in Eléments de philosophie (1923-1930; Eng. tr., An Introduction to Philosophy, 1930-1937), Distinguer pour unir, ou les Degrés du savoir (1932; Eng. tr., The Degrees of Knowledge, 1937), Humanisme intégral (1936; Eng. tr., True Humanism, 1938), Ransoming the Time (New York, 1941), and a convenient summary, Confession de foi (New York, 1941), first published in English in a volume by several authors entitled I Believe (1939, ed. by Clifton Fadiman). Although Maritain is primarily a metaphysician, his influence has been equally marked in the fields of aesthetics, ethics, and politics. He has tried to evolve an aesthetic out of Scholastic philosophy and has colored it with his personal views on art and his sensitive appreciation of modern writers like Claudel, Cocteau, and Reverdy (qq.v.), musicians like Eric Satie, and painters like Severini, Rouault (on whom he wrote brief volumes), and Chagall; his chief work in this domain is Art et scolastique (1920; new eds., 1927, 1935; Eng. tr., Art and Scholasticism, 1930). His later philosophical criticism of modern poetry (Situation de la poésie, 1938) is less luminous.

His ethics and politics derive from his metaphysical position, since man must first of all know who he is and where he is before he can know what he should do. Maritain has vigorously opposed the Rousseauist conception of democracy (in which the general will is the expression of numbers), communism (which frees collective men, but not the human personality), bourgeois and capitalist liberalism (which sets up the selfish interest of the individual as the absolute rule), and all totalitarian, fascist, or reactionary systems

(as the most directly opposed to Christian principles). He had condemned the French royalist doctrines as early as 1927, in Primauté du spirituel (Eng. tr., The Things That Are Not Caesar's, 1930). In several later works, published mostly in English in New York, Scholasticism and Politics (1940), Ransoming the Time, Le Crépuscule de la civilisation (1941; Eng. tr., The Twilight of Civilization, 1943), The Rights of Man and Natural Law (1943), Maritain presented democracy as being, in Bergson's phrase, "of evangelical essence and moved by love" and praised it most when, refraining from appealing to appetite and inertia, it proclaimed the dignity of the individual person. He added that such a belief in the worth of the individual can only be rooted in Christian faith and begged Catholics to make democracy more social and, forging new ties between the working classes and the Church, to reintegrate the proletariat in the national community. Equality should be proportional, i.e., afford the possibility for men, in whatever social condition they may be placed, to enjoy the same opportunities of achieving their human fullness. Three other volumes, one on the French defeat of 1940, A travers le désastre (1941; Eng. tr., France, My Country, through the Disaster, 1941), Education at the Crossroads (1943), and Pour la Justice (1945), bear witness to Maritain's versatility and keen interest in contemporary problems. He has also written Christianisme et démocratie (1943; Eng. tr., Christianity and Democracy, 1944).

The value and solidity of Maritain's metaphysics are questioned by many non-Catholic philosophers, and many Catholics refuse to link their faith with one system, however comprehensive it may have been; some even deplore a certain lack of intellectual humility in some of his works. But it is universally acknowledged that the courage of his political attitude, the charity and love of mankind which breathe in his works, the cogent power of his reasoning, and the lucidity of his style when at its best entitle him to be called, in the words of T. S. Eliot, "the most conspicuous figure and probably the most powerful force in contemporary philosophy."

See: Gerald Phelan, Jacques Maritain (1937); Raïssa Maritain, Les Grandes Amitiés (1941-1944; Eng. tr., We Have Been Friends Together, 1942; Adventures in Grace, 1945).
H. P.

Marquina, Eduardo (1879-, Spanish dramatist), is generally and properly thought of as the chief exponent of the verse drama in modern Spain. He began his career as a journalist in his native Barcelona, but prose has never been his happiest medium, even though he is the author of various collections of short stories and short novels. He has also translated from Catalan, French (Baudelaire's Les Fleurs du mal), Portuguese, and English (Booker T. Washington's Up from Slavery). At the age of 20 Marquina published, in collaboration with Luis de Zulueta, a dramatic verse legend called Jesús y el Diablo, but his first real achievement was the group of lyric poems, Odas (1900), some of which had been previously published in Publicidad, of Barcelona. Eglogas followed in 1902 and Elegias in 1905. These early poems of Marquina placed him among the modernistas who, with Rubén Darío at their head, sought to renovate Spanish poetry by extending poetic imagery, by avoiding swollen rhetoric, by perfecting form, by utilizing the innovations of the French Parnassians and symbolists. Marquina did indeed achieve considerable novelty in form, expression, and emotion; but he always maintained his own individuality, and his innovations were received with less shock than that produced by the works of many of his contemporaries. This is probably because he constantly remained serene, optimistic, and sincere. His main theme is love, love for woman first, but also a love toward all created things, as illustrated by Vendimiación (1909). Marquina was never an ivory-tower poetic recluse, and his growing preoccupation with national problems is shown in successive volumes such as Canciones del momento (1910) and Tierras de España (1914). His subsequent collections of verse show him still deeply rooted in the Spanish tradition—Juglarias (1914), Breviario de un año (1918), La poesía de San Francisco (1927), Los pueblos y su alma (Buenos Aires, 1936), and especially Por el amor de España (Buenos Aires, 1937), containing six romances (ballads) and a prose epilogue.

As a dramatist Marquina has written a few plays in prose, such as Cuando florezcan los rosales (1914), and several in verse in which the lyric element runs away with the dramatic (El abanico duende, 1918; El pavo real, 1922); in one case he even dramatized a very poor novel of Blasco Ibáñez (q.v.), Los enemigos de la mujer (1927). His typical verse dramas, however, place him in the tradition of Lope de Vega and Zorrilla because of his predilection for Spanish history and legend. These historical plays are unquestionably his best. The first was a "dramatic biography in four acts" on a foreign subject, Benvenuto Cellini (1906), but in 1908 Marquina showed his real españolismo in Las hijas del Cid, a not too spirited play based on the third canto of Spain's great epic poem. More dramatic effectiveness is displayed in Doña María la Brava (1909). Marquina's most famous play is En Flandes se ha puesto el sol (1910), a vivid portrayal of the clash, still continuing, between the spirit of Spain and that of the rest of Europe. Audiences did not care if historical details were false and dramatic structure imperfect, for the play, in ringing verse, is alive. Las flores de Aragón (1914) is a vigorous, even somewhat overblown, dramatic treatment of the marriage of Ferdinand and Isabella. El Gran Capitán (1916) idealizes the figure of the great Gonzalo de Córdoba and his devotion to Queen Isabella. In 1925 Marquina, in collaboration with A. Hernández Catá, produced a drama in which both theme and subtitle are reminiscent of Spain's golden age, the "legendary cloak and sword play" Don Luis Mejía, the best modern Spanish dramatic treatment of the personality of Don Juan. The dramatic technique is admirable, the characterization of the sad and unsatisfied Don Luis excellent. Since 1925 Marquina has continued to write verse dramas (e.g., Fruto bendito, 1927; Salvadora, 1929; Fuente escondida, 1931; En el nombre del padre, 1936) and has made an adaptation of Lope de Vega's La Dorotea (1935). The success of Marquina's plays, often rhetorical and altisonant in tone, is remarkable in an age dominated in Spain by the quiet, realistic, and apparently undramatic plays of men like Benavente and Martínez Sierra (qq.v.).

See: A. González-Blanco, Los dramaturgos españoles contemporáneos, Ser. 1 (1917), pp. 297-330.

N. B. A.

Marsman, Hendrik (1899-1940, Dutch poet, critic, and short-story writer), was born at Zeist in the province of Utrecht. He suffered many ailments as a child and never enjoyed robust health. While other boys spent their free time at play, Marsman read and studied. He began to write poetry at the age of 20. His father, who was a well-to-do bookseller, supplied him with the means for travel and for a prolonged sojourn in Germany. That was in 1921, when German youth, demoralized by four years of war and privation, was in turmoil. They were scornful of the intellect and glorified action as the one force that could liberate them from the enervating spell of thought. Marsman's first volume of poetry (Verzen, 1923) reflected the rebellious and explosive mood of young Germany, for which he coined the name "vitalism." After his return to Holland he studied law and established himself as a practicing attorney at Utrecht (1929). But he was not strong enough to be both a writer and an attorney. He had to make a choice and chose to devote himself exclusively to a literary career. He was married by that time. The young couple began a wandering life, settling down for longer or shorter periods in France, Spain, Italy, Greece, and Austria, wherever the scene was in harmony with his literary mood. In 1938 was published his Verzamelde Werk (3 vols., Collected Works), containing selections from his poetry, narrative prose, and critiques that he considered worth reprinting. At the outbreak of the Second World War he was living in the mountains near Bogève, France. In June, 1940, he fled with his wife to Bordeaux, intending to escape via England to South Africa. His ship was torpedoed during the night. Only two of those on board were rescued. One of these was M^{rs}. Marsman. The poet's life was lost before his great talent had reached maturity.

Marsman ranks among the literary leaders of his generation in Holland. The appearance of his Verzen was welcomed as an event of great significance. The spirit of these poems was akin to the revolutionary bewilderment of the German boys who were to form Hitler's hooligan following. But though this mood was alien to Marsman's Dutch contemporaries, they were impressed by the power and the boldness of his imagery. German expressionism was toned down and constrained by the Hollander's pictorial instinct. He was saved from being carried away on the waves of German emotionalism and the animal passions of the age by a native tendency towards self-analysis. He won great distinction as a critic, but he never probed the literary consciences of others as relentlessly as he did his own. This self-probing had a dulling effect on his creative faculty. In the years that followed the publication of Verzen he wrote almost exclusively critical and narrative prose. His later poetry is affected by his prose style. It is balder, less ornate; but this simplicity acts as a foil to the force of the imagery. Marsman's egocentric preoccupation with the inner life received a rude shock from the outbreak of the war. His last great poem, Tempel en Kruis (1939; Temple and Cross), is a kind of poetic autobiography, the story of his growth as a poet under the impact of the study of world history.

See: J. Greshoff, "Inleiding," Nieuwe Nederlandsche Dichtkunst (1942), Vol. II; N. P. van Wyk Louw, "Die Digter Marsman, in Marsman, Poezie en Proza (1943).

A. J. B.

Martin du Gard, Roger (1881–, French novelist and dramatist), winner of the Nobel prize in 1937, was born in Neuilly-sur-Seine, of a well-to-do middle-class family. He completed his studies at the Ecole des Chartes in 1906; his thesis, based on excavations at the Norman abbey-church of Jumièges, was published in 1909 under the title Etude archéologique des ruines de Jumièges. The same year saw the publication of his first novel, Devenir! followed in 1913 by Jean Barois, his first work to attract wide attention. After the First World War, during which Martin du Gard served in a motor transport division, he began his major work, Les Thibault (complete Eng. tr., The World of the Thibaults, 1939–1941), a novel cycle in eight parts, the composition of which filled the period between the two wars (Le Cahier gris, 1922; Le Pénitencier, 1922; La Belle Saison, 1923; La Consultation, 1928; La Sorellina, 1928; La Mort du père, 1929; L'Été 1914, 1936; Epilogue, 1940). He has also written nouvelles (Confidence africaine, 1931; Vieille France, 1933). His dramatic works include two peasant farces, Le Testament du Père Leleu (performed at the Théâtre du Vieux Colombier 1914) and La Gonfle (published 1928), and a drama, Un Taciturne (performed 1931 at the Comédie des Champs-Élysées).

Martin du Gard has described himself as "an independent writer who has escaped the fascination of partisan ideologies, an investigator as objective as is humanly possible, as well as a novelist striving to express the tragic quality of individual lives." His novels are in the tradition of the 19th-century realists and naturalists; the seemingly effortless narrative and descriptive technique is the result of patient craftsmanship. He is especially concerned with the conflict of ideas in men's minds: Jean Barois, for example, traces the religious and intellectual development of a Frenchman of the 1880–1890 generation who finds himself torn between his heritage of mystic beliefs and the demands of his scientific mind. The two main characters of Les Thibault, Jacques and Antoine Thibault, seek in different ways, one through revolt, the other through self-mastery, to define their relationship to their inherited bourgeois environment. Martin du Gard's habit of mingling his fictional characters with historical figures and events—the Dreyfus affair in Jean Barois, the First World War in L'Été 1914—makes his novels a valuable commentary on the events and intellectual currents of the early years of the 20th century.

Martin du Gard has never been a conspicuous public figure. Among his friends are Jean Schlumberger and André Gide (q.v.). He was associated with the Nouvelle Revue française from its early years, worked and wrote for Jacques Copeau's (q.v.) Théâtre du Vieux Colombier immediately before and after the First World War, was a frequent visitor to the symposia held at the Abbaye de Pontigny under the direction of Paul Desjardins (q.v.). From 1920 on, his customary residence was his country estate at Bellême in Normandy, where he was known as a friendly host to younger writers. After the events of June, 1940, Martin du Gard lived in Unoccupied France, maintaining a dignified silence in face of the "New Order."

See: A. Houtin, Un Prêtre symboliste: Marcel Hébert (1925); R. Lalou, Roger Martin du Gard (1937); Les Prix Nobel en 1937 (Stockholm, 1938); A. Gide, Journal (1939); H. C. Rice, Roger Martin du Gard and the World of the Thibaults (1941); G. Sadoul, "Rencontres, sous l'occupation, avec Roger Martin du Gard," Etoiles (Paris), June 19, 1945.

H. C. R.

Martínez Ruiz, José, see Azorín.

Martínez Sierra, Gregorio (1881–, Spanish dramatist), born in Madrid, began his career by writing poems (e.g., Flores de escarcha, 1900) and novels (e.g., Tú eres la paz, 1907, Eng. tr., Ana María, 1921). He took his very first work, El poema del trabajo (1899), to the great dramatist Benavente (q.v.), who gave the younger man encouragement. Martínez Sierra's first dramatic work consisted of four Maeterlinckian fantasies (see Maeterlinck) in dialogue form, published under the title Teatro de ensueño (1905). His first attempt actually to reach the stage, Vida y dulzura (1908), was in collaboration with the Catalan dramatist Santiago Rusiñol (q.v.). La sombra del padre (1909) was far more realistic. More successful was El ama de la casa (1910), the story of a stepmother who triumphs over difficulties through good sense and sheer goodness. Canción de cuna (1911; Eng. tr., The Cradle Song, 1917), in two acts with a brief poetic interlude, dedicated to Benavente, is the author's most famous play. It is a poetic idyl rather than a drama, delicately portraying with considerable sentimental charm various feminine types in a convent. It was played in New York in 1921, in London in 1926 (109 performances), again in 1927 in New York (with Eva Le Gallienne; 125 performances). It was on tour in the United States, had several performances in Oxford, Liverpool, and Dublin, and was later made into a movie (1933). Primavera en otoño also appeared in 1911. Mamá (1912), which would make an audience think contrastingly of Ibsen's (q.v.) The Doll's House, shows a frivolous mother turned from thoughts of extracurricular pleasures to home and duty, because of the needs of her daughter. Madrigal (1913) presents a wayward lover saved from an adventuress and returned to a sane and wholesome life by his pure, sweet fiancée. El reino de Dios (1915; Eng. tr., The Kingdom of God, in Plays, Vol. II, 1923) traces the career of a woman, Sor Gracia, from youth to old age and offers a fine role for a character actress. It was played in London in 1927 and Ethel Barrymore played it in New York in 1928 to open the theatre named for her. Sueño de una noche de agosto (1918; Eng. tr., The Romantic Young Lady, in Plays, Vol. II, 1923) is a typically pleasant Martínez Sierra production, with a romantic heroine, a sophisticated novelist-hero, a sprightly thrice-married grandmother, and amusing situations and dialogue. Don Juan de España (1921), in seven acts, presents modern variations on an old theme. In the last act Don Juan, now Brother John, is stabbed in trying to settle a brawl, but he dies in the arms of the sweet and innocent Clara, thus accompanied as always by woman's love. Triángulo (1930) presents a man whose supposedly drowned first wife returns after he has married a second. He loves them both equally; so at the end of the play, after the curtain falls, he escapes into the audience, turning "from protagonist into spectator," and there is no solution.

These plays constitute a fair representation of the several score turned out by Martínez Sierra in intervals between managing a theatre (Eslava), running a publishing house (Renacimiento, and later the Biblioteca Estrella), writing poems, novels, short stories, and essays (40-odd volumes of nondramatic works), and translating or adapting plays of Maeterlinck (five volumes), Shakespeare, Goldoni, Dumas fils, Brieux (q.v.), Björnson (q.v.), Ibsen, Dickens, Barrie, and Shaw. In most of his work he has had the collaboration of his distinguished wife, Doña María de la O

Lejárraga, and many critics have attributed to her influence the definitely feminine tone of his productions. Like Benavente, he is cosmopolitan in his interests, though typically Madrileño, and it is usually the upper strata of Madrid society which are presented on his stage. He is less bitter and less profound than Benavente. His characters are plausible though not deep, his dialogue always sprightly, his dramatic technique excellent. His very considerable success on the stage was further assured by the talented first lady in his troupe, Doña Catalina Bárcena.

See: Helen and Harley Granville-Barker, "Introduction," in Martínez Sierra, The Kingdom of God and Other Plays (1929); J. G. Underhill, "Introduction," in Martínez Sierra, The Cradle Song and Other Plays (1929).

N. B. A.

Martini, Fausto Maria (1886-1931, Italian playwright, poet, and novelist), was born in Rome. He seems to have had a pleasant and sheltered childhood; he felt a deep attachment for his mother, and this is a recurring theme in his lyrics and short stories. The novel Si sbarca a New York (1930), chiefly autobiographical in character, reveals that Martini was one of a group of young poets who would gather around Sergio Corazzini (q.v.) to discuss the latest works of Pascoli and D'Annunzio (qq.v.) or to debate the relative merits of Verlaine, Mallarmé, Rodenbach, Maeterlinck, Jammes, and Samain (qq.v.), with whom they felt a bond of kinship. When Corazzini died at the age of 20, Martini and two other of Corazzini's admirers, feeling that they had lost their spiritual moorings, set sail for New York. After a series of hardships Fausto returned to Italy, where he entered journalism. He was severely wounded in the First World War.

Although his greatest success was as a playwright, he also wrote several books of verse and prose. Of these, La Vetrina dell'antichità (1923), a collection of short stories and reminiscences, is important because it discloses Martini's personality as an artist. It also reveals that spiritual bewilderment which, in the author's lyrical expressions Le Piccole Morte (1906), Panem nostrum (1906), and Poesie provinciali (1910), resolves itself in plaintive and nostalgic tones. In this last-named collection of verse are found the somber colors, the humble and subdued tone, the repressed sentiments, and the languorous and ephemeral musicality of verse that characterize the poeti crepuscolari.

In the Italian theatre Martini's position is unique in that his creations are a product of the blending of three main currents of the artistic expression of his time: the twilight atmosphere of the crepuscolari, Pirandello's (q.v.) dualistic concept of life, and the wry cynicism of the grotteschi. These features are best exemplified in Martini's most successful plays: L'Altra Nanetta (1917), Ridi, pagliaccio (1919), and Il Fiore sotto gli occhi (1922). In Ridi, pagliaccio, the protagonist, unable to realize his dream and not possessing the emotional maturity to endure frustration, finds release in suicide. This work, under the title of Laugh, Clown, Laugh, was presented in New York by David Belasco and Tom Cushing in 1923-1924. In Il Fiore sotto gli occhi, considered by many as Martini's best play, Silvio Aroca, a Latin professor, wants to recapture the romantic, adventurous life of his youth. It is only the heroine's intuitive intelligence and her sense of loyalty to the moral standards of the bourgeois world to which she belongs that avert the catastrophe.

As in his novels and short stories, most of Martini's protagonists in the plays are reflections of the author himself, for they, like him, are products of a well-ordered respectable middle-class society. Yet underneath a placid exterior, there is an emotional unrest and a spiritual groping for something intangible and often indefinable which explains their sense of frustration. It was indeed fortunate that Martini turned to the theatre for the expression of his inner life, because in it his perception of new psychological truths is not blurred by the involved and verbose style of his novels. In his plays, both characters and situations, shorn of any rhetorical cloak, emerge alive in all their frail humanity.

Other plays are Aprile (1917), Il Giglio nero (1921), I Drammi dell'insignificante (1928), Teatro breve (1929); La Porta del paradiso (1920) and I Volti del figlio (1928) are collections of short stories. Martini's best-known novels are Il fanciullo che cadde (1920), Veriginità (1920), and Il Silenzio (1932). The author also translated into Italian Rodenbach's (q.v.) Bruges-la-morte (1907).

See: A. Tilgher, Voci del tempo, Ser. 2 (1924), pp. 150-162; A. Galletti, Il Novecento (1935), pp. 379-437.

P. P. M.

Martini, Ferdinando (1841-1928, Italian playwright, journalist, and politician), a descendent of an old Tuscan family, was born in Florence. As a boy he attended a private school in Florence which failed to prepare him for the university, although it provided him with ample grounding in rhetoric and prosody. At 15 he left school for the paternal library and the inspiring company of men of letters who frequented his father's house. He prided himself on being a self-educated man.

Interested like his father in the theatre, he wrote a two-act comedy, L'Uomo propone e la donna dispone (1862), and a play, I Nuovi Ricchi (1863), which won for him a literary prize; other pieces for the stage—Fede (1864), Un Bel Matrimonio (1864), L'Elezione di un deputato (1867)—followed, with varying success. Under the pen name of Fantasio he composed dramatic proverbs (Chi sa il gioco non l'insegni, 1871; La Strada piu' corta, 1871; Il Peggio Passo e' quello dell'uscio, 1873), a story (Peccato e penitenza, 1872), and a play (La Vipera, 1874) which were extremely well received. Although these are neither masterpieces of characterization nor of invention, nevertheless they represent a genre which, imported from France, was enthusiastically received in Italy.

Martini had a long and colorful political life; a liberal, he was first elected a deputy in 1874 and served until 1919. In 1874 he became undersecretary in the Ministry of Public Education and for a few months was minister (1892-1893). While holding these offices he favored radical reforms. From 1897 to 1900 he was civic commissar of the colony of Eritrea and in 1915-1916 was minister of colonies; he was elected to the Senate in 1923 and became minister of state in 1927. As administrator for Eritrea he displayed wisdom and capacity for organization.

His long political career never caused him to lose interest in literature. The two books Nell'Africa italiana (1891) and Cose africane (1896) are documents of colonial diplomacy and also delightful travel accounts. He collected documentary material on the history of Tuscany and issued Le Memorie inedite di Giuseppe Giusti (1890), the Epistolario di G. Giusti (1904), and Il Quarantotto in Toscana (1918). His main and most important writing activity was however in the field of journalism. He began in 1871 as a correspondent of the daily Fanfulla under the pen names of Fantasio and Fox. Later he edited the weekly literary magazine the Fanfulla della domenica (1879-1882). He then started the Domenica letteraria (February, 1882) and founded the Giornalino dei bambini (1880-1882), the first publication of its kind in Italy. He gathered around himself the best writers of his time: Carducci, Pascoli, De Sanctis (qq.v.), Collodi, and others. By means of these publications he endeavored to develop cultural interests among his numerous readers and to acquaint the Italian public with European literature. His prose style is worthy of the best literary periodicals of Europe. A wide knowledge of French literature, theatre, and life helped him in developing a manner always clear, precise, modern, appealing to a large public without ever compromising in purity and measure. His prose is a refreshing example of what could actually be done with a language that had been overburdened by a century of classical tradition and too often limited by provincial flavor. Unmistakably a Tuscan, his pages are full of charming anecdotes told with the color, biting irony, and quick wit so characteristic of the people from this region.

His literary criticism is guided by sound instinct and innate good taste if not always by deep aesthetic concepts. His evaluations of D'Annunzio (q.v.) and Giovanni Marradi are remarkable instances of the soundness of his taste and of the destructiveness of his apparently stingless appraisals. He discovered and helped artists and writers, admiring cleverness even among those younger authors who somewhat bewildered and shocked him by being so different from him in their scorn for stylistic perfection and their indulgence in vulgarity. Valuing cultured conversation as the highest form of expression, he succeeded in giving to his writings the fluidity, variety, and vivacity of an expert conversationalist.

Martini is at once a modern and a humanist, a Tuscan true to his ancestral blood and a European. His collections of public speeches, articles, and memoirs, such as Tra un sigaro e l'altro (1876), Di palo in frasca (1891), Pagine raccolte (1912), Confessioni e ricordi (2 vols., 1922-1928), his correspondence, Lettere, 1860-1928 (1934), offer copious documentation on 80 years of political, literary, and anecdotal life of Italy. Seldom an historian of synthetic vision, he is incomparable as a chronicler and a depicter of bourgeois society.

See: C. Weidlich, Ritratto di Ferdinando Martini (1841-1928) (1934).

M. Pi.

Martinson, Harry (1904-, Swedish poet and author of travel sketches and nature studies), is indubitably the most remarkable literary phenomenon among living Swedish authors. While some of his critics have insisted that his work is highly overrated, the general Swedish literary public, judging from the sale of Martinson's books, accept the judgment of those critics who look upon him as the first literary gift to his generation. The strange vagabond story of his childhood, youth, and early manhood is to be found in the two autobiographical novels Nässlorna blomma (1935, 9th ed., 1936; The Nettles Bloom) and Vägen ut (1936, 5th ed., 1937; The Way Out) and in the two volumes of highly original travel impressions Resor utan Mål (1932; Aimless Wanderings) and Kap Farväl! (1933; Eng. tr., Cape Farewell, 1934) based upon his six years at sea. Born into poverty in the southeast province of Blekinge, a homeless orphan at the age of six, he lived a bleak, wandering early existence, doing what work he could on various farms and estates in his native province, until at the age of 14 he made his way to Göteborg and went to sea as a cabin boy. Despite the unhappy circumstances of his early boyhood and the miscellaneous vagabond experiences of his youth and early manhood, Martinson's work shows on the whole rather few traces of bitterness or of the class consciousness of an author of typical proletarian backgrounds. He is interested in human experience as such rather than in social or political theories; and no Swedish author has given expression to his experience of life in more astonishingly fresh and immediate forms. His work has often been criticized as undisciplined and obscure because of its frequently fantastic, seemingly forced stylistic expressionism. It is undisciplined in the sense that it does not observe the normal rules of Swedish diction and syntax, and it is certainly obscure at points; but not infrequently Martinson's departure from accepted Swedish speech practices is a happy one, and his obscurity (in so far as it exists) seems to result directly from the inability of language to express the overwhelming intensity and complexity of his impressions rather than from any conscious desire on the part of the author merely to experiment with language forms for their own sake.

He has written in both poetic and prose forms, the first two volumes from his pen being poetry (Spökskepp, 1929, Ghost Ship; and Nomad, 1931), which were followed by the four volumes of autobiographical material. These in turn were succeeded by three volumes of fresh and original if at times somewhat obscure nature studies, Svärmare och harkrank (1937; Dreamers and Daddy Longlegs), Midsommardalen (1938; Midsummer Valley), and Det enkla och det svåra (1939; The Simple and the Difficult).

In 1940 he published a strenuous polemic volume, entitled Verklighet till döds (Realism to Death), in which he attacks modern political theories and practices which destroy individual human values. Martinson's two volumes of travel sketches, Resor utan mål and Kap Farväl! are to date his most artistically well-rounded and satisfactory works. They contain miscellaneous impressions of people, places, and natural phenomena observed during the author's life at sea—impressions projected with an amazing immediacy, so starkly realistic in their employment of sensory material that they break over the bounds of mere sensation into a new-dimensional world clearly related to expressionistic painting. The later nature studies in Svärmare och harkrank, Midsommardalen, and Det enkla och det svåra retain these new-dimensional patterns, but in somewhat less happy, frequently very obscure forms. This is chiefly because Martinson departs in these volumes from the largely artistic aim merely to regive his impressions and is now searching, not very successfully as yet, for some deeper meaning in the strange world of human experience as he sees it. His "philosophy," a kind of mystical primitivism, is far less impressive than his art. This is apparently however a transitional phase in Martinson's development. The future may reveal him as an original thinker of more consequence than he would seem to be at present.

A. G.

Martinson, Moa (born Helga Svarts, 1890–, Swedish novelist and poet), is the most impressive of women interpreters of rural as well as urban proletarian life in Sweden. Born in extreme poverty in the industrial city of Norrköping, and brought up by a mother who labored for a mere pittance in a textile factory, she married a rather unstable workman at an early age and had five children by him before she was 25. Besides having to face economic uncertainties of all kinds with a constantly growing family, she was early widowed (her husband committed suicide) and two of her young sons lost their lives by drowning. She found work in Stockholm, associated with radical labor groups (syndicalist, communist), began writing occasional articles for the labor press, and in 1929 married the brilliant young proletarian author Harry Martinson (q.v.). Her literary career, in the strict sense of the term, did not begin until she was middle-aged—with Kvinnor och äppelträd (1933; Women and Apple Trees), followed within a year by its sequel Sallys söner (Sally's Sons). These two novels, though not the best of Moa Martinson's work, are in most essential respects typical. They tell the double story of two long-suffering, poverty-stricken women together with the ramifications of their families and their immediate acquaintances. Though the picture of poverty that we get in these novels is at times brutally frank, the author never seeks to play upon the reader's sentiments as such and she never indulges in obtrusive social propaganda aimed at suggesting any specific "program of reform." In form these two novels are almost more chaotic than the miscellany of human fates that they seek to depict, but the story is told with such directness, energy, and fierce realistic intensity that one is scarcely conscious of the absence of normal fictional architectonics. She is not "literary" in the traditional sense simply because she is too close to life itself in all its diverse physical and emotional manifestations.

Since the appearance of Kvinnor och äppelträd and Sallys söner Moa Martinson has published a half dozen novels and one interesting but not particularly important volume of verse. The novels fall into two classes: three of them (Mor gifter sig, 1936, Mother Marries; Kyrkbröllop, 1938, Church Wedding; and Kungens rosor, 1939, The King's Roses) are directly autobiographical in both inspiration and content; the other three (Rågvakt, 1935, Rye Watch; Drottning Grågyllen, 1937, Queen Grågyllen; and Vägen under stjärnorna, 1940, The Way under the Stars) are broad, warmly realistic chronicle-like novels about peasants and working people from various past periods of Swedish history. Though the autobiographical novels are on the whole more finished and well balanced works of art (Mor gifter sig is perhaps Moa Martinson's masterpiece to date), the chronicle novels are in both general conception and in certain details of execution more powerful, and they seem to point the way to a type of novel which is the most natural form of expression for the author's peculiar genius. In these chronicle novels Moa Martinson combines a brutally realistic directness of expression, almost Rabelaisian in its sensuousness, its gusto, and its appetite for life, with an imaginative intensity and sweep and a profound sense for folk traditions and folk superstitions reminiscent of the great epic tradition. Few Swedish novels approach Rågvakt, Drottning Grågyllen, and Vägen under stjärnorna in color, richness of action, variety of character, and brooding social pathos. If Moa Martinson continues in the way suggested by these novels she is likely to create an epos which will rank in variety of content and intensity of conception with Olof Högborg's (q.v.) Norrland folk epic Den stora vreden, and her novel will more than likely be cast in a literary form more finally satisfactory than is Högborg's great novel.

See: Marika Stjernstedt, "Om Moa Martinson," Bonniers litterära magasin, VIII (1939), 511-521.

A. G.

Masaryk, Tomáš (1850-1937, Czech statesman, philosopher, and critic), widely known national leader and first president of Czechoslovakia (1918-1935), played a significant part in the evolution of Czech ideas on philosophical and sociological subjects and must be included in any consideration of Czech literature. He was an important critic of the history of his country and of its writers. His general intellectual influence can scarcely be overrated; he turned the Czechs away from romantic nationalism and gave them a new ideology with roots in their own past. Masaryk assigned a special role to his own nation in the realization of a high ideal of humanity. He expounded a whole philosophy of Czech history in several books like Česká otázka (1895; The Czech Question), Jan Hus (1896), and Karel Havlíček (1896). The Hussite period appears as the summit of Czech history, and the Bohemian Brethren are presented as the finest embodiment of the ideal of humanity in history. The Czech national revival seems to Masaryk a direct continuation of the Czech Reformation, and the modern Czech democracy preached by him and his followers is to him merely a fulfillment of the early promises of the Czech tradition. These views imply also a conception of Czech literary history which stresses its ideological and theological contents.

Masaryk began to discuss literature in his early writings, attacking the authenticity of the so-called Old Czech Manuscripts, which were actually produced in the early 19th century by Hanka and his associates. He expounded his own literary views in a little pamphlet, O studiu básnických děl (1884; On the Study of Poetry), and in a wider context in Moderní člověk a náboženství (1898; Eng. tr., Modern Man and Religion, 1938), as well as in his many studies of intellectual history, the most important of which is Rusko a Evropa (2 vols., 1913; Eng. tr., The Spirit of Russia, 1919). Masaryk is first of all a moralist, intensely preoccupied with the ethical and social implications of literature. He sharply criticized romanticism and the related subjectivism and titanism, wherever he found them: in Goethe's Faust, in Nietzsche (q.v.) and Musset, in Zola (q.v.) and Arne Gaborg (q.v.). He shocked his contemporaries by a lack of reverence for great names and in particular by his merciless analysis of the intellectual shoddiness of a drama and a poem by his celebrated compatriot, Vrchlický (q.v.). He was fascinated though ultimately repelled by Dostoevski (q.v.), who seemed to him the reductio ad absurdum of romanticism and mysticism. He disliked French romanticism, in which he saw only the symptoms of decadence; he never wearied of praising the sanity, humanity, and Protestant Christianity of the main English tradition. Obviously he had little interest in English poetry, and Byron he criticized severely as a specimen of romantic titanism. He was repelled by writers like Joyce and George Moore, who seemed to him decadent and false. But he loved the main tradition of the English novel from Defoe to Wells, and he was particularly appreciative of women writers like the Brontës and Elizabeth Barrett Browning. It is clear that Masaryk is above all a general critic interested in literature largely as a mirror of society. His rigid moralism and his lack of interest in problems of form frequently led him astray, but the very bluntness with which he expounded his anti-romantic point of view profoundly influenced Czech literary criticism, in the 1890's still hidebound in romantic traditions. Whatever may be said about certain deficiencies of his literary insight, he was in literary criticism as elsewhere a leader and a liberator.

See: biographies by J. Herben (3 vols., 1926-1927), K. Čapek (3 vols., 1928-1935; Eng. tr., President Masaryk Tells His Story, 1934; Masaryk on Thought and Life, 1938), Zdeněk Nejedlý (5 vols., 1930-1937), and P. Selver (1940, in English). For Masaryk as a philosopher see J. L. Hromádka, Masaryk (1930); articles in the Festschrift Th. G. Masaryk zum 80. Geburtstag (1930); W. P. Warren, Masaryk's Democracy (1941); R. Wellek, "The Philosophical Basis of Masaryk's Political Ideals," Ethics, LV (1945), 298-304.

R. W.

Massis, Henri (1886-, French critic and essayist), was born and educated in Paris. He attended the Lycée Henri IV, where he came under the spell of Alain (pseud. of Emile Chartier, q.v.), the free-lance professor of philosophy who exercised a powerful influence upon many students of his generation. Although not exactly a skeptic, Alain delighted in exploding the doctrines and ideas which his students had accepted during their earlier school days; they generally left his courses without any personal philosophical convictions, but ready to let themselves be carried away by new enthusiasms. So it happened that the very young and very intelligent Massis began by airing his views on Zola (q.v.) in Comment Zola composait ses romans (1906); he then became interested in Anatole France (q.v.) in Le Puits de Pyrrhon (1906) and a little later turned his attention to Barrès (q.v.) in La Pensée de Barrès (1908). These fugitive little books were soon forgotten when he became one of the editors of Opinion which was, for a time after the storm raised by the Dreyfus affair, the alert organ of young men in search of new ideas. It was in Opinion that Massis and Alfred de Tarde, jointly using the pseudonym Agathon, wrote a series of articles which were reissued in book form in 1911 under the title L'Esprit de la Nouvelle Sorbonne: La Crise de la culture classique, la crise du français. Those sensational articles were savage attacks upon Gustave Lanson (q.v.) and others who, according to the authors, had replaced the old philosophical appreciation and criticism by an academic, dry-as-dust method imported from Germany. That German method, it may be remarked, went back to Taine and Renan (qq.v.). In 1913 there were new attacks (Les Jeunes Gens d'aujourd'hui, Le Goût de l'action, La Foi patriotique, Une Renaissance catholique, Le Réalisme politique).

The First World War gave the ardent young protagonist of purely French traditions further occasions to combat German methods and ideas, this time from a political angle. His articles and books at this period breathe an ardent patriotism. Le Sacrifice: Impressions de guerre (1914-1916) was officially praised by the French Academy, and Massis wrote a moving book on his personal friend, the author of Le Centurion and Renan's grandson, who had died in action, La Vie d'Ernest Psichari (1916). He also wrote a pamphlet attacking Rolland, Romain Rolland contre la France (1915).

Shortly afterwards, he allied himself momentarily with the Neo-Thomist movement, seeming to find in Jacques Maritain (q.v.) the standard by which to judge—more often to condemn—authors who were frequently under discussion at that time: Renan, Gourmont, Gide, Duhamel, Benda (qq.v.). His ever impassioned and dogmatic pronouncements of that period were published in two volumes, Jugements (1923-1924). In 1920 he founded with Bainville (q.v.) the Revue universelle, the nationalistic, Catholic, and monarchist fortnightly published by Larousse until 1937.

In La Défense de l'Occident (1925; Eng. tr., Defence of the West, 1928) Massis tried to give a sort of philosophical unity to all his more recent writings. With utter conviction he declared that the French nation alone is capable of giving the world a civilization worthy of the name, that of "the Occident," while under the designation "the Orient" he classes all that is not what he terms the "Latin inheritance." The Orient includes not only Asia and its peoples who constitute the yellow peril, but the Turks also and the Russians. According to him, it was the Reformation that broke the back of Latin Europe and threw the "white man" into obscurity. What is more, he argued, the Turks and the Eastern powers have found an accomplice in a Germany obsessed by her disaster of 1918. The enemy host is Fichte, Spengler, Keyserling, Steiner, and tutti quanti, with whom he associates Gandhi, Tagore, Gobineau (q.v.), Kant, and even Seillière and a formidable array of others, with whom the reader is supposed to believe that the author himself is familiar. All this was to arouse France from her inertia. The French Academy awarded him the Grand Prix de Littérature for the total of his publications.

In spite of the enormous output of his own books and articles, Massis found time to publish an important edition of Pascal (1926). In 1937 appeared his Le Drame de Proust and L'Honneur de servir, wherein he expresses the hope that a revival of 13th-century France will blot out the memory of the France of Renan and of Anatole France. In 1940 he once more expressed his detestation of the Orient, of Germany, and of Gobineau in a series of essays entitled La Guerre de Trente Ans: Destin d'un âge, 1904-1939. Later in that same year Massis lost no time in turning "collaborationist" (see Les Idées restent, 1941).

See: P. Moreau, "Henri Massis," in Le Victorieux XXe Siècle (1925).

A. Sz.

Matavulj, Simo (1852-1908, Serb short-story writer and novelist), was born in Dalmatia, in the Adriatic port of Šibenik. After attending school in his native town he was taken by his uncle, an iguman or father superior of the Orthodox monastery Krupa, who wanted him to become a monk. But monastic life did not suit him, and he left Krupa after acquiring an unforgettable experience and an insight into this particular milieu. He participated in two Serbian national revolts against the Turkish rule in 1876 and 1881. Then he became a school teacher in Dalmatia and Montenegro and later a language instructor and journalist in Belgrade, where he was elected a member of the Serbian Royal Academy.

Thoroughly familiar with Italian, French, and English, Matavulj was a diligent translator. He translated Molière's Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme and Le Misanthrope, Zola's Le Rêve, tales by Maupassant (q.v.), Bleak House by Charles Dickens and De Imitatio Christi of Thomas à Kempis. There are numerous collections of stories by Matavulj, e.g., Iz Crne Gore i Primorja (2 vols., 1888–1889; From Montenegro and the Littoral), Iz primorskog života (1890; From Littoral Life), Sa Jadrana (1891; From the Adriatic Sea), Iz beogradskog života (1891; From Belgrade Life), Iz raznih krajeva (1893; From Different Regions), Primorska obličja (1894; Figures from the Seashore). These and his two novels Bakonja fra-Brne (1892) and Uskok (1892; The Guerrilla Fighter), his plays Zavjet (1894; The Legacy) and Na slavi (1904; House Patron Saint), his autobiography Bilješke jednog pisca (1897; Notes of a Writer), and letters about his numerous travels show his manifold talent.

Unlike many other Serb authors, he lived in a number of different provinces and depicted all of them with their characteristics and ways of life, their patricians, monks, intellectuals, and townspeople, as well as their peasants, seamen, and fishermen. An ardent adherent of the French realistic and naturalistic schools, and himself of a rationalistic and positive temperament, with a gift of observation and remarkable understanding of human nature, Matavulj gave a highly adequate reproduction of reality. He is at his best in stories about figures from the Adriatic coast and in the masterful picture of monastic life, Bakonja fra-Brne.

See: J. Skerlic, Pisci i knjige, Vol. I (1907) and Brankovo kolo, Vols. XIII, XIV (1908).

P. A.

Matoš, Antun Gustav (1873–1914, Croat poet, essayist, critic, and journalist), was born in Tovarnik, in the heart of Croatia. He never completed a formal school training. In order to evade the three-year compulsory military service in the Austro-Hungarian army, he fled to Serbia, then to Paris, and then back again to Serbia where he was given friendly shelter until, in 1908, he was pardoned and permitted to return to Zagreb. He lived by his pen, and for a short time by playing the violoncello, in Belgrade.

Matoš was for the turn of the century what Krleža (q.v.) became for the post-war Croatian literary world. A bohemian, a lover of elegance and form, he never was a deep thinker. He intensely disliked German heaviness and preferred the lighter touch in literature and art of the French. Unstable and erratic, he was often opposed, but—unquestionably brilliant—he was also extensively admired. Indeed as essayist and journalist he had a great name and a school of followers. The most brilliant pages of all were written in France or about France. Matoš was constantly ill and worked often under pressure of fever and sometimes under threat of hunger.

Politically Matoš was an ardent disciple of the Croat ultranationalist Ante Starčević, and Starčević's influence is evident in the manner in which Matoš writes of his native province. But Matoš was also always a close friend of the Serbs. An ardent opponent of academic writing, he opposed the Serb professor of literature Jovan Skerlić (q.v.). Matoš attracted youth with his revolutionary ideas and founded for them and with them several literary magazines, all of which had short lives.

Matoš's main works are Iverje (1899; Waste Wood), Novo iverje (1900; New Waste Wood), Umorne priče (1909; Tired Tales), and Vidici i putovi (1908; Perspectives and Paths). There are other collections of essays and also short stories of nearly perfect form, including the famous Pereci, friški pereci (1910; Pretzels, Fresh Pretzels). The poems of Matoš were given wide publicity in the magazines of his time in Belgrade and Zagreb and were collected for the first time in 1923. A selection of his best writing was published by his brother under the title Dok je srca bit će i Croatie (1925; While There Is Heart, There Will Be Croatia). Publication of his complete works in 15 volumes, in Zagreb, was interrupted by the invasion of 1941; nine volumes had appeared before that date.

See: A. Venzelides, Književne studije (1918); D. Prohaska, Pregled savremenehrvatsko-srpske književnosti (1921); A. Barac, Knjiga Eseja (1924).

M. H.

Maupassant, Guy de (1850–1893, French short-story writer and novelist), was born in Normandy, where he spent his youth and received his education. His studies were interrupted by service in the Franco-Prussian War, after which he was employed successively in the Ministry of the Navy and the Ministry of Public Instruction. He resigned in 1880 in order to devote himself entirely to writing. Subject to nervous maladies for some time, he eventually experienced hallucinations and obsessions which led to a complete mental breakdown during the final months of his life.

Maupassant's early years were spent in observation and in literary apprenticeship. He accumulated a great store of impressions of the many people he encountered, carefully noting their appearance, manners, gestures, and speech. Norman peasants and fishermen, provincial bourgeois, French and German soldiers, government clerks and other functionaries, members of all classes of Parisian society, are the principal actors of his human comedy. The avowed disciple of Louis Bouilhet and of Flaubert (q.v.), he learned a great respect for literary art, the value of precision and conciseness, the necessity of characteristic and accurate detail.

Maupassant's youthful writings were published under various pseudonyms. His first recognized success was "Boule de Suif," a cynical war story appearing in Les Soirées de Médan (1880) under the aegis of Zola (q.v.). Maupassant was immediately hailed as a master. In the following 10 years he produced nearly 30 large volumes of short stories, novels, plays, and travel books. Among his best-known collections of short stories are La Maison Tellier (1881); Contes de la bécasse (1883); Clair de lune and Les Sœurs Rondoli (both 1884); Toine, Contes du jour et de la nuit, and Contes et nouvelles (all 1885); Le Horla (1887); L'Inutile Beauté (1890).

The character portrait, the brief but poignant drama, were admirably suited to Maupassant's talent, which excelled in the short story. The painting, achieved in a few bold, rapid strokes, is sober, often somber, occasionally relieved by a touch of ironic humor. There is little real gaiety. The society portrayed is usually the victim of its material interests, of its passions or vanities. Happiness is seldom attained; momentarily glimpsed, it disappears and its loss is a source of perpetual regret. Maupassant seeks truth, "the humble truth," but the mirror which he holds to nature is smoked and uneven. It seldom reflects idealism, spirituality, real generosity. But he often succeeds in elevating the commonplace and the unattractive to the realm of art. His peculiar ability as a conteur has generally impaired his technique as a novelist, but in Pierre et Jean (1888) he has achieved a rare unity and concentration. The preface contains an important statement of his literary ideas. Other novels are Une Vie (1883), a depressing and often revolting story of a Norman woman's life, and Bel-Ami (1885), a caricature of an unscrupulously successful Parisian journalist. Identified with the realists and naturalists, Maupassant escapes rigid classification by the scope of his subjects, his preoccupation with form, and his increasing emphasis upon psychology and mental divagations.

Nearly all Maupassant's works have been translated into English.

See: E. Maynial, La Vie et l'œuvre de Guy de Maupassant (1907); Ernest A. Boyd, Guy de Maupassant; a Biographical Study (1926); R. Dumesnil, Guy de Maupassant (1933).

J. F. J.

Maura y Gamazo, Gabriel (1879–, Spanish historian), was born in Madrid. The son of Antonio Maura, the distinguished conservative leader of the reign of Alfonso XIII and founder of the political party bearing his name, he was active as one of the most outstanding members of his father's party. The ideas which he brings to literature do not transcend in scope those of the Maurist party, i.e., the dignification and renovation of national politics within the framework of Spanish tradition. His literary production is limited almost entirely to the field of history. In the beginning his historical studies dealt with past periods, medieval as in La vida urbana en el siglo XIII (1909) or modern with Carlos II y su corte (1911–1915). Little by little, however, in the face of Spain's political transformation, which was destroying traditional institutions, he became a historian of contemporary events. His narrative is that of a spectator who views with bitterness the disappearance of the most cherished things. This can be seen in his principal works, Historia crítica de la regencia de doña María Cristina (1929), Bosquejo histórico de la Dictadura (1930), and Recuerdos de mi vida; confesiones de nuestros tiempos (1934), which are a valuable source of information for the understanding of contemporary Spain.

E. G. L.

Mauriac, François (1885–, French novelist), was born in Bordeaux, a city in which the scenes of most of his novels are laid. His father died before he was two; his mother gave him a very pious and austere education, which he has described in a small volume, Commencements d'une vie (1932). He studied first in a Catholic school, then at the lycée and at the University of Bordeaux and, for a brief period, at the Ecole des Chartes in Paris. His books give evidence of a solid classical culture and of constant meditation on the Gospels and on a few great Christian works (Imitation of Christ, Pascal's Pensées). The chief literary influences on his youth were Maurice Barrès, the Catholic poet Francis Jammes, André Gide (whom he later rejected as a dangerous master of immoralistic temptation), and Paul Claudel (q.v.). He first published a few volumes of verse, a form in which (even in his later and most felicitous poem, Le Sang d'Atys, 1940) he never was fully successful. His early novels, while still imperfect, reveal the permanent themes of Mauriac: the turbid age of adolescence; the abysses of sin and of evil; provincial families in which hatred, revenge, and an avid passion for material property are the ruling motives. Human life is presented as a conflict between the treacherous temptations of the flesh and the supreme temptation of God; the latter usually triumphs in the end after the misery of a godless world has aroused remorse and humility in the characters.

Mauriac's first major works were, in 1922 and 1923, Le Baiser au lépreux and Genitrix (Eng. tr. of both in The Family, 1930). Between 1923 and 1941 a dozen more novels, of unequal value, were published. Three undoubtedly stand out as masterpieces of the contemporary novel, Le Désert de l'amour (1925; Eng. tr., The Desert of Love, 1929), Thérèse Desqueyroux (1927; Eng. tr., Thérèse, 1928), and Le Nœud de vipères (1932; Eng. tr., Vipers' Tangle, 1933). Others, especially La Fin de la nuit (1935), Plongées (1938), and La Pharisiennne (1941), contain some unforgettable scenes. Mauriac has also proved an able dramatist in Asmodée (1938; Eng. tr., Asmodée; or, The Intruder, 1939) and Les Mal Aimés (1945). He has composed two biographies (Vie de Racine, 1928; Vie de Jésus, 1936, Eng. tr., Life of Jesus, 1937), which do not rank among his best works. Mauriac, unanimously acknowledged in France as a "moralist" of the first order, has written a few remarkable volumes of essays which fully reveal his religious and artistic conception of the novel, Le Roman (1928), Dieu et Mammon (1929; Eng. tr., God and Mammon, 1936), Le Romancier et ses per- sonnages (1933). Three volumes of collected articles entitled Journal (1934, 1937, and 1940) include some of his finest prose. Although undisputed success came early to Mauriac (he was elected to the French Academy in 1933), he has remained unspoiled by it and independent and has not lost the admiration of the younger literary generation in France. His attitude during the German occupation of France was one of courageous resistance to the invader and the Vichy regime.

The originality of Mauriac as the chief French novelist since Proust lies in his skillful combination of several varied elements: a feeling for poetic and dramatic style, especially conspicuous in the descriptive and evocative parts of his novels; a masterly technique, which owes nothing to English or Russian influences and has reverted to the traditional rigid, condensed, feverish French novel which sprang from Racinian tragedy; a subtle psychology, which never intrudes into the novel but reveals dramatically the bitterest soul conflicts of the characters through their physical appearance, their gestures, and their speech. Reminiscence of the past is a favorite device of Mauriac's novels. A profoundly Christian and Catholic conception of human beings permeates everything; the never-ending conflict—the pagan beauty of the world and the lust for pleasure or possession against remorse, faith, and charity—gives unity and perhaps monotony to these novels. A moving personal book by Mauriac, Souffrances et bonheur du chrétien (1929), has revealed the deep sincerity of his austere faith, which does not, like Balzac's or Bourget's (q.v.), advocate religion as commendable for political or social reasons.

See: Gérard de Catalogne, Une Génération (1930); Charles du Bos, Mauriac et le problème du romancier catholique (1933); Amélie Fillon, Mauriac (1936).

H. P.

Maurois, André (pseud. of Emile Herzog, 1885–. French biographer, novelist, and essayist), was born at Elbeuf in Normandy, of Alsatian parents. He attended the Lycée Corneille at Rouen; there he studied under the philosopher Alain (pseud. of Emile Chartier, q.v.) who was to exercise a profound influence upon his personality and upon his works. Later he studied at the University of Caen and obtained the degree of master of arts in philosophy. Though he would have liked to continue his studies, a sense of duty compelled him to enter the cloth factory his family had founded in Elbeuf. He remained there until 1914, encountering the harsh realities of industrial management. At the beginning of the First World War he was appointed liaison officer and interpreter with the British army. Two books of familiar essays, Les Silences du colonel Bramble (1918) and Les Discours du docteur O'Grady (1922), portray his British comrades with sympathy, humor, and keen insight. His first biography, Ariel, ou la Vie de Shelley, appeared in 1923. In 1926 he again left Elbeuf, where he had resided since the end of the First World War, and went to Paris to devote himself entirely to literature. A series of lectures he gave at Cambridge University in 1928 was later published under the title Aspects de la biographie (1928), in which he discusses the technical problems confronting a biographer. According to him, biography should be not only a work of science based on sound erudition, but also a work of art unfolding the development of a human personality and a means of personal expression for the biographer himself. The biographies of Maurois include La Vie de Disraëli (1927), Don Juan, ou la Vie de Byron (1930), and Chateaubriand (1938).

As a novelist Maurois has produced Bernard Quesnay (1926), a book which is partly autobiographical, Climats (1928), and Le Cercle de famille (1932). All relate with penetrating tact and sensitivity the story of a sentimental or moral crisis. He is also the author of fantastic novels, such as Le Peseur d'âmes (1931), and of philosophic tales, La Machine à lire les pensées (1937).

The alert mind of Maurois has kept in constant touch with the social, political, and ethical problems of the day. He discusses them in essays, Dialogues sur le commandement (1924) and Sentiments et coutumes (1934). He has been a brilliant and well-qualified interpreter of English civilization in his works of literary criticism, e.g., Magiciens et logiciens (1935), and in his historical works, Edouard VII et son temps (1933) and Histoire d'Angleterre (1937). With the exception of Sentiments et coutumes, all the writings of Maurois named in the present article have been translated and published in English.

Maurois was elected to the French Academy on June 23, 1938. At the outbreak of the Second World War he joined the French army. After the military collapse of France he came to the United States, where he lectured and taught. In 1942 he volunteered for the French army in North Africa. Outstanding traits are his keen intelligence, his wide culture, his human sympathy, and his intellectual honesty and courage. Under the influence of his philosophic training and of his personal experience he learned to have a horror of fanaticism, of abstract theorizing, of spectacular simplification. His message is one of friendship and of confident optimism.

See: J. Prévost, "André Maurois," Nouvelle Revue française, XLIX (1937), 437-450; G. Lemaitre, André Maurois (1939).

R. B.

Maurras, Charles (1868-, French journalist and literary and political critic, leader and theorist of the neo-royalist movement), was born at Martigues in Provence. He moved to Paris after having received his baccalaureate from the Catholic College of Aix-en-Provence, in 1885. Being afflicted with partial deafness since the age of 14, Charles Maurras had become accustomed to an intensely studious and meditative life. He set out to complete his education, and from 1885 to 1890, which he calls his "period of philosophical absorption," he plunged into the study of history, philosophy, and the social sciences. Most of his articles that were published at that time, the first in February, 1886, were critical reviews of books on these subjects. After having made a complete, searching analysis of the doctrine of counterrevolution (in an important essay on "L'Evolution des idées sociales," Réforme sociale, January-February, 1891), he turned most of his attention to art and literature, particularly poetry, his musique intérieure. During the next period of five or six years, Maurras took an active part in the literary discussions of the day. He wrote numerous articles of criticism, short stories, and poems, some of these in Provençal. He was one of the founders of the short-lived Ecole Romane (1891) and of the Ecole Parisienne du Félibrige (1892). But he never entirely neglected political and social questions.

The Dreyfus affair was in 1898 to throw him entirely into political journalism. Ever since that time the main concern of Maurras has been the elaboration of a system of thought which, in his mind, is destined to solve forever the political and social problems of the French nation. He joined the Action Française soon after its founding, in 1899. This political group, whose initial aim had been limited to the reorganization of republican France, became soon, under his influence, the nucleus of a new royalist movement. It adopted the doctrine of integral nationalism (the placing of the nation's interest above everything else) which, according to Maurras, necessarily entails the restoration of an absolute and hereditary monarchy. The Action Française claims that at least as far as France is concerned only the king and the Catholic Church can secure political and social stability, order in man and in society. In art and literature, Maurras opposes classicism to romanticism and the 16th and 17th centuries to the 18th and 19th. He has naturally contributed his share to the "anti-Rousseauism" crusade. His aim has been to create a deep faith in a new set of values based on tradition and what he calls "reality," i.e., everything that is directly opposed to the principles of the French Revolution. The Action Française supported the government of the French republic during the First World War, but resumed its systematic and relentless attacks on public figures and democratic institutions as soon as the armistice was signed. In spite of some setbacks, such as the temporary condemnation by the pope (the placing of the daily Action française and five of Maurras's books on the Index) in 1926, the movement kept growing until 1940. While much of its program was put into force by the Vichy government, it failed in creating the state of mind that might have assured the success of a coup de force against the republic. In January, 1945, Maurras was brought to trial as an enemy of the republic and condemned to life imprisonment.

Maurras had previously served sentences in prison, fought duels, and on several occasions narrowly escaped assassination. He was elected to the French Academy in 1938, in his 70th year. Most of his writings have been collected and published in book form. His five-volume Dictionnaire politique et critique (1932-1934) is the most convenient work of reference to the ideas he has expressed in practically every field of thought. More strictly limited to the political question are the Enquête sur la monarchie, 1900-1909 (1909; definitive ed., 1924) and Mes Idées politiques (1937), a small compact volume containing the essentials of his teaching. The story of his polemics on the religious question will be found in La Démocratie religieuse (1921). His articles on French foreign policy between 1895 and 1905 have formed a volume, Kiel et Tanger (1910), which produced a sensation at the time of its publication. There are pages of very fine literary criticism in such books as Trois Idées politiques (1898), dealing with Chateaubriand, Michelet, and Sainte-Beuve; Les Amants de Venise (1902), on the well-known Sand-

Musset love affair, which is Maurras's only book not made up of selected articles and miscellaneous writings; L'Avenir de l'intelligence (1905), dealing especially with the concept of order, basic principle of his traditionalism, in all domains of human endeavor; and L'Etang de Berre (1915), mostly about Provence and modern Provençal literature. From an artistic and literary point of view must be especially recommended Le Chemin de Paradis (1894), a collection of philosophical short stories; Anthinéa (1901), letters from Greece, Italy, Corsica, and England; and, above all, La Musique intérieure (1925), a selection of poems preceded by a long and interesting biographical essay which contains some of the most beautiful pages Maurras has ever written.

Maurras has pitilessly analyzed the ills of modern society, invariably putting the blame on democracy, romanticism, or "Rousseauism." He is a powerful polemist, one who has aroused much intense hatred among his contemporaries. Yet his sincerity of purpose has rarely been questioned, and the best critics recognize him as one of the ablest thinkers and most forceful prose writers of our time. He has taught many a young man how to think straight—this does not necessarily mean accepting his arguments, either premises or conclusions—and has exerted a deep influence upon modern French thought, whether positively or negatively. Since the appearance of Anthinéa Maurras has been considered the foremost representative of the classical spirit in French literature. Through his clear and direct style, vigorous logic, and constant appeal to reason, he has performed the feat of holding the admiration, respect, and even interest of readers who have never been bewitched by the logic of his political philosophy. And this alone would have justified the prominent place that he has been given in the history of French literature.

See: P. Descoqs, S. J., A travers l'œuvre de Charles Maurras (1913); A. Ségard, Charles Maurras et les idées royalistes (1919); A. Thibaudet, Les Idées de Charles Maurras (1920); L. Daudet, Charles Maurras et son temps (1930); E. Renauld, "L'Action Française" contre l'Eglise catholique et contre la monarchie (1936); E. Roussel, Les Nuées maurrassiennes (1937).

A. V. R.

May, Karl (1842-1912, German novelist), was born in Hohenstein-Ernstthal, the son of a weaver. He taught school until discharged for misdemeanors and turned, in 1874, to writing travel and adventure stories. During the rest of his life his literary output was enormous and his popularity has been national, especially among younger readers for whom his work supplied enchanting vistas into romantically conceived distant lands. Although May had no direct experience of America, he conveyed in such books as Helden des Westens (1890), Winnetou (3 vols., 1893), Old Surehand (1894), Der Schatz im Silbersee (1894), and many others memorable fictional pictures of a colorful wild West frontier land. With amazing literary agility he published in 1892 alone six long tales with a Near Eastern setting (Durch Wüste und Harem, Durchs wilde Kurdistan, Von Bagdad nach Stambul, Durch die Schluchten des Balkan, Durch das Land der Skipetaren, Der Schutz). Other parts of the world, charged with mystery and indescribable dangers, are the background of such best sellers as Das Vermächtnis des Inka (1895), Im Lande des Mahdi (3 vols., 1896), Im Reich des silbernen Löwen (4 vols., 1898–1902). The Karl-May Stiftung, founded in 1913, has continued to publish (in the Karl-May-Jahrbuch, 1918 ff.) the inexhaustible resources of May's literary remains.

In his work memories of the noble savage, aspects of James Fenimore Cooper, and the most striking features of travel and detective literature are effectively intermingled. His tales are fashioned after the black-and-white pattern of a melodramatic chase sustained by treachery and deceit and by the superhuman display of endurance and cunning until Old Surehand or Kara Ben Nemsî fires the redeeming shot. But no matter how transparent his literary devices may be, May represents a significant element in the history of German life at the end of the century. Not only by his insistence upon the indubitable effectiveness of bourgeois values, but also by his attempt to open remote areas of fascinating experience, he contributes to the shift in German imagination from the grand gestures of Wagnerian heroism to the political realities of colonial ambition.

See: May, Mein Leben und Streben (1910); Otto Eicke, "Karl May, ein deutscher Volkschriftsteller," Der Bücherwurm, XVIII (1933), 206–207; Wolfgang Goetz, "Karl May," Deutsche Zukunft, Jahrgang II (1934), No. 19, p. 16.

V. L.

Mayakovsky, Vladimir (1893–1930, Russian poet and playwright), claimed the double distinction of being a leading futurist poet and the poet of the Revolution. Before the Revolution, his iconoclasm seemed an aim in itself. He hated the existing order, its institutions and standards, its authorities, its aesthetics. His verse had the air of savage anarchism; it spouted indignation, gall, and mockery, and, lacking in a positive goal, it breathed despondency and defeatism. The very form of his verse was a challenge to tradition and convention. After the Revolution of 1917 Mayakovsky changed neither in form nor in substance: but he acquired an ideal, a positive purpose, to which he dedicated himself wholly. He found a meaning in his hatred of the old, and with renewed vigor he now attacked the survivals of the past in the name of the nascent new order. Similarly, his formal innovations came to mean not only a protest against old aesthetics, but also an expression of the new order and its affirmation. Mayakovsky thus personified the odd marriage of futurism and the Bolshevik Revolution.

Mayakovsky was the son of a forester in the village Baghdady, in the Caucasus. After the death of his father in 1906, the family moved to Moscow. Vladimir, while in high school, joined an underground revolutionary organization and was arrested several times. In 1910 he spent 11 months in a solitary prison cell. He expressed his rebellious spirit as a student in an art school, where he joined a group of extremists, subsequent futurists. His first futurist poem was published in 1912, and in the same year he signed the manifesto of the Moscow cubo-futurists, "A Slap in the Face of Public Taste." Most of his writings before the Revolution were intended to shock the respectable, both in form and in content, but along with boisterous puerilities they displayed the basic robustness of his talent and his healthful resentment to things-as-they-are. Thus in the poem "Oblako v shtanakh" (1915; A Cloud in Pants) he mingled individualistic whims with social motives of daring implications. He addressed the "street thousands," the miserable and destitute, himself as one of the lowly, "vomited by a consumptive night into the palm of Moscow." He exhorted the crowds to straighten out their bent backs, to rise in self-respect, not to beg for alms but to prepare for the pending years. The positive aim of the Revolution was not clear to the poet as yet; he only burned with wrath and vengeance. "On every drop of a flowing tear I have crucified myself," he cried to wretched humanity, to all "who are hungry, sweaty, meek, soured in flea-ridden filth," summoning them to decorate lampposts with "the gory corpses of shopkeepers." This note of rebellion rang out in other long poems of his, as well as in brief lyrics and satires, before and during the First World War. Among the longer compositions of the period there were several outstanding works—"Fleita-pozvochnik" (1915; Flute-Spinal Cord), "Voina i mir" (1916; War and the World), and the ironical panegyric to himself in "Chelovek" (1917; Man).

From the first, Mayakovsky used a unique style. He despised hackneyed phrases and conventional terms and employed them only in derision. His epithets are fresh and unexpected, his vocabulary is rich and colorfully original, yet his Russian is free from the exaggerated neologisms of his fellow futurists. He achieves novelty by multiplying the potentialities of Russian prefixes and suffixes, by the unexpected juxtaposition of sounds and phrases, by taking such liberties with grammar as changing adverbs into adjectives, verbs into nouns, or vice versa, by omitting prepositions, when the meaning is clear without them, by abbreviating and lengthening words for the sake of euphony, and by other means of avoiding a smooth and obvious language, correct "like the pulse of a corpse." The trim regularity and Tchaikovsky-like melodiousness of the tonic-syllabic Russian verse nauseated Mayakovsky. His verse, not unlike Russian folk poetry, is based on the number of stressed syllables in a line, with no regard for the nonstressed syllables, the result being a flexible tonality and greater freedom of rhythm. His metric irregularity is coupled with typographically broken lines. Since most of his verses are designed for declamation, for street singing and marching, Mayakovsky arranges the lines so as to guide the reader's intonation, making each line an accented unit. Very often his line consists of one word ("Left! Left! Left!"), lending the style a dynamic, elemental rhythm. When his verse is not blank or free, it has the widest variety of rhyming schemes, from subtle inner rhymes to clusters of words combined to echo a preceding line. Equally unexpected and striking are Mayakovsky's metaphors. They are always concrete and sensory, even when he deals with supernatural images, and he deliberately clothes them in a hyperbolic form, humorously exaggerating dimensions and concepts. This feature became more apparent after 1917, when the upheavals and cataclysmal events in Russia lent themselves to hyperbolic treatment, as in the play Misteriya Buf (1918; Eng.

tr., Mystery Bouffe, 1933) or in the long poem 150,000,000 (1920).

During the last 13 years of his life Mayakovsky was extremely active, writing, traveling, reciting, painting, addressing large crowds, throwing himself fully into the fight for the new fatherland. He did not spare himself, nor his everlasting enemies—smugness, pettiness, narrowness, greed, commonplaceness, the vices he found extant even in the new society which he championed. Among his travel verses should be mentioned the cycle Amerikanskiye stikhi (1925–1926; American Verses), keen impressions of Mexico and the United States, admiration for technological advancement alternating with revulsion from economic wastage and cruelty. His former preoccupation with his personal self reemerged from time to time, as in "Pro Eto" (1923; Of That) and even in his exuberant hymn to Soviet life, "Khoroshol!" (1927; 'Tis Good!). The conflict between his devotion to the new order and his old bohemian leanings may have contributed to his suicide in 1930. His last poem on the death of Lenin, "Vladimir Ilyich Lenin" (1924), showed the progressive ripening of Mayakovsky's gift, his throwing off of his early mannerisms, futuristic trickery, excessive imagery; his personal lyricism became enriched with the broad notes of a national epic. Two prose plays of his, Klop (1928; The Bedbug) and Banya (1930; The Bathhouse), caustic satires on philistine propensities in Soviet Russia, gave promise of fresh possibilities in the creative mind of Mayakovsky. His premature death was a foolish and cruel loss.

See: V. Pertsov, Vladimir Mayakovski; kritiko-biograficheski ocherk (1940); Herbert Marshall, comp., Mayakovsky and His Poetry (1942).

A. K.

Mechow, Karl Benno von (1897–, German novelist), born in Bonn in the Rhineland, was the son of a colonel. He himself fought as a cavalry officer in the First World War. Later he acquired an estate near Schwiebus, but the economic situation forced him to give it up. For some time he was employed in a bookstore in Freiburg. Since 1928 he has lived with his wife in southern Bavaria.

Mechow took his time in maturing as a writer, and when he brought out his first novel, Das ländliche Jahr (1929), it was a notable success. The work is rooted in a life close to the soil. It shows a rural community in the cycle of one year from winter to winter, but it is singularly free from the falsifying romanticism of the "blood and soil" school. Mechow is an honest writer, and while he describes the phases of nature with loving intimacy and realistic exactness, he shows also the wretchedness of man and his inability to cope with the forces about him. The young manager of an estate, the central figure, has traits of the author's character. Shy, retiring, honest, and not too certain of himself, he grows in dealing with men and problems; Mechow stresses the somewhat resigned attitude of modesty and obedience to the law of life. This is also the basic atmosphere in the noteworthy war novel Das Abenteuer (1930), a masterfully graphic description of a "community on horseback." It is the story of the cavalry and its function in the great German thrust into Russia in 1915. Men and horses and landscape gradually slip into the consciousness of the reader until thorough familiarity with the characters and the vast Russian countryside is achieved. The novel Vorsommer (1934) had a varied reception. Mechow's ideals of goodness and purity are demonstrated in the chaste love of a young girl, gay and of good will. Through her love an undistinguished man finds meaning and aim in his work and life. The book is more an idyl than a novel. From 1934 to 1938 Mechow was (with Paul Alverdes, q.v.) the editor of the periodical Das Innere Reich.

See: P. Alverdes, "Karl Benno von Mechow," Die neue Rundschau, Jahrgang XLIV (1933), Bd. II, pp. 841-845; G. Haupt, "Karl Benno von Mechow," Die neue Literatur, XXXV (1934), 79-83; W. K. Pfeiler, War and the German Mind (1941), pp. 240-243.

W. K. P.

Medina, Vicente (1866-1936, Spanish poet), was a native of Murcia, of humble origin. In 1898 he won acclaim with a volume called Aires murcianos which initiated a type of regional poetry that was to become widespread and of great influence among local and regional poets of other sections of Spain and Spanish America. Vicente Medina's achievement consisted in creating a new style of rustic poetry. His poetry does not deal with local color, as did the regional literature of the 19th century; nor is he interested in the people because of their unusual or picturesque attributes, as were the romantics, or in the physical and social aspects of their environment, as were the realists. It was the soul of the people he sought to express—their emotions, conflicts, and human qualities as they are manifested in their ingenuous, unstudied, elemental, primitive aspects. For this reason Medina's Aires murcianos is regional poetry only in a limited sense. The flavor comes from certain outstanding dialectal characteristics which are perfectly intelligible to anyone who knows Spanish, as Murcia is a region of Castilian origin. The defect of this poetry is its monotony. Medina, throughout his life, merely repeated himself; he was never able to give new dimensions to his poetry, not even by changing the regional theme, as he attempted to do in the popular poems he wrote about the Argentine where he lived for over 20 years. His first creations, however, are masterpieces of an art that is human and unassuming and may well live forever. They have not been surpassed either by their author or his many imitators.

See: A. González-Blanco, Los contemporáneos (1906), pp. 240-276; J. Mas y Pi, Letras españolas (1911).

F. de O

Mell, Max (1882, Austrian poet and dramatist), was born in Styria at Marburg (Maribor); his father was made director of the state institute for the blind in Vienna, and the family moved there. Mell took his Ph.D. degree at the University of Vienna, majoring in Germanics, but resolved to devote himself to writing and sought no position or office. While still at the university he published his first book of stories (Lateinische Erzählungen, 1904), characterized by polished form and conscious artistry. He continued to improve his style and technical competence by translating and emulating foreign writers, and his prose came to combine Austrian grace and classical purity. His first poems (Das bekränzte Jahr, 1911) sing his beloved Styria in all its aspects, seasons, and moods, and a simplicity akin to that of the folk song marks both these and his subsequent lyrics.

More strikingly original and better known is his dramatic production, which won him recognition throughout the German lands for his revival and renewal of the old-time Laienspiel. Modeled on the style of the old folk play, inspired by true religious feeling, and rendered more poignant by the destruction and distress of the First World War, Mell's three Legendenspiele (Das Apostelspiel, 1923, Eng. tr., Apostle Play, 1934; Das Schutzengelspiel, 1923; Das Nachfolge Christi-Spiel, 1927) were played everywhere by professionals and laymen, with reverence in the performance and with profoundly emotional response on the part of the audiences. Reminding one of German expressionism in their affirmation of religious experience, these plays, like many of the lyrics, restored to modern life some of the best aspects of medieval faith and medieval simplicity.

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Dritte Folge: Dichter aus deutschem Volkstum, (1934), pp. 100-110.

B. Q. M.

Mendele mocher sforim (pseud. of Sholem Yakob Abromowitz, 1836-1917, Yiddish novelist and essayist) was reared in a small town in the province of Minsk, Russia, where he received the traditional orthodox Jewish education with its emphasis upon the Bible, the Talmud, and religious commentaries. At 14, when his father died, he set out as a wandering scholar in search of knowledge. He attended famous rabbinical schools at Slutsk and Vilna. A wandering mendicant who was passing through Mendele's native community fired the young man's imagination with stories of prosperity prevailing in the Ukraine, supposedly a land flowing with milk and honey. Both set out for this promised region, begging their way from town to town, acquiring a fund of experiences, a treasure of folklore, and an insight into Jewish and Russian folkways. Mendele finally managed to break away from the older vagabond and made his way to Kamenets in the Ukrainian province of Podolia. Here the Hebrew poet Abraham Beer Gottlober became interested in him, arranged for his education in Russian, German, and arithmetic, provided him with a position as teacher in a Jewish parochial school, and published his first literary efforts. Encouraged by Gottlober, Mendele decided to devote himself to creative writing.

His first essays in the late 1850's and early 1860's were in Hebrew. But he soon realized that the majority of his fellow Jews did not have sufficient command of Hebrew to read with pleasure works written in the sacred tongue, and so in 1863 he turned to Yiddish as the more suitable vehicle for his popular tales. Unlike his contemporaries, most of whom took great pains with their Hebrew but not with their Yiddish style, Mendele labored no less diligently over his Yiddish, writing and rewriting his essays and stories until they attained their most perfect form. He has been called the creator of classical Yiddish. He is certainly its best prose stylist. His main subject matter is Jewish life in the Russian Pale. He has his intellectual roots in the enlightened humanitarianism of the 18th century and aims not merely to entertain but also to reform his readers. He therefore uses satire as an important vehicle for castigating injustice and for urging reform of intolerable social conditions. In his satirical allegory Die Klatshe (1873; The Dobbin) he depicts the hapless lot of Russian Jewry in the figure of a sorry old nag, undernourished, overworked, beset on all sides by the better-fed breed of aristocratic steeds, and becudged by ignorant unpitying ragamuffins. In his tale Fishke der Krume (1869-1888; Fishke the Lame) he draws upon his youthful experiences as a wandering mendicant and rouses sympathy for the poorest of the poor, for outcasts, vagabonds and thieves. His most ambitious work, Masoës Benyamin Hashlishi (1878; The Wanderings of Benjamin the Third), is a prose epic of Eastern European Jewry, modeled after Don Quixote. His maturest novel is Dos Vintshfingerl (The Wishing Ring), upon which he worked for many years.

Mendele is revered by Yiddish readers as the "grandfather of Yiddish literature." His influence has been enormous upon many younger writers, and his work has been translated into several European tongues.

See: S. Niger, Mendele mocher sforim (1936).

S. L.

Mendès, Catulle (pseud., rarely used, C. Valérius, 1841-1909, French poet, novelist, playwright, and critic), was born in Bordeaux. He came of a family of Jewish bankers; his father, having a literary turn of mind, named this son for the Latin poet Catullus. After several changes of residence in France and abroad, Catulle Mendès, still very young, settled in Paris (1860). He very soon threw himself headlong into the literary melee. Romanticism was dead, and poetry was languishing, but the rising generation was eager to bring about its rejuvenation. Mendès was not yet 20 when he launched the very exuberant Revue fantaisiste (1861)—whence the name Fantaisistes sometimes given to the group generally called the Parnassians. A heavy fine and imprisonment for an obscene play which appeared in this review (Le Roman d'une nuit, published in book form, 1883) sounded the death knell of the periodical. A more successful attempt to give a new impetus to poetry was made by a group of young poets, led by Mendès and Louis Xavier de Ricard, their Maecenas, when they published the first installment of an anthology, Le Parnasse contemporain (1866). Mendès has recorded humorously the laborious beginnings of the undertaking in La Légende du Parnasse contemporain (1884).

Mendès had a profound admiration for Théophile Gautier, whose daughter Judith he married, but later divorced. He had a great dislike for whatever savored of littérature utilitaire or littérature moralisatrice, following in that the lead of Gautier, Banville (q.v.), and Flaubert (q.v.). With a decided leaning towards light poetry, not to say accented gauloiserie (Philomela, 1863; Les Vaines Amours; Odelettes et ballades), Mendès proved himself a virtuoso in almost every form and genre of poetry. The same versatility characterizes his prose stories, with, however, too frequent violation of common decorum. He also tried his hand with moderate success at the theatre (Briséis, 1899; Capitaine Fracasse, 1878, libretto for an opéra comique based on Gautier's story; La Reine Fiammette, 1898; Médée, 1898; Scarron, 1905) and showed an interest in history (Les 73 Journées de la Commune, 1871; Le Roi vierge, 1881, a novel about Ludwig of Bavaria). He was one of the first enthusiasts of Wagner music in France (Richard Wagner, 1886).

Certain critics, e.g., Martino and Souriau, have treated Mendès with great severity. In any case it was sheer injustice that gave Mendès no place in the great four-volume Anthologie des poètes du XIX^{me} siècle published by Lemerre in 1888.

See: P. Martino, Parnassiens et symbolistes (1925); M. Souriau, Histoire du Parnasse (1929); A. Schaffer, The Genres of Parnassian Poetry (1944).

A. Sz.

Menéndez Pidal, Ramón (1869–, Spanish philologist and historian of the Middle Ages), born in La Coruña, when still very young attracted the attention of all Romance scholars with his book La leyenda de los Infantes de Lara (1896), in which he reconstructs a legend of medieval Spain and traces its development up to the 19th century. His principal works since then are Gramática histórica (1904), El poema del Cid; texto, gramática y vocabulario (1909), L'Épopée castillane (1909), Poesía juglaresca y juglares (1924), Orígenes del español (1929), La España del Cid (1929), Historia y epopeya (1934); in addition there are numerous studies on the Romancero, the literature of the 17th century, dialectology, etymology. In 1925 appeared three huge volumes, Homenaje a Menéndez Pidal, in which philologists and historians from all over the world collaborated as a tribute to the master.

Before Menéndez Pidal, Spanish linguistics was studied by foreigners and not too adequately. Now, as a result of this scholar's great contributions, what the Spanish language is, how it originated and developed historically, can truly be understood. Even more will be revealed upon publication of the monumental Historia de la lengua española, on which he has been working all his life. Before Menéndez Pidal, the belief was held that the Spanish epic was meager and not very original; such a situation has changed completely since the sagacious literary archaeologist reconstructed various poems, lost, or scattered in the prose of the medieval chronicles. The particular ability of Menéndez Pidal has consisted in knowing how to combine judiciously a fabulous knowledge of details with a peculiar gift for arriving at great historico-geographic syntheses. Starting, for example, with the diphthongization of the Latin vowels e and o in the Iberian language, he has been able to reconstruct the successive limits of Basque-Iberian and Latin in the Iberian Peninsula. By comparing 60 local versions of a popular ballad ("Gerineldo"), he has laid the foundations for a folkloric geography, which thus appears to be controlled by social forces analogous to those determining the diffusion of the language.

An unbelievable capacity for work and a rare intuition enable Menéndez Pidal to find his way in the darkness of history. From the shadows are drawn the speech and life of Christian Spain during the 10th and 11th centuries, to produce, in Orígenes del español, a book without parallel in any modern language. This is the only work, according to Professor Leo Spitzer, that really explains the rise of a Romance national civilization and language; it could have been written, Spitzer says, "only by a polyhistor with a gigantic power of synthesis comparable to that of a Jakob Grimm" (Modern Language Quarterly, Vol. IV, 1943, pp. 420–421). Its author is, without any doubt, an essential constituent element of the almost miraculous Spanish revival which centers about the year 1900, and he has been for historical science what S. Ramón y Cajal was for biological science. New interpretations of the art, literature, and thought of Spain were then emerging almost spontaneously; Menéndez Pidal himself really had no teachers. He collected a fund of historical materials which would have overwhelmed anyone but him, endowed as he was with an instinct for logical arrangement and method. At the age of 12, reading the Bible, he tried to understand it in terms of historical maps; later he was to reconstruct the itinerary followed in El poema del Cid, the life of the hero, and that of all those who had any importance in the history of the 11th century.

Attracted by the assiduous enthusiasm of this artist of historical precision, a few young Spaniards grouped themselves about him, and with them Menéndez Pidal founded the Centro de Estudios Históricos of Madrid (1910), the important publications of which have blazed new trails for European and American Hispanism. One official organ of the Centro has been the Revista de filología española, in which Menéndez Pidal has published some of his best studies on the Spanish Romancero and has made known hitherto unpublished poems of the Middle Ages (Elena y María and the epic poem Roncesvalles). Fascist Spain deprived Menéndez Pidal of the direction of the Centro de Estudios Históricos and of the presidency of the Spanish Academy. But the great scholar continues his task with the same ardor that characterized his youthful years, for the eternal good of Spain.

See: Gaston Paris, Poèmes et légendes du moyen-âge (1900), pp. 213-251; H. Morf, Aus Dichtung und Sprache der Romanen (1903), pp. 373-396; Homero Serís and Germán Arteta, Bibliografía hispánica; Ramón Menéndez Pidal, 2d ed., enlarged (New York, 1938).

A. C.

Menéndez y Pelayo, Marcelino (1856-1912, Spanish historian and critic), was born and died in Santander, in the heart of the primitive nucleus of Castile, a city to which he always came back from Madrid. There he assembled his great library with that bibliophile's passion which characterized him all his life. His entire life was devoted to books. His first works caused a great impression principally because of the amount of reading they represented on the part of an author so young. When he was 22 he won his appointment to the chair of Spanish literature in the University of Madrid, and from 1898 he was the director of the National Library of Madrid. As a young man he was sent with the aid of a grant to study abroad in Portugal, Italy, France, Belgium, and Holland; he visited, in fact, only the libraries, and nothing but books aroused his interest. He was almost altogether self-taught and he had few other teachers than the old and modern books he read, although he was initiated in his studies by Manuel Milá y Fontanals (q.v.), whose classes he attended at the University of Barcelona.

His first works were of a polemical nature. Their object was to defend and justify the Spanish tradition against the attacks of which it had been the target since the 18th century in Spain and abroad and which had flared up again in his day on the part of the liberals and progressives of the 19th century. Thus his Historia de los heterodoxos españoles (1880-1881) was written to prove that the genuine thought of Spain is Catholic and that only exceptionally has this not been the case in works of real value by Spaniards. La ciencia española (1876) is, in turn, a work in which he attempts to reply to the old contention that Spain has contributed nothing to the development of modern science. These apologetic works, which quickly made their author famous, had the defects and merits that might be expected of them: they were full of ardor and emotion, but their arguments were not always entirely valid. The positive and scientific part of these two works was of necessity only the great accumulation of bibliographical material they contained, for it was not possible for a single author to study the history of all the sciences in the one instance, and in the other the history of all religions—except the Catholic. As for literature, the cultural field which Menéndez y Pelayo completely dominated and for the study of which he was extraordinarily gifted and prepared, he produced the most important works that had been written on the subject, so much so that he may be called the creator of the history of Spanish literature in a total conception that aimed to grasp and understand it in its complete development and evaluation. His traditionalism and his Catholicism, once they had ceased to be militant and polemic, became for him the bond with the Spanish past, thus constituting a national sentiment which, united to his deep intuitive sense of beauty and art, gave unity to the whole of his writings.

His first study on Spanish literature, Historia de las ideas estéticas en España (1883-1891), he considered an indispensable preliminary work for a projected history of Spanish literature. Though this was never written, many chapters of it are contained in his various other works: the novel prior to Cervantes, in Orígenes de la novela (1905-1915); poetry before Garcilaso, in the prologues in the Antología de poetas líricos españoles (1890-1908); the theatre, in his prologues to the plays of Lope de Vega in the edition of the latter's Obras (1890–1913) published by the Spanish Academy. The vast proportions that his works assumed as they grew have been the reason that nearly all of them remained incomplete on the death of their author. His bibliographical studies extend from the first work he published, entitled Horacio en España (1877), to Bibliografía hispano-latina clásica (1902), which was left unfinished.

In addition to these larger enterprises, Menéndez y Pelayo wrote works for special occasions, such as addresses or introductions, which of necessity had to be brief and limited. In these, collected under the title Estudios de crítica literaria (1884–1908), the reader can appreciate the value of his concisely expressed ideas and opinions on a great variety of topics and writers of Spanish literature.

Throughout his work he displays equal competence, although the field of his preference and most special ability was the golden age, particularly in those of its aspects which derived from the Renaissance and the classics. Menéndez y Pelayo was not a specialist in literary criticism in the sense the word has taken on in modern times, but rather a humanist, like those of the Renaissance. His literary taste was unerring and in his writings he determined the values and rankings of Spanish literature, and his judgments have been generally accepted and have come to constitute the consensus of Spanish literary criticism up to the present moment. This is Menéndez y Pelayo's great talent—his ability to organize and evaluate swiftly a field as broad as is that of the whole civilization of a nation. All this makes him the greatest historian Spain produced in the 19th century. His works may not have achieved perfection; but it would be difficult for anyone to approach any question, large or small, concerning Spanish literature without finding that Menéndez y Pelayo had already taken the initiative in that field and had analyzed it along lines that are almost always definitive.

See: A. Bonilla y San Martín, Marcelino Menéndez y Pelayo (1856–1912) (1914); M. Artigas Ferrando, La vida y la obra de Menéndez y Pelayo (1939).

F. de O.

Mercier, Louis (1870–, French poet), outstanding representative of the "Ecole Lyonnaise," was born at Coutouvre near Roanne, a town which itself, although in the Forez region, is but a distant suburb of Lyon. The poet's parents lived in comfort on the farm where generations of Merciers had lived and prospered. Mercier was educated at St. Jodard and at the Catholic University of Lyon, where the study of Greek and Latin was inseparable from that of French literature. His academic life was cut short by a period of military service (three years) in North Africa. But he always felt himself an exile there, and in all his works no trace of exoticism is found. Back in his native Forez, his only ambition was to become a writer. He joined the editorial staff of the Journal de Roanne, never abandoning his position there and unpholding the most vigorous regionalist and traditionalist views.

Mercier's first book of poems, L'Enchantée (1897), a contribution to symbolist literature, has little in common with his later productions. The poet found his real path and struck the right vein for him when love of nature and love of his own homeland inspired him to write his two greatest works, Voix de la terre et du temps (1903) and Le Poème de la maison (1906). G. M. Witkowski made use of the latter in his symphonic and lyric composition of the same title, first presented in 1921.

The association of the French peasantry with the First World War was recorded by Mercier in two noble, inspired collections, Poèmes de la tranchée (1916) and Les Pierres sacrées (1920), which more than his Lazare le Ressuscité (1909) reveal a "Catholic Vigny." It would perhaps be more appropriate to relate him to Vergil. Though he succeeded, both in verse (Les Petites Géorgiques, 1923) and in two novels (Hélène Sorbiers, 1912; Les Demoiselles Valéry, 1923), in giving probably the best sketches of his native Forez, Mercier is not merely a provincial man of letters. His poetry is a hymn to life, to man's life associated with his ancestors and mother earth. The French peasant lives in close and harmonious contact with the fields and the home of his sires, works hard for his sons, and takes pride in giving life. In his small hedged or walled-in realm he may be forgetful of his hardships, not of his responsibilities.

When Mercier, the first in his family to do so, abandoned the plough for the pen, he took upon himself the task of making his neighbors hear more distinctly the voices of nature and time and become more conscious of the noble beauty of their lives. He never cared to have his poems read and praised by the press and critics of Paris. Mercier's style, in harmony with the subject, is always simple, avoiding all trickery and spotlight effects. Its very flaws—some are obviously deliberate—show the poet's dislike of artifice.

See: F. Gohin, Le Poète Louis Mercier (1923.)

P. Bo.

Merezhkovski, Dmitri Sergeyevich (1865–1941, Russian novelist, critic, poet, and essayist), born in St. Petersburg into the family of a nobleman of Ukrainian background, was educated in the Third St. Petersburg Classical Gymnasium. As a boy in his teens Merezhkovski met Dostoevski (q.v.), an event that deeply impressed him. He also became acquainted with the poet Nadson (q.v.), and a friendship developed between them. In 1884 he finished at the Gymnasium and entered the historico-philological faculty of the University of Moscow. In his student years Merezhkovski was absorbed in the works of Spencer, Comte, Mill, and Darwin; however, the religious urge that was fostered in him since childhood left him dissatisfied with positivist philosophy. Like many another Russian intellectual of the time, Merezhkovski became carried away by a search for "eternal truths." On completing his work at the university, he journeyed to the Caucasus, where he met and soon married Zinaida Hippus (q.v.). After his return to St. Petersburg, Merezhkovski began earnestly to pursue a literary career. Aided by his wife, he eventually gathered about himself a number of young authors and philosophers interested in the "God-seeking" trends of that period. Later their informal gatherings took on the aspect of an organization—the Religious-Philosophical Society. Seeking a Neo-Christianity that would supplant the old Russian orthodoxy, Merezhkovski denied equally the church and tsarism and after the Revolution of 1905 was forced to emigrate abroad. With the outbreak of the First World War the Merezhkovskis opposed it on principle; with the ascendancy of the Soviets to power, they took an irreconcilably hostile attitude toward the new regime. In 1919 they succeeded in escaping from Russia and eventually took up residence in Paris, where they became associated with reactionary elements.

Merezhkovski began his literary career as a poet. As early as 1883 he was publishing verses much in the mood of Nadson's melancholy civic poetry. After Nadson's death in 1887 Merezhkovski was regarded for a while as a "civic" poet and possible successor to Nadson. In the early 90's, following a nascent interest in modernism, Merezhkovski published a book of verse, Simvoly (1892; Symbols), and a collection of essays, O prichinakh upadka i o novykh techeniyakh souremennoi russkoi literatury (1893; On the Causes of the Present Decline and New Currents in Russian Literature), in which he analyzed the spiritual strivings of his contemporaries and also interpreted the works of Russian classics in the light of impressionism, symbolism, and mysticism. In another collection of essays, Vechnyie sputniki (1896; Eternal Companions), he pursued this thesis further. Thereafter his reputation as leader of the symbolist movement was established. In 1896 was published Smert bogov (Eng. trs., Julian the Apostate, 1899, The Death of the Gods, 1901, 1929), the first part of his popular trilogy, Khristos i Antikhris (Eng. tr., Christ and the Antichrist, 1938). Here Merezhkovski presents his religious-philosophical interpretation of history in a neatly schematized synthesis of thesis and antithesis. Paganism and Christianity, the religion of flesh and the religion of spirit, were the two opposite historical forces that were eventually to resolve themselves into a third, reconciling religion. The second part of the trilogy, Voskresshive bogi: Leonaruo da Vinci (1901, Resurrected Gods: Leonardo da Vinci; Eng. trs., The Romance of Leonardo de Vinci, 1902, 1928), has been the most successful of Merezhkovski's works, although it, too, suffers from subjugation of plot to a philosophical formula. The last part of the trilogy, Khristos i Antikhris: Piotr i Aleksei (1905; Eng. trs., Peter and Alexis, 1905, 1931), although historically as authentic as its two predecessors, is less convincing as a literary piece. Merezhkovski's outstanding critical book is his study Tolstoi i Dostoyevski (1901–1902; Eng. tr., Tolstoi as Man and Artist, with an Essay on Dostoïevski, 1902), in which he analyzes the works of these two authors as antithetical revelations by two "seers"—the one, "of the flesh," being Tolstoy (q.v.), and the other, "of the spirit," Dostoevski. During the decade following the Revolution of 1905 were published several collections of essays by Merezhkovski on the social, intellectual, and religious trends in Russia; the essays are full of dialectics, mingled sometimes with prophetic revelations. His other fictional works include such historical novels as Aleksandr I (1925) and 14 Dekabrya (1921; Eng. tr., December the Fourteenth, 1923) and the play Pavel I (1908; Paul I). After the Revolution of 1917 he attacked Bolshevism in his vitriolic Tsarstvo Antikhrista (1922; The Kingdom of Antichrist). Once he had settled in Paris, he undertook a study of ancient Egypt that resulted in a second-rate novel, Rozhdeniye bogov: Tutankamon na Krite (1925, The Birth of the Gods: Tutankhamen in Crete; Eng. tr., The Birth of the Gods, 1925).

Merezhkovski's most significant contributions to Russian literature were made in the course of a dozen years, ending in 1905. During this time he was an influential figure in an important literary movement; after that his significance declined.

See: A. S. Dolinin, "Dmitri Merezhkovski," in S. A. Vengerov, ed., Russkaya literatura XX veka, I (1914), 295-356.

O. M.

Merrill, Stuart (1863-1915, French poet), born in Hempstead, Long Island, New York, went to Paris in his early youth and studied at the Lycée Condorcet. Ephraïm Mikhaël, Pierre Quillard, René Ghil (q.v.), and André Fontainas were schoolfellows, who like himself were destined to play an active part in the symbolist movement. In 1884 he returned to America to enter the school of law at Columbia University in New York City. Four years of jurisprudence did not interfere seriously with his poetic vocation, since his first book of poems, Les Gammes, appeared in Paris (1887), while in New York were published Pastels in Prose (1890) and a volume of translations of contemporary French poetry. Back in France in 1890, Merrill spent the rest of his life in his adopted country, choosing Versailles for his residence and devoting himself to his literary pursuits. An enthusiastic exponent of the new school of poetry, he contributed poems, essays, and critical articles to all the reviews favorable to the symbolist theories. Following the example of René Ghil and deeply influenced by the music of Wagner, Merrill aimed at verbal orchestration, using all the resources of assonance and alliteration as well as the tonal qualities of the vocalic sounds. The result is a complex harmony applied with learned skill to the alexandrine or other syllabic meters. This manner is amply illustrated in Poèmes (1887-1897), in which the subtle and refined music of his earlier compositions is followed by the gorgeous sonority of "Les Fastes." The dazzling effect of rare and precious words mingling with the clash of resounding syllables may fail to move our hearts but not to astonish our ears. Soon, however, in Les Quatre Saisons (1900) Merrill returned to a more subdued style, one more suited to tender reverie and to the murmured confession of a soul. But the pure artist that he was did not hide from the realities of the world around him, and he took an active interest in socialist organizations as early as his student days in New York. His humanitarian creed finds expression in several of his writings, more particularly in Une Voix dans la foule (1909).

See: Rémy de Gourmont, Le Livre des masques (1896); Vance Thompson, French Portraits (1900); André Beaunier, La Poésie nouvelle (1902); Marjorie Louise Henry, La Contribution d'un Américain au symbolisme français: Stuart Merrill (1927).

M. D.

Mesa y Rosales, Enrique de (1879-1929, Spanish poet and dramatic critic), was born and educated in Madrid. He became known as a writer when he won a prize from a Madrid newspaper in 1903, and from then until his death he devoted himself to the literary profession. He was secretary of the Ateneo and president of its section of literature. As dramatic critic of Imparcial he aroused resentment and won respect by his frank appraisals of the work of actors and authors. The best of these criticisms were published under the title Apostillas a la escena (1929). Other volumes of his prose are Flor pagana (1905), El retrato de Don Quijote (1905), and Andanzas serranas (1910).

It is as a poet, however, that Enrique de Mesa won fame. His three significant volumes of poetry, Cancionero castellano (1911; 2d ed., 1917), El silencio de la Cartuja (1916), El posada y el camino (1928), form a spiritual whole. Tierra y alma (1906) has long been out of print. It is poetry in the traditional manner and meters of the Spanish classical poets. His theme is the Castilian countryside, with its mountains and mountain dwellers, its arid plains, its sense of age and timelessness. His vocabulary consists of precise, realistic words that call country things and places by their popular names. It is a lyric poetry of restrained expression but intense feeling. In a series of plastic word pictures, Enrique de Mesa conveys to the reader a sense of the emotion of the landscape. His exquisite use of color and sound and his evocation of Castile's past reflect the literary mode of his day. He can, however, be classed with no group or school. Rather is he another of the line of truly Spanish poets who perceived the essential quality of his country and gave it beautiful expression.

See: R. Pérez de Ayala, preface to Mesa y Rosales, Cancionero castellano, 2d ed. (1917); R. Cansinos-Asséns, Poetas y prosistas del novecientos (1919); M. Gardner, "Enrique de Mesa," Hispania XIII (1930), 311-314.

K. R. W.

Meyer, Conrad Ferdinand (1825-1898, Swiss poet and story writer), was born in Zurich. A gifted and sensitive child, he grew up in an atmosphere of cultured refinement. After the early death of his father (1840) his education remained in the hands of his melancholy and neurasthenic mother. The poet fell a victim to the same trouble; a neurasthenic fear of reality gripped him, and in 1852 he agreed to enter a sanitarium. He stayed seven months and learned to settle down to a daily task. His first literary work was a translation of Thierry's Récits des temps mérovingiens, completed in 1855. The following year his mother committed suicide, a victim of her melancholia. Falling heir to a fair inheritance, Meyer was free. He went to Paris and then to Rome. Much as Meyer admired modern French esprit and French art, the stern Calvinist in him rejected what seemed to him French levity. He felt more at home in Rome, and there he found in Michelangelo his ideal, a high seriousness of purpose and an unfailing sense of what is really great. He returned to Zurich, convinced that poetry was his mission.

Meyer presents perhaps the strangest case of delayed development in literary annals. He was 39 when his Zwanzig Balladen von einem Schweizer (1864) was published anonymously. At 43 he ventured to give his name to another slim volume, Romanzen und Bilder (1871), a collection of ballads and lyrics. At 50 he married. The Franco-German War helped to set free his latent powers, and under the impact of those stirring days he wrote Huttens letzte Tage (1871), a sequence of terse ballads forming an epic narrative, his first masterpiece. The laconic couplets seem as if wrought on an anvil. He struggled for a decade with a historical novel, as Michelangelo, his spiritual kinsman, struggled with a block of recalcitrant marble. He was 51 when this novel, Jürg Jenatsch, was published (1876). It is his only novel, a panoramic view of the world in the 17th century. The novel centers in Switzerland, but Italy, the France of Richelieu, and the Germany of the Thirty Years' War enter into the picture. The hero is an uncompromising man of action for whom the end must justify the means.

While working on this novel Meyer found the field in which he could most fully satisfy his striving for that final perfection of form his artist's conscience demanded. The shorter Novelle with its more closely knit structure, where cause and effect are inexorably linked as in the tragic drama, attracted him. Its very compactness made sterner artistic demands possible, and its relative brevity more readily allowed frequent rewriting and conscientious and conscious artistry. He had entered the field of history in his Hutten and his Jenatsch, and he stayed there. He sees and depicts human struggles in bygone centuries in their historical aspect. Meyer's production of historical Novellen began with Das Amulett (1873) and reached its first peak in Der Heilige (1880; Eng. tr., Thomas à Becket the Saint, 1885). Quite on the same level with this is Die Hochzeit des Mönchs (1884; Eng. tr., The Monk's Wedding, 1887). Dante tells this story, and from the very beginning we hear the voice that chanted the verse of The Divine Comedy. Beside these two supreme achievements stand Die Leiden eines Knaben (1883), Die Richterin (1885), and Die Versuchung des Pescara (1887; Eng. tr., The Tempting of Pescara, 1890).

The striving for flawless perfection that marks Meyer's prose is even more evident in his lyrics. An unusually high standard of excellence is maintained throughout, and the very arrangement of the poems is a work of art. Most of these poems stem from the poet's later years. Instead of youthful exuberance are found mellow maturity and conscious restraint, but a sensitive ear will hear the beat of a heart that felt deeply life's joy and grief. Beside the wistful love lyrics of his 30's are the warm and mellow lyrics of his happy marriage. His great ballads are the most direct reflection of his passionate nature, e.g., "In der Sistine" and "Casar Borgias Ohnmacht." Meyer is not only a sensitive interpreter of the various moods of nature, but also of the work of human hands, as in "Der römische Brunnen." In conciseness and perfection of form Meyer is akin to Stefan George (q.v.).

See: W. Brecht, Conrad Ferdinand Meyer und das Kunstwerk seiner Gedichtsammlung (1918); R. Faesi, Conrad Ferdinand Meyer (1925); H. Maync, Conrad Ferdinand Meyer und sein Werk (1925); A. Burkhard, Conrad Ferdinand Meyer; the Style and the Man (1932).

F. Br.

Michaëlis de Vasconcelos, Carolina Wilhelmina (1851-1925, German philologist, Romanist, and critic), was born in Berlin. At the age of 17 her first work (Erläuterung zu Herders Cid) was published, and at 22 she began to write for technical publications such as the Romanische Forschungen and the Zeitschrift für romanische Philologie. She devoted herself at the start to etymological investigations, chiefly concerning the Spanish language; in her early works the Portuguese language is referred to only when helpful to clarify any particular point under consideration. In Leipzig in 1876 appeared her Studien zur romanischen Wortschöpfung, in which she already expounded the theory, later supported by Jespersen and other distinguished linguists, that "each modification of a language is a progressive evolution." She married Joaquim de Vasconcelos, a well-known historian of Portuguese art who had made a long visit to Germany. After 1876 she lived in Portugal.

On the occasion of the third centennial (1880) of the death of Camões she started the publication of her valuable studies about the great Portuguese poet. She was one of the scholars who contributed most to identifying the compositions that had really been written by Camões. She prepared for Gustav Groeber's Grundriss der romanischen Philologie (1894) the chapter covering the medieval period of Portuguese literary history. In 1904 was published her famous and scrupulously careful edition of the Cancioneiro da Ajuda, a collection of medieval poetry; the glossary did not appear until 1921. She also prepared a critical edition of Sá de Miranda (1885) and valuable studies on Gil Vicente (Notas vicentinas, 1912-1917) and on other Portuguese writers and prominent historical personages.

Carolina Michaëlis de Vasconcelos was appointed professor of Germanic philology at the faculty of letters of the University of Lisbon in 1911. One year later, at her request, she was transferred to the chair of Romance philology at the University of Coimbra. She was the editor of the review Lusitânia of Lisbon and a contributor to the Revista de filologia española of Madrid and to other scholarly publications. She possessed a wealth of scientific information and had a gift for philological research. Her vast knowledge covered the fields of Hispanic linguistics, etymology, literature, ethnology, and folklore. She died at Oporto. In 1933 the University of Coimbra published in her memory a 1156-page volume entitled Miscelânea de estudos em honra de D. Carolina Michaëlis de Vasconcelos.

See: J. Mendes dos Remédios, D. Carolina Michaëlis de Vasconcelos (1926).

J. F.

Miegel, Agnes (1879-, German poet and short-story writer), was born in Königsberg, East Prussia, the only child of a merchant. She considers herself a genuine Kolonialdeutsche since her mother's family had come to East Prussia from Salzburg in Austria in the middle of the 18th century and had been successful farmers there for several generations. In Kinderland (1930) she tells of her happy childhood in Königsberg and her first acquaintance with the sea, which made a lasting impression on her. She pays tribute to her parents who introduced her to the best in German and foreign (especially English) literature. She writes of her father's love for their homeland, of his interest in the history of East Prussia, and of her discovery of Prussian folklore and legends, a source of inspiration for her own work. After completing her elementary education in Königsberg, Agnes Miegel attended a girls' finishing school in Weimar and traveled, first to Paris, then to England where she stayed for two years. A number of her ballads deal with themes taken from the history of England and France. She returned from England and spent several years in Berlin doing newspaper work. However, she never felt at home there and longed for East Prussia. Back in Königsberg, where she has lived ever since, she worked on the staff of the Königsberger Zeitung until 1927.

Agnes Miegel's talent is essentially lyrical. She expresses her love, suffering, and longing in simple, moving poems, traditional in form. She is best known, however, for her stirring ballads dealing with historical events as well as magic and supernatural forces. They are direct and forceful in style; the fusion of lyrical and narrative elements results in poems quite different in form and appeal from the usual narrative ballad (Gesammelte Gedichte, 1927). In her prose tales, the most powerful of which is Die Fahrt der sieben Ordensbrüder (1926), she emphasizes detail and description in order to create local color as well as mood and suspense. But although she fully succeeds in thus depicting situations of intense emotional appeal, these are apt to confuse the reader and conflict with the dramatic development of her themes. After the separation of East Prussia from the Reich in 1919, Agnes Miegel became more and more the spokesman of her native land. She voices the hopes and fears of its people (Herbstgesang, 1932), "in order that others who will follow may understand their country and their forefathers," and similarly explains her own work in "Gespräch mit den Ahnen" (Unter hellem Himmel, 1936).

See: M. Schochow, Agnes Miegel; eine Studie (1929); P. Fechter, Agnes Miegel; eine preussische Frau (1933).

O. S. F.

Mikszáth, Kálmán (1847–1910, Hungarian novelist and short-story writer), was born in Szklabonya and died in Budapest. Mikszáth went to secondary schools in Rimaszombat and Besztercebánya and studied law at the University of Budapest. For a short time he served as a county official; then he turned to journalism, contributing to newspapers in Szeged and other cities. His social roots were those of the gentry, though his father was an innkeeper and a butcher. Mikszáth's nature was such that he was indulgent with the frailties of human beings, regardless of their social position; this explains his humorous attitude toward the gentry, the Slovak peasants, and the "Palócz" people of County Nógrád (descendants of the Bessenyő people, who were absorbed by the Hungarians in the 13th century), toward tradesmen, artisans, windbags, and politicians. His world was a rather simple one, but he saw the complexities of simple or seemingly simple lives. Politically he was attached to the Liberal Party under the leadership of Count Kálmán Tisza; he was also a member of the Hungarian Parliament. His collected works appeared first in 1889, and again in an augmented edition in 1910. Edited by Mózes Rubinyi, 16 volumes were published posthumously. The complete edition of the collected works consists of 46 volumes. The nation appreciated Mikszáth. Every important literary society elected him to its membership; he was a member of the Hungarian Scientific Academy and president of the Society of Hungarian Journalists. At the fortieth anniversary of his literary activities he received the family manor house as a gift from the nation, and his birthplace was named after him. Mikszáth divorced his wife, then remarried her. The death of his young son, János, influenced the character of his children's stories.

Mikszáth was chiefly a humorist, who could laugh and smile and share his fun with the reader, but he had also a mocking intelligence, an ironic vein, and here and there his spirit was darkened by bitterness and uneasiness. One of the reappearing motives in Mikszáth's world of fiction is the illusion of small things being great and great things being small. This does not mean that he was a contortionist in the novel and the short story, but that his observations caught the implications of incongruousness. He wrote much, frequently in the living, vital, direct, and imaginative dialect of the "Palócz" people. From the year 1871, when his first stories appeared, until his death he handled his material with deftness and adroitness. While he did not have the multitude of readers that Jókai (q.v.) had, his following was large. Despite dated subject matter, his humor and satire are still lively and refreshing. One of his best novels, Szent Péter esernyője (1895), has appeared in English (St. Peter's Umbrella, 1900). His stories were published in French, German, and other languages. Some of his stories were dramatized. He wrote a book about Mór Jókai, entitled Jókai Mór élete és kora (1907; Mór Jókai's Life and His Age). He produced juvenile stories and introductions to a year-book called Egyetemes regénytár almanach (1888; The Almanac of General Fiction), which after his death was named Mikszáth Kálmán almanachja (The Almanac of Kálmán Mikszáth).

It is not so much objective critical evaluation as personal taste that decides which of the works of Mikszáth are most admirable. The gusto with which he tells a story is apt to be contagious. Some of his most revealing novels and short stories are the following: Urak és parasztok (1904; Gentlemen and Peasants), A jó Palóczok (1882; The Good Folks of Palócz), Vén gazember (1906; The Old Scoundrel), Galamb a kalitkában (1893; A Caged Pigeon), Katánghy levelei (1893; The Letters of Katánghy), Besztercze ostroma (1895; The Siege of Besztercze), Kisértet Lublón (1896; A Ghost in Lublo), Prakovszky, a siket kovács (1897; Prakovszky, the Deaf Smithy), A Noszty fiú esete Tóth Marival (1907; The Case of the Noszty Boy with Mary Toth), A fekete város (1910; The Black City). His political sketches, e.g., Apróságok a házból (Trifles from the Parliament), gave him an opportunity to excel in brief, pointed portraits in which the serenity or pompousness of the Parliament was reduced to the level of common humanity. His juvenile story A ló, a bárdnyka és a nyúl (The Horse, the Lamb, and the Rabbit) is enchanting.

From the viewpoint of humor and irony Mikszáth combined many qualities. Jonathan Swift and Mark Twain, Anatole France and Alphonse Daudet, would have enjoyed Mikszáth could they have known him, because each of these authors would have discovered something in the Hungarian writer that would have pleased their sense of humor or their sense of irony. Essentially, however, Mikszáth's charm was the reflection of his originality. Even his anecdotal stories have artistic merit. His characterizations of women are apt to be inferior to those of men, but as a whole this defect does not detract from the general significance of Mikszáth as an important writer of novels and short stories.

See: B. Várdai, Mikszáth élete és munkái (1910); P. Gyulai, Bírálatok (1911); M. Rubinyi, Mikszáth írói hagyatéka (1914); A. Schöpplin, Magyar írók (1919).

J. R.

Milá y Fontanals, Manuel (1818–1884, Spanish critic and philologist), born in Villafranca del Panadés, was the most brilliant Spanish scholar of the middle 19th century and the founder of modern Spanish scholarship. If his contributions have been unjustly forgotten at times by present-day investigators, this is due partly to the difficulty in obtaining his works, collected in Obras completas (8 vols., 1886–1896), which are in fact still far from complete. Very early in life he showed a keen mind, versatile and profound. From 1846 till 1884 he taught with great success at the University of Barcelona. His contributions range from original poetry to significant studies in Romance philology and literature. In keeping with Catalonian tradition Milá was well versed in the classics, a training which tempered his romantic leanings. His De los trovadores en España: Estudio de lengua y poesía provenzal (1861) is an outstanding contribution; the Observaciones sobre la poesía popular con muestras de romances catalanes inéditos (1853), which later appeared as the Romancerillo popular catalán (1882), is one of the first scientific contributions to Spanish folklore; and the De la poesía heroico-popular castellana (1874) is the first study to point out the relation between the oldest Spanish ballads and medieval Spanish epic poetry.

See: J. Rubió y Ors, Noticia de la vida y escritos de D. Manuel Milá y Fontanals (1887); M. Menéndez y Pelayo, El doctor D. Manuel Milá y Fontanals; semblanza literaria (1908); A. Rubió i Lluch, Manuel Mila i Fontanals; notes biografiques i critiques (1918); W. J. Entwistle, European Balladry (1939).

F. S. y E.

Mille, Pierre (1864–1941, French short-story writer, humorist, and journalist), was born of bourgeois parents in Choisy-le-Roi near Paris. He showed an early interest in journalism, and although he completed a formal law education, his first position, in 1890, was as correspondent in England for the Paris Temps. He remained on the staff of the Temps until his death, as reporter, colonial editor, and columnist ("En passant"), meanwhile contributing to other newspapers and periodicals. In Madagascar in 1896 he became interested in the problems of the rapidly expanding French colonial empire and subsequently found occasion as a reporter to travel in all France's colonies of the Eastern Hemisphere. He was a recognized authority on colonial problems, advocating a liberal treatment of the natives. He served on the Conseil Supérieur des Colonies from 1912 and became president of the Académie des Sciences Coloniales. Significant reminiscences of all this are found in Mes Trônes et mes dominations (1930) and Mémoires d'un vagabonde en retraite (1932).

Some 30 volumes of Mille's stories have been published. He was particularly successful with the nouvelle, told in a delightfully informal style, tempered with a keen, penetrating humor. He was an independent artist, a humanist who saw permanent values in all life. The settings of his stories are as varied as his travels and are artistically written, but the emphasis is always upon people. His characters are legion. A few are especially significant: Barnavaux, popular French soldier of the Foreign Legion, through whom Mille told many colonial stories, Sur la vaste terre (1906; Eng. tr., Barnavaux, 1915), Barnavaux et quelques femmes (1908; Eng. tr., Under the Tricolour, 1915), and Louise et Barnavaux (1912; Eng. tr., 1916); Partonneau, a colonial administrator and shrewd observer, L'illustre Partonneau (1924); Le Monarque (1914; Eng. tr., The Monarch, 1925), a typical French Southerner, sympathetically portrayed without caricature; Caillou et Tili (1911; Eng. tr., Two Little Parisians, 1913), children whose stories reveal Mille's keen appreciation of childhood; and Nasr-Eddine, a semi-legendary, humorous Turk, whose stories in Nasr-Eddine et son épouse (1914) allowed Mille free play for his imagination. Mille ranks among the leaders in French colonial literature.

See: Florian-Parmentier, Pierre Mille (1923); André Thérive, Galerie de ce temps (1931), pp. 93–116; W. J. Everts, The Life and Works of Pierre Mille (1938).

W. J. E.

Milosz, Oscar Wladislas de Lubicz (1877–1939, Lithuanian-French poet, dramatist, and philosopher), was born in Czereia, Lithuania, of an old and noble family. In 1899 he went to Paris, where he attended the Lycée Janson-de-Sailly and then followed courses in the Ecole des Langues Orientales and the Ecole du Louvre, studying Hebrew, Aramaic, and Assyrian. At the same time he was writing and publishing poetry, Le Poème des décadences (1899) and Les Sept Solitudes (1904), revealing a sensitivity for verbal music and a mystic temperament, but not differing greatly from the work of many other contemporary symbolists (see French symbolism). He continued his oriental studies, traveling in the Near East, until the outbreak of the First World War. In 1919 he was named Lithuanian minister to France, a position he held until 1926. In 1930 he became a French citizen.

His work grew in beauty and obscurity as his interest in philosophy and mysticism deepened. Plays, Mephiboseth (1914) and Miguel Mañara (1912; Eng. tr., 1919), and volumes of verse, Les Eléments (1911), Poèmes (1915), and La Confession de Lemuel (1922), mark a steady increase in preoccupation with spiritual problems and the mystery of the universe. In two books of metaphysics, Ars magna (1924) and Les Arcanes (1926), Milosz has given some idea of his system, an exotic blend of Catholicism, Swedenborg, Böhme, Eastern tradition, and modern physics. During his later years, he lived in great seclusion at Fontainebleau, engaged in biblical studies and enjoying among his neighbors the reputation of a saint.

Milosz has been accused of pretentiousness and obscurity by some and hailed as one of the greatest modern French poets by others. He himself said that he wrote with l'âme des mots, and as he grew older this verbal concentration, combined with the esoteric nature of his subject matter, undoubtedly presented great difficulties to the reader. Whatever Milosz's final position in French literature may be, it cannot be denied that his mastery of the melody and suggestive power of the French language was equaled by few of his contemporaries.

See: Francis de Miomandre, Le Pavillon du mandarin (1921); René de Berval, "La Mort d'Oscar W. de L. Milosz-Milasius," Mercure de France, CCXCI (1939), 246-247; Francis de Miomandre, "Mort d'un poète: J'ai connu Milosz," Nouvelles littéraires, March 11, 1939. C. W., Jr.

Minski, Nikolai Maksimovich (pseud. of Nikolai Maksimovich Vilenkin, 1855-1937, Russian poet and philosopher), was born of poor Jewish parents at Glubokoye in the former Government of Vilna and took his degree in law at St. Petersburg (1879). Minski began his literary career as a follower of Nekrasov, but soon abandoned "civic" themes for an "art for art's sake" attitude; he became the first of the Russian decadents, among whom he shared leadership with Volynski and Merezhkovski (q.v.), particularly as a philosopher. He was one of the organizers of the Religious-Philosophical Society (1902), which attracted the intellectuals among the believers. His ideas are set forth in the Nietzschean Pri svete sovesti (1890; By the Light of Conscience) and in Religiya budushchevo (1905; The Religion of the Future), which develops his concept of "meonism," the religion of nonbeing, based on a mystic faith in conscience, sacrifice, and love, compounded with elements borrowed from Nietzsche (q.v.) and oriental mystics. His poetry is often merely a vehicle for his ideas, though in his later work he occasionally achieved a true synthesis of form and content. Minski was unfortunate in becoming a poet during a period of transition, and his chief importance lies in his preparing the ground for the later symbolists. Curiously enough, 1905 found Minski among the revolutionaries; he became the nominal head of Novaya zhizn (The New Life), Russia's first legal Social Democratic newspaper, for which he wrote "A Hymn of the Workers." His arrest terminated that period, and he left Russia for Paris. In exile, he wrote, among other things, a dramatic trilogy and a volume of criticism (Ot Dante k Bloku, 1922; From Dante to Blok), and then lapsed into silence.

See: S. A. Vengerov, ed., Russkaya literatura XX veka, Vol. I (1914); Aikhenvald, Siluety russkikh pisatelei, Vol. III (1923); "Minski," in Literaturnaya entsiklopediya, Vol. VII (1934).

P. A. P.

Mirbeau, Octave (1850-1917, French playwright and novelist), was born at Trévières, Calvados, the son of a middle-class doctor. An unhappy childhood, complicated by unfortunate experiences in a school chiefly for young nobles, affected him deeply and may account in part for the bitter tone of much of his mature work. Mirbeau began his literary career as a conservative journalist, but soon became a violent revolutionary. He quickly rose to a position of influence in artistic and literary circles (he was a member of the Goncourt Academy) and gave real support to the efforts of such innovators as Van Gogh, Rodin, Manet, Monet, Cézanne, Debussy, and Maeterlinck (q.v.). After an extremely turbulent journalistic career, during which he provoked numerous duels by his outspoken criticism of conservatives in art and politics, he withdrew to his estate at Cheverchemont, where he died after a long illness.

In his works the note of protest and revolt is dominant. His first great play, Les Mauvais Bergers (1897), directed against those dishonest politicians who exploit the laboring man, paved the way for the epoch-making Les Affaires sont les affaires (1903), one of the memorable successes of the French stage, a bitter indictment of business ethics and the financial world in general. Le Foyer (1908) continues the note of social protest with a sharp attack on deceit and mismanagement in charitable institutions. His early novels, Le Calvaire (1886), L'Abbé Jules (1888), and Sébastien Roch (1889), are largely autobiographical. Of his later novels, Le Jardin des supplices (1899), a terrifying study of oriental sadism, and Le Journal d'une femme de chambre (1900), the most truly naturalistic of his works, enjoyed the greatest popularity.

Mirbeau's style is peculiarly vivid and intense, his tone nearly always violent and excessive, his execution frequently uneven. Undeniably sincere, he carried on a long crusade for social justice and shocked his age by the reforms he preached. Today, even though many of his ideas are dated, he holds a large audience by the vigor of his prose, by the fearlessness of his attack, and by his love for liberty, justice, and equality.

See: G. Rodenbach, L'Elite (1899); E. Pilon, Octave Mirbeau (1903); G. Lecomte, "L'Œuvre d'Octave Mirbeau," Grande Revue, XCIII (1917), 20-35; M. Revon, Octave Mirbeau; son œuvre (1934).

R. J. N.

Miró, Gabriel (1879-1930, Spanish novelist and essayist), born in Alicante, entered the Jesuit College of Orihuela and later the Instituto de Segunda Enseñanza of Alicante. He began the study of law in Valencia and finished these studies in Granada. He lived in Alicante and in 1911 moved to Barcelona, where he worked on a sacred encyclopedia for a publishing firm. Continually in financial straits, he later went to Madrid as secretary of the Concursos Nacionales de Bellas Artes. He died May 27, 1930, in Madrid.

His first work, Del vivir (1904), is a book of travels through his own province, in which he seemed to have been mainly impressed by the leprosy existing in certain districts; already he shows vigorous power in the emotional description of persons and places. In the year 1908 his short novel Nómada was awarded a prize in a contest sponsored by a Madrid review, and from that moment Miró figures among the group of writers intent upon the renovation of literary style. Novels constitute a good part of his production. The first of these, La novela de mi amigo (1902), is marked by profound spiritual anguish and a polished style; Las cerezas del cementerio (1914) is characterized by a modernism through which there shines a romantic sensibility. His best novels are Nuestro padre San Daniel (1921; Eng. tr., Our Father San Daniel, 1930) and El obispo leproso (1926). "Ciudad de Oleza" (a name with which he disguises Orihuela in the province of Murcia), episcopal see where the clergy from the convents and the bishop from his palace govern every phase of the people's lives, is, at times, merely the background of his work and of the actions of his characters, but on many occasions this city becomes in its own right a character in these novels. The very typically 19th-century theme of innocent vital instincts stifled by a fanatical conception of morality loses all the appearance of a political thesis in Miró and serves only as a basis for human situations and conflicts.

Although these two major novels of Miró are good examples of modern craftsmanship, the author found the really appropriate expression of his literary temperament in non-fictional forms. This is evident first of all in a series of books—Libro de Sigüenza (1917), El humo dormido (1919), El ángel, El molino, El caracol del faro (1921), Años y leguas (1928)—in which he collects impressions and descriptions of landscapes, types, and scenes from the urban and rural life of his region. As the protagonist of almost all these works, Miró invented a double of himself whom he calls "Sigüenza" and who strolls through the recollections of past life or through the present realities of the Mediterranean country. In his figures from the villages and the countryside there is a strict fidelity in the minute descriptions of each object and at the same time a profound poetic sensibility which always extracts a spiritual essence from the material he is describing. His manner suggests Fray Luis de Granada, the mystic of nature of the 16th century; in a deep sense Miró is before all else a poet. His greatest non-novelistic work is Figuras de la pasión del Señor (1916; Eng. tr., Figures of the Passion of Our Lord, 1924). Against a biblical background this presents scenes from the life of Jesus and portrays the major and minor figures who appeared in it. Doubtless the countryside of Alicante suggested to Miró visions of Palestine, where he had never been. His extensive readings in sacred history, done while he was working in Barcelona, furnished him a documental basis for the work. It is here that Miró's prose reaches its maximum descriptive power; the effects call to mind the magnificent polychrome altarpieces and sculptures of traditional Spain.

Miró really eludes classification. Normal literary genres were never quite appropriate for his intimate quality. He is a prosista who, keenly sensitive to the latent beauty of words, would endow prose with all possible potentialities of expression. If in this way his work runs parallel to one of the tendencies of modernism, Miró puts above the merely modernistic a constant use of the "popular" and rural lexicon; this, combined with cultismos, produces a prose of a density and richness unmatched in modern Spanish literature.

See: J. Chabás, Vuelo y estilo (1930), pp. 17-58; J. Guardiola Ortiz, Biografía íntima de Gabriel Miró (1935); M. de Mayo, Gabriel Miró (1879-1930): vida y obra (1936).

P. S.

Mistral, Frédéric (1830-1914, Provençal poet), was born, lived, and died at Maillane near Avignon. His father, a well-to-do farmer, felt honor-bound to give him a good classical education. Accordingly Frédéric Mistral was sent to three different boarding schools and given an opportunity to attend courses at the Collège Royal of Avignon. He enjoyed the classics and proved to be an excellent student, but reading Homer and Virgil barely consoled him for the loss of actual contact with country life and people who spoke Provençal, his mother tongue. He had his revenge by composing verses in that speech which was spurned by official education and derided by his schoolmates. One day he was elated to hear one of his teachers, Joseph Roumanille (q.v.), recite some poems in the despised tongue. This marked the beginning of a life-long friendship and fruitful collaboration. Later Mistral went to study law at the University of Aix-en-Provence. After receiving his Licence en Droit (1851), he returned home determined to devote his life to the task of reviving Provençal consciousness among his countrymen. This he hoped to accomplish through the prestige of poetry in the vernacular which, like Roumanille, he was intent upon restoring to literary dignity.

Mistral's first publications had been two French poems written in a period of republican and humanitarian enthusiasm (1848), but he attracted considerable attention only when some of his early compositions in Provençal were included in Li Prouvençalo (1852), an anthology of living poets edited by Roumanille. From then on his prestige increased rapidly. He was the most brilliant star of the pléiade that founded the Felibrige school (1854), i.e., the association that was to promote the linguistic and literary renaissance of southern France. His first important work, Mirèio (1859; Eng. trs., Mireio, 1867, Mirelle, 1868, Mirèio, 1872), established his reputation outside of Provence. This, a long poem in 12 cantos, a rustic idyl cast in the epic form, was a revelation with regard to the richness and poetry of both language and subject matter. It was crowned by the French Academy, later translated into the main European languages, and set to opera by Gounod. Mistral made several trips to Paris but resisted the lure of the capital, his main interest being now to direct the Felibrige toward the realization of a definite social and even political program. Limiting his activities to southern France, he presided over joint meetings of Provençal and Catalan poets, pleading for local and provincial rights. The Franco-Prussian War (1870-1871) modified somewhat the nature of his teaching. Feeling that the real threat to Provençal aspirations and traditions (Mistral is a traditionalist in the best sense of the word) was in the northeast rather than in Paris, he then focused his attention upon the so-called idée latine, the idea of uniting the Latin nations, regarded as constituting a "race" or rather group of people with common traditions and ideals, into a kind of peaceful confederation for the defense of Mediterranean civilization. In 1904 Mistral shared the Nobel prize in literature, for both his literary works and his contribution to philology. He used the proceeds of the prize to house the Museon Arlaten, a museum of ethnography which he had just founded and to the enrichment of which he was to devote the last 10 years of his life. When he died, he had been the leading spirit of the Felibrige for nearly 60 years.

Besides Mirèio Mistral's works in verse comprise two other poems of the epic type, Calendau (1867), symbolizing Provence in its struggle against centralization, and Lou Pouèmo dóu Rose (1897; Eng. tr., Anglore; the Song of the Rhone, 1937), depicting the life of the Rhone boatmen before the advent of the steamship, as well as two volumes of collected lyrical poems, a versified novelette, and a lyrical tragedy. His prose work includes Moun espelido; memòri e raconte (1906; Eng. tr., Memoirs of Mistral, 1907); a collection of speeches; and three volumes of Prose d'almanach (1926–1930), published posthumously with, opposite the Provençal text, a French translation from the pen of the editor. To these must be added a scholarly work, Lou Tresor dóu Felibrige; dictionnaire provençal-français embrassant les divers dialectes de la langue d'Oc (1876–1886), which is indeed a treasure of science and poetry, and a translation of Genesis into Provençal prose. His enormous correspondence has not yet been published, and many scattered poems and articles have still to be collected. Mistral's works are better known to the general public by their French titles, e.g., Mireille, Calendal, Mes Origines. The French translations accompanying the original are by the author himself.

While chiefly considered a Provençal patriot and poet of the soil, Mistral has also been studied as a reviver and defender of classical traditions. Served by a powerful genius and a keen artistic sense, he has been able to produce works with a strong and universal appeal, characterized by both perfection of form and the omnipresence of a noble ideal. The greatest qualities of these works are their natural simplicity and freshness and a joyous spirit and reasonable optimism that bear the stamp of their Provençal origin.

See: C. A. Downer, Frédéric Mistral, Poet and Leader in Provence (1901); P. Lasserre, Frédéric Mistral, poète, moraliste, citoyen (1905); J. Vincent, Frédéric Mistral; sa vie, son influence, son action et son art (1918); A. Thibaudet, Mistral, ou la République de soleil (1930); C. M. Girdlestone, Dreamer and Striver: The Poetry of Frédéric Mistral (1937).

A. V. R.

Moberg, Vilhelm (1898–, Swedish novelist and dramatist), ranks today as one of Sweden's most important novelists. He has been active also as a dramatist, several of his plays (notably Hustrun, 1929, The Wife; and Väld, 1933, Violence) having had considerable success on the Stockholm stage. Though Moberg left his native rural Småland in early youth to seek a literary career in the city, most of his fiction deals with the folk life of this south-central Swedish province. He attained literary eminence rather slowly, not reaching the heights until the late 1930's, after some 10 years of a persistent and somewhat miscellaneous literary apprenticeship, the most important products of which, aside from one or two of his dramas, were the series of Småland novels Raskens (1927), Långt från landsvägen (1929; Far from the Highway), and De knutna händerna (1930; The Clenched Hands). Though solid in construction and honest in their depiction of folk psychology and folk life, these novels did not rise much above the artistic and intellectual standards of many other Swedish novels of the day. Moberg's first great literary triumph came with his Knut Toring trilogy (1935–1939; Eng. tr., The Earth Is Ours, 1940). This novel, partly autobiographical, is a sober, penetrating account of how Knut Toring, who had left his native countryside and found success in the city, is driven by spiritual necessity in his maturity to return again to his native village and identify himself again with the way of life there. Though the earlier parts of the trilogy concentrate primarily on the psychological problem posed by Knut Toring's break with the traditions of his peasant ancestors and his subsequent longing to find the way back to these ultimate sources of his spiritual existence, the novel becomes increasingly concerned as it progresses with related general social, economic, and political questions of the day. The last volume of the trilogy has as its immediate background the ominous preliminaries of the Second World War on the Continent, and in it Moberg gives clear and ringing expression to his opposition to modern Continental totalitarian trends. In his next novel Rid i natt! (1941; Eng. tr., Ride This Night! 1943) Moberg takes his stand even more sharply against totalitarianism and in favor of democracy, though in outward form this novel goes back to the 17th century for its background and its action. In its art this last novel of Moberg's is spare, lean, and muscular, in rather marked contrast with the leisurely, detailed epic manner of most of Moberg's earlier work. The difference is doubtless to be accounted for by the burning actuality, the vital urgency of the theme developed so centrally in Rid i natt!

See: A. Gustafson, "'A Dream Worth Dying For—': The Price of Freedom in Vilhelm Moberg's Recent Novels," American-Scandinavian Review, XXX (1942), 296–307.

A. G.

Mockel, Albert (1866–1945, Belgian poet, critic, and fableist), was born near Liège and grew up there through school and university. As a "freshman" (1884) he founded a literary society and edited the Elan littéraire. Renamed the Wallonie (1886–1892), this review introduced symbolism to Belgium and for a time was the principal organ of the symbolist movement. The Wallonie inaugurated symbolist drama by first publishing Charles van Lerberghe's (q.v.) Les Fleurs (January, 1889), Maeterlinck's (q.v.) L'Intruse (January, 1890), and Mockel's ideas on the theatre; it published work of nearly all the symbolists, including Mallarmé, Valéry, and Gide (qq.v.), and ended by giving its name to the French provinces of Belgium. In the Wallonie Mockel developed a critical mind of astonishing clarity, subtlety, and balance, wrote out his rationale of free verse calling on poets to quit the alexandrine and use rythme intérieur, and made one of the best efforts of his generation to define the symbol. After 1890 Mockel lived in Paris, where he went regularly to Mallarmé's. He moved to Brussels in 1938 and the next year was president of the Académie Royale.

Propos de littérature (1894) is a mature statement of the ideas developed in Wallonie, applied to the poetry of Rénier and Vielé-Griffin (qq.v.). This book is perhaps the best source of symbolist aesthetics; its claim is that the symbolists restored music to poetry. In an age of impressionism Mockel used the method of comparison and analysis. Sir Edmund Gosse liked the sophisticated burlesque of Contes pour les enfants d'hier (1908) so much that he called Mockel a Belgian Ariosto. The two books on Verhaeren (q.v.) (1895, 1917) are a triumph of critical justice done to work not congenial to the critic. His little book on Mallarmé as "a hero" (1899) is definitive in taste and judgment.

Disciple of Wagner (q.v.), Mallarmé, and Schopenhauer, Mockel easily moved, both in theory and practice, from music as art to music as idea. In Chantefable un peu naïve (1891), of mixed prose, music, and verse (the music to be read, not played), the poet was so absorbed in theory that the technique became the real subject of the work. In his mature poetry, Clartés (1901) and La Flamme immortelle (1924), music is generalized as means of formal control: rhythm is lyric aspiration toward ideal being.

See: Tancrède de Visan, L'Attitude du lyrisme contemporain (1911); A. van Bever and P. Léautaud, Poètes d'aujourd'hui (1929).

J. M.

Moe, Ingebret Moltke (1859-1913, Norwegian folklorist and language reformer), born in Krødsherad, was the literary heir of the two great pioneer collectors of Norwegian folk traditions, his own father, Jörgen Moe, and the latter's fellow worker, Asbjørnsen. He started his activities as collector and editor as early as 1877 and became the leading folklorist of all the Scandinavian countries. In 1886 he was appointed professor of folk traditions at the University of Christiania and was the teacher and the industrious advisor of all the younger generations of literary scholars in Norway. With sovereign scholarship and fine poetical taste Moe revised the older editions of fairy tales and legends, espousing and leading the growing demands for a conscious approach to the vernacular, in forms and vocabulary and even more in popular phraseology. From the 1890's he became the real head, often behind the scenes, of the movement for a spelling reform of the traditional literary language, in the same direction, and for the amalgamation of the two literary forms fighting for supremacy. Thus he was the true father of the two spelling reforms of 1907 and 1917; he had worked practically for them, not only by his revisions of the fairy tales, but also by his collaboration in the two most important new primary readers for the schools appearing in the 1890's, that of Nordahl Rolfsen in Bokmaal and that of A. Austlid in Landsmaal. His own authorship, embracing brilliant studies of folk poetry and folk traditions, showed him not only an eminent scholar, a founder of severe methods in his researches, but a stylistic artist of high merit. His writings are available in Samlede skrifter (3 vols., 1925-1927; Collected Works).

See: A. Olrik, "Personal Impressions of Moltke Moe," in Folklore Fellow Communications, No. 17 (1915), 3-76.

H. K.

Molnár, Ferenc (1878-, Hungarian playwright, novelist, and short-story writer), was born in Budapest. He was reared in well-to-do surroundings; socially and economically he enjoyed advantages that few Hungarian writers have had. He studied law, but preferred journalism, the stage, and literature. He was first acclaimed as a clever and witty journalist and almost simultaneously as a gifted and effective playwright. He also acquired a prominent place in Hungarian literature as a novelist and as a writer of short stories. In 1908 he was elected to the Petőfi Társaság (Petőfi Society), thus receiving official approval of his literary worth. Molnár has been married three times. At present his home is in New York. Much of his time has been spent away from Hungary, yet whatever subject or atmosphere he explored as a writer and as a traveler, he has remained true to his Budapest background. He has never forgotten the outskirts of Budapest where the poor and the vagabonds live, nor the plutocratic society of his home town.

As a playwright Molnár is internationally famous. His plays are neither enriched nor handicapped by a respect for tradition. His heroes and heroines are apt to encounter difficulties, of course, but these difficulties as a rule are caused by a transgression of conventionalities or by an irrational approach to rational problems, and they rarely reveal those tragic or comic complications which one discerns in the works of the greatest playwrights. Molnár's overtones are apt to be sentimental or cynical. An innate taste has prevented him from being only an effect-seeker, has made him avoid the temptation merely to play tricks, and has enabled him at times in a piece like Liliom actually to suppress sentimentalism and to assert a real poetic sensitiveness. It is clear that Molnár has the urge of the genuine creator, but in most of his plays the mingling of realism and romanticism, sometimes assumed mysticism, leads to a heterogeneous sort of artistic experience, betraying an extraordinary aptitude for unexpected scenes, lively dialogues, manufactured excitement. Az ördög (1907; Eng. tr., The Devil, 1908), A testőr (1910; Eng. tr., The Guardsman, 1924), A hattyú (1920; Eng. tr., The Swan, 1922), Olympia (1928; Eng. tr., 1928)—to mention a few of his plays produced in the United States—are admirably constructed. However, Molnár's cleverness of composition is inclined to hurt his creative authenticity. The naïveté and poetry of Liliom (1909; Lily; Eng. tr., Liliom, 1921), though even in this play the sentiments are sometimes dubious, show secrets of Molnár's talent which he neglected or could not recapture in most of his other plays. The symbolism of the play is obvious: the need of goodness and affection is beautifully suggested. Molnár makes us keenly aware of the moods and problems of Liliom, the circus barker. The play is unpretentious, and its legendary atmosphere is within the boundaries of the credible because it is made poetically vivid and convincing. His other plays, despite their skilled technique, their ingeniousness, and in some instances their brilliancy, never rise to the level of supreme literary art. There are, in many other plays of Molnár, unsuspected or sudden echoes of his sincerity, but they cannot make us forget the mannerisms of the playwright, the lack of spontaneousness, the heights he misses.

As a novelist and as a writer of short stories

Molnár is, with one or two exceptions, less certain of his composition than in his plays. Yet his unusual ability is demonstrated in a juvenile novel entitled A Pál-uccai fiúk (1907; Eng. tr., The Paul Street Boys, 1927). In this novel, portraying a phase of Budapest student life, Molnár does not need cleverness in order to conceal bareness. The novel has epic attributes; it is simple and tragic, solid and humane; it has perspective. Most of his novels and stories which were translated into English, such as Egy gazdátlan csónak története (1901; Eng. tr., The Derelict Boat, 1926), Éva (1903; Eng. tr., 1926), Rabok (1907; Eng. tr., Prisoners, 1925), Zenélő angyal (1933; Eng. tr., Angel Making Music, 1935), were evidently written with the intention to entertain, but that is all. The fact that Molnár, besides The Paul Street Boys, wrote other delightful juvenile stories, e.g., Gyerekek (1907; Children) and Józsi (1902; Joe), suggests that he could have made better use of his ability had he remained in harmony with those creative instincts here expressed.

One of Molnár's best books has the unpretentious title Haditudósító naplója (1916; The Diary of a War Correspondent). This is the record of a keen observer, of an experienced journalist; but it is also the book of a warmhearted man whose gay and pensive reflections and interpretations of human goodness, decency, and solidarity in the midst of warfare (the First World War) show a passion of the spirit which, regrettably, one often painfully misses in his other works. Compared with some of his successful novels the diary of Molnár as a war correspondent is a modest offering, yet it radiates a humane glow, a forward-looking spirit not found in the hopelessness of these novels.

Molnár's singular ability must be admitted. He was an innovator on the Hungarian stage, and throughout his writings one senses a highly developed sensibility and sophistication.

See: A. Schöpflin, Magyar írók (1919); All the Plays of Molnár, with a foreword by David Belasco (1937).

J. R.

Molo, Walter von (1880—, German novelist), was born at Sternberg, Moravia. The formative years which he spent in Vienna are charmingly described in Der kleine Held (1934). After publishing a few modern novels, Molo gave up his engineering profession to live by his pen. In 1913 he moved to Berlin. The flamboyant titles of his popular Schiller novel in four volumes—Ums Menschentum, —Titanenkampf, Die Freiheit, Den Sternen zu (1912–1916)—indicate the author's determination to impress the reader with Schiller's heroic character. Molo depicts the dramatist's milieu in minutest detail, accentuating Schiller's heroic struggle with the petty misery of everyday life. On the other hand, the highly dramatic scenes in which the spiritual development of the hero is revealed in monologues and dialogues are of expressionistic intensity and compactness. However, neither here nor in his Kleist novel Geschichte einer Seele (1938) did Molo succeed in creating the spiritual atmosphere in which the genius must live. In his later novels Molo's style becomes even more dramatic, epic progress being expressed by a succession of forceful dialogues linked together by terse narrative passages. The author excels in portraying the Prussian character. In picturing one decisive day of battle, which at first appears hopeless but ends in a great triumph for Frederick the Great, Molo not only holds his reader's constant attention but also presents a complete picture of the king.

Molo's Holunder in Polen (1933) describes the plight of the Germans in the territory taken over by the Poles after the Versailles treaty. During those disheartening years following the First World War, many Germans found inspiration in the heroic qualities of great German leaders of the past whom Molo presented so energetically in Der Roman meines Volkes with its three parts (Fridericus, 1918; Luise, 1919; Das Volk wacht auf, 1924), in Mensch Luther (1928; Eng. tr., Brother Luther, 1929), in Ein Deutscher ohne Deutschland (1931), presenting the tragic story of the famous German economist Friedrich List, and in Eugenio von Savoy (1936).

See: Franz C. Munk, Walter von Molo; der Dichter und das Leben (1924).

E. Hof.

Mombert, Alfred (1872–1942, German poet and author of modern "myths"), is an outstanding literary personality not connected with any school or clique. Though little known to a wide public, he has been regarded by poets (Dehmel, q.v., Pannwitz, Benn, q.v., Carossa, q.v.) and critics (Moeller van den Bruck, K. H. Strobl, R. Benz, R. von Delius, Ernst Michel) as the outstanding German genius of his generation. Mombert was born in Karlsruhe, Baden, not far from the Rhine, the river which he loved so deeply and which became a kind of homely leitmotif in his most exalted and in his most sublime poetry. He studied law and philosophy at the universities of Heidelberg, Leipzig, Munich, and Berlin. After six years of law practice he retired from all public activities and devoted himself to a life of contemplation. He lived in Heidelberg, absorbed in his books and a collection of minerals which he brought home from trips all over Europe and northern Africa. He was an enthusiastic walker and alpinist, and the greater part of his poetry was written not in his study but while wandering about the country.

Mombert's first volume of verse, Tag und Nacht (1894), was influenced by the poets of German romanticism, but at the same time was inspired by a strange psychological insight, making the interior life transparent and mysticism a realistic affair. His next books, Der Glühende (1896), Die Schöpfung (1897), Der Denker (1901) and Die Blüte des Chaos (1905), describe the experiences of the human soul in pictures of emotional grandeur and in words of momentous rhythmic power. Many of these poems have been set to music by well-known composers.

In the years that followed, Mombert made the attempt to create a "myth," based on his personal philosophy. His most important work during this period is the trilogy Aeon (1907–1911), written in dramatic form. The first part concerns the relations between the world and the human soul, the second the dilemma of our ego placed between chaos and cosmos. The third part deals with the materialization of the human soul in the history of the nations. These dramatic poems with their awe-inspiring impressive dignity are not for the contemporary stage but are meant to be presented to audiences of the future, should the dramatic art ever return to its sacred and solemn beginnings. Of a proposed second trilogy, Aigla, the poet finished only two parts (1928–1931). During the same period two of his greatest lyrical works, Der Held der Erde (1919) and Atair (1925), were published.

In his seventh decade Mombert turned to a new realism. In Sfaira der Alte (1936) the wise old poet who is the central figure of this most beautiful book of verse does not have "imagination" and does not talk about things; he is simply the most sensitive and understanding of listeners. The trees, the mountains, the lakes, the parks, the old inns, talk to him. The world is pictured as it looks to them and not from the point of view of a reflective poet. The world of a stalactite cave does not appear through its impressions upon men but is realized, in a superb poem, through the emotions of the cave's gnome when human beings intrude upon his realm. Besides its high artistic value, this book made German history by the deep and tender love it expressed for Germany's landscape, culture, and music at the very time when the Nazis denied the Jew Mombert the right to call himself a German. Friends tried to persuade him to emigrate, but he wanted to die in his beloved homeland.

In the fall of 1940 he was, however, with other so-called "non-Aryans" of western Germany arrested and moved to the concentration camp of Gurs, France, where he fell seriously ill. In 1941 friends succeeded in having him released to reside in Switzerland. He died in Winterthur after celebrating his 70th birthday with his friends. He had finished and revised a second part (1941) to Sfira der Alte.

See: E. Michel, Der Weg zum Mythos (1919); R. Benz, Die Stunde der Musik, Vol. II (1927); F. D. Benndorf, Mombert; Geist und Werk (1932); H. Carossa, Führung und Geleit (1933).

M. F.

Momigliano, Attilio (1883–, Italian critic and literary historian), was born in Ceva and was graduated in literature and philosophy from the University of Turin in 1906. From 1919 to 1937 he was one of the editors of the Giornale storico della letteratura italiana and was literary critic for the Milanese newspaper Corriere della sera from 1926 to 1938. He held the chair of Italian literature in the universities of Catania, Pisa, and Florence from 1920 until 1938, when he was deprived of his post by the race laws against the Jews. In 1946 he was returned to his chair in Florence.

Much of Momigliano's best criticism is contained in the notes and commentaries which he published with his editions of Italian classics: Manzoni's lyrics (1914), Politian's poetry (1921), Alfieri's Saul and Mirra (1923). Whether in this form or in the separate essay and monograph, as in his Impressioni di un lettore contemporaneo (1928), Studi di poesia (1938), or the Saggio sull'Orlando Furioso (1928) and Giovanni Verga narratore (1923), Momigliano's critical effort is devoted exclusively to the work of literature itself. He shows his reader what to look for in the work in hand, how to be alone, one might say, with the work before him. His Storia della letteratura italiana (1936) keeps faith with this single intention, with the result that it is outstanding among histories of Italian literature after De Sanctis (q.v.). Momigliano makes no attack on the historical and positivist scholars of Italian literature, but he has never forgotten, as they too often did, that the values of a work of literature must be found within itself. His work as teacher and writer by this creed has taught a generation of Italians how to read better their classics.

C. S. S.

Moniz Barreto, Guilherme (1863–1899, Portuguese critic), was born in Goa, Portuguese India, the son of an army officer. He began to study in India and at the age of 17 went to Europe in order to finish his secondary education in Lisbon, where he also followed the Curso Superior de Letras. Very early in his life he began to read intensely, familiarizing himself with the most representative works of European literature, science and philosophy. In spite of his weak physical constitution he made his way through college by teaching philosophy and mathematics.

In 1887 was published in Paris his book Oliveira Martins, by which he became well known in Portuguese literary circles. The following year he started his contribution to O reporter of Lisbon. In "A crítica," one of the articles he wrote for that periodical (August 9, 1888), he expressed his personal viewpoints concerning the aims and methods of criticism. It was in O reporter too that his study on Eça de Queiroz (q.v.), among other important articles, was published (July 25, 1888). With "A literatura portuguesa contemporânea," a 40-page article on the Portuguese literature of his time, he opened the first number of the Revista de Portugal, which appeared in Oporto in 1889. For three years he wrote for that short-lived review, in which his contributions were issued either under his real name or under the pseudonym G. Côte Real. In 1893 he went to Paris and began to send articles to the Jornal do comércio.

Moniz Barreto was strongly influenced by German philosophical thought, especially by Hegel and Kant. As a critic he was a disciple of Taine (q.v.). "He taught me how to write," said he in the tribute he wrote for the Jornal do comércio on the occasion of the death of the famous French critic. He was particularly concerned with general ideas and had himself a great power of abstraction. His criticism is dominated by the spirit of system and by the concept of development. A believer in the hierarchy of causes and effects, he always endeavored to see in each literary work a link in the evolution of ideas and feelings of mankind. His views against specialization were expounded in his article "O especialismo," published in O reporter (August 16, 1888). His style was convincing, powerful, and precise. He has been regarded as the most outstanding critic of the literary production of the realistic school in Portugal. With the exception of his book on Oliveira Martins, all his studies are scattered in newspapers and periodicals of his time. In 1918, some years after his death, nine such articles were reprinted in the Revista de história, under the editorship of Fidelino de Figueiredo (q.v.), who wrote a brief introduction to them.

See: Manuel da Silva Gayo, Os novos; I, Moniz Barreto (1894); Fidelino de Figueiredo, "Materiais para a história da crítica literária em Portugal: Artigos de Moniz Barreto," in Revista de história, VII (1918), 245-276.

J. F.

Montale, Eugenio (1896-, Italian poet and critic), was born in Genoa and spent his youth in that city and on the neighboring Ligurian coast. When Italy entered the First World War, Montale left school to serve with the Italian Alpine troops. On his return to civil life he joined the editorial staff of an Italian publishing house; several years later he accepted the post of chief librarian of the celebrated Gabinetto Vieusseux in Florence. His coolness towards political developments in Italy may have had bearing on the fact that he was quietly relieved of this post, in spite of the luster he shed on it, before the beginning of the Second World War.

As a poet Montale has made an extremely significant and rich contribution to Italian letters, Ossi di Seppia (1925), his first published volume, immediately arrested the attention of a poetry-reading public which had retained its taste and interest through many years of predominantly anemic fare. They recognized the true sound and substance of poetry in these unconventional and often cryptic lyrics, and in a period of six years brought about the publication of augmented second and third editions of the little book. In 1931 a lyric entitled "La Casa dei doganieri" won Montale the Antico Fattore prize, yearly award of a group of Florentine artists. The prize poem, together with a small group of new lyrics and half a dozen drawings by artists of the Antico Fattore circle, was subsequently printed in a limited edition pamphlet. At this time a number of critical studies of Montale's work began to make their appearance, his reputation spread abroad, and translations and critical notes were published in both British and American periodicals (Criterion, June, 1928; This Quarter, April-

May, 1930; London Times Literary Supplement, June 21, 1934; Saturday Review of Literature, July 18, 1936). Foreign readers who watched for his work during this period found his signature under reviews and articles on contemporary French, Italian, and even American literature as well as under his own lyrics in the Gazzetta del popolo, Italia letteraria, Caratteri, and other periodicals. His translation of Shakespeare's The Tempest was announced before Italy entered the Second World War. In 1940 there appeared a new volume of poems, Le Occasioni, reprinted the following year with a few additions and changes.

Montale's poetry communicates a complex experience of external and inner worlds mutually illuminating one another. It is hard, intense, often difficult, with a predominantly tight, dry texture, but musically conceived and musically executed. Like T. S. Eliot, to whom he has often been compared, Montale uses prose rhythms as a basis for poetic structure, like Eliot he has a highly individual and memorable diction, like Eliot he weaves ideas and images with musical rather than prose logic. The comparison, however, should not be given much weight, for in essentials both of sound and sense the two poets are far apart. Montale is concerned above all with the dissidence between man's free hope and his prisoned fate. Life is seen as a chain of events whose links bind and determine one another—and, at the same time, as a spiritual motion away from compulsion, out of the logic of time and place, toward free creation and free vision. This theme is developed or touched upon in almost as many variations as Montale has occasions for poems. It is not stated baldly, but arises from the materials of experience or imagination. And perhaps the outstanding quality of Montale's poetry lies in just this ability to convey the abstract through the concrete and personal without destroying the direct suggestive power of the images. His whole concrete world, its motions and gestures, reflect or interpret an intellectual or emotional content. This is apt to yield strange effects—for the juxtaposition and interplay of things and forces are constrained only by the inner logic of the individual poem—but such strangeness is neither arbitrary nor constructed. Clearly the poet is working toward the crystallization of certain orienting themes in the forms from which he first divined those themes.

Naturally not all the poems in Montale's two volumes and pamphlet reach the same depth or complexity. Some do not pretend to be more than renderings of moments of acute perception. A few are too hermetic even for those readers who prefer the poet in his secret vein.

See: A. Consiglio, Studi di poesia (1934); L. Musco, "Montale," Movimento letterario, V-VII (1935).

I. B.

Montégut, Emile (1826–1895, French critic), was born at Limoges of a well-to-do bourgeois family. After graduating from the local lycée, he went in 1844 to Paris to study law, a purpose from which he was soon turned by the attractions of literature. In 1847, with an article on Emerson, he began a 43-year association with the Revue des deux mondes. During that long period he was an indefatigable contributor, ranging through English, American, and European literature, discussing political and social questions, and in his later years writing travel notes and art criticism. Although from 1857 he held the position of chief literary critic of the Revue, fame both during his life and after his death seemed to escape him. As a critic he was overshadowed at first by Sainte-Beuve and later by Taine, Renan, and finally Brunetière (q.v.). He received the ribbon of the Legion of Honor in 1865, but he was defeated in three attempts at election to the French Academy, in 1884, 1894, and, most humiliating of all, in 1895 by his former protégé, Brunetière. Nevertheless Montégut deserves a higher place than is generally accorded him. His original work suffers, no doubt, from its miscellaneous character and from the fact that it includes no sustained effort, his books being no more than collections of articles. Yet it has undeniable merit. In a period of literary transition, his criticism had the great virtue of common sense and intellectual flexibility; he was hardly ever wrong in his estimates of what was lasting and what only ephemeral. His tastes were catholic and his reading surprisingly wide. His essays on American literature, particularly on Emerson and Hawthorne, are remarkable considering their date of composition (those on Hawthorne in 1860 and 1864 are still in many ways unsurpassed); and it is unfortunate that they have never been collected. His studies in English literature, collected in Essais sur la littérature anglaise (1883), Ecrivains modernes de l'Angleterre (3 vols., 1886–1892), and Heures de lecture d'un critique (1892), range from Shakespeare, through Aubrey, Pope, and Sterne, to Tenny-son and George Eliot; his volumes on European literature, e.g., Types littéraires (1882) and Mélanges critiques (1888), are no less eclectic, treating as they do such diverse personalities as Dante, Cervantes, Goethe, Hugo, and Michelet. As a translator from the English he was also notable, in particular for his version of Emerson's Essays, Essais de philosophie américaine (1851), and of Shakespeare, Œuvres complètes de Shakespeare (10 vols., 1867–1873), for long the standard French text.

See: A. Laborde-Milaa, Emile Montégut (1922).

C. W., Jr.

Montherlant, Henry de (1896–, French novelist), is a brilliant and perverse writer. He will probably best be remembered as the one prominent French author who during the tragic occupation of his country in the Second World War welcomed and adulated the enemy pour le plaisir de trahir, to use his own words—for the sheer pleasure of betraying. Born in Paris of an old French family of Catalan origin, he received an excellent traditional education in a Catholic collège, saw service in the First World War and was wounded, and became one of the leading spokesmen of the restless, cynical, and exalted post-war generation. He made a gesture of abandoning literature in favor of life in 1925, traveled in Spain and North Africa for seven years, played an equivocal role as philosopher and prophet during the politically troubled pre-war years, and found in the outbreak of war and the enslavement of his country a complete vindication of the defeatism with which his whole work is saturated.

His first, semi-autobiographical, loosely constructed novels—La Relève du matin (1920), Le Songe (1925), Les Bestiaires (1926; Eng. tr., The Bullfighters, 1927), and Les Olympiques (1927)—deal with adolescence, war, bullfighting, and sport from the point of view of an aristocratic, highly egotistic, emotionally retarded person, revealing a strong influence of Chateaubriand and an even stronger influence of Barrès (q.v.). Preoccupation with tradition, death, and the affinities of blood and lust is at times pushed to the point of caricature. Hating bourgeois democracy with its coddling of the weak and the inept, despising women except as instruments of man's pleasure, exalting the "virile" virtues, professing a philosophy which is an amalgam of stoicism, the patrician code of the Roman Empire, Mithraic sun worship, Nietzscheism (see Nietzsche), and physical culture, he constantly skirts the edge of a nihilism which is perhaps best expressed in his Solstice de juin 1941 (1942).

As writer, as sheer craftsman, he stands above almost all his contemporaries. In Les Célibataires (1934; Eng. tr., Lament for the Death of an Upper Class, 1935, American title, Perish in Their Pride, 1936) and the four volumes of Les Jeunes Filles (1935-1940; Eng. tr., Young Girls, published with Pity for Women, 1937; The Demon of Good and The Lepers, published in one volume as The Lepers, 1940, American title, Costals & the Hippogriff, 1940) he shows an evolution from the almost oratorical style of his earlier work toward a hard, brilliant objectivity. Admirably disciplined, with a rare aesthetic integrity, he is a master of character delineation and possesses psychological insight, trenchant wit, and a grasp of the subtlety and complexity of contemporary social relationships. Costals, the hero of Jeunes Filles, detestable as he is, is one of the creations of modern fiction, and in this same work there is nothing to compare with his cruel dissection of modern woman.

See: Paul Archambault, Jeunes Maitres (1926); Haakon M. Chevalier, "The Monster, Marriage," review of Costals & the Hippogriff in Kenyon Review, III (1941), 246-249; Pierre Brodin, Les Ecrivains français de l'entre-deux-guerres (1942); Honor Tracy, "The Pleasures of Treason," Horizon, VIII (1943), 47.

H. M. C.

Morais, Wenceslau de Sousa (1854-1929, Portuguese prose writer), was born in Lisbon. He embarked upon a career in the Portuguese navy (1871) and eventually became a captain in that service. Then voyages to the Far East so fascinated him that he decided to abandon occidental life. He first obtained the post of Portuguese consul at Kobe, but later (1912) gave up this career too in order to penetrate better the life of the country. He made of Japan—landscape, life, and sentiments—the one theme of his writings and in this was the most characteristic representative of contemporary Portuguese "Japonism." This literary current is totally independent of the influence of Pierre Loti (q.v.) or of the Goncourts (q.v.); on the contrary it is to be considered as a continuation of a tradition in Lusitanian culture which begins in the 15th century. Morais—who lived in Japan twice as long as Lafcadio Hearn—transformed his life in a passionate effort to identify himself with the Japanese soul. In 1895 he published Traços do Extremo Oriente (Sketches from the Far East), in which the most characteristic outlines of life in Siam, China, and Japan are depicted with great serenity of vision. Japan occupies the greatest amount of space, and one senses the author's joy of discovery and his desire for immersion in that exotic world. The work which follows, Dai-Nippon (1897; Great Japan), reveals a traveler of an enlarged vision, engaged in an impassioned exegesis of the most individualistic traits of the Japanese spirit, in search of a happy fusion with this spirit. Later he published Cartas do Japão (1904-1905; Letters from Japan), in which he outlined for Portugal the Japanese point of view in the conflict with Russia. During this period, after his Buddhist marriage, his compenetration of the Nipponese soul is very profound. There appeared then O Culto do Chá (1905; The Cult of Tea) and Paisagens da China e do Japão (1906; Landscapes of China and Japan), in which the author continues, with a more controlled style, the interpretation of Dai-Nippon. Finally, in his old age, he revealed the melancholy of the occidental disillusioned after the impossible adventure of trying to assimilate himself with the inscrutable Orient. Bon-Odori em Tokushima (1918; Bon-Odori in Tokushima) and O-Yoné e Ko-Haru (1923; O Yoné and Ko Haru) are the fruits of this unhappy later mood. As late as 1926 he published Serões do Japão (Evenings in Japan) and Relance da alma Japonesa (Glances at the Japanese Soul). In 1928 appeared the third series of Cartas do Japão, and the following year the author died in Tokushima.

See: F. de Figueiredo, "O homem que trocou a alma," in Torre de Babel (1929); A. Pereira and O. César, Os amores de Wenceslau de Moraes (1937).

E. G. D.

Morales, Tomás (1885-1922, Spanish poet), was born in Moya, a little seacoast town on the Grand Canary. He studied medicine in Cádiz and Madrid and spent several years as a country doctor in Agaete, a town on the island of his birth. There he married and his children were born. He later moved to the capital, Las Palmas, where he became interested in politics. But his principal and unwavering vocation was poetry; this manifested itself in all the phases of his brief existence which, in turn, are reflected in his verses. His infancy is represented by a series of poems entitled "Vacaciones sentimentales," which are subjective in feeling and characterized by a delicate, sentimental prosaicness, typical of the post-modernist period and of the poetry of the Canary Islands. Then comes the poetry of the sea and the waterfront, in its commonplace, everyday aspects, intimate and sentimental in feeling too. And, finally, there is his more ambitious work, represented by the "Oda al Atlántico," the "Canto a la Ciudad Comercial," and other poems with a mythological vision of the sea, at once classic and modern; in these his great rhetorical gifts which stem from the modernists can be appreciated. This poetic production, varied, intense, personal, contained in two books, Poemas de la gloria, del amor y del mar (1908) and Las rosas de Hércules (1919-1922), has the unmistakable flavor of the region from which he comes and has had a strong influence on the young and gifted poets of the Canary Islands. At the same time its appeal is universal, and its influence is perceived on other poets of Spain and America. All this has combined to make him, it may be claimed, one of the most brilliant examples of the post-modernist poets of Spain.

See: E. Díez-Canedo, review of Poemas de la gloria, del amor y del mar in Lectura, Año VIII (Madrid, 1908), Tomo II, pp. 315-318, and article in Pluma, III (Madrid, 1922), 425-430.

F. de O.

Morand, Paul (1888-, French novelist, diplomat, and writer of travel books), was born in Paris. He attended the Institution Sainte-Marie and in 1899 entered the Lycée Carnot. Having been sent to England every summer to study English, in 1908 he was permitted by his father to spend a full year at Oxford. Upon his return to France he decided to follow a diplomatic career. His military service completed, he entered the Ecole Libre des Sciences Politiques. After a short stay in the Department of the Protocol, Morand was sent first to England (1913-1916), then to Rome (1917) and to Madrid (1918). During the years 1919-1925 Morand was engaged at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Paris, and it was then he began to write. His first publications—Lampes à Arc (1919) and Feuilles de température (1920)—were collections of short poems. Tendres Stocks (1921) contained three short stories about three young women, drifting in wartime London. Ouvert la nuit (1922) and Fermé la nuit (1923) brought Morand instantaneous fame. Lewis et Irène (1924), a full-length novel, was not an unqualified success. L'Europe galante (1925) presented the same themes as the Nuits, but in a more daring key.

In 1925 the Ministry of Foreign Affairs sent him to Siam to assume charge of the legation in Bangkok. To reach his new post, where he remained only a short time, Morand traveled half way round the world. For several years thereafter he spent a large part of his time traveling and devoted the rest to writing. Some of his books were accounts of his travels, Rien que la terre (1926), Le Voyage (1927), Paris-Tombouctou (1928), Hiver caraïbe (1929). Others were studies of various human groups, the yellow race in Bouddha vivant (1927), the black in Magie noire (1928), the American people in Champions du monde (1930). In 1932 Morand became the head of the official Tourist Bureau in France. His books since then have been mostly of four kinds: travel books, such as Flèche d'Orient (1931), Air indien (1932); studies of cities, New York (1929), London (1931), Bucharest (1935); political works, such as 1900 (1931), France-la-Doulce (1934), Rond-Point des Champs-Élysées (1935); autobiographical works, such as Papiers d'identité (1931), Mes Débuts (1933). Many of Morand's works have been translated into English.

See: G. E. Lemaître, Four French Novelists (1938).

P. B.

Moravia, Alberto (1907-, pseud. of Alberto Pincherle, Italian novelist), born in Rome, has had a rather precocious literary career. His first novel, Gli Indifferenti (1929; Eng. tr., The Indifferent Ones, 1932), brought him immediate fame and made him one of the most discussed figures among the younger writers in Italy. The chief characteristic of Gli Indifferenti is a grim, hopeless realism which seems to be, on the whole, the fundamental note of Moravia's artistic temperament. The personages of this book could be divided into two types: one, unconscious and superficial, lets life overcome him, accepts weakness and compromise, seeming not to know any better; the other looks at his destiny with critical, pessimistic eyes, lacks faith in himself as in others, indulges in psychological self-examinations and confessions, but does not find in himself the energy to escape toward a broader and lighter way of life. The solution to the ethical problems of the characters is thus either negative or pessimistic. This first novel, which struck the critics as a revelation of a powerful and original talent, nonetheless follows the familiar pattern of psychological realism, showing Moravia's derivation from French réalisme together with the influence of modern Italian writers such as Pirandello, Tozzi, Svevo (qq.v.).

A book of short stories (La Bella Vita, 1935), a novel (Le Ambizioni sbagliate 1935; Eng. tr., Wheel of Fortune, 1937), and a book of romanzi brevi (short novels, L'Imbroglia, 1937) display the development of Moravia's inspiration; he continues on the road followed in his first book. Le Ambizioni sbagliate seems a deeper novel than Gli Indifferenti. The author seems to have followed the example of the Russian novelists, mainly Dostoevski (q.v.), in the analysis of the slow and inevitable progress of a protagonist toward crime and self-destruction as well as in the technique of painting a constantly somber and haggard atmosphere. Shortcomings of the book are prolixity and a useless repetition of scenes, dialogues, and monologues which are not necessary either to the understanding of the characters or to the development of the plot. The most beautiful pages of Moravia may be found perhaps in some of his short stories where a limited, narrow world is usually painted with a deliberate crudeness. An example of the melancholic cruelty of Moravia's technique may be found in the short story "Inverno di malato," in which the loneliness and utter misery of a sick adolescent are expressed with a sensitive pen. In other stories, e.g., "Delitto al circolo di Tenris," the somber realism degenerates into a morbid love of the sadistic and the grotesque.

See: G. A. Borgese, "Moravia," Corriere della sera, July 21, 1929; P. Pancrazi, Scrittori italiani del novecento (1934), pp. 313-17.

E. C.

Moréas, Jean (pseud. of Iannis Papadiamantopoulos, 1856-1910, French poet), was born in Athens, where his family was prominent in Greek military and judicial affairs. A French governess inspired young Moréas with a love of French literature which was to dominate his life. When he was allowed to make a European tour as preparation for the study of law, Moréas went to Paris (1872) and was straightway captivated by the metropolis. Returning to Athens, he became increasingly obsessed by love of literature, compiled an anthology of modern Greek verse, and made translations from French and German. In 1878 his first volume of poetry appeared. It contained both Greek and French poems and bore the title Tourterelles et vipères. Moréas returned to Paris in 1879, ostensibly to study law, but immediately he began frequenting literary cafés and neglected to study. First identified with the "Hydropathes" and the

"Zutistes," he wrote several poems which were published in the Nouvelle Rive gauche. His volume of verse Les Syrtes (1884), in which the influence of Baudelaire and Verlaine (qq.v.) is visible, earned him the esteem of the young poetic generation. The year 1886 saw the appearance of his volume Les Cantilènes, of two novels written in collaboration with Paul Adam (q.v.), and of a manifesto (in the supplement of Figaro on September 18) which defended the symbolists against the accusations of the conservatives. A new manifesto, which appeared as the preface of Le Pèlerin passionné (1891), suggests the trend toward classical inspiration which his poetry was to assume. Soon he had founded the Ecole Romane, with Charles Maurras (q.v.), Maurice du Plessys, Raymond de la Tailhède, and Ernest Raynaud as disciples. This school called for the return of classic forms, for the inspiration of the Middle Ages, of Ronsard, and of the 17th century. It sought to discredit the romanticists, the Parnassians, and the symbolists, all of whom it accused of breaking the Gallic tradition. In practice this meant the abundant use of mythological references, of archaic words, and of traditional poetic forms. The vices and virtues of this new poetic manner are best demonstrated in Moréas's Enone au clair visage (1893) and Eriphyle (1894). By virtue of his personality, of his manifestoes, and of these books, Moréas became the recognized leader of a school of poetry. He was encouraged by Léon Deschamps, the director of Plume, from whose presses appeared Les Stances (Livres I-II, 1899; Livres III-VI, 1901). In 1903 was published Iphigénie, a drama in verse which closely followed Euripides in action and content, but which showed originality in images and metrics. Moréas also wrote prose works, of which the best is perhaps Esquisses et souvenirs (1908). Ten years after the death of Moréas appeared the Septième Livre des Stances.

Moréas's literary reputation is not yet firmly established. Blind adoration from his disciples is offset by accusation that he was only a pedantic and servile imitator. It is certain that his personality had much to do with his position as chef de file. A great part of his existence was spent in Parisian cafés where his commanding presence, his incisive voice, his flashing monocle and black mustache, usually dominated a group of admiring young poets. He appears to have been exceedingly vain, but neither to his friends nor in his verse did he yield the secrets of his emotional life. Perusal of his successive volumes of poetry give the impression of a man who suffered much and who became increasingly melancholy and disillusioned, but these are the overtones rather than the matter of his verse. His career was an evolution toward clarity, order, and restraint; had he not been so faithful in imitation of Ronsard and Malherbe, so prone to weight his poems with mythological references, he might have gained a surer reputation. Even detractors will admit his fine sense of rhythm and his ability to lift the commonplace to poetic level.

See: E. Raynaud, Jean Moréas et les Stances (1929); R. Georgin, Jean Moréas (1930); R. Niklaus, Jean Moréas, poète lyrique (1936).

W. K. C.

Moreno Villa, José (1887-, Spanish poet), belongs to the moment of transition from traditional to "pure" poetry, which uses image, metaphor, and allusion, not for the logical expression of ideas, but to dissolve old associations and create new realities stripped of all but purely poetic values. He was born in Málaga and educated there by the Jesuits. In 1904 he went to Germany to prepare himself for a business career, but he soon found that he was more interested in literature and art. In 1910, after his return to Spain, he began the study of archaeology and architecture, which was to have a profound influence on his writing. After five years (1916-1921) of editorial work, he became a librarian, first in the instituto of Gijón, then in the University of Madrid. While practicing his profession, he has edited the magazine Arquitectura, lectured on architecture and the fine arts, and exhibited his own paintings. He has written plays and edited classics (Juan de Valdés, Diálogo de la lengua; Lope de Rueda, Teatro; José de Espronceda, Obras). In Pruebas de Nueva York, which appeared in 1927, are recorded his impressions of a trip to America made in that year.

Garba (1913), Moreno Villa's first book of poetry, is southern in its clarity and grace. It is full of acceptances, of the passing of youth, the limitation of human effort, the triumph of the commonplace. Beginning with his second book, El pasajero (1914), the poet enters upon a course of exploration and expostulation, further revealed in the titles of later works—Luchas de "Pena" y "Alegría" (1915), Evoluciones (1918), Carambas (1931), Puentes que no acaban (1933), and Salón sin muros (1936). El pasajero reflects his interest in medieval life and art. Its evocations of old Castilian towns and types recall the work of Antonio Machado (q.v.) and others of the Generation of '98. "La selva fervorosa," however, is a spearhead into new realms of poetic sensibility. It is a hymn of human aspiration and despair and divine consolation which might well have been conceived among the stone figures of mingled grotesqueness and beauty crowded under the arches of a Gothic cathedral. It suggests, by a wealth of striking imagery, the mysterious thrust of the unrecognized and uncoordinated thoughts and sensations which struggle constantly within the tangle of man's consciousness. Evoluciones, containing both prose and poetry, offers further interpretation of medieval art in "Caprichos románicos" and "Caprichos góticos" and in the "Bestiario," whose animal portraits contain flashes of sharp observation and irony.

Colección (1924), Jacinta la Pelirroja (1929), and the three series of Carambas have strong vanguard tendencies, including touches of surrealism; "Cuadro cubista" might well be a poetic transcription of Salvador Dalí. The later books, Puentes que no acaban and Salón sin muros, express unmistakable disillusion with life and art. The poet "devours his life, question by question." He finds the world a mass of absurdities, the line between reality and fantasy impossible to draw. Words seem to him "fragments of broken crystal which cut the truth." Here, as elsewhere, some deep denial in his nature bars him from full allegiance to any spiritual or artistic creed. He remains on the periphery.

See: A. Valbuena Prat, La poesía española contemporánea (1930); G. Diego, Poesía española (1932; new volume, 1934); F. de Onís, Antología de la poesía española e hispanoamericana, 1882-1932 (1934).

D. K. A.

Moretti, Marino (1885-, Italian novelist, short-story writer, and poet), was born in Cesenatico, Romagna. After a few years of schooling at Ravenna and Bologna, he went to Florence to study acting. In Via Laura (1931) Moretti tells how he turned to poetry when he discovered his inaptitude for the theatre. In spite of his vigorous objections to the title of typical representative of the "crepuscular" school, there can be no doubt that he inaugurated his literary career by adhering to that group of five or six poets (Corazzini, Gozzano, Martini, Palazzeschi, qq.v., Civinini) to whom the critics later attached the label of crepuscolari. His first volume of poetry was published in 1905. He followed that with five more, of which Poesie scritte col lapis (1910) and Poesie di tutti i giorni (1911) are the best. Poesie (1919) is the author's own selection of his best poems. By his own admission it was the Myricae of Pascoli (q.v.) which made him react against the sensual and refined aestheticism of D'Annunzio (q.v.). And, indeed, he reminds us of a Pascoli on a small scale, disillusioned and ironically conscious of his own poor world and prosaic destiny. His attention is focused on the petty facts of everyday life and the most elementary sensations, which he envelops in the gray tints of ennui and the minor-key tones of a despairing sadness. A sense of fatigue and desolation pervades everything. Some relief is afforded by a bit of laughter lurking now and then under the general crepuscular melancholy.

Dissatisfied with this prose-poetry, Moretti turned to the short story and wrote four volumes, the most notable being I Lestofanti (1909) and I Pesci fuor d'acqua (1914). The action is laid almost invariably in the provinces, and the characters are vivid types taken for the most part from the working and lower middle classes and drawn with realistic and psychological directness. Life is painful and meaningless, and the hidden motives underlying human actions are an irrational and incoherent mass of base impulses. There is also a residue of vulgarity and sensuality, which the author fortunately abandoned later.

Barberina, the heroine of his first novel, Il Sole del sabato (1916), was destined to be the basic type for several subsequent novels. He offered this poor, ignorant girl almost as a challenge to the glamorous heroines of D'Annunzio and Ibsen (q.v.). An exploited and bruised stepchild of life, possessing simple human qualities, she bore patiently the brutality of selfish and vulgar men; and from her long-suffering tale of woe and submission, she learned to love, pray, suffer, and accept life as a duty. With this beautiful example of moral courage Moretti had succeeded in destroying the aimlessness of the crepuscular attitude. From now on his sympathies are almost all for feminine characters. The fundamental sense of sadness, which is the core of his work, comes from an inner striving of these creatures toward a happiness which life invariably denies in one way or another. The heroines of Guenda (1918), La Voce di Dio (1920), Nè bella nè brutta (1921), I Due Fanciulli (1922), though drawn from various walks of life, are basically all sisters in search of an illusory happiness. In I Puri di cuore (1923) and Il Trono dei poveri (1928) the protagonists are men, but the suffering is the same. In L'Isola dell'amore (1920) Moretti departs from the realistic descriptions of Romagna and weaves a charming fantasy around a luxurious institute for old maids. Whatever the fantastic atmosphere and the ironic and humoristic tone, the fundamental lesson remains the same: happiness is an illusion and suffering is real. The perfect example of humility, sacrifice, and obedience is found in Clarice, the poor servant girl of Il Segno della croce (1926). All these humble and passive people are commendable, to be sure, but their philosophy of nonresistance is a cheerless one. The other characters are rapidly sketched accessory figures. Moretti seems to have sensed the reader's justifiable impatience with this lack of contrast and reaction, and in L'Andreana (1935) he creates a character who refuses to succumb completely to life and finally does resist circumstances. This is probably his best novel, a solidly constructed story in which the secondary characters are better delineated and the monotonous gray gives way to the lively colors of desires and instincts let loose. Between novels he wrote innumerable short stories. His prose style expresses itself in a direct, honest, and simple language. The inspiration of his art is preeminently Christian with its message of love for the humble, the defenseless, and the sensitive, adrift in the inevitable evil of the world.

In addition to his creative works, Moretti has written five volumes of reminiscences and autobiographical notes. Mia Madre (1924) and Il Romanzo della mamma (1924) emphasize the important part that his mother, a humble and kindly elementary school teacher, played in his life and art.

See: F. Cazzamini-Mussi, Marino Moretti (1931); P. Pancrazi, Scrittori italiani del novecento (1934), pp. 61-67; F. Casnati, "Moretti, laico della misericordia," Nuova Antologia, CCCCIV (1939), 190-209.

J. F. De S.

Morgenstern, Christian (1871-1914, German poet-philosopher), admired for his profound spirituality and whimsical humor, was born in Munich, the son and grandson of well-known artists. His philosophical mind was early attracted to Schopenhauer, but in 1893, when Morgenstern's tubercular condition confined him to his room for months, Nietzsche (q.v.) first exerted on him the overpowering influence which was to dominate his student years in Berlin. Convinced of the boundless power of the human mind, he expressed his spiritual elation in humorous dithyrambic fantasies in Phanta's Schloss (1895), in which cosmic, mythological, and modern concepts are playfully combined. Morgenstern's lyric talent, revealed also in two subsequent collections, Auf vielen Wegen (1897) and Ich und die Welt (1898), was recognized by his naturalistic colleagues in Berlin, and Morgenstern was asked to translate Ibsen's (q.v.) poems and dramas in verse. This he accomplished in the following years to the great satisfaction of the dramatist. Ein Sommer (1899), poems written in Norway, shows a family heritage in the artist's growing appreciation of the physical beauty of this earth. About this time medical examination revealed the certainty of his early death. In his ceaseless search for the meaning of life, with accompanying periods of spiritual helplessness and doubt, he found inspiration in Paul de Lagarde's writings. Beside the impressionistic daintiness of the "silken" verse of Morgenstern, there is in Melancholie (1906) the inexorable seriousness of his longing and the awareness of participation in a spiritual realm not yet clearly discerned. The grotesque humor of his Galgenlieder (1905) and Palmström (1910), which established the poet's widespread popularity among the sophisticated, is just another way of liberating the mind from the world of matter. Morgenstern's "superior nonsense" assigns human attributes and functions to everything, even mere words and sounds. Grotesque scenes are evolved from a literal interpretation of conventional phrases. New objects are created by analogy of mere words, ridiculing the assumption that name and thing are identical.

In the winter of 1905-1906 when Morgenstern studied Buddha, Dostoevski (q.v.), and Meister Eckhart, he experienced, through the Gospel of St. John, the crowning realization of many years of meditation: that God, immanent in the world and evolving through it, reaches his highest stage of consciousness in the spiritual man (I and the Father are one). When God becomes conscious of himself in us, all suffering in the world becomes our suffering, time and eternity become one. In the lyrics of his Einkehr (1910) we sense the spirit of harmony and gratitude of one who has found his spiritual self, but also the subdued pain of one who is gradually disengaging himself from this physical plane. Morgenstern had reconciled himself to the idea that he must finish his way in solitude when, in 1908, he found through his love for Margarete Gosebruch, who was to become his wife, a companionship and new horizons which transfigured the last years of his life. The sonnets and songs of Ich und du (1911) are among the purest and loftiest poems of love in all German literature. Morgenstern became acquainted with Rudolf Steiner through Margarete Gosebruch and seemed admirably prepared to understand Steiner's anthroposophical science. Here he learned that the evolution of the spiritual man was, to be sure, the innermost meaning of this earth, but that man is not the highest stage of God's consciousness. There are, he was told, above him hierarchies guiding man's cosmic evolution as he passes through his earthly reincarnations. The highest cosmic spirit for this earth is Christ. The final phase of Morgenstern's religious development is reflected in his last collection of poems, Wir fanden einen Pfad (1914), dedicated to Rudolf Steiner; they rank with the best that George (q.v.) and Rilke (q.v.) have produced. Two of Morgenstern's posthumous works constitute a priceless record of the poet's inner development and wisdom, a book of aphorisms and notes, called Stufen (1918), and Mensch Wanderer (1927), a collection of hitherto unpublished poems.

See: Michael Bauer, Christian Morgensterns Leben und Werk (1933).

E. Hof.

Móricz, Zsigmond (1879-1942, Hungarian novelist, short-story writer, playwright), was born in Csécse. He received his elementary and secondary education in Debrecen. As a young man he had little chance to learn and practice his craft; for a number of years he did routine work for Az Újság (News), a Budapest daily, and for popular historical and geographical books. Nyugat (West) discovered Móricz when he submitted a profoundly moving short story, "Hét krajcár" (Seven Pennies). Debrecen, a predominantly Calvinistic community, the city of Móricz's youth, is in the great Hungarian plains; his own village and the vicinity of this town brought Móricz in contact with wealthy and poor peasants, with farmhands, herdboys, and cattle ranchers. These people and their experiences became the central theme of his brutally realistic art. Later he added other characters to the gallery of his types—small-town tradesmen and artisans, city and county officials, members of the Calvinistic clergy, intellectuals living in villages, ladies and strumpets, and dissipating or unhappy members of the landed aristocracy. This list was completed with historical characters, remote from the contemporary scene but not remote from the fundamental problems of Hungary. Móricz is apt to be sordid in his extreme realism, yet he is also concerned with the lighter side of Hungarian life and can be sincerely humorous.

Móricz is a powerful writer, with an exceptional insight into the rural and provincial realities of his country. He has been accused of exaggerating ugliness and ignoring decency. The truth is that he resented the illusions of the neo-romanticists who preceded him in the description of the village; he was not a propagandist for filth and pauperism but a creative artist and observer opposing such conditions. Móricz is never frivolous, yet sometimes he seems unconvincing because he accentuates spiritual darkness, unfairness, viciousness, vulgarity. His constantly returning theme is frenzied sensuality; sometimes he portrays this psychological and physiological condition in a manner that suggests erotic caricature.

He is widely read as novelist and short-story writer, but a less popular and indeed less capable playwright. At the 25th anniversary of his literary activities his collected works were published. Of his novels Sárarany (1910; Golden Mud) is an uncompromisingly frank work; the hero, Dani Turi, is the son of the people, strong, attractive, a peasant Don Juan, outlawed by his own surroundings. Fáklya (1925; Eng. tr., The Torch, 1931) is the story of a young Calvinist minister, the personification of good will, and of his plight in the village where he preaches the gospel of the Lord. Several other novels and stories of Móricz have been published abroad. Légy jó mindhalálig (1922; Be Good Until You Die) is a fine juvenile story. His short stories, Magyarok (1926; Hungarians), are penetrating studies and reports of Hungarian types. Erdély (1935; Transylvania), a trilogy, represents Móricz as a historical novelist. Sári Bíró (1910; Judge Sari) and Buzakalász (1924; Sheaf of Wheat) are his best plays.

As a social realist and as a master of the Hungarian language Móricz ranks among the foremost Hungarian writers. He was inclined to be a careless craftsman; in his later years he was prolific at the expense of artistic quality. Nevertheless his fiction indicates progress in an honest interpretation of Hungarian life.

See: A. Schöppflin, Magyar írók (1919); J. Gassner, Masters of the Drama (1940); J. Reményi, "Zsigmond Móricz, Hungarian Realist," American Slavic and East European Review, Vol. IV, Nos. 8-9 (1945), 165-181.

J. R.

Morselli, Ercole Luigi (1882-1921, Italian dramatist), born at Pesaro, lived from his seventh to his twenty-first year at Florence.

where he studied medicine for two years and also literature, but without receiving any degree. He received mental cultivation and stimulation through contact with such minds as those of Papini and Prezzolini (qq.v.). Morselli loved adventure and in 1903 set sail from Genoa with his friend F. Valerio Ratti. After traveling to Cape Town, and spending some time in South America (enlisting to fight against Saravia's army in the civil war in Uruguay) and in England, he turned homewards "the most penitent and happy of prodigal sons."

Morselli's first volume of prose, Favole per i re d'oggi (1909), is mild and suffused with a melancholy resignation; there is also a note of derision of contemporary morals. These "little myths" may be considered an anticipation of his two great plays. The myth is the most appropriate means of expression of the inner Morselli, of his delicate and sweetly lyric poetic nature, and provides the unity of his work. His writing is an unmatched phenomenon in Italian literature in that he occupies the unique position of an Italian who had a scant knowledge of Greek and only a smattering of Latin but was a classicist in that spirit which was his by national inheritance. His Orione (1910) and Glauco (1919) are about mythical heroes. Orione accomplishes gigantic feats: he hunts down wild beasts, insults gods and women, engages in debauchery, derides everything and everybody, even Mother Earth who produced him from a divine seed. Then, the end: a tiny scorpion aroused by the same offended Mother Earth kills the great Orione. Glauco is the story of a fine young man who believed in the reality of the only joy granted to mortals, that of a happy home. He leaves the trustworthy love of his Scilla, to travel, to become a king and a god. But landing again at the beach whence he had set sail, he no longer finds his beloved; Scilla, having waited so long and faithfully, has slain herself. Again is heard the lament on the vanity of glory, the futility of a power which cannot revive Glauco's true love who is dead, and the lost reality of human joy. Even the much desired oblivion of death is denied him: "Ah! Cursed be my Glory! Now I see . . . I am immortal!" Glauco then has himself bound to the body of his dearest one, with whom he could no more be united in life and, with her, cast into the sea from where his bewailing may reach mortal ears evermore. Glauco is a defense of the family hearth, an attack upon the much praised "liberty" of the romanticists of the end of the 19th century.

Like his own heroes. Morselli won glory

when it was too late. Having endured the hardships of poverty all his life, in the moment of his triumph with Glauco on the Italian stage he was already very ill. The great success of this drama led to an interest in his earlier works, and he seemed to have a wonderful future in prospect. But he died in March, 1921, in Rome, of tuberculosis.

See: R. Rugani, Ercole Luigi Morselli (1931); S. D'Amico, Il Teatro italiano (1932).
H. E. P.

Multatuli (pseud. of Eduard Douwes Dekker, 1820–1887, Dutch essayist and novelist) was born at Amsterdam, the son of a captain of the Dutch merchant marine. When he was 18 years old, he accompanied his father to Java, where he was given employment in the office of the government comptroller at Batavia. He was quickly promoted and subsequently transferred to the administrative branch of the colonial service. He rose in rank to become secretary of Menado, North Celebes (1848), and three years later was made assistant resident of Amboina, an island of the Moluccas. In 1852 he was given a two-year furlough and returned to Holland. In 1856 he was appointed assistant resident of Lebak, a residency of Java. Here it came to his notice that the native prince impoverished his own people by systematic extortions, and he promptly reported the potentate's misdeeds to his superiors. But the form and the manner of his protest were not approved by his superiors in Batavia. Instead of the praise he expected, he was given a reprimand and temporarily relieved of his office, whereupon Dekker asked for his honorable discharge from the service.

He returned to Europe and settled for a time in Brussels. There in a small inn, Au Prince Belge, he wrote his autobiographical novel Max Havelaar (1860; Eng. trs., 1868, 1927), which established his fame as an author and inaugurated a movement for reforms in the methods and practices of colonial administration in the East Indies. The novel bore the curious subtitle De Koffie-veilingen der Nederlandsche Handelmaatschappij (The Coffee Auctions of the Netherlands Trading Company). The book was a protest against the commercialism of the Dutch bourgeoisie, which for the sake of financial profits let the Javanese people slave in the coffee plantations and suffer extortion from their princes. He drew an immortal caricature of that bourgeoisie in the person of Batavus Droogstoppel (Drystubble), coffee broker of Amsterdam, who is one of the chief characters in the novel. In 1862 appeared Minnebrieven (Love Letters), a correspondence between the author and Fancy, his Muse, containing some of his best parables and satirical tales. In 1862 he brought out a volume entitled Ideën, the first of a series of seven, containing a multifarious collection of aphorisms, paradoxes, parables, essays, and fairy tales. The chapters of his uncompleted novel De Geschiedenis van Woutertje Pieterse (The Story of Walter Peterson) are scattered through the pages of some of these volumes. They were edited as a consecutive story by his widow in 1890 (Eng. tr., Walter Pieterse; a Story of Holland, 1904). He described this whimsical story as a "battle of true poesy against the mendacious prose that offers us the world as truth." Its hero is Multatuli's other self, an honest, romantic, ingenuous boy whose idealism clashes with his petty bourgeois environment. His widow also edited his Brieven, Bijdragen tot de Kennis van zijn Leven (1890; Letters, Contributions to the Knowledge of His Life), in which he bared his soul more frankly than any Hollander of his age would have dared or cared to do. Dekker had married, in Java, Everdine Hubertine, Baroness van Wijn-gaarden, who bore him two children. But his infidelities made life with him unendurable, and she left him in 1872. He remarried after her death and spent his closing years with his second wife in Germany. He chose to live outside his native country, where he felt himself insufficiently appreciated. German romanticism appealed to him, and in Germany he found a final home. He died in Nieder-Ingelheim in 1887.

Multatuli was beyond question the most gifted and most original author of his generation in Holland, and the only one whose writings influenced the movement of the so-called "Eightiers" and De Nieuwe Gids. His revolutionary temper was akin to theirs. They shared his contempt for Holland's bourgeoisie, its narrow-mindedness and smugness; they resumed his onslaught on the stereotyped diction of contemporary poetry.

See: A. J. (i.e., Lodewijk van Deyssel), Multatuli (1891); P. C. Molhuysen and P. J. Blok, eds., Nieuw Nederlandsch biografisch Woordenboek, I (1911), 697–702; D. H. Lawrence, "Introduction," in Multatuli, Max Havelaar, tr. by W. Siebenhaar (1927); C. E. du Perron, De Man van Lebak (1937); A. J. Barnouw, The Dutch; a Portrait Study of the People of Holland (1940), pp. 176–182.

A. J. B.

Münchhausen, Börries, Baron von (1874–1945, German poet and essayist), born in the quaint city of Hildesheim, was doctor of civil and canon law, honorary doctor of philosophy, canon of the Protestant cathedral of Wurzen, captain of the Saxon Guard Cavalry Regiment of the Reserve, senator of the German Akademie der Dichtung, etc., etc. He was not, however, a lineal descendant of the distinguished soldier and world-renowned fabulist Hieronymus von Münchhausen (1720–1797), who left no heirs, though as the head of the widely ramifying Münchhausen clan that traces its descent from one Rembertus von Münchhausen he had in his keeping at Schloss Windischleuba all the family treasures, including the souvenirs of the famous Lügen-Baron. As interesting as a work of fiction are his Geschichten aus der Geschichte einer alten Geschlechtshistorie (1934), in which he tells of those members of the family who have made it important in the annals of Hanover and two of whom have made it known and loved in two hemispheres.

The poet published his first poems, Gedichte, in 1897 and became famous with his sonorous Juda (1900) and his first Balladen (1901). Das Balladenbuch (1924) contains all the ballads, Das Liederbuch (1928) all the other poems which had appeared previously in numerous collections. His Fröhliche Woche mit Freunden (1922) and Die Garbe (1933) contain collections of essays filled with interesting information about the poet, showing the influence that he exerted and that was exerted upon him and setting forth much wholesome appreciation and criticism by an eminently sane practitioner of the art he is judging.

Münchhausen's name is most closely associated with the German ballad. A century and a quarter after Bürger and the Hainbund and while Münchhausen was yet a student at Göttingen, he and a group of his friends infused new life into the form. Acknowledging Strachwitz as his starting point, Münchhausen gave to the ballad a new content, an aristocratic tone which helped to resolve the cacophony of naturalism. This he accomplished as much by his delightful humor (especially in the ballads grouped under the headings "Schwänke und Schnurren" and "Balladen für meine Jungens") as by the "ethical-causal relation between the beginning and the end of the external action" in his Weltanschauungsballaden (e.g., "Die Fischer von Svendaland" and "Ballade vom Brennesselbusch"). The astounding range covered by his ballads in time and space is apparent from a glance at the arrangement of them according to subject that precedes the index in Das Balladenbuch. What is left over in the world of emotion finds expression in his lyrics, where deep and tender sentiment alternates with captivating humor. The author is a master of the dramatic and onomatopoetic possibilities of the German language. In his Meister-Balladen: Ein Führer zur Freude (1923) he analyses 11 great ballads of his precursors and contemporaries. Of more recent date is his preface to Sammlung deutscher Balladen von Bürger bis Münchhausen (1934). Sole judge of the Olympic Song Contest in 1935, Münchhausen with his inherited sense of order and documentation subsequently studied patiently all the poems submitted and wrote for private circulation among his friends a lengthy analysis of the total offering and of the psychology of the contestants, many of whom evoked for their temerity the poet's irony, wit, and humor.

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, 10. Auflage (preface 1919), pp. 707–710; H. Spiero, Deutsche Köpfe (1927), pp. 299–308; M. Ritscher, "Börries von Münchhausen" (with biography and bibliography), Die schöne Literatur, XXXI (1930), 6–17; W. Kaiser, Geschichte der deutschen Ballade (1936), pp. 275–282, 284–289.

J. F. G.

Munk, Kaj (1898–1944, Danish playwright), born in Maribo, is among the more striking figures of contemporary Scandinavian drama. Munk was a clergyman, whose literary production, beginning in the late 1920's, was very prolific and on the whole very uneven in quality. It includes, in addition to eight plays, a travel book on Palestine, two volumes of verse, a sheaf of hunting letters, a large body of articles and essays and sketches for the daily press, and a posthumous volume of sermons. After the Nazi invasion of his homeland in 1939, Munk became one of the most outspoken critics of the invader and all that he stood for, until he was murdered by a band of Nazi assassins early in January, 1944.

In the year before his death Munk wrote his best historical play, Niels Ebbesen (Eng. tr. in Scandinavian Plays of the Twentieth Century, Ser. 2, 1944), in which he employs as the central figure a Danish national hero who in the late Middle Ages had defied the German oppressors of his homeland. The parallel to contemporary events in Denmark could scarcely be misunderstood. Though there is some necessary bloodletting in the course of the action in Niels Ebbesen, this play is less aggressively violent in the main than most of Munk's other historical dramas. These plays reveal a strong predisposition on the dramatist's part to deal with figures of portentous proportions, characters with blood on their hands, and (as Munk conceives them) with deep brooding in their hearts—Herod in En Idealist (1928; An Idealist), Henry VIII in Cant (1931), King David in De Udvalgte (1933; The Elect), Mussolini in Sejren (1936; The Victory). In these plays Munk is reacting—not always impressively—against what he considered the “undramatic” modern psychological play in favor of a drama of grandiose scene and violent action reminiscent of the strenuous, full-blooded life of the Renaissance stage. Vividly alive as are some of the individual scenes in these historical plays, Munk is on the whole more successful in two modern dramatic character sketches in a more tempered vein—I Braendningen (1929; In the Breakers), a partly symbolical evaluation of Georg Brandes (q.v.) as a cultural personality; and Han sidder ved Smeltediglen (1938; He Sits by the Melting Pot), a moving study of a fussy old German scholar who has the final moral courage not to prostitute his learning in the service of Nazi doctrine.

Munk is most successful, however, in his one purely religious play, Ordet (1932; The Word), which not infrequently employs theatrical devices of a not very subtle kind and yet which moves from scene to scene with a sure dramatic touch and brings its story to a close with an overwhelming cumulation of dramatic power. Its central character is a half-demented youth, who has to show “The Way” to a group of self-righteous religious sectarians who did not have the courage of their convictions in the hour of crisis. Though this youth has a role loosely parallel to that of Eleanora in Strindberg’s (q.v.) Easter, Munk’s play seems to be a wholly original dramatic conception, with its alternately satiric and sympathetic treatment of religious sectarianism and its final use of the element of “the miracle” to produce the logical dramatic dénouement. Munk has nowhere else in his dramatic production written anything which can compare with Ordet in solid theatrical entertainment, and it is doubtful that he could have done anything as well again had he lived.

See: K. Elfelt, “Kaj Munk og ‘Ordet,’” Ord och bild, XLII (1933), 284–288; H. Kehler, “Kaj Munk,” Bonniers litterära magasin, IV (May, 1935), 28–37; A. Gustafson, “Introduction,” in Scandinavian Plays of the Twentieth Century, Ser. 2 (1944).

A. G.

Muñoz Seca, Pedro (1881–1936, Spanish dramatist), was born in Puerto de Santa María, Cádiz, and died in Madrid, a victim of the Spanish civil war. He was professor of the Greek language and of Latin and Greek literature in various academies and private institutes; eventually he entered government service as an employee of a financial board (Tribunal Supremo de Cuentas del Reino). He became one of the cleverest writers of sáinetes and comedias de enredo, in which he constantly created the most improbable and absurd situations. As an Andalusian by birth and a resident of Madrid, he was able to fuse keen Andalusian wit and Madrilenian jocosity. Despite his exaggerated presentation of manners and customs, often approaching caricature, and an excessive use of jokes frequently involving forced humor, his works were a success owing to their cheerful wit, their lively and facile dialogue and clever theatrical devices. Within the dramatic framework of the so-called género chico, he was the creator of a special type, the astrakanada, in which nonsensical actions, plays on words, and puns, designed to keep the public in a continual state of hilarity, were exploited to their limit. Some of these works were written in collaboration with Pedro Fernández Pérez, and others with García Alvarez. Among his best-known works are La barba de Carrillo (1918), Trampa y cartón (1920), Pepe Conde, o el mentir de las estrellas (1920). In 1919 La venganza de don Mendo was staged. This is a parody of the tragic manner, and although it follows the general lines of the astrakanada and even accentuates them by the contrast between the tragedy and the comedy, it is written in good verse and parts of it show that its author possessed the potential qualifications for the development of a more serious and lofty dramatic art.

E. G. L.

Musil, Robert (1880–1939, Austrian novelist, dramatist, and essayist), first produced two collections of short stories (Vereinigungen, 1911; Drei Frauen, 1923), an expressionistic drama (Die Schwärmer, 1921), and a comedy (Vinzenz und die Freundin bedeutender Männer, 1923). His initial experiment in the novel, Die Verwirrungen des Zöglings Törless (1906), dealt with the inner and the outward conflicts of adolescence. Musil’s serious claim to greatness rests upon Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften (Vol. I, 1930; Vol. II, 1933; Vol. III, 1942), an epic enterprise immense in scope and unique in its execution. Against the background of the disintegrating Austrian Empire it sets the making of a new man and the shaping of a new mind, blending satire with prophesy but without sentimental pathos. Its satire is a subtle dissection of men and manners by the scalpel of an anatomist, its prophesy is the detached determining of a utopian locus by the mind of a mathematician. Because of his probing mind Musil has been compared to Marcel Proust (q.v.) and

James Joyce. Reminiscent of these two is the sophisticated disintegration of the form of his novel which, with hardly a coherent story, will never have popular appeal but, with its sparkling ironies and striking insights, will always fascinate and delight a few.

R. A.

N

Nabokov, Vladimir Vladimirovich (pseud. Vladimir Sirin, 1899–, Russian novelist, poet, and short-story writer), was born at St. Petersburg of a prominent family, but left Russia after the Revolution. He graduated from Cambridge University (1922), where he wrote Russian verse; he then settled for a time in Berlin and devoted himself primarily to literature, lecturing occasionally, studying butterflies, and playing chess. One of his best novels, Zashchita Luzhina (1930; Luzhin's Defense), is the story of a young chess master and his ultimate disintegration, told with sensitiveness and understanding. Camera Obscura (1933; Eng. trs., Camera Obscura, 1936, Laughter in the Dark, 1938) rises above anything merely sensational chiefly because of the author's artistic vision and the virtuosity with which the lethal plot is developed. Otchainiye (1934; Eng. tr., Despair, 1937), remarkable for its sustained interest, is in the same macabre tradition, which culminated in Priglaseniye na kazn (1938; Invitation to an Execution), a phantasmagoria of a topsy-turvy world for all its apparent realism. Unlike most Russian novelists, Nabokov is cold toward his characters and shows little interest in their social backgrounds. His plots are artful and full of surprises, sometimes at the expense of the reader; however, Nabokov's originality lies rather in his imaginative use of language, with which he transfigures reality. All these traits are equally evident in his short stories, some of which have been translated into English.

Since his coming to the United States (1940), Nabokov has divided his time between entomology and literature and has adopted English as his medium. The Real Life of Sebastian Knight (1941) may therefore mark the beginning of a new period.

See: G. Struve, "Vladimir Sirin," Slavonic Review, XII (1933–1934), 436–444; M. Slonim, "V. Nabokov-Sirin," Novoye russkoye slovo, March 21, 1943, p. 8.

P. A. P.

Nadson, Semyon Yakovlevich (1862–1887, Russian lyric poet), born in St. Petersburg, was of Jewish extraction on the side of his father, who was brilliant but mentally unstable. His mother belonged to the noble Mamantov family and was a woman of exceptional charm and energy. After the death of the poet's father, however, a second marriage ended in the suicide of her husband, and she herself died of tuberculosis at the age of 31. The poet's constitutional inheritance was thus not a healthy one, despite his early manifestation of musical and literary talent.

The first poem of Nadson's to be published appeared in print when he was only 15. Regardless of his delicate health, he was schooled for the army, but while still in the military academy he succumbed to a pulmonary infection which necessitated a year's convalescence in the Caucasus and, as subsequent developments proved, was never really cured. His wide popularity began about 1881, when his older friend, the poet A. N. Pleshcheyev, opened to him the pages of Otechestvennie zapiski (National Notes), the best-known monthly of the moment. Commissioned in the army the next year, Nadson was at first stationed at Kronstadt, where he seems to have enjoyed military associations and even gathered about him a group of like-minded friends with whom he shared literary experiments, music, and amateur theatricals.

But this contentment was short-lived. In the summer of 1883 Nadson developed a tubercular fistula which necessitated his resignation from the army. He had some thought of becoming a teacher, but his health was so uncertain that physicians advised a milder climate, so that he spent the winter of 1884–1885 in Wiesbaden, Nice, and other resorts. Homesickness drove him back to the dampness of St. Petersburg the next spring, but he was urged to go south again. Residence in Kiev failed to improve his condition, and he refused to endure the loneliness of another stay abroad. In the autumn of 1886 he therefore moved to Yalta, in the Crimea, where he died three months later, in January, 1887.

Nadson was unquestionably the most popular Russian poet of the 80's, and by 1916 the slender volume of his verses (Stikhotvoreniya) had sold 28 editions to a total of 197,000 copies. Yet estimates of his work and talent are extremely diverse. Some critics of the day regarded him as the greatest poet since Nekrasov's death; others called him trivial and shallow. As a matter of fact, his talent was moderate, and he died at 25 before it had fully matured. What captivated his contemporaries was his winning personality and the faith he expressed in better things. In an epoch of general depression, Nadson wept with the disconsolate, but tried to arouse within them the hope of a fairer future, so well expressed in his most famous poem "Drug moi, brat moi" (1881; My Friend, My Brother). That is, indeed, Nadson's only theme, but it was what the younger generation of the 80's wanted to hear. They were discouraged in a period of reaction, their intellectual level was not very high. They had ideals which they despaired of realizing, and they needed a poet to tell them the sun would shine sometime. Nadson's own tragic destiny contributed largely to his poetic reputation. But with all due sympathy for his untimely end, one must admit that he owed his popularity to his good fortune in expressing earnestly and sincerely, in acceptable and sometimes brilliant verse, the hopes and aspirations of his generation.

See: A. Luther, Geschichte der russischen Literatur (1924), pp. 366-368; D. S. Mirsky, Contemporary Russian Literature (1926), pp. 70-71.

S. H. C.

Nałkowska, Zofja (1885-, Polish novelist and dramatist), was born in Warsaw, the daughter of a distinguished geographer, and reared in an unusually scholarly atmosphere. Powerfully stirred by the positivist currents, she began at the age of 15 to take a serious interest in world affairs and especially in social conditions in her own country. After studying the branches which were then so popular—economics, philosophy, and psychology—she made her literary debut at 21 with the novel Kobiety (1906; Women), a work in which are to be found marked traces of her deep interest in all three of these subjects, especially psychology. A true product of positivism, Nałkowska is devoid of all passion save that of destroying evil and setting the world right.

She has given much time to social causes, notably prison reform, and her novels often appear to be mere by-products of these other preoccupations. This is particularly true of Ściany świata (1931; Walls of the World), Granica (1931; The Boundary Line), and Niecierpliwi (1939; The Impatient Ones). With Choucas (1927; The Jackdaw), a view of the European mind in general as seen from the vantage point of a Swiss tourist resort, and with Niedobra miłość (1928; Unwholesome Love), Nałkowska won considerable fame abroad, as she did also with the two plays Dom kobiet (1930; The House of Women) and Dzień jego powrotu (1931; The Day of His Return). Nałkowska is greatly respected in Poland, both as a writer and as a person.

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, II (1928), 251-270; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 223-224, 370-392, 701-704; Stefanja Podhorska-Okółów, Kobiety piszą (1938), Ch. VII.

A. P. C.

Nathansen, Henri (1868-1944, Danish playwright and novelist), was born in the city of Hjørring. His father was a well-to-do merchant, and his family was representative of the highly refined Jewish intellectual aristocracy which has played an important role in Danish life. Nathansen, deeply conscious of his racial affinities, became one of the exemplifications of the claim that in Denmark prosperity and highly developed talent, specific racial characteristics and national traits, have blended remarkably well. The Jewish element in this writer largely determined his life and work—and he ended his life tragically, having been forced by German persecution to flee his native land for Sweden, where in a moment of unbearable anguish he plunged to death from a hotel window.

Nathansen originally studied law at the University of Copenhagen and at the age of 31 published his first book, a novel, Sommernat (1899; Summer Night), followed by Floden (1901; The River), and Den forbudne Frugt (1902; The Forbidden Fruit). In 1905 he began a series of dramas, Mor har Ret (1905; Mother is Right), Den gode Borger (1907; The Good Citizen), Daniel Hertz (1909), Danas Have (1910; The Garden of Dana, i.e., Denmark), Indenfor Murene (1912; Within the Walls), Affaeren (1913; The Affair), and Dr. Wahl (1915). Then he turned to novels again, writing Af Hugo Davids Liv (1917; From the Life of Hugo David) and Mendel Philipsen & Søn (1932). He also composed biographies:

Georg Brandes (1929), Johannes Poulsen og Poul Reumert (1918; Johannes Poulsen and Poul Reumert), Karl Mantzius (1926), William Bloch (1928). For a number of years Nathansen was art director of the national Royal Theatre of Copenhagen, coming into close contact with Poulsen, Reumert, Mantzius, and Bloch.

In everything Nathansen wrote there is an undercurrent of wistfulness, directly due to his racial sensitivity. He had acute perception of the life, and understanding of the thoughts, of the bourgeoisie, a finely developed ear for the music of words, a most accurately registering eye for hidden beauty.

G. St.

naturalism, see French naturalism, German naturalism.

Navarro Tomás, Tomás (1884–, Spanish philologist and critic), was born in the province of Albacete. A pupil of Menéndez Pidal (q.v.) at the University of Madrid, he later became one of his closest collaborators in the development of modern philological studies in Spain. His first linguistic work was a study of the Aragonese dialect (1908). The following year he entered the National Archives and Library Service, where he reached in 1936 the highest rank as director of the National Library of Madrid. From 1912 to 1914 he had studied phonetics in France, Germany, and Switzerland. After returning to Spain he was a leading figure in the Centro de Estudios Históricos, where he directed the section of phonetics; worked actively in the Revista de filología española, and organized the Archivo de la Palabra. An inspiring and respected teacher in the Centro, well known also in foreign universities which he visited at different times, he taught the essentials of Spanish speech to many young Spanish and foreign scholars and guided a group of chosen pupils in the first steps of phonetic and stylistic research. In 1931 he was appointed professor of phonetics at the University of Madrid and in 1934 was elected to the Spanish Academy. During the civil war he was one of the directors of the cultural policy of the republican government, and as a result of his devotion innumerable bibliographical and artistic treasures were saved. He left Spain at the end of the war and has been since then a professor at Columbia University.

Navarro Tomás is the author of many articles and monographs on phonetics and Spanish dialects; a group of them, such as Doctrina fonética de Juan Pablo Bonet (1920) and Manuel Ramírez de Carrión y el arte de enseñar a hablar a los mudos (1924), deal with the history of linguistic studies in Spain. The Manual de pronunciación española (1918), now in its fifth edition, is the standard work in the field. In 1927 he made a complete study of the Spanish language in Puerto Rico, which is now, after a careful revision, in press. He has contributed to literary studies by editing, with critical introduction, the Moradas of St. Teresa (1911) and the poetry of Garcilaso de la Vega (1911). His most important work, a "Linguistic Atlas of the Iberian Peninsula," directed and prepared by him with the collaboration of some of his closest pupils, was near completion when interrupted by the civil war.

See: M. Artigas, Discurso (1935), composed for Navarro's reception into the Spanish Academy.

A. del R.

Nazor, Vladimir (1876–, Croat poet), was born in Postire, on the island of Brač, studied natural history, and has taught in teachers' colleges in Croatia most of his life. After the First World War he was director of a children's institute, where he found inspiration for his stories and poetry about the very young. In 1926 he was forced to retire because of his political views, but was reinstated as teacher in a women's college the same year.

Nazor's literary activities began when he was still a student. He early translated Yugoslav poetry into Italian and Latin. His first published book was Slavenske legende (1900; Slav Legends). Most of his first writings were poetry, lyric and epic, or a kind of simple prose which had lyric connotations—Knjiga o kraljevima hrvatskijem (1903; Book about Croat Kings), Krvava košulja (1905; Bloody Shirt), Krvavi dani (1908; Days of Blood). The next book, Veli Jože (1908), a story about Istria, made Nazor's name popular all over Croatia. The volume Lirika (1910; Lyrics) lifted him to the rank of a really distinguished poet. The collection Istarske priče (1913; Istrian Tales) established his fame as storyteller of the Croat coastland; the poems of Hrvatski kraljevi (1912; Croat Kings) made him the national bard of Croatia. Several Croat and Slav nationalistic collections of poetry and prose followed during the years of the First World War. In this period Nazor also published his famous epic for children, Medvjed Brundo (1915; Brundo the Bear). Several collections of tales for children followed. As early as 1908 the most competent Croat literary critic, Branko Vodnik, began to publish Nator's collected works. His lyric poetry was collected in 1922, and in 1925 a representative edition of Nator's lyrics appeared in Zagreb.

Until about 1920 Nator was the most discussed author in Croatia. Although he came to fame after his contemporary lyric colleagues Dragutin Domjanić, Mihovil Nikolić, and Vladimir Vidrić, he presently overshadowed all of them. He reached full maturity about 1910. His educational work, particularly for children, grew as his literary work fell off. After the First World War Nator's fame was in eclipse and emerged again only after Hitler's invasion of Yugoslavia.

When Fascism was imposed on the Croats, the new ruling clique tried to make itself popular by using famous nonpolitical artists for its own purposes. Nator was slated for such a role. The Quisling of Croatia, Ante Pavelić, nominated Nator a member of the Croat Academy. But Nator seemed not to appreciate the honor, and indeed only a few months later there was published a collection of poetry, Pjesme (1942; Poetry), which described his disappointment with the new trend of events. Quisling literary critics wrote bitter attacks against the old bard. Then Nator, not satisfied with writing poems against traitors of his own nation, joined the Partisans in the mountains of his native Dalmatian coastland. Here he created a new kind of prose, wrote stirring appeals to the nation, condemning traitors and extolling the fighters for freedom. He also became president of a local self-governing body of the Partisans in Yugoslavia.

Nator has had a strong influence on the youth of Croatia and is considered a typical Yugoslav poet, i.e., a poet for all the South Slavs, and not only for his Croat clan. Although not a politician, he always stood for the liberation of the South Slavs from any foreign yoke. While Croatia and Dalmatia were ruled by the Hapsburgs the nationalist poetry of Nator was in fact a political weapon. During the formative years of Yugoslavia Nator was less active, but he stirred even the youngest readers to think in terms of Yugoslavia and to reach beyond the narrower national confines.

See: B. Vodnik, "Vladimir Nator," in preface to Medved Brundo (1915); A. Barac, Vladimir Nator (1918); A. Venzelidis, Književne studije (1918); M. Marjanović, "Vladimir Nator," in Carmen Vitae (1924).

M. H.

Neera (pseud. of Anna Radius Zuccari, 1846-1918, Italian novelist) was born and died in Milan. Her innate introspective tendency became manifest during a childhood devoid of warm maternal affection. When her mother died, her father's cool aloofness further accentuated this trait; the young girl, in her emotional solitude, developed an unusual power of observing life about her and of studying the vicissitudes of real people whom later she was to portray in her novels. Perhaps as a compensation for her loveless childhood, she early decided to make love the exclusive theme of her literary works. But she was not concerned with a somewhat dated romanticism nor with the tawdry and often sordidly tragic passion of certain widely read women novelists; at the outset of her career, Neera chose as her artistic motto: "the ideal through the real," and remained unswervingly faithful to it.

Her many heroines are actual living beings whose passions and actions spring naturally from their inherent character. In L'Indomani (1889) she depicts the woman who discovers that motherhood amply compensates her for the passion that matrimony failed to give her. In Amuleto (1897) Miriam, already married, renounces love, telling Pietro that while the paths to one's dreams are many, the road to real life lies only in matrimony. Daria, in La Regaldina (1884), sacrifices herself to protect her brother's children neglected by an erring sister-in-law. There are many other stories of abnegation in which the chief women characters are at once noble and credible: Teresa (1886), Anima sola (1894; Eng. tr., The Soul of an Artist, 1905), La Vecchia Casa (1900), Una Passione (1903). The German translator of Anima sola claimed to see in the heroine the portrait of Eleonora Duse. In Senio (1892) a man falls under the power of a vulgar woman in a manner suggestive of Philip Carey in Maugham's Of Human Bondage.

In her score of novels and various short stories as well as in such studies as Il Libro di mio figlio (1891), L'Amor platonico (1897), Battaglie per una idea (1898), and Un'Idealista (1898), Neera discusses with wariness and logic her moral philosophy, insisting that our great social evils stem directly from our materialistic concept of happiness. Wrongly accused of antifeminism, she stoutly maintains that neither political nor material equality of the sexes will remedy our social evils, but rather the frank recognition that woman's supreme mission is to create a family and that only through love can man and woman strengthen and improve one another. Neera's style, while often betraying the haste of spontaneity, rises often to poetic beauty and shows sincere creative power. Neera exemplified in her own life the same lofty ideals that she embodied in her literary works.

See: E. Tissot, Princesses des lettres (1909); M. Serao, Ricordando Neera (1920).

L. E. S.

Negri, Ada (1870–1945), Italian poet and prose writer), is the greatest woman lyricist and one of the great artists both in verse and in prose of modern Italy. She was born in Lodi in Lombardy of extremely poor parents. In her autobiographic story Stella mattutina (1921; Eng. tr., Morning Star, 1930), by some considered her masterpiece, Negri relates the heroic struggle and self-abnegation by which her widowed mother (slaving 13 hours a day for starving wages in a silk factory) succeeded in putting her promising, gifted daughter through normal school. Her first teaching position took Negri to the village of Motta-Visconti in Pavia where from 1888 to 1892 she taught hundreds of children of poor peasants and factory workers.

In 1892 the publication of Fatalità (Eng. tr., Fate and Other Poems, 1898), a slender volume of verse which with vehement eloquence exalts the virtues of the hard-working, suffering proletariat and chastises the vices of the idle, effete, parasitic bourgeoisie, skyrocketed her to fame. She was hailed both in Italy and abroad not only as a poetic voice of rich, unique promise, but as the mouthpiece of the oppressed and a champion of the socialist movement then in its heyday in Italy, especially in the highly industrialized North from which Negri came. In 1893 the Italian government, in recognition of her signal poetic achievement, promoted the little schoolmistress of Motta-Visconti to the position of professor of Italian literature in a normal school in Milan.

In 1896 Negri married Giovanni Garlanda, a wealthy Piedmontese industrialist. Marriage gave Negri one supreme, transcending experience—motherhood, whose ecstatic joys and pains she sang eloquently in her volume of verse Maternità (1904). But the union between the wealthy bourgeois and the fiery poet of the proletariat was to end in utter failure. In 1910, accompanied by her beloved 12-year-old daughter Bianca, Negri left her husband and Italy. She resided mostly in Switzerland, but traveled extensively to other lands seeking and finding no peace for her wandering ever-yearning spirit. The restless vague longing of this period finds expression in her two volumes of verse Dal profondo (1910) and Esilio (1914).

At the outbreak of the First World War Negri returned to Italy disillusioned and broken-hearted at the complete failure of the socialist dream of universal brotherhood and lasting peace and justice. This mood of gloomy disenchantment is reflected in her first volume of prose fiction, Le Solitarie (1917), which presents a gallery of frustrated modern women "lonely in spite of family, lonely in spite of love." Love is the predominating theme of these short stories. Indeed love is the mainspring of Negri's poetic world. Its unabated longing, occasional fulfillment, and frequent frustration play an all absorbing role in the lives of her characters—women most of them. When in 1919 (after a tempestuous love experience, an experience consumingly intense, total, short-lived, and tragic, which invested her whole passionate being as she was nearing her 50th year) she published Il Libro di Mara, Negri gave world literature a breath-taking love poem. This book is aflame with a passion which is frank, devouring, incandescent, essential, elemental like a blind force of nature. It has been placed in the same category as Sappho's lyrics and the Biblical Song of Songs. The same incandescent, ecstatic quality characterizes I Canti dell'isola (1925), a series of poems which celebrate the beauty of the island of Capri, beauty so transcending, so overwhelming that the poet becomes "sick with beauty." According to Serao (q.v.) these Canti of Negri have said the last word concerning the unearthly beauty of this dream isle.

But neither in the ecstasy of love nor in the ecstasy of beauty did Negri's heart find what it long sought. All the hopes and mirages of her youth and maturity ended in disillusionment. She became convinced that no revolutionary social order could ever establish perfect justice, brotherly love, and lasting peace on earth. No human love and no earthly beauty could give peace to the human heart. The tragedy of human frustration has such deep and distant roots that only God and a supernatural order can heal it. In her last years Negri's works took on an ever deepening mystical and religious tone which reaches its climax in that most beautiful prayer to God entitled "Atto d'Amore," which closes her last volume of poems, Il Dono (1936). Resigned acceptance of inescapable suffering which disciplines and purifies the spirit; austere performance of one's daily duties, be they ever so humble; broadening of the heart's charity until it can understand and share all human suffering and in sharing another's pain to forget its own; preparation for and serene expectation of life's supreme ordeal, death—these are the motives that inform Negri's last two volumes of poetry, Vespertina (1931) and Il Dono, and such prose works as Le Strade (1926), Sorelle (1929), and Erba sul sagrato (1939).

Ada Negri in the course of her career received many literary prizes and distinctions and in 1940 became the first woman member of the Italian Academy.

See: B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, 3d ed., II (1929), 335–355; A. Mannino, Ada Negri nella letteratura contemporanea (1933); V. Schilirò, L'itinerario spirituale di Ada Negri (1938).

T. C.

Nencioni, Enrico (1837–1896, Italian poet and critic), was born in Florence. In his school days he was a fellow pupil of Carducci (q.v.) in the Scuole Pie of Florence, and the friendship formed there was destined to be lifelong. Nencioni's early years were not happy; he earned his living as a private tutor in aristocratic families and satisfied the literary urge in him by contributing poems and articles of criticism to ephemeral journals. These writings—and perhaps the friendship of Carducci—secured for him considerable recognition, and in 1879 he was made editor of the Fanfulla della domenica in which subsequently appeared most of his best work, including the Medaglioni (1883) of famous women. In 1883 he was made professor of Italian literature in the Istituto Superiore di Magistero in Florence. This post he held till his death, meanwhile continuing to contribute to literary periodicals, notably the Nuova Antologia. Nencioni was a poet of considerable stature and an outstanding critic, but, perhaps unfortunately for his own reputation, he was endowed as well with such charm of personality that his influence over others, in the last analysis greater than he, tends to overshadow his own substantial merits. He is remembered as the friend of Carducci, to whom he pointed* out the beauties of the Northern literatures, thus enriching Carducci's inspiration; he is also remembered as the friend and counselor of the young D'Annunzio (q.v.). In their own way both of these writers were at odds with the basic moral and literary attitudes of Nencioni, who was a man of sincere moral conviction and something of a romantic in literature. But though he could hardly make Carducci abandon his classicism and nationalism any more than he could make a Christian of D'Annunzio, his influence is discernible in both. Of his own work it may be said that though the poems (Poesie, 1880) are of genuine merit, it is his criticism and essays that are now read, and it is to them that he owes his place in the history of Italian letters. Though less of a historian than Carducci his criticism is nonetheless based on sound research and animated by a sense of poetry and a Tuscan gift of simplicity of style. Perhaps more informational than strictly critical are the various collections of saggi, which bear rereading because of their beauty of style and their reflection of a warm personality. The Saggi critici di letteratura inglese, collected and published in 1897, contains a preface by Carducci, and the Saggi critici di letteratura italiana (1899) has an introduction by D'Annunzio. These volumes contain the best of his work, but the following titles also contain some fine pages: Nuovi Saggi di letterature straniere (with a foreword by Ferdinando Martini, 1909), Nuovi Medaglioni (1920), and Impressioni e ricordanze (1923).

See: F. Pera, Biografia di Enrico Nencioni (1896); "A Enrico Nencioni," Marzocco, May 13, 1900 (special number devoted to Nencioni); A. Sorbelli, "Gli Amici del Carducci," Marzocco, June 24, 1924; M. Praz, La Carne, la morte e il diavolo nella letteratura romantica (1930), pp. 248–251; B. Cicognani, L'Età favolosa (1940), pp. 73–340.

T. G. B.

Nerman, Ture (1886–, Swedish poet and journalist), is representative of that not inconsiderable group of Swedish literary figures who, despite their middle-class origins and their academic backgrounds, have thrown in their lot with the Swedish proletariat seeking new economic and political power in the last two generations. Born in Norrköping, Nerman received his university education at Uppsala, after which he served his journalistic apprenticeship on the editorial staff of the labor newspaper Nya samhället (The New Society) in Sundsvall, center of the sawmill industry in Norrland. Later he was associated with various other liberal and radical newspapers for considerable periods of time as a foreign correspondent. His journalistic assignments took him to the Orient and to America as well as to various parts of the Continent. As a literary figure he was most successful with his poetry, though he tried his hand at the novel (Olympen, 1913; Fem friska, 1924, Five Healthy Young Men) and at extended interpretative essays on political and cultural subjects (Kina åt kineserna, 1914, China for the Chinese; Borgarkulturens undergång, 1920, The Decline of Middle-Class Culture). Both as a poet and as a writer of prose he is at his best in a clever, ironic vein strongly reminiscent of Heine, and his verse reveals also an almost Gallic lightness of touch and a remarkable technical virtuosity. Few Swedish poets write with the irrepressible flair and the effortless verbal swing of Nerman at his best. In subject matter his poetry concerns itself almost exclusively with two themes, physical love and labor agitation of one kind and another, though during the First World War he wrote pacifistic verse of considerable originality and power. Nerman has written some half dozen volumes of verse, the most typical being I brynja och brånad (1913). Neither his radical labor poetry nor his erotic verse bear the stamp of real greatness: the former is spirited and honest, but it is motivated by the most crass and naïve propagandistic Marxism; the latter, giving expression largely to a callow, youthful sensualism, lacks entirely the note of deep and mature passion. Nerman's loosely composed and on the whole rather superficial novel Fem friska (apparently autobiographical in origins) is of some value as a contemporary document in the history of the bohemian-radical side of the Swedish labor movement before and after the First World War.

A. G.

Neruda, Jan (1894–1963, Czech poet and essayist), was the most important poet of his country at the beginning of the 1920's. He was born in Prague, the son of a janitor in the barracks, and grew up in a quaint old quarter, Malá strana (Small Side). For a time he studied at the university and taught school, but subsequently became a journalist. He made his name as a regular essayist for the main Czech daily of the time, Národní listy (National Journal). Later in his life he traveled extensively in Europe. He died in Prague.

Neruda was in his own time better known as an essayist and writer of short stories than as a poet. But his poetry contains his most lasting work. His first volume, Hřbitovní kvítí (1925; Churchyard Flowers), is still full of conventional romantic pessimism, though the sober and even dry style shows some originality. Knihy veršů (1927; Books of Verse), though much superior, is still a romantic volume which contains imitations of folk ballads, echoes of Heine and Musset, and some personal lyrics which hint at silent personal tragedies. Pláně kosmické (1928; Cosmic Songs), far more original, introduces ideas of modern astronomy and physics into poetry and plays with fanciful analogies between cosmic events and earthly doings in a curious mixture of humor and pathos. In spite of its success it remains a tour de force. Two collections published in 1928 contain Neruda's best and most mature work. One, Balady a romance (Ballads and Romances), imitating the style of Czech folk ballads, reveals masterpieces of precision and power, and the other, Prosté Motivy (Simple Themes), though in the form of simple nature studies, is really the finest expression of a shy and kindly soul who has achieved the peace of smiling resignation. A posthumous volume, Zpěvy páteční (1936; Good Friday Songs), shows a surprising change: in hymns full of pathos and with ornate rhetoric are intoned the sufferings and hopes of his nation. Neruda's usually sober nationalism takes on almost mystical fervor.

Neruda's work in prose—voluminous and diffuse—is very different. Many volumes of sketches, essays, and travel impressions (e.g., Obrazy z ciziny, 1922, Pictures from Abroad) are only of ephemeral value, though they display his powers of observation, his democratic outlook, and his kindly humor. More important are his short stories, one group collected in Arabesky (1934) and another in Různí lidé (1931; All Sorts of People), drawn from his travel experiences in the Balkans. By far the best volume, however, is Malostranské povídky (1928; Stories from the Small Side). This is his most popular book, based on childhood memories of the quaint old quarter of Prague, its steep and narrow streets and the "originals" which inhabited them. In vividness of description and characterization, in warmth of feeling, these stories approach the art of his master Dickens. A vanished part of Old Prague has found here a lasting monument. Neruda's theatrical and literary criticism, though full of shrewd judgments and sensible reflections on nationalism in literature, is not incisive enough to rise above the level of good journalism. His comedies may be ignored.

Neruda is best as a lyrical poet of intimate sorrows which he expressed, without ostentatious display of feeling, in a sober, subdued, almost classically simple style. His influence, overshadowed in his time by the facile Hálek (q.v.) and the brilliant Vrchlický (q.v.), has been growing since the turn of the century. Today he is generally acknowledged to be one of the most genuine Czech poets, manly and kindly, disciplined and fervent.

See: F. V. Krejčí, Jan Neruda (1902); F. X.

Šalda, Boje o zltřek (1905) and Šaldův zdpisník, VI (1934), 320–345; A. Novák, Jan Neruda (1921). There are German translations of Malostranské povídky, Plsně kosmické, and Zpěvy páteční.

R. W.

Neumann, Alfred (1895–, German novelist and poet), was born in Lautenburg, West Prussia. After having attended the Gymnasium in Berlin and in Rostock, he became a reader for the Georg Müller publishing house in Munich (1913–1918) and in 1917 published his Lieder vom Lacheln und der Not. From 1918 to 1920 he was Dramaturg at the Munich Little Theatre. The most noteworthy of his earlier works is a story entitled Der Patriot (1925; Eng. tr., 1928), which deals with the murder of the Emperor Paul of Russia. The dramatic version (1926) was staged in London (1928) under the title Such Men Are Dangerous. His first literary recognition, however, came with the Kleist prize for his novel Der Teufel (1926; Eng. tr., The Devil, 1928), in which lust for power during the reign of Louis XI is the theme. The next year brought Rebellen (Eng. tr., The Rebels, 1929), with the Carbonari revolution as a background. A kind of continuation is Guerra (1928; Eng. tr., 1930), dealing with the leader of the Italian independence movement. The murder of Rathenau in 1922 suggested Der Held (1930; Eng. tr., The Hero, 1931), and the Memoiren des Ritters Hans von Schweinichen led to the composition of Narrenspiegel (1932). Königin Christine von Schweden (1926; Eng. tr., The Life of Christina of Sweden, 1935) represents a historical portrayal of the Swedish queen with some attention to her erotic peculiarities. His dramas, Königsmaske (1928), Frauenschuh (1929), and Haus Danieli (1931), may be mentioned in passing. Under the Nazi regime he left Germany and took refuge in the United States. Among his latest works, written in exile, are Neuer Caesar (1934; Eng. tr., 1934), Kaiserreich (1936; Eng. tr., Gaudy Empire, 1937), and Goldquelle (1938).

Neumann has contributed to the revival of the historical novel, using the past, however, to symbolize present political situations and human problems. His lack of hero worship and his tendency to pacifism probably rendered his works, from the Nazi viewpoint, suitable for the notorious holocaust in 1933.

See: A. Neumann, "Autobiographische Skizze," Blätter der Bücherstube am Museum Wiesbaden, III (1927), 6–7, "Skizze des Lebens," Bergische Bühnenblätter, Vol. VII (1927), No. 28, pp. 4–5, and "Selbstdarstellung," Die literarische Welt, Vol. VI (1930), No. 45, p. 1.

F. S.

Neumann, Stanislav Kostka (1875–, Czech poet), is one of the most influential and popular Czech writers of free verse. Neumann was born in Prague, took part in the abortive anti-Austrian conspiracy "Omladina," and for a while cultivated an aristocratic anarchism. He became a journalist and served in the Austrian army during the First World War. After the war he was a member of Parliament for the Czech socialists, but in 1922 he joined the Communist Party and edited their periodicals. In 1945 he was awarded the title "national poet."

Neumann began as the poet of fashionable anarchism and Nietzschean individualism. Jsem apoštol nového žití (1896; I Am the Apostle of a New Life) and Satanova sláva mezi námi (1897; Satan's Glory among Us) are titles of early verse collections which suggest both the crude ideology and the rhetorical style of the young author. But he soon discovered the social and national question: Sen o zástupu zoufajících (1903; A Dream of the Despairing Mass) is a vision of the horrors of social oppression and of the poet's hope for its abolition. Neumann then turned again to individual problems. Possibly his best work is in two collections written before the war. Kniha lesů, vod a strání (1914; The Book of Woods, Waters, and Slopes) contains frankly sensual poems in praise of nature, open air, and sex. The rich sonorous free verse, the charmingly vivid and colorful metaphors, convey a sense of zest for life and sheer animal enjoyment rare in Czech poetry. Horký van a jiné básně (1918; The Hot Breath and Other Poems) adds a naïve celebration of the pleasures of the marriage bed. But a completely new ideology and technique appear in the collections published just after the war. Nové zpěvy (1918; New Songs) suddenly discovers the beauties of machine civilization, and Třicet zpěvů z rozvratu (1918; Thirty Songs from the Time of Upheaval) versifies Neumann's experiences in Hungary and the Balkans during the war. The technique of these two collections is futurist—a mosaic of colors and impressions, a flow of free-verse rhetoric which never loses vitality but frequently violates all standards of taste and good sense. Rudé zpěvy (1923; Red Songs) and several other later volumes are only versified propaganda, but one collection, Láska (1933; Love), returns to the theme of sexual love in sober and mature tones and even uses old-fashioned concise song and stanza forms. Neumann's prose is less important, and much of it is either polemics or propaganda; there are also books of reminiscences from the First World War and two travel books of post-war Czechoslovakia. A love story, Zlatý oblak (1932; The Golden Cloud), is trivial, and his histories of love, of woman, and of the French Revolution are mere potboilers.

Neumann's youthful enthusiasm, which outlasted maturity, his frank "pagan" sensualism, his glorification of the wonders of modern civilization, the zest and flow of his rhetorical verse, the color of his metaphors, have endeared him to the generation of readers immediately following the First World War, and he has, more than any other older poet, influenced the young "proletarian" poets. The naïve ideology and the lack of subtler emotions and ideas exclude him from the first rank of Czech poets.

See: B. Polan, Se St. K. Neumannem (1919); B. Václavek, S. K. Neumann, 1875-1935 (1935).

R. W.

Nexø, Martin Andersen (1869-, Danish novelist), the most widely renowned Danish author of his generation and one of the foremost proletarian writers of this century, was born the fourth of 11 children in a rat-infested tenement in a Copenhagen slum. His father, a stonecutter, was of Bornholm peasant stock; his mother was the daughter of an immigrant German blacksmith from Mainz. Relentlessly but without bitterness Nexø has recorded his memories of a proletarian childhood and youth in four volumes which have already become classics of Danish autobiography: Et lille Kræ (1932; A Little Mite), Under aaben Himmel (1935; Eng. tr., Under the Open Sky, 1938, includes this and the preceding volume), For Lud og koldt Vand (1937; Roughing It), and Vejs Ende (1939; The End of the Road). The first volume presents an appalling picture of the torments of a child of the poor in a big industrial city. The second takes the family to the island of Bornholm, still feudal but kinder to children, where from eight to 14 Martin lived a relatively happy and healthy outdoor life, herding cattle and devouring thrillers by Eugène Sue and others. After confirmation he worked as farm hand, shoemaker's apprentice, and hod carrier for some seven years, during which he became interested in socialism and hungry for education. Two winters in the local folk high school at Rønne were followed by two in the famous Askov school, where he first began to write. From there he went in 1893 to teach in Odense, but developed tuberculosis after a year, and spent most of the next two years in Spain, where he learned "that poverty is international." In Soldage (1903; Eng. tr., Days in the Sun, 1929) he has recorded his impressions of a second visit to Spain.

To Nexø the cruel poverty in which he grew up seemed as unnecessary as it was unjust, and he threw himself wholeheartedly into the fight against it. As a radical socialist, and since the Russian Revolution as a Communist, he has championed the cause not only of the working people but of all victims of social injustice. He is frankly a propagandist for the ideas in which he believes and has contributed indefatigably to leftist periodicals in many countries. But his most effective contributions to the cause he has served so devotedly are at the same time his finest artistic achievements, the great social epic Pelle Erobreren (4 vols., 1906-1910; Eng. tr., Pelle the Conqueror, 1913-1917; combined in one volume, 1930) and its feminine counterpart Ditte Menneskebarn (5 vols., 1917-1921; Eng. tr., Ditte: Girl Alive! 1920; Ditte, Daughter of Man, 1921; Ditte: Toward the Stars, 1922; combined in one volume, 1931). Pelle spends his boyhood on a Bornholm farm and learns his trade in a small town there. He and his old father, Lasse, are the most vivid and appealing of a whole gallery of superbly drawn Bornholm types. Lasse, gentle and patient, has no heart for the struggle against exploitation, but Pelle, arriving in Copenhagen to find that the machines have taken away his livelihood, becomes the leader of a successful strike and the founder of a cooperative community; his conquest is the modest triumph of Social Democracy in Denmark before the disillusionment of the First World War. In the pathetic story of the little servant girl, Ditte, Nexø shows, as only he can, how unselfishness, tenderness, and even rare delicacy of feeling spring up out of the most unlikely soil. His intimate knowledge of the most wretched of mankind has only strengthened his faith in the fundamental goodness of human nature.

In both these novels as in his short stories (Samlede Noveller, 3 vols., 1922-1926), Nexø is at his best in writing of childhood and old age. He is extremely fond of children and was so favorably impressed by Soviet methods of education that he devoted a whole chapter to that subject in his first book on Russia, Mod Dagningen (1924; Toward Dawn). A second book on Russia, To Verdener (Two Worlds), appeared in 1934. Nexø's third great novel, Midt i en Jerntid (1929; Eng. tr., In God's Land, 1933), is a satirical study of the more prosperous Danish farmers before and during the First World War—"the dance around the Golden Calf" and its disastrous results when the sudden inflation subsided. Although a powerful novel with many fine characterizations, it lacks the warmth and intimacy of the novels and short stories dealing with the working class and of the autobiography.

In 1923 Nexø went to live in Germany, where he was then very popular, but returned to Copenhagen in 1930. He has made frequent visits to the Soviet Union, where he is still very popular. In 1943 he fled from German-occupied Denmark to Sweden. In his latest novel, Morten hin Røde (1945; Morten the Red), he has continued up to 1918 both Pelle's story and his own.

See: O. Friis, "Martin Andersen Nexø," in Dansk biografisk Leksikon, I (1933), 405-413; Dorothy Brewster and Angus Burrell, Modern Fiction (1934), pp. 283-287; Harry Slochower, Three Ways of Modern Man (1937), pp. 105-144; Svend Erichsen, Martin Andersen Nexø (1938).

J. B. C. W.

Nezval, Vítězslav (1900-, Czech poet, dramatist, and novelist), is the leader of Czech "poetism" and surrealism. Born at Biskupky near Třebíč (western Moravia), the son of a schoolteacher, he went to Prague to study languages and has since earned his living by writing. He has made several visits to Paris and to Russia. In 1945 he became chief of a division in the new Ministry of Information.

Nezval was the founder of a movement which he called "poetism." He had begun as an adherent of "proletarian" poetry, but reacted against its preoccupation with rhetoric and propaganda, though he never gave up his sympathies for Communism. "Poetism" was a new name for pure poetry devoid of thought and of propaganda, for poetry as a play of fancy and association. Nezval carried out his theory in several collections (e.g., Menší růžová zahrada, 1927, The Smaller Rose Garden), in which he proved himself an "admirable magician," as one of his poems is called, an astonishing virtuoso in poetical fireworks, an inventor of fantastic rhymes, illogical chains of associations, grotesque fancies, whole topsy-turvy little worlds. The affinities with Italian futurism (see Marinetti) and Apollinaire (q.v.) are frequently obvious, but Nezval has his own peculiar themes and techniques. About 1928 Nezval's tones began to change and deepen; feverish visions and dreams replace the bright daylight of the early books. His poetry now centers around death, time, inexorable change, and night. His best volume, Básně noci (1930; Poems of the Night), is well named, and his masterpiece, "Edison," piquantly combines a celebration of technical civilization with the cult of night and sorrow. Other collections show a decline in inventive power and much repetition, though individual poems are as good as ever. Snídaně v trávě (1930; The Breakfast in the Grass), Jan ve smutku (1930; John in Mourning), Skleněný havelok (1932; The Havelock of Glass), Zpáteční lístek (1933; The Return Ticket), Sbohem a šáteček (1934; Good-bye and a Handkerchief) are some of the fancifully named volumes which show an increasing lack of self-criticism.

About 1934 Nezval embraced the creed of French surrealism, and he has tried since to write according to the recipes of André Breton (q.v.). Poetry is now become a mere overflow of the subconscious, almost automatic writing as practiced by mediums. Žena v množném čísle (1936; Woman in the Plural), Praha s prsty deště (1936; Prague with the Fingers of Rain), Absolutní Hrobař (1937; The Absolute Gravedigger), and Pět minut za městem (1939; Five Minutes behind the Town) are the surrealist collections. The last represents a return to public themes; one poem, "Historický obraz" (A Historical Picture), represents an impressive attempt to express the feeling of the Czech people after Munich.

Nezval has done certain verse translations, very free, from Poe, Rimbaud (q.v.), and Mallarmé (q.v.) and has written verse plays which try to achieve the effect of improvisation in the style of the commedia dell'arte. Schovávaná na schodech (1931; Hide-and-Seek on the Stairs) uses a comedy of Calderón, and Milenci z kiosku (1932; The Lovers from the Newsstand) is an original entertainment which had considerable success on the stage. Nezval's prose is on a lower artistic level: his novels (e.g., Posedlost, 1930, Obsession; Dolce far niente, 1931; Jak vejce vejce, 1933, As Like as Two Peas) are loosely composed long stories which frequently border on pornography or on Marxist propaganda. A few travel sketches, manifestoes, and essays should be added to this production of bewildering variety.

Nezval is no man of ideas or even intellect, but he has an amazing vitality, a lively play of fancy, an inexhaustible inventiveness in rhyme and metaphor which outweigh his frequent bad taste and schoolboyish coarseness.

See: F. Soldan, O Nezvalovi a poudlečné generaci (1933); L. Kratochvil, Volker a Nezval (1936).

R. W.

Niccodemi, Dario (1874–1934, Italian dramatist), was born in Leghorn, but the formative years of his adolescence were spent in Buenos Aires. In that city and in the Spanish language his literary career began; while still in his teens he began to write theatre notes and in his early 20's he composed two comedies in Spanish. He might indeed have remained in Argentina but for his connection with the French actress Réjane, who took him to Paris as her secretary. In Paris he remained for some 15 years, from the turn of the century until the outbreak of the First World War. He did a good deal of translation and adaption of Italian comedies and found time also to write several original dramas in French, none of them of really high literary merit but all of them "good theatre." Of these La Flamme (1910), Le Refuge (1911), and Les Requins (1913) are typical. His Italian phase follows; he left France for Italy and during the war years wrote a number of plays in Italian. L'Ombra, commonly regarded as his best play, and Scampolo, certainly his most popular one, both appeared in 1915. He continued his residence in Italy and his work in the Italian theatre until his death. He was president of the Società Italiana degli Autori for several years and directed for some 10 years (beginning in 1921) a traveling company which gained much success and esteem in Spain and South America. He also continued to write; La Maestrina (1918) and the collection of lively one-act plays published under the title of Teatrino (1922) should be added to the titles above as representative of his style and technique. Niccodemi had a great deal of facility and, as might be expected, no great profundity, no intellectual content to speak of, though his skill was such as to deceive an occasional contemporary critic. His plays contain good dialogue, vivacity, and just enough realism to make them convincing to the spectator of the moment. Essentially they belong to the Parisian tradition, and they have that combination of wit, melodrama, and sophistication that one finds in Henry Bernstein (q.v.). Scampolo perhaps stands out above the rest since it contains all these elements nicely combined, plus a real Italian atmosphere lacking in some of the other plays.

See: C. Levi, Il Teatro (1921), pp. 33–34.

T. G. B.

Nicolau d'Olwer, Lluís (1888–, Catalan critic and essayist), is an outstanding figure in Catalan letters and was also active in liberal-nationalistic politics after the republic was proclaimed in Spain (1931). He was born in Barcelona. His father, a lawyer of that city, was able to provide him with an excellent education. Before finishing his studies, including law, he had already produced several literary essays which gave evidence of a precocious talent: Sobre les fonts catalanes de "Tirant lo Blanch" (1907) and Notes sobre les regles de trobar, de Jofre de Foixà i sobre les poesies que li han atribuït (1907). He was later elected a member of the Institut d'Estudis Catalans (the most distinguished cultural institution of Catalonia), in which he distinguished himself for his work in the philological section. He became a professor of Greek, and his prestige as a Hellenist led to his appointment as reviser of the Greek and Latin texts of the classics published, with the Catalan version, by the Fundació Bernat Metge of Barcelona. Among his learned and critical works are: Sobre la influència italiana en la prosa catalana (Concerning Italian Influence on Catalan Prose), Bernat Metge, Francesc Alegre (1908); Del classicisme a Catalunya (1909; On Classicism in Catalonia); Jaume I i els trobadors provençals (1909; James I and the Provençal Troubadors); Gerbert (Silvestre II) i la cuotura catalana del segle X (1910; Gerbert (Silvestre II) and the Catalan Culture of the Tenth Century); Jordi de Sant Jordi (1915); Tractat de lingüística (1917; Treatise on Linguistics) and Resum de literatura catalana (1917; Summary of Catalan Literature).

Nicolau began his political career when he was elected councilman of the municipal government of Barcelona (1918–1921). With his friend Bofill i Mates he founded the party Acció Catalana in 1922. From 1923 to 1930 he worked to harmonize nationalistic and republican ideas; from 1930 to 1939 he filled various representative offices. He continued to be deeply interested in literature and history and produced numerous studies: Del diàleg de la poesia medieval catalana (1920; The Dialogue in Medieval Catalan Poetry); L'escola poètica de Ripoll en els segles X–XIII (1920; The Poetic School of Ripoll from the 10th to the 13th Centuries); L'expansió de Catalunya a la Mediterrània oriental (1926; The Expansion of Catalonia in the Eastern Mediterranean); L'expedició dels catalans a Orient (1926; The Expedition of the Catalonians to the Near East); Paisatges de la nostra història (1929; Landscapes of Our History). Of a political nature are Comentaris (1920; Commentaries) and La llicó de la dictadura (1931; The Lesson of the Dictatorship). El pont de la mar blava (1928), purely literary, consists of impressions of a trip through Tunis, Sicily, and Malta. Nicolau's style is notable for precision, clarity, and simplicity.

A refugee in France in 1939, and his extradition having been demanded, he was obliged to endure incarceration with common offenders. He was finally set at liberty and after living under surveillance in a small village was able to move to the French capital—to await the liberation of his native country.

J. M. M. i V.

Nietzsche, Friedrich Wilhelm (1844–1900, German philosopher), was born at Röcken, Prussian Saxony, the oldest child of a Lutheran minister. His father died in 1849 of a brain affection caused by a fall, and the following year the family moved to Naumburg. There Friedrich attended the Gymnasium (1854–1858) and the Schulpforta (1858–1864). The next year he spent at Bonn in the study of theology and philology and then transferred to Leipzig, where he completed his university course in philology under Ritschl. Among his classmates and intimate friends was Erwin Rohde. While in Leipzig he came under the influence of Schopenhauer and made the personal acquaintance of Richard Wagner (q.v.)—two events of great importance in his life. In 1869 he was called to the chair of classical languages at Basel, and in view of his brilliant record as a student, the University of Leipzig conferred the doctor's degree upon him without a formal dissertation. In the Franco-Prussian War he volunteered for ambulance duty and was in the war zone from August till October, 1870. The strenuous work and the sight of suffering proved to be too much for him, and he returned to his teaching after a severe illness. At Basel his favorite colleagues were Franz Overbeck and Jakob Burckhardt. But his most important association was with Wagner at the latter's home in Tribschen, near Lucerne (1869–1872). Both men were interested in the relation of music and tragedy in their bearing on the ethical meaning of life. Wagner regarded Nietzsche as his most brilliant adherent. Coolness developed between the two, however, with Nietzsche's increasing independence. Nietzsche was present at the laying of the cornerstone in Bayreuth (1872), and he attended the opening of the theatre in 1876, but by that time he had definitely if not publicly broken his allegiance to the great composer and was launching out on new ways of his own. For some years Nietzsche's health had been declining, and in 1879 he had to resign his professorship. A small private income, supplemented by a pension from the university, enabled him to live independently on a very modest scale. The next 10 years were spent in growing isolation as Nietzsche traveled about in search of a favorable climate. He suffered a breakdown at Turin in 1889. His mind was beclouded, and he became progressively worse until his death at Weimar in 1900.

Nietzsche's efforts, considered in their totality, were directed to a single goal, the definition of a higher type of human character and its realization in a new frame of existence. He believed that man had come to the end of a long period of civilization and was face to face with a catastrophic dissolution of all his former ideals. It was now a question of complete nihilism or of creating a new goal. The ethical and moral ideas fostered by religions and metaphysics, especially Schopenhauer's pessimism, encouraged an attitude of resignation and held up nirvana or an imaginary future life as our highest hope. Particularly the Christian religion with its doctrine of total depravity broke all that was courageous in man. Psychologically this meant that man was enslaved by a powerful escape complex which unfitted him for the mastery of life and of himself. In opposition, Nietzsche set up the ideal of tragic optimism, or heroic pessimism, which views life as a tragic process but regards tragedy as the source of new life and power. Ethical rank is determined by the capacity to endure suffering and rise superior to it in a new creative effort. The symbol he used for his ideal was the Greek god Dionysus. As a sort of new metaphysical frame, though he ostensibly repudiated metaphysics, he evolved the ideas of the "will to power" and the "eternal return" as his highest expression of the affirmation of earthly existence—in a sense another concept of an "absolute" and another version of immortality. The hypothesis underlying the "will to power" is that in all existence the urge of each vital unit is to secure at every moment the utmost feeling of power, in whatever disguised ways it may be, and according to the "eternal return," life in all its forms will be repeated without change in ever recurring cycles.

Nietzsche first proclaimed his theory of heroic pessimism in Die Geburt der Tragödie (1872), which connected the rebirth of the tragic spirit with Wagner's music dramas. At the same time he was advancing new educational ideas in certain public lectures at Basel and in his Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen (4 parts, 1873-1876), all centering around the differences between learning and culture. A new series of analytical studies began with Menschliches Allzumenschliches (1878-1880). Rounding out this group were Morgenröte (1881) and Fröhliche Wissenschaft (1882). At the outset of this period, pure knowledge is represented as man's highest achievement and greatest consolation. Metaphysics, religion, and the aesthetic arts reflecting them are subjected to dispassionate criticism, not without nostalgic relapses. Saint, poet, and philosopher are superseded by the scientist. Biological determinism relieves man of the great burden of responsibility and fear accompanying a "free will." Nietzsche begins his history of moral ideas and shows his hostility to the state as a menace to true culture. As he proceeds he questions the sufficiency of pure knowledge and ends with the idea of "joyful knowledge." This period finds its climax in Also sprach Zarathustra (4 parts, 1883-1892), his greatest bid for the popularization of his ideas. The limitations of man in his highest forms are exposed. In the figure of Zarathustra a new type is foreshadowed. He has been through all the "thou shalt" and "thou shalt not" and, having gained mastery over his baser passions, can now safely entrust himself to a creative morality of "I will."

After Zarathustra, Nietzsche again returned to the rational principles of his thinking. In Jenseits von Gut und Böse (1886), a fifth part of Fröhliche Wissenschaft (1887), and Zur Genealogie der Moral (1887), he produced some of his best writing. More and more stress is laid upon the function of the so-called evil forces in the economy of life, and the idea of the "will to power" emerges clearly. What probably would have been Nietzsche's greatest book, in which he intended to develop his ideas in their philosophical and ethical implications, remained unwritten. Materials for it are to be found in Vols. IX-X of his works (Taschenausgabe) entitled Der Wille zur Macht, compiled by his sister and Peter Gast on the basis of a brief outline left by Nietzsche. The three works written and published in 1888, Der Fall Wagner, Götzendämmerung, and Der Antichrist, and two others composed in that year but published later, the autobiographical Ecce Homo (1900), and Nietzsche contra Wagner (1901), represent a final effort to gain general recognition. They are somewhat uneven, frequently rising to Nietzsche's accustomed height but occasionally falling into old ruts of thought, imitation, and ranting. Megalomania appears. Nietzsche regards himself as Dionysus, victor over Christ after two thousand years of dominion.

The complete works of Nietzsche have appeared in English, edited by Dr. Oscar Levy (Edinburg and London, 1909-1913). See: Elisabeth Förster-Nietzsche, The Young Nietzsche (1912) and The Lonely Nietzsche (1915), tr. from the German; G. B. Foster, Friedrich Nietzsche (1931, in English); Ernst Bertram, Nietzsche (1933); Karl Jaspers, Nietzsche: Einführung in das Verständnis seines Philosophierens (1936); Crane Brinton, Nietzsche (1941, in English); G. A. Morgan, Jr., What Nietzsche Means (1941).

T. M. C.

Nijlen, Jan van (1884-, Flemish poet), was born in Antwerp. He was originally engaged in his father's banking business, but in 1919 became connected with the Ministry of Justice in Brussels, where he now occupies a high official post.

Van Nijlen's poetry is full of an endless desire to be "elsewhere," full of the eternal homesickness of romanticism, but expressed in a classically governed form. He is the poet of the loneliness of the individual amid the busy turmoil of cities, of the loneliness of older persons amid the bustle of youth, of the loneliness of the poet amid the lively confusion of merchants. In 1938 his poetry was collected in a volume entitled Gedichten (Poems). He has also written two extensive studies, one in 1919 on Charles Péguy and one in 1928 on Francis Jammes (qq.v.), and has prepared a translation, with explanatory notes and an introduction, of the best essays of Montaigne.

J. G.

Nikitin, Nikolai (1897-, Russian novelist, short-story writer, and playwright), spent his childhood in the extreme North of Russia and his youth in Petrograd. In 1922 he joined the literary group of "Serapion Brothers" led by Gorky and Zamyatin (qq.v.). The latter influenced Nikitin's early work (Kamni, 1922, Stones; Rvotny fort, 1922, Vomiting Fort; Vosstanye, 1923, The Revolt; Russkie nochi, 1924, Russian Nights), in which the young writer made many stylistic experiments, using all sorts of formal devices—rhythmic prose, folklore elements, symbolistic construction. In general, a combination of romanticism and stylization are characteristic of Nikitin. His novels and short stories are always centered around the events of the Revolution and civil war in Russian villages and small provincial towns. These romantic interpretations of the Revolution, which remind one of Pilnyak (q.v.), were gradually superseded by a more direct approach to reality. Nikitin's novel Prestuplenye Kirika Rudenko (1927; Kirik Rudenko's Crime) describing ethical problems faced by the Communist youth was written in a more traditional realistic manner. Shpion (1930; The Spy), Linya ognia (1931; The Line of Fire), and the play Baku (1937) deal with life and issues of the reconstruction period. In 1942–1944 Nikitin wrote good short stories on the Russo-German war.

M. S.

Noailles, Anna Elisabeth de Brancovan, comtesse de (1876–1933, French poet), was born in Paris. Her father was Prince Grégoire Bibesco de Brancovan, whose ancestors were rulers of Walachia (now part of Rumania), and her mother was a Greek, born in Constantinople. Anna de Noailles spent most of her life in Paris and at Amphion, the family estate on Lake Geneva in Switzerland. At Amphion, where she lived every summer, even after her marriage to Henri Mathieu, comte de Noailles, in 1897, she took voluminous notes on the tiniest details of nature. As a child she composed verses and extemporized brilliantly in prose before the art-loving society that frequented her parents' home. Educated by private tutors, she read widely and early developed a taste for the philosophies of Taine (q.v.), Schopenhauer, and Nietzsche (q.v.). She evolved a cult of pleasure and the belief that sensation is the only reality; such convictions caused her to scoff at Christianity and declare herself a pagan. Among the poets who influenced her poetic style were Racine, Hugo, Musset, and Baudelaire (q.v.). Her verse is classic in form, but her treatment of the eternal themes of love, nature, and death is a feminized version of that of the early romantic poets, with an added element of Dionysiac fervor. From Baudelaire she learned the evocative power of intuitive imagery to interpret her sensuous appreciation of nature. Pride in her oriental origin and staunch patriotism for France are other favorite themes. Believing inspiration the true guide to poetic creation, Anna de Noailles refused to discipline her thoughts or polish her style. Consequently there is much repetition and exaggeration in the poems comprising her nine large volumes of verse, published 1901–1934. Her early poems express an exuberant joie de vivre and evoke a dazzling world of nature, of which she feels herself the center and pivot. Her later books show an ever increasing pessimism and disillusion with life, as she grows older and more aware of death. In general, her prose is greatly inferior to her poetry. Her three novels show a lack of organization and of the objectivity proper to such material. Her other prose works are essays, short stories, a number of prefaces, travel impressions, and an autobiography, Le Livre de ma vie (1932).

Anna de Noailles received much literary recognition during her lifetime. When her first book of poems, Le Cœur innombrable, appeared in 1901, it was hailed as a chef-d'œuvre, and subsequent collections met with similar success. In 1919 she was invited to join the Nouvelle Pléiade, the other members being Paul Valéry (q.v.), Joachim Gasquet, Xavier de Magallon, Pierre Camo, Tristan Derème, and Charles Derennes. In 1921 she was awarded the Grand Prix de Littérature of the French Academy, and in 1922 she was admitted to the Belgian Academy.

See: Jean Larnac, Comtesse de Noailles; sa vie, son œuvre (1931).

C. B. C.

Nobre, António (1867–1900, Portuguese poet), born in Oporto, spent his childhood in the company of peasants and fishermen. In 1888 he matriculated in the law school of Coimbra, but failed during his first year. Lack of mental discipline was accompanied by a sickly constitution. He devoted his time to poetry in order to be a "Bachelor Graduated in Illusions" from the University of the Chimaera." He then went to Paris to study political science and law, established himself in the Latin Quarter, and, suffering from tuberculosis and also from nostalgia for his Portugal of sea and country, alternated his studies with the writing of poetry. In 1891 he visited Germany and in the following year had published, in Paris, a collection of poems written from 1884 to 1892 with the title Só (Alone). This was the lyric autobiography of an ailing spirit tormented by the desire for life. The author himself warned his compatriots against "the saddest book in Portugal." The book in fact aroused sympathy and enthusiasm and began to exert its powerful influence on contemporary Portuguese poetry. A host of imitators appeared, idolaters of "Sósismo." Then Nobre began his wandering and dramatic peregrination in search of better climes, struggling with the consuming illness and with the presentiment of the end. He went to Switzerland (1895), where he sang of that country's beneficent mountains, and to the United States (1897) and finally sought refuge in the Madeira Islands (1898). There his illness became worse. Oppressed by an insatiable thirst for travel—in search of rest—he returned to Switzerland in 1899 and finally, all hope for recovery gone, to Portugal, where he died in Foz, the scene of his childhood, at the age of 33. Nobre's death added to his renown. Two years later his brother published Despedidas (Farewells), a collection of the poems written from 1893 to 1899.

Nobre's work—with that of Eugénio de Castro (q.v.)—represents in Portuguese poetry the return, following realism, to artistic purity and intimate subjectivity. Essentially a neo-romantic, a sick aesthete attracted by the latest forms of decadency (through which he had inherited the romantic forms), he combined this neo-romanticism with the candor of a childish soul imbued with devotion to Portuguese folkloric elements. Nostalgia, accentuated by illness, made of Portuguese life and landscape one of the constituent elements of his art. This regionalism, extremely original in its expression, revived the Portuguese lyric and gave birth to the nationalistic poetic movement. Endowed with a remarkable capacity for assimilation, he reduced everything to an extremely personal formula of artistic creation. The synthesis of ingredients as dissimilar as Portuguese folkloric elements and decadence produces alternative attitudes in his work—discernible in a single poem—of satanism and rustic candor; the elemental mysticism of the race appears in fusion with the deliriums of neurosis. The style, which follows these contrasts of angelic sweetness and Luciferian rebellion, connotes a tremendous lack of interior balance, a product of the morbid sensitiveness of the nervous system. There is a deliberate twisting of form, which gives a really astounding variety and flexibility of metric combinations and from which derives the poet's unmistakable manner. Nobre deliberately disregards established rhythmical customs and syntactical laws and utilizes the incoherent to produce that sensation, expressive of the ineffable, sought by the poet. One finds an almost unbelievable richness of images which, owing to extraordinary associative plasticity, open a new metaphoric cycle in contemporary Portuguese poetry.

Nobre's work marked a return to simple folklore and to irrational, mysterious, and Messianic pessimism, perhaps the basal substrata of the Portuguese soul. His dolorous and hopeless song in the sonnet "Ao cair das folhas" (When the Leaves Fall) is the morbid enjoyment of the anticipation of death. In the few published fragments of the epic poem "O Desejado" (The Desired) he associates dramatically the destruction of his physical life with the disaster of Alcácer-Quebir; King Dom Sebastião is simply the symbol of the crumbling of his illusions. The collective cry of renunciation in "Lusitânia no Bairro Latino" (Lusitania in the Latin Quarter) has caused Le Gentil to call him "the great master of discouragement."

See: A. da Veiga Simões, António Nobre (1904); Visconde de Vila-Moura, António Nobre (1915); Castelo Branco Chaves, Estudos críticos (1932), pp. 125-147.

E. G. D.

Noel, Eugenio (1885-1936, Spanish novelist and journalist), was born in Madrid. He became known through his book Lo que vi en la guerra (1912), denouncing the Moroccan War of 1909, in which he had served as a private. A picturesque reformer, he acquired a kind of popularity for his bohemian appearance and his campaigns against bullfighting, "flamenco-ism," and other aspects of social life in Spain considered by the intellectuals since the end of the 19th century as national ills. Products of his campaigns were books and pamphlets such as República y flamenquismo (1912) and Escenas y andanzas de la campaña anti-flamenca (1913) as well as the four which were all published in 1915—Las capeas; Pan y toros; Señoritos, chulos, fenómenos, gitanos y flamencos; and Las raíces de la tragedia española. Of greater literary value are certain books of impressions and travels such as Semana Santa en Sevilla (1916), España nervio a nervio (1924), and Agua fuertes ibéricos (1927) or such novels as Las siete cucas (1927). He wrote at times in a forceful although somewhat muddled and baroque style, was gifted with natural talent, and had a varied culture; but a temperamental lack of balance and a deficiency in formal studies prevented his successful development.

See: Azorín, Los valores literarios (1913), pp. 231-234.

A. del R.

Nordal, Sigurður (1886–, Icelandic poet, critic, and scholar), was born at Eyjófsstaðir in Vatnsdalur, North Iceland. He studied Old Norse-Icelandic philology at the University of Copenhagen, taking his M.A. in 1912 and his Ph.D. in 1914 with a study of the Sagas of the Norwegian Kings. He studied psychology and philosophy at Oxford in 1917–1918 and became professor of the Icelandic language and literature at the University of Iceland in 1918, holding the post until 1945. He has frequently lectured in Scandinavia and in England, and in the United States he held the Charles Eliot Norton professorship of poetry at Harvard University in 1931–1932.

Nordal's short stories and prose poems are all contained in one slim volume, Fornar ástir (1919; Old Loves). The short stories are of the psychological kind and of no unusual merit. But the prose poem "Hel" is unequalled in Icelandic literature for beauty of style and originality of conception. The influence of French "decadent" masters is obvious. Unfortunately, the work has had no imitators. But as a critic in the tradition of Sainte-Beuve and of Renan (q.v.) his favorite, Nordal has been extremely influential in Iceland. In the modern field he has written brilliant essays on the most prominent figures. He has also attacked the pre-war liberalism, especially as mixed with the spiritualism of E. H. Kvaran (q.v.), demanding more discipline in thought and action. Finally, he has emphasized the principle of continuity in Icelandic literature and thought and urged deference for national values, whether they date from the golden age of the saga or are more recent, such as the modern rustic culture of Iceland. In the Old Icelandic (Norse) field his studies and essays on Snorri Sturluson (1920), Völuspá (1923), and Egill Skallagrímsson (1924) are of fundamental importance. His plan for a new epoch-making literary edition of the sagas is well begun, with many volumes already published (1933–). But his masterpiece will undoubtedly be Íslensk menning (1942–; Icelandic Culture), of which only the first volume has appeared. It is a thoroughly new evaluation of Iceland's contribution to world literature and world civilization, a masterful study of the small nation and a remarkable synthesis of a lifetime of study.

See: S. Einarsson, "Sigurður Nordal," Tímarit Þjóðræknisfélags Íslendinga, XIII (1931), 7–18.

S. E.

Nordström, Ludvig (1882–1942, Swedish novelist and short-story writer), began his literary career as a genial teller of full-bodied fisher-folk tales and completed his cycle of development as a literary world-planner in the manner of H. G. Wells. All of his best work finds its setting in and near the harbor town of Härnösand (the Öbacka of his tales and novels), Nordström's birthplace on the Baltic not far from the Polar Circle; but this limitation of scene in no way restricts the rather pretentious, world-embracing imagination which animates the "philosophical" contents of much of Nordström's work, particularly the later novels. Unlike the pure individualist Hamsun (q.v.), who also wrote of the life in small harbor communities in the Far North, Nordström is extremely social minded. His late work includes as its central ideational element nothing less than a super-world-plan (named "totalism"), which proposes a Utopian world society based on a world-wide economic solidarity. Into this world society Nordström quite naturally fits his own northern Sweden, whose rapid transformation into a rich modern industrial province he had witnessed in the course of his life. Instead of worshiping the past and that which is peculiar if not unique in the Swede (a form of provincialism not uncommon in Swedish literature: Lagerlöf, Heidenstam, Karlfeldt, qq.v.), Nordström worships modern industrial progress as an international phenomenon in which Sweden can play an important part; and his heroes are, in consequence, builders of industry and leaders of finance rather than the military and the ancient ruling classes. He develops these ideas in a very prolific literary production, on a rather abstract and universal plane in such works as Nya himlar och en ny jord (1917; New Heavens and a New Earth), Döda världar i samhällsrymden (1920; Dead Worlds on Society's Horizon), and Världsstaden (1923; The World City), and in a somewhat more immediate and concrete way in a series of novels under the general heading Petter Svensks historia (Peter Swede's Story), an attempt to define with some precision Sweden's particular place in the proposed world economic community.

Despite Sweden's remarkable economic and industrial growth in the last two generations, Nordström has found few disciples, literary or otherwise, among his countrymen, chiefly perhaps because his social and economic philosophy is too patently schematic and superficial in its interpretation of national and international developments. As a purely literary figure, however, Nordström is more significant. His Rabelaisian vitality and boundless appetite for life in all its forms, combined with a stylistic gusto of remarkable range and a well-nigh inexhaustible imaginative inventiveness, place him unquestionably high among Swedish authors of the last two generations. His early fisherfolk and harbor town tales (Fiskare, 1917, Fisherfolk; Borgare, 1909, Citizens; Herrar, 1910, Gentlemen; and De tolv söndagarna, 1910, The Twelve Sundays), free from the pretentious theorizing of his later work, are on the whole his best work, though his undeniable literary talents not infrequently break through the schematic outlines of the "philosophy" in his late work and provide the reader with some of the best writing in modern Swedish fiction.

See: E. Hedén, Eros och Himeros (1917); F. Böök, Resa kring svenska Parnassen (1926), pp. 220-236; G. Castrén, Den nya tiden, 1870-1914 (1932), Vol. VII of H. Schuck and K. Warburg, Illustrerad svensk litteraturhistoria, 3d ed., pp. 470-478; K. Stromberg, Modern svensk litteratur (1932), pp. 140-148, 159-161; G. Näsström, "Ludvig Nordström," Ord och bild, XLVII (1938), 1-11.

A. G.

Norwegian literature. Norwegian literature shows as strong repercussions of the Modern Awakening initiated in 1871 by Georg Brandes (q.v.) as does the Danish (see Danish literature). The immediate impulse was given by Brandes, but the revolt had long been prepared by the struggle of the Norwegian people to find itself nationally; and the movement in Norway was shaped by national characteristics, by the Norwegian preoccupation with ethical problems, by the tendency to relate literature closely to life, and most of all by the passion for truth and hatred of hypocrisy. The importance of the epoch can hardly be stressed too much. It is possible to trace every new development in modern Norway to the literature which in the 1870's was dominated by four great writers: Henrik Ibsen, Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson, Jonas Lie, and Alexander Kielland (qq.v.). The liberalizing of the government, the revolt against an authoritarian church, the emancipation of women, the modernizing of education, the new social conscience leading to legislative reforms, and even the development of natural resources which brought expansion of life and somewhat relieved the grim poverty of the 19th century—all have their germs in the literary works of the age.

Bjørnson's En fallit (1875; Eng. tr., The Bankrupt, in Three Dramas, 1914) and Ibsen's Samfundets støtter (1877; Eng. tr., The Pillars of Society) introduced the modern realistic drama. Both authors turned from historical subjects to models immediately before them. Both plays deal with dishonesty in business, and both foreshadow that faith in woman as a regenerative influence which was to be so marked in the literature of the future. Jonas Lie created the modern novel picturing family life, sometimes among seafaring people, sometimes in the upper class of business and professional people. Kielland castigated the rich for luxurious living and for exploiting their laborers, but at the same time his novels, such as Skipper Worse (1882; Eng. tr., 1885), describe with gusto the activities of seafaring, shipbuilding, trade, and fisheries that were the life of his native town, Stavanger. Both Kielland and Lie satirized the pedantic education of the time as created by bureaucrats to raise more bureaucrats while ignoring preparation for practical life. They even went so far as to suggest that girls of good families could take jobs in offices and had a naïve faith in the efficacy of these measures to solve the woman problem that had been raised by Camilla Collett (q.v.) as early as in 1855. Jonas Lie was especially sensitive to the sufferings of women in the upper classes. Ibsen disclaimed the intention of being in any special sense the champion of women, and when the supporters of women's rights appropriated for their cause Et dukkehjem (1879; Eng. tr., A Doll's House) he stated that he was interested in human beings, not particularly in women. Nevertheless it could not be helped that Nora's refusal to be the plaything of her husband and her insistence on her right to break a marriage in which she could no longer live worthily should start a discussion of the problems relating to women and marriage. The discussion became more stormy on the appearance of Gengangere (1881; Eng. tr., Ghosts), with its far more somber theme. Here Ibsen posed the question of whether a woman whose husband was diseased and dissolute should still cover up his sins and stay with him. A somewhat undigested Darwinism entered into Ghosts and still more into the works of Bjørnson, leading to a more and more decided repudiation, not only of the church, but of Christianity itself. In its place Bjørnson would put faith in evolution and in the perfectibility of man.

The decade of the 70's had been that of realism. The decade of the 80's became that of naturalism. It was a period of bitter partisanship, when the nation was divided into two camps, a liberal and a conservative. Families were wrecked and old friendships were broken, while the members of the two camps could hardly speak to each other. But then the liberal camp was split wide open by the issues of religion and morality. Works of literature were no longer judged on the beauty of their style or the profundity of their thought, but on their attitude toward this or that question of the day. Atheism and sex were discussed with a freedom never known before. Zola (q.v.) became the model of the naturalistic writers. Absolute unrestraint in matters of sex was urged by Hans Jæger in his novel Fra Kristiania-Bohème (1885; From the Christiania Bohème). It was a book devoid of literary merit, but the fact that it was confiscated by the police made it an issue to those who demanded freedom of speech, and it precipitated what became known as the Morality Feud. Björnson, although he had renounced the Christian faith, still believed in Christian morality, and made himself the champion of old-fashioned standards. In his drama En hanske (1883; Eng. tr., A Gauntlet, 1894) he made woman throw down the gauntlet to man, demanding of him the same continence before marriage that he demanded of her. His position led to a break with Brandes and brought down on him the ridicule of younger contemporaries, who mocked the "gauntlet-morality" and were not averse to a little sport at the expense of the sententious elder statesmen of literature. The most gifted of the naturalists, and perhaps the only writer of note who consistently adhered to the naturalistic school throughout her career, was Amalie Skram (q.v.). In her novels she essayed to show the demoralizing influence which the conspiracy of silence in matters of sex had on young girls. Arne Garborg (q.v.) ranged himself on the side of the naturalists with his novel Mannfolk (1888; Menfolk), picturing the miserable existence of the academic and artistic proletariat in Christiania. He blamed poverty and narrow opportunities for the prevailing immorality and urged free relations if marriage was impossible for lack of means. Ibsen, living abroad in distinguished seclusion, had kept aloof from the storm he himself had raised. Beginning with Vildanden (1884; Eng. tr., The Wild Duck) he had initiated the series of symbolic plays which he continued till his death, delving into the consciousness of the individual rather than castigating the ills of society. However much he might advocate freedom, Ibsen was at heart a puritan, and when he visited Norway in the late 80's his fastidious taste revolted against the shouting from the housetops about matters that had hitherto been considered private. His comment came in Hedda Gabler (1890), an analysis of an upper-class woman who likes to toy with erotic subjects and encourages a young man to tell her about his night life, while she herself is a sterile nature, incapable either of loving or of taking a risk.

One of the chief scoffers against Björnson was Gunnar Heiberg (q.v.), the most important playwright after Ibsen and a brilliant essayist. Heiberg satirized what he considered the pettiness of Norwegian political life, not sparing the liberal leaders. In other plays, notably Balkonen (1894; Eng. tr., The Balcony, 1922) and Kjerlighedens tragedie (1904; Eng. tr., The Tragedy of Love, in T. H. Dickinson, Chief Contemporary Dramatists, Ser. 2, 1921), he gave poetic form to the theory of love which had come out in crasser form in the works of the naturalists. He refused to see love as a social factor or a regenerative influence, but looked on it only as a devastating force of nature which must of necessity conflict with work or intellectual interests. The ecstasy of love, and by love he means chiefly the physical, must be weighed against all other life content. The lyrical beauty of Heiberg's style lends a meretricious glamour to a theory of life that is really bald and negative. Most of the books written during the two decades when literature was the vehicle of discussion had been prose. The theory had even been voiced that forms of literature change and perhaps verse was doomed to extinction. Nevertheless the period brought to maturity one of the most distinguished lyric poets of modern Norway, Nils Collett Vogt (q.v.). He sought inspiration in nature, and love of the land of Norway always remained a vital element in his verse. During his 50 years of productive work his poetry came to reflect the events and currents of the day, but it never ceases to be lyrical. His plays and novels deal more directly with timely problems. Gunnar Heiberg and Nils Collett Vogt, though each went his own way, are products of the age, with its indignations, its revolt against recognized authorities, its sympathy for those on the shady side of life, and its faith in social reforms to bring happiness to mankind.

Knut Hamsun (q.v.) took up the cudgels against this preoccupation with causes and utilitarian purposes. He accused the older authors of reducing life to its simplest factors and leaving vast areas of human experience unexplored. In his first serious book, Sult (1890; Eng. tr., Hunger, 1899), he described a young writer who went about in Christiania and starved, unable to find work. An author of the preceding decade would have made it an indictment of society which had no use for a young man with "the best brains in the country and shoulders that could stop a truck"—to quote Hamsun's modest description of his alter ego. But Hamsun was not interested in social justice. He cared only for what hunger did to the young man's mind and body and nerves, and he described it in a style which in its lightness and flexibility and capriciousness was as new as his approach. Hunger initiated the neo-romantic school in Norway. It was followed by other incarnations of Hamsun's wanderer type, the individual who is always an outsider from life, not from choice, but because his nerves and senses are differently attuned from those of the ordinary citizen. While Hamsun has been the most widely popular contemporary author of Norway, Hans E. Kinck (q.v.) has had a small but devoted following. He is at once a romanticist and a scholar. As the son of a country physician, he learned to know the peasants from childhood and later came to see them in the light of his historical studies. He conceived of them as vikings born too late, medieval characters thrown into an age when they could find no outlet for their cravings except drinking and brawling and fighting at weddings. In spite of Kinck's genius, especially evident in his short stories, his countrymen resented the picture of primitive savagery, at times almost bestiality, which he presented as the image of Norwegian peasants.

Toward the end of the 19th and in the beginning of the 20th century, with the movement initiated by Ivar Aasen (q.v.), writers became increasingly conscious of the dual nature of the Norwegian people, one element being represented by the peasants who spoke their dialects derived from the Old Norse, the other being the "foreign" official class. Many of the latter were descended from officials who had come in during the union with Denmark, and they spoke a language closely resembling the Danish, called Riksmåal. Garborg was a partisan of the peasantry. Kinck regarded the cleavage between the two folk elements as too deep ever to be bridged. The language problem he endeavored to solve by using the Riksmåal with a more phonetic spelling and incorporating many dialect words. Most Norwegian authors have followed this principle, though with a wide leeway in style and diction. Others have adopted the Landsmaal, a synthesis of peasant dialects. It is probable that the latter have curtailed the circle of their readers by using the Landsmaal. It must be admitted, however, that in the hands of a master like Garborg, as for instance in his lyric cycle Haugtussa (1895; The Hill Innocent), the Landsmaal is unsurpassed for poetic beauty and flexibility. Another poet who has used it with success is Per Sivle (q.v.). Elias Blix (q.v.) and Anders Hovden (1860–) have enriched the Lutheran hymnbook with hymns written in the Landsmaal, which seems well suited to the expression of religious feeling. Among the older authors who used Landsmaal exclusively, Jens Tvedt (q.v.) was very productive and popular. With Olav Duun (q.v.) the Landsmaal came into its own as the exclusive vehicle of an artist of the first rank. In his books the peasant community is described absolutely from the inside, self-sufficient, resting in itself, without any of the attitude of protest found in Kinck or Garborg. His greatest work is the six-volume novel cycle Juvingar (1918–1923; Eng. tr., The People of Juvik, 1930–1935), tracing the history for more than a century of a family of wealthy, landowning peasants. It is a dynasty founded in violence like greater dynasties; and even in the descendants of the "old fellows" there are atavistic impulses, throwbacks to a more savage time, but in the end the Christian and humanitarian impulses win out. The style has a saga terseness well suited to the epic quality of the story. Another author who has written epic works in the Landsmaal is Kristofer Uppdal (q.v.). His books signalize the advent of the laboring class into literature. He deals often with the vagrant laborers, in strong contrast with Duun's conservative peasants.

The 20th century shows such volume and variety of literary production in Norway that it is difficult to trace special schools. In general one may say that the first two decades are marked by a strong regionalism, due in part to the increasing number of peasant writers, in part to the geographical conditions in an enormously elongated country pierced by deep fjords and divided by mountain ranges. Garborg, after a long sojourn in the capital, did his best work writing in Landsmaal about the peasants on the small, poor farms of southwestern Norway, where he was born. Hamsun abandoned the story seen through the reflective mind of his wanderer type to describe whole communities of Nordland, as in Segelfoss by (1915; Eng. tr., Segel- foss Town, 1925) with its great family, its parvenus, and its lively, reckless fisherfolk. Markens grøde (1917; Eng. tr., Growth of the Soil, 1920), the book which won its author world fame and the Nobel prize, is an apotheosis of husbandry and is less completely localized, but in his later works, telling the story of his scalawag "hero" August, Hamsun returns to the Nordland background he knew as a child. Thomas Krag (q.v.), one of the leading neo-romantic authors, came of an old aristocratic family in southern Norway and drew on his early environs, often picturing in colorful style the decay of such an old family. His younger brother Vilhelm Krag (q.v.) wrote novels and poems with the same background. Gabriel Scott (q.v.) also draws his themes from southern Norway, but from the life of the poor and humble and simple-minded. His best known novel is Kilden (1918; The Fountain), which combines with spiritual beauty an idyllic quality rare in Norwegian literature. Very different are the books picturing the hard, stiff-necked, sturdy people of the interior. Among these a high place is taken by Hans Aanrud (q.v.), one of the foremost writers of peasant stories, whose background is the Gudbrandsdal, the heart of Norway from ancient times. Jacob Breda Bull (1853-1930) was at his best in stories of the wooded Österdal, where the people are not only tillers of the soil but know the more adventurous life of lumbering and hunting. Peter Egge (q.v.) has described his native Trondheim and environs in vigorous novels, the best known being Hansine Solstad (1925; Eng. tr., Hansine Solstad, the History of an Honest Woman, 1929). A little to the north lies Olav Duun's Namdalen, the background of his Juvik series. An altogether unique milieu is that of Johan Falkberget (q.v.) who writes of the people in the small mining town of Röros on the treeless plateau over toward Sweden. His three-volume novel cycle Christianus Sextus (1927-1935), so named from one of the old copper mines, goes back to the first half of the 18th century and pictures a cosmopolitan community of German mining experts, Danish officials, Swedish immigrants from across the border, and Norwegian peasant miners. For multiplicity of types he has been compared to Selma Lagerlöf (q.v.). As a regional writer we may also classify Oscar Braaten (1881-), who writes about the proletariat in Oslo's East Side, often using their own dialect.

It is a significant fact that Johan Bojer (q.v.) did not completely win the allegiance of his own people before he wrote Den siste vikings (1921; Eng. tr., Last of the Vikings, 1923), a vivid story of the great winter fisheries at Lofoten before the oar and sail had been supplanted by the motor. Much earlier Bojer had won admiration abroad by his psychological problem novels, a characteristic example of which is Troens magt (1903, The Power of Faith; Eng. tr., The Power of a Lie, 1908), in which a man makes himself believe a lie he has once uttered and finally acts upon it without a twinge of conscience. In Den store hunger (1916; Eng. tr., The Great Hunger, 1918) he preached an undogmatic religion of forgiveness and love for one's enemies. Coming as it did during the First World War, the book struck a responsive chord, especially in America. A novelist and playwright whose work is akin to Bojer's problem novels is Sigurd Christiansen (1891-), and although he lacks Bojer's gift of vivacious narrative, he far surpasses him in depth and veracity. In To levende og en død (1931; Eng. tr., Two Living and One Dead, 1932) he satirizes the vicarious heroism of a community which turns a cold shoulder on a man who has refused to throw away his life as a mere heroic gesture in futile defense of money entrusted to him. Modern fiction in Norway shows a wide variety of types. Nini Roll Anker (1873-1942) interprets the problems of women, but is at her best when describing the aristocratic environment in which she grew up. Trygve Andersen (q.v.) painted a solid and careful picture of life in official circles in the early 19th century. Hjalmar Christensen (1869-1925) wrote a series of novels dealing with the life of government officials beginning with the end of the 17th century. Kristian Elster (q.v.), a competent literary critic and historian, wrote novels of Christiania as well as the countryside. Ronald Fangen (1895-), also a distinguished literary critic, has essayed novels and plays which are thoughtful and written with a pronounced Christian tendency. Sigurd Hoel (q.v.) is a flippant and sophisticated satirist possessed of a polished and brilliant style.

By the end of the 19th century it seemed that the wave of revolt which had passed through Norwegian literature had spent itself. Most of the freedoms for which the writers of the period had contended had been won. It followed that the regional writers, described above, settled down to picture objectively the locality or phase of life each knew best, while others, like Bojer, Christiansen, and Fangen, dealt with the moral problems that are common to humanity in any age or under any conditions. Some show a decided turning back to old ideas of religion and morality. In no one is this tendency more pronounced than in Sigrid Undset (q.v.), the greatest writer of 20th-century Norway. The scene of her early novels was laid in Christiania (now Oslo). Her heroines are often young girls working in offices, living in dreary lodgings, sometimes seeking satisfaction for their pent-up longing for life and happiness in free love relations, but, because they are at bottom serious and moral, never able to take a light relation lightly, suffering the penalty in disillusionment. Powerful as these low-toned realistic novels were, it was not until she began to choose medieval subjects that the author revealed the full scope of her genius. The magnificent trilogy Kristin Lavransdatter (1920–1922; Eng. tr., 1923–1927) differs from the ordinary historical novel in that it does not deal with famous characters or epochal events, but pictures a 14th-century family with a wealth of detail which shows intensive historical study. It is the story of a woman in her relations as daughter, wife, and mother, but above all it is the story of a soul in its relation to God. In the tetralogy Olav Audunsson (1925–1927; Eng. tr., The Master of Hestviken, 1928–1930) the outer events are quite subordinate to Olav's spiritual development. Though bleaker and harsher than Kristin Lavransdatter, it is even more absorbing as a penetrating analysis of sin, retribution, and final redemption. It is Sigrid Undset's great distinction that she has made spiritual experience life's most exalted adventure. In medieval times, with their bolder outlines and sharper contrasts, above all with their conception of wrongdoing not as a mistake but as a sin against God, she found the medium suited to her. After achieving these two great novel cycles, she returned, however, to a modern background. Gymnadenia (1929; Eng. tr., The Wild Orchid, 1931) and its sequel Den brændende busk (1930; Eng. tr., The Burning Bush, 1932) describe the conversion of a young Norwegian to the Catholic Church. In her later books the author continues her treatment of family problems, without introducing any distinct religious element, but always along the lines of conservative morality.

Norwegian literature of the 20th century has few dramatists of note, but is rich in lyric poetry. Nils Kjer (1870–1924) was an essayist and dramatist of rather light caliber. Helge Krog (1889–) continues the tradition from Gunnar Heiberg both in his social satires and his conception of love. Nordahl Grieg (q.v.), one of the younger authors of Norway, wrote successful plays as well as poetry and novels. He was a champion of the proletariat with decided leftist sympathies, went to sea, and traveled widely. For all his internationalism, he was deeply imbued with patriotism. His lyric cycle Norge i vore Hjerter (1929, Norway in Our Hearts) is a homage to the plain people by whose labor the country subsists. Similar tendencies may be found in Arnulf Överland (q.v.), considered the most distinguished lyric poet of Norway today. He was one of the first to warn against the dangers of Nazism. Olaf Bull (q.v.) launched a passionate attack on German militarism in 1918, predicting that all beauty, culture, and spiritual life would be crushed under a flat-footed soldiery. Olaf Bull is the most intellectual of modern Norwegian poets. Sigbjørn Obstfelder (q.v.) and Vilhelm Krag broke with the conventional form of poetry and created a new irregular meter. Herman Wildenvey (q.v.) carried this further and developed the long billowing line which C. J. Hambro says is "peculiar to the great wanderers of literature." Wildenvey's light lyrics, often dealing with young love, have won for him a popularity equaled by no Norwegian author except Hamsun. Rolf Hjørth Schøyen (1887–) and Jean Føyen (1878–) are followers of Wildenvey. Among men writing in Landsmaal the visionary Olav Aukrust (q.v.) and the epic-lyric poet Tore Ørjasæter (q.v.) are most distinguished.

See: F. Bull, F. Paasche, and A. H. Winsnes, Norsk litteraturhistorie (5 vols., 1924–1937); K. Elster, d.y., Illustreret norsk litteraturhistorie (2 vols., 1923–1924); I. Grøndahl and O. Raknes, Chapters in Norwegian Literature (1923); H. G. Topsøe-Jensen, Scandinavian Literature from Brandes to Our Day (1929); A. Gustafson, Six Scandinavian Novelists (1940); Theodore Jorgenson, History of Norwegian Literature (1933).

H. A. L.

Nouveau, Germain (1852–1920, French poet), almost unknown in his own day, will be remembered for having written some of the most beautiful religious poetry of the 19th century. His life was a strange one. Born of poor parents in Pourrières, Var, and never quite free of poverty, during the first half of his life he made a living as best he could, chiefly in Paris, giving drawing lessons, occasionally selling an illustration to a magazine, working sporadically at any odd job that offered itself. Throughout this period he was writing poetry, and though not published, his work was known and praised by Richépin, Coppée, and Villiers de l'Isle-Adam (qq.v.). More important was his friendship with Rimbaud (q.v.), whom he had met by 1873 and with whom he traveled in England, and with Verlaine (q.v.), whose work strongly influenced him. It was through Verlaine and Verlaine's mother that he returned to Catholicism in 1877. Towards the end of the century, the religious fervor that had steadily increased since his conversion dominated him completely. Repenting of his early bohemian existence, he begged those of his friends who possessed manuscript copies of his poems to destroy them, and cutting himself off completely from the past, he began a period of wandering on foot, begging his bread from church door to church door, journeying to Rome, to St. James of Compostella, and finally up and down the roads of Provence until his death. His whereabouts had been unknown for years, when in 1920 the news came from Pourrières that he had died there, in the public hospital.

Though Nouveau commanded the destruction of his poems, his friends did not heed his order, and in 1904 a collection of his religious verse appeared under the title Savoir aimer (reedited and enlarged, 1910, as Poèmes d'Humilis). A second volume, Valentines et autres vers (1922), early work for the most part, adds little to his stature. Like the work of Verlaine, which it resembles so closely, Nouveau's poetry can be divided into two classes, sacred and profane. The parallel with Verlaine can be made very definitely: it would not be difficult to believe that much of Poèmes d'Humilis and Sagesse, on the one hand, and of Valentines and Chansons pour elle, on the other, was the work of a single man. In general, Nouveau's religious poems are not much inferior to those of Verlaine; often they are quite as good; and in a few rare instances they achieve a strength and simplicity, with each word carrying the utmost possible intensity, that recalls no one so much as Villon.

See: Martial Perrier, "A propos de Germain Nouveau," Mercure de France, LXXXVIII (1910), 374-377; Marcel Arland, "Poésies d'Humilis," Nouvelle Revue française, XXIV (1925), 234-236.

C. W., Jr.

Novák, Arne (1880-1939, Czech critic and literary historian), was the son of the writer Teréza Nováková (q.v.). He studied in Prague and Berlin and began teaching at the University of Prague in 1906. In 1920 he became professor of Czech literature at the newly founded Masaryk University at Brno, Moravia. He was its rector when the university was dissolved by the Germans. He died at Polička in November, 1939.

Novák ranks next to Šalda (q.v.) as the most important Czech critic. He was a master of psychological portraiture, but he knew that the most important function of the critic is judgment. Novák stressed the national tradition of Czech literature; his political outlook was conservative, and he was cool towards the most modernist literature. But he never forgot that literature is, first of all, an art. His criticisms, written in a somewhat precious style, are collected in many volumes, such as Mužové a osudy (1914; Men and Fates), Myšlenky a spisovatelé (1914; Thoughts and Writers), Zvony domova (1916; Bells of Home), Krajané a sousedé (1921; Countrymen and Neighbors), Duch a národ (1936; Spirit and Nation), and to these a small handbook, Literární kritika (1916; Literary Criticism), should be added. Novák was also a profound student of literary history; he excelled both in monographs, among which studies on Neruda (q.v.) and two volumes on Svatopluk Čech (q.v.) are most important, and in general histories of Czech literature. His German Geschichte der českischen Literatur (1907; with J. Jakubec) attracted attention by the skill of ordering his materials and the sharp judgments on local celebrities. Přehledné dějiny české literatury (1909; A Survey of the History of Czech Literature) was again and again expanded and rewritten until the fourth edition (1936-1939) included all periods of Czech literature. Novák's insight into the movement of ideas as well as into the evolution of the art of literature is as remarkable as the power of characterization and analysis. Novák was also interested in the plastic arts and wrote a book, Praha barokní (1916; Baroque Prague), which gives a sympathetic interpretation of the 17th-century architecture and civilization.

See: J. Heidenreich, Arne Novák (1940); J. Horák, A. Pražák, et al., Strážce tradice: Arne Novákovi na památku (1940); I. Liškutín, Arne Novák (1940); A. Pražák, Arne Novák (1940).

R. W.

Nováková, Teréza (née Lanhausová, 1853-1912, Czech novelist), is a prominent woman novelist of peasant life in eastern Bohemia. She was born in Prague and died there, but spent some 20 years in Litomyšl, in eastern Bohemia, where she was married to a teacher at the Gymnasium. She came to take a deep interest in the common people of the region, and this first found expression in good folkloristic and topographical studies. Later she depicted their life in novels, evidencing the same faithfulness with which Karolina Světlá (q.v.) and Josef Holeček (q.v.) described the peasants of northern and southern Bohemia. In some of her short stories her own voice sounds and the romantic pessimism of her own outlook on life is evident, but her best novels are admirably objective studies of religious and social problems. Jan Jilek (1904) tells the story of a Czech at the end of the 18th century who emigrated for religious scruples; Jiří Šmatlán (1906) traces the change of a fervent Protestant sectarian into an enthusiastic socialist; Děti čistého živého (1909; The Children of the Pure and Living) describes the decay of a remarkable pantheistic sect; and Drašar (1914) attempts the portrait of a priest and writer early in the 19th century who was wrecked by his passions. Mrs. Nováková's best work excels, in tightness of composition and penetration of psychological insight, the comparable work of Světlá and Holeček, but she lacks their vitality.

See: F. X. Šalda, "Teréza Nováková," in Duše a dílo (1913); J. Novotný, Kraj a dílo T. Novákové (1924); A. Novák, O Teréze Novákové (1930).

R. W.

Novaro, Angiolo Silvio (1866–, Italian poet and short-story writer), was born in Diano Marina on the Ligurian Riviera. Novaro's first interest was painting, and a work exhibited at the General Exposition of Turin in 1884 was favorably received by the critics, but an eye affliction made him give up the brush for the pen. His promise as a writer had been shown at an early age when several articles and short stories were accepted by the Gazzetta del popolo della domenica and the Gazzetta letteraria of Turin; the articles, when published in a single volume entitled Sul mare (1889), won the praise of Giovanni Verga (q.v.), eminent Sicilian novelist. With a brother also inclined to letters he directed an important olive oil company, whose publicity magazine, Riviera Ligure, in the years preceding the First World War contained pieces by some of the best young writers of the period, such as Papini, Soffici, and Jahier (qq.v.).

Novaro's early poems were gentle, sincere, and light of touch, of a stylistic refinement characteristic of the Carducci (q.v.) school. He was acclaimed the poet of the home and garden for his tender treatment of the familiar objects of childhood environment. His only son, Jacopo, fell in battle during the First World War at a very early age, and this bereavement inspired a narrative entitled Il Fabbro armonioso (1919) and led to an accentuation of a mystical trend, previously only faintly discernible in Novaro's poetry. Besides Il Fabbro armonioso, Novaro wrote Il Cuore nascosto (1921; poetry), La Fisarmonica (1924; short stories), Il Piccolo Orfeo (1929; poetry), but he achieved popularity only with Il Cestello (1910), a book of poems for children, some of which are now included in every Italian school anthology. In 1929 he was elected to the Italian Academy.

See: G. A. Boigese, La Vita e il libro (1910), pp. 190–195; G. Ravagnani, I Contemporanei (1930), pp. 100–109.

C. M.

Novelli, Augusto (1868–1927, Italian dramatist), was born in Florence. His first literary efforts were of a very humble nature, for he began his career as a pamphleteer and his public was the lower-middle-class world. Subsequently he turned his attention to the theatre and wrote a number of comedies, for the most part imitations of the French, characterized by nothing more than a certain superficial facility. He found his true métier toward the turn of the century when he began to compose comedies in the Florentine vernacular dealing with the piccola borghesia and the popolino of his native town. In this vein he wrote with great charm. It is obvious that such a small world—in all senses of the word—puts its limitations on the artist, and there is certainly no great character that emerges from the theatre of Novelli and no intellectual content to speak of. The plays are amusing, good-natured in tone; here and there one finds a touch of the easy cynicism of the people coupled with the sort of aphoristic morality and conventionality of the world of artisans and shopkeepers. As types the figures in his play are convincing; the dialect is handled with assurance and skill although at times self-consciously; the author is limited not so much by the use of the vernacular as by the characters he portrays and by his own rather conventional attitude towards life. The comedies do however give an excellent picture of the Florentine "little man" and are in their way in the sound tradition of Goldoni. Perhaps the best known and the most successful technically is L'Acqua cheta . . . (1908). Others of real merit are: Inferno, Purgatorio e Paradiso (1894), Casa mia, casa mia (1909), E chi vive si dà pace (1916), and La bestia nera (1909).

See: C. Levi. Il teatro (1921), pp. 20-21.

T. G. B.

Novikov-Priboi, Aleksei Silych (1877-, Russian short-story writer and novelist), was born of peasant stock in a village of the Government of Tambov, received an elementary education in the local school, and worked in the fields until his 22d year, when he became a sailor in the Baltic fleet. As a member of the crew of the battleship Orel, he participated in the long cruise to the Orient and the fateful battle of Tsushima, during which he was taken prisoner. By then Novikov had become active in the revolutionary movement among the sailors, and consequently he spent the years 1907-1913 in Western Europe, sailing for a time on English commercial ships. He had turned to literature as early as 1906, but because of the censorship found it difficult to publish. After the Revolution he joined the group of proletarian writers known as Kuznitsa (The Smithy) and became a popular author. His first collection of stories, Morskiye rasskazy (1917; Sea Stories), was followed by More zovyot (1922; The Sea Calls), Dve dushi (1923; Two Souls), and others. An adventurous life furnished him with the subject matter of his work: realist and storyteller, he makes the most of the hard life of the sailor, the class struggle, the beauty of nature, and the role that women play in men's lives. His best-known work, Tsusima (2 vols., 1933-1934; Eng. tr., Tsushima, 1936), is naval history as well as an engrossing account written by an eyewitness of the debacle of the Russian fleet. His latest book, a short novel (Kapitan 1-vo ranga, 1943; Captain, Senior Grade), is also retrospective.

See: A. S. Novikov-Priboi (1930); "Novikov-Priboi," in Literaturnaya entsiklopediya, Vol. VIII (1934).

P. A. P.

Nowaczyński, Adolf (pseud. Neuwert and Przyjacieli, 1876-1944, Polish dramatist and pamphleteer), was born in Podgórze, a suburb of Cracow, the son of a Polish official in the Austrian service. Educated in Cracow and Munich, Nowaczyński began his career in a manner prophetic of his later iconoclasm, when he publicly proposed a toast to anarchy in a Cracow café on receipt of the news of the Empress Elizabeth's assassination (1898). A tireless, vitriolic pamphleteer, full of eccentricities, spites, and prejudices—many of the latter grossly unworthy of a man of his ability and standing—Nowaczyński was Free Poland's greatest literary curiosity. He would treat any subject under the sun, including many he knew nothing about, such as the American scene, and he wrote in a style that was often turgid, ostentatious, and overloaded with foreignisms. Yet his readers were legion. He liked nothing better than to deflate the reputations of the great and, as in Warta nad Wartą (1937; Watch on the Warta), a rehabilitation of several men of western Poland, to extol the neglected. Among his many plays, in all of which history is ruthlessly distorted, are Car Dymitr (1908; Tsar Dmitri); Wielki Fryderyk (1907; The Great Frederick); Wiosna narodów (1929; The Spring of Nations), a satire on 1848; and Cesar i człowiek (1937; Caesar and Man), a drama of Copernicus and the Borgias. Nowaczyński's final work before the debacle of 1939 was the fascinating Młodość Chopina (1939; Chopin's Youth), a semifictional reconstruction of the early life of the great composer with interesting revelations of the Polish sources of Chopin's genius. Nowaczyński has been called the Polish Daudet.

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, II (1928), 213-230; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, I (1934), 262-268, 320-322.

A. P. C.

Núñez de Arce, Gaspar (1834-1903, Spanish poet, dramatist, politician, and journalist), came from middle-class stock of Valladolid. Although a conservative by temperament, he early associated himself with the liberal movement that resulted in the fall of the Bourbons in 1868. He was active in politics throughout his life and rose to the position of colonial minister. As a writer he first attracted attention with his eye-witness impressions of the African war of 1859-1860. Subsequently he wrote for the stage, often in collaboration with Antonio Hurtado. His dramatic writings followed the vogue of the thesis play, but his supreme achievement was El haz de leña (1872), a historical drama in verse, dealing with the imprisonment and death of Don Carlos, son of Philip II.

But Núñez de Arce has survived primarily as a poet. Reacting against romanticism, he wrote readily intelligible verse of social and philosophic significance, successfully reflecting the collective ideas and passions, sorrows and joys of his age. His success earned him high popularity, as is attested by the frequent editions of his works. In 1894 Spain paid him official tribute for his patriotic service and for his literary accomplishments, but in recent decades his reputation has been drastically revised downward in the light of modern poetic values.

Núñez de Arce's verse falls into two groups, philosophic and sentimental. Chief examples of the first type are Gritos del combate (1875), Raimundo Lulio (1875), La visión de Fray Martín (1880), Ultima lamentación de Lord Byron (1879); the best known of the second category are Un idilio (1878), La pesca (1884), Maruja (1886). In their totality these works reveal a poet of impressive technical versatility but of limited vision and commonplace lyricism. When Núñez de Arce is reflective he is obsessed with doubt; when he is sentimental he lacks personal poignancy. But, whether he expresses the anguish resulting from the conflict between soul and mind, form and spirit, idealism and reality, or whether he interprets familiar reality in terms of readily felt tenderness and delicacy, he is ever conscious of the inherent power of attractive form to furnish an impressive measure of compensation for the inferior quality of substance. Hence his greatest effectiveness derives from rhetoric, eloquence, and conventional poetical adornment in general. His verse lends itself to declamation, and, indeed, public recitals of some of his compositions contributed much to their popularity.

As the poet of doubt Núñez de Arce betrays an intellectual deficiency rather than a philosophic attitude. He is neither a profound nor an inquisitive spirit. The enigmas of life do not intrigue him; his mind is stirred only by what is immediate, clear, and comprehensible. By temperament he liked order, methodicalness, formulas; hence, whatever defied instant penetration stimulated doubt in him. Yet in his day he expressed the dilemma of thinking persons. Brought up to worship liberal political and social ideals, he was grievously disappointed to discover that humanity is manifestly incapable of maintaining the loftiness and purity of an ideal when it is translated into action. He was reluctant to abandon his faith in human perfectibility, but the scant evidence of its realness disheartened him. In austere, patriarchal tones he declaimed against the excesses of rationalism and positivism, voicing the disillusionment of those who found slight comfort in the exchange of faith for reason.

Núñez de Arce's ultimate significance is largely historical. For his contemporaries he had a message of social import, and he delivered it honestly and sincerely, although at times with excessively studied inflection and intonation. For those who, like him, lived in an atmosphere of ideological violence, religious conflicts, and political clashes, his moral zeal and high-pitched earnestness were communicative and contagious; Fernando de Herrera (1534?-1597) and Manuel José Quintana (1772-1857) were revived in his poetic histrionics and patriotic bugling. For posterity he is an illuminating document concerning an age which had a pathetic faith in the power of eloquence to fortify man's spirit in his quest of the good life.

See: J. del Castillo Soriano, Núñez de Arce (1904); M. Menéndez y Pelayo, Estudios de crítica literaria, Ser. 1 (1927), pp. 291-347.

H. C. B

Nušić, Branislav (pseud. Ben Akiba, 1864-1938, Serb dramatist, novelist, and humorist), was born in Belgrade, where he studied law. Entering the foreign service he worked for 10 years in the consulates of South Serbia, then under Turkish rule. Later he became a playwright and director of the National Dramatic Theatre, chief of the Serbian Art Division, newspaperman, editor of several newspapers, author, lecturer, initiator of many cultural and national organizations and institutions. "Perpetuum mobile," as he was called, he did not long remain attached to any one task, but in the variety of his activities he was constantly useful and important for his nation. Throughout his whole career he was devoted to literature.

He became one of the most fertile and versatile of Serb writers. From the publication of his first book, Pripovetke jednog kaplara iz srpsko bugarskog rata 1885 (1886; The Story of a Corporal in the Serbo-Bulgarian War of 1885), to his death, i.e., for more than half a century, he was the most widely read Serb author and a tireless amuser of the Serbian public. The bibliography of his published works contains thousands of items.

A great part of Nušić's production is narrative. Here the best works are Ramazanske večeri (1898; The Evenings of Ramazan), Opštinsko dete (1902; The Community's Child), Ben Akiba (1907), Devetstopetnaesta (1921; Nineteen Hundred Fifteen), Autobiografija (1924; Autobiography), Hajduci (1934; The Haiduks), and several volumes of short stories (1931, 1932, 1936). His feuilletons are lively and imaginative, abounding in witticisms, comic situations, interesting anecdotes—to the detriment, it must be confessed, of psychological and genuinely literary elements. During his service in South Serbia, Nušić wrote several good books of travel whose chief value lies in the ethnographic material on this region. Sometimes his work has scientific intention; such is the case with the long study of speech, Retorika (1934; Rhetoric).

His greatest contribution is in the drama. He became a master of theatrical technique. A certain number of his plays gained wide popularity because of their patriotic or national tendencies, e.g., Knez od Semberije (1900; The Duke of Semberija), Rastko Nemanjić (1906), Danak u krvi (1907; Tribute in Blood), Hadži-Loja (1908), Nahod (1923; The Foundling). His serious dramas—Pučina (1901; The Main), Tako je moralo biti (1910; It Had to Be Thus); Iza Božjih ledja (1910; Behind God's Back)—do not represent his highest attainment.

Nušić is important above all as a writer of comedies—Sumnjivo lice (1889; A Suspicious Person), Protekcija (1889; Pull), Narodni poslanik (1896; A National Representative), Običan čovek (1900; An Ordinary Man), Šopenhauer (1900; Schopenhauer), Svet (1906; The World), Put oko sveta (1910; A Voyage around the World), Gospodja ministarka (1929; The Minister of State's Wife), Mister Dolar (1932; Mister Dollar), Beograd nekad i sad (1933; Belgrade Then and Now), Ožalošćena porodica (1934; The Mourning Family), Ujež (1935; The Association of Yugoslav Emancipated Women), Analfabeta (1935; The Illiterate), Doktor (1936), Pokojnik (1937; The Deceased). These are mostly comedies of manners or intrigue, occasionally farces. Nušić knew thoroughly each milieu, the small town as well as the capital, and he saw clearly through his fellow men. He knew society's selfish depths, its ambition, materialism, vanity; he depicted bureaucracy, corruption, the slow tempo of administration, the weaknesses of executives and politicians, and also the relations among the members of a household as well as between the family and society.

His world is the varied one of southeastern Europe, which still shows the traces of a patriarchal tradition, but which already reveals the influences of contemporary materialistic culture. His characters will remain as documents on the Balkan man in an epoch of transition.

Nušić was a constant critic and a mild reformer of customs. Without delivering moral speeches he created comic situations implying conclusions to which the spectator should come by himself. He besprinkled his plays with jolly, carefree humor and laughter; although he touched upon many vices, he did so without emphasis or bitterness. Human sins and foolishness seemed to him altogether pardonable. His characterization was often light, even superficial, as in a film. Only as time went on did his delineation become fuller, deeper, until he achieved the quality of a real satirist, an earnest judge of national life. Possessing a marvelously youthful and energetic spirit, tirelessly inventive and active he was in constant contact with his country's life; he participated in its political and social progress and expressed the strivings and thoughts of his environment for many decades.

See: P. Popović, "Srpska drama u XIX veku," Srpski književni glasnik (1902); Milan Grol, "Branislav Nušić," Srpski književni glasnik, February 16, 1938; B. Kovačević, "Branislav Nušić kao komediograf," Srpski književni glasnik, February 16, 1938.

P. A.

O

Obstfelder, Sigbjörn (1866–1900, Norwegian poet), has come to typify the fin de siècle in Norwegian poetry as has no one else. Cultivated by only a narrow circle in his lifetime, he has repeatedly been "rediscovered" since his death. He was born in Stavanger, the son of a baker, grandson of a German physician, and his singular talents were apparent already in childhood (original writing in his 11th year). His university studies began in philology, quickly shifted to engineering; he dabbled in painting, played various instruments, and won considerable skill as an im-proviser on the violin. Split as he was among these various talents, he was unable to strike out on any one of them until his return from an eight-month stay in the United States in 1891 and his recovery from a subsequent nervous breakdown. From 1892 to his untimely death he unfolded one of the most refined and eccentric literary personalities in Norwegian literature, exhibited in such volumes as Digte (1893; Poems), To novelletter (1895; Two Short Stories), Korset (1896; The Cross), De røde dråber (1897; The Red Drops), En præsts dagbog (1900; A Pastor's Diary), Efter- ladte arbeider (1903; Posthumous Writings). His form was a prose with rhythm and a poetry without rhyme, often seeking to give the effect of music through the sound of words. His themes were the universe, the soul, woman, God, and eternity, all treated in a mystic, brooding spirit, reminiscent of Eduard von Hartmann and Schopenhauer. His overpowering sense of the terror and mystery of life and his own loneliness, as well as his attempts to express the inexpressible, remind one of the paintings of his countryman and contemporary, Edvard Munch. He was a neo-romantic of the purest water, but without a trace of the poseur, and even today his slender production is impressive for its limpid depth and the haunting music of its lines.

See: Obstfelder, Poems from the Norwegian (1920); C. Claussen, S. Obstfelder i hans diktning og breve (1924); C. W. Stork, An Anthology of Norwegian Lyrics (1942).

E. H.

Ognyov, Nikolai (pseud. of Mikhail Grigoriyevich Rozanov, 1888–1938, Russian novelist), son of a small-town lawyer, became active in the revolutionary movement as a young man. His first short stories appeared before the First World War. Their somber and morbid fantasy acquired a new significance in the author's later work, in which, as in Krusheniye antenny (1923; The Collapse of the Antenna), he contrasted his favorite themes of peasant witchcraft, bestiality, chaos, and death with the organizing and rational principle of the Revolution. His style, like that of many writers of the early 20's, often became overburdened with the unusual and the picturesque. In his wide experience as educator, Ognyov soon found the material for a work purely realistic and remarkably direct, his popular Dnevnik Kosti Ryabtseva (2 vols., 1927–1928; Eng. tr., The Diary of a Communist Schoolboy and The Diary of a Communist Undergraduate, both 1928). It was later completed by his Tri izmereniya (1932; The Three Dimensions), which describes an earlier period. The diary is a humorous, vivid, and pathetic story of school life in Soviet Russia in the early 20's, when the new school had to deal with a young generation emerging from the chaos of the civil war. Portrayals of members of the old intelligentsia attempting to find a place in the new society are not always as direct and convincing as those of the younger characters. The series was later abridged by the author and published as Nachalo zhizni (1933; The Beginning of Life).

See: E. Rusakova, N. Ognyov-molodyozhni pisatel (1933).

L. S.

Ojetti, Ugo (1871–1946, Italian journalist, art critic, novelist, short-story writer, playwright, and essayist), born in Rome, is a perfect example of the gifted and versatile newspaperman. Obviously under the influence of D'Annunzio, he started out on his literary career with the novel Senza Dio (1894). He followed that with Alla scoperta dei letterati (1895), an inquiry into the most significant currents of Italian literature from Carducci and Verga to Pascoli and D'Annunzio (qq.v.). In it were already apparent those qualities of keen observer of the men and events of contemporary life and culture which are the essential characteristic of his work as writer and journalist. His works of fiction (four novels, several volumes of short stories, two comedies) are, with a few exceptions, pleasant but inconsequential, with their typical bourgeois situations and rapidly sketched and poorly motivated characters. The novel Mio figlio ferroviere (1922) deserves more consideration. It is a subtly ironic picture of the period of disillusionment, political chaos, and opportunism in Italy immediately following the First World War.

Ojetti finally abandoned light fiction and dedicated himself to his journalist's career, also inaugurated in 1894. Thereafter he wrote for the leading Italian newspapers. It is interesting to note the progressive development of his prose style. He did his most notable writing for the Corriere della sera, to which he had contributed from 1898, first with the column Piccole Verità, then Caratteri, and finally Cose viste from 1921 on. These latter articles on contemporary figures and events have been reprinted in six volumes of Cose viste (1923, 1924, 1926, 1928, 1931, 1934; partial Eng. tr., As They Seemed to Me, 1928). In these Ojetti stands out as one of the most brilliant writers for the literary page or terza pagina, which in Italian newspapers has played the important role of bringing literature into contact with daily life and reality. Seldom in his narrative and innumerable critical works is he as keen and literary as in these pictures of men and events. His limpid, fluent, and sharply faceted prose, made up of a happy mixture of the best elements of modernism and classicism, seems a perfect vehicle for his ordered, clear ideas and images. The author's inspiration is sustained; his vigilance, sometimes smiling, sometimes sad, never relaxes. It is fragmentary journal istic art at its best. The subject matter changes continually: distant memories, lively impressions of the moment, portraits and recollections of celebrated men, autobiographical details, pictures of spectacles, crowds, and celebrations, descriptions of historic places, war anecdotes, and graceful fables with a moral. The author is indulgent, ironic, cordial, or skeptical as the occasion demands, and for material he delved into the rich fund of his years of experiences, constant work, meetings with famous people, and travels (Ojetti traveled extensively in Europe, Egypt, Central Asia, and the United States). He was a dilettante in the best sense; no form of human culture was ever a matter of indifference to him. Frank in his likes and dislikes, he maintained a consistent faith in most of his contemporaries and in their striving after ever new expressions.

Ojetti also produced excellent work as an art critic. He conceived and directed two great Italian art exhibitions and founded the reviews Dedalo (1920) and Pegaso (1929). He waged an untiring campaign against bad taste in the arts and, for all his love and knowledge of the masters, he constantly encouraged and kept his mind open to the new trends.

Ojetti became a member of the Italian Academy in 1930. He was the general editor of two important collections of Italian classics and of the review Pan. He also wrote several books of travel and literary essays and two on the United States, L'America vittoriosa (1898), on the Spanish-American War, and L'America e l'avvenire (1905).

See: L. Russo, I Narratori (1923), pp. 173-175; A. Baldini, Amici allo spiedo (1932), pp. 97-103; P. Pancrazi, Scrittori italiani del novecento (1934), pp. 36-41.

J. F. De S.

Olbracht, Ivan (pseud. of Kamil Zeman, 1882-, Czech novelist), is probably the most gifted of the recent Czech writers of fiction. He was born in Semily (northeastern Bohemia), the son of a writer, Antonín Zeman (1843-1931), who produced early realist novels under the pseudonym Antal Stašek. Olbracht studied law, but became a journalist in the labor movement, writing for Socialist and, later, Communist papers. He spent several short periods in jail because of revolutionary writings and in 1942 was arrested by the Nazis. In 1945 he became chief of the Broadcasting Division of the new Ministry of Information.

Olbracht's first book was a collection of good romantic stories about tramps and circus people, O zlých samotářích (1913; Of Evil Solitary Men); but his rise as an artist began only in the First World War, with a strangely powerful novel, Žalář nejtemnější (1916; The Darkest Prison), which describes the jealous pangs of a blind man. The next long work, Podivné přátelství herce Jesenia (1919; The Strange Friendship of the Actor Jesenius), put him into the front rank of Czech novelists. The story is based on the motif of split personality and is set in extremely vivid scenes of the war and of green-room life. His moral points toward a victory of collective belief over narrow egotism and barren introspection. Olbracht seems to have taken to heart with a vengeance the lesson of his novel. His next book, Anna proletářka (1928; Anne the Proletarian), a story of the Communist revolution, is heavy-handed propaganda, and the prison stories, Zamřížované zrcadlo (1930; The Grated Mirror), are also failures. But Olbracht again surprised the admirers of Jesenius with his next novel, Nikolaj Šuhaj, loupežník (1933; Nikolaj Šuhaj, the Robber), a brisk story of Sub-Carpathian Russia with an epic speed, a tight composition, and a balladlike objectivity. It centers round the deeds and misdeeds of a popular revolutionist who took the law into his own hands against the Czech police authorities. Golet v údolí (1937; Golet in the Valley), a series of stories drawn from the lives of the poor Orthodox Jews in Sub-Carpathian Russia, is also excellent. Olbracht's other work is journalistic in nature: it includes an enthusiastic travel book about Soviet Russia (Obrazy ze soudobého Ruska, 1920; Pictures of Present-Day Russia) and a good descriptive account of Sub-Carpathian Russia and its social problems (Hory a staletí, 1935; Mountains and Centuries). Bratr Žák (1938; Brother Žák) is a collection of short stories.

The strong leftist ideology has not marred Olbracht's deep humanity and sure artistry. His evolution from an analytical novelist of the subconscious to a storyteller of epic grandeur is a sign of revolt against the excesses of introspection and heralds the revival of the almost forgotten art of storytelling. For in Nikolaj Šuhaj Olbracht succeeded in telling his story interestingly, objectively, in sharp outlines, in fine, clear, model Czech prose, with something of the monumentality of a primitive epic.

See: B. Václavek, Tvorbou k realitě (1937).

R. W.

Oliveira Martins, Joaquim Pedro de (1845-1894, Portuguese historian), was born in Lisbon. His father died when he was 10, and he was forced to abandon his studies at an early age and enter business to support his family. In 1870 he went to Spain, and he remained four years as the manager of a mine in the province of Córdoba. From there he went to Oporto, where he was first an employee and later manager of a railroad company until 1888, at which time he moved to Lisbon. In Oporto he became an intimate friend of Antero de Quental (q.v.) and established connections with the Coimbra Group (see Portuguese literature). This strong-willed autodidact, formed by tireless personal reading, accepted readily the reforms of Coimbra realism. In his youth he had sympathized actively with republicanism—and wrote on socialistic doctrine—but later he abandoned these views, like other members of the Coimbra Group, in the face of the passionate negativism of the republican propaganda. Influenced by German writers, he became an adherent of monarchism in order to attempt national restoration within the framework of the existing regime. This he visualized through economic dictatorship and centralistic Caesarism, in support of the royal authority. These aspirations led him into active politics, and he was a deputy (1887) and secretary of the treasury (1892), but failed in his political purpose. He traveled in Spain and other parts of Europe, represented Portugal at various congresses, and filled different official and honorary positions.

He began his literary career with a historical novel, Phebus Moniz (1867)—which he later withdrew from the market—and a historical trilogy in prose and verse, but soon abandoned imaginative literature to devote his efforts to historical writing. He planned an extensive universal and national historical work, projected on a sociological and anthropological basis, which he nearly completed. In this he perpetuated the attitude of Herculano (see Portuguese literature) and marked a healthful, though perhaps excessive, reaction against the deceptive optimism as to the historical past and national grandeur, the official attitude of the time. A reexamination of values became imperative. Realism was to confront the romantic eulogy of past glories with the decadence of the moment. Antero de Quental had broken ground in this direction with his lecture in the Casino de Lisboa, and Oliveira Martins was to go the whole way; he represents in Portugal the sifting of historical tradition carried out later in Spain by the Generation of '98—on which he exerted a notable influence. Neither his agitated social life nor his temperament suited him for the slow and laborious task of investigation and accumulation of materials. He utilized the materials of others, from which he extracted and selected data to be passed later through the sieve of his keen sensibility and orderly intelligence. Thus he was able to create a work of artistic reconstruction, of integral revitalization of the past in the manner of Michelet, but with even greater lyric intensity. This is a work characterized by luminous syntheses but also, at times, by hasty or risky generalizations. He was not, strictly speaking, a historian but a man of letters, a poet or dramatist devoted to history—a “great historical artist” in the happy phrase of Menéndez y Pelayo (q.v.).

It was Oliveira Martins who initiated the Peninsular point of view in historico-political conceptions. The realism to which he had been somewhat allied had adopted a cosmopolitan attitude as a reaction against romantic nationalism. But this cosmopolitanism, Francophile or Germanophile, was still characterized by ignorance of Spain or prejudice against that nation. Oliveira Martins took a valiant stand in behalf of a deep unity of Peninsular civilization, one which would transcend momentary vicissitudes. Following the English threat of 1890, which led him to a colonial campaign related in Portugal na Africa (1891; Portugal in Africa), he succeeded in making Iberism a basis for political action. His stay in Spain and his knowledge of that country doubtless influenced him in his attempt at political rapprochement, in which he attempted to replace the traditional English alliance—weakened by the ultimatum—by one with Spain. In 1875 he had founded with Quental the Revista occidental to promote a community of interests and collaboration between the two peoples and with the Hispanic American republics.

The influence of Oliveira Martins was very profound. His systematization of national history, which he effected through a subjective interpretation instead of limiting himself to simple recording; the elaboration of a definite and total basis for judgment; his Peninsular theory—all these were new things in Portugal. His success is easily explained if we add a vigorous style, somewhat like that of Taine (q.v.), a powerful plastic and psychological imagination, and extraordinary gifts as a literary narrator. But such qualities frequently led him into impressionism, and his work, ardently personal, is less enduring than his historical philosophy. Faithful to his Hegelian tradition, he shows a scrupulous respect for truth, which he depicts from all angles and presents even in contrast with his personal opinions. His evaluation of Portuguese history is painfully negative. His purpose was "to lay it bare of patriotic illusions and fantastic chimeras . . . in an impersonal and objective manner," but, a victim of the national pessimism of all his generation, he viewed the national past in a sad light and painted it à la Goya. In his brilliant and corrosive prose he summed up the eight centuries of Portuguese national development as a mass of abjections and wretchedness and the grandiose epic of the discoveries and the Eastern Empire as a heap of infamies interwoven with plundering and simony.

His first historical work was O helenismo e a civilização cristã (1878; Hellenism and Christian Civilization), and there followed in rapid succession História da civilização ibérica (1879; Eng. tr., A History of Iberian Civilization, 1930), História de Portugal (1879; History of Portugal), Portugal contemporâneo (1881; Contemporary Portugal) which he himself called "a sad work" and which is a true de profundis of the Portuguese nationality—and Brasil e as colônias portuguesas (1880; Brazil and the Portuguese Colonies). From 1880 to 1885 he produced a series of works on universal historical anthropology, sociology, and chronology, and in 1889 he returned to national history with Portugal nos mares (Portugal in the Seas). From that moment the biographical character of his former work was clear; henceforward he excelled in historical portraits and was an expert in the psychological characterization of personages, groups, and periods. Then there appeared Os filhos de D. João I (1891; Eng. tr., The Golden Age of Prince Henry the Navigator, 1914), Vida de Nun'Alvares (1893; Life of Nun'Alvares), and the single chapter of O príncipe perfeito (The Perfect Prince), published posthumously in 1895. When he left the government (1892) he made a trip to England and wrote A Inglaterra de hoje (The England of Today), an appraisal of British society dominated by a confessed Anglophobia. During his last trip to Spain, a little before his death, he wrote a series of impressions entitled Cartas peninsulares (1895; Peninsular Letters), also issued posthumously. Aside from his work as a historian he left a large number of very interesting books and tracts on such subjects as literature, economy, politics, and agrarianism.

See: Teófilo Braga, As modernas idéias na literatura portuguesa (1892), II, 346-390; Fidelino de Figueiredo, "Oliveira Martins," Revue hispanique, LXXV (1929), 54-143.

E. G. D.

Oller i Moragues, Narcís (1846-1930, Catalan novelist), was born in the city of Valls, near Tarragona, and died in Barcelona. His highly successful participation in Catalan letters came late and was brought about through the intervention of his cousin, the critic Josep Ixart, who presented him to a group of writers taking part in the Jocs Florals. These poetic competitions, restored some years previously (1859), were contributing to the rebirth of Catalan literature. He had earlier been a notary. His first works were published in the Renaixença, at the beginning in collaboration with Ixart. His reading of Zola's (q.v.) works influenced him greatly in his decision to become a novelist. The literary world of the Barcelona of those times was far from able to understand the message of naturalism, and Narcís Oller adapted what he could from the school in the light of his public's taste. In 1875 came his first book, Croquis del natural (Sketches from Nature), in which he essayed his powers as a realistic writer. Sor Sanxa (Sister Sanxa) was published in 1880, followed by another novel, Isabel de Galceran. A little later he wrote Vilaniu (1885). Then there appeared one of the author's most popular novels, the one which contributed most to his fame and has been translated into various languages, La papallona (1882; The Butterfly), the picture of a masculine character, all movement and madness. L'escanya pobres (1884; The Exploiter of the Poor) and the Febre d'or (1890; Gold Fever) are the beginning of his thesis-works, so dear to naturalism; rather than literary creations they are photographs taken in a sordid milieu of repugnant characters. La borgeria (1898; The Bourgeoisie) presents the problem of insanity and its social consequences. Some consider Pilar Prim (1906), a novel of middle-class urban life, the crowning point of Narcís Oller's work. Also to be mentioned among his narrative writings are Notes de color (Color Notes), De tots colors (1888; In All Colors), Figura i paisatge (1897; Figure and Landscape), Rurals i urbanes (From the Countryside and the City), and Al llapis i a la ploma (1929; With Pen and Pencil) which, by their very titles, suggest parallels with the plastic arts, in particular painting and drawing.

In following the French naturalistic school (see French naturalism) Narcís Oller developed marked talent as an observer, although, as may happen with the devotees of the naturalistic manner, he frequently presented incarnations of vices and passions rather than men of flesh and bone. Yet his realism never becomes crude, and he shows rather a keen desire to present great social problems in thesis form; this was the genesis of his works on the insane asylum, usury, slander, the desire for wealth. In this sense his work is always moralizing and has an essential didactic purpose. He translated various authors, and his work was in turn translated into Italian, English, Spanish, Russian, and German.

See: A. Savine, La Littérature catalane (1888); C. Fortuny, La novela catalana (1912); M. de Montoliu, "Estudi crític" (prologue to the complete works of the author published by Gustau Gili, Barcelona, 1928-1930).

F. de P.

Olyosha, Yuri Karlovich (1899-, Russian novelist and dramatist), was born in Odessa. His first novel, Zavist (1927; Eng. tr., Envy, 1936), based on the conflict between the new society and dying individualism, met with considerable success, but caused much controversy. Olyosha's treatment of the subject seemed equivocal and perplexing. It is true that he represents prerevolutionary individualism by degraded and futile day dreamers, whose impotent hatred finds expression in a fantastic "conspiracy of feelings" against the new social order. On the other hand, his characterization of the director of a food trust, who typifies the new social order, is hardly inspiring; the man's soundness and efficiency exasperate, and a new sort of low-priced sausage that he triumphantly produces symbolizes his main contribution to Soviet society. The author does not make a clear choice between these conflicting types of humanity, and were it not for his introduction of a secondary theme of young love, his attitude could be mistaken for sheer misanthropy. In reality, Olyosha has hardly ever sought to express anything more definite than a belief in the intrinsic value of the psyche and an inability to share in standardized enthusiasms. He is primarily a lyricist and a remarkably brilliant and inventive stylist, whose sensorial acuteness discovers in everyday life fantastic microcosms of unexpected imagery and emotion.

Besides Envy and a few short stories, Olyosha has published a longer story, Tri tolstiaka (1928; The Three Fat Men), revolutionary in content and somewhat reminiscent of Hans Christian Andersen in form; a play, Spisok blagodeyani (1931; List of Blessings), in which he once more turns to the conflict between society and the individual; and two screen plays, one of which, Walter (1937), deals with the struggle against facsimism. Zavist and Tri tolstiaka have been adapted for the stage, the latter as a ballet scenario.

See: Gleb Struve, "Current Russian Literature: Yuri Olesha," Slavonic Review, XIII (1934-1935), 644-649.

L. S.

Onís, Federico de (1885-, Spanish critic and scholar), was born in Salamanca, where he pursued all his studies up to the time he left for Madrid (1906) to study for the doctorate. At the University of Salamanca, Onís came under the powerful and decisive influence of Miguel de Unamuno (q.v.), from whom he acquired an approach to Hispanic culture which differed considerably from the prevailing positivistic perspective, an approach which was responsive to the achievements of all modern European culture without abjuring the indefectible originality of the genius of Spain. In Madrid, Onís came to know the literature of modern Spain and its creators and allied himself with the men determined to renovate cultural Spain. By 1909 he had become professor of Spanish literature at the University of Oviedo, and it was there he read three years later his provocative paper on the historical problem of the Spanish university. Soon Onís was drawn to the new institutions of learning that had been established, especially to the Centro de Estudios Históricos, where under the direction of Menéndez Pidal (q.v.) the Revista de filología española was started (1914) with his active collaboration and that of Navarro Tomás, Américo Castro (qq.v.), Antonio Solalinde, and Alfonso Reyes. At the Residencia de Estudiantes, where students from all over Spain lived and studied, Onís lectured to the future leaders and in 1915 delivered a speech "Disciplina y rebeldía" which breathed the new spirit of renewal controlled by a sturdy discipline of the complete man.

Onís contributed to the new scholarship in his edition (1914-1921, in the "Clásicos castellanos" series) of De los nombres de Cristo by Fray Luis de León. In 1916 Columbia University in New York invited him to take charge of graduate work in Spanish. Through new courses, two magazines, Revista de estudios hispánicos (1928-1929) and Revista hispánica moderna (1934-), the publication of original works and of doctoral theses, the creation of the Hispanic Institute of America (1920) and its Hispanic House, Onís has contributed to the spread of a new vision on matters relating to the culture and civilization of Spain, Portugal, and Iberic America.

Onís has been able to exercise a great deal of influence in Iberic America. His Antología de la poesía española e hispano-americana, 1882-1932 (1934) is perhaps the best anthology of its kind in the Spanish language. The enthusiastic response accorded it by outstanding critics in Spain and America indicates its value and importance. In general the pattern of Onís's thought can be traced in the essays "El problema de la universidad española" (1912), "El estudio del español en los Estados Unidos" (1920), and "El concepto del renacimiento aplicado a la literatura española" (1926), all of which were published with other papers in his Ensayos sobre el sentido de la cultura española (1932).

See: Azorín, L. Bello, J. Pin y Soler, M. S. Oliver, "Sobre el concepto del patriotismo," in Onís, Ensayos sobre el sentido de la cultura española (1932), appendix; M. P. González, Nuestro camino de Damasco: a propósito de un libro de Federico de Onís (1935).

M. J. B.

Oriani, Alfredo (1852-1909, Italian historian, critic, and novelist), is a complex and tragic personality, a rich and tormented spirit, who was almost ignored by his contemporaries and then apotheosized by Fascism as one of its major prophets. He was born in Faenza, Romagna, of a noble but impoverished family, the least loved and understood of three children. At the age of 10 he went to Bologna to study with the Barnabites, famous Italian teaching order. In 1868 he went to the University of Rome to study law. Oriani's student years in Rome were the historically stirring years when this ancient mother of civilization was about to become the capital of the youngest national state in Europe. After receiving his law degree from the University of Naples in 1872 he withdrew, to his father's bitter disappointment, to the family villa in Casola-Valsenio to dedicate himself to a literary career. Here Oriani spent the rest of an uneventful but prodigiously prolific literary life. None of the many books into which he poured his passionate soul achieved success during his lifetime. The fame for which he had worked and hungered so came only after he had died a brokenhearted, almost obscure man.

Oriani tried every literary genre. From 1876, when he made his literary debut with an autobiographic novel, Memorie inutili, to 1902, when Olocausto, his last work of fiction, appeared, he wrote extensively in this field; his novels and short stories gave him the reputation chiefly of a vulgar and disheveled exponent of the naturalist school. Only Disfatta (1886), described by Croce as the novel richest in ideas in Italian literature, has escaped oblivion. A volume of verse, Monotonie (1878), and the nine plays he produced between 1899 and 1909 caused hardly any stir. Oriani's fame and the considerable influence he exerted on immediate posterity rests mainly on his historical writings. Of these the most important are Matrimonio (1886), Fino a Dogali (1889), Lotta politica (1892), his major work, and Rivolta ideale (1908), his last and noblest book.

Matrimonio is an impassioned defense of the integrity of the family against the advancing onslaught of divorce and free love. Dumas fils in La Question du divorce (1880) had advocated divorce in the name of progress and human happiness. Matrimonio refutes Dumas's thesis, maintaining that the essence of life is duty and self-sacrifice, not happiness, and that the family exists for the protection of the child, not for the benefit of the parents. Fino a Dogali was inspired by the Dogali disaster, which ended Italy's first colonial venture in Africa. To Oriani expansion into Africa is a historical necessity for Italy, the next inevitable step in her renewed life. His Africanismo is an integral part of his vision of history; it informs all his historical works and gives the vantage point from which, in Lotta politica, he surveys the entire panorama of Italian and European history. Lotta politica is an extraordinary feat of reconstruction embracing three thousand years of Italian history.

Briefly stated, Oriani's vision of history is this: humanity through the blood and toil of the continent of Europe is evolving a world civilization. In the 19th century this civilization attains full maturity as it brings forth the two perfected forms of historic life, the democratic national state and the free citizen of modern society, forms destined to extend to all peoples on earth. The colonial expansion of European states into America, Africa, and Asia is the process whereby Europe is lifting other continents to its own level; the process is completed in America. Italy which by her political renaissance has resumed her place in the vanguard of history cannot evade her historic responsibility in Africa. Oriani does not admit imperialism; he has the comfortable theory that even when men think they are furthering their interests they are unconsciously serving an ideal. Oriani's ideal is the triumph of liberty, the establishment of an order wherein free men organize into democratic national states to vie with each other peacefully in the discovery of truth and the creation of beauty—no more master and subject races. Empires will disappear once they have fulfilled their historic function of teaching all peoples democracy. In Rivolta ideale, his spiritual testament, Oriani, a careful student of Hegel, warns modern man that liberty does not mean freedom to enrich and indulge himself to the detriment of his brothers; on the contrary liberty means the acceptance of high responsibilities and the willing subordination of interests to ideas and of passions to truth.

See: L. Donati, La tragedia di Oriani (1919); G. Pentimalli, Oriani (1921); B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, 2d ed., III (1922), 227–258; P. Zama, Oriani (1928); A. Giorgi, Oriani (1935).

T. C.

Ørjasaeter, Tore (1886–, Norwegian poet, dramatist, and prose writer), was born in the mountain valley of Gudbrandsdal in central Norway and has lived there most of his life. From early childhood he deeply felt his allegiance to the close-knit farm society with its venerable and overpowering heritage of traditions. But as the son of a schoolteacher he at the same time did not really belong; and his personal development early made him rise in revolt. Long-lasting serious disease emphasized his isolation and intensified his problems.

His literary creations, essentially philosophical, are built on the contrast sharpened by his own experience of the free soul and "the powers." His first collections of verse express spontaneous attachment to his milieu and its secure traditions, with a background of sublime mountain landscapes such as is found in all his poetry. His following books are monuments to crises. In the great verse-cycle Gudbrand Langleite (3 vols., 1913–1927), within the framework of a loose epic narrative, he runs a gamut of contrasts: the rise of the individual against surroundings and heritage, of man's will against the ensnaring powers of love and home, of the artist's dream against everyday life, of the soul against its fate, the painful doubleness and the struggle of the forces in himself, until the conflict is solved in religious understanding. An independent collection, Skiringsgangen (1925; Purgatory), moves within the same circle of ideas. Both works are conceived with intensity and grandeur of thought and emotion, in symbols of original beauty. Similar also are the motifs of Ørjasaeter's two plays, his drama of a legendary mountaineer, symbol of individualistic isolation (Jo Gjende, 1917), and his analysis of a girl rising against her inherited tasks (Anne paa Torp, 1930; Anne of Torp). The calm and clarity after the storm is charmingly expressed in the allegorical cycle of poems Elvesong (1932; Song of the River). In a few highly personal prose works he has analyzed himself and his development with great frankness and a humor which indicates his growing mastery of himself and of his world.

Ørjasaeter is one of the most genuine poets of New Norse literature. His poetry is sometimes monotonous and not always easily accessible. His thought is inquiring and often gropes for expression; his form may be vague and inconclusive. But his best poems have a noble sincerity and a lucid depth of feeling and expression which give them high rank.

See: R. Thesen, T. Ørjasaeter (1935).

S. S.

Orkan, Władysław (pseud. of Franciszek Szmaciarsz-Smreczyński, 1876–1930, Polish poet and novelist), was born, of peasant stock, in the mountain village of Poręba Wielka in the Podhale section of the Tatras. He owed everything to his mother, who was determined to give her son an education at whatever cost. By heroic efforts on her part and his, Orkan was able to study at the Jagiellonian University in Cracow. Here he became aware of his potentialities and those of his people through observing the progress of two movements: the "Tatra movement" led by Asnyk (q.v.) and Tetmajer (q.v.), on the one hand, the neo-romantic "art for art's sake" ferment led by Przybyszewski (q.v.), on the other. Orkan stood outside, but derived spiritual nourishment from both movements, and soon he was writing, in his own primitive, somewhat metaphysical style, the first tales of the Tatras to issue from the pen of a real mountaineer. Of his many works, Drzewiej (1912; Of Old) was the most significant, standing as a milestone on the long road which, with Reymont (q.v.), finally brought the Polish peasant as he is, unidealized, into Poland's limited stock of literary material.

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, II (1928), 65–82; G. Korbut, Literatura polska (1931), IV, 283–284; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, I (1934), 223–231, 322–324.

A. P. C.

Ors, Eugenio d', see D'Ors.

Ortega y Gasset, José (1883–, Spanish essayist and philosopher), was born in Madrid. Like many Spanish liberals, he received an early religious education, and his secondary studies were completed in a Jesuit school. After taking his doctorate in philosophy (Madrid, 1904), he studied in several German universities. In Marburg, Hermann Cohen initiated him into the Neo-Kantian movement. Although his thought later developed along personal lines, Germany left a lasting imprint upon his ideas, affected his approach to all intellectual matters, and awakened his eagerness to create in Spain an adequate atmosphere for philosophical and systematic thinking. The Germanic bent was clearly expressed in his first book, Meditaciones del Quijote (1914), in which he compares the Germanic and the Mediterranean culture. The former is for him a culture of "profundity," its instrument the "concept"; the latter is a culture of "surface," its instrument the "impression." He became in 1910 professor of metaphysics at the University of Madrid. Since then, indeed since his return from Germany, Ortega's life has been inseparable from the intellectual life of his country, and he has shared with Unamuno (q.v.), outstanding figure of the older generation, the spiritual leadership of Spain.

Ortega's influence grew with the century. His ideas about the "dehumanization" of art, the contemporary spirit, and a new life for Europe and Spain were determining factors in the rise of a new generation which gradually separated itself from the Generation of '98 writers (see Spanish literature) and from the modernistic movement. Already in his first essays—collected later in Personas, obras y cosas (1916)—Ortega started in earnest the attack against the individualism of his predecessors in literary life. Thus in 1909 in an essay about Renan (q.v.), whose intellectualism or idealism had a great influence on the young Ortega, he says: "In general, I cannot conceive that men can be of more interest than ideas, persons than things. . . . The objective is the true, and must interest us above anything else." The disagreement with Unamuno is evident in these lines; later in the same essay the allusions to him become direct, personal, and unflattering.

In other ways too, Ortega was for contemporary Spain an "animator." In fact, his work as writer and thinker is indissolubly bound to his conception of intellectual life as an activity which has to operate on life itself. All his philosophy is built on a concept of human reality already defined in the Meditaciones del Quijote. Instead of the thinking ego of Cartesian rationalism, he conceives the first reality to be an ego surrounded by circumstances. "Yo soy yo y mis circunstancias," which could be rendered as "I am my ego plus my circumstances," defining circunstancias as the "silent things which are [i.e., which I find] in my immediate surroundings." Accordingly, his first intellectual task was to think about the problems of Spain as a national entity in order to bring it closer to the main currents of European life, which for him represented the highest values of culture. In the Meditaciones del Quijote he defines his criticism as a patriotic undertaking, and during the same year, 1914, appeared Vieja y nueva política, embodying a real program of intellectual and political action. With the exception of a brief period as a member of the Cortes Constitucionales of the republic, he held no public offices. Throughout the years, however, he considered himself the mouthpiece of an intellectual minority with a superior conception of national life. Its organ was first the review España, founded by him in 1915. Later he expounded his ideas on current political events in numerous articles and speeches, some of which he collected in 1931 in such books as La redención de las provincias y la decadencia nacional and Rectificación de la república. When the civil war began, he left Spain and has been practically silent since then about all Spanish problems. The real field, however, of Ortega's influence has been the intellectual. Through his work as professor, through his books, and through personal contacts with a growing group of devotees, which extended to this side of the Atlantic and especially to Argentina, it can be said that all the intellectual youth of the Spanish-speaking world came at one time or another under his spell. As director of Revista de Occidente and of several collections of the publishing house Espasa-Calpe, he made known in Spanish translation an impressive list of books representing the highest attainment of modern European culture, particularly of German thought. For this as well as for his original work, Ernst Curtius could say he was "one of the twelve peers of European intellect."

Ortega has embodied more, perhaps, than any other writer of our time the contemporary spirit. The object of his varied meditations has been the 20th-century scene in all its aspects. He has been a "spectator"—a word he chose as the title of several volumes of essays (El espectador, 8 vols., 1916–1934). As such, he defined his mental attitude as that of contemplating things with amor intelectual, trying to find “in a fact, a man, a book, a painting, a landscape, an error, a sorrow . . . the plenitude of its meaning.” There is scarcely any important subject of our time that he has not commented upon. He has endeavored to interpret with the same interest and ease the significance of a passing social fashion, the Castilian landscape, the formation and nature of the modern state, the conception of Hegel’s philosophy of history, the meaning of time and form in the art of Proust (q.v.). Some of his major works contain highly original and controversial ideas which have had great influence and have also provoked sharp reactions against his thought. Such are España invertebrada (1922; Eng. tr., Invertebrate Spain, 1937), an interpretation of the decadence and anarchy of Spain as owing to the lack of a leading élite (for him, history, as thought and art, is always shaped by selected minorities); La deshumanización del arte (1925), an explanation and an implied defense of antirealism in contemporary art; and La rebelión de las masas (1930; Eng. tr., The Revolt of the Masses, 1932), his most widely read book, in which he explains the modern state of society as an inversion of values due to a crisis in European culture and to the preponderance of a mass mind.

He attempted mainly to systematize his purely philosophical thought in El tema de nuestro tiempo (1923; Eng. tr., The Modern Theme, 1931), propounding a philosophy based on life itself. The being is conceived as a multiplicity of values which we apprehend through a variety of “perspectives.” To the pure reason of idealism he opposes a “vital reason,” a logos which is constantly affected by the vital and historical circumstances of life. But he rejects utterly any idea of determinism. The individual, rather than follow circumstances blindly, modifies them in a constant interplay, and life becomes a quehacer and a creation, a plurality of tasks that we freely undertake. His thought has a close relation to that of the contemporary German thinkers Dilthey and Scheller and the existentialists. But, on the other hand, it seems to be rooted in a deep Spanish individualism for which man is the supreme reality and the only subject of life and history. To Ortega’s thought and influence is added his extraordinary value as a pure writer. In precision, richness, and elegance his style stands out as a model of modern Spanish prose.

See: M. G. Morente, “El tema de nuestro tiempo (Filosofía de la perspectiva),” Revista de Occidente, I (1923), 201–217; E. R. Curtius, “Spanische Perspektiven,” Die neue Rundschau, Jahrgang XXXV (1929), Bd. II, pp. 1229–1248; C. Barja, Literatura española: Libros y autores contemporáneos (1935), pp. 98–263; H. L. Nostrand, “Introduction,” in Ortega y Gasset, Mission of the University (1944), pp. 1–31.

A. del R.

Orzeszkowa, Eliza (née Elżbieta Pawłowska, 1841–1910, Polish feminist and novelist), was born on the family estate at Milkowce near Grodno, Lithuanian Poland, the daughter of a wealthy and cultured country gentleman. Her father died when she was two, and she was brought up by a cold and frivolous mother. She studied for five years (1852–1857) at the famous Convent of the Sisters of the Sacrament in Warsaw—Konopnicka (q.v.) was also there at the same time—and then returned to Litwa to marry, at the age of 16, a landowner of Kobryń district in Polesie by the name of Peter Orzeszko. During the conspiratorial period that preceded the uprising of 1863, Orzeszkowa agitated for the national cause among her neighbors in Kobryń district and later, during the uprising, gave invaluable help, it is said, to Romuałd Traugutt, one of its leaders. When her husband was exiled to Siberia after the uprising, Orzeszkowa returned to her native Litwa and proceeded to shock the county population by getting a divorce. She was banished from polite society on this account and in Grodno, to which she moved, became known as a new George Sand.

In 1886 Orzeszkowa began to find the outlet her strong emotional nature needed, with the acceptance of her tales of Lithuanian village life by the Warsaw Tygodnik ilustrowany (Illustrated Weekly), a journal more friendly to women than most. Gradually, after this, Orzeszkowa’s reputation underwent a change, and soon she was known everywhere as “the Good Lady of Grodno.” Of her many works, the most significant were the revolutionary Meir Ezosowicz (1878; Eng. tr., 1898), a sympathetic delineation of the struggles of a young Jew to escape from the darkness and superstition of the ghetto, and the prose poem Nad Niemnem (1889; Along the Niemen), a picture of Polish-Lithuanian society under Russia notable especially for its descriptions of the Niemen landscape.

A passionate partisan of the peasant, Orzeszkowa strove with all her might to assist him in his struggle for emancipation. To make reading matter available at a cost the peasant could pay, she opened her own publishing house in Wilno, but was blocked in her generous purposes by the ill will of her own class, functioning through the Russian censorship. Orzeszkowa was a true pioneer, both as a champion of woman's right to self-expression outside the home (see her Kilka słów o kobietach, 1871, A Few Words about Women) and as a realist in the writing of fiction. She is one of the most interesting and original figures in Polish literature.

See: G. Korbut, Literatura polska (1931), IV, 122-126; I. Krzywicka, "Młoda Orzeszkowa," Wiadomości literackie, 1936, Nos. 53-54, and "O ciężkiej starości w Polsce," ibid., 1937, Nos. 11, 26; introductions to the collected edition of her works, Pisma, 1937-1939.

A. P. C.

Osorgin, Mikhail Andreyevich (pseud. of Mikhail Andreyevich Ilyin, 1878-1942, Russian novelist and journalist), was born at Perm. Long before he took his degree in law at the University of Moscow (1902), he became a frequent contributor to newspapers and magazines. After the abortive Revolution of 1905, he went abroad, but continued to publish in Russia. Among his early works, his studies on Italy attracted attention. A period in Russia (1916-1921) proved unproductive, but during his second and last exile he wrote many remarkable feuilletons for the émigré newspapers and produced a number of novels, dealing mainly with the Russia he once knew. His best work is Sivtsev Vrazhek (1928; Eng. tr., Quiet Street, 1930), a novel of gentle people involved in the turmoil of the Revolution of 1917. Povest o sestre (1930; Eng. tr., My Sister's Story, 1931) is a record of unfulfilled love. In Svidetel istorii (1932; The Onlooker of History) and its sequel, Kniga o kontsakh (1935; The Book about Ends), Osorgin shows keen sympathy for the early revolutionaries, though he probably identified himself with Father Yakov, the homeless wanderer who loves his land and people. Volny Kamenshchik (1937; The Freemason) is about another humble idealist and, like all of Osorgin's work, bears the imprint of a humanitarian and somewhat anarchic spirit.

See: "Osorgin," in Entsiklopediya "Granat", Vol. XI (1912), appendix, p. 681.

P. A. P.

Ossendowski, Ferdynand Antoni (1876-, Polish scientist, traveler, and writer), was born in Vitebsk, of old Polish stock. In 1899, after having studied at the University of St. Petersburg, he made his first trip to Siberia and the Far East, described in W ludzkiej i leśnej kniei (1923; Eng. tr., Man and Mystery in Asia, 1924). After receiving his doctorate in Paris, he taught chemistry and physics at Tomsk until 1903, when he returned to Eastern Siberia. In Od szczytu do otchłani (1924; Eng. tr., From President to Prison, 1925) he has recorded his experiences as, successively, chemical expert to the Russian general staff during the Russo-Japanese War, president of a short-lived "Revolutionary Government of the Russian Far East," and political prisoner under the tsarist reaction. On regaining his freedom, he returned to St. Petersburg, where, amidst other work, he served as consulting chemist to the navy until 1917. From 1918 to 1920 he taught chemistry at Omsk, being associated at the same time with the government of Admiral Kolchak. After his escape from the Bolsheviks through Mongolia, described in Przez kraj zwierząt, ludzi i bogów (1922; Eng. tr., Beasts, Men, and Gods, 1922), he took up residence in Warsaw, where he resumed teaching. He has since traveled extensively, particularly in northern Africa, about which he has written several volumes, among them Pod smaganiem samumu (1925; Eng. tr., The Breath of the Desert, American title, Oasis and Simoon, both 1927), Płomienna północ (1926; Eng. tr., The Fire of Desert Folk, 1926), and Niewolnicy słońca (1927; Eng. tr., Slaves of the Sun, 1928). Although best known for his books of travel, which have been extensively translated, he has produced many other works, including biographies, plays, novels, and scientific articles.

Ossendowski has described himself as "a writer, wanderer, and weaver of romances," and, against accusations of inaccuracy, he has asserted the traveler's right to be more concerned with his own subjective impressions than with factual detail. His interest in the occult and in local anecdotes and legends gives added color to his memoirs. His political views reflect a deep fear of Bolshevism and Islam and a strong belief that it is the prescribed duty of the "Aryan race" in Europe to lead the less fortunate peoples of the earth to freedom and peace in universal brotherhood.

See: Sven Hedin, Ossendowski und die Wahrheit (1925).

F. J. W.

Ossiannilsson, Karl Gustaf (1875–, Swedish poet, novelist, and dramatist), was born at Lund in the south of Sweden, and studied at the University of Lund. He soon became the literary leader of the Socialist Party and was active in the cause of the Allies in the First World War. Though he wrote drama and prose fiction, it is as a lyric poet that he has won his chief recognition, with such volumes as Örnar (1902; Eagles) and Orchester (1907; The Orchestra). Like Kipling he used repetition effectively, though not the refrain. Sir Edmund Gosse admired his “virile violence in invective.” He is fond too, as Sir Edmund’s phrase might suggest, of an almost Swinburnian alliteration. He did in fact translate Swinburne and Browning.

Ossiannilsson has been more than a narrow party man; he sees his cause in a perspective of history. One of his most cherished ideas was that the tyrant, in arousing masses to opposition and concentrating their wills, was an involuntary friend of liberty, and Ossiannilsson’s best-known poem is “Bismarck.” Almost equally memorable is the more smoothly flowing “Pompeii,” which begins with a description but develops into a symbol of the idle aristocracy in all ages, careless and secure, while the lava of popular unrest is rising in the crater above them. Ossiannilsson loves the northern winter that is death to the parasites’ cowardice and presumption. He has a poem about a woman millworker that is like a modern “Song of the Shirt,” and a locomotive lyric that is deafening in its blast and clash, yet he catches equally well the subtle moods of nature’s repose, and he has written a delectable drinking song in praise of—water.

See: K. Warburg, Svensk litteraturhistoria i sammandrag (1911); C. W. Stork, Anthology of Swedish Lyrics (1917; revised and enlarged ed., 1930); E. Gosse and W. A. Craigie, eds., The Oxford Book of Scandinavian Verse (1925).
C. W. S.

Ossorgin, Mikhail Andreyevich, see Osorgin.

Ostayen, Paul van (1896–1928, Flemish poet and essayist), was born in Antwerp and died in Miavoye-Anhée. He is the most significant experimental poet that Dutch and Flemish literature has had for many years. In three books of poetry, Music Hall (1916), Het Sienjaal (1918; The Signal), and Bezette Stad (1921; The City Occupied), he introduced free verse wherein he combined a great devotion to the political and social problems of his time with an atmosphere of classical and purely aesthetic ivory-tower writing. Abandoning the social themes and his function of political seer and prophet in the manner of Whitman, he then turned to dadaism and finally to “pure poetry.” In this last vein he composed poems of great purity and extremely refined musical construction (Het eerste Boek van Schmoll, 1929; The First Book of Schmoll). He wrote a number of short stories which are mere intellectual acrobatics, impertinent and witty. They are composed with verbal ingeniousness and constitute powerful antidotes to the bombast and romanticism which are traditional ailments of Flemish literature. As an explorer of literary “realms unknown,” his influence was considerable both in Flanders and in Holland. His critical work is extremely personal in tone and phrased in rather abstruse language.

See: G. Burssens, Paul van Ostayen (1935).
J.-A. G.

Österling, Anders (1884–, Swedish poet and critic), made his mark as a lyric poet at an early age. When he was scarcely 20, he made a brilliant debut with a volume entitled Preludier (Preludes), and during the next three years he added Offerkransar (1905; Votive Crowns) and Hälsningar (1907; Greetings). Early elected to the Swedish Academy, he became its permanent secretary upon the death of Karlfeldt (q.v.) in 1931. His earliest volumes of poetry revealed a sensitive, precociously gifted young poet, filled with infinite longings and an infinite melancholy, and giving expression to his feelings in poems that reflect a marvelous technical virtuosity for one so young. That which he longs for is the ineffable spirit of beauty—beauty with a capital B, the beauty which to the tradition of symbolistic poetry on the Continent was the one source and only aim of the pure poetic mind. Certain things in Ruskin, in the Pre-Raphaelite painting and poetry, and in the verse of Stéphane Mallarmé, Stefan George, and in the early Richard Dehmelt (qq.v.) were among the chief formative influences in Österling’s earliest poetry; while at home, in the example of two contemporaneous poets of Skåne, Ola Hansson and Vilhelm Ekelund (qq.v.), he found immediate native models in a sensitive, finely nuanced, and more than a little precious poetic manner. The delicate, subtly varied musical tonalities and the fragile, floating, half-evasive imagery of Continental symbolists was, however, largely an early passing phase in Österling’s poetic development. In Årets visor

(1907; The Year's Songs) one observes a definite break with the symbolist tradition in poetry. This break is confirmed in Blommande träd (1910; Blossoming Trees), is given further and more significant expression in Idyllernas bok (1917; Book of the Idylls) and De sju strängarna (1922; The Seven Strings), and comes to find a rich, mature, and finally authoritative expression in Jordens heder (1927; The Honor of the Earth) and Tonen från havet (1933; Tones from the Sea). During all of these years Österling has been occupied also with a rather prolific critical production as literary and theatrical editor of various Stockholm newspapers. Selections from the best of the critical sketches and essays have appeared from time to time in book form under such titles as Människor och landskap (1910; Men and Provinces), Tidsstämningar (1916; Time Tones), Dagens gärning (3 vols., 1921-1931; The Day's Work), and Tio års teater, 1925-1935 (1936; Ten Years of the Theatre 1925-1935). Österling has also been among the most assiduous and sensitive of Swedish translators of foreign poetry, German, French, and English.

The line of development in Österling's poetry to be noted clearly for the first time in Årets visor as early as 1907 is in the direction of a new poetic realism—a realism that involves in its choice of subject matter a return to life and to the soil, and in its form a simple, direct, concrete imagery and word choice. Among Österling's new masters were Francis James (q.v.) in France, and, more important, a number of early 20th-century Danish poets; but the chief individual foreign influence on the Swedish poet was unquestionably Wordsworth, whom he came to know early and has translated with a remarkably sensitive feeling for the English poet's essential poetic qualities. It is the quiet, serene, meditative strain in Wordsworth, together with the English poet's interest in common man and his preference for the language of everyday life, that appealed so strongly to Österling's sensitive, restrained poetic temperament. Österling comes to bring this spirit and manner to bear with richly satisfactory results upon the folk life and upon the landscape of his native province of Skåne, effecting, in his best poems, a happy compromise between the half-symbolistic tradition in the contemporaneous poetic tradition in Skåne and the more purely meditative, philosophical manner of Wordsworth. Certain post First World War critics in Sweden have accused Österling of practicing an evasive idyllicism in times which call for poetry of a sterner spirit; but he has gone his own way, as neither reactionary nor revolutionary, quietly meeting the challenge of a changing pattern of life with no fundamental change in point of view or in poetic manner. He, like Wordsworth, feels that true poetic genius draws inspiration from sources beyond those postulated by man's latest fad in thinking or history's most recent phase of development.

See: F. Böök, Resa kring svenska Parnassen (1926); A. Gustafson, Österling's "Arrival" as Landskapsdiktare: from Årets visor (1907) to Blommande träd (1910) (1938).

A. G.

Ostrovsky, Nikolai Alekseyevich (1904-1937, Russian novelist), has been virtually canonized by Soviet criticism, as much for his extraordinary human accomplishment as for his literary achievement. He lived and died heroically, an example of idealistic youth challenging all obstacles, and his work is ranked among the classics of Soviet literature. Born of a laborer's family in the town of Shepetovka, Volyn (Ukraine), he received only a primary education. At 12 he became a kitchen boy, and then a fireman in an electric station. At 17 he fought in the civil wars in the Western Ukraine. Later a shock-brigade leader, a military commissar, and a regional director of the Young Communists, he lost his health in 1927 when progressive paralysis set in, followed by total blindness. Bedridden, often in agonizing pain, subjected to many operations, he nevertheless resolved (1930) to continue serving the Revolution through writing. The manuscript of his first work was lost in the mails. The second, a novel of the civil wars, Kak zakalyalas stal (1936; Eng. tr., The Making of a Hero, 1937), won instant recognition as a dramatic and authentic account of the Young Communists of the early Revolution who were, like steel, "forged and hardened" by war, famine, and epidemics. The experiences of Paul Korchagin, the chief character, are largely those of the author. The book sold more than 1,600,000 copies in its first year. Rozhdyonie burey (1937; Eng. tr., Born of the Storm, 1939), another politico-autobiography, the first half of an uncompleted novel, appeared on the day of his funeral. Dedicated to the struggle of the Ukrainian peasants and proletariat against the Polish lords and the German army of occupation, its main theme is the typical hero of the Revolution. Its last chapters, the personal epic of a man who struggles for his regeneration, attain true moral greatness.

Ostrovsky's narrative power, his skill in creating a vividly realistic background and in handling an intricate plot, are considerable, though his characterizations tend to oversimplification on both national and class lines and his style suffers from clichés. His burning conviction, however, and his heroic will to accomplishment, which for years sustained a ravaged body, offset such faults and lead one to believe his talent would have greatly ripened. He was decorated (1935) with the Order of Lenin. André Gide (q.v.) paid him a singular tribute in his Retour de l'U.R.S.S.

See: Ostrovsky, Rechi, stati, i pisma (1937); M. Serebryanin, "Nikolai Ostrovsky," in Ostrovsky, Kah zakalyalas stal, Rozhdyonie burey (1937), pp. 445-460.

N. S.

Överland, Arnulf (1889-, Norwegian poet), has for more than a decade been devoted to the ideal of "forging a sword," i.e., of making his poetry into a social weapon. There was no sign of this ideal in his earliest verse, which appeared in such choice collections as Den ensomme fest (1911; The Lonely Feast), De hundrede violiner (1912; The Hundred Violins), and Advent (1915). These were in the tragic mood of Obstfelder (q.v.), but with a tense, compressed power which was unknown to the poets of the 90's. He wrote of his lonely heart, bitterly crying out against the vanity of all things, devoted to the dream which alone satisfies. The poems were acclaimed by critics for their fastidious restraint of form, their elimination of all rhetoric, and their truly monumental use of simple, unadorned words. These qualities have remained characteristic of his verse, which is pale in coloration, with a glint of steel, yet passionately moving because of the angry fire in the poet's heart. That fire was kindled by the First World War and the peace of Versailles, which belied his poetic belief of 1915 that to him "there was nothing more that could happen." He awoke to the existence of social injustice, and it made him cry out in Brød og vin (1919; Bread and Wine) that "there are dearer things than life. You shall fight for them!" He turned from the cultivation of his own soul and plunged into contemporary life as a rather obstreperous battler on the extreme left. The collections Berget det blå (1927; Blue Mountain), Hustavler (1929; Laws of Living), and Jeg besverger dig (1934; I Conjure Thee) are not one-sidedly social, for there is love and beauty in them too, but they display a growing faith in the mystic value of sharing life with one's fellow men. This religious devotion to the ideal of socialism became a substitute for the Christianity against which he turned all his acid scorn, using repeatedly its own vocabulary and form, even to the extent of creating a socialistic ritual in the recently published book, Ord i alvor til det norske folk (1940; Words in Earnest to the Norwegian People). Many of his poems implied for himself a suffering to come, a crucifixion: "This is my body . . . nailed to the tree of passion; eat, ravens!" Prophetic also was his cry in the poem "Opbrudd" (Breaking Up) of 1934: "Harsh times will come, when each man bears a sword." He quickly found his leading adversary in Hitler, and his poems in Den røde front (1937; The Red Front), bearing such flaming titles as "Spain 1936," "Guernica," and "You Must Not Sleep!" were challenges intended to awaken his countrymen to the menace of Nazism. When the German horde actually did invade Norway in 1940, Överland's moment of passion had come. He wrote a series of poems which were anonymously and privately circulated; these became in his countrymen's hands the swords he intended them to be. Such poems as "We Shall Live through All," "They Came as Friends," "Blacked-out Town," "To the Fallen," "Our Men," and "To the King" (since the war's end collected and published in a volume entitled Vi overlever alt, 1945, We Shall Live through All) established the pattern of Norwegian resistance, by virtue of the simple but powerful poetic form in which they couched the demand for national integrity. Överland paid for these poems in a German concentration camp, thus giving substance to his own line of 1929: "Words that cost something may long survive." In May, 1945, came his liberation; he has now moved into the Grotto, the old home of Norway's greatest poet, Henrik Wergeland, as the honored guest of the Norwegian state.

See: H. Naeseth, tr., in American-Scandinavian Review, XXIX (1941), 331-332; C. W. Stork, Anthology of Norwegian Lyrics (1942); E. Haugen, tr., in American-Scandinavian Review, XXXI (1943), 5-7; H. Krog, Nordmannsforbundets Julehefte (1943).

E. H.

P

Pagnol, Marcel (1895–, French writer and cinema specialist), was born at Aubagne near Marseille. Destined for a career of teaching, he was professor of English in various lycées and collèges in southern France before being called to the Lycée Condorcet in Paris in 1922. Even in his youth he had shown a marked tendency for creative literary production. During his professorial days in the South of France he edited a literary revue, Fantasio (which later became the Cahiers du sud), and a theatrical sheet, the Spectator, and wrote a pseudoclassical play in verse, Catulle (1922), as well as several minor works of small importance. Shortly after his arrival in Paris he deserted the teaching profession in order to throw himself wholly into writing for the stage. In collaboration with Arno Brun he produced the play Ulysse chez les Phéniciens (1925). The same year appeared his very successful play, Les Marchands de gloire, written in collaboration with Nivoix. In 1926 he produced Jazz, and in 1928 the play that brought him especial renown, Topaze (presented in New York in English in 1930, English film 1933). His Marseillais trilogy, Marius (1929), Fanny (1931), and César (1936), contributed to the enhancement of his reputation. He also wrote two short novels, Pirouettes (1932) and La Petite Fille aux yeux sombres (1933). About 1930 he became interested in the possibilities of the cinema and proceeded to the founding of two companies under his direction, one to write and produce moving pictures and the other to market them. He also established a magazine, Cahiers du film, which served as a vehicle for the expounding of his cinematographic theories. At the same time he was producing several films, largely adapted from the legitimate stage.

It is in the Cahiers du film that are found his theories on the function and art of the cinema. He felt that the sound film represented a new artistic medium and wished to elevate it to the dignity of a separate literary genre which might, in fact, supersede the legitimate stage, and he sought to establish the literary canons for its guidance and development. These canons consist largely of the adaptation of the rules of the French classical theatre to the greater freedom and scenic possibilities of the screen. In 1935 he produced Merlusse as an illustration of his cinematographic theories.

See: A. G. Bovée, ed., Topaze (1936), pp. ii–iv; Louis Combaluzier, Le Jardin de Pagnol (1937); L. G. Moffatt, ed., Merlusse (1937), pp. ix–xvi.

L. G. M.

Pailleron, Edouard (1834–1899, French dramatist), the son of wealthy merchants and son-in-law of François Buloz, director of the Revue des deux mondes, was a typical Parisian grand bourgeois whose fortune allowed him to satisfy a taste for fashionable living and literary endeavor. His dramatic career ran smoothly to the climactic success of Le Monde où l'on s'ennuie (1881) and his subsequent election to the French Academy.

Pailleron's works reflect the qualities and limitations of his education and milieu. A conservative at heart, he scorns romanticism as a social disease and extols laughter as a means of self-defense against the disintegration of moral and cultural values (see his "Ode au rire," 1859). As a man of the world, however, he learned how to use his weapons lightly and gingerly. With the exception of some early plays, heavily moralizing and poetized after the manner of Emile Augier (Les Faux Ménages, 1869; Hélène, 1872), his theatre is remarkable for its witty dialogue and clever characterization (Le Monde où l'on s'amuse, 1868; L'Age ingrat, 1878; L'Étincelle, 1879; Cabotins, 1894). Le Monde où l'on s'ennuie, his masterpiece, could easily be baptized a social play, a modern replica of Molière's Les Femmes savantes as well as a denunciation of the newborn aristocracy of the Third Republic, dull, vulgar, noisy, and self-seeking. Far better justice is done by considering it a superior comedy of intrigue, with just the right mixture of the ironic and the sentimental, a perfect example of Parisian good taste and Gallic sprightliness.

See: Hippolyte Parigot, Le Théâtre d'hier (1893), pp. 243–290; Alessandro Liala-Paternostro, Edouard Pailleron (1931).

J.-A. B.

Palacio Valdés, Armando (1853–1938, Spanish novelist, short-story writer, and critic), was born at Entralgo in Asturias, but he passed his youth mostly in neighboring Avilés, where the family took up residence in 1854. After completing his elementary schooling he entered the instituto at Oviedo. In 1870 he enrolled in the law school at the University of Madrid. Excelling in philosophy and political science, in which he was more interested than in law, at one time he looked forward to teaching philosophy as a career, but with the encouragement and aid of friends he was attracted to writing and made his début as literary critic and editor. He soon distinguished himself with three series of sketches of Spanish orators, novelists, and poets (Los oradores del Ateneo, 1878; Los novelistas españoles, 1878; Nuevo viaje al Parnaso, 1879). La literatura en 1881 (1882), a volume he wrote in collaboration with Leopoldo Alas (q.v.), was his last critical work. These works contributed more to the crystallization of Palacio's aesthetic concepts than to the development of Spanish literary criticism.

Except for the premature death of his first wife and the loss of his only son, Palacio enjoyed a serene and uneventful life characterized by economic comfort almost unknown among Spanish literary men. His unparalleled popularity abroad—he is the most widely translated modern Spanish novelist—added greatly to the placidity and optimism which permeate most of his works. His relations with other writers were as pleasant as his contacts with life. Few admired him, many esteemed him, and some even appraised him flatteringly. He received many honors at home and abroad. In 1906 he was elected to membership in the Royal Spanish Academy of Language, and in 1917 he was admitted to the Legion of Honor. In the English-speaking world he was regarded as the "dean of Spanish novelists," and he appreciated this admiration as deeply as the enthusiasm of his French devotees who were frequently attracted to his chalet on Cap-Breton.

The essence of Palacio's art may be derived from his own novelistic formula. Free from profound spiritual preoccupations or transcendental aims, he finds his themes and characters in the ordinary ebb and flow of life, which he mirrors with spontaneity and facility. He changes his mood and shifts his view with slight effort, achieving variety at the expense of complexity. His settings are drawn from several regions of Spain, and his choice between city and country is largely capricious. Similarly impulsive would seem to be his unstable attachments to regionalism, naturalism, and idealism. In the matter of following literary fashions Palacio frequently ignored his own injunction against such practice. Marta y María (1883; Eng. tr., The Marquis of Peñalta, 1886) reflects the concern with religion so prominent in Spanish fiction of the 70's; La espuma (1891; Eng. tr., Froth, 1891) and La fe (1892; Eng. tr., Faith, 1892) are naturalistic in a restricted sense of the term; La Hermana San Sulpicio (1889; Eng. tr., Sister Saint Sulpice, 1890) and La aldea perdida (1903) belong to a group of regionalistic novels. However, in preferring to imitate a wisely chosen model rather than striving for originality of doubtful significance, Palacio was more faithful to his own creed. The absence of a strong uniform accent in his art is perhaps due to the fact that he was easily attracted to the sharper tones of his contemporaries. Only once was he able to free himself from artistic opportunism: La aldea perdida is a work of genuine inspiration and perhaps the only one in which the author extends his gaze beyond the usual domestic horizon. In the clash between rural life and industrial civilization there is a touch of epic grandeur, and the vigorous conception of the theme overshadows the manipulated characters and the mannered style which is a queer compound of roguishness, banter, euphemism, and transparent humor.

Palacio discovered his stride early and throughout the half century of his career, which was caught between two divergent literary generations, he rarely altered it. He is ever leisurely and diffuse in plot movement, lingering fondly on the episodic and winding pleasantly in the alleys and byways of life. The human beings of his world, which comes close to being the best of possible worlds, are simple, familiar folk whose inner life is as readily comprehensible as their outward behavior is conventional. They cause the author no anxiety, nor do they stir the reader. They are an ingratiating lot capable of transmitting to others their feeling of well-being. They are kindly creatures who offer everyone the hospitality of their restful homes in which pink and pastel shades predominate.

Palacio's impressive success is no surprising phenomenon. Spaniard or foreigner, no reader could fail to derive pleasure or profit from the novels of an author who once (1917) made the following confession: "If I were despoiled of that which belongs to the great masters who have gone before me, I should stand denuded. There is, however, something of which no one in this world can despoil me—the sweet satisfaction of knowing that some of my pages have brought smiles to the lips and others tears of tenderness to the eyes, the comforting certainty that no one has come away from the reading of my novels less pure and less noble than he was." In the light of this confession—which is a bit of sincere autocriticism—the rising literary generations of Spain have been excessively hostile in completely discarding Palacio Valdés.

See: H. Peseux-Richard, "Armando Palacio Valdés," Revue hispanique, XLII (1918), 305-480; A. Cruz Rueda, Armando Palacio Valdés; estudio biográfico (1925); J. A. Balseiro, Novelistas españoles modernos (1933), pp. 382-443.

H. C. B.

Palamas, Kostas (1859-1943, Greek poet), was born in Patras and educated at Missolonghi. He studied at the University of Athens, of which he later became the secretary. He held that post for many years, although efforts were made to oust him at the time of the linguistic riots started by students in 1901 who protested against the translation of the New Testament into the demotic speech. He first began to use the "pure" language (see Greek literature), but then turned to the demotic speech, which he brought to the highest stage of its poetical development. With a thorough knowledge of world literature, he welcomed and adapted in modern Greek such various authors as Leconte de Lisle (q.v.), Schopenhauer, and Verhaeren (q.v.). At the same time he never lost his sense of the continuity of his own Greek literature and life from their earliest days. His first important work in the demotic speech, Tragoudia tes patridos mou (1886; Songs of My Fatherland), expresses his aspirations; in the introduction to the Hymnos sten Athenan (1889; Hymn to Athena) he asserts categorically the duty of the poet to be a leader of his people. Palamas is far more a philosophical and intellectual poet than he is a pure lyricist, although he can feel deeply, as in Taphos (1898; The Tomb), the lament of a father for the death of his favorite child. His most impersonal work is the Assalephti zoi (1904, Life Unshakable; Eng. tr. of first part, Life Immovable, 1919, of second part, incomplete, A Hundred Voices and Other Poems, 1921) in which he glorifies Patras, Missolonghi, Athens, and the eternal qualities of Greece. In such poems as the Dodekalogos tou Yiphtou (1907; The Twelve Speeches of the Gypsy) and the Phlogera tou vasilia (1910; The Flute of the King) he brings before us the whole pageant of Greek and Byzantine history in the tone of a Byzantine hymn. Elsewhere in the Dekatetrasticha (1919; Fourteen Verses) and in his lyric drama Triseryene (1903) he again gives the spirit of Greece in its universal aspects. A careful craftsman, protean in his interests, Palamas, more than any other modern Greek writer, embodies the spirit, the aspirations, and the dreams, as well as the enduring sense of the past, of his nation.

See: A. E. Phoutrides, "A New World-Poet," in Palamas, Life Immovable (1919); A. Kampanes, Istoria tes neas ellenikes logotechnias (1933), pp. 214-239.

C. A. M.

Palazzeschi, Aldo (1885-, Italian poet and novelist), was born in Florence. Manifesting in early youth a pronounced predilection for letters, he soon became an active defender of the futuristic school of poetry which was in vogue in Italy during the years 1908 and 1909 and brought out his first volume of poems, a collection entitled L'Incendiario, of which the publisher, Cesare Blanc, was none other than his pet cat. These early poems contained a simplicity and freshness of lyrical inspiration that were bound to attract new readers, even though some found it difficult to distinguish the meaning of such compositions as "Ara mara amara," "Il Segno," "Oro doro odoro dodoro." Yet poems like "Rio Bo," "Chi sono?", "Lo Specchio," "La Fontana malata," "Lasciatemi divertire," revealed a charming delicacy of pathos and a delightful melancholy sweetness, expressed in a style fantastic and almost childlike. The poems also revealed the mischievous, impish, and playful traits of a literary youngster throwing stones at poetic windows.

Palazzeschi's attachment to futurism did not last long. His publications subsequent to L'Incendiario show a marked tendency to be independent of any school of literary thought. Il Codice di Perelà (1911; English adaptation, Perelà, The Man of Smoke, 1936) is the story of a man made of smoke and is considered among the most fantastic and entertaining novels published in Italy in the last 50 years. Here we find Palazzeschi in a gay, mischievous mood, seemingly enjoying the sight of human beings battling the incongruities and impenetrable paradoxes of life. Society for Palazzeschi assumes the character of a three-ringed circus. Like the youngster attending his first performance he laughs heartily at the antics of the clowns before him. His most hearty chuckles are elicited by the somersaults of critics and poets and the tightrope walking of philosophers. Palazzeschi's laughter is interrupted only when he realizes what a ridiculous figure he too has been cutting. Then there is one more hearty laugh, but this time it is at himself. A reviewer of the English version of Perelà has called it "an Italian parable of human folly; an Italian version of Gulliver standing on its head."

Since the appearance of Perelà, Palazzeschi's most noteworthy publications are Stampe dell'ottocento (1932) and Sorelle Materassi (1934). The former is autobiographical; the author depicts in colorful nostalgic tones the humorous scenes of his early Florentine childhood. Sorelle Materassi contains the same ironic, humorous vein—this time about the world of old maids. The sketches are developed by a more deliberate and mature hand. Critics in Italy have hailed these two novels as among the outstanding achievements of contemporary Italian letters.

See: C. Pellizzi, Le Lettere italiane del nostro secolo (1929), pp. 230–234; P. Pancrazi, Scrittori italiani del novecento, (1934), pp. 141–147.

P. M. R.

Panferov, Fyodor (1896–, Russian novelist), was born in Central Russia, of a poor peasant family. From early childhood he was compelled to earn his living, as a shepherd, a farm hand, a servant. After the Revolution of 1917 Panferov worked among the peasants as a Communist Party official. He started to write in 1922, but did not gain popularity until 1930 when the first two parts of his long novel Bruski (Eng. tr., Bruski, 1930; And Then the Harvest, 1939) were published. This was the first attempt made in Soviet literature to picture the struggle between the new and the old mode of life in a Russian village. The first and the second parts of Bruski have had numerous editions, but the third part (1933), describing the triumph of collectivization in a rhetorical and pompous way, did not appeal to readers. The factual material offered by Panferov was interesting and revealing and it had an undoubtedly large social significance, but the poor organization of the work and the primitiveness of the artistic devices provoked sharp criticism, especially from Gorky (q.v.). In 1942 Panferov published a series of short stories on war (Tyazhelaya ruka, The Heavy Arm); his book on the industrial effort in the Urals (Na Urale, The People of the Urals) appeared in 1943. Panferov's latest work shows that he has followed Gorky's advice and paid more attention to style and literary craftsmanship.

M. S.

Panzacchi, Enrico (1840–1904, Italian poet and critic), was born at Ozzano, near Bologna. He studied at the University of Bologna, and at the University of Pisa where he was taught by two now famous authorities on Italian literature, Pasquale Villari and Alessandro D'Ancona. Panzacchi began his poetical career at the age of 30 with a short volume of verses entitled Funeralia (1870). This was followed by Piccolo Romanziere (1872), which received the unconditional praises of Carducci (q.v.) and which established Panzacchi's fame as a poet. Lirica (1877) had an immediate success. In 1881 appeared Vecchio Ideale which became a year later, with additions and minor corrections, Racconti e liriche; these poems were written at the height of his inspiration. A later volume is Nuove Liriche (1888), and a complete edition of Panzacchi's poetry with a preface by Giovanni Pascoli (q.v.) was published in 1908. Panzacchi also tried his hand at writing drama, but here he was a failure.

Panzacchi's poetry consists completely of rapid emotions, not harmonized, not given any lyric unity. He is ready on all occasions, not because of vanity or for mercenary reasons, but because poetry for him is one of the necessities and dignities of life, a noble vocation, an indispensable mode of expression. As lecturer and orator few surpassed him in eloquence.

See: E. Lamma, Enrico Panzacchi (1905); B. Croce, La letteratura della nuova Italia, 2d ed., II (1921), 119–125; G. Mazzoni, L'Ottocento (1934), pp. 1379–1380.

A. C. R.

Panzini, Alfredo (1863–1939), Italian author and teacher), was born in Senigallia, in the Marches, near his beloved Romagna. As a teacher his distaste for scholarly research and publication prevented him from ever getting more than a professorship in a secondary school. A born artist, he loved life far more than archives. In a period in which historical research, positivism, and socialism were in full swing, if it was not exactly a fault to write well, it certainly was no merit, even in university circles. Like Albertazzi and Severino Ferrari (q.v.), fellow disciples of Carducci (q.v.) with whom he had something in common, Panzini remained a teacher throughout his life, in and outside the classroom. Unlike them, however, he became, in his 50's, a favorite of the Italian ruling class, with its rather obvious hedonistic ideals in art, and also popular with the younger generation of critics, with its rather aristocratic, sophisticated standards. The ruling class and the unruly critics were for once in agreement. His case is a rare example of an outstanding writer ignored by his own generation and made famous by the very generation which delighted in removing the halo surrounding older writers.

His early works (Libro dei morti, 1893; Inganni, 1895; Moglie nuova, 1899; Piccole Storie del mondo grande, 1901) were conceived and published in the epoch dominated by Carducci, whose pupil Panzini was proud to acknowledge himself. These books of short stories show all the characteristics of the later Panzini, although at times hazily and clumsily. They were reprinted after Serra (q.v.) "discovered" Panzini in 1910 and enjoyed a success almost as great as that of his later works. Panzini's best, however, came at the time of Serra's "discovery," and the enthusiasm of the new generation, which welcomed him in its anthologies (Papini, q.v., and Pancrazi included him in their classic Poeti d'oggi, published in 1910), doubtless gave more self-confidence to a man who was by nature rather uncertain, shy, and probably suffering from the public's failure to recognize his merits.

The charm of Panzini's personality is reflected in all his works, even in his dictionary (Dizionario moderno, 1906), textbooks, and anthologies. It is a personality impossible to curb or repress. The light plots of his novels (Santippe, 1914; La Madonna di mamà 1916), the flimsy intrigues of his short stories (Le Fiabe della vita, 1911), the kaleidoscopic sequences of his books of history or travel (La Lanterna di Diogene, 1907; Viaggio di un giovane letterato, 1919, but written in 1913-1914), are no more than springboards and deserve very little attention in an evaluation of his literary art.

Imagine a man of the classic age, fond of simple country life and natural feelings, chaste and moderate of speech, of noble and solemn deeds, revering truth, the family, and his country—imagine such a man risen from the dead in the modern world, hedonistic, money-mad, openly frivolous, sensualist in love, grossly materialistic in its social unrest, rebellious to natural order and tradition. In his simple, childlike heart he cannot but feel that his new contemporaries are wrong, although he cannot bring himself to condemn them. He does not like them, but he is attracted by them; they are impure and absurd—especially the women—but how charming! Like a child, he is slowly overcome with a feeling of wonder. Can it be that he is wrong, that he is a mere provincial, a weakling incapable of making the most of his opportunities? This contrast between the world of classic times, where Panzini has his roots, and the new industrial and materialistic world, wherein it was his lot to live, offers him a good opportunity to carry the reader's imagination with him to the other world and back again into this. Hence follows a style all sparkling with contrasts and ironies, with indecisions, pauses, and resumptions, with personal experiences, with interruptions for a lesson, or with witticisms interrupting a lesson. His easy enthusiasm, which has the cadence of poetry, is often disconnected and fragmentary (this fact endeared him to the Voce group, whose gospel was fragmentarism). He is incapable of handling and organizing a complex mass of material and, one may say, incapable of methodically thinking through to a cogent conclusion. Attracted by what glitters, but with a solid attachment for what is fundamental, he has more power of instinct than of reason. When in doubt, he tries to be evasive with a smile or a pleasantry, something for which Croce (q.v.) has caustically reproached him. But even this irate philosopher could not but acknowledge the happy moments of pure lyricism in Panzini's fluid and transparent prose. Generally these happy moments are melodious instants in his contemplation of nature, art, and men, idyllic and romantic in their intimate aspirations.

During the First World War, and even more so immediately after it, he was confronted with problems too baffling for him. Peace disappeared from his soul; his mild ironies became sarcasms (Io cerco moglie, 1920; Eng. tr., Wanted—a Wife, 1922; Il diavolo nella mia libreria, 1920; Signorine, 1921; Il Mondo e rotondo, 1921). His Il Padrone sono me (1922) is a frank and bitter expression of the fear of communism dominating the middle classes, which formed the backbone of Fascism in Italy. But the great bulk of his readers was attracted by other qualities of his: his biting ironies, his scathing malice, his veiled criticism of modern life. In his last books Panzini got into the habit of a style made up of contrasts—the so-called "humor" of Panzini which sometimes is rather a formula than a style.

When the crisis brought about by the war and Bolshevism was over in Italy, Panzini turned to recreating the past (La Pulcella senza pulcellaggio, 1925; Tre Re, con Gelsomino buffone del re, 1927; Sventurata Irminda, 1932; Il Bacio di Lesbica, 1937) and to the glory of this earth (Giorni del sole e del grano, 1929). In these pages there is more academic art and less originality and candor than in previous works. He was made a member of the Italian Academy, and one feels that he deserved this particular honor.

To complete the review of his work, other titles should be mentioned. He wrote two books on Cavour (Il 1859; da Plombières a Villafranca, 1909; Il Conte di Cavour, 1931) and La Vera Istoria dei tre colori (1924). Very gingerly, like a cat approaching water, he touched upon the Jewish question in Viaggio con la giovane ebrea (1935). He took up the defense of "noble" Boiardo against "servile" Ariosto (M. Maria Boiardo, 1918). Very popular and quite curiously so is the already noticed Dizionario moderno (7th ed., 1935), in which he collected for fun all the "garbage" of the current Italian language as it appeared in newspapers, and adding thereto contemporary slogans, slang words and expressions, borrowings from French and English—commenting upon them with caustic spirit, trying at the same time to correct and amend, but sometimes giving up in sheer disgust and helplessness at the violence of what to him were the outpourings of a sewer. He was personally esteemed and loved by many friends.

See: G. Prezzolini, Amici (1922) pp. 73–96; G. Mormino, Alfredo Panzini nelle opere e nella vita (1937); A. Bocelli, "Alfredo Panzini," Italia che scrive, XXII (1939), 95–96 (one of many commemorations of the death of Panzini).

G. P.

Papini, Giovanni (1881–, Italian writer and poet), was born in Florence of a lower-middle-class family; his father was a furniture maker with atheistic views and also an ardent patriot, his mother was a Catholic with simple tastes, devoted to her three children. Papini gives his own picture of his childhood in Un Uomo finito (1912; Eng. tr., A Man—Finished, American title, The Failure, both 1924). These very subjective memoirs show a restless, tormented, and ambitious boy with a devouring passion for information, seeking refuge from a dreary and hostile world in books of every description and in projects for writing an encyclopedia of all knowledge. His formal education completed, Papini became a teacher of Italian at the Anglo-Italian Institute of Santa Reparata (1902–1903) and also served as a library clerk at the Museum of Anthropology (1902–1904). Books lost some of their engrossing charm, and Papini began to crave friendships. With Giuseppe Prezzolini (q.v.), to whom Papini was attracted in terms of comradeship, in intellectual curiosity, love of ideas, he felt an apostolic urge to lead his countrymen to the acquisition of more culture, more spiritual energy, and more nationalism. Papini believed the time had come for him to emerge from his lowly environment and assert his indomitable personality in the field of thought. With Prezzolini he founded a literary review, the Leonardo (1903–1907), which ushered in a nation-wide literary and philosophic renaissance. In politics he played the agitator and the reformer. He joined the ranks of the Regno (1903–1905), carrying over from the Leonardo, but with added violence an antagonistic campaign against the Socialists. The articles by Papini and Prezzolini in the Regno are among the first documents to express the change that was taking place in the youth of Italy towards nationalism (e.g., Vecchio e nuovo nazionalismo, 1914). Papini then carried his restlessness, his gusto for novelty, for social approval, and for self-assertion into the realm of philosophy, proposing to sweep out traditional philosophic and freely pouring forth the bitterness of his own disillusion in Crepuscolo dei filosofi (1906). He turned to pragmatism, but this gradually tapered off for him into a strange mixture of vague theosophy, spiritualism, occultism, and mysticism. He wrote short stories where the dramatic torment of his philosophical thought and autobiographical reminiscences served as material for poetic expression: Il Tragico quotidiano (1906); Il Pilota cieco (1907; Eng. tr. of this and of Il Tragico quotidiano, Life and Myself, 1930); Parole e sangue (1912); Buffonate (1914). In the last two of these books he drifted away from his philosophic abstractions and leaned towards an imitation of Poe and Baudelaire (q.v.).

In 1907 Papini married Giacinta Giagnoli, a peasant girl from Bulciano (Tuscany). He went to Milan where he had some dealings with the religious group known as the Modernista and then withdrew to Bulciano to the beauties of nature and the joys of family life, and read and meditated. Toward the end of 1908 Papini returned to Florence where he began to edit a philosophic collection of classics under the title of Cultura dell'anima. His most important activity of this period was related to the Voce movement (see Italian literature). His collaboration was varied: he composed for this periodical articles on political and educational reforms; religious and literary polemics; critical essays on Nietzsche, Count Leo Tolstoy (qq.v.), Poe, William James, Vailati, and others (collected in 24 Cervelli, 1913; Eng. tr., Four and Twenty Minds, 1922). With Giovanni Amen-dola he founded a strictly philosophical monthly, the Anima (January–December, 1911). Most of Papini's contributions to the Anima were to become chapters of L'Altra Metà (1912); some critics have seen in the nihilism and pessimism of this book a first glimmer of Papini's future conversion to Catholicism. He had now reached a crisis in his mental turmoil. He poured out his bitterness against scholars and philosophers in a series of lampoons, satires, and demolitions later collected as Stronature (1916). Then his tempo slowed down in the Vita di nessuno (1912). Finally, Papini passed into a lyrical dream, and the result was Un Uomo finito. This spiritual autobiography is the author's most complete expression of that belligerent self-assertion which strikes the keynote of his whole literary career.

In January, 1913, Papini, Soffici, Palazzeschi (qq.v.), and Tavolato founded a new review, Lacerba (1913–1915). This magazine opened its pages to a "futuristic" inundation, and later in 1914 it became an organ of tenacious political propaganda for Italy's intervention in the war on the side of the Allies. Rejected for military service, Papini turned to collect some of his articles previously published in reviews and periodicals. La Paga del sabato (1915) contains articles on Papini's disillusion with war; Testimonianze (1918), like Stronature, is a collection of literary criticisms; Maschilità (1915) contains articles on literary theory. In this fury of publication Papini overlooked nothing. He brought together in Polemiche religiose (1918) writings on religious subjects that dated as far back as 1908. In his literary criticism Papini takes over Croce's categories, mixes them with other elements; he is as superficial here as in his treatment of James's pragmatism. His principal offering is "criticism by invective"—with occasional flashes of insight.

Even in an atmosphere of bombastic futurism, war clamors, and fiery polemics, Papini could sometimes achieve such tranquillity as is best represented in his prose poems Cento Pagine di poesia (1915) and Giorni di festa (1918) and in the poems of Opera prima (1917). Here he sought escape from the commonplace sentimentalities of life and from the usual lyrical forms in which they had for centuries been expressed. His concept of pure poetry is probably of French origin, stemming more remotely perhaps from the environment of Rimbaud and Valéry (qq.v.), to whom Papini had been introduced by Soffici, an enthusiast. Later, in 1926, when Papini had come forth with his fourth volume of poems, Pane e vino, he had become reconciled to the idea that poetry should not consist simply and purely of sound effects for new harmonious pleasure to the ear, but that great poetry could be found solely in eternal truth.

At the end of the First World War, Papini, still feverishly looking for a meaning in life and for a way to be useful to his fellow men, turned to religion and became a convert to Catholicism. His Storia di Cristo (1921; Eng. trs., Life of Christ, 1923, The Story of Christ, 1924) created a sensation. It was translated into many languages, it was financially a tremendous success, it aroused widespread discussion in Italy. The Storia di Cristo is Papini's exuberant and highly personal dramatization of Jesus; those hostile critics who have doubted the sincerity of Papini's "conversion" find in the book "no Christian vision of life."

Papini continues to be extraordinarily active. He is a collaborator on the Frontespizio and contributes to other periodicals and reviews; he collects essays and articles, produces books such as Operai della vigna (1929), La Scala di Giacobbe (1932), La Pietra infernale (1934), I Testimoni della passione (1937). His biographies of Sant'Agostino (1929; Eng. tr., Saint Augustine, 1930) and Dante Vivo (1933; Eng. tr., Dante Vivo, 1934) are very interesting in as much as they are strictly "Papinian." Gog (1931; Eng. tr., 1931) is a bitter satire on modern society. Eresie letterarie (1932) and Ritratti italiani (1932) are essays on literary theory and criticism. Papini was made a member of the Italian Academy in 1937.

Papini with his vast ambitions and hasty renunciations remains a typical representative of a period disturbed by great events. His works voice the moods of a whole generation of Italians, a generation that fed too eagerly on abstractions, that hated its masters too cordially, that often sought the short cut to success and the achievement of sound culture, a generation which, nevertheless, struck not a few chords of spiritual revival that echoed throughout the world.

See: G. Prezzolini, Discorso su Giovanni Papini (1915); R. Fondi, Un Costruttore: Giovanni Papini (1920); E. Palmieri, Giovanni Papini (1927); A. Viviani, Giansfalco (1934).

M. B.

Pardo Bazán, Emilia, condesa de (1852–1921, Spanish novelist), was born at La Coruña in Galicia. When only 17 years old she married the Galician José Quiroga. Literary success came to her for the first time in 1876 when her essay Examen crítico de las obras del

Padre Feijóo won a prize. The fact that she was a woman prevented her election to the Spanish Academy, an honor she was most anxious to have. However, she did have that of being appointed to the chair of modern Romance literatures at the University of Madrid. She was an enthusiastic feminist and an ardent advocate of the education of woman.

Literary criticism and other critical and erudite writings, together with travel books and some dramatic attempts, constitute an important part of the author's 47 volumes of Obras completas and stand as a testimony to the variety of talents of this most cultivated lady. By far the largest part, however, consists of novels, and it was as a novelist that she occupied a foremost position among the writers of her time. Her name as a novelist is connected with the rise of the naturalistic movement, of which she was the main Spanish exponent, especially in her essay (originally a series of newspaper articles) La cuestión palpitante (1883). Her position in this matter was not an easy one, caught as she was between her literary enthusiasm for the new movement on the one hand and her Catholic faith and rather idealistic philosophy on the other. Curiously, the same year (1882) in which the articles of La cuestión palpitante were published saw also the appearance of her two-volume work, San Francisco de Asís. What she finally did was to reject the materialistic philosophy of naturalism and accept the realistic principle of its literary orientation, broadening this principle in such a manner, however, as to include the spiritual as well as the natural. Even with these limitations and alterations, her position was ambiguous enough to provoke a reaction on the part of such opponents of naturalism as the Platonist Juan Valera (q.v.), who replied to La cuestión palpitante with his Apuntes sobre el nuevo arte de escribir novelas (1886-1887). Aside from the theoretical aspect of the question, a certain naturalistic tendency is to be seen in such of the author's works as Un viaje de novios (1881; Eng. tr., A Wedding Trip, 1891), La tribuna (1883), El cisne de Vilamorta (1885; Eng. tr., The Swan of Vilamorta, 1891), Insolación (1889), Morriña (1889; Eng. tr., Morriña—Homesickness, 1891). Of this tendency Los pazos de Ulloa (1886) and its sequel, La madre naturaleza (1887), in which the primitive instincts and forces of nature play also the role of a deterministic factor, mark the culminating point. Except for Un viaje de novios and Insolación, all these are regional novels of Galician people, their customs, etc. In them the literary personality of Pardo Bazán as the typical 19th-century painter of Galician life and scenery appears in its true character. The picture is a faithful and colorful one, and of this picture the description of the physical and moral decomposition of the noble house of Ulloa, in Los pazos de Ulloa, is the masterpiece. Galician too for the most part are Una cristiana (Eng. tr., A Christian Woman, 1891) and its sequel, La prueba (both 1890). The last novel, however, with its moral of Christian resignation and self-sacrifice, marks a new spiritual, religious orientation in the author's career. Besides her own religious and philosophic background and the antinaturalistic reaction of the closing years of the century, a factor contributing to this new orientation was the reading of Russian literature, in which Pardo Bazán had become interested. Her book La revolución y la novela en Rusia (Eng. tr., Russia: Its People and Its Literature, 1890), not particularly original yet significant in this connection, had appeared in 1887. Typical of the author's spiritualistic manner are La quimera (1905), La sirena negra (1908), and Dulce dueño (1911), three novels in each of which the disappointments and emptiness of life lead to a religious solution. The lesson is impressively dramatized in the futile life struggle of the hero-artist of La quimera. Pardo Bazán's novelistic production includes also several collections of short stories and cuentos (e.g., Cuentos de Navidad y Reyes, 1902; Belcebú, 1912). Outstanding are the Galician short stories and cuentos of the two collections Cuentos de Marineda (1892) and Un destripador de antaño (1900). An English translation of some of her shorter pieces appeared as Short Stories in 1933.

See: F. Vézinet, Les maîtres du roman espagnol contemporain (1907), pp. 203-231; Andrenio (E. Gómez de Baquero), Novelas y novelistas (1918), pp. 293-330; J. A. Balseiro, Novelistas españoles modernos (1933), pp. 262-327; C. Barja, Literatura española: Libros y autores modernos, revised ed. (1933), pp. 305-322; E. González López, Emilia Pardo Bazán, novelista de Galicia (1944).

C. B.

Pareto, Vilfredo (1848-1923, Italian economist, sociologist, and writer), the scion of a noble and patriotic family of Genoa, was born in Paris and died in Céligny, Switzerland. He has a world-wide reputation as an economist and a sociologist, but deserves mention also as a writer. Influenced by Walras, he developed the application of mathematical methods to economic problems in two famous books: Cours d'économie politique (1896–1897), Manuale d'economia politica (1907). During those years he had criticized the prevailing systems of socialism and had then attempted to treat sociology as a scientific subject in his Trattato di sociologia generale (1916), of which there is a notable American version, The Mind and Society (4 vols., 1935), edited by Arthur Livingston and translated by him and Andrew Bongiorno.

This is not the place to dwell upon Pareto's theories except to note that all his books are permeated by a spirit of contempt for ordinary, mediocre, and commonly accepted views and opinions. Pareto constructs a veritable barrier between the elite and the common man by creating a world above and beyond any thought of practical or sentimental motives—a world attainable only to superior minds capable of making that rare effort that consists in a pure understanding with no moral implication, hope, or fear. Pareto's thought stemmed directly from two sources of culture, classic Greek and mathematics. His style is precise and crystal clear, like that of Galileo, who had the same fundamental inclination, and like Galileo, Pareto developed from the height of his mental aloofness an unconcealed disdain for careless thinking, for sentimental reasoning, for any appeal to common opinions and authorities. And in so far as Machiavelli was a sort of Galileo, exploring the skies of politics with scientific methods, Pareto has also been called a "Machiavelian," especially because of his study of the role of the ruling class in history. If his works were reduced to the Cours and Manuale, he would have left only a model of precision, not unlike those of other Italian writers on political economy; but in his Les Systèmes socialistes (1903) and in his Trattato, both of which deal with historical facts and immediate controversial matters, he had ample opportunity to display his irony and give vent to his onslaughts, disparagements, and invectives, which are by far the most delightful parts of the books.

Perhaps his most vital comments are not to be found in his sociological classifications so much as in his footnotes or in his digressions and comments on quotations of his adversaries or on clippings from newspapers. This is Pareto the writer at his best. His influence has been profound if not extensive, and it is true, although curious, that this writer has contributed to the general devaluation of the domain of the intellect which characterized the beginning of the 20th century. He profoundly disliked the intellectuals. He is to be placed alongside of Bergson, Sorel, and Croce (qq.v.) in the category of those thinkers who have used their intelligence to limit the field of the intellect.

He lived for many years in seclusion at Céligny, near Geneva where he taught at the university, and in his aristocratic attitude as well as in his style and in his tastes there is more than one point of contact with Voltaire. He was a great advocate of freedom and among his favorite targets were prudish, hypocritical, and sanctimonious laws and books (Il Mito virtuista, 1914).

See: "In memoria di Vilfredo Pareto," Giornale degli economisti e rivista di statistica, LXVI (1924), 1–153 (special number devoted to Pareto); G. H. Bousquet, Vilfredo Pareto, sa vie et son œuvre (1928); James Burnham, The Machiavelians (1943), pp. 169–220.

G. P.

Paris, Gaston (1839–1903, French scholar and critic), born in Avenay, Marne, made a principal part of his life work the conversion of technical philology into living literature in the field of French medievalism. He was the son of Paulin Paris, who was himself an erudite publisher of forgotten treasures as well as commentator. When, before he was 30, Gaston came back from studious semesters in German universities, mainly Bonn and Göttingen, he was well equipped to play a necessary role in high educational circles. He became quickly engaged in a controversy with Désiré Nisard, who had been arguing for complete neglect of the "uncouth attempts at literature before the 16th-century Renaissance." He delivered his first lecture in his father's chair at the Collège de France on December 3, 1866. From that date to his death this energetic scholar, interested in the present and in linking it closely to the past, was faithful to his announced program: "High culture in a nation is at least for a large part that conscience of its continuity which it acquired by the study of its own past." He wrote for the Revue critique and the Revue celtique and founded the important philological journal Romania, a celebrated initial article to the effect that "there are no Latin races" provoking much comment and also disagreement. He taught at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes as well as the Collège de France, carried on a wide correspondence at home and abroad, and was known for his gracious hospitality, combining a highly personal charm and elegance with his linguistic achievements. The loss of one eye did not impede his strenuous existence.

The publication of manuscripts and of etymological studies were the natural by-product of the new presentation of medieval moments. A Manuel d'ancien français (1888) was of great help to the growing number of students. Insisting upon the Middle Ages as an essentially poetical epoch, Gaston Paris wrote La Poésie du moyen âge (1885), François Villon (1901), and Poèmes et légendes du moyen âge (1900). In modern literature he dealt with Mistral, Renan, and Sully-Prudhomme (Penseurs et poètes, 1896). He was elected to the French Academy in 1896.

Paris accepted the German hypothesis that short songs were in the course of time merged into epics and that very ancient Indo-European tales gradually spread through Western civilizations (Les Contes orientaux dans la littérature française du moyen âge, 1875). He was unequalled in pointing out the idiosyncrasies of new renderings of heroic deeds or of everyday stories. His views in L'Histoire poétique de Charlemagne (1865) may seem superannuated; a polygenetic or at least a polymorphic origin of folk tales is now often preferred to the notion of a steady diffusion of the primitive stories of the East. His advocacy, in the Congress for Comparative Literature in 1900, of Stoffgeschichte now seems too exclusive. But La Littérature française au moyen âge, XI-XIVe siècles (1888; never completed) and many essays, studies, and criticisms (in Journal des savants, Histoire littéraire de la France, Romania, and Revue critique) further testify to the great merit of a scholar who never tired of emphasizing that "science has no other object than truth, and truth for itself."

See: J. Lemaître, Les Contemporains (1887); A. G. van Hamel, "Gaston Paris en zijne leerlingen," De Gids, June, 1895, pp. 487-528; H. A. Todd, "Gaston Paris, Romance Philologist and Member of the French Academy," Publications of the Modern Language Association of America, XII (1897), 341-354; J. Bédier, Hommage à Gaston Paris (1904).

F. B.

Pascarella, Cesare (1858-1940, Italian poet and short-story writer), was born in Rome. Having a modest private income, he devoted himself to painting in his earlier years and in the course of these activities he established the contacts which were to lead to his writings in various newspapers and reviews. In his later years, after he was made a member of the Italian Academy, he traveled extensively, going as far as India and America. A growing deafness made him lead in his old age a very retired life.

His literary work, most of which was produced between 1880 and 1890, is of two kinds: poems, in the form of sonnets and sequences of sonnets, composed in the Roman dialect and collected in Sonetti (1909); and short stories and sketches of modern Roman life, written in literary Italian, first published for the most part in Capitan Fracassa, Nuova Antologia, and Fanfulla, and later collected in Prose (1920). Although the subject matter is substantially the same in both cases, it is the poems that have given him literary fame.

The Roman dialect in which Pascarella's sonnets appear is a medium which an adroit writer can exploit to great advantage, it being close enough to the normal literary tongue to be readily understood by all Italians (the glossary that accompanies his Sonetti consists of less than 40 terms), while at the same time permitting extraordinary freedom of expression. A skilled user can descend deep into the soul of the colorful Roman people. At a slightly earlier period Giuseppe Belli had used the Roman dialect for poetic purposes, but his satiric leanings had prevented him from exploiting its possibilities to the full. Trilussa (pseud. of Carlo Alberto Salustri), almost a contemporary of Pascarella, drew the full flavor from the dialect, but his ultra-cynical and occasionally salacious tendencies limit his achievement, and at best he is only amusing. Pascarella, on the other hand, presents not merely the little comedies, but also the small tragedies of the everyday life of lower-class Romans, and these tragedies are depicted as they really are, that is to say of paramount importance to their participants. Some of these pieces, in the opinion of Italy's foremost literary critics, are of outstanding merit. Carducci (q.v.) describes Villa Gloria as Italy's highest achievement in dialectal epic while Croce (q.v.) extols the author's conscientiousness and seriousness of purpose and his utter and refreshing spontaneity.

Villa Gloria (1885) is a participant's account of one of the ill-fated attempts to seize Rome which preceded the unification of Italy. Scarcely less important is the Scoperta della America (1893), in which Columbus, Ferdinand, Isabella, Spanish sailors, and American Indian chieftains speak the colloquial dialect of Rome in its most humorous aspects as they go about the business of negotiations, voyage, and discovery, in 50 sonnets. Er Morto de Campagna (1882) and La Serenata (1882) are removed from the sphere of epic action or ludicrous anachronism, but offer tragic episodes of popular Roman life in all their stark, gruesome realism, while Er Fattaccio (1904) describes, with graphic yet dispassionate bitterness, the ultra-personal, selfish reactions of five different eyewitnesses to a deed of bloodshed.

See: B. Croce, "Note sulla letteratura italiana nella seconda metà del secolo XIX: Cesare Pascarella," Critica, IX (1911), 401-412; E. Cecchi, "Pascarella inedito," Nuova Antologia, CDIX (1940), 181-187.

M. P.

Pascoli, Giovanni (1855-1912, Italian poet), was born, the fourth of 10 children, in the village of San Mauro, near Savignano (Romagna), on a princely property of which his father was the respected steward. The poet's affectionate memory clung to that San Mauro hearthside all his life long, its effect upon his writings intensified by the sorrows that early engulfed it. When he was seven a baby sister died, another when he was 10, and when he was 12 fell the tragic blow from which he was never to recover: the father, as he was driving home late at night, was set upon and murdered, a deed for which no one was ever brought to justice. There followed six more deaths, the oldest sister, the mother, two older brothers, two young nephews. At 21 Giovanni found himself head of a family consisting of two younger sisters, still at their convent school at Soriano, and two younger brothers.

Throughout these sad years Pascoli had been receiving an excellent education, especially in Latin, from the brothers of the Scolopi Order, at Urbino, Rimini, and Florence, securing his licenza at Cesena in 1873. A scholarship admitted him to the University of Bologna, where he worked well for two years at Greek, Latin, and Italian literature and history, then suddenly dropped out of his classes to join the strong socialist movement of Bologna. When the minister of education visited the university, Pascoli took part in demonstrations which lost him his scholarship, then joined the Internazionale. During the turbulent period that followed, his brother Raffaele had to share with him his lodging and a crust. His socialist tendencies—fed by the injustice of what had befallen his family, his own dire poverty, and the contacts with social problems that city life brought him—led to his arrest and "preventive" imprisonment in the autumn of 1879. This involuntary seclusion gave him time for meditation; he resolved to resume his studies and accept his family responsibilities. His scholarship being restored to him, he was able to begin teaching Greek and Latin at the liceo of Matera by 1882. In 1884 he was transferred to Massa and from then on could always make a modest home for his sisters. In 1891 his fame began, with the publication of Myricae. That same year he won in the Amsterdam competition the first of his 14 gold medals for Latin poetry, with which he eventually bought a house. In 1895 his sister Ida married, and as a summer home for himself and the other sister he leased (later purchased) a cottage at Castelvecchio di Barga, far up the Tuscan valley of the Serchio, settling there with Maria, who was to be his devoted companion as long as he lived and became his literary executrix (Poesie varie raccolte da Maria, 1912-1913, Traduzioni e riduzioni, 1913). Throughout the series of academic transferences and promotions (Leghorn, 1887; Bologna, 1895; Messina, 1897; Pisa, 1903), the summers brought them back to Castelvecchio. Out of his childhood memories and the life with Maria came the poems by which he is best known. These intimate subjects he dwells on endlessly: family sorrows, his father's murder, the natural life of growing things that he could watch from his study, the work of the kitchen and the field, the companionship of animals, and a narrow but deep domestic life in which the poet himself took his share of the sacred activities of gardening, drawing water, laying fires, baking bread. He lent a life of their own even to inanimate objects, whose sentiments he imagined and interpreted. Myricae, Primi Poemetti (1903), Canti di Castelvecchio (1904), Nuovi Poemetti (1906), even much of Odi e inni (1906), are but sensitive and tender variations upon these plaintive themes; but the antique landscape of the Sicilian years inspired a volume on classical subjects (Poemi conviviali, 1903), and after succeeding Carducci in the chair of Italian literature at Bologna (1905), he too turned to historical and patriotic subjects (Canzoni di Re Enzo, 1908-1909; Poemi italici, 1911; Poemi del Risorgimento, ed. by Maria Pascoli, 1913).

The Wordsworthian homeliness of his topics called for a new vocabulary foreign to Italian poetry, and he used dialect, local words, baby talk, pidgin Italian of returning immigrants, onomatopoeia, invented forms, in a great variety of meters (sometimes Latin), whose deceptive simplicity disguises their in-tricity and technical skill. By his excessive personalism and his rejection of classical canons, he seems to belong to the romantics, but he owed to a later school his effective use of symbols. Poetry is a staff ("Il Bordone") or a lamp ("La Poesia"), love a sweet mortal poison ("Digitalis purpurea"); "Il Vischio" suggests that the principle of evil may envelop the whole being as the mistletoe stifles the tree; "Il Focolare," a cold forsaken hearth, symbolizes religion; "La Pecora smarrita" is Earth, lost lamb of the universe. He exalts poverty, decries riches. The thought of death is never absent, since the larger number of those dear to him lie in the San Mauro cemetery, "sad and only house of my kinsfolk," seeming still to share the preoccupations of the living family.

In the "Prefazio a Maria" of Primi Poemetti he writes: "Recollection is poetry, poesy but recollection," and in the preface to Nuovi Poemetti (dedicated to his students): "I sing for you, boys and girls, only for you." Within these two sentences lies his literary doctrine, whose more famous exposition is the essay "Il Fanciullino" (Pensieri e discorsi, 1907). Your true poet, he affirms, is a child and should address himself to the tastes and interests of children—or of the child in all of us—which include nature, family life, military prowess, and adventure. This would exclude love as too dramatic and philosophy as too adult, yet "Il Ciocco" and "La Vertigine" are philosophic poems of cosmic imagination.

Mention should be made of his expositions of the Divina Commedia, his anthologies of Italian poetry for youth, and his Latin verse (Ioannis Pascoli Carmina Recognoscenda Curavit Maria Soror, 1930). Some of his poetry has been translated into English (Poems of Giovanni Pascoli, 1923, 1927, Selected Poems of Giovanni Pascoli, 1938).

See: G. L. Passerini, Vocabolario pascoliano (1915); A. Simon, "Giovanni Pascoli" (including translations of his poems), Poet Lore, XXVII (1916), 191–203; A. Meozzi, La Vita e la meditazione di Giovanni Pascoli (1923); A. Gandiglio, Giovanni Pascoli, poeta latino (1924); R. S. Phelps, Italian Silhouettes (1924), pp. 33–54; A. Zamboni, Giovanni Pascoli (1885–1912) (1937).

R. S. P. M.

Passeur, Stève (1899–, French dramatist), born in Sedan, has brought to modern French drama something of the roughness of his native Ardennes. His early work, such as La Maison ouverte (1925), was marked by boldness of concept and a strong sense of the theatre, and to these he has added in more recent years greater intelligence and a deeper sense of human values. Passeur is interested in the deepest emotions of his characters; he attempts to shock and surprise his audience by demonstrating that the completely unexpected is very often psychologically quite consistent. His characters, therefore, are almost always thrown into unusual situations, the normal routine of their lives is interrupted and completely upset, the most intense intellectual and moral pressure is piled upon them, and under this strain all that is artificial in their personalities falls away, leaving them psychologically naked before the spectator. In order to facilitate this process, Passeur does not hesitate to resort to the most shopworn tricks of melodrama, but the surprising quality of his work results from the fact that though the situations are often the hackneyed ones of a thousand thrillers and tear-jerkers, the characters' reactions to them are psychologically plausible and hence startling in the extreme. In all his mature work, Passeur excels in thus establishing cynically, brutally, and directly a situation which calls into question conventional values. Too often at first, however, in such plays as L'Acheteuse (1930) and La Chaîne (1931), he displayed a tendency, once having set his characters in motion, to avoid resolving the problem in an intellectually satisfactory fashion, falling back instead on his mastery of theatrical tricks to provide him with a conclusion. Les Tricheurs (1932), however, marked a great advance in this respect. Here one feels that stock devices are used with restraint and are fully justified by the penetration of Passeur's analysis.

See: François Mauriac, Dramaturges (1928).

C. W., Jr.

Pasternak, Boris (1890–, Russian poet), born at Moscow, son of a well-known painter, grew up in a highly cultivated environment. His own erudition is broad, and his interests are catholic. He is well versed in literature, painting, music; he studied philosophy at the universities of Moscow and Marburg. In reading his verse one is struck not so much with his versatility and virtuosity as with the freshness and novelty of his approach to life: he reacts to objects and phenomena with the wonderment of one who sees them for the first time and is therefore innocent of hackneyed images and threadbare comparisons. His extremely personal reaction is expressed in a style of his own that makes him difficult to understand at the first reading, but the effort is rewarded by the ultimate pleasure of being able to see with his eyes and hear with his ears. He has been classed for years as a futurist, the only justification for this label being his involved syntax and the resulting "estrangement," a feature advocated by Russian formalists. Actually Pasternak is beyond "school" labels. The form of his verse is regular, the rhythm is varied and rich, the rhymes are extraordinarily original. Though he has influenced a number of young poets, he is essentially inimitable.

It is natural that such a subjective contemplator as Pasternak should remain rather indifferent to political issues. During the most eventful years he suggested that "in times of quick tempo 'tis best to think slowly." The title of his collected verse, 1912-1930, is fittingly enough Poverkh baryerov (1931; Above Barriers). In the year of the Revolution, 1917, his volume Sestra moya zhizn (Life My Sister) was published in Berlin. "What's the millennium, dear folks, outdoors at the moment?" asks the poet with wide-open eyes. Soviet Russia has inevitably affected his muse. however, as may be seen from his volume Vtoroye rozhdeniye (1932; Second Birth). Of late he has made excellent translations from foreign poetry, including his fine version of Shakespeare's Hamlet, published in 1941.

A. K.

Pastonchi, Francesco (1877-, Italian poet), born at Riva Ligure, has written poems, one novel, a book of short stories, and in his early years was a literary editor. Fame came to him when he was still a student because of his skill in reciting poems which had a marked tendency to sonority. He started by declaiming the classics but ended by reciting his own, a little like those music conductors who are themselves inspired to compose after a lifetime of hearing the classics. He first became widely known through an intellectual but cold writer of verses, Arturo Graf (q.v.). If one is looking only for good style, impeccable form, precise words, measure, polish, adroitness, all sorts of rhymes and rhythms, Pastonchi gives full satisfaction, in any one of his volumes (Saffiche, 1892, Italiche, 1902, Belfonte, 1903, books of poetry; Il Violinista, 1908, a novel; Il Campo di grano, 1916, short stories). He is an expert technician of Italian verse, and not without reason have his poems been called poetical exercises; he is a kind of general lyricist, ready to exalt water, like Pindar, or wine, like Alceus, to extol patriotism and all kinds of Latin glory, or women, history, heroes, poets. His poems, elegant and precious, are always written to be declaimed; the conscious style and the concern for a surprising rhyme seem to becloud the inspiration—whenever there is any. Pastonchi's charm as a declaimer made him the spoiled child of the wealthy who do not read but enjoy hearing, and he found admirers especially among women of this class. Presently he discovered how empty and shallow this social world is and certain sighs for redemption escaped from him in Il Randagio (1920; a poem), but there was no deep feeling. Had he been able to look at the people about him, even the society folk, poetically, he might have produced a real work of art, but when he tried his hand at this (Versetti, 1931), only small, fragmentary sketches and bittersweet prints were the outcome. Pastonchi has been classified as a Parnassian of the French school. He definitely has a comparable polish. Fascism turned him into a professor, to the great surprise and consternation of some of the older teachers who did not believe that writing smooth verse guaranteed an ability to teach the history of poetry.

See: P. Pancrazi, Scrittori italiani del Novecento (1934), pp. 117-124; U. Ojetti, Cose viste, IV (1928), 132-141.

G. P.

Pavlenko, Peter Andreyevich (1899-, Russian novelist), was born in St. Petersburg, into the family of an artisan. He fought in the civil war and in 1919 joined the Communist Party. For several years he served with the Soviet Commercial Agency in Turkey, and his experiences in that country provided him with the subject matter of his volume of short stories, Aziatskiye rasskazy (1929; Asiatic Stories). His first novel, Pustynya (1931; The Desert), dealing with the irrigation of the Kara Kum Desert in Turkmenistan, is also based on personal experience and observation and is typical of the period of socialist realism. The Paris Commune served as background for his Barricady (1932; The Barricades). In Na vostokey (1937; Eng. tr., Red Planes Fly East, 1938) Pavlenko presents a broad and vigorous picture of life in the Soviet Far Eastern provinces threatened, in their rapid growth, by the ever increasing menace of Japanese imperialism. Though essentially realistic, the novel culminates in a vision of an imaginary conflict; the Japanese army attacks the Soviet border, but meets with disaster, and a vast revolutionary movement spreads from the Asiatic mainland to Japan itself. During the Second World War, Pavlenko published an account of the struggle waged by the partisans against the German invader, Russkaya povest (1942; The Russian Story).

See: T. Eventova, "Pavlenko," in Literaturnaya entsiklopediya, VIII (1934), 389-392. L. S.

Pawlikowska, Marja, see Jasnorzewska, Marja.

Pea, Enrico (1881-, Italian novelist), has been a sailor, a merchant, the impressario of a provincial theatre, as well as a writer of novels, short stories, poems, and plays. He was born in Versilia, a tiny region of Italy that is in spirit quite apart from the Tuscany to which it belongs geographically; it is impervious to modern civilization, rich in natural talents, poetic geniuses, and interesting persons, with a treasury of popular songs, proverbs, and tales. Two of Pea's books, Fole (1910) and Lo Spaventacchio (1914), are adult fairy tales. A magic legendary quality colors all his work. Folklore, with a savor of unreality among humble and tragic realities, is in him cultured and artistic, although the origin of this culture and the source of his inspiration are difficult to trace. He was attracted by exotic traditional cultures, especially the oriental, dating from the time when he lived in Egypt selling Italian marble and Egyptian real estate, and by the culture of Versilia to which he finally returned (see Lo Spaventacchio). He mixes his personal experiences, always bathed in the light of art, with old literary patterns. In planning a work he takes careful aim beforehand, but his leaning towards that vague world of the imagination frequently causes him to miss fire. One never has the feeling of reality even in characters that he sketches with merciless realism. Religion, not infrequently in the form of superstition, appears often in his dramas and novels, but we cannot say that he seems convinced of his beliefs; angels are not unlike disguised devils.

In late years Pea has frequently tried his hand at the more traditional narrative form of writing, as is seen in his novels Moscardino (1922), Il Volto santo (1924), Il Servitore del diavolo (1931), Il Forestiero (1937), and La Maremmana (1938). Because of his artistic effort and the strange richness of his vocabulary and the high quality of parts of his writing, his works have always been received with deferential regard, but he has never won the unconditional approval of the critics or a large reading public. In any case he is a personality and has carved his own niche in the literature of contemporary Italy.

G. P.

Péguy, Charles (1873-1914, French man of letters), was born in Orléans of humble working people. His father died while Charles was still less than a year old, and it was the manual labor of his mother, a repairer of chairs, plus numerous scholarships which sent him up the French educational ladder to, in 1894, the Ecole Normale Supérieure. Older than many of his classmates, since he had already voluntarily left school to do his year of military service, and filled with an ardent faith in socialism which he desired to test in action, he was not content with the life of a student; the world outside, and in particular the Dreyfus affair, drew him inescapably. He married, left the Ecole, and in 1897 opened a socialist bookstore and press in the university quarter.

He had already begun to write, and it was only natural that his first two books should come from his own press, Jeanne d'Arc (1897), a play, and Marcel; premier dialogue de la cité harmonieuse (1898), a noble and ecstatic description of the perfect socialist state. Neither of the books sold, and the shop did not flourish, in spite of subsidies provided by a committee of socialists headed by Lucien Herr. Péguy was intellectually and temperamentally incapable of blindly following a party line, and when the committee, knowing this, refused to back him in his project of founding a review, the inevitable break came. Herr, Blum, and the others withdrew their support; Péguy abandoned the bookstore and went on alone to found the Cahiers de la quinzaine (1900), to which he devoted the rest of his life. In its pages most of his work appeared, in its pages he fought, sometimes almost alone, for truth, in its pages he published the work of such young men as Benda (q.v.), Daniel Halévy, André Spire (q.v.), François Porché, André Suarès (q.v.), Romain Rolland (q.v.), and the Tharauds (q.v.). Constant polemics left him little time for poetry, perhaps his true vocation, till his last years when, as though sensing an impending doom and attempting to pack the work of a lifetime into four years, he produced a series of long poems and poetic plays, in particular Le Mystère de la charité de Jeanne d'Arc (1910), Le Porche du mystère de la deuxième vertu (1911), Le Mystère des Saints Innocents (1912), and Eve (1913), which mark him as one of the great French poets. He was killed in action, at Villeroy, September 5, 1914.

Péguy's life, simple as it was, and his thought are full of apparent contradictions. An ardent socialist, he was completely nationalistic; a pugnacious supporter of Dreyfus, he loved the French army and was never happier than when serving his month at maneuvers every summer; a Catholic, devout to the point of saintliness, he was anticlerical, was not married in the Church, did not baptize his children, and, deprived of the sacraments, did not even attend Mass. Actually, however, in great things Péguy was remarkably consistent. His mind was far from universal; it held only a few general ideas, but those it held firmly, comprehended fully, and applied unshrinkingly. Just as Péguy's knowledge of and taste for literature was limited to a few classics instilled in him at school—Sophocles and Homer, Corneille and Hugo—so his basic ideas can be easily traced to his childhood. He was the child of the Church and of the republic, of the state school and of the class in catechism, of Jeanne d'Arc and of the French Revolution. And above all, he was the child of the working class, the people, doing honest labor honestly. His lifelong struggle was an attempt to unite and defend the two idealisms—or, as he would have said, mystiques—that of Christianity and that of the French republic. The bond of union he found in the three great virtues, faith, hope, and charity. Péguy loved God and his neighbor, believed in the perfectibility of mankind, fought for truth, attacked falsehood—all falsehood. For him, as for so many, the Dreyfus case was crucial; in it he saw the central event in all modern history, political, religious, intellectual. From it he drew the perfect illustration of his antithesis between mystique and politique: at first mystique, a struggle for truth and truth alone, the case degenerated into politique in the retaliatory measures of Combes and Waldeck-Rousseau. It was politique that Péguy despised and struck out at, politique in the universities, in the Church, in the Socialist Party. To Péguy, Bernard Lazare, who died in poverty, almost forgotten, was a great martyr: he had given his life to the mystique of the affaire. And Jaurès, mourned by half a nation, was a great Judas: he had sold the mystique of the Socialist Party. Péguy's essential task was to see that mystique was not devoured by politique, that the ideals of France, of democracy, of Christianity, for which generations had given their blood, were not betrayed and defiled. To that task he gave his life.

His prose suffers from being largely occasional, the history of battles whose details escape us with men whose names we no longer recognize. But though at times the quarrel seems petty, behind it the great principles always loom. Péguy's style, too, discourages many. It is simple enough in essence, but it is marked by peculiar repetitions, secular litanies in which the key words and phrases are almost chanted again and again, examined in all their shades of meaning, modified slightly but surely with each repetition, so that the thought seems to progress with the heavy tread of the marching infantryman. The desire to extract the utmost from a single word that led Péguy into repetition led him also into interminable parentheses. He seems unable to choose any one path; he must follow all, include every possible development of an idea. Yet such works as Notre Patrie (1905), Notre Jeunesse (1910), and A nos amis, à nos abonnés (1909) can now be recognized as standing among the greatest in modern French literature.

Péguy's poetic work, whether in the form of the mystère, as La Charité de Jeanne d'Arc, or the quatrains of Eve, is also marked by idiosyncrasies. There is the same repetition, the same slow movement, and hence an almost enormous length. But there is in this poetry a nobility and an acuteness of mystic vision to be found among Péguy's contemporaries only in Claudel (q.v.) and a tenderness for suffering humanity, manifest on a verbal level in Péguy's astonishing ability to render the sublime in the words and metaphors of popular speech, which it would be difficult to find anywhere else. Perhaps the highest praise that can be given is to say that in these works Péguy has made God speak and act, and God has not become ridiculous.

Selections from Péguy's prose and poetry have been translated by Ann and Julien Green and appear with French text in Basic Verities (1943) and Men and Saints (1944).

See: Daniel Halévy, Charles Péguy et les Cahiers de la quinzaine (1918); Pierre Lasserre, Les Chapelles littéraires (1920); Jérôme and Jean Tharaud, Notre Cher Péguy (1926); Roger Secrétain, Péguy, soldat de la liberté (1941); Ann and Julien Green, introduction to Péguy, Basic Verities; Prose and Poetry (1943).

C. W., Jr.

Pellerin, Jean Victor (French dramatist), after writing a novel, Insulaire (1920), made his début in the theatre in 1922 with a one-act play called Intimité. In it the author used a scenic effect which has served him in good stead since: the characters, husband and wife, are engaged in a conversation that is far from transmitting their true thoughts, which are represented at the rear of the stage by other actors and actresses. The effect is highly satiric. Le Plus Bel Homme de France (1925) was slightly less of a success. A deceived husband and his wife's lover are themselves deceived by "the handsomest man in France." The fault of the play lay in the fact that the author strove to transform his characters into symbols; they became lifeless, illogical, meaningless. Têtes de rechange (1926) was well received by the critics. Pellerin again made use of the effect which had first won him fame. A young man called Ixe is visited in his office by his uncle, Opéku, who has come to ask his nephew for some financial advice. While the elder man is talking, the young man's mind wanders, and the scenes that follow represent his daydreams. This is typical of the author's predilection for "externalizing" his hero's thoughts. The play cannot really be classified as drama, but rather as a pageant; it calls attention to a certain restlessness characteristic of the era.

It was apparently the author's intention, in Cris des cœurs (1928), to present a vast triptych depicting once again this same restless feeling so prevalent among his contemporaries. In the first act a young man is set upon by his ideas come to life. The setting of the second act represents the façade of a home, which fades away to reveal four apartments and four couples. As they are picked out by the spotlight, each character tells of his desires and his sorrows. The theme that runs through their dialogue is the dissatisfaction of modern man who, torn by conflicting instincts and intellectually ill, seeks refuge in love, only to find that it too fails to provide the desired peace. In the third act, a philosophical sculptor proposes a double solution—work and religion. Obviously inspired in part by Francis Jammes and Paul Claudel (q.v.), the play remains rather naïve, arbitrary, and disconcerting.

Pellerin's plays seem to lose with age. Their complement of surprise lost, they already appear dated. Something of their satirical value, however, remains.

See: Edmond Sée, Le Théâtre français contemporain (1928), pp. 167–168, and Le Mouvement dramatique (1930–1935), I, 85–86, III, 186–190.

P. B.

Pereda y Porrúa, José María de (1833–1906, Spanish novelist and short-story writer), is one of the foremost exponents of regionalism in modern Spanish fiction. He was born in Polanco near Santander, in the heart of the montaña (highlands) and close to the Cantabrian Sea, both of which inspired his best works. Of a conservative and moderately wealthy family, he was reared in an atmosphere of chaste Spanish traditionalism. He was educated in Santander and in 1852 went to Madrid to prepare himself for the artillery academy at Segovia. Neither his studies nor life in the national capital attracted him strongly, and in 1854 he returned to Santander, where he soon made himself known as a writer of genre sketches. These appeared first in local papers, but in 1864 a volume of them was published under the title Escenas montañesas. Their frankly realistic portrayal of montaña life moved Antonio de Trueba, who wrote the prologue for the collection, to accuse the author of imitating the French naturalists. This uncritical opinion had little if any effect on Pereda's literary procedure. In the same vein as his early book was the next volume of sketches, Tipos y paisajes (1871), which made its appearance the year before his first novel, Los hombres de pro (1872). Pereda had gone to Madrid as deputy in Parliament under the banner of the conservative Carlist Party. Ill fitted for politics by temperament and philosophic conviction, he withdrew into his Polanco retreat in 1872; there he soon fell into the routine of a patriarchal existence and devoted himself exclusively to letters and the management of his financial affairs. Aside from a brief visit to Paris in 1864, a trip to Portugal in the company of Benito Pérez Galdós (q.v.) in 1885, and an occasional excursion in Spain, Pereda was almost literally rooted in the montaña. In 1897 he was obliged to establish legal residence in Madrid in order to qualify for the Royal Spanish Academy of Language.

Pereda's novels fall into two categories. In those which appeared between 1872 and 1879 (and in an occasional one of later date, notably La Montálvez, 1888, and Nubes de estío, 1890) he is far more interested in his political, social, and religious prejudices than in the creation of artistic values. Here he attempts to show the evil that comes to man when he removes himself from the wholesome influence of nature and seeks self-realization through experiences provided by modern life—politics, social ambition, religious liberalism. Pereda is controversial, satirical, intolerant, stubborn, and uncompromising. Although his point of view is relentless, he is never convincing, and he inspires in the reader a hostile reaction. More attractive artistically and philosophically are his works between 1881 and 1895, especially El sabor de la tierruca (1881), Sotileza (1884), and Peñas arriba (1894). Written more from the heart than from the head, these novels are the only ones which illustrate fully the author's theory of regionalistic fiction as he formulated it in his speech before the Academy in 1897. Rather than quarrel with a real or imaginary opponent, Pereda has assembled in these works a mass of eloquent evidence to support his philosophy that man's highest goal—moral living—is best realized in close contact with nature, from which he learns many virtues and an occasional vice. There is primitive vigor in the energetically drawn characters, in the throbbing, dramatic canvases of mountain, sea, and valley, and in the incisive, archaically flavored style. In his superior accomplishments Pereda delights with his artless art, free from artifice or strained effect. Philosophically, too, the novels of the second group command respectful attention to their theme of the struggle between man and nature, a struggle in which nature cannot vanquish man because of his infinite power of moral resistance—nor can man subdue nature with the aid of scientific agencies and intellectual strength.

In an appraisal of Pereda's works, his inferior novels are particularly unimportant. Their bias is the expression of a zealous and ardent personality, indifferent to accidental changes, passionate and vehement in matters of the spirit, and profoundly in love with nature and human beings, provided the latter have escaped the effect (or havoc, from Pereda's standpoint) of civilization. Moreover, in several instances (Pedro Sánchez, 1883, and La Montálvez) Pereda was lured into pitfalls by the leading critics who begrudged him recognition as long as he restricted his vision to the elemental life of the montaña. But in his happier and characteristic moments he is a writer of impressive stature. In power of observation and faculty for assimilation of detail he ranks high among modern Spanish realists. His characters may not be psychologically complex, but they are plausible and interesting against their sincerely painted background and in the elemental human situations which shape their lives. Most interesting is their background. Pereda's landscapes are not mere conventional backdrops; they are animated and powerful, often providing the dramatic element of the story. He is an emotional, not a sentimental, painter, and the emotions which he stirs are as deep as the epic grandeur suggested by the vigor and vastness of his pictures.

During his life Pereda's critics emphasized his weaknesses—his tendentiousness, the lack of relief in his plots, the shadowy outlines of his heroines, and his obscurantist ideas. He has fared better with some members of the so-called Generation of '98, largely because of his descriptive skill. Outside of Spain he attracted slight attention because of his self-imposed, chaste regionalism. Yet in the eloquence with which they demonstrate the effect of the montaña environment on primal human qualities, Pereda's best works have permanent literary value.

See: R. E. Basset, introduction to Pereda, Pedro Sánchez, 1907 ed.; J. M. de Cossío, La obra literaria de Pereda (1934); Jean Camp, José María de Pereda; sa vie, son œuvre et son temps (1937).

H. C. B.

Peretz, Yitzchok Leibush (1852–1915, Yiddish poet and novelist), was born in Zamość, a town in the province of Lublin, Poland. Besides the traditional education in the Bible, the Talmud, and Hebrew, he received private instruction in Russian, German, and other secular subjects. Brooding over problems of life, death, God, and fate, the youth set out to find an answer in books. Obtaining access to a rich private library, he read the German, Polish, and Russian volumes without much discrimination and then taught himself French so that he could devour the French books as well. Physics and fiction, law and philosophy, were pored over with equal zeal, but his longing for a definitive solution of eternal problems remained unsatisfied.

He began to write at 14. After experimenting with Polish and Hebrew, he finally decided upon Yiddish as a literary vehicle, since only in this tongue could he be adequately understood by the Jewish working masses, whom he was interested in enlightening. His first major Yiddish poem, Monish, appeared in 1888, and his first collection of Yiddish tales was published in 1890 under the title Bekannte Bilder. During the next quarter of a century he forged ahead as the supreme figure in modern Yiddish literature. The social lyrics of Peretz were recited and his love lyrics were sung throughout Eastern Europe. His short stories stirred to pity and to action. The best known of these, "Bontsie Shvaig" (Bontsie Silent), centered about an inarticulate lowly worker, who found no reward in this world of illusion, but for whom there was reserved in the kingdom of heaven a seat at the side of the saints and patriarchs of Israel.

Peretz pleads the cause of the heart as against the claims of the intellect, the cause of the poor as against the arrogance of the rich, the cause of the Chassidim or mystics as against their deriders, the practical people who lay claim to the goods of this earth. Peretz, Mendele mocher sforim, and Sholem-Alcikhem (qq.v.) form the triad of classical Yiddish Literature.

See: A. A. Roback, I. L. Peretz, Psychologist of Literature (1935); S. Liptzin, Peretz (in preparation; selected stories and essays. English and Yiddish on facing pages).

S. L.

Pérez de Ayala, Ramón (1880–, Spanish novelist, poet, and essayist), was born at Oviedo in Asturias. His early education with the Jesuits was an unpleasant experience which he used later in his satire against that order, A.M.D.G. (1910; Ad maiorem Dei gloriam). Very different was his experience at the University of Oviedo, where he studied law and had the good fortune of meeting a group of sympathetic teachers, among them Leopoldo Alas (q.v.), who had a direct influence on his intellectual and spiritual formation. From Oviedo he went to London and there resided for some time. Since then he has spent most of his life in Madrid, though he has traveled frequently in both Europe and America. His wife is a North American. In 1928 he was elected to the Spanish Academy. Like many of his contemporaries, he was finally drawn into politics and in 1931, together with Ortega y Gasset (q.v.) and Marañón, founded the political group Agrupación al Servicio de la República. The Spanish republic appointed him ambassador to England (1931–1936).

It was as a poet that Ayala began his literary career in 1903 with La paz del sendero, followed in 1916 by El sendero innumerable. The two poems, for each volume has the ideal unity of a single poem, are parts of a poetic cycle dealing, respectively, with the two elements, the earth and the sea. Still a third volume, El sendero andante, conceived as a link between the two previous poems, appeared in 1921. Showing a sensibility for the most classic as well as the most modern poetic moods and forms, Ayala reveals himself as a poet rich in emotion, imagination, and thought. His is not the simple and uncontrolled sentimental reaction that exhausts itself in the immediacy of the particular experience, but rather the more complex and restrained intellectual emotion that results from the realization of the deeper significance of each single thing as part of a universal and transcendent order. Hence a natural tendency towards both a pantheistic conception of nature—a tendency which in its relation to man resolves itself into a deep sense of humanity—and a symbolic interpretation of things. Yet his art, by virtue of the vividness of the poet's sensations, remains attached to the reality of the surrounding world. Many other poems are interspersed in Ayala's novels, especially in the volume of three "poematic novels," Prometeo, Luz de domingo, La caída de los Limones (1916; Eng. tr., Prometheus: The Fall of the House of Limón: Sunday Sunlight, 1920), charming short stories, each chapter of which is introduced by a poem which serves as the leitmotif to the episode in question.

A first-rate poet, Ayala is also a first-rate novelist. In truth, the difference between these two aspects of his work is on the whole more formal than real. Characteristic of the author's literary personality is, indeed, this intercrossing in his work of the aspects of the poet, the novelist, and the intellectual (the essayist). Here the poet reflects the intellectual, and the novelist reflects both the poet and the intellectual. The special character of his novel is the result, combining features of a realistic art with the lyric emotions of the poet and the speculations of the intellectual. Somewhat of a difference must be noted in this connection, however, between the two main groups of his novelistic production, namely, the sequence of his first four novels, Tinieblas en las cumbres (1907), A.M.D.G. (1910), La pata de la raposa (1912; Eng. tr., The Fox's Paw, 1924), and Troteras y danzaderas (1913), on the one hand, and on the other Belarmino y Apolonio (1921) and the two novels in two parts each, Luna de miel, luna de hiel and Los trabajos de Urbano y Simona (both 1923), Tigre Juan and El curandero de su honra (both 1926; Eng. tr., Tiger Juan, 1933). His first four novels are to a large extent still conditioned by both personal and local circumstances, containing as they do elements of a spiritual autobiography and reflecting here and there Ayala's original connection with the spirit of the so-called Generation of 1898. Of such limitations the novels of the second group are for the most part free. The characters, poetically conceived, assume the significance of symbolic representations of the human attitudes they are supposed to embody. The problems, of broad philosophic and educational transcendency, are more universal. The composition is also more organic and more artistic.

Literary criticism, problems of art, and political questions are the subjects commonly discussed by Ayala in his essays. Of special interest, as providing a background for a better understanding of the author's views on the problems presented in some of his novels, is the collection of essays Las máscaras (2 vols., 1917-1919).

See: S. de Madariaga, The Genius of Spain and Other Essays on Spanish Contemporary Literature (1923), pp. 71-86; F. Agustín, Ramón Pérez de Ayala; su vida y obras (1927); J. A. Balseiro, El vigía, II (1928), 123-271; C. Barja, Literatura española: Libros y autores contemporáneos (1935), pp. 439-466.

C. B.

Pérez Galdós, Benito (1843-1920, Spanish novelist and dramatist), was born in the Canary Islands and went to Madrid in 1863. He devoted his whole life to observing the social reality of which he formed a part and to creating, without rest and without interruption, his vast literary accomplishment of over a hundred volumes. His work, taken as a whole, is a literature in itself which represents the evolution of the novel of his time in Spain and in Europe and which with every day that passes is more unanimously considered the greatest literary achievement of Spain since the golden age.

His first works, La fontana de oro and El audaz, published in 1871, were historical novels, dealing with the not too remote past, in which Galdós was seeking the beginnings and origin of the present. Then there came to his mind the vast conception of the Episodios nacionales, of which the first two series were written between 1873 and 1879 and the last three series 20 years later. In them he gives aesthetic expression to the spiritual unity of a whole nation, not only when this unity existed in fact, as in the War of Independence, but also when, during the whole century that followed, the essential political reality of Spain was its internal discord. At the same time he also wrote four novels, Doña Perfecta (1876; Eng. tr., 1880), Gloria (1877; Eng. tr., 1883), Marianela (1878; Eng. tr., 1883), and La familia de León Roch (1878; Eng. tr., Leon Roch, 1886), which more than all the rest of his works have influenced the judgment formed of Galdós. These novels, with the exception of Marianela, touch upon the heart of what Galdós found to be the basis of the cleavage in the conscience of Spain—the religious problem. The two contending camps in Spain were divided again over these works, and they and their author became a subject of strife. But it was never the intention of Galdós to carry on antireligious propaganda through his novels. Galdós was a profoundly religious spirit, and throughout his work the reader can appreciate his sympathy and affection for all those human beings to whom, in one form or another, religion is a living force.

The second phase of the work of Galdós is represented by a series of novels written between 1881 and 1889 which he calls "contemporary" and which could also be called novels of Madrid. This series, which might properly be considered one single novel with the same characters playing out their lives against the common background of the society of Madrid, represents the zenith of the art of Galdós, most perfectly typified in Fortunata y Jacinta (1886-1887). Here is found the perfect harmonization of all the qualities of his genius—his extraordinary capacity for observing and reproducing real life, his humor, and his boundless human understanding and sympathy. The whole range of everyday life in Madrid is portrayed with fidelity and minuteness; but what in the last analysis gives these novels their supreme artistic value is something that transcends time and space and makes of them not only documents of fact and history but also human documents. The characters of these novels live their lives, like everybody, in the inevitable framework of their city and their epoch. But all of them reveal in their commonplace existence a direction, a meaning, which has repeated itself constantly in mankind always and everywhere. As a matter of fact, all these characters are little Quixotes, who are moved by good and generous impulses, by lofty aspiration, by an optimistic, trusting misconception which leads them to believe that everything is better than it really is. There is in all of them so much natural goodness that it redeems them in our eyes from all their mistakes, shortcomings, and badness. But their lives, like that of Don Quixote, are constant failures, "they are," somebody says of one of them, "so good, so good, that they never do anything but blunder." In these novels modern realism and naturalism become fundamentally Spanish because Galdós's vision of life is not pessimistic but humorous and constitutes the finest example since Cervantes of the Spanish ability to redeem the outcast and the fallen through the gift of understanding, to smile serenely as the last hope fades, and to affirm man's undying worth through his very failure.

In 1889 a change took place in the writings of Galdós, marked by a tendency toward spiritual restlessness and psychological problems. The work manifesting this crisis is Realidad (1889), in which the problem raised in La incógnita (1889) is solved by eliminating all that we think of as reality and penetrating into the mysterious realm of the soul and the purely subjective world of concept and will. In Angel Guerra (1891) Galdós approaches the religious problem anew, from the point of view of an intimate psychological crisis. This spiritual searching, in which there is an influence of the Russian novel, appears in other novels of this period, such as Nazarín (1895) and Misericordia (1897).

From 1892, when a dramatized version of Realidad was put on the stage, until the end of his life, the theatre served Galdós to express those ideological and symbolical concepts which characterized his first novels. Once more the Spanish public was upset and divided by the religious problem of Doña Perfecta, dramatized in 1896, also the theme of Electra (1900; Eng. tr., 1911) and Casandra (1910); but these works, which aroused so much comment for reasons that had nothing to do with literature, were at bottom informed by the same human, conciliatory, deeply artistic and moral significance of La loca de la casa (1893), La de San Quintín (1894; Eng. tr., The Duchess of San Quintín, in B. H. Clark, Masterpieces of Modern Spanish Drama, 1917), Mariucha (1903), El abuelo (1904; Eng. tr., The Grandfather, 1910), and the other theatrical works of Galdós which represent the last effort of his creative genius.

See: Clarín (Leopoldo Alas), Galdós (1912); Andrenio (E. Gómez de Baquero), Novelas y novelistas (1918); S. de Madariaga, Semblanzas literarias contemporáneas (1924); Leslie B. Walton, Pérez Galdós and the Spanish Novel of the Nineteenth Century (1927); Angel del Río, "Introducción," in Pérez Galdós, Torquemada en la hoguera (1932); J. Casaldueiro, Vida y obra de Galdós (1943).

F. de O.

Périer, Odilon Jean (1900-1928, Belgian poet, dramatist, and novelist), was born in Brussels. His family belonged to the upper bourgeoisie, and his grandfather, General Thys, had an important share in the colonization of the Congo. Périer's first poems already gave signs of an unusual personality. His position in Belgian literature is unique, for the young poet's spiritual attitude was a reaction both against the current tendencies of Belgian writers and against the solemn and puritan atmosphere of his family life. However, his best poems are those inspired by his native town, and, curiously enough, his criticism, by its moralizing tone, has forced him into an attitude akin to puritanism.

In contrast to all the Belgian writers of the preceding generation, Périer's language is exceedingly pure, without any superfluous ornament, sober, concise, and always avoiding emphasis and eloquence. In La Vertu par le chant (1920), as well as in Notre Mère la ville (1922), Périer concentrates in a few lines of blank verse the anxieties of his restless soul. Faith would probably have appeased his anguish, but, although far from being an agnostic, the poet never found the consolation of religion. Therefore the ethical problem that constitutes the background of all his poems remains unsolved. In 1924 he wrote Le Citadin, ou Eloge de Bruxelles, a poem in classical French alexandrine verse, in which he draws a vivid description of Brussels and life in Brussels in the 20's, as seen through the eyes of a refined and gentle-hearted young man belonging to the ruling class. Le Citadin, Périer's masterpiece, is his best chance of attaining immortality.

The young poet had been very well received in Parisian literary circles. The Nouvelle Revue française published his last poems, Le Promeneur (1927), and also a curious novel, Le Passage des anges (1926). His play, Les Indifférents (1925), which reflects his moral attitude and his perpetual scruples, was favorably received in Brussels. Périer, who had always been ailing, died of heart disease in Brussels in January, 1928. He was buried on the very day of the birth of his only child, a son. His poems are to be found in most anthologies of French contemporary poets.

L. K.

Perk, Jacques (1859-1881, Dutch poet), was born at Amsterdam, where his father was a minister of the Walloon Church. While he was yet a student at the University of Amsterdam, a number of his sonnets were published in the weekly De Nederlandsche Spectator. They formed part of a sonnet sequence in four books, which he never saw in print. He died before his 22d birthday. The sequence, Gedichten (1882; Poems), was edited and posthumously published by his friend Willem Kloos (q.v.). The sonnets were inspired by Perk's love for Mathilde, a Belgian girl whom he met, one brief summer vacation, in the Ardennes. She was engaged to be married to another man, and he never saw her again. But in his sorrowing memory she became an embodiment of abstract beauty, the muse who consecrated him poet. A similar idea was expressed by Perk in "Iris," a poem which in its rhythm echoes Shelley's

"Cloud." The rainbow appears when the sun breaks through the weeping clouds; even so beauty is born from sorrow when the latter is illumined by the light of the soul. The sonnets of the Mathilde sequence reflect the changes of the poet's mood as it is affected by his passion and by the mountain scenery that forms the setting of the idyl. Perk's choice of the sonnet form, his diction and imagery, were something new in Dutch literature. The editors of De Nieuwe Gids (The New Guide), which began to appear four years after his death, looked upon him as a forerunner, as the herald of the revolt of the "Eightiers."

See: Willem Kloos, "Jacques Perk," in Veertien Jaar Literatuur-geschiedenis (1896), pp. 1-24; J. A. Nijland, Jacques Perk; een Studie (1906).

A. J. B.

Perse, St.-J. (pseud. of Alexis Saint-Léger Léger, 1887-, French poet), was born on a small coral island near Guadeloupe, Saint-Léger les Feuilles, which belonged to his family. After a childhood spent under the care of a Hindu nurse on West Indian plantations worked by men of all races, Léger went to France for his schooling at the age of 11. Entering the Foreign Service in 1914, he spent the years 1917-1921 in Peking. After the Washington Conference on limitation of armaments (1921-1922), at which Léger served as political expert on Asiatic questions, Briand took him to Paris. For the next decade he served the great peace-loving diplomat, rising rapidly in the Foreign Office until he became General Secretary of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in 1933. When France capitulated to Germany in June, 1940, Léger came to America.

Rarely has a poet distinguished himself and so deeply influenced contemporary lyricism with so small an output: four thin volumes contain all his work—Eloges (1910; Eng. tr., Eloges and Other Poems, 1944), Anabase (1924), Amitié du prince (1924), and Exil (1942). The English translation of Anabasis by T. S. Eliot (1930) and the German translations by Benjamin and Groethuysen, Rilke (q.v.), and Kassner have helped to extend his reputation beyond the borders of France. Vigorous, personal, often obscure, his poetry accumulates rich and unusual images in majestic strophes, like those of Claudel (q.v.) or of Rimbaud's (q.v.) Une Saison en Enfer, with the rhythm strongly marked. His vast and precise vocabulary includes many technical and scientific words. Despite his professed hatred for literary exoticism, Léger's work is saturated with the sun of the Gobi desert, lush with the tropical growth of Polynesian islands, and studded with evocative nautical terms. In the tradition of Rimbaud, St.-J. Perse creates with the subconscious mastered by reason, and his own subconscious—judged by its products—is remarkably rich. To some extent a poet's poet (as is indicated by the list of those who have translated and prefaced his poems, to which list must be added Valéry Larbaud, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, and Giuseppe Ungaretti, qq.v.), Léger has won for himself a small but fervent audience of the élite.

See: Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Neue schweitzer Rundschau, May, 1929; T. S. Eliot, preface to Anabasis (1930); Archibald MacLeish, "A Note on Alexis Saint Léger Léger," Poetry, LIX (1941-1942), 330-337.

J. O'B.

Perzyński, Włodzimierz (1878-1930, Polish dramatist and novelist), was born at Opoczno, Radom district, Russian Poland, the son of a popular Warsaw editor. After completing his formal education at the Jagiellonian University in Cracow, Perzyński went abroad (1899), first to Italy, later to Paris, where he steeped himself in French literature and mastered, as few of his race have done, the art of dramatic construction. Soon after his return to Poland he published a series of typical poems of young love in Życie (Life), the organ of Young Poland (see Polish literature), but quickly abandoned poetry for the drama, and through this medium in the next three decades literally "chronicled his epoch." A natural reporter, as his father had been before him, Perzyński was a playwright made to order. His works were popular at once and continued to enjoy favor even after their author's death, his first play, Lekkomyślna siostra (1904; The Prodigal Sister), holding the boards to the very end of Free Poland. The scope of Perzyński's interest was not wide nor his concern for humanity deep, but within the limits he set for himself his understanding of human behavior was considerable. His outlook on life, unlike that of most of his contemporaries, was healthy and straightforward. His characters were middle-class intellectuals, mostly Warsawians. Perzyński wrote, besides dramas, many short stories, the best of these being found in the collections Cudowne dziecko (1921; The Miraculous Child) and Znamię (1928; The Mark). In his last years Perzyński turned to the novel, a form in which he had previously shown skill with Michalik P.P.S. (1910) and other tales of the 1905 revolutionaries. Raz w życiu (1925; Once in a Lifetime), regarded by many as the finest novel of post-war Warsaw, Nie było nas, był las (1927; There Was Only the Forest), and Klejnoty (1930; Jewels) show him to have been growing in power rather than declining at the time of his death.

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, II (1928), 167-182; Wiadomości literackie, 1931, No. 371 (entire issue); M. Orlicz, Polski teatr współczesny (1932), passim; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, I (1934), 275-285, 324-325.

A. P. C.

Pessanha, Camilo (1871-1926, Portuguese poet), was born in Coimbra. He received a degree in law and practiced this profession; he was also a high school teacher, in Macao (Macáu), Portuguese China. A precursor of the modernista group which was to be centered around the review Presença (1927), he profoundly influenced these writers. His extremely sensitive poetic nature was even further refined through contacts with Chinese life, art, and literature. Pessanha was the first of the Portuguese writers of his time to begin the cultivation of a pure, inner poetic world by rejecting the emotional inspiration of national lyrical elements. Seeking subtle verbal expression of the utterly subjective, he initiated lyrical formulations of the intimate world of sensations, of what is incoherent and fragmentary in the realm of the psychical, by means of symbols which are both elaborate and partial. The disconnected expression of the disassociated elements of emotional life, a method utilized extensively by those who have followed him, the eagerness to catch in a poem the vague and the fleeting and to achieve revaluation of beauty of form, not as richness but as intensity of expressive power—these are the things which constitute his poetic contribution.

With the exception of one book, Clepsidra (1920; Clepsydra), Pessanha's work is scattered in reviews. He wrote in prose on Chinese historical and artistic subjects and translated and annotated Chinese poetry ("Oito elegias chinesas," Eight Chinese Elegies, published in the review Descobrimento, Discovery). With Wenceslau de Moraes (q.v.) he helped maintain the very old orientalist tradition in Portuguese literature.

See: H. Cidade, Tendências do lirismo contemporâneo (1939), pp. 67-72.

E. G. D.

Pessoa, Fernando (1888-1935, Portuguese poet), born in Lisbon, spent his childhood in South Africa and received his education in Cape Town University. He is an outstanding member of the first poetic generation of the 20th century in Portugal, a generation which began propitiously with futurism in the review Orféu (1915) and developed richly with the modernista group represented in the review Presença (1927). Pessoa, a link between the two movements, was conspicuous and exceedingly influential—even though his writings were not numerous and are scattered in journals.

His one book, Mensagem (1934; Message), distinguished by an official award, is not typical of his poetic bent and represents only a facet of patriotic, Messianic, and irrational mysticism, which links him with the old Lusitanian tradition of the illusion of King Sebastião's return. The rest of his poetic production is truly significant. He unfolded himself by projection into four lyrical personalities, his own and a trio characterized by their individual qualities—Alvaro de Campos, Alberto Caeiro, and Ricardo Reis. These are not pseudonyms, but are four perfectly autonomous entities as regards natures and modes of expression, and the poet has defined them psychologically and biographically. Through them he endeavored to give form to four distinct facets of his being. It is difficult to offer an opinion about the ultimate meaning of this polarization and the boundaries of independence separating those personalities. His poetry, which, like that of his generation, moves in the zones of the inner life, represents an intellectualization of internal emotion. He is the master of intellectual lucidity in the realm of emotion, but beneath the apparent coldness of lyric cerebralism, which at times appears to be only a clever game, one detects a sentimental energy that impels the poet toward direct communication, toward the liberation of verbal expression, and at times toward irrational intuition. His poetic instrument is sensitive to the faintest stimuli coming from the abstract. His form is clear, transparently condensed, and, owing to its precision, almost analytical; his extreme suggestive sensibility recalls Paul Valéry (q.v.).

See: A. Casais Monteiro, "Introdução à poesia de Fernando Pessoa," Bulletin des études portugaises, Vol. V (Coimbra, 1938), No. 2, pp. 1-14.

E. G. D.

Péterfy, Jenő (1850-1899, Hungarian literary historian, critic, and essayist), was born in Budapest and died, a suicide, on a train near Fiume. Péterfy studied at the University of Budapest and taught the humanities in one of the secondary schools there. However, his major activities were not didactic in a narrow pedagogical sense: he was a first-rate literary historian, critic, and essayist, sensitive to poetry and to the subtleties of philosophy. He was a member of the Kisfaludy Társaság (Kisfaludy Society). He shaped creative and philosophical experiences into meaningful designs at a time when the prevalent tendency was to confine literary and philosophical values within the boundaries of nationalistic phrases. Péterfy loved his country, but he was not content with the critical practice of writers and scholars who identified verbal optimism with courage. Péterfy was a man of letters in the very best sense of the word.

Greek ethos, Hegel's philosophy, and natural sciences were the three factors that determined Péterfy's intellectual outlook. He saw certain ethnical characteristics in creative works and their particular spiritual significance; in his essays on József Eötvös, Zsigmond Kemény, and Móricz Jókai (q.v.), he recognized the Hungarianism of these eminent writers. But as culture and beauty were his ideals (he was emphatically an antimaterialist), in his sphere of values the universal elements of man's destiny had to be related to ethnical symbols. Péterfy was a humanist, but not an internationalist as this term is understood today. He was a humanist whose estimations, however, revealed the manifold facets of modernity. His essays written on Hellenic literature (e.g., Aristophanes, 1889; Plato, 1890) show a spirit that was not enslaved by up-to-date catchwords; with the aid of his analytical intelligence he successfully conveyed to the reader the qualities of the Greek mind; his best efforts were put forth in the service of Greek culture. He translated several works of Plato into Hungarian. The meaning of the tragic spirit, Dante, Ibsen (q.v.), Taine (q.v.), Gottfried Keller (q.v.), Conrad Ferdinand Meyer (q.v.), music, the relationship of history to natural sciences, were subjects that he could discuss with insight. His collected works (Összegyűjtött munkák) were published in 1903.

Péterfy abhorred a servile acceptance of rules that seemed valid because of tradition and yet were lifeless vestiges of the past. He believed in traditions supported by evidence of merit. He of course recognized adverse material circumstances, but denounced those who ignored culture and who accepted the superficially practical. He addressed his works to the few, failed to reach the many. Péterfy was always honest in his evaluations, sometimes wrong in his conclusions.

See: D. Angyal, Péterfy Jenő élete (1903).
J. R.

Petrov, Yevgeni Petrovich (pseud. of Yevgeni Petrovich Katayev, 1903–1942, Russian humorist and journalist), a younger brother of Valentin Katayev (q.v.), was born at Odessa into the family of a schoolteacher. In the 20's Petrov went to Moscow, where he worked for satiric journals and published humorous stories. It was here that he met Ilf, with whom he was to engage in a famous collaboration (see Ilf, Ilya Arnoldovich). After Ilf's premature death, Petrov continued his journalistic work. During the Second World War he was editor of the popular weekly Ogonyok (The Little Light) and a war correspondent of note. He was killed during the siege of Sevastopol. A selection from his informal articles, many of which were addressed to audiences in English-speaking countries, has appeared posthumously as Frontovoi dnevnik (1942; Front-Line Diary).

See: "Petrov," in Literaturnaya entsiklopediya, Vol. VIII (1934).

P. A. P.

Philippe, Charles Louis (1874–1909, French novelist), was born at Cérilly in Bourbonnais. In a letter to Maurice Barrès (q.v.), who became one of his influential protectors, he writes: "My grandmother was a beggar; my father, who was a child full of pride, was a beggar when he was too young to earn his daily bread." This father is made the hero of a book, Charles Blanchard, Philippe's magnum opus, never completed; it was edited and published after the author's death by Léon Paul Fargue (q.v.) with an interesting preface. The father became at first a shoe maker and then started a wood business; he was very thrifty, although never rich, and enjoyed some years of leisure before he died in 1907. The novel offers many autobiographical traits of the author himself. He was brought up in a religious atmosphere and took his first communion at 12; after five years of school at Montluçon, he went to the Lycée of Moulins (1891–1894). He continued his studies and passed his examinations to enter the Ecole Polytechnique, but finally gave up this promising career for no special reason except that he preferred solitude. He wrote this characteristic sentence: "I should have been quite unhappy if I had achieved happiness." He wandered to Paris, and it was not long before he had exhausted the little money he had accumulated. The symbolist poet René Ghil (q.v.) had been helpful in getting some of Philippe's articles published (1894-1895). After a few months in Cérilly he returned to Paris (1896), where he found work at a very modest wage as a clerk in an office of the city administration. In 1901 he received a kind of promotion to the Paris department of sanitation, and finally, through the intervention of Barrès, he was appointed to a still better post. After his father's death his mother joined him in Paris, but he never recovered his health, irretrievably damaged by a poor diet, and in 1901 an attack of typhoid fever followed by meningitis took him to the grave.

Philippe's fame rests entirely on the success of his short stories. His favorite theme is the forced resignation of the poor, who are mercilessly trampled under foot by an unhappy fate. The books of Dostoevski (q.v.) had been a revelation to him, as were those of Claudel and Nietzsche (qq.v.). He had a great admiration also for La Vie d'un simple (1904), by Guillaumin, the life of a poor peasant of his own province of Bourbonnais. But nearest to his heart was his friend Jules Renard (q.v.), the author of Poil de carotte (1894). Like Poil de carotte, his Bubu de Montparnasse (about the pathetic "cocu") was produced as a play and also as a film. Charles Louis Philippe protested against the not quite undeserved reproach of maudlin sentimentality (sensiblerie); it is not altogether easy to explain why he should survive so long in the esteem of later generations while others who sounded the same note of accented pity fell into oblivion or disrepute.

His best stories are found in Quatre Histoires de pauvre amour (1897), Bonne Madeleine et pauvre Marie (1898), Mère et enfant (1900), Bubu de Montparnasse (1901), Père Perdrix, métayer (1903), Marie Donadieu (1904), Croquignole (1906). The following books were published after his death: Dans la petite ville (1910), Lettres de jeunesse (1911), Charles Blanchard (1913), Lettres à sa mère (1928). Philippe contributed to numerous periodicals, Art jeune, Revue franco-allemande, Cahiers d'aujourd'hui, Canard sauvage, Mercure de France, Nouvelle Revue française.

See: A. Gide, "Charles-Louis Philippe," Grande Revue, LXIV (1910), 449-467; Nouvelle Revue française, III (1910), 139-324 (issue devoted to Philippe); H. Bachelin, Charles Louis Philippe (1929); J. Giraudoux, "A propos de Charles-Louis Philippe," Nouvelle Revue française, XLIX (1937), 537-549.
A. Sz.

Picard, Edmond (1836-1924, Belgian jurist and author), was a brilliant lawyer, polemist, politician, orator, novelist, poet, playwright, critic, philosopher, traveler, and explorer and played a vital part in the intellectual life of Belgium. He was president of the Belgian bar association and a member of the supreme court of justice. Born in Brussels of a Walloon father and a Dutch-Flemish mother a few years after the birth of his country in 1830 as an independent kingdom, he is considered the creator of the Belgian national spirit in literature, a protagonist of the "Belgian soul."

At the age of 17, interrupting his formal education, he embarked in Antwerp as a cabin boy on a sailing ship bound for New York. For four years he lived the hard life of an ordinary sailor on various sailing vessels cruising the South Atlantic and even rounding Cape Horn. Upon his return to his home country he finished his studies at the law school of the University of Brussels with high honors. While a student he had published a French translation of Goethe's Faust. A collection of sonnets (Réveries d'un stagiaire) which he had written about the same time were not published until 1879. An indefatigable worker, he was endowed with a most brilliant and comprehensive intellect. As a lawyer he was known for his vast erudition, the lucidity of his judgment, the ease and fluency of his convincing speeches. Devoting himself entirely for one period to the study of law, he started publication in 1878 of the famous Pandectes belges (still continued) which established definitely his reputation as a scholar. Then he turned his attention to the field of art and in Paradoxe sur l'avocat (1881), Mon Oncle le jurisconsulte (1884), La Forge Roussel (1884), Le Juré (1887), he tries to draw a parallel between law and art in their ideal achievement of beauty and perfection.

Picard's extraordinary power as a narrative and descriptive writer appears in his novel L'Amiral (1884), in which he relates the adventures of his sailor's life. Always in quest of dynamic experiences he undertook a dangerous exploratory journey through the Congo, of which he gave a vivid account in El Moghreb-al-Aksa (1889) and En Congolie (1896). Monseigneur le Mont-Blanc (1900) was written after his climb of that high Alpine peak. Toward the end of his life he turned to the theatre as a means of expression; he wrote seven plays. La Joyeuse Entrée de Charles le Téméraire (1905) gives a colorful and well-characterized picture of the great duke of Burgundy and the period of relative autonomy of the Belgian country in the 15th century; Jéricho (1901), although tainted with anti-Semitism, is full of wit and dramatic action; Ambidextre Journaliste (1904) is a biting satire against the venality of journalism. Some of his plays, e.g., Psukè (1903), give the impression of being mainly philosophical dialogues. Picard's theatre is a "théâtre d'idées" forming a logical unity. As in Balzac's Comédie humaine the same characters reappear in his various works. Although he himself was of such a very dynamic nature, his general philosophy is one of inner appeasement in the face of the fear-inspiring mysteries of human destiny. Picard has also written some poems of impressive vigor, revealing, besides his temperament as an untiring polemist, a heart sensitive to the deepest emotions (e.g., Atra Mors, 1905).

Picard's published works comprise 41 volumes. Yet he was best known to the general Belgian public for the many articles, all of them earmarked with his striking personality, with which he flooded Belgian newspapers and magazines, among others the Peuple and the Art moderne.

See: J. Chot and R. Dethier, Histoire des lettres françaises en Belgique (1910); H. Liebrecht, Histoire de la littérature belge d'expression française (1910); G. Doutrepoint, Histoire illustrée de la littérature française en Belgique (1939).

L. V.

Picón, Jacinto Octavio (1852-1923, Spanish novelist, short-story writer, and critic), was born in Madrid. He was educated first in France and later at the University of Madrid, where he studied law. Essentially a fiction writer, he began his literary career as an art critic. His biography of Velázquez and his book on the evolution of caricature are readable works of sound scholarship.

Picón's early novels are really elongated short stories (e.g., Lázaro, 1882), a genre which he cultivated impressively. As a novelist he lacks creative power, although he often achieves effectiveness by sheer intellectual effort. His plots are slight and in their stereotyped artificiality are reminiscent of the classical Spanish comedia. Their hesitant progress creates impatience rather than suspense.

More naturalistic than any other Spanish author, Picón had two favorite themes, anti-clericalism and unconventional love. Yet his conception of love is romantic in the sense that he presents it as a force justified by its very existence and not to be restrained in its freedom of expression by moral laws or social preoccupations (as in Dulce y sabrosa, 1891).

Were it not for the veil of delicacy which his cultivated style casts over the details, Picón's fiction might justly be called erotic. Something of Juan Valera's (q.v.) interest in the sensuous and his meticulous style can be detected in Picón. His prose is pleasingly dignified and fluent, his diction is sensitively handled, and his sentences fall in soft cadences. Although sparingly humorous, he is always ripplingly ironical. Occasionally his style is self-consciously literary. A pure Madrilenian, Picón builds his scenery out of local vignettes which together with his faithful transcription of the capital's argot lend his novels a regionalistic quality.

Picón's strength and weakness derive from his personal formula to which he scrupulously adhered. He aimed to reproduce rather than to create, to appeal to sentiment and not to imagination, to please and not to moralize, and to extract from Castilian as much of its inherent beauty as possible.

See: H. Peseux-Richard, "Un romancier espagnol: Jacinto Octavio Picón," Revue hispanique, XXX (1914), 515-585; J. A. Balseiro, Novelistas españoles modernos (1933), pp. 338-345.

H. C. B.

Pilnyak, Boris (pseud. of Boris Andreyevich Vogau, 1894-, Russian novelist and short-story writer), was one of the first new literary figures to emerge from the Revolution. Various, complex, and controversial, often an artist of power, he was one of the most brilliant members of the so-called "fellow travelers." As such he accepted the October Revolution as an elemental revolt of the people springing from ancient Russia of the pre-Petrine era—he himself remaining outside orthodox Communism. He was born in Mozhaishk, near Moscow, of well-educated middle-class parents intimately connected with the Populist movement. In his blood mingle four strains—German, Jewish, Slavic, and Tartar. He graduated (1913) from the Nizhni-Novgorod school of positive sciences and (1920) from the Moscow Institute of Commerce, where he specialized in administration and finance. His early years were influenced by a life close to nature and by association with many leaders of the zemstvo and the intelligentsia. His literary beginnings (from 1915) won him no special recognition until he published Goly god (1922; Eng. tr., The Naked Year, 1928), a panorama of Russia in the chaos of 1921, ravaged by civil war, blockade, and famine. It created a sensation by its tragic realism and its new manner, with its broken rhythms, its flexible language, and its abrupt, strident notes alternating with lyric tenderness. Outwardly formless and non-narrative, its structure is rather that of planes reflecting a complex and violently contradictory scene with the focal emphasis on historical Russia, not on individuals. This was the first major literary depiction of the Revolution.

Many other volumes followed, notably Ivan-da-Marya (1923; Ivan and Maria), dealing with the inquisitorial Cheka savagery deriving from sexual perversion; Tretya stolitsa (1923; The Third Capital), a contrapuntal étude of the spirit of rural Russia, sensitive and redolent of Chekhov and Bunin; Mashiny i volki (1925; Machines and Wolves), with its adamant Bolsheviks in leather jackets; and Mat syra-zemlya (1926; Mother Damp Earth). Pilnyak's work of these years, while owing much to Bely and Remizov (qq.v.), was the most characteristic expression of early Soviet literature, which often took from his style and method. A number of his best-known short stories (see the collection published in English, Tales of the Wilderness, 1925) belong to this period. Later his influence waned. Mahogany (1929), published in Berlin, was denounced as antirevolutionary and banned in the U.S.S.R. In an altered form it was incorporated into Volga upadayet v Kaspiskoye more (1930; Eng. tr., The Volga Falls to the Caspian Sea, 1931), perhaps his most successful and widely known novel, concerned with the building of a dam at Kolomna so as to change the course of the Volga, a project symbolizing the industrial construction of the first Five-Year Plan. The hyperbole of the symbol contains a hidden criticism of the enormous cost in human wreckage entailed in the Revolution. The basic dualism of his attitude to the Revolution appears throughout his work, as in Rozhdeniye cheloveka (1935; The Birth of a Man), the heroine of which, a "classical" Communist scorning the "obsolete" family, discovers the joys of motherhood, or as in Sozrevaniye plodov (1936; The Ripening of the Fruit), describing the ancient craftsmanship of the villagers of Palekh, for generations devoted to painting icons and, latterly, to secular objects. Pilnyak has traveled extensively throughout Russia and the Far East, as well as in Germany (1922), England (1923), and the United States (1931), where he spent much time in Hollywood. These experiences have unquestionably enriched his thought and his work.

See: V. Lidin, ed., "Boris Pilnyak," in Pisateli (1926), pp. 229-233; A. Voronsky,

"Boris Pilnyak," in Literaturnye tipy (1927), pp. 39-60; B. P. Kozmin, "Boris Pilnyak, in Pisateli sovremyonnoi epokhi, Vol. II (1937). N. S.

Pinto, Júlio Lourenço (1842-1907, Portuguese novelist and critic), was born in Oporto and died there. He studied law at Coimbra and later held various government offices. As a result of opposing the movement to overthrow the liberal government of the duke of Loulé he lost all political preferment. In 1906 he was appointed director of the Banco Commercial of Oporto.

As a writer he cultivated the realistic novel, embraced naturalism wholeheartedly, and became the pupil of Flaubert, Zola, and Eça de Queiroz (qq.v.). His first serious attempt in his favored field was Margarida (1879), a novel of contemporary customs in which he portrays "a Portuguese Madame Bovary." This work was followed by Vida atribulada (1880; Life of Distress), O senhor deputado (1882; The District Representative), and O homem indispensável (1884; The Indispensable Man). In all these novels he practiced faithfully the tenets of the naturalistic genre, though he is perhaps overzealous in the detailed and methodical treatments of both characters and descriptions. It may be justly said that his work is more imitative of art than of life.

This series of novels was followed in 1885 by his Estética naturalista (Aesthetics of Naturalism), subtitled Estudos sobre arte (Studies on Art), wherein he attempts to explain the theory of naturalism, offers a critical analysis of its aesthetic qualities, and defends it vigorously. This work is generally considered a worthy contribution in the field of literary criticism in Portugal.

See: A. F. G. Bell, Portuguese Literature (1922), pp. 318-319; F. de Figueiredo, História da literatura portuguesa (1923), pp. 230-231. G. I. D.

Pirandello, Luigi (1867-1936, Italian playwright, short-story writer, and novelist), was born at Girgenti, Sicily, studied at the University of Rome, and took his Ph. D. at the University of Bonn in Germany. Soon after his return to Italy in 1894, Pirandello married Antonietta Portulano, the choice of his father. They settled in Rome, and for 10 years Pirandello was a free-lance author, living on a generous allowance from his father. His unhappy family life with a woman who eventually lost her mind, his irksome duties when he became a teacher at the Istituto Superiore Femminile di Magistero in Rome, the indifference of the Italian public to his writings—these details help one understand the pessimism that tinges his art. Fame came to him about 1920. He relinquished his teaching and dedicated himself to the theatre in Italy. He toured Europe and America with his troupe performing his plays, was decorated by the Italian and the French governments, and in 1934 won the Nobel prize in literature. In Italian letters Pirandello was the outstanding personality after the First World War and until his death, of a heart attack in his sleep, in 1936. He owed his first recognition to two foreigners, Benjamin Crémieux, a Frenchman, and James Joyce, an Irishman, both of whom in 1915 called the attention of the literary world to his works. In 1921 his Sei Personaggi in cerca d'autore (Eng. tr., Six Characters in Search of an Author, 1922) earned him universal acclaim.

The predominating trait of Pirandello's art is humor, but a grim humor with a definite philosophical derivation. He was a thoughtful individual who strolled among his fellow men wondering how he could reconcile life as a cosmic entity with life as enclosed in each being; life as a sublime entity that merged with a sort of religious platonism, and human existence of this planet, a pitiful nothingness that, after a brief interlude of enchantment and beauty, was inevitably destined to wither and perish under the cold hand of death. His art, whether considered in short stories, novels, or plays, is the projection of this dialectical query. If life is a cosmic entity, the very fact that it becomes caught and immobilized in an individual form, be it a tree, an animal, or man, offends it greatly. Ciampa in Il Berretto a sonagli (1916) states: "Divine spirit enters into us and becomes dwarfed into a puppet." If life is cosmic in its origin and nature, what is the value of everyday existence and the organization of society with its well-regulated bureaus, its strict laws, and its unbending codes? Why so many temples when there is the universe as a place to worship God? Why so many gods, as many at least as there are religions, if the divine personality of God is one? Why political systems that are bound to become corrupt and perverted? What is the relationship between the cosmic in each man and the mask that he wears when he goes before his fellow men? This is the shout of disgust voiced by Baldovino in Il Piacere dell'onestà (1917; Eng. tr., The Pleasure of Honesty, 1923). The second act of this dialectical drama presents a sort of rogues' gallery composed of individuals who err by refusing to live according to "sentiment." The author had insisted years before in his study Umorismo (1908) that, whatever the illusions, "man does not have an idea, an absolute concept of life, but rather a changing and varied sentiment according to time, cases, and circumstances." He stressed the contrast between concept of life and sentiment of it. Unlike other beings in the universe that live by abandoning themselves to the warm flow of instinct, man is capable of formulating a concept of his existence and of his self, a trait that creates a clash between intellect and instinct. Other beings live, man sees himself live through an infernal machine called logic. Concepts are the chief products of this machine. Man looks at his fellow men, not as individuals but as fixed and unchanging entities in which he crystallizes definite types: this man is moral, that one immoral; another serious, still another funny; and so on through all the categories that have been invented in apprehending and cataloguing a reality that, being made up of individuals, rebels at all these clear-cut and ironclad concepts. The moral and immoral men do not exist in categorically well-defined embodiments. This is the plea of the father in Sei Personaggi in cerca d'autore. An individual cannot be categorically said to be serious or lighthearted. The truth is that the same individual can show himself staid and proper with one person and lighthearted with another who awakens the joyous side in his or her nature. This is the main theme in La Signora Morli, una e due (1920). Reality does not consist of its material and factual aspects, but of our sentiment of it, i.e., how we mold it to make tolerable an unbearable situation. This is the main motif that runs through Così è, se vi pare (1917; Eng. tr., Right You Are If You Think So, 1922).

Pirandello began his career as an author by writing short stories and novels. He did so on the advice of Luigi Capuana and Giovanni Verga (qq.v.), the leaders of the verismo movement in the 90's. These two men had practiced the art of storytelling as the objective study of life in its humble yet dramatic and picturesque aspects. Pirandello, too, presented in his short stories ordinary men and women observed in his native Sicily. Among the best are "L'Eresia catara" and "Il Treno ha fischiato," in which interest is focused on the lamentable plight of the main characters and the power of illusion that allows them to escape it. Yet, in Pirandello's stories (he wrote over 300) there is rarely adequate development of the philosophical intuition that originated them: the clash between the cosmic and the actual. The contrast itself is clearly borne out by many of the titles of the collections: Amori senza amore (1894), Befte della morte e della vita (1902), Bianche e nere (1904), Erma bifronte (1906), La Trappola (1915), Il Carnevale dei morti (1921). But the humble and elementary characters in whom Pirandello here enclosed his tragic sentiment of life were not big enough nor possessed of an intellectual stature fully to convey it. Though conceived on a wider canvas, and often significant, his novels are weighed down by the clash between the lofty generating motif and the grotesque forms that it assumed in the vicissitudes through which Pirandello led his characters. Such is the case in L'Esclusa (1901; Eng. tr., The Outcast, 1925), Il Fu Mattia Pascal (1904; Eng. tr., The Late Mattia Pascal, 1923), I Vecchi e i giovani (1913; Eng. tr., The Old and the Young, 1928), Si Gira (1915; Eng. tr., Shoot, 1926), Uno, nessuno e centomila (1926). But when Pirandello turned to the stage, he was able to reveal the philosophical motif of his thought untrammelled—and often with the radiance of great art. He then created figures conceived as the reflection of his mature self and capable of carrying the weight of thought and pathos that he entrusted to them. This is true especially in Il Piacere dell'onestà, Sei Personaggi in cerca d'autore, Enrico IV (1922; Eng. tr., Henry IV, 1922), Come tu mi vuoi (1930; Eng. tr., As You Desire Me, 1931), and Quando si è qualcuno (1933). It was undoubtedly as a playwright that Pirandello found the full measure of himself.

See: W. Starkie, Luigi Pirandello (1926; 2d ed., revised and enlarged, 1937); D. Vittorini, The Modern Italian Novel (1930); pp. 137–154, and The Drama of Luigi Pirandello (1935); F. V. Nardelli, L'Uomo segreto (1932); L. Baccolo, Luigi Pirandello (1938); B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, VI (1940), 359–377.

D. V.

Pirenne, Henri (1862–1935, Belgian historian), was born in Verviers. After receiving his doctor's degree at the University of Liège, where he had been the pupil of Godefroid Kuřth, he studied in Leipzig, Berlin, and Paris. At the age of 22 he was appointed instructor in paleography at the University of Liège and, two years later, he became professor of history of the Middle Ages at the State University of Ghent, where he remained until 1930, with the exception of the years 1916–1918 which he spent in a German prison camp.

Between the year 1888 and his death he produced more than a dozen works, of which the most important is his monumental Histoire de Belgique (7 vols., 1900–1932). The first volume was issued in German in 1899; the French edition began appearing the following year. From the very moment of its publication it put in the shadow all previous studies on the subject. Pirenne's work proclaims the existence of a national Belgian consciousness. His thesis is that Belgium is not a recent creation of European diplomacy, but that its unity and national spirit may be traced back as far as the Treaty of Verdun in the middle of the 9th century. He studies its evolution and its changes through the centuries as being the result of an undeniable ethnological fact. Pirenne is the first historian of that country to give the economic, social, and religious factors a place as prominent as that given to political events in the development of national history, and, differing from his predecessors who used to treat countries as separate entities, he scrutinizes these factors in the light of their connection with the general movement of Western European civilization. In Pirenne's work Belgium has become one of the important elements in Europe's evolution, whether it be in the history of the Crusades, the birth of the communes, the movement of the Renaissance, or in the philosophical, artistic, and scientific fields. Among Pirenne's other publications the following should be noted: Les Anciennes Démocraties des Pays-Bas (1909), Les Villes du Moyen Age; essai historique, économique et social (1927), Histoire de l'Europe, des invasions au XVI^e siècle (posthumously published, 1936; Eng. tr., A History of Europe from the Invasions to the XVI Century, 1939).

L. V.

Pirmez, Octave (1832–1884, Belgian writer), was born in Châtelet, in the Walloon section of Belgium. His life was uneventful and devoid of material difficulties. Except for travels in France, Germany, and Italy (Jours de solitude, 1869; Lettres à José, 1884), he led the leisurely life of a solitary country gentleman, reading, studying, and meditating in his Château d'Acoz, near the town of his birth. "My only companions," he said, "are love and death. They converse together at my side without ever fatiguing me." He was a lover of nature and a dreamer, deeply influenced by the melancholy trend of romanticism (Remo, 1878), a great reader of Montaigne, Pascal, Rousseau, Chateaubriand; but his "mal du siècle" is sad without despair. It is Christian, exalting, as with Pascal, the power of sentiment above the power of reasoning (see Heures de philosophie, 1873). Pirmez is always noble and delicate, his style is clear, flowing in gentle, somewhat sadly harmonious periods; the purity of his mind instills in the reader an aversion for bourgeois commonplaceness and utilitarianism. His first book, Pensées et maximes (1862), was republished under the title Feuillées in 1870.

See: Paul Champagne, Octave Pirmez; sa vie et son œuvre (1925) and La vie méditative d'Octave Pirmez (1929).

L. V.

Pitoëff, Georges (1886–1939, French actor, theatrical director, and metteur en scène), was born at Tiflis, Georgia, where his father directed a theatre. After acting in St. Petersburg, he formed his own company in Geneva in 1915, whence, already famous, he came to Paris in 1919. At the Comédie des Champs-Élysées, Théâtre des Arts, Vieux Colombier, and finally the Mathurins, he realized a new conception of the theatre dominated by simplicity, subordination of details to the central idea, and emphasis upon psychological overtones. His favorite dramatists were those most characteristic of his age of unrest, Pirandello (q.v.), Lenormand (q.v.), Shaw, Andreyev (q.v.), Gorky (q.v.), Claudel (q.v.). Before beginning to interpret a work, he lived with the text until he could visualize it upon the stage as if he had written it himself. Brilliant productions, illuminated by his intelligence and the sensitive acting of his wife, Ludmilla Pitoëff, revived Shakespeare, Ibsen (q.v.), and Tolstoy (q.v.) for the French public. The Pitoëff creations of Hamlet, of Bernard Shaw's Saint Joan, of Pirandello's Six Characters in Search of an Author, are landmarks in the history of the modern stage. With Baty, Dullin, and Jouvet (qq.v.) he formed the famous Cartel of four Parisian producers.

See: R. Brasillach, Animateurs de théâtre (1936).

J. O'B.

Pogodin, Nikolai Fyodorovich (1900–, Russian dramatist), was born into a peasant family and from childhood worked as a hired hand on a farm and later in blacksmith shops and in bookbinderies. These experiences gave him the raw material first for newspaper sketches and stories and then for plays. From 1930 on, a new play of his was produced nearly every year, and he became the most consistently successful Soviet dramatist. Whereas earlier Soviet playwrights had dealt with the bitter conflicts of the Revolution, Pogodin turned with optimism to the enthusiasm of socialist reconstruction during the first Five-Year Plan. For him dramatic suspense consisted not so much in personal tragedies as in the conquest by the masses of the problems of construction—man's mastery of the machine. His plays were filled with the joy of struggle, rough humor, and friendly teasing among workers busy in a common cause. His themes were drawn from the everyday life of factory or farm. His hero was the common man. This new type of hero, a full-blooded, exuberant, good-natured worker, for whom there is no difference between his private interest and the social good, reveals a very different type from the morbid, introspective heroes so common in Russian plays before the Revolution.

In Temp (1930; Eng. tr., Tempo, 1936) Pogodin dramatizes the necessity for speed in building the Stalingrad tractor factory, in which feat the Russian workers are helped by a sympathetic young American engineer. In Poema o topore (1931; Poem about the Axe) he writes with lyric enthusiasm about the final success of the workers in inventing a stainless steel for axes. Moi drug (1932; My Friend) presents a very tolerant picture of the friendly chief of construction of a new factory. In Sneg (1932; Snow) is shown the transformation of worthless characters under the ordeal of snow in the Caucasus Mountains. Posle bala (1934; After the Ball) transfers the same spirit of good humor to the new life on the collective farm. Pogodin's theories for his new type of drama were given in O dramaturgii (1934; About Dramaturgy). With Aristokraty (1935; Eng. tr., Aristocrats, 1937, acted in London in 1940) Pogodin's optimism goes so far as to represent former criminals and political prisoners, working on the Baltic and White Sea Canal, transformed into real aristocrats of labor. With Chelovek s ruzhyom (1937; Eng. tr., The Man with the Gun, 1938) Pogodin turned back to the eve of the Russian Revolution and introduced a meeting between a peasant soldier coming from the front and a very human Lenin—the first successful representation of Lenin on the stage. For this play Pogodin was awarded in 1941 the Stalin prize of 100,000 rubles. Gioconda (1938) was the story of a patient recuperating at a rest home and caring only for the picture of Mona Lisa and a woman whose smile resembled hers. Pad serebryanaya (1938; The Silver Valley) shifts to the Manchurian frontier and the danger of foreign invasion. For this long series of wholesome portrayals of Soviet life Pogodin was awarded the Order of Lenin in 1939. In Kremlyovskie kuranty (1940; The Kremlin Chimes) Pogodin went back again to Lenin and to a half-humorous working man who mended the chimes in the tower of the Kremlin so that they played the "Internationale." After the Nazi attack on Russia, Pogodin's plays took up the question of national defense with the same combination of "tremendous relentless determination and stalwart good humor" which he had shown in his earlier plays dealing with industrialization. Lodochnitsa (1943; The Boatwoman) depicted the magnificent courage of the women running the ferry across the Volga River during the siege of Stalingrad. After the invaders had been driven out, Pogodin wrote Sotvorenie mira (1945; The Creation of the World), depicting a Russian town wrecked by the Nazis and describing the zeal with which the Russian people turned to the reconstruction of the city as though it were the creation of a new world.

See: Yuri Yuzovski, "Nicholas Pogodin," Teatr i dramaturgiya, Vol. I (1933), No. 6, pp. 19-31, No. 7, pp. 56-60, No. 8, pp. 20-24; A. Gurvich, Tri dramaturga (1936), pp. 7-111.

H. W. L. D.

Polenz, Wilhelm von (1861-1903, German novelist and dramatist), was born on the country estate of his ancestors at Ober-Cunewalde in the eastern part of Prussia. Though a typical representative of the landed aristocracy by birth, he was attracted by the democratic principles and activities of the naturalistic school. His first novel, Sühne (1890), shows the style and form of Zola, Boelsche, Schlaf (qq.v.), et al. But he soon drifted into a middle of the road course and produced three novels of a type still sociological but in general more cultural. The first, Der Pfarrer von Breitendorf (1893), depicts the economic and spiritual afflictions of the country parson; the second, Der Büttnerbauer (1895; Eng. tr., Farmer Büttner, 1913-1915), presents the milieu of physical misery and constant financial trouble of the small landowner; and the third, Der Grabenhäuser (1896), outlines the social and political significance of the aristocratic country-estate owners and their economic responsibilities. After Thekla Lüdekind (1900), a love story of the triangle type, he discussed in a lengthy autobiographical novel, Der Wurzelocker (1902), the struggles and tribulations of his own literary development in the midst of the intellectual confusion of his time. His attempts at self-expression by means of the drama were not very successful; a number of short stories were preparatory steps for his novels. An extensive trip through the United States resulted in his best, and posthumous, work, Das Land der Zukunft (1903; Eng. tr., The Land of the Future, 1904).

See: E. von Mach, "Wilhelm von Polenz," in German Classics of the 19th and 20th Century (1912); W. Tholen, Wilhelm von Polenz und die deutsche Literatur seiner Zeit (1924).

A. Bu.

Polish literature in the early 1870's began to be dominated by a new mood, one of romantic humanitarianism, a belated manifestation of the fever which in Western Europe had largely been cured by the events of 1848. The fever had already been known in parts of Poland in the 40's, thanks to emissaries sent from Paris by the Polish exiles to stir up rebellion, but it had not then reached beyond the German and Austrian provinces of that country and its influence on literature had been negligible. When, however, nearly a generation later, romantic humanitarianism actually penetrated the Russian provinces, especially Warsaw and vicinity, it became the principal force animating a literary resurgence whose influence was to be felt for two decades.

The new mood was a natural and logical reaction on the part of youth distrustful of the spirit and ideals which had dominated their elders and which had brought Russian Poland, as a consequence of the uprising of 1863, to an abyss of humiliation. Throughout the three decades following 1831, the year in which the Napoleonic era, so full of buoyancy and hope for Poland, was finally liquidated, the Poles had lived in a dream. They believed, as the romantic poets on whom they were nourished believed, that it is neither "the furrow, nor commerce, nor division of labor" that constitutes a country's wealth, but only "aspiration."

Naturally there were many who, even before the epoch of dreaming was ended by the collapse of the uprising, realized fully that Polish life was an anachronism and that the Polish social organism was in urgent need of revamping; but it was only with the arrival on the scene of a group of young men from the Szkoła Główna, the admirable universi-in Warsaw founded in 1862 by Alexander Wielopolski, that this feeling was reflected in literature. Having been exposed, in the course of their studies, to Comtian positivism and especially to the writings of the English thinkers of the day—Darwin and Spencer, Buckle and Mill—these young men emerged from the university convinced that it was their duty as patriots to restore “the spiritual equilibrium of the nation, long out of balance through over-emphasis of the artistic,” and thus “to reroute the stream of Poland’s energy from heart to brain.” Even the poets of the Szkoła Główna group sang no longer of nature and love, but of the new ideals of work, reality, and truth.

The Szkoła Główna graduates made their ideals vocal through the various new journals which quickly sprang up in Warsaw. The most influential of these, and the spearhead of the new humanitarianism, was the Przegląd tygodniowy (Weekly Review), founded in 1866. The contributors to this journal often crossed swords in the early years of the new literary awakening—which soon came to be known as positivism—with the more conservative Biblioteka warszawska (Warsaw Library), a journal dating from the 40’s which had grown out of the intensely patriotic salon of Deotyma, and also with the Cracow Przegląd polski (Polish Review), a monthly founded in 1866 and edited by Stanisław Tarnowski.

The most important contributor to the Przegląd tygodniowy and the very Coeur de Lion of the young writers was Aleksander Świętochowski (q.v.) The ideals of the positivists—the nobility of work, the desirability of female emancipation, and the necessity for extending the benefits of education more widely in Poland—were promulgated by Świętochowski in the “Echoes of Warsaw” column of the Przegląd. Later he embodied these also in a series of dramas, the best of which was the trilogy of contemporary life Nieśmiertelne duszy (1876; Immortal Souls). Because of the excessively cerebral nature of the writing of this most spectacular of the positivist writers, the movement he represented laid itself open to the charge of literary sterility. The credit for giving the lie to this charge, which was in fact an unfair one, goes to that most typical of the positivists, Bolesław Prus (q.v.). Prus widened and enriched the stream of Polish literature and turned its course into hitherto unexplored channels of realism.

In Austrian Poland a shock hardly less severe than the one which brought Russian Poland to its senses in 1863 had been felt as early as 1846, with the Metternich-provoked Jacquerie throughout the valley of the San; two years later, in 1848, Lwów was bombarded and crushing reprisals followed. In Cracow, early in the 50’s, Józef Szujski had issued a challenge to the past when he declared the “epoch of the lyric” was over and the time for the sterner discipline of the drama had arrived. It was not, however, until the late 60’s and early 70’s that the new day heralded by Szujski actually dawned in literature. Then there took place in Cracow ferment and reorientation like that in Warsaw—similar in purpose, at least, if not in detail.

The literary awakening in Cracow had its origin in an alliance unique in Polish history, an alliance, as the journalist Pruszyński has called it, “of the counts with the professors.” Arch-symbol of the alliance, leader of the literary resurgence, and arbiter of taste in Austrian Poland for a long quarter century was Stanisław Tarnowski, a member himself of one of Poland’s so-called “nine families” and professor of Polish literature in the Jagiellonian University. Tarnowski and his colleagues, known collectively as “Stańczycy,” from the name of a famous 16th-century wit, differed from the Warsaw positivists in their conservatism and religious orthodoxy and in the fact that they were more interested in the past of their country than in its present or future. Their principal contribution was made in the field of historical criticism. Their purely literary works, not excluding Szujski’s many and ambitious historical dramas, are today forgotten, but their theory of Polish history, attributing Poland’s collapse in the 18th century not alone to the rapacity of Germany and Russia but even more to maladies within the Polish state itself, is a live and burning issue still.

Lwów did not share in the literary awakening of the 70’s, yet one Lvovian at least, Władysław Łoziński, adorned his country’s literature even in that arid period. With the brilliant and charming historical essays that began in the 70’s to flow from his pen, Łoziński established a tradition other Polish writers might well have emulated, and he ultimately won himself the name of being the parent of romantic biography in Poland.

Besides the fascinating, more or less historical figures of the essays of Łoziński, other new material was employed for literary purposes for the first time in the post-1863 epoch. The peasant began to be portrayed as he actually is, first in the moving tales of that pioneer feminist and reformer Eliza Orzeszkowa (q.v.), the Polish George Eliot (also called the Polish George Sand), later in the stories of Prus and Sienkiewicz (qq.v.). The Jew was represented sympathetically and humanely in the novels of Orzeszkowa, and the whole life of the natural world was for the first time acclimatized to Polish literature by Adolf Dygasiński (q.v.). In Cracow at this time also, Michał Bałucki (q.v.) pioneered in the use of the city dweller, especially the petty official, as material for the drama.

It is clear that the purpose animating Poland's literary activities in every part of the realm during the post-1863 epoch was a desire to rouse the nation and then to educate it—a purpose manifest in Cracow by a stern evaluation of the past, in Warsaw by a formulation of programs for the future—and no figure is more representative of the era as a whole, none crystallizes its ideals more perfectly, than the one best known and most admired abroad, Henryk Sienkiewicz. For Sienkiewicz was indeed the teacher par excellence of his nation, not alone of his own generation but of the next as well. By bringing tradition brilliantly to life, especially in his trilogy of historical novels, by presenting it in colors that could not fail to thrill and captivate the imagination, Sienkiewicz made tradition seem worthy of perpetuation, not secretly within the hearts of individuals, as in his own day, but openly in the collective heart of a state. Thus, although at first thought Sienkiewicz seems to have little in common with the other writers of his day, with the reformer Świętochowski, the realist Prus, and the conservative, scientifically inclined historians of the Cracow school, he was actually a product of the fusion of the tendencies of all these—and a genius besides. Two widely different monuments bore witness to his greatness: the peasant epic of Reymont (q.v.), Chłopi (1902–1909; Eng. tr., The Peasants, 1924–1925), which owed its inspiration directly to the trilogy, and the free Polish state which arose at the end of the First World War.

One of the most striking phenomena of the epoch immediately following 1863 in Poland was the country's isolation from the West. Travel from Poland to France and Italy fell in this period to an unprecedentedly low state, and the Polish realm "beyond the cordon" erected by the partitioning powers as a result of 1863 took little part in the intellectual life of Western Europe. As Tadeusz Żeleński (Boy) (q.v.) put it, "The romantics of the previous generation had been sentenced to vagabondage over the face of Europe and endless yearning for the homeland; their descendants, on the other hand, were obliged to submit to an opposite sentence: to quietly sitting at home and longing endlessly for the almost mythical Europe beyond the border."

In the middle 80's this began to change and Europe found its way once more into the Polish realm, especially, at the beginning, into its Austrian provinces. It arrived first by way of the Cracow theatre, brilliantly cosmopolitan under the administration of Tadeusz Pawlikowski (1894–1899), and later, after the death of Matejko, by way of the Academy of Fine Arts. Even before Poland and Europe had reestablished contact in this manner, however, Cracow had opened up new horizons on its own initiative and found its own way out of isolation. The way, discovered by a band of enthusiastic and lyric young men who soon came to be known collectively as Young Poland (Młoda Polska), led through Poland's hitherto unappreciated and largely unknown southern mountains, the Tatras. The Polish genius has always found its fullest and readiest expression in lyric poetry, yet poetry had been out of fashion in Poland since 1863. Obviously the time had come in the 80's and 90's to set right this unnatural state of affairs, and it fell on the Cracovians to do this. Having found an adequate spring of inspiration in the pure air and the quaint huts of the Tatras, these Young Poles proceeded to restore poetry to the place of honor it had until recently held in the national life. The period was known as "Tatra-ism." There were Asnyk (q.v.) with his thoughtful lyrics, Tetmajer (q.v.) with his rich verses and authentic if somewhat idealized tales of mountain life, to say nothing of the mountaineer Orkan (q.v.) who, though standing apart from Young Poland, nevertheless owed much to it and even contributed his own peculiar genius.

It was not long, however, before the kawiarnias (cafés) of Cracow replaced the peaks of Podhale as the center, not only symbolically but actually, of Young Poland's life: "satanism" triumphed over "Tatra-ism" and strange, exotic new colors were introduced. The new colors now came not at all from within Poland itself but entirely from abroad, from the Europe which Cracow had yearned after. They came first by way of Ludwik Szczepanowski, who arrived in 1897 and proceeded to found the journal Życie (Life). A little later that "child of Satan," Stanisław Przybyszewski (q.v.), returned to his native land from a season in the Berlin circles dominated by Strindberg (q.v.) and for the final year and a half of the century reigned in the cafés and monopolized the pages of Życie.

Under Przybyszewski's persuasion Young Poland now inscribed on its banners the "art for art's sake" slogan and proclaimed the emancipation of the writer from all moral responsibility. In Warsaw, at the same time, another group of young writers similarly inspired began to proclaim like ideals in a journal appropriately named Chimera. Zenon Przesmycki (pseud. Miriam), who founded it in 1901, was the discoverer and rehabilitator of Cyprjan Norwid, little-known romantic. The new agitation, in Warsaw as in Cracow, meant simply that Poland was once more united intellectually and spiritually to the rest of Europe and that she was suffering, along with the West, from the malady called fin de siècle. The sober chronicler of this epoch in Poland was the novelist Berent (q.v.); its most penetrating satirists were the Cracow dramatist Jan August Kisielewski, disciple of Bahr (q.v.) and of Schnitzler (q.v.), and Gabrjela Zapolska (q.v.), founder of Polish naturalism.

The remarriage of Poland with Europe brought about by Young Poland produced a number of skilled and competent literary figures, among them the dramatists Perzyński (q.v.) and Grubiński (q.v.) and the great iconoclast-critic Tadeusz Żeleński (Boy), founder of Cracow's most celebrated literary rendezvous, the Zielony Balonik (Little Green Balloon). Besides these, Young Poland produced also the strange and unexpected genius, Stanisław Wyspiański (q.v.).

Although Wyspiański far outdistanced Young Poland in his achievements, he nevertheless owed a great deal of his success to this movement: to its Tatra period for having made the native, Slavonic element in Poland's culture not only known, but popular and respected; to its European period for having reopened the sluices that carried the culture of Rome and of the West into Poland; and to the movement as a whole for having restored poetry to Polish life and brought back the imaginative into a position of honor. Wyspiański found the fullest expression for his many-sided genius in poetic drama. Equally at home in a variety of artistic media, he brought into being not only a great body of dramatic literature, but a great theatre in the widest sense of the term. He gave to Polish literature its first original conception in the field of drama, a conception in which he synthesized—as Słowacki and Norwid had unsuccessfully tried to do—all the significant elements of European drama from Aeschylus to his own contemporary Maeterlinck (q.v.).

In every nation there are figures outstanding for their enrichment of the symbolism by which the nation thinks and speaks, and Wyspiański was such a figure in Poland. Possessing the insight and understanding necessary to identify the types and symbols peculiar to his nation and recurrent in its experience, Wyspiański had also the skill necessary to evoke these dramatically and in such telling manner as to make them henceforth a part of the national idiom. He belongs, from this point of view, with the creators of Hamlet and Don Quixote, of Werther and Don Juan. Wyspiański's symbols, especially those occurring in his striking folk play Wesele (1901; The Wedding)—the peacock feather, the straw man, the golden horn, and the young bridegroom—stand with those of Mickiewicz and Słowacki, immortal and indispensable in the national idiom.

No less powerful in this same respect was the novelist Żeromski (q.v.). Like Mickiewicz's Gustav and Słowacki's Kordian, to say nothing of the types found in Wyspiański, Żeromski's Andrzej Radek in Szyzowe prace (1898; Sisyphean Labors), Dr. Judym in Ludzie bezdomni (1900; The Homeless), Cezar Baryka in Przedwiośnie (1925; Early Spring), Przełęcki in "Uciekła mi przepióreczka" (1924; My Little Quail Has Fled), and his evocation of the spirit of the Baltic seacoast in the figure of Smętek in Wiatr od morza (1922; The Wind from the Sea)—all have an important and permanent place in the national culture.

The literary awakening noted in Cracow in the 1890's had its counterpart also in Lwów, the political capital of Poland's Austrian provinces, and the movement was due in large measure to the arrival in that city of Jan Kasprowicz (q.v.). Poet, professor, journalist, and translator, Kasprowicz possessed not only the enormous virility of the peasant, but the dynamic freshness of a man new to the world of letters. Unlike his contemporary Przybyszewski, with whom Kasprowicz was unhappily linked by the desertion of his wife, Kasprowicz was not the object of a cult, nor did he become a legend, except with the Tatra mountaineers among whom he made his home. Yet after him there flowed out of Lwów an unbroken stream of poetry, first by way of Poland's greatest contemporary lyricist, Leopold Staff (q.v.), later through Staff's disciple Kazimierz Wierzyński (q.v.). In Kasprowicz's Lwów were bred and nurtured also that prime favorite of both children and grownups in Free Poland, Kornel Makuszyński (q.v.) humorist, storyteller and critic, and Stanisław Wasylewski (q.v.), leading heir of Łoziński as a historical essayist.

The city of Łódź, Poland's textile capital, experienced no literary revival comparable to that enjoyed by the other cities, yet it had the distinction of contributing to Free Poland her outstanding poet, Julian Tuwim (q.v.). A bard of the present and the future, Tuwim owed more to Russian literature, in which his studies in a Russian Gymnasium thoroughly grounded him, than he did to the literature of the West—though his debt to Whitman and Verlaine (q.v.) was by no means small. Tuwim was a brilliant individualist, always to be found in the thick of the literary controversies that kept Warsaw in a stir for the duration of Polish freedom, and he was the leading representative of the post-war cosmopolitan trends in literature which Warsaw warmly supported and which Cracow often resented.

Free Poland inherited from the preceding period of subjection other fully mature writers besides Staff. Some of these, notably the novelist Żeromski and the dramatist Karol Hubert Rostworowski (q.v.), a Cracovian bred and born and Wyspiański's principal heir, made a sincere effort to come to terms with the new times and partially succeeded in doing so. Rostworowski was especially successful with his dramas of contemporary life. For the most part, however, the older writers—Tetmajer, Reymont, and Józef Weyssenhoff (q.v.), author of the superb prose epic of the Eastern Border, Soból i panna (1911; Eng. tr., The Sable and the Girl, 1929)—either retired completely from the scene or simply, as one critic has said, "added marginal notes" to their already finished lifework.

So far as new and hitherto untried writers were concerned, these occupied themselves mainly with poetry during the first 10 years of Free Poland; only after about 1928 did they turn to the novel and the drama.

The first group effort to found a literature in the new state took place in Warsaw in 1918, when the First World War was scarcely over and the war with the Bolsheviks was yet to be fought. The movement was known from the name of its journal, Skamander, appropriately christened after the youth who was destined to restore the glories of Troy, and its leaders were the young poet and critic Jan Lechoń (q.v.), the poet Słonimski (q.v.), Tuwim, Kazimiera Iłłakowicz (q.v.), and that versatile man of letters, at home in every artistic form and medium, Jarosław Iwaszkiewicz

(q.v.). The Skamandrites were full of hope and bursting with energy. They desired nothing but the chance to sing of the universal joys and sorrows of mankind, to soar like the poets of other nations, free from the bondage of patriotic themes which seemed ever to shackle the poets of Poland. The youngest talent to ally himself with Skamander and to typify its ideals, as these changed and shifted from year to year, was Kazimierz Wierzyński. At the end of Free Poland's existence a still more youthful poet, the Lubliner Józef Łobodowski, became identified with the Skamander group.

Life in Poland in the 20's was for most people chaotic and fragmentary, and for years prose writing suffered from the universal lack of time and absence of repose. In the late 20's, however, signs began to appear that the novel was about to come into its own. First came the tales of Juliusz Bandrowski (q.v.), some nostalgic, others realistic descriptions of contemporary life in city and industrial center. Besides these there were also numerous "tales from the trek" by Ferdynand Goetel (q.v.), including the popular Z dnia na dzień (1926; Eng. tr., From Day to Day, 1931). Finally, in the 30's, came the imposing Noce i dnie (1932–1934; Nights and Days) of Marja Dąbrowska (q.v.) and the great medieval canvas of Zofja Kossak (q.v.), Krzyżowcy (1935; The Crusaders).

In the 30's there also got under way a new generation of playwrights. The Polish stage, after being forced overlong to draw on the balance it had inherited from Young Poland and its descendants—notably from Grubiński, Perzyński, and Nowaczyński (q.v.)—was now able to incorporate into its repertory the works of newcomers like Jerzy Słaniański and Marja Morozowicz-Szczepkowska, Pawlikowska (see Jasnorzewska, Marja) and Antoni Cwojdziński.

The psychological novel enjoyed in Free Poland a considerable flowering, in Michał Choromański's Zazdrość i medycyna (1932; Jealousy and Medicine), in the many novels of the old writer Zofja Nałkowska (q.v.), and in that excellent portrait of the "eternal stranger" by Marja Kuncewiczowa (q.v.) Cudzoziemka (1935, Forever Foreign; Eng. tr., The Stranger, 1943). There are also various studies of womanhood by Pola Gojawiczyńska (q.v.) and an autobiographical chart of a boy's growth in Uniłowski's Dwadzieścia lat życia (1937; Twenty Years of Life).

Attempts were made by several young writers to force the peasant problem, so crying for solution in Poland, into the limelight by way of the novel, but their success was not conspicuous either artistically or in the consequences for the peasant. A sensational work of this category was Jalu Kurek's Grypa szaleje w Naprawie (1934; Influenza Rages in Naprawa). The city slum dweller also became literary material, especially in the novels of Helena Boguszeńska and Jerzy Kornacki, and the sea, as a theme for prose and verse, was utilized assiduously by a number of writers in response to official prodding and spontaneous popular urging.

At the end of Free Poland a distinct trend toward the too long neglected art of romantic biography was evident. In line with this were not only the novel Czerwone tarcze (1934; Red Shields) by Iwaszkiewicz and the numerous vignettes of Stanisław Wasylewski, but also the controversial Marysieńka Sobieska (1938) by Free Poland's eminent writer, Tadeusz Żeleński (Boy). In the field of biography—fictional yet far removed from the romantic—was the portrait of a humble foot soldier in the imperial Austrian army by Józef Wittlin (q.v.), Sól ziemi (1936; Eng. tr., Salt of the Earth, 1939).

A strong trend toward the cultivation of various regional movements in literature manifested itself toward the end of the 30's in Poland, and one can only surmise the consequences had Poland's life as a state not been abruptly cut off by the German invasion of September, 1939.

See: P. Chmielowski, Zarys literatury polskiej z ostatnich lat szesnastu (1881) and Nasza literatura dramatyczna (1898); K. Wojciechowski, Przewrót w umysłowości i literaturze polskiej po roku 1863 (1928); W. Borowy, "Fifteen Years of Polish Literature (1918–1933)," Slavonic Review, XII (1933–1934), 670–690; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej (3 vols., 1934–1936) and Najnowsza twórczość literacka (1938); O. Forst-Battaglia, "The Polish Novel of Today," Slavonic Review, XV (1936–1937), 663–674; Z. Grabowski, "Polish Literature between Two Wars," Free Europe (London), January 12, 1940, pp. 96–97; W. J. Rose, "The Poets of Young Poland, 1890–1903," Slavonic Year-Book, XX (1941), 185–199.

A. P. C.

Pondal, Eduardo (1835–1917, Spanish poet), was born at Ponteceso in Galicia. He studied medicine in Santiago de Compostela and took part in liberal student agitations which culminated in a banquet given for the workers in Conjo, a village near Santiago. He was threatened with punishment by the authorities because of the tone of his fiery anarchical verses. He was graduated as a doctor in 1860 and almost always lived in retirement in his native village. His poetry is contained in two books, Rumores de los pinos (1877), written for the most part in Castilian with a few poems in Galician, and Queixumes dos pinos (1886; Complaints of the Pines), entirely in Galician. At his death he left unpublished an extensive poem of epic cast, "Os Eoas" (a reference to the seafaring people of the East), written in Galician and relating the deeds of the discoverers of America.

In the renaissance of Galician poetry, Pondal represents the romanticism of the Celtic school and—it might even be said—of Ossianic stripe. He was much given to reading and annotating. His powers of abstraction place him in an almost prehistoric atmosphere, and then the present world adapts itself to his imagination. The murmurs of the pines of Bergantiños resound in his ears like the harps of the ancient singers, and the trees form legions of Celtic warriors; he feels himself to be a bard from other periods before Christianity. Seated by the sea which furiously beats upon the shores of the Galician Finisterre, he carries on a dialogue with the fairy Rouriz or foretells days of glory for the race of Breogán now unchained. Pondal possesses a great humanistic-literary culture (Tasso, Camões, Latin, Greek, mythology), understanding of the Celts and sympathy with the fantastic halo that surrounds them, and exquisite sensibility which allows him to present the remote in terms of the present by symbolic-naturalistic means. He does not, however, adopt the Gaelic literary cycle with its sustained scenes and dramatization, but offers momentary evocations, brief and moving, a miraculous product of an ancestral influence of land and race. No one has written Galician poetry with more austere sonority and grandeur. Discipline in the classical languages has resulted in the most direct of manners put to the service of a primitive solemnity. On rare occasions is seen the nostalgic melancholy common to the Galician poets of his period, in stanzas like those of his most famous composition "A campana d'Anllons" (The Bell of Anllons). Here a captive in Africa grievously evokes his native country under the spell of a hallucination in which he hears the sound of his village bell on a night of full moon. Pondal stands worthily beside Rosalía Castro (q.v.) among the poets of his country and time.

See: C. Barja, En torno al lirismo gallego del siglo XIX (1926), pp. 92-102; R. Otero Pedrayo, Discurso de ingreso na Academia Galega (1931), pp. 109-205.

R. M. L.

Ponten, Josef (1883-1940, German novelist), is one of the foremost representatives of Sachlichkeit in modern German literature, chiefly through his portrayal of the life and fate of German emigrant groups in foreign countries, especially Russia. A native of the countryside near Aachen (born at Raeren), he combined the geniality of Rhenish temperament with serious endeavor in the study of geography, philosophy, architecture, and history. Although he spent a large portion of his life "on the road," traveling extensively in Europe, the Americas, Asia, and Africa, and although he chose Munich as his domicile for the last 20 years of his life, he never relinquished the fundamental emotional and spiritual stimuli of his native scene on the Rhine—the simple life of the country folk, the impressive natural environment, the lively river traffic, the celebrated Rhenish art and architecture, the eventful history of one of the oldest provinces of Germany, and last but not least the historical and legendary figure of Charlemagne. These elements furnish, if not the background, at least the poetic and human impulses behind most of his writings.

Ponten's literary significance is primarily based on the extensive series of novels under the collective title Volk auf dem Wege, which, composed from 1925 on, began to appear in 1930. But before 1925 Ponten gained considerable repute through several short stories and novels such as Jungfräulichkeit (1906; new version, 1920), Siebenquellen (1908), Die Insel (1918), Der babylonische Turm (1918), Die Böckreiter (1919), Der Meister (1919), Der Gletscher (1923), Die Uhr von Gold (1923), and Der Urwald (1924). In the same group belong Salz (1927) and Die Studenten von Lyon (1927). Most of these works, participating in the prophetic tone of expressionism without sharing its frenzy, pose in one form or another the problem of the cultural crisis of modern man. They do not voice violent protest or accusation; as long as they can proclaim the continuity of life they are willing to accept the tragic destruction of the individual. Their relative lack of action is balanced by most brilliant description of natural scenery or of cosmic events as well as by calm and concise use of dialogue. Ponten's art of characterization in these books is most successful. Frequently they reveal the author as an attentive disciple of Goethe's physics and Nietzsche's (q.v.) metaphysics.

While these earlier works often assumed allegorical dimensions, Volk auf dem Wege is grounded more on observation, experience, and source studies. Chancing upon the settlements of Volga Germans in 1920, Ponten planned to present the poetic history of German emigration in various cycles, covering several continents. Only the Russian cycle was completed. In 1930 and 1931 the first volumes appeared (Volga, Volga and Rhein und Wolga); they were soon withdrawn and rewritten. From 1933 on the following volumes were published: Im Wolgaland (1933), Die Väter zogen aus (1934), Rheinisches Zwischenspiel (1937), Die Heiligen der letzten Tage (1938), Der Zug nach dem Kaukasus (1940, published posthumously). Tracing the various waves of emigration as far back as 1689, Ponten portrays the most diverse causes and motives of "German unrest" and the aspirations and disillusion which accompanied it. With humanistic restraint he pictures historical events as natural processes, as it were, subject to the polarity of being and becoming, of existence and change; but he never succumbs to the lure of narrow-minded nationalism which his subject obviously contained. Similar devotion to objective reality, marked by the absence of sentimental evaluation, pervades Ponten's essays on nature and art, Studien über Alfred Rethel (1910; 2d ed., 1922), Griechische Landschaften; ein Versuch künstlerischer Erdbeschreibung (1914), Architektur, die nicht gebaut wurde (1924), Europäisches Reisebuch (1928).

See: Wilhelm Schneider, Josef Ponten (1926); L. A. Shears, "The Novellen of Josef Ponten," Germanic Review, XI (1936), 50-55; G. Fittbogen, "Pontens volksdeutsches Romanwerk," Dichtung und Volkstum, XXXIX (1938), 213-222; H. Rehder, "Josef Ponten, Gestalt und Werk," Monatshefte für deutschen Unterricht, XXXIII (1941), 124-137.

H. R.

Pontoppidan, Henrik (1857-1943, Danish novelist), owes his Latinized name to one of his numerous clerical forebears. His father was a clergyman in the Established Church, and although Henrik's childhood in the little Jutland town of Randers seems to have been happy, he reacted against the dominant clerical influence. He wanted a practical profession and chose civil engineering, but when he had almost finished his course, he dropped it in order to become a teacher in his brother's folk high school. Once more he reacted against the religion which here was in the Grundtvigian (i.e., folk high school) pattern and, in Pontoppidan's opinion, was too facile, sentimental, and "joyous." As soon as he had placed his first book, he decided to devote himself entirely to writing. He was on the whole in accord with the principles of Georg Brandes (q.v.), but did not feel at home in Copenhagen literary and artistic circles. Many years later he voiced his complete disillusion with the leadership of Brandes in a poem written for the great critic's 70th birthday.

Pontoppidan settled down in the country and married a farmer's daughter. Through his own experiences he learned to know many phases of Danish life. More than any other class he respected the peasants and the small bourgeoisie, but he thought the strongest leaders were likely to come from those who had struggled up from the very bottom. He believed in hate as a potent force for advancement and excoriated his countrymen for their complacency, their easy tolerance of abuses, for their famous "Danish grin," and their addiction to sweetness and light.

In his early books of short stories Pontoppidan painted the life of the very poor in the rural districts with a naturalism that was new at the time. In the three great novel cycles which constitute his chief works he has a wider field and a great variety of types. Det forjættede Land (3 vols., 1891-1895; Eng. tr., The Promised Land, 1896) tells the story of a clergyman who is imbued with Tolstoyan ideals and tries to put them into practice, but ends in collapse and insanity. The background is that of the Grundtvigian church circles. Lykke-Per (2 vols., 1898-1904; Lucky Per) describes life in Copenhagen during the reign of Brandes (who appears in the book as Dr. Nathan). The hero is Per Sidenius, a clergyman's son who revolts against his home and sets out, as a perfectly selfish cad, to conquer the world, but ultimately returns to the ascetic ideal instilled in him from childhood. De Dødes Rige (2 vols., 1912-1916; The Kingdom of the Dead) is an utterly pessimistic picture of Denmark at a time when liberalism had conquered outwardly, but, in the opinion of the author, had failed to transform the spirit of the people. Finally, Mands Himmerig (1927; Man's Heaven) is an intensely bitter attack on the Danish people at the beginning of the First World War, on the press, the government, the profiteers, and the public which cared about nothing except to keep out of trouble.

No other Danish writer castigated his people as Pontoppidan did. Nevertheless the sense that his anger derived from affection somehow penetrated their minds and won him loyal allegiance in return. The memoirs he published in his old age are mellow and kindly in tone. In 1917 Pontoppidan shared the Nobel prize in literature with his countryman Karl Gjellerup (q.v.). The Swedish critic Frederik Böök remarked that instead of half a prize he should have had two.

See: Hanna Astrup Larsen, "Pontoppidan of Denmark," American-Scandinavian Review, XXXI (1943), 231-239.

H. A. L.

Popov, Alexander Serafimovich, see Serafimovich, Alexander.

Popović, Bogdan (1863-1945, Serb critic and essayist), born in Belgrade, came of a very cultured family and was educated at the University of Belgrade and later in Paris, at the Sorbonne. In 1893 he was made professor of French, comparative literature, and literary theory at the University of Belgrade and soon became a focus of Serbian intellectual life. A university professor during four decades, he contributed to the formation of many writers who later played major roles in the Serbian literary world. As a founder and first editor of the best South Slav review, Srpski književni glasnik (1901-1941; Serbian Literary Herald), Popović showed clearly and persuasively which direction his nation should take in writing.

Popović was a man of amazing erudition. Familiar with many European languages and a good classical scholar, he was thoroughly acquainted with much of the world's best literature. Among his numerous translations from English, French, and German are Shakespeare's The Taming of the Shrew and Molière's Le Malade imaginaire. Besides literature, he understood excellently music, painting, and sculpture, revealing critical gifts in all these domains. His lectures as well as his writings abound in allusions and references taken from a rich artistic treasury out of whose depths he drew countless examples.

Popović was not a fertile or quick writer; he remained a long time considering a problem, analyzing minute details, but the results of his meditations display profoundness of thought, ingenuity of observation, rightness of judgment, and delicacy of taste. His brilliant study Bomarshe (1889, 1925; Beaumarchais), his essay O književnosti (1894; On Literature), the two volumes of Ogledi (1924-1927; Essays), show exceptional writing talent. Outstanding also are articles such as "Walt Whitman i Swinburne" (Walt Whitman and Swinburne; Srpski književni glasnik, January 16, 1925) and "Šta Srbi imaju da nauče od Engleza" (What the Serbs Have to Learn from the English; Srpski književni glasnik, September–December, 1929), and the masterly Antologija novije srpske lirike (1912; Anthology of New Serbian Lyrics). Popović was more a philosopher of art than an everyday critic, and for him a literary work often served only as an incentive for the development of his aesthetic theories in general. Very significant are his essays on the education of taste, on the principle of harmony, on satire and allegory, on poetical diction. He insists in an essay on criticism upon the scrutiny of "line after line, word after word," until beauty, scientifically tested, becomes real, intense, irresistible. His most important theories have been collected by his disciple Lj. Petrović under the title Misli i refleksije Bogdana Popovića (1923; Thoughts and Reflections of Bogdan Popović).

Bogdan Popović's style, vigorous and simple, clear and precise, has served as a model for his numerous disciples. In this way there has come into being the so-called "Belgrade style." Popović is also responsible for the introduction of European criteria and the European spirit into Serbian literature. His judgments often seem sharp and stern, but they are always just and well meant; consequently his influence has been widespread and enduring.

See: I. Sekulić, "'Ogledi' Bogdana Popovića," Srpski književni glasnik, Vol. XXI (May–August, 1927); Zbornik u čast Bogdana Popovića (1929).

P. A.

Porto-Riche, Georges de (1849–1930, French dramatist), asked to have inscribed on his tomb these words: "The author of Amoureuse." The description is exact, for Porto-Riche is the dramatist of but one play. Presented at the Odéon in 1891 with Réjane in the leading role, Amoureuse broke with the fashion of French naturalism (q.v.) to return to the French classical tradition of simplicity, penetration, and finesse in the portrayal of passion. Its two principal characters, unlovely but very human, illustrate the fact that it is not enough for two people to love each other if they do not love in the same manner and with something like the same degree of intensity. The fatuous man and the sensual woman whose erotic approaches form the subject of Porto-Riche's comedy of the couple express themselves with cynicism and sometimes with crudity, but they provide insights into the human heart that are reminiscent of Racine. In the violence and predominately sensual quality of the love he depicts, most of Porto-Riche's critics discern a specifically Jewish character.

Georges de Porto-Riche was born in Bordeaux of Italian Jewish parents and was not himself naturalized until 1892, following the triumph of Amoureuse. After several volumes of romantic lyrics and some plays, both in bad verse and bad taste, he discovered himself in the one-act Chance de Françoise (1888), a foretaste of Amoureuse. Later plays—Le Passé (1897), Le Vieil Homme (1911), Le Marchand d'estampes (1917), Les Vrais Dieux (1929)—contributed nothing to his initial success. In 1923, after five unsuccessful candidatures, he was elected to the French Academy but never attended a meeting of that august body. He greatly influenced Donnay and Bataille (qq.v.).

See: P. Lasserre, Portraits et discussions (1914); H. Charasson, G. de Porto-Riche, ou le Racine juif (1925); W. Müller, G. de Porto-Riche (1934).

J. O'B.

Portuguese literature. By the third quarter of the 19th century, after the long crisis occasioned by the implantation of liberalism and its embodiment into the historical structure of the country, Portuguese romanticism proper had produced everything that could be expected of it. This movement has been divided, with some overlapping, into three periods. An "initial romanticism" (1825–1851) produced three leaders, Almeida-Garrett (1799–1854), Alexandre Herculano (1810–1877), and António Feliciano de Castilho (1800–1875). Upon Garrett's death, the germ of rebellion inherent in the movement was personified in Herculano—he himself called his work "the first attempt at a critical history of Portugal"—but this insurrection disappeared with his retirement to the village of Vale de Lobos in 1867. Then only Castilho remained; around him had collected the greater part of the writers who were to constitute the "second romanticism" (1851–1871). Castilho, a master of the language, a man of verbal opulence but possessing scant creative imagination, personified the adaptation of romanticism to the old culture of Portuguese society. His formation coincided with the dissolution of Arcadian classicism, and he participated in the introduction of romanticism without in fact accepting it entirely. About 1865 he was the pontiff of the pseudoclassic adaptation of romanticism, enthroned as the official, ruling taste. Castilho was the obstacle in the path of the new generation that introduced the "third romanticism" (1871-1890), which soon evolved into a frank realism marking the beginning of contemporary literature. This third movement began with the rebellion of the so-called Generation of Coimbra. The lines were drawn for the battle between the initial romanticism which now enjoyed an official, academic status and the unrestrained, social and critical convictions, highly personal, of the newcomers. The new group revolted not only against the tyranny of officialized taste, represented by Castilho, but also against all its philosophical, aesthetic, and historical concepts—especially against the accompanying national optimism—and stated the necessity of adapting Portugal to European trends.

The young generation broke forth with two noisy manifestations. The first was the famous "questão coimbrã" (Coimbra question) presented in the pamphlet Do bom senso e bom gosto (1866; Of Good Sense and Good Taste), and the second the "Conferências democráticas do Casino de Lisboa" (1871; Democratic Lectures in Lisbon's Casino). The young students of Coimbra had shown themselves on several occasions rebellious against the scholastic iron discipline of the University. Two very distinct personalities, Antero de Quental and Teófilo Braga (qq.v.), were the visible heads of the university insurgency. Quental had already published Sonetos (1861; Sonnets), Beatrice (1863), a poem permeated with amorous idealism, and Fiat Lux (1863) and Odes modernas (1865), in which he attempted to harmonize inspiration and the scientific spirit; Teófilo Braga had also made his appearance in the world of letters with two cyclical poems of Hugoesque inspiration, Visão dos tempos (1864; Vision of the Ages) and Tempestades sonoras (1864; Sonorous Tempests). The "questão" revealed the abyss separating the two generations. The motive was a trivial one. Castilho, the patriarch of letters, in a letter-preface to the Poema da mocidade of Pinheiro Chagas (1842-1895)—spoiled darling of the elect oldsters of Lisbon—had made some references, rather more ironical than malevolent, to the two new poets of Coimbra, attacking the aesthetic tendencies of these representatives of the reforming student youth. Replies were immediately forthcoming, a result of the direct allusion and of the desire for polemical discussion on the part of the young men. Antero de Quental published the acrid brochure mentioned, Do bom senso e bom gosto, in which he attacked Castilho violently. The latter's adherents came forth with a great display of energy; pamphlets flew from the one camp and the other. Quental attacked again with A dignidade das letras e as literaturas oficiais (1865; The Dignity of Letters and Official Literature), and Braga published his Teocracias literárias (1865; Literary Theocracies).

Camilo Castelo Branco (q.v.), the great independent novelist, who was to have subsequent encounters with the same younger generation, took part in the controversy and attacked those of the Coimbra Group with his pungent sarcasm. The polemic lasted until 1866. It was an encounter in which the newcomers saw the opportunity to display themselves in public and try their forces with the enemy. This new romanticism, saturated with French culture and with everything that came through France from the rest of Europe, first took its subject matter from the French thinkers of the group of '48—Michelet, Proudhon, et al. Later it broadened its sources and ended in a well-marked realism. Those young men absorbed everything: the satanism of Baudelaire (q.v.), the historical erudition of Leconte de Lisle (q.v.), the determinism of Taine (q.v.), the humanitarian liberalism of Hugo, the apostolic revolutionism of Michelet, the alleged dilettantism of Renan (q.v.), and subsequently the realism of Flaubert and Zola (qq.v.). All of France overflowed into these rebellious and irreverent youths who, reared in the patriotic optimism of romanticism, had awakened to passionate hypercriticism and denunciation of national historical values. José Maria Eça de Queiroz (q.v.), a member of the group and creator of the character "Fadrique Mendes," the ideal type of the generation, said, speaking of "the ardent and fantastic Coimbra" of his day: "Over the railroads which had opened the Peninsula, whole waves of new things descended upon us every day from France, and Germany by way of France: ideas, aesthetic systems, forms, sentiments, humanitarian interests. . . . Each new day brought its revelation like a new sun. Michelet appeared, and Hegel, and Vico, and Proudhon; and Hugo turned prophet and exacting judge of kings; and Balzac with his perverse and languid world, and Goethe, vast as a universe, and Poe and Heine and I believe even Darwin and some others." Everything interested them, folklore, philology, comparative religion, ethnology, archaeology. All the scientific apparatus of the 19th century was brought forward to confront the old flimsy romanticism of Arcadian tendencies. But what really absorbed these young writers was Humanity—in capital letters and still with a romantic coloring. "We began immediately to love Humanity as ultraromanticism had loved Elvira, dressed in muslin in the moonlight," said Eça. Within the resulting ideological confusion two philosophical tendencies were outstanding, the Hegelianism of Quental and the Comtism of Braga. The first of these tendencies was to nourish in Quental the best philosophical poetry of Portugal, and the other was to produce in Braga "the most distinguished victim of the systematic method," whose work as an investigator was impaired by his dogmatism and extravagant syntheses.

The second manifestation of the Generation of Coimbra, now mature, came, as already indicated, in 1871. Some of the members of the original group, with the addition of new elements, had established a cénacle in Lisbon, headed by Antero de Quental. Under his leadership they organized the "Conferências democráticas do Casino de Lisboa." Their intention, expressed in the program prepared by Quental, was, in short, to transform Portuguese society by relating the country to the philosophical, aesthetic, and social currents of Europe. Only four lectures were given; three were published the same year. The first, by Quental, dealt with "Causas da decadência dos povos peninsulares" (Causes of the Decay of the Peninsular Peoples)—and was the real point of departure for all the Spanish revisionist literature of the Generation of '98 (see Spanish literature). Eça de Queiroz spoke on "Realismo na arte" (Realism in Art). The fifth lecture would have been "Historiadores críticos de vida de Jesús" (Critical Historians of the Life of Jesus), but the government suspended the series as prejudicial to the state religion.

The aged Herculano broke his silence to protest against the official act. Eça soon provided conservative criticism with a motive for attack. Rebellion in the novel was bound to meet violent opposition, owing to the popularity of the genre. Already in 1867 Eça's contributions to the Gazeta de Portugal, in a fiercely satanistic tone, had provoked scoffing criticism, and now with the publication of his novel O crime do Padre Amaro (1875; Father Amaro's Crime), characterized by a strong psychophysiological social realism in the manner of Zola, the great battle began. A journalist and critic, J. M. da Silva Pinto, a friend of Castelo Branco, published a book praising Eça and the new school, but Branco himself attacked the innovators bitterly and became involved (1881) in an extremely heated controversy with one of the defenders of the new tendencies. Pinheiro Chagas accused Eça of being unpatriotic because of his naturalistic presentation of Portuguese society. Eça's daring realism distressed persons of timorous ethics. Brochures were published addressed to mothers to warn them of the moral pitfalls of the new style. Castelo Branco had carried his belligerency so far as to publish various novels parodying those in the new manner, such as Eusébio Macário; história natural e social d'uma família no tempo dos Cabraes (1879; Eusébio Macário; Natural and Social History of a Family in the Time of the Cabrals), and although these purport to be only caricatures of the realistic method, some of them are notable examples of this very technique. Meanwhile the adherents of the new school were explaining and defending it actively. One theorist who expounded its principles was Júlio Lourenço Pinto (q.v.)—who as a novelist applied the principles far too rigorously. Another writer, Guilherme Moniz Barreto (q.v.), in his literary criticism brought to this type of literature an impartiality of judgment unknown at that time in Portugal. Opposition still continued in 1887 when Pinheiro Chagas, chairman of the prize committee of the Portuguese Academy, caused the rejection of Eça's novel A relíquia (1887; Eng. tr., The Relic, 1925). The essence of the contention resided in the fact that realism was not a gradual process of evolution from post-romanticism but a weapon imported by a generation for whom "realism meant not only a definite literary school which gave a special interpretation to the novel, but also, and in broader terms, an attitude of protest against a subjective idealism paradoxically without ideals."

This belligerent generation produced three figures of the highest rank—Quental in poetry, Eça in the novel, and Joaquim de Oliveira Martins (q.v.) in historical writing. Oliveira Martins was a continuator of the critical thesis of Herculano and a writer who exerted considerable influence on the Spanish thought of the Generation of '98. Also to be mentioned are Abílio Guerra Junqueiro (q.v.) and Gomes Leal (1849–1921), eloquent poets with civic-social preoccupations, and João de Deus (q.v.), who purifies amorous lyricism through the delicacy of his emotion and the transparency of his methods. In general terms it can be asserted that realism broadened the scope of this poetry by incorporating into it political, social, and philosophical themes.

The poetic vocabulary was expanded, and there was a deliberate seeking after themes and words previously considered unpoetical, as though from a special delight in opposing romantic fastidiousness. In the field of scholarship Tófilo Braga carried out a prodigious work of literary investigation, Francisco de Sousa Viterbo (q.v.) untiringly accumulated historical materials, and Gama Barros (1854-1925), Costa Lobo (1840-1913), and Ramos Coelho (1832-1914) elevated historical writing to great heights. The novel reached its apogee at this time with Eça. Other adherents to realism were Francisco Teixeira de Queiroz (q.v.), Abel Botelho (q.v.), so unflinchingly naturalistic in his Patologia social (Social Pathology) series, and Júlio Lourenço Pinto. José Duarte Ramalho Ortigão (q.v.) was outstanding in social criticism and travel literature. In collaboration with Eça he published As farpas (1871-1883; The Darts), a journal devoted to satire and social education. This type of publication was continued in Os gatos (1889-1893; The Cats) by José Valentim Fialho de Almeida (q.v.), who replaced fine irony with violent sarcasm. Fialho was also notable as a writer of stories in which he combined a realism characterized stylistically by a plastic striving for great effects and a preoccupation with "écriture artiste." José de Trindade Coelho (q.v.) continued his use of country themes and his stylistic scrupulousness. Alberto Braga (q.v.) told delightful village tales in a serene and simple manner. Jaime de Magalhães Lima (q.v.), who came to literature late, added to realism the humanitarian element of the Russian novel of Leo Tolstoy (q.v.), whose doctrines he propounded in a theoretical exposition.

The English threat of war in 1890 and the republican rebellion of Oporto aggravated adverse criticism of the regime and at the same time carried national literary negativism to a systematic denial of historical values. An all but total political impregnation of literature had taken place. Reaction was almost instantaneous, for once again the need was felt to dignify art by removing it from the immediate field of social and political action and from emphasis upon the ugliness of life; it was made to seek the essence of things, not simply to grasp them rationally. This new art, refusing to bow before the alleged scientific veracity of realism, was to seek aesthetic truth. As a reaction against universal and supernational humanitarian liberalism, it was to bring a reversion to the treatment of indigenous themes—a Neo-Garrettism (after Almeida-Garrett, mentioned above). The new movement of aesthetic purification was to affect poetry particularly. No clash comparable to that of 1865-1871 took place, because the newcomers lacked the combative cohesion of the Coimbra Group and in addition their revolution was less profound.

Symbolism began. There was no Parnassian stage, and this is not surprising since the impassive character of that art was in conflict with Portuguese subjectivity and especially since its Hellenic trappings were too reminiscent of the Arcadianism of Castilho. But there were traces of Parnassianism in a certain concern over descriptive accuracy, discernible in the poetry of Cesário Verde and António Feijó (qq.v.) and also in the first poems of Gonçalves Crespo (1846-1883), although he was more closely associated with Brazilian literature. Eugénio de Castro (q.v.) was the leader of the nefelibata (cloud-treader) movement, the name given to symbolism in the Portugal of that time. His Oaristos (1890) was the manifesto. The way had been prepared in many respects by the preceding generation. All the genres had been renovated by foreign influences; poetry alone had made relatively slight progress. Quental, unable to accept satanism, had moved toward a poetry of ideas, extremely personal in nature and expressed through a deep metaphysical lyricism; Junqueiro had imparted eloquent energy to romantic inspiration; and both had supplied new themes, developing a fuller and more sincere poetic language, whose possibilities of expressive simplicity João de Deus had already exploited fully. But none of these things had actually revolutionized poetry, which still followed regular metrical standards and employed an imagery which stopped short of the audacious. A renovation of form was needed and this Castro inaugurated. Entirely new media of expression appeared, the verse line was revolutionized, and an ostentatious vocabulary for fabrics, jewels, perfumes, and rare gems was evolved as a by-product of descriptive Parnassianism. All this was accompanied by a daring system of metaphors, based on bold and unexpected relationships of ideas. Poetry was separated completely from the forum and the market place, and once more the Portuguese bard was concerned with the timeless themes of love and melancholy.

Eugénio de Castro, more receptive to exterior than to local contacts, became one of the Portuguese writers with greatest universal reputation. In Paris he founded an international review, Arte, on which Mallarmé and Verlaine (qq.v.) collaborated. He established contacts with artists from all over the world who gathered in Paris, and he came to know Rubén Darío. He exerted a profound influence on the Hispanic American modernista movement. On the other hand, António Nobre (q.v.) was the greatest influence in Portugal and was almost at the opposite pole from the cosmopolitanism of Castro. Exterior contacts caused Nobre to withdraw within himself and to express his subjectivity in a purely Portuguese manner. Combining morbid peasant childishness and literary decadence, he created a regionalism of a certain aesthetic quality which was colored by rustic adolescent recollections in a tormented hypersensitive tone. Só (1892; Alone) has been called a "work which marks the return, not only to Garrett, but to all the morbid poetical tendencies and all the picturesque weaknesses of the national spirit."

Two historical events helped restore to literature the impulse for action and the consciousness of national energy—the establishment of the republic (1910) and participation in the First World War. Literature again participated in politics, in a more subtle manner. Manuel da Silva Gaio (q.v.) established Neo-Lusitanianism, with the plan, expressed in a symbolic poem, Chave dourada (1916; Golden Key), of making the mysticism of the race the basis of national energy. Nationalism branched off in two tendencies, an acceptance of the republic and a desire for counterrevolution. The first was represented in the formation of the group "Renascença Portuguesa" (Portuguese Renaissance), and among its principal leaders were the poets Joaquim Teixeira de Pascoais (q.v.) and Jaime Cortesão (1884–), the essayist António Sérgio (q.v.), the philosopher Leonardo Coimbra (1883–1936). Pascoais, editor of the group's organ A águia (1910; The Eagle), was its spokesman for some time with his doctrine of saúdosoismo, which endeavored to make of the saúde—national feeling of pleasurable pain in nostalgia—a motive for action. A arte de ser português (1915; The Art of Being Portuguese) was the book which expounded this doctrine. Opposition to the republic grouped itself about the historian, poet, and essayist António Sardinha (q.v.), who organized the "Integralismo Lusitano" (Lusitanian Integralism) and its organ A nação portuguesa (1914; The Portuguese Nation). This movement has been compared with the Action Française and resembles it in many respects; although Sardinha quotes Léon Daudet and Maurras (qq.v.), the one to whom he is spiritually akin is Barrès (q.v.). The recent authoritarian government (1926–) found its doctrinal basis in this group.

Afonso Lopes Vieira (q.v.), founder of the journal Lusitânia (1924–1927), on which writers from both groups collaborated, represents purely literary nationalism, and he has sought the national essence not in an artificially picturesque regionalism, but in the roots of his country's literature. In his poetry he has endeavored to effect a fusion between extreme modernity and the archaism of the lyric tradition. A great part of contemporary Portuguese poetry, indeed, has tried to find its formula in an intellectualized vision of folkloric elements, by combining ingenuousness as to theme with skillful elaboration, in what has been called "the democratization of Parnassus and symbolism." Augusto Gil (q.v.) describes the pagan-Christian simplicity of the villages in musical Verlainian verses. António Correia de Oliveira (q.v.) is carried away by the unadorned and devout graciousness of country life, and, abandoning his devotion to a nebulous pantheism, he becomes the singer of Catholicism and the historic past.

Poetry based on national emotion is disappearing, in favor of themes taken from the intimate zones of personality, from the hermetic seclusion of the inner world, unconcerned by collective destiny. This tendency can already be noted in the next to the last generation, as in the case of Camilo Pessanha (q.v.), translator of Chinese poems, whose work is already characterized by a subjective lyricism. Feminine participation in this tendency is notable; among others, Virginia Vitorino (q.v.) is an example with her impassioned sonnets. Such poetry presages the modernista movement, which had its focal point in Coimbra in the journal Presença (1927) and which, after undergoing the momentary influence of futurism (cf. Orféu, 1915; Orpheus), has produced poets as delicate as Fernando Pessoa (q.v.), Adolfo Casais Monteiro (1908–), Mário de Sá Carneiro (1884–1916), and José Régio (1901–). The influence of Valéry, the ideas of Proust (qq.v.), "pure poetry," are discernible in this poetry.

Various attempts at realism in the drama produced little worthy of mention. The nationalistic reaction gave rise to a neo-romantic theatre in which the influences of the Scandinavians, of Maeterlinck and Rostand (qq.v.), were incorporated. João da Câmara (q.v.) is really outstanding in the depiction of regional manners and customs. Amílcar Ramada Curto (q.v.) tends toward social criticism. Júlio Dantas (q.v.) has brought an elegant, poetic, and heroic Don Juanism to the theatre. A majority of authors have preferred romanticized emotions about the Peninsular past—Fernando Caldeira (1841–1894), Lopes de Mendonça (1856–1931), Marcelino Mesquita (1856–1919), and Eduardo Schwalbach (1856–1919) in addition to the already mentioned Virginia Vitorino, Jaime Cortesão, Correia de Oliveira, et al.

The novel is still under the influence of Eça de Queiroz. Themes vary, descriptive naturalism is accentuated, but the structure remains unchanged. Aquilino Ribeiro (q.v.) with his copious production is the most consistent follower of Eça. Other novelists are Antero de Figueiredo (1867–), who imparts a certain religious shade to his work, Manuel Ribeiro (1879–1941), in whom can be noted the influence of Huysmans (q.v.), and Augusto de Castro (1883–), characterized by psychological tendencies. Oriental exoticism, a part of the old national tradition, reappeared with the Japonism of Wenceslau de Moraes (q.v.) who, in the desire to “change his soul,” may be compared with Lafcadio Hearn. Criticism, since the period of realism, has progressed in all fields, historical, literary, philosophic, etc. The generation of nationalism has produced figures such as Carolina Michaëlis de Vasconcelos (q.v.), expert in the study of medieval Romance texts. At the present time a brilliant generation of investigators in numerous special fields is bringing honor to Portugal, alternating works of erudition with the essay and criticism. Above all there is the work of Fidelino de Figueiredo (q.v.), indefatigable critic and sagacious essayist, who in the multiplicity of his interests has brought forward the Peninsular point of view in important literary historical writing. There should also be pointed out the work of António Sérgio, whose Ensaio (1920–1936) mark a high point in the clarity of Portuguese contemporary thought. Numerous influences can be discerned in the literary production of the moment, though now the French vein seems to be mixed with the English and the Spanish, and to such names as Gide (q.v.), Proust, and Valéry should be added those of Thomas Mann, Rilke (qq.v.), Joyce, Huxley, Ortega y Gasset (q.v.), and Unamuno (q.v.). But above the permeations and influences, Portuguese literature can still be heard singing in its unwavering elegiacal range, which after all is the very essence of the ancient national soul.

See: Innocência F. da Silva et al., Dicionário bibliográfico português (22 vols., 1858–1914); A. de Campos, Antologia portuguesa (28 vols., 1919–1926); F. de Figueiredo, A crítica literária como ciência: Bibliografia portuguesa de crítica literária (1920), História da literatura realista, 1924 ed., and Depois de Eça de Queiroz (1938); A. F. G. Bell, Portuguese Bibliography (1922) and Portuguese Literature (1922); A. J. Anselmo, Bibliografia das bibliografias (1923); A. Forjaz de Sampaio, Coleção patricia (51 fascicules, 1923–) and História da literatura portuguesa ilustrada dos séculos XIX e XX (1939–); A. F. G. Bell, ed., Oxford Book of Portuguese Verse (1925); M. Fonseca, Aditamentos ao Dicionário bibliográfico português (1927); J. Mendes dos Remédios, História da literatura portuguesa desde as origens a atualidade (1930); G. Le Gentil, La Littérature portugaise (1935); H. Cidade, Tendências do lirismo contemporâneo (1939).

E. G. D.

Potgieter, Everhardus Johannes (1808–1875, Dutch poet, critic, short-story writer, and essayist), was born at Zwolle, where his father had a draper's business. Everhardus left school when he was 13 years old and was sent to Amsterdam to be employed in the leather trade. In April, 1831, he went on a business trip to Sweden, where he remained till the end of 1832. After his return he established himself as an agent of foreign business concerns. His impressions of that sojourn in Sweden are embodied in Het Noorden (2 vols., 1836–1840; The North). In January, 1837, appeared the first issue of De Gids (The Guide), a monthly which Potgieter founded and was to edit for the next 28 years. He contributed book reviews, essays, short stories, and poetry. The judgment he passed on contemporary Dutch literature was severe, but deservedly so. He condemned it for its smugness, its pedestrian tone, its lack of moral elevation. De Gids came to be known by the nickname De blauwe Beul (The Blue Executioner). How feeble and petty, Potgieter thought, were the Dutch of his generation compared to their ancestors of the 17th century. He never tired of reminding his contemporaries of that golden age, in the hope of shaming them into more strenuous activity and emulation of their glorious forebears. Jan, Jannetje, en hun jongste Kind (1842; John, Jean, and Their Youngest Child) and Het Rijksmuseum (1844; The National Gallery) are his most eloquent pleas for a national revival. In 1863 Coenraad Busken Huet (q.v.) joined the editorial board of De Gids. He outdid Potgieter in severity when censuring the mediocrity of the monthly literary output. Two articles by Huet in the January issue of 1865 aroused the ire of his fellow editors, who demanded his resignation. Only Potgieter sided with Huet, and when Huet was forced out, Potgieter went out with him. The two friends traveled together to Florence to attend the celebrations in honor of Dante's sixcentenary. This journey suggested to Potgieter the subject of his greatest poem, Florence (1868), a poetical life of Dante in terza rima. It was included in a volume of his collected poetry, Poëzy, 1832-1868, together with another of his major poems, Gedroomd Paardrijden (Riding in Dream). Perhaps his most important poetic work is De Nalaten-schap van den Landjonker (1875, Memories of a Country Esquire), because in this collection of poems he revealed more clearly than elsewhere his inner nature and the hopes, the longings, and disillusion of his life. Potgieter never married. He died in his bachelor home on the Leliegracht at Amsterdam on February 3, 1875.

De Gids, was, thanks to his literary eminence, the leading periodical of its kind in Holland during his lifetime, and it still maintains a place of distinction among Dutch periodicals, although their number has greatly increased since Potgieter's day. He exerted greater influence as a critic than as a writer. Despising the platitudinous and pedestrian writings of most of his contemporaries, he strove, by way of reaction, for a prose style which he meant to be artistic but which impresses a later generation as being ponderous and overornate. His verse was far superior both in form and in content to the poetry of his age, but it is too often marred by the same striving for artistry that vainly parades as art. He was a persistent student of foreign languages, and one of his chief merits was the service he did his countrymen by making them acquainted with the best literature he had found abroad, including the writings of American authors.

See: J. H. Groenewegen, E. J. Potgieter (1894); G. Busken Huet, ed., Brieven van E. J. Potgieter aan G. Busken Huet (1902); A. Verwey, Het Leven van Potgieter (1903); Henry Zylstra, "A Mid-Nineteenth Century Dutch View of American Life and Letters," Publications of the Modern Language Association of America, LVII (1942), 1108-1136.

A. J. B.

Pourrat, Henri (1887-, French novelist), was born at Ambert, Puy-de-Dôme, a quiet little town, where prolonged illness has compelled him to spend almost all his life. Under the influence of Jean Angeli, a former schoolmate and an intimate friend endowed with rare artistic sensibility, Pourrat developed at an early date a deep and abiding interest in the picturesque countryside of Auvergne. From the beginning of his literary career his constant preoccupation has been to present a vivid picture of a rural civilization unusually rich in popular lore. His first book, Sur la colline ronde (1912), written in collaboration with Angeli, who used the pseudonym Jean l'Olagne, is a series of little sketches depicting life in a village of Auvergne at the beginning of the present century. Since the publication of this work Pourrat has written some 20 volumes dealing with varied aspects of life in his native province and is now recognized by French critics as a master of regionalist literature. His views on this genre are to be found more specifically in La Ligne verte (1929) and Le Bosquet pastoral (1931), two collections of essays on literature and folklore. In these books he states repeatedly that the regional writer must not use local color as an end in itself, but only as a means. The same idea had already been aptly expressed in Dans l'herbe des trois vallées (1927): "True regionalism begins where the picturesque stops." Local color is justified only in so far as it helps the reader better to understand the story. The true artist must avoid sentimentality and introduce a healthy realism and humor in the description of characters and settings.

This is precisely what Pourrat has done with rare success in all his books. Landscapes, people, and customs of his beloved Auvergne have received their most beautiful treatment in his four-volume peasant epic, Les Vaillances, farces et gentilleses de Gaspard des montagnes (1922-1931). Perfection of character delineation and depth of poetic feeling combined with the unusual light thrown on popular beliefs and customs, many of which are still current in present-day Auvergne, make this novel one of the masterpieces of contemporary French fiction. Other notable works of Pourrat are Le Mauvais Garçon (1926), Le Meneur de loups (1930), La Grande Cabale: Les Sorcières du canton (1933), Monts et merveilles (1934), and Le Secret des compagnons (1937).

See: Arno Ringelmann, Henri Pourrat; ein Beitrag zur Kenntnis der "littérature terrienne" (1936).

J. M. C.

Prados, Emilio (1899-, Spanish poet), was born in Málaga, Andalusia. Except for a few trips to various Spanish and European cities he lived there until in 1936, when he went to Madrid to take an active part in the struggle for the republic. In 1939, following the triumph of Franco, he left for Mexico, where he now lives. He was a representative and stimulating member of the Southern Group, which published the journal litoral and the works of new poets such as García Lorca, Alberti, Aleixandre (qq.v.), and Altolaguirre (q.v.)—his inseparable literary associate—as well as the works of Prados himself (Tiempo, 1925; Canciones del farero, 1925; Vuelta, 1927). During the war he reaffirmed his poetic creed and collected the ballads comprising the Romancero general de la guerra de España (1937), among which his own ballads are outstanding. His book Memoria del olvido (Mexico, 1940) reveals the essential content of his poetry from 1927 and announces the future publication of numerous other works.

In the attitude, inspiration, and form of the Málaga group there has been recognized the stamp of Góngora and the influences of Unamuno, Antonio Machado, Juan Ramón Jiménez—that of the latter in particular—Salinas, and García Lorca (qq.v.). With a flavor of the traditional and yet in a most modern and daring manner, Prados brings to literature his own penetrating and serious personality. With as much agility as ardor he interprets his azure and golden countryside of Málaga. The destruction of Spain, in which the lot of Málaga was a particularly painful one, added to his already dramatic sensibility new depths of sorrow and anguish. From that moment his poetry becomes a fever of agony, a tormented dream in which he speaks of death as near and ever present, in which he decries universal injustice in a manner that transcends literary schools and canons, utilizing for these ends a masterful control of classical and popular modes of Spanish poetic expression.

See: Laurel: Antología de la poesía moderna en lengua española (1941), pp. 683–715, 1131.

A. I.

Praga, Marco (1862–1929, Italian playwright), was born in Milan. His father, Emilio Praga, was a prominent member of the scapigliati, a group of rebellious and ultraromantic writers of the 1860's. But Marco, who had seen their dream of reviving Italian literature evaporate along with their hazy literary effusions, developed an aversion for romanticism. His father, whose poetic gifts had been vitiated by a life of excesses, died a victim of alcoholism at the age of 36. Marco was then 12 years old. However, he never really forgot the literary glamour which had surrounded the family and tried his hand at play writing while still engaged in the prosaic occupation of accountancy.

His first plays, L'Incontro (1883) and Le Due Case (1885), both written in collaboration with Virgilio Colombo, gave little indication of the real dramatic gifts latent in this quiet, serious youth. His next play, L'Amico (1886), in one act, attracted considerable attention and set the pattern for his subsequent productions. Sensual, illicit love becomes his main theme. L'Amico presents the case of a woman who attempts to retrieve letters she had sent her lover, suddenly deceased, and is caught in a trap of her own creation. The dramatic conflict springs from the moral struggle; the dramatic compactness reveals the born playwright. Here in embryonic form are those qualities which become identified with Praga's theatre: a profound analysis of the female character; a dialogue both terse and sober, trenchant in its bitter sarcasm; a faculty for keen and accurate observation; and an aptitude for the faithful and objective representation of life in a few bold strokes.

The people that Praga observed and knew belonged to the aristocratic and well-to-do classes of Milan. It was a society which had enough affluence to permit itself certain luxuries: one of the most costly in human misery was the clandestine and illicit love affair. The prevalence of this immorality may explain Praga's addiction to the theme of adultery. In the projection of his world on the stage he does not preach or inveigh against this moral laxness, nor does he upbraid the transgressors directly. As a playwright his primary interest was to portray life as realistically as possible. Hence his aloofness and his apparent lack of sympathy for his tormented creatures. In this attitude he was an authentic naturalist. In his dramatic creations he is satisfied in letting the spectacle of a humiliated soul consumed by remorse carry its own admonitions. In his more powerful and successful plays, Le Vergini (1889), Il Bell'Apollo (1894), La Morale della favola (1903), L'Ondina (1908), and La Porta chiusa (1913; Eng. tr., The Closed Door, in The Eleonora Duse Series of Plays, 1923), the heroine is the victim of man's egotistical nature. Disillusioned and humiliated, she resigns herself to a life of silent expiation of her shame. The male protagonists of most of these plays are self-centered and vain—unworthy of the love and sacrifices they seem to inspire. This contrast between man's selfishness and woman's sacrifice is basic with Praga. But two notable exceptions are found in La Moglie ideale (1890) and in La Crisi (1901), considered the author's masterpiece. In the first of these an amoral woman contrives to make her husband happy because she possesses the necessary sang-froid and cunning to deceive him without compromising herself. In the second it is man who suffers: a husband accepts the humiliation of sharing his wife's embraces with another for fear of losing her. In such plays as these last two the author presents situations that have a definitely grotesque flavor and seems to anticipate by a decade the vogue of the teatro del grottesco.

Other plays of Praga are Giuliana (1887), L'Innamorata (1891), Alleluja (1892), L'Erede (1893), La Mamma (1903), Il Dubbio (1903), and Il Divorzio (1915). He also wrote the novels La Biondina (1893), Storie di palcoscenico (1895), and Anime a nudo (1920) and a book on the theatre, Cronache teatrali (1925).

See: C. Levi, Autori drammatici italiani (1921), pp. 69-110; A. Galletti, Il Novecento (1935), pp. 417-419.

P. P. M.

Prévost, Jean (1901-1944, French essayist and novelist), attended the Lycée Henri IV. There he studied under Alain (pseud. of Emile Chartier, q.v.), whose disciple he remained. In 1919 he entered the Ecole normale supérieure and the Ecole des Langues orientales vivantes. Jacques Rivière (q.v.) welcomed him in 1924 to the Nouvelle Revue française; in 1925 a short essay, Tentative de solitude, was published, in which Prévost attempted to carry isolation and self-analysis to the extreme. The same year he wrote Plaisirs des sports, which consisted of a series of analyses of internal sensations and of the movements of the human body. In 1927, in his Essai sur l'introspection, he described a series of the intellectual and emotional states commonly believed to be spiritual, in which respect he seemed to adhere to Spinoza's doctrine. Besides a rather inadequate Vie de Montaigne, which is in the nature of an educational pamphlet, Prévost had published, in 1926, Brûlures de la prière, the fictional diary of a mystic. Editorial secretary on the Navire d'argent from 1925 to 1926, then on the staff of the magazine Europe, he contributed philosophical essays to those reviews. A novel, Merlin, was published in 1928. Polymnie (1929) described with almost excessive minuteness the facial and nasal movements of movie actors. The same year also saw the appearance of Dix-huitième Année, a volume of Prévost's boyhood souvenirs, which reflects the spirit of his generation. In 1930 was published a "populist" novel, Les Frères Bouquinquant. The plot is merely an excuse:

the main intention is to show the emotional reactions of members of the working class.

Subsequently Prévost wrote essays (Les Epicuriens français, 1931), history (Histoire de France depuis la guerre, 1932), short stories (Nous marchons sur la mer, 1931; Lucie-Paulette, 1935), intelligent but hasty novels (Rachel, 1932; Le Sel sur la plaie, 1935; La Chasse du matin, 1937), and a volume about American civilization (Usonie, 1939).

A member of the fighting forces of the Resistance, he fell in the maquis of Vercors in 1944.

P. B.

Prévost, Marcel (1862-1941, French novelist, dramatist, and journalist), was born in Paris, the son of a minor government official. Prévost shares with Alexandre Dumas fils, who commended his novels, the role of apologist for middle-class moral values. Undoubtedly much of this concern with social law stems from his education in Jesuit schools at Bordeaux and Paris, where high academic honors assured his admission to the Ecole Polytechnique in 1882. Though he had written short stories and articles for Clairon as early as 1881, Prévost hesitated to embrace literature as a career, serving as an engineer of the Manufacturiers de Tabacs until 1890, when the success of his first three novels had established his literary reputation. A shrewd psychological insight, flavored by a consciously romantic sensuality reminiscent of George Sand, assured the popularity of La Confession d'un amant (1891) and of the Lettres de femmes series (1892-1897). Following Les Demi-Vierges (1894), which decried moral laxity in the education of young women, Prévost attacked the whole question of feminism in Les Vierges fortes (1900), which sought equality for woman within traditional family relationships rather than in independence. His Lettres à Françoise (1902), with its sequels, outlined an educational program for the attainment of this feminine ideal. The same mixture of morality and sensuality which led Jules Lemaître to remark that Prévost "loves to dwell on what he condemns" characterizes the long list of novels following his election to the French Academy in 1909. The Vatican denounced La Retraite ardente (1927), a somewhat ironic study of spiritual and carnal love which had gained considerable notoriety.

Adaptations of his own novels brought Prévost moderate success as a playwright. An active journalist, he had begun regular contributions to Figaro as early as 1902; he directed the publication of the Revue de France until his death at Vianne, Lot-et-Garonne, in April, 1941.

See: Winifred Stephens, French Novelists of To-day (1908), pp. 45-81; L. Lemonnier, "Les Romans de Marcel Prévost," Grande Revue, CXX (1926), 72-91.

G. Sh.

Prezzolini, Giuseppe (1882-, Italian critic and editor), was born in the city of Perugia. In a land of long-established traditions of formal education he offers the rare example of a self-taught man. Although he came of a family of cultural and literary interests, he left school before obtaining any degree. He found no purpose in life until he went to Florence, where one day he met Giovanni Papini (q.v.), in whom he discovered a kindred soul. This meeting marks the turning point in the life of Prezzolini, whose real eagerness to learn in his own way was, through this friendship, given new impetus and an aim. His interest now definitely turned to philosophy and literature. The memory of those days has been indelibly preserved in the tenth chapter of Papini's masterpiece, Un Uomo finito (1912), a chapter dedicated to "Giuliano," Prezzolini's pen name in the days of his collaboration with Papini on the famous Florentine review Leonardo (1903-1907).

During the days of the Leonardo, Prezzolini developed a certain personal inclination towards mysticism under the influence of Bergson (q.v.) and James and later of St. Augustine. The experience of the Leonardo and the impact of Croce's (q.v.) philosophy brought to Prezzolini a feeling of the need of a more earnest way of life for his country. To this end he founded a new review, the Voce (1908-1916), dedicated to an intellectual crusade; the aristocracy of culture was to come out of its ivory tower and participate actively in the solution of the problems facing Italy. Prezzolini also attempted to expand Italy's horizons by accounts of the new cultural and philosophical manifestations abroad.

In the Voce Prezzolini showed the ability to bring together men who differed not only in character but in political and philosophic thought—Salvemini (q.v.) and Mussolini, Gentile (q.v.) and Croce (q.v.). This ability to discover new men, to interpret the value of new trends in thought and in politics made him an authentic "promoter of culture." It is the same quality which particularly fitted him to direct (1925-1930) the Literary and Information Department of the Bureau for Intellectual Cooperation founded in Paris by the League of Nations, and subsequently to direct (1930-1940) the Casa Italiana of Columbia University in New York. He is now an American citizen.

Prezzolini's great variety of interests has led him into many fields. He tried his hand at allegorical writings in Il Sarto spirituale (1906). Having for a while the idea of becoming a systematic philosopher, he began with a study of the inadequacy of language to fully express inward experience (Il Linguaggio come causa di errore, 1903) and with a study of the psychological basis of propaganda (L'Arte di persuadere, 1905). After the First World War he renounced any attempt to participate actively in the political life of Italy and made up his mind to play the part of impartial judge of men and parties. Invited by the publisher Formiggini to write a biography of Mussolini, he accepted on condition that he also write the biography of Mussolini's chief opponent, Giovanni Amendola; both books appeared in 1923.

Prezzolini is the author of some 20 volumes. He is best known for his interesting study on Benedetto Croce (1909), La Coltura italiana (1923), his studies on German mystics (Studi e capricci sui mistici tedeschi, 1912), his critical essays (Uomini 22 e città 3, 1920), and particularly Amici (1922), a very readable volume, written in his characteristic unadorned easy-flowing style, devoted to the critical study of certain former collaborators (Jahier, Panzini, Slataper, Soffici, Croce, Salvemini, qq.v., Einaudi, Lombardo-Radice). In 1927 appeared a biography of Machiavelli, widely translated (Eng. tr., 1928). Because of its brilliant, un-academic treatment and entertaining style, it shocked the sedate tastes of some readers, but gave relief to others who were tired of the overdose of ponderous, unimaginative studies on the great Florentine. Since coming to Columbia University (1930) as professor of Italian, Prezzolini has been engaged in the publication of an important bibliography of the history of Italian literary criticism since 1902.

See: C. Pellizzi, La Letteratura italiana del nostro secolo (1920); B. Crémieux, preface to the French translation (1925) of Prezzolini, La Coltura italiana.

P. M. R.

Prishvin, Mikhail Mikhailovich (1873-, Russian novelist and naturalist), belongs to the older generation, since he was born in Khrushchevo, in the Yelets district of Central Russia, in 1873. He was educated in the local high school and, after some desultory study in Germany, trained himself as an agronomist.

In this capacity his chief contribution to knowledge was Kartofel (1905; The Potato), at the time a basic study of tuber culture. Finding agricultural work distasteful, Prishvin made several false starts in letters and then spent some time collecting popular epic poetry in the far northern provinces. The contacts with nature in this area inspired his first successful book, V krayu nepugannykh ptits (1907; In the Land of Unfrightened Birds), followed by Kolobok (The Little Round Loaf), inspired by the same experiences. The former book won Prishvin a medal of the Geographic Society and steady journalistic employment. He himself was early to recognize that his chief skill lay in the description of nature, which he instinctively viewed with a painter's eye for color and line. Prishvin's revolutionary experiences were unpleasant, since the local peasants confiscated his small Yelets estate, and he lived for some time in humble circumstances before he acquired a position as schoolteacher in the province of Smolensk.

Prishvin's luck turned in 1923 when Voronski, editor of the magazine Krasnaya nov (Red Soil), accepted his episodic novel Kashcheeva tsep (The Chain of Kaschei). Having a pronounced autobiographical stamp, this work expressed Prishvin's revolt against superstition and social convention. Its first three parts, after serialization, appeared in book form in 1924 under the group title Kurymushka (Prishvin's childhood nickname, roughly "little berry") and gave a fine evaluation of his childhood memories. A fourth part was entitled Boi (Battle), and the whole first book appeared in 1927. A second volume in five parts was serialized in 1927-1928 and appeared in book form during the latter year. Prishvin's Rodniki Berendeya (1925-1926; Springs of Berendei) is inspired by a love of nature and marked by a talent for the observation of nature rare among Russian authors.

See: D. S. Mirsky, Contemporary Russian Literature (1926), pp. 295-296; G. Struve, 25 Years of Soviet Russian Literature (1944), pp. 17-18.

S. H. C.

Proust, Marcel (1871-1922, French novelist), born in Paris, a scion of the wealthy Parisian bourgeoisie and of Jewish descent on the maternal side, was like Flaubert (q.v.)—although much more patently—a genius conditioned by illness. A chronic asthmatic condition, first revealed at the age of nine, cut him off once and for all from the world of action.

He literally worshiped his mother, who watched with infinite care over his nervous, sensitive childhood. His father, Adrien Proust, professor at the Paris School of Medicine, promptly decided that the best therapy was to indulge his every whim. Leisurely years on the aristocratic "West Side"; summers at Illiers, a village between Nogent-le-Rotrou and Chartres which he was to immortalize as "Combray," or at Cabourg, the "Balbec" of his novel; brilliant but desultory studies; precocious explorations of the monde and demi-monde; juvenile friendships with a fashionable and literary set—all these circumstances shaped the young man into an aesthete and a snob, charming, eccentric, inordinately curious and observing and yet immensely impractical. In the famous salon of Mme Armande Caillavet (see Caillavet, Gaston Armand de) he brushed elbows with Anatole France (q.v.), who condescended to write a preface for Proust's first published work (Les Plaisirs et les jours, 1896). Neither this production nor Proust's subsequent journalistic essays (collected as Pastiches et mélanges, 1919) proved to be more, however, than the exercises of a fastidious, cultured dilettante.

A trip to Venice (1900) heralded the revelation of Ruskin, whose Bible of Amiens (Part I of Our Fathers Have Told Us) Proust translated in 1904 (see also his translation of Sesame and Lilies in 1906). The deaths in rapid succession of his father and mother (1903, 1905) and a recrudescence of his illness led to the dramatic revulsion from which A la recherche du Temps Perdu was born. The former dandy withdrew into quasi seclusion, discharging his social duties through his enormous Correspondance (of which six volumes have been printed, 1930-1936). His solitude, unrelieved by any religious faith, turned to art as to "the most austere school of life" and "truly the Last Judgment." Unable to stand the light of day or the noise of the street, Proust wrote by night—mostly in bed—in a cork-walled room filled with the smell of fumigations. Instead of inclining him to concision, the fear of dying too soon caused him to labor feverishly and extend his original three-volume project into a huge cyclic novel of 13 to 16 volumes according to the edition (Eng. tr. by Charles K. Scott Moncrieff and, the last part, by Frederick A. Blossom, Remembrance of Things Past, 1922-1932). Du côté de chez Swann, the first book and purest gem of the series, came out in 1913 at the author's expense, having been previously refused by several publishers. It went almost unnoticed, in sharp contrast to A l'ombre des jeunes filles en fleurs (1918) which won the Prix Goncourt (1919) and aroused much controversy. Proust's reputation rose to extraordinary heights with Le Côté de Guermantes (1920), the four volumes of Sodome et Gomorrhe (1921–1923), and the posthumous publication of La Prisonnière (2 vols., 1923), Albertine disparue (2 vols., 1925), and Le Temps Retrouvé (2 vols., 1927) which—as the title indicates—holds the final key to an understanding of the entire work.

That Proust's technique should have been likened by some to that of a mémorialiste seems logical enough in view of the fact that A la recherche du Temps Perdu records at great length the progressive crumbling of class distinction under the Third Republic and the ultimate abdication of the nobility (or "côté de Guermantes") into the hands of the upper bourgeoisie (or "côté de chez Swann"). Yet Proust himself disclaimed any deliberate ambition on his part to write "the Saint-Simon Memoirs of another epoch." This statement was no mere anticipation of such criticism as would reproach him later for his lack of a political creed, his neglect of the masses, his indifference to economic issues, etc., etc. It sprang from the deep-seated belief that the method commonly termed "realistic" might well be the least realistic of all, since it "decimates" things, satisfies itself with a "puny" inventory of lines and surfaces, and ignores the richer world—the world of inner essences. Unlike the naturalists, Proust did not presume to take "notes" but resorted to "sketches," implying by this that in his eyes the truth of his observations was less a documentary truth inherent in the object than the transient and relative truth of his own successive moods. Thus Proust's analysis never reaches stability or completeness. His cosmos, whether material or moral, and whatever its amazing complexity, consists of an endless chain of approximations.

In such a mobile, atomistic, evanescent universe, the notion of perspective is divested of its spatial content. It comes to represent the angle of incidence of man's emotions; in other words, it takes on a temporal hue. Time, understood in the Bergsonian sense (see Bergson, Henri) but not always and not always faithfully; Time, conceived as a "lived" duration but made primarily into an agent of destruction and decay in direct opposition to Bergsonism—Time is the greatest, the most complicated, and, again, the most "approximate" of Proust's characters. In primitive childhood Time is a friend: it stands peaceful and motionless at our side, and the world is ours to have and to enjoy. Presently, however,

Time will break this harmony of living: in the wake of our first sorrow, we start on our slow journey toward death and assume the painful task of comprehending what we no longer immediately possess. Intelligence, therefore, is a fruit of exile grown in a climate of oblivion. The memory of the brain is a faculty most conspicuous by what it forgets, and its very recollections are no recollections at all, rather a system of reference powerless in itself to resuscitate the past. Meanwhile, deep in ourselves, some sort of visceral memory alone challenges the flight of Time, buries all, treasures all, remembers all. Throughout the years the body, this poor, disintegrating machine, renders us the invaluable service of hiding away this one guarantee of our personal identity. Subconscious memory manifests itself in dreams or, during our waking hours, on the occasion of rare "privileged moments" when a chance sensation (it may be the taste of a little cake, the clank of a hammer on a wheel, the peculiar disposition of a group of poplars on the roadside) hauls to the surface its twin sensation of long ago and for a fleeting second abolishes Time by merging our past—the whole living past to which it belongs—into our present.

A la recherche du Temps Perdu is the poem of Oblivion and Memory. It is not, in the manner of Joyce's Ulysses, a passive reproduction of the stream of consciousness. It is very much, despite all of Proust's anti-intellectualism, a rational effort at organization and elaboration. The "drops" of transcendental remembrance that fall from the subconscious will be crystallized by means of a mysterious alchemy and linked up in a rigid concatenation of metaphors. In order to give actual relief to the gradual encroachments of death upon life and to the corresponding expansion of reason at the detriment of the heart, the narrator of A la recherche du Temps Perdu will use the device of making his prelude poetical like infancy and his finale analytical like old age. These magical transmutations and evocative processes are easily recognizable as those of symbolism and impressionism in all the arts, and the last word to be said about Proust is that he strove—how successfully posterity will tell—to become the Charles Baudelaire (q.v.) of French fiction.

See: Léon Pierre-Quint, Marcel Proust; sa vie, son œuvre (1925; revised ed., 1928, 1935; Eng. tr., 1927); Arnaud Dandieu, Marcel Proust; sa révélation psychologique (1930); Charles Blondel, La Psychographie de Marcel Proust (1931); Albert Feuillerat, Comment Marcel Proust a composé son roman (1934);

Sybil de Souza, La Philosophie de Marcel Proust (1939).

J.-A. B.

Prus, Bolesław (pseud. of Aleksander Głowacki, 1847–1912, Polish journalist and novelist), was born at Hrubieszów, on the Lublin-Volhynian border, of lower gentry stock. His mother died when he was three, and he lived for a time with the grandmother whom he later immortalized in Kłopoty babuni (1873; A Grandmother's Woes). Later, on the death of his father, he lived with his aunt, Domicela Olszewska, a remarkable woman whom he used as the model for the good wife and mother in Omyłka (1884; The Mistake). Prus was powerfully influenced in his schooldays in Lublin by the example of his brilliant, passionately patriotic older brother Leon, who was in the thick of conspiratorial activities. On the outbreak of the uprising of 1863 Prus enlisted at once, although he was only 16, and saw active service with the Polish forces. Injured by a shell and badly burned, he was later imprisoned by the Russians and released only through the bribes and entreaties of his devoted aunt. Prus's eyesight was permanently impaired by the shell wound, and he was obliged in later years to protect his eyes by the dark glasses which became so characteristic of him.

After the uprising, Prus studied for two years in the excellent Szkoła Główna in Warsaw (see Polish literature). When this was made a Russian institution (1869), he left to study in the agricultural institute at Puławy, and also independently. After steeping himself thoroughly in the then popular branches of sociology and economics, he took a job in 1872 in the Warsaw factory of Lilpop and Rau, manufacturers of railroad cars, a common thing for young men of his class to do in those days of industry's novelty. Before this Prus had dreamed of emigrating to America; now he wished only to remain in Poland and serve his country along the lines laid down by the increasingly popular positivist creed.

Soon Prus abandoned the factory lathe for the pen, to expose in a series of articles and stories one sore spot after another in the national life. Many of his articles appeared in Świętochowski's (q.v.) famous Przegląd tygodniowy (Weekly Review). All segments of Polish life came under his survey, from the industrial workers of Łódź, in Powracająca fala (1880; The Returning Wave), to the peasant struggling to hold his land against the German, in Placówka (1886; The Outpost). Prus's masterpiece was the great novel of middle-class Warsaw, Lalka (1890; The Doll). This work, with its shopkeeper hero, was revolutionary in Polish letters and a herald of the new realism in fiction. It was followed by the widely read and discussed Emancypantki (1893; The Emancipated Women), a study of a type new to Polish life and not greatly admired by Prus. In Faraon (1895; Pharaoh) Prus resorted to a device popular in Russian Poland, concealing under an Egyptian disguise an exposé of Poland's miseries, and finally, in Dzieci (1909; The Children), he brought his life work to a close with a revelation of the intolerable plight of the Pole in the period of reaction following 1905.

A quaint, bespectacled, modest little man, Prus was at heart a reformer, and no finer monument to his memory could possibly be imagined than the embankment along the Vistula bearing his name. Each spring this serves to shield the poor of Warsaw from the swollen river and to remind them of their earliest partisan.

See: L. Włodek, Bolesław Prus (1918); G. Korbut, Literatura polska (1931), IV, 126–130; Wiadomości literackie, 1932, No. 418 (entire issue); T. Żeleński (Boy), "Prus w perspektywie czasu," Wiadomości literackie, 1937, No. 25.

A. P. C.

Przybyszewski, Stanisław (1868–1927, Polish novelist, essayist, and dramatist), was born at Łojewo in Kujawy, German Poland, the son of a village schoolteacher and a musical, highly strung, intensely religious mother. His birthplace, near legend-haunted Lake Gopło, the cradle of the Polish state, a melancholy region of peat bogs and willow groves, played a great part in the molding of his nature, heightening a natural tendency to fits of alternate ecstasy and gloom. Przybyszewski himself believed one's birthplace, like one's name, was predestined and prophetic, citing in proof of the latter his own strikingly appropriate name, which means "a destined-for-fame newcomer." A newcomer and an outsider Przybyszewski was from first to last: in Toruń, as a Pole in an almost entirely German Gymnasium (1881–1884); in Berlin (1889–1895), as a member of the suspect Bohemia of the capital; in Cracow, as a denizen of the cafés; in Warsaw, as a man shunned by the more stable elements of society because of his marriage to the estranged wife of the poet Kasprowicz (q.v.); and finally in Danzig, as a Polish official in an outpost of militant Germanism.

The most significant period in Przybyszewski's life was that spent in Berlin. Here, at first as a student and later, after a term in Moabite Prison because of his friendship for a proscribed Polish socialist, as an ex-student earning a precarious living by free-lance writing, Przybyszewski took part in the literary revolution which resulted in the fall of Zola (q.v.) and the rise of Strindberg (q.v.). He himself was deeply influenced by the Scandinavians. Not only did he now marry a Norwegian, Dagny Juell, and pay a long visit to the Scandinavian states, but it was under Scandinavian influence that he conceived the philosophy of medievalism by which he made himself at once famous and notorious. This philosophy, which repudiates reason and exalts intuition, was embodied first in the famous Totenmesse (1893) and Satanskinder (1897) and other early works in German. Later Przybyszewski built a temple of Satan in Cracow to promote its proper recognition.

Przybyszewski's influence on Polish literature, which was considerable, was exercised not only through his writings but through his personal association with young Polish talents—Żeleński, Grubiński, Perzyński, etc. (qq.v.)—and through his guidance of the editorial policy of the journal Życie (Life) during the months of his residence in Cracow from October, 1898, to the end of 1900. It was largely owing to his encouragement that the final blow was dealt to moribund positivism (see Polish literature) and the way paved for full acceptance of neo-romanticism. Of Przybyszewski's novels, the most typical is Homo Sapiens (1898; Eng. tr., 1915); of his dramas, the most widely influential, among the Czechs and Croatians as well as in Poland, are Dla szczęścia (1900; Eng. tr., For Happiness, 1912) and Śnieg (1903; Eng. tr., Snow, 1920).

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, I (1927), 67–86; A. Guttry, Unbekannte Literatur (1932), pp. 29–35; T. Żeleński (Boy), Znasz-li ten kraj? (1932).
M. M. C.

psychoanalysis in modern literature. Psychoanalysis has, ever since its consolidation into theoretical and practical psychology, maintained a close contact with art and literature. Sigmund Freud himself gave a definite lead with a number of essays on literature and related topics. Most of these are now contained in his Psychoanalytische Studien an Werken der Dichtung und Kunst (1924). In the first place, creative writing supplied him with a source of interesting human material upon which he could test his theories, if indeed he did not extract some of his principles from psychological observations made by novelists and poets. In the second place, literature, as a document and manifestation of life in general, presented excellent material for the psychoanalytic interpretation of cultural evolution as such. Freud's collaborators and early followers have strengthened the bond of interest between psychology and literature. The psychoanalytic viewpoint soon was applied systematically to literature in Wilhelm Stekel's Dichtung und Neurose (1909) and in Otto Rank's Das Inzest-Motiv in Dichtung und Sage (1912), two books which inaugurated a very active school of psychoanalytic criticism. Foremost among those who demonstrated the general applicability of psychoanalysis to art criticism are C. G. Jung, Oskar Pfister, Charles Baudouin, Albert Mordell, DeWitt Parker, Ernest Jones, F. C. Prescott. It is not difficult to understand why psychoanalysts should veer so conspicuously toward literary problems. The common meeting ground lay, in a broad sense, in the sphere of irrational and subconscious forces. Creative writers throughout the ages have always contended that their works were, in the final analysis, attributable to the prompting of some irrational urge. Psychoanalysts, on the other hand, were quick to claim that their conception of subconscious life was equally applicable to the explanation of art and literature, taking it for granted of course that artists are not noticeably different from the common run of men. Human nature even in our days still remains conditioned, the argument runs, by a set of childhood instincts, mainly of an erotic type, which invariably cause certain psychic problems and disturbances. Artistic production is directly concerned with the transformation of such infantile wishes into socially acceptable or even enjoyable creations.

If we disregard those many modifications which Freud's theory has undergone, certain principles may be set forth as the fundamental tenets on which literary criticism of the more orthodox kind of psychoanalysis is based and which have been widely used for appraisal of both ancient and altogether modern writers.

First. Since all essential manifestations of human conduct must be looked upon as being conditioned by some basic erotic experience and since almost every human action represents the resultant of two opposed forces, of the craving to satisfy our infantile erotic desires and of the more or less keenly felt obligation to suppress, convert, or sublimate such instincts, there can be no hard and fast line of demarcation between art and any other cultural activity; they all constitute so many attempts to cope with the curse of our erotic or, to be quite exact, incestuous nature, leaving in the wake of their efforts a welter of sex symbols, in the form of customs, words, images, institutions, thoughts, handicraft. Similarly, the difference between the most general and anonymous literary products (such as jokes, riddles, myths, fairy tales) and the highly individualistic expressions in towering masterpieces is one of degree rather than of kind. The former are collective confessions of wishful sexual thinking or of clandestine indulgence in incestuous pleasures, while the latter bear witness to the exertion of some conscientious individual to hide or even control his sinful because asocial longings. Gottfried Keller (q.v.), in the opinion of psychoanalysts, suffered from a strong mother fixation and was for this reason unable to love another woman; but instead of angrily venting his aversion—to say nothing of yielding to his incestuous impulse—he created a galaxy of beautiful woman-characters too lofty to become the object of erotic attention; these fantasies helped him to purify or at any rate to neutralize his emotional aberrations.

Second. What we commonly call artistic imagination, the ability of some people to weave a motley assembly of thoughts, emotions, and volitions into a pleasing pattern of form and content, is closely related to, though not entirely synonymous with, the faculty of dreaming. The common denominator of both is an ingenious method of evading the censorship invested in social consciousness and of giving more or less free rein to our libidinous drives. But there is this difference between dream and poetic imagination: mere dreaming—daydreaming especially—is bound to result in neurotic mental states with alternating currents of sinning and repenting, whereas the artist somehow manages to stem the tide of incestuous longings and to deflect its soul-destroying power into socially useful channels. Hence the essentially cathartic function of art, ridding individuals and society as a whole of tormenting complexes by substituting an imaginary world for stark reality and by providing relief at least in its imagined world. Few people realize that in witnessing a performance of Wagner's (q.v.) Tannhäuser, Tristan und Isolde, or Der fliegende Holländer their mother complex is being drawn off; yet such is the case, according to psychoanalysts. Wagner's own erotic feelings were focused on his mother, and indeed with such intensity that all his artistic dreams of incest were not sufficient to release him from his complex; on occasion he would actually fall in love with the motherly type of women, with the wives of his best friends.

Third. Since the urge to create is an act of self-defense necessitated by the pressure of incestuous longings, the comprehension of works of literature depends on a thorough analysis of the artist's infantile sex life and not, as traditional literary criticism has assumed, on all the irrelevant details of environment and training. Critics graduating from the Freudian school have produced a new type of biography, in which a few basic psychological data become intimately linked with whatever variety of formal and philosophical characteristics a work of art may possess. For instance, Renan's (q.v.) mildly incestuous attachment to his sister is said to reappear in the effeminacy of the author and in the gentleness, the moral tone, of his writings. A murder fantasy discovered among Jane Austen's Juvenilia has given rise to the suspicion that many of her works conceal a subconscious desire to do away with her parents and her sister. Père Goriot with his double passion for his daughter and for money enables the analyst to diagnose incestuous impulses and a castration complex in Balzac. A la recherche du Temps Perdu gives away, in its very title, Proust's (q.v.) dominant longing to go back to the maternal omphalos. But the most revealing authors, for the psychoanalyst, are Baudelaire (q.v.), Poe, and Strindberg (q.v.). For René Laforgue (L'Echec de Baudelaire; étude psychanalytique, 1931) the poems of Baudelaire form a perfect illustration of an acute mother fixation; his hatred for the stepfather—and for his mother in that she preferred a stranger to her own son—assumed such proportions as to make him finally equate all natural things with the abominable. Poe's infantile trauma dates back to two experiences, seeing his mother in the embrace of a strange man and watching her slow death through tuberculosis. According to Marie Bonaparte (Edgar Poe; étude psychanalytique, 1933) he became a sadist and necrophile, and his stories must be read as so many dreams through which he relived past horrors or in which he meted out savage punishments. Strindberg, thanks to a long series of autobiographical novels, allows the psychoanalyst to penetrate to a classical bifurcation of the Oedipus complex. Hating his father for having given him a stepmother, he transferred this emotion to all father-surrogates, to teachers, employers, governments. At the same time his aversion from his stepmother made him an inveterate misogynist deriving a morbid satisfaction from being the martyr of numerous marital adventures. From the nature of infantile erotic situations literary critics of the Freudian school finally arrived at a classification of artists into certain types, depending on whether they were bereft of either father or mother or both, on whether they had a stepfather or a stepmother, and on the balance of affection they felt towards their real parents.

Fourth. As it is only natural for psychoanalytic critics to be convinced that in works of art every detail falls into line with the artist's fundamental psychological constitution, there can be no talk of such a thing as an objective style. The old notion, for instance, of objective drama has to be discarded; drama is perhaps the most subjective medium of expression, a perfect external projection of the author's complexes, with more than one member of the dramatis personae appearing as a spokesman of the unconscious drive, or of certain ramifications of this drive, while jointly they reenact the dramatist's struggle between incestuous desires and social conscience. A play thus reveals itself as a series of clever stratagems ending in defeat of, or triumph for, the forces of social responsibility. The ever moving effect of Hamlet is attributed by psychoanalysts to a multiple projection of Shakespeare's Oedipus complex. Hamlet embodies this instinct in its broken, intimidated form; his own father, now only a ghost, can no longer be the object of real hatred, and a substitute is therefore created in the person of his stepfather, Claudius. But now the moral censor intervenes, vetoing at least for the time being any drastic expression of Hamlet's pent-up emotions. Another outlet must be found: Laertes appears on the scene to become a perfect disguise for Shakespeare's criminal longings. Laertes' father having been killed—much to Laertes' own satisfaction and to the satisfaction of Shakespeare—the author can now easily deceive the world as to the nature of his feelings by posing as a loving son and as an avenger of his father's death. Moreover, critics point out that in Hamlet Shakespeare works off all other concomitant complexes as well, love between brother and sister through the medium of Laertes and Ophelia, love between father and daughter through identification with Polonius and Ophelia.

Fifth. The most startling contribution of psychoanalysis to the criticism of literature was made in the form of a new interpretation of literary historicity. If the word evolution is to carry any meaning with the psychoanalyst, it must imply a steadily growing control over our incestuous desires by means of a strict subjugation of emotions to reason. In this slowly but inexorably maturing sublimation and conversion of harmful instincts literature is playing or, to be more accurate, has played an honorable part. With allowance for repetitions and digressions, the literary guild has in the past centuries discharged its function of universal catharsis in three definite stages which mark the only truly perceptible incisions in the history of creative writing. To recognize the salient features of each successive literary period and of its significance in the growth of Western civilization, psychoanalysts direct us to Sophocles' Oedipus Rex, Shakespeare's Hamlet, and Schiller's Don Carlos. Sophocles, speaking for a primitive age, allowed his incestuous desires to come to the surface almost unsuspected and to be naïvely gratified, if not in reality then at least in the dreamworld of his dramatic vision. Not until after Oedipus has been permitted to kill his father and to marry his mother does the Greek dramatist pause, reflect, and censor the sinful nature of such conduct, to impose on it now the stern punishment of self-inflicted mutilation. Crime and its atonement, sin and repentance, balance one another evenly at this early stage of civilization. It remained for future generations to be more watchful and to intercept the incestuous drive before it has run its course. But ages passed before literature was to record or to suggest a noticeable advance in the control of our infantile impulses. Shakespeare, even if he could not wholly convert or sublimate his sinful promptings, at least knew how to disguise the desire to kill his own father and to marry his mother so well that it takes a trained psychoanalyst to reconstruct the original emotional basis. True, the mother complex is only partly repressed, and to the extent of its being diverted into Hamlet's love for Ophelia. The father complex, on the other hand, has become completely unhooked from its real object and is finding a plausible substitute in Claudius; Hamlet's incestuous hatred, while not exactly transformed into a socially useful purpose, does occasion no great harm, because the stepfather had some punishment due him. Don Carlos brings us considerably closer to successful sublimation; he falls in love with his stepmother, which is a far cry from Oedipus' infatuation with Jocasta, and he would hate the man who happens to be his father even if the latter were a stranger. Yet in the end Schiller, too, feels morally compelled to deliver his seemingly innocent hero into the hands of the executioner, a tacit admission of some lingering feeling of guilt; unless the last vestiges of incestuous motives are eliminated or entirely sublimated there will be no peace for man's conscience, just as there will be no possibility of orderly, rational behavior. An emphatic warning to heed our in-cestuous urges—this is as far as creative literature can go in helping mankind. Further progress can only be expected from scientific psychology and from the prompt application of its findings. Modern literature has to content itself with making the problems involved apprehensible, rather than evolving the final solution. The same necessity for the most radical rationalization of life, on which our salvation depends, will sooner or later spell the doom of art, just as it spelled the end of religion in earlier times. Art, like religion, had its important duty to fulfill. When this is done, the function which was hitherto entrusted to artists will pass into the hands of the scientists; or rather, the latter must take over where art left off, to lead us into the millennium of scientific control.

Orthodox psychoanalysis has advanced other concepts of literary criticism in addition to those enumerated above. Freud's analysis of the incestuous elements in wit, for instance, was at one time widely discussed. But more important than these are the change which Freud's original views on the nature of our infantile urges has undergone and the influence of this change on literary criticism. Broadly speaking, the tendency among psychoanalysts was to contemplate the presence of other than incestuous or even erotic instincts. Adler's substitution of inferiority and superiority complexes for the Oedipus complex was an invitation to identify the unconscious Id with many other nonerotic drives, such as an elemental lust for power or a cannibalistic cruelty. C. G. Jung's preference is for mystic, religious propensities or for collective instincts; still others are ready to accept even innocuous volitions (e.g., a tendency to tell lies) as a fundamental trait, if not of all men at least of all writers. Literary critics who had hesitated to go the whole length of orthodox psychoanalysis availed themselves of the wider scope which these diluted theories of dissenting schools offered to them. Among critical works which employ such eclectic psychoanalytic tenets two deserve mention: Gustav Morf's The Polish Heritage of Joseph Conrad (1930) and Walter Muschg's Gotthelf: Die Geheimnisse des Erzählers (1931). Morf relies to a considerable extent on Adler's psychology, by attributing to Conrad's work a compensatory function; he had to make good as a writer in order to overcome his inferiority feeling as a foreigner among Englishmen. In other respects the author draws on Freud: Conrad, the motherless boy who was soon also to lose his father, transferred his thwarted love for the parents to Poland; this in turn led to a violent guilt conflict, because he had run away from his native land. Lord Jim, apart from having the dreamlike qualities of all great art, is also Conrad's most intimately autobiographical work; here the author atones for his guilt. Jung's influence seems to be suggested by Morf's frequent references to Conrad's instinctive knowledge and use of many universal symbols, for instance of the symbolic meaning of the sea which stands for fate in all its threatening and yet challenging mysteries. If Conrad emerges here as a highly individualistic figure, Gotthelf, as presented by Muschg, appears to be an anonymous spokesman, an outlet not so much of his own personal concerns as of the fundamental urges of his race or of all mankind, an eruption, as it were, of such primal instincts as worship of higher powers, love of the soil, and fear of demons, instincts which were controlled and purified by the fervent desire to sanctify life and to transform reality into an abode of peace and Christian beatitude.

In a preface Muschg acknowledges his indebtedness to Freud; disciples of the Klages school and adherents of the recently propagated "blood and soil" theory, though bitter enemies of psychoanalysis, have yet not hesitated to hail Muschg as a supporter of their own biocentric psychology. This fact goes far to show that there is no strong dividing line between psychoanalysis and other systems of Tiefenpsychologie. They are all different phases of a movement which had its origin in German romanticism and which, after having been powerfully amplified by Nietzsche (q.v.), was to endure and to gain in influence. Its unifying bond consists in the conviction that the motive for human actions—in life and in literature—must be sought in some unconscious impulse; it is in the exact definition of the unconscious elements that modern psychology begins to split into various factions.

The same civil war raging within the sphere of analytic psychologies has brought to light much valid criticism especially of the orthodox Freudian interpretation of art. Dissenters under the leadership of C. G. Jung protested, first, against the purely genetic approach to art by which nothing is achieved except a slight shift, within the old theory of environment, towards psychological data and, second, against the gloomy conclusion that the days of great art are numbered and that from now on our cultural interests will be in the hands of the scientists. The latter claim is for Jung another instance of causality and science running wild and trespassing into spheres where they are bound to do harm, this time in the sphere of creative imagination and ethical values. As Jung points out, the Oedipus complex and its female counterpart, the Electra complex, may well explain the causes of man's unrest and of the artist's urge to create, but they do not and cannot determine our creative reaction to these inner demons. In the worst cases, the reaction will follow the hedonistic line of a barely concealed resistance, leading to disastrous results; with greater moral fortitude, our response may be directed by some higher vision, creating an entirely new situation. The manly attitude which Oedipus shows when confronted with the consequences of his mistakes is something which could not have been foretold from the nature of his incestuous desires; he rises to an ethical height such as only the imagination and wisdom of Sophocles were able to envisage. To project into the consciousness of mankind such ever nobler ways and means of counteracting the blind force of primitive nature was, is, and forever will be the divine office of art, a task which cannot be taken over, in its entirety, by any other intellectual or spiritual agency. Literary interpretation lacking the intuitive sensitivity necessary to fathom the possibilities of creative imagination can never do justice either to works of art or to the role which art is playing in civilization. A modern critic relying solely on the analytic approach to art will fall just as short of his goal as would a mineralogist making bold to explain the artistic significance of a marble statue from a purely mineralogical standpoint. Analytic training will enable us to discover in Faust the erotic mother fixation of its author; only constructive comprehension can follow Goethe to those new levels of existence on which Faust, impelled by the titanic restlessness of his nature, discovers the essence of human life to lie in social responsibility and in active concern for our fellow men. Great writers have always endeavored to integrate individual life in tasks which by their very difficulty give birth to new inner qualities. Infantile emotions have then no chance to spread. They pass into oblivion.

Recent critics of psychoanalysis go even further than that, by questioning the validity of Freud's main contention that human instincts are basically selfish, pleasure-seeking, and asocial. In 1935 appeared the first edition of I. D. Suttie's book The Origins of Love and Hate, a work which may well mark the turning point in modern psychological thought. Much in the same manner in which Pestalozzi, more than a hundred years earlier, emphasized that love in its passive and active form constitutes the first experience of earliest infancy, Suttie holds that the instincts of gentleness and friendliness precede all egoistic sex urges, developing his argument with a medical, psychological, and anthropological knowledge which is more than equal to that of any Freudian. This assumption of the primacy of altruistic emotions over self-interest is one which answers the deepest longings of our time and which may lead to a new social philosophy as well as to a new school of literary critics. By calling attention to the "taboo of tenderness" in European literature Suttie has already indicated the direction which literary research may well follow.

The gauging of the influence that psychoanalysis has had upon recent creative writing will present a task of considerable difficulty to future historians of literature. The problem is not rendered easier by the suspicion—almost amounting to a certainty—that every European and American writer of account in the last four decades has in some form or other become exposed to the psychology of the unconscious. As a preliminary, varying degrees of directness and intensity with which psychoanalysis has affected literature must be distinguished. A tentative stratification may be suggested.

There are, first of all, authors who are more or less expert psychoanalysts and who are fond of introducing a psychoanalytic practitioner among the characters of their literary product. In Italo Svevo's (q.v.) La Coscienza di Zeno the hero—largely identical with the author—psychoanalyzes his own life in a style suggesting actual clinical case reports. R. E. Sherwood in Reunion in Vienna entrusts the psychoanalyst Doctor Krug with the handling and successful solution of an embarrassing family affair. The most direct and almost brazen application of psychoanalytical methods to literature is to be encountered in Der Seelensucher by Georg Groddeck who expressly defines his book as a psychoanalytic novel. The technical device he employs is not without hilarious possibilities: a psychoanalytic wolf in the garb of a bourgeois lamb roams through respectable middle-class society and provides, with the bluntness of a fool and the malice of a devil, a running psychoanalytical commentary on our customs and beliefs which shows at every turn that men are not really running their own affairs but are instead being run by that great Id, none other, of course, than Eros. Groddeck succeeds in suggesting lascivious intentions even in such trivial acts as the threading of a needle or the striking of a match. Other instances of psychoanalytical practice may be found in the works of the Swedish novelist Hjalmar Bergman (q.v.) and in those of Rebecca West, Eugene O'Neill, and H. R. Lenormand (q.v.). It was Lenormand who warned writers against a too literal appropriation of Freudian psychology as the surest way of becoming dated and outmoded.

Other authors, though paying close attention to the findings of psychoanalysis, nevertheless succeed in preserving their intellectual and artistic independence. Thomas Mann (q.v.), who wrote a eulogistic essay on Freud's significance for the future of civilization—assigning to him the role of a liberator from all dark, irrational instincts—yet creates his more representative literary figures out of his own psychology. Remarkable is the case of D. H. Lawrence. Overwhelming as the evidence of Sons and Lovers and of Lady Chatterley's Lover seems to be in favor of direct Freudian influences, in his treatise Psychoanalysis and the Unconscious (1921) he not only refutes all such dependence but also ridicules Freud's picture of the unconscious mind.

A large number of modern literary creations in a third group treat boldly of incestuous relationships; the prevalence of this motif may, in the final analysis, be attributable to the stress which Freud has put on the Oedipus complex. May Sinclair, J. D. Beresford, Gabriele D'Annunzio (q.v.), Stefan Vacano, J. P. Jacobsen (q.v.), Gustav af Geijerstam (q.v.), Peter Nansen, Jean Giraudoux (q.v.), Catulle Mendès (q.v.), Emil Strauss (q.v.), Clara Viebig (q.v.), Hugo von Hofmannsthal (q.v.), Adolf Koelsch, and others may be said to use incest motifs with the responsibility befitting serious writers. The same cannot be claimed of others, for instance of Leonhard Frank (q.v.), Arnolt Bronnen, and H. H. Jahn, all of whom hover on the border of pornography.

And finally, just as analysis, the tracing back of manifest behavior to some hidden erotic desire, became a strong trend in modern psychology, so pansexualism, the philosophical complement to psychoanalysis, has infiltrated into innumerable works of literature. But this frank discussion of sex problems for which contemporary literature presents abundant evidence—André Gide, Julien Green, Henry de Montherlant, Gerhart Hauptmann, Frank Wedekind, Arthur Schnitzler, Federico Tozzi, Corrado Alvaro (qq.v.), to mention only a few examples—cannot in every case have been instigated by direct contact with Freudianism; more often it appears to be a result of that general naturalistic current which assumed the proportions of a veritable Zeitgeist; of this widely prevailing spirit psychoanalysis itself is only one symptom among many others.

The very diffusion of psychoanalytic influence into every sphere of modern art makes it impossible to discern a psychoanalytic school in the strict sense of a literary movement. A well-defined movement presupposes a common philosophy and the employment of certain stylistic devices and innovations. True enough, the attempt has been made to show that psychoanalysts practice a set of formal characteristics and at the same time have certain views on life in common. The analytic form in drama and fiction, though not of recent origin, seems to meet the exigencies of psychoanalytic problems better than any other, allowing us, as it does, to analyze a conflict breaking out in later life and to run it down to some early, forgotten experience. It has also been pointed out that in life and literature alike psychoanalytic deliverance from a long-hidden complex is most expediently brought about by a confession or by a sudden outburst of self-accusations. Dostoevski's (q.v.) technique in Crime and Punishment—the slow extraction of a confession—has found many imitators among modern novelists; Jakob Wassermann (q.v.) shows a definite preference for this device, E. M. Forster has used it with brilliant effects in A Passage to India. Explosive self-revelation was carried to its extreme in expressionistic drama, in which one character often does all the talking while the others are supposed only to be patient and sympathetic listeners. Furthermore, since Freud relied so much on dreams as the royal road into the depth of the unconscious, writers made frequent use of the same expedient, in order to bring to light hidden desires. The sequence of dream scenes alternating with realistic settings in J. M. Barrie's Dear Brutus is a striking example of the good use to which dreams may be put for character analysis. Finally, since the past, by virtue of its decisive influence on man, can at any time raise its ugly head and deeply affect the present, psychoanalysts have argued that we must change our conception of time. Literature has taken cognizance of this change by introducing the stream of consciousness technique; James Joyce, Virginia Woolf, and Alfred Döblin (q.v.) will always be remembered as chief exponents of this novel method.

All these technical features occur quite frequently, however, aside from psychoanalytic beliefs in the strict sense of this term. In addition, we do not have strong enough evidence of a common approach, among psychoanalysts, to social and political problems. Full agreement prevails on one point only: the obnoxious complex must be converted into a socially useful purpose. Admittedly the definition of such usefulness often coincides with Marxist ideas on progress, and this accounts for the easy amalgamation of psychoanalysis with Marxism—the former explains what human nature is, the latter proclaims what it ought to become. But the two creeds are far from being complementary; one may be a Marxist without taking the slightest notice of Freud, and vice versa.

The prospect of a civilization which will know how to select and control its emotions and how to press them into the service of society remains one of the creative visions by which psychoanalysis deserves to be remembered. These emotions, however, must be located in other than incestuous, egotistic roots. Indications of a growing skeptical view on Freud's basic instincts are as definite among present-day writers as they are among psychologists proper. What is perhaps more revealing is the fact that Gide, a representative novelist of the older generation which was steeped in psychoanalysis, should have recovered his faith in the immanent nature and the everlasting value of altruistic feelings. With gentle insistence he shows in Les Faux-Monnayeurs that when all the time-honored emotions of parental love, filial affection, and loyalty among friends have been deflated in true psychoanalytic fashion human beings will at once begin again to crave for the very same emotions. The urge to give love and to receive love is not merely a residue of infantile perversions but must be accepted as a manifestation of cosmic energy. The fact that this universal libido upon occasion deteriorates into incestuous desires or, if we are to believe Adler, into an excessive lust for power does not mean that higher forms of libido such as love, a serene zest for life, social conscience and compassion, are becoming invalidated. It remains for a new generation of writers to rediscover the source of constructive, anagogic inspiration and to reincarnate, both in actuality and in imagination, those lofty, timeless emotions, to borrow an expression from Goethe, which are the very lifeblood of noble thought and action.

See: E. Aulhorn, "Dichtung und Psychoanalyse," Germanisch-romanische Monatsschrift, X (1922), 279-292; L. Cazamian, "La Psychanalyse et la critique littéraire," Revue de littérature comparée, IV (1924), 449-475; W. Muschg, Psychoanalyse und Literaturwissenschaft (1930); F. L. Sack, Die Psychoanalyse im modernen englischen Roman (1930); H. Pongs, "Psychoanalyse und Dichtung," Euphorion, XXXIV (1933), 38-72; B. De Voto, "Freud in America," Psychoanalytic Quarterly, IX (1940), 236-245; C. S. Lewis, "Psycho-Analysis and Literary Criticism," Essays and Studies by Members of the English Association, XXVII (1941), 7-21; F. J. Hoffman, Freudianism and the Literary Mind (1945).

H. B.

Puccini, Mario (1887-, Italian bookseller, publisher, short-story writer, novelist, critic, and translator), was born in Senigallia. He is a prolific and serious worker who has never attained great fame, although he has always merited attention and praise for his conscientious effort. Characteristic of him are a mild realism and interest in average types. In his first works he followed closely in the footprints of Verga (q.v.; see Foville, 1914) and noted with sympathy both the literary and political developments of Italy. In a rather studied and fragmentary way he felt the human and national problems of the First World War (Dal Carso al Piave, 1918; Come ho visto il Friuli, 1919), of the post-war period (Viva l'anarchia, 1921; Dove è il peccato è Dio, 1922), and of Fascism (Gola o il ritratto dell'italiano, 1927). Each of these works has been greeted as a promise, but none has been hailed as a masterpiece. He gives evidence of a religious preoccupation which he has not yet made articulate. He has made good translations from Spanish and South American literature and collected certain critical essays in a volume entitled Da D'Annunzio a Pirandello (1928).

See: G. Marcellini, "Mario Puccini," Nuova Antologia, CCCXVIII (1925), 84-91; L. Gillet, "M. Mario Puccini et le portrait de l'Italien," Revue des deux mondes, September 1, 1928, pp. 207-218; T. G. Bergin, "Mario Puccini," Italica, XIII (1936), 129-131.

G. P.

Q

Queiroz, see Eça de Queiroz, José Maria; Teixeira de Queiroz, Francisco.

Quental, Antero Tarquinio de (1842-1891, Portuguese poet), was born in Ponta Delgada, Azores, to a noble family of literary and liberal traditions. In 1858 he went to Coimbra to study law. The university was then a center for revolt and for the fermentation of new ideas. Gigantic and kindly, a magnetic personality, with his golden and resplendent shock of hair and beard, he led the school revolts against the medieval Byzantinism of the university and became the guide of a group of restless spirits who, as the Generation of Coimbra, were destined to renovate the spirit of Portuguese literature. In 1861 he made his appearance as a poet with the publication of a volume of poems, Sonetos de Antero, which revealed an art of first quality. In the preface he outlined a theory of the sonnet, for him a vehicle of pure lyricism, and urged the rehabilitation of this disciplined metrical form, then out of style, as a link to the tradition of Camões. In the course of 25 years of painful poetic production he was to do the best of his work in the form of sonnets. In 1863 appeared Beatrice, a poem full of amorous idealism, showing the influence of the new lyricism of João de Deus (q.v.). This poem was included in a later collection of early works, Primaveras românticas (1871; Romantic Springs). That same year (1863) he produced Fiat Lux, destroyed almost as soon as it was printed—indeed Quental, an essentially sincere and independent spirit, free of all artistic ambition, for whom poetry was an immediate expressive necessity, threw away more of his work than his friends were able to save and publish.

He destroyed the greater part of his verses in romantic vein when, in 1865, he entered the revolutionary phase of Odes modernas (Modern Odes); this constitutes a peculiar alliance of Hegelian naturalism and French social humanitarianism. With this extremely original collection he introduced the poetry of struggle into Portugal; later he was also to repudiate this as false, though still recognizing his sincerity in writing it. Now came the famous "Coimbra question" (see Portuguese literature). The young Antero was already known outside the university when the noisy polemic, which publicized the incompatibility of the new poets with exhausted post-romanticism, occurred. Then the vigorous polemist, the Antero of the tracts against Castilho, appeared. Odes modernas carried a brief note on the mission of poetry, deploring the existing divorce between the prolix, post-romantic lyricism and the complex magnitude of the spiritual life of the century. Influenced by Proudhon, Quental declared that poetry should be the voice of the Revolution. Instead of being an insignificant, personal pastime, it should present the great human problems, the metamorphoses of civilization, and the anxieties of modern conscience. Philistinism viewed all this as an extreme boldness and the odes were called monstrosities and metaphysical pedantry.

Quental had by this time completed his university work, but remained in Coimbra without deciding upon a career. Then began that struggle of will which was to be the great drama of his existence. A constant victim of metaphysical anguish, only in death could he find relief; initiator of all the spiritual movements in the Portugal of his time, he devoted himself with momentary passion to all his ideals, to end finally in the tragedy of neurosis and self-destruction. He started Iberism in 1868 with his brochure Portugal perante a revolução da Espanha (Portugal in the Presence of the Spanish Revolution) and later with Oliveira Martins (q.v.) founded the Revista occidental. He renounced his social position and went to Paris as a typographical worker, but disillusion and poor health obliged him to abandon this proletarian venture. In the sailboat of one of his friends he made a voyage to the United States and to Canada. He took an active part in socialistic propaganda and established the Portuguese branch of the International. In 1871 he again met his fellow students of Coimbra and organized the "Conferências democráticas do Casino de Lisboa" (see Portuguese literature), so soon to be suppressed. The polished, satiric pamphleteer appeared again in the "carta" to the marquês de Avila, protesting the suspension. In 1874 neurosis seized him anew, and he gave up all active endeavor and retired to Vila-do-Conde. In this retreat he prepared, with the aid of his faithful friend Oliveira Martins, the edition of the Sonetos completos (1886; Eng. tr., Sonnets and Poems of Antero de Quental, 1922) as well as a poetic collection for children; in addition, at the request of Eça de Queiroz (q.v.), he wrote three articles on the tendencies of contemporary philosophy. He left his seclusion only in 1891, to head the patriotic movement against the English ultimatum. Discouraged by the failure of this final illusion of his active life, he left for his native island; there, one suffocating afternoon, he took his own life in a public park.

Quental's work kept pace with his spiritual evolution. Having lost the Catholic faith of his adolescence, he entered a phase of deistic spiritualism. Later he discovered Hegel and was carried away by the grandiose Hegelian syntheses which he endeavored to combine with the democratic humanitarianism of the French, avoiding the problem of conscience in revolutionary faith. But soon his naturalism and the mystic tendency of his spirit came into conflict. These he tried to reconcile, but slipped into a phase of desolate pessimism—aggravated by disease—which produced the “lugubrious” poems saved by Oliveira Martins. Finally he thought he had discovered interior equilibrium in an optimistic theory of the beatitude of virtue and saintliness, a sort of occidental Buddhism which he called psychodynamism or panpsychism. When he lost hope of the nirvana of moral placidity—reflected in the final sonnets—he sought rest in death. His sonnets are “the autobiography of a thought . . . memoirs of a conscience” which aspires to understand the incomprehensible and express the ineffable. The philosophical sonnet first appeared in Odes, and in Primaveras there are love sonnets, as there are also in Raios de extinta luz (1892; Rays of Vanishing Light), a collection of juvenilia published posthumously.

The aesthetic technique of Antero is extremely personal and consists in the reaching for the most inapprehensible abstraction through the most immediate experience. His imagination was abstract and anti-pictorial. His sonnets, in their dual aesthetic and philosophical quality, give evidence of a sober and luminous art, characterized by deep emotion and sculptured, classic precision. Opposed to art for art's sake, he considered poetry not an end but a “perfectly involuntary means” of satisfying his need for expression. Because of a weakness of will, his production was disproportionately small in comparison with his creative powers, but as for quality “there is not another moment of greater intensity in Portuguese poetry after Camões.”

Quental's poetical works have been translated into the principal languages of Europe and take their place beside the best universal philosophical poetry. His philosophical essays, articles, brochures, and similar works collected in Prosas (1923-1931; Prose) offer, with his letters, guides to his intimate thought and sentiments and are evidence of his high quality as a prose writer, a role which has been somewhat obscured by the great stature of the poet.

See: Teófilo Braga, As modernas idéias na literatura portuguesa (1892), II, 96-223; “Antero de Quental,” in In Memoriam (1896); Fidelino de Figueiredo, Antero (1942).

E. G. D.

Querol, Vicente Wenceslao (1836-1889, Spanish poet), was born in Valencia and while still young wrote a small number of poems which were collected in 1877 in the volume Rimas (including also five poems in Catalan with Spanish translations). These were sufficient to give him a place among the best poets of his day. The circumstances of his life which demanded that he devote all his energies to the duties of his post with the Compañía de Ferrocarriles del Mediodía made it impossible for him to dedicate himself to poetry. Though limited in number, the quality and purity of his poems have kept his name alive. Among a select group he commands devotion as a great poet, whose work has not aged like that of some of his more renowned contemporaries. His poetry combines classic regard for form with lyric intimacy. He writes of sentiments that are familiar to all with nobility, tenderness, and delicacy; he writes of staid, chaste love, as in his Cdrtas a María. He feels and expresses with restrained intensity nature, love of country, and moral elevation.

See: J. Valera, Florilegio de poetas castellanos del siglo XIX (1902), I, x, IV, 59-68; A. F. G. Bell, Contemporary Spanish Literature (1925).

F. de O.

Quintero, Serafín Alvarez and Joaquín Alvarez, see Alvarez Quintero.

R

Raabe, Wilhelm (1831-1910, German novelist), was born in Eschershausen near Brunswick, the son of a minor official; he left school before finishing and became an apprentice in a Magdeburg bookstore. Even as a child he read avidly (Robinson Crusoe, Scott, Hauff, Dumas, Sue, E. T. A. Hoffmann), and before he entered the University of Berlin in 1854, he was acquainted with the English humorists from Sterne to Dickens and Thackeray as well as with the popular German novelists of his day. During the winter of 1854 he wrote his first book, the idyllic novel Die Chronik der Sperlingsgasse, which was published in 1857 under the characteristic pseudonym Jacob Corvinus. After three happy years in Wolfenbüttel, he traveled widely, married in 1862, and settled in Stuttgart. There he wrote his most distinguished early novels (Die Leute aus dem Walde, 1863; Der Hungerpastor, 1864, Eng. tr., The Hunger-Pastor, 1885; Abu Telfan, 1867, Eng. tr., Abu Telfan; Return from Mountains of the Moon, 1882; Der Schüdderump, 1870) and two of his most popular collections of short stories (Ferne Stimmen, 1865; Der Regenbogen, 1869). After 1870 he spent his remaining years in Brunswick, writing in spite of the public's indifference to his later work and living withdrawn from a world that seemed to him in its values ever more confused and unsteady.

Within the intricate history of German fiction, Raabe is one of the few genuine humorists. But his humor, like his characters and their lives, demands from the reader a sympathetic understanding of the depth and breadth of German provincial life. His work indicates the impressive climax and end of the literature of German bourgeois idealism. With Gotthelf, Stifter, and Keller (q.v.) he is one of the most representative novelists of the century. A far greater artist than his popular contemporary Freytag, and a less self-conscious craftsman than Fontane (qq.v.), he is the most genuine storyteller of his generation. Without being either as romantically subjective or as effusively sentimental as "Jean Paul" Richter, he shares Richter's affection for the minutely revealing detail and the quaint and bizarre characters of a proudly class-conscious society. His language, like that of Richter, is baroque in its warmth, occasionally overcharged with recondite learning, but inexhaustible in its wealth of invention.

His first novel, Die Chronik der Sperlingsgasse, is in its subject matter reminiscent of the sensibility of the Biedermeier period, but even in this youthful work Raabe speaks with the seasoned authority of a wise observer of life. Three historical novels, Nach dem Grossen Kriege (1861), Der heilige Born (1861), and Unseres Herrgotts Kanzlei (1862), were followed by the last long work of his early period, Die Leute aus dem Walde (1863), in which occurs one often quoted sentence that sums up the idealistic realism of Raabe's belief: "Sieh nach den Sternen! Gib acht auf die Gassen!"

If he found himself in his middle years in agreement with the gist of Schopenhauer's "pessimistic" ideas, he was (long before the remarkable later Novelle, Pfisters Mühle, 1884) a critical but positive defender of those threatened cultural values which his gilded age seemed willing to forget (see Horacker, 1876). The contemporary socialistic and naturalistic ideologies hardly interested him as such. But in his three best-known novels, Der Hungerpastor, Abu Telfan, and Der Schüdderump, he foreshadowed the German and European crisis of morals with insight and possibly with greater wisdom than even Nietzsche (q.v.) himself. All three works, related in substance but not in plot, portray the eventual triumph of inner strength and integrity of feeling over the forces of dissolution (see the preface to the second edition of Der Schüdderump, 1894). Not unlike the world of his North German contemporaries, Storm (q.v.), Reuter, and Groth, Raabe's characters demonstrated their bourgeois virtues by their personal solidity and moral substance and not, as in Freytag's Soll und Haben, in terms of action and success. With Freytag and the social essayist W. H. Riehl (1823-1897), he shares a pride in the accomplishments of the national past; although he is not primarily a "historical novelist," many of his narratives deal with historical subjects. His short stories, from the early and lyrical "Holunderblüte" (1863) and the dramatic "Die schwarze Galeere" (1860), the humorous "Die Gänse von Bützow" (1865), "Gedelöcke" (1866), and Wunnigel (1879), to more complex tales ("Der Marsch nach Hause," 1873, and "Die Innerste," 1874), give him a conspicuous place in the history of the German Novelle from Kleist to C. F. Meyer (q.v.) and Thomas Mann (q.v.).

With his last six novels, Stopfkuchen (1891), Gutmanns Reisen (1892), Kloster Lugau (1894), Die Akten des Vogelsangs (1895), Hastenbeck (1899), and the fragmentary Alttershausen (1911), Raabe crowns his work as one of the German masters of the craft of fiction. Without the involved and occasionally precious whimsicality of his earlier prose, these nature works reiterate his tenacious resolve to "remain what we are destined to be": "Wir wollen bleiben was wir sein müssen."

See: W. Fehse, Wilhelm Raabe (1937).

V. L.

Radiguet, Raymond (1903-1923, French poet and novelist), because of his personal charm, his precociousness, his considerable promise, and his early death, has become the subject of a legend which his published work hardly warrants. Very few critics today would, on merit alone, give more than passing attention to the two slim volumes of verse, Joues en feu (1920) and Devoirs de vacances (1921), or to the two short novels, Le Diable au corps (1923; Eng. tr., The Devil in the Flesh, 1932) and Le Bal du comte d'Orgel (1924; Eng. tr., The Count's Ball, 1929). Yet they show exceptional merit and maturity for so young a writer and suggest that had he lived he would have produced work of lasting quality and left a mark upon his time.

Nothing is known of Radiguet's earliest years beyond the fact that he was born at Parc-de-Saint-Maur, a meteorological station some 10 miles from Paris, and that at 14 he was already writing remarkably good poetry. He arrived in Paris in 1918, where he led a hand to mouth existence until presently he was taken up by Max Jacob and Jean Cocteau (qq.v.), through whom he was introduced to Aragon, Breton, Soupault (qq.v.), and other advance-guard writers. Although he was friendly with these extreme innovators and was invited to contribute to Sic and other "new" reviews, he was from the beginning, and remained, addicted to the classic tradition, especially to 18th-century classicism. His verse, both metrically and in subject matter, is conventional, though it has at its best a grace, a felicity, and a restraint that reveal facility and taste, if not original power. Le Diable au corps is a highly sophisticated Daphnis and Chloë in modern dress and Le Bal du comte d'Orgel an almost cynically disillusioned novel of manners, both remarkable for their keen and economical delineation of character, for the extremely skillful handling of complex and elusive human relationships. If they make no striking contribution either to the form or substance of the novel, they reveal in the exceptionally acute and sensitive mind of the author a significant état d'âme of that post-war period. It is compounded of traditionalism and an almost nihilistic disillusion, of which the early death of a writer of potential genius is perhaps an appropriately poetic fulfillment.

See: Jean Cocteau, "Préface," in Radiguet, Le Bal du comte d'Orgel (1924); M. Martin du Gard, Feux tournants (1925), pp. 95-115; Henri Massis, Raymond Radiguet (1928); François Mauriac, Le Roman (1928); Lawrence Leighton, "An Autopsy and a Prescription," Hound and Horn, July-September, 1932, pp. 533-539.

H. M. C.

Rakić, Milan (1876-1938, Serb poet), born in Belgrade, was a son of the writer Mita Rakić, author of an excellent translation of Victor Hugo's Les Misérables. He studied law at the University of Paris, where he also added greatly to his knowledge of French literature. In 1904 he entered the foreign service, which led him to South Serbia and Salonika, then under Turkish rule, and later to Bucharest, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Sofia, Rome, and Paris. Rakić began his literary activity by translating the poetry of Victor Hugo and Verlaine (q.v.), as well as short pieces from Renan (q.v.), but already in 1902 his first original poems had been published. In 1904 appeared his first book, Pesme (Poems), and in 1912 Nove pesme (New Poems). His entire poetic work was collected in 1922.

Rakić wrote little, a total of some 50 poems, but each one is an artistic achievement. An ardent devotee of Parnassian poetry, he tried to express in harmonious form the sentiment of a heart longing for beauty and alarmed at the inevitability and implacability of fate. His manner of expression is profoundly emotional and personal, but at the same time humanly general. Rakić is a pessimist, to whom life is a burden and an anguish without recognition and without reward, but who believes dignity requires us to bear all, serenely and stoically, with proud resignation.

During his service in South Serbia, in a region the scene of important national historical events, Rakić created a series of poems of patriotic inspiration. His patriotism is un-rhetorical, discreet, vibrant, and moving; he inaugurated a significant revival of Serbian patriotic poetry. An extensive musical culture contributed to his success; the rhythm and sonority of his verse are incomparable. Many modern Serbian poets have been attracted both by the spirit and the form of his writing; he has become a model for 20th-century lyric poetry in his own country.

See: J. Skerlić, Pisci i knjige, Vols. V (1911), VI (1913); B. Lazarević, "Versifikacija Milana Rakica," in Impresije iz književnosti, Vol. II (1924); Srpski književni glasnik, July 16-August 1, 1938 (number dedicated to Rakić on the occasion of his death).

P. A.

Ramada Curto, Amilcar da Silva (1886-, Portuguese playwright), lives in Lisbon. Whatever his ambitions may be, he hides them behind a cloak of ironical conceit, resigning himself to the lowly station of an "amateur in belles-lettres."

Since 1916, and especially since 1930, a considerable number of plays have appeared under his name, tragedies and comedies which do not pretend to be anything but honest character studies without frills. Passionate, hopeless love, the traditional Portuguese theme, is a favorite with Ramado Curto. He makes it live in the figures of demonic women who snare helpless puppets of men, but are themselves marionettes in the hands of an unfeeling deity. Such are the sinister Maria in Demónio (1930; Demon), the flippant Terezinha in A boneca e os fantoches (1930; The Doll and the Puppets), and the fatal Laura in O sapo e a doninha (1930; The Toad and the Weasel). The last play, a charming, melancholy idyl, follows the bucolic tradition as it had been revived in the country tales of Almeida-Garrett and Júlio Diniz. Although Ramada Curto does not innovate, he shows courage when, in a country saturated with the glories of the past and in an age of robots, he conceives strong characters and passions without recourse to history.

Besides a dozen or more plays of varying worth, Ramada Curto has published thus far one novel, Do diário de José Maria (1942; From Joseph Mary's Diary).

G. M. M.

Ramalho Ortigão, José Duarte (1837-1915, Portuguese prose writer), was born in Oporto. The son of a professor, he followed the same career, combining it with journalism, criticism, and literature. In 1866, while editor of the Jornal do Pôrto (Oporto Journal), he took part in the polemic between the post-romantics and the realists which was known as the "Coimbra question" (see Portuguese literature). Despite his judicial attitude, the criticism he leveled at Antero de Quental (q.v.) in his brochure A literatura de hoje (Today's Literature) provoked a duel between the two in which Ramalho was slightly wounded. Later he joined the reform group, and in collaboration with one of its distinguished members, the novelist Eça de Queiroz (q.v.), he composed a detective novel in the form of letters to the Diário de notícias (Daily News)—Um mistério na estrada de Cintra (1870; A Mystery on the Cintra Road)—which caused a sensation since the public believed it dealt with a real happening. The same year his collection of short stories, Histórias côr de rosa (Rosy Stories), appeared.

But Ramalho's true literary value found expression in his journalistic work and travel books rather than in fiction. Once more associated with Eça de Queiroz, he began, in 1871, the publication of a monthly journal, As farpas (The Darts), which continued at intervals until 1883 and which was to exert an important influence on Portuguese realism. It has been asserted that As farpas had its origin in the Guêpes of Alphonse Karr, but it must be added that its character is different and richer and its scope much more comprehensive. The journal combined the delicate irony of Eça—whose collaboration continued until 1872—with the balanced, serene, and faithfully didactic spirit of Ramalho. Devoted to elegance and hygiene, both physical and spiritual, Ramalho produced a useful and methodical work of healthful popularization and social education in As farpas. With a pleasing encyclopedism the studious Ramalho, eager to teach and reform, treated the most varied subjects, science, politics, literature, in a limpid and flexible style, characterized by ample and delicately ironical sentences. His clear and incisive pen, with a sensible didactic intention, satirizes weaknesses and shortcomings of Portuguese life. The serene balance of his faculties, his artistic good sense, and his spiritual elegance established a tribunal in As farpas from which the ideas of the Generation of Coimbra were disseminated. Positivism, determinism, humanitarianism, moral secularism, faith in science, and aesthetic realism were presented in its pages with great coherence. The success of As farpas established a "school" which resulted in continuations or imitations, the most significant of which was Os gatos (The Cats) of Fialho de Almeida (q.v.). Os gatos, however, had a very different character, in which defamatory sarcasm was exaggerated.

In the other aspect of his work, travel literature, Ramalho's attitude is not that of the simple observer of beauty who passes on his aesthetic impressions. A product of his period, he imparts scientific importance and practical usefulness to this literature. His aim is to compare societies, draw conclusions, and apply them to the betterment of countries. A Holanda (1883; Holland) has this purpose. In an account characterized by great descriptive briskness, indicative of searching powers of observation, he gives us a social and historical study of that country, focused always on comparisons with Portugal. It is Holland and not France that Portugal should observe, since that country represents the solution of a problem more like her own in every respect than that of the great Gallic nation. The book enjoyed a wide acceptance and has remained a model of this type of literature. In 1887 John Bull was published. It does not attain the level of excellence of A Holanda, either in the system followed or in the attitude; with its Anglophobia, inherited from Herculano and common to the whole realistic generation, it is manifestly hostile to the milieu described. Ultimas farpas (1910-1915; Last Darts) is also clearly inferior to the early work. The spiritual and literary personality of Ramalho—progressive and reforming—left a mark of constructive elegance in Portuguese criticism and journalism of the period.

See: Maria A. Vaz de Carvalho, Alguns homens do meu tempo (1889), pp. 37-106; J. M. Eça de Queiroz, Notas contemporâneas (1909), pp. 27-54; Ricardo Jorge, Ramalho Ortigão (1915).

E. G. D.

Ramuz, Charles Ferdinand (1878-, Swiss novelist), was born at Cully, a small town on Lake Geneva in the canton of Vaud. After completing his studies at the University of Lausanne, he went to Paris where, from 1902 to 1914, he lived in obscurity, known only to a small group of friends and admirers. The books written by him at that time, four volumes of poetry in addition to eight novels and two collections of short stories, failed to attract attention outside his immediate circle. Longing for an atmosphere truly congenial to his artistic temperament, Ramuz decided to go back to his native Cully. This proved to be a momentous step in his life. As he explained in "Raison d'être," published in 1914 in the Cahiers vaudois, he now had a clear conception of his purpose as a writer. He at once embarked on what was to be a long and highly successful career.

The 20-odd volumes of fiction written by Ramuz since 1914 contain a searching analysis of the primitive emotions which give the life of the simple folk of his canton its distinctive tonality. Peasants, winegrowers, small craftsmen, and fishermen live again vividly before the eyes of the reader. To mention only the most noteworthy of his books, La Guérison des maladies (1917), Le Règne de l'esprit malin (1917; Eng. tr., The Reign of the Evil One, 1922), Les Signes parmi nous (1919), Salutation paysanne (1921), Présence de la mort (1922; Eng. tr., The End of All Men, 1944), Joie dans le ciel (1925), La Grande Peur dans la montagne (1926), La Beauté sur la terre (1927; Eng. tr., Beauty on Earth, 1929), and Derborence (1935), all very clearly show with what consummate skill he has succeeded in emancipating himself from bookish influences and in merging his personality with that of his characters. His style reveals a remarkable degree of independence from the commonly accepted standards of literary excellence. He readily concedes the presence of regional peculiarities of language in his novels. He also agrees that his word order is often logical rather than grammatical. As critics have pointed out, the rhythm and phrasing of his sentences show not only the influence of the spiritual climate, but even of the geographical features of the canton of Vaud. These varied features make of Ramuz one of the most fascinating figures in contemporary French literature.

See: "Pour ou contre C.-F. Ramuz," Cahiers de la quinzaine, XVII (1926), 9-312; Emmanuel Buenzod, C.-F. Ramuz (1928); Gertrud Brandner, C. F. Ramuz, der Dichter des Waadtlandes; ein Beitrag zur Literaturgeschichte der französischen Schweiz (1938).

J. M. C.

Rapisardi, Mario (1844-1912, Italian poet), is Italy's outstanding contribution to the satanic school of poetry, outstanding for the quantity of his verses if not for the quality. He was born in Catania and taught at its university until his death. If we disregard the poems of his early youth, which he himself rejected, Rapisardi's first production was Palingenesi (1868), an epic poem wherein, in keeping with the anticlericalism then current in his country, a religious reform is propounded. Here at the very outset Rapisardi places his art at the service of an ideal. To this practice he adhered all his life. It may have been choice, but one cannot help feeling that for Rapisardi it was a necessity. His vast power of expression could not find adequate scope in his own inward experiences, the paucity of which is further indicated by his labors as a translator (he translated Lucretius, Horace, Catullus, and Shelley's Prometheus Unbound) and is borne out by his entire production. Hence the necessity of his looking outside for a peg, as it were, on which to hang a poem—religious reform first, then Darwinism, atheism, socialism, all of which remain mere schematisms which Rapisardi fills in out of the abundance of his vocabulary, reminiscences, and versifying skill.

Today he is remembered chiefly for his polemic (1881) with Carducci (q.v.), from which neither his equanimity nor his reputation ever quite recovered. This polemic came on the heels of his Lucifero (1877), a miserably conceived epic poem in which fustian, scurrility, blasphemy, and lewdness, compounded with all the commonplaces of Italian poetry and prosody, conspire to move the reader to nausea or, if he is struck by the ludicrous in the author's high pretensions and his performance, to laughter. And to laughter it moved many of his contemporaries, aided and abetted by the parodies it occasioned. Rapisardi, whose vanity, egotism, and self-bestowed role of exalted bard of the new era of universal peace, love, justice, and godlessness could not admit of the slightest sense of humor, became very bitter, but did not relent. Striking the gladiatorial pose best indicated to show to advantage his flowing locks, broad brow, and large, dreamy eyes, he kept open the floodgates of his declamation to give two more epic poems, Giobbe (1884) and Atlantide (1894). Neither of these did much to dispel the mistaken but widespread belief that the epic was a thing of the past, or to alter the equally widespread conviction that Rapisardi was no epic poet. But is he a poet at all? He is, but only in those rare moments when an inward feeling of wonder, bewilderment, sympathy, or yearning steals into his consciousness and so fills it as to preclude his lapsing into posturing, bombast, or ear-tickling sonorities. These poetical moments are to be found in his shorter lyrics, notably among his Poesie religiose (1887), and in several of his Poemeti (1885-1907).

See: N. Vaccalluzzo, Mario Rapisardi; raccolta di poesie scelte con introduzione e commento (1930); N. Cappellani, Mario Rapisardi (1931).

S. E. S.

Raynal, Paul (1890-, French dramatist), born at Narbonne, studied law and passed eventually from jurisprudence to literature. He submitted his first play, Le Maître de son cœur, to the Odéon theatre in 1913. But the First World War intervened. The play was laid away and was not produced until 1920, when it was acclaimed a masterpiece of psychological insight, a penetrating analysis of the conflict between love and friendship. In the minds of admiring critics it recalled the art of Racine, Musset, Cúrel (q.v.).

The drama of Paul Raynal has, in fact, become identified with that trend in the post-war theatre in France which drew its inspiration from the classic tradition, from Racine and, especially, Corneille. It is characterized by psychological profundity and moral nobility, by a mood of the tragic and the heroic, two of the essential traits of French tragedy. Raynal had joined his regiment as a simple soldier in 1914. When he came back, four years later, he gave expression to the sufferings and heroisms of all its known and unknown soldiers in his next play, Le Tombeau sous l'Arc de Triomphe (1924; Eng. tr., The Unknown Warrior, 1928). The drama portrays symbolically the conflict between the desire for peace and its pleasing amenities, on one side, and the tragic call of sacrifice, which is the price of such peace, on the other. It was bitterly assailed and fanatically defended. It has ended by being generally accepted as a masterpiece of the literature inspired by the tragedy of war.

In Au soleil de l'instinct (1932) Raynal returned to the vein of his first psychological drama, and in La Francerie (1933) to the theme of war, stressing the epic side of it, however, and striking a note of hope for reconciliation among nations. Epic and psychological traits were combined in his portrait of the French emperor, Napoléon unique (1936). The lofty nature of Raynal's dramatic talent is strikingly illustrated in his later play, A souffert sous Ponce Pilate (1939). Probing the motif for Judas Iscariot's betrayal, he ascribes it not to evil intent but to the disciple's naïveté and limited understanding and less to lack of love than to little faith. The symbol of charity is raised here to the level of the divine.

The art of Raynal stands out for its sumptuous lyric and tragic qualities. He achieves dramatic intensity and the color, the passion, and the movement of life, as in classical tragedy, by virtue of an elevated style which is oratorical but not declamatory, poetic and musical but withal precise, clear, and exact. He drains the complex human passions—love, hate, honor, vengeance, sacrifice—of the dross that collects in them in the maelstrom of daily reality, purifies and lifts them to an exalted mood, and molds through them characters of a heroic stature. He is one of the outstanding dramatists of his generation in France.

See: E. Sée, Le Théâtre français contemporain (1928), pp. 72, 157-162; H. M. and A. J. Dickman, "Paul Raynal, Cornelian and Symbolical Theatre—A Critical Essay," University of Wyoming Publications, IV (1938), 45-57; K. Wais, "Paul Raynal und die Schöpfung des französischen Kriegsdramas," Dichtung und Volkstum, XXXIX (1938), 168-179.

S. A. R.

Régnier, Henri François Joseph de (1864-1936, French poet, novelist, and critic), was born at Honfleur in Normandy, of the lesser French nobility. His paternal ancestors, military men, came from Picardy. Literary inheritance seems to descend from the maternal forebears, Burgundian judges, scholars, men and women writers. Régnier's novel Les Vacances d'un jeune homme sage (1903) vividly presents his maternal uncle, a genealogist, who interested him in heraldry (this feature appears in his symbolist poetry). The poet's ancestors are important in his memoirs and novels. His genealogical studies resulted in certain occult and atavistic theories, coloring the novels, making the past and memory outstanding elements of his poetry. In the novel Le Passé vivant (1905) the descendants are under fatalistic compulsion, through the survival of mystic forces forming the tissue of their beings, to repeat or be influenced by the destinies of the ancestors living in them. In 1879 Henri wrote his first verses, confiscated by an uncomprehending professor. His friend, the American-born Francis Vielé-Griffin (q.v.), another second-generation symbolist, founded the Entretiens politiques et littéraires, to which Régnier contributed. A slender volume, Les Lendemain (1885), was published by Vanier, the symbolists' editor. Régnier contributed to various little reviews of the period, including Lutèce (1885). The pseudonym Hugues Vignix reveals his admiration for Hugo and Vigny, but his early poems indicate especially a Parnassian influence. Sully-Prudhomme and Leconte de Lisle (qq.v.) were his first great literary acquaintances.

In Poèmes anciens et romanesques (1890) Régnier first manifested the distinctive poetic personality which flowered in Tel qu'en songe (1892), Aréthuse (1895), and Les Jeux rustiques et divins (1897). The last contains the gently crepuscular, sensitive lyrics called "odelettes," an original form, not similar to those of Ronsard or Banville (q.v.). He now uses vers libre, rhymed at will or assonanced. The uneven meters, nuances, and wistful musicality of a Verlaine (q.v.) are evident, but Régnier's rhythms have a longer flow, his harmonies and art of suggestion are more subtle. There is sumptuous decorativeness and the sadness of a pagan regretting the evanescence of beauty as he clings to memory. His favorite words are or and mort. He uses all the devices—swans, philtres, enchanted forests, and dream cities—inherited by his great symbolistic predecessors from Wagner. The poem "Le Vase" shows how far he has come from the Parnassians' motionless, chiseled poems of similar title. This remarkable poem, revealing the successive states of an artist while creating, has constant motion. Régnier's sensuousness of sound, perfume, color, and form recalls the "Après-Midi d'un faune" of Stéphane Mallarmé (q.v.). Several of Régnier's articles give tribute to that master whose salon he devotedly frequented for years.

Though Régnier's work reveals multiple influences and an eclectic character, he achieves a synthesis that justifies his place as representative symbolist. His importance was officially recognized when he was elected to the French Academy in 1912, but before he had achieved this honor, he had at times veered toward the classic form and given proof of abilities in traditional versification. Les Médailles d'argile (1900) was dedicated to André Chénier, as its bucolic tendencies and ancient verses on new themes justified. Here the sonnets also have a touch of the work of José Maria de Heredia (q.v.). In 1896 Henri de Régnier married a daughter of Heredia, Marie, who wrote under the pseudonym Gérard d'Houville (q.v.).

Versailles, presented as a decorative city of dreamy silence, in its crystallized beauty preserving the past, our only permanence in an ever changing world, is the subject of La Cité des eaux (1902). The poet's return to alexandrines and description, said to be an Heredia influence and a bid for Academy election, is more likely a lessening of lyric adolescent revery and originality, a normal growing into maturity's greater realism, a descent from the ivory tower to which his sensitive, haughty soul, wounded by life's imperfection, had retired. His poems, in the works just mentioned and later in La Sandale ailée (1906; Eng. tr., Poems from The Winged Sandal, 1933), Vestigia Flammae (1920), and Flamma tenax (1922–28), retain their musical fluidity. There is a tendency to direct expression of sentiments and to less décor, but even here the delicately suggestive symbolistic "odelettes" appear.

The prose vein begins with Contes à soi-même (1893), symbolic stories with preciousness of style. The first and best-known full-length novel by Régnier, La Double Maîtresse (1900), despite its 18th-century setting is said to be the first Freudian novel and thus the precursor of a whole new literature. The main character, among a numerous Dickensian array, suffers from a fixation causing a lifetime of repression. Other novels in 17th and 18th-century style, Le Bon Plaisir (1902) and Les Rencontres de M. de Bréot (1904; Eng. tr., The Libertines, 1929), possess a libertine flavor realistically faithful to the times evoked. However, le comte de Mun, on receiving Henri de Régnier into the Academy, reproached him for their "art for art" realism—and for a lack of moral responsibility towards his readers. Le Mariage de minuit (1903) is a beautifully moving, refined modern novel of moral idealism. Its comte de Serpigny portrays the eccentric poet, le comte de Montesquiou-Fézensac, with whom Régnier duelled in 1897. This novel contains reminiscences of Régnier's American tour (1900), as does L'Amphisbène (1912), which also recounts a Mediterranean cruise, described autobiographically in Escales en Méditerranée (1931). To a lover of the picturesque past, no city could be more poetic than Venice. Certain of Régnier's modern novels unfold there. Les Esquisses vénitiennes (1906) resulted from his visits to Venice; L'Altana, ou la Vie vénitienne (2 vols., 1928) relates 25 years of his wanderings about its familiar streets, canals, gardens, and palaces.

As a critic Régnier contributed to the little reviews and to the Mercure de France, Figaro, and Journal des débats. In his later years he edited the Roman littéraire, publishing works by younger writers. Using his memory for things historical, Régnier employs frequent analogies from the past in his criticism. The articles collected in Figures et caractères (1901) and Sujets et paysages (1906) show the same amused irony present in his novels. Nos Rencontres (1931) and De mon temps (1933), devoted more to personal memoirs and anecdotes of contemporaries, have less criticism of a man's work, but much deftly delineated portraiture.

See: J. de Gourmont, Henri de Régnier et son œuvre (1908); H. Berton, Henri de Régnier, le poète et le romancier (1910); A. Lowell, Six French Poets (1915); R. Honnert, Henri de Régnier; son œuvre (1923).

M. C. M.

Reina y Montilla, Manuel (1856–1905, Spanish poet and politician), was born in Puente Genil, Córdoba. A lawyer by profession, he practiced in Seville, Granada, and Madrid. In politics he was a constitutional monarchist, associated with the liberal party of Sagasta and later with the conservative Maura. Although economically comfortable, he interested himself in the underprivileged, and in Parliament he promoted legislation in behalf of the Spanish wage earners and for the protection of children.

His first verses appeared in Epoca and Ilustración española y americana. In 1877 Andantes y alegros was published, and Cromos y acuarelas followed in 1888. His best work is El jardín de los poetas (1899), in which he interprets and pays homage to the great poetic figures of the world, from Homer to Spain's Espronceda. La vida inquieta (1894) attracted attention because it was published with a prologue by Núñez de Arce (q.v.), who presumably influenced Reina.

Reina's poetic qualities may be inferred from the titles of his works—musicality, color, imagery, and emotion. These together with his metrical dexterity, richness of diction, and avoidance of academic molds place him somewhere between his contemporaries and the poets of the following generation. Critics have been fairly unanimous in bestowing praise on this quietly personal and pleasantly independent poet.

See: E. de Ory, Manuel Reina (n.d.).

H. C. B.

Rejment, Władysław Stanisław, see Reymont.

Remarque, Erich Maria (1898–, German novelist), gained world-wide fame with his war novel Im Westen nichts Neues (1929; Eng. tr., All Quiet on the Western Front, 1929). He was born the son of a bookbinder in Osnabrück and attended the Gymnasium of his home town. He served and was wounded in the First World War. Later he tried his hand at several professions, finally becoming the editor of a sports journal. When in this position he wrote his famous novel in which he claimed to be the spokesman of "a generation that was destroyed by war, even though it might have escaped its shells." This must be accepted with reserve, for evidence shows (see Flex and Dwinger) that the heroes of Remarque are not representative of a whole generation but only of a certain type. Of this type, however, the novel is an authentic record, and it has literary merit. Remarque knows how to draw characters and situations; he engages attention and arouses sympathy. His language is versatile and concise, rich in contrast and interspersed with pertinent reflections. His composition is based upon excellent stage technique. Lyric and idyllic scenes alternate with the coarsest and most lurid realism. The intricate problems of life and of the war are reduced to plain propositions that the poorest in spirit can grasp. Just at the most favorable psychological moment, when Arnold Zweig (q.v.) and Georg von der Vring (the latter with his fine war novel Soldat Suhren; Eng. tr., Private Suhren, 1928) had broken the ice and the universal anti-war sentiment had reached its climax, the story gave eloquent expression to the cry "No more war!" As an ethical document it is not without flaws. It shows adolescent immaturity and, through omissions and through generalizations implied by individual incidents, a partial and narrow outlook.

The fate of the surviving heroes in the chaotic time after the war is told in Der Weg zurück (1931; Eng. tr., The Road Back, 1931). This novel falls far short of its predecessor, though it has narrative interest. In 1932 Remarque went to live in Switzerland, and in 1939 he came to the United States.

Other successes of his were Three Comrades (1937); Flotsam (1941), the story of European refugees fleeing from the Gestapo; and Arch of Triumph (1946).

See: W. K. Pfeiler, War and the German Mind (1941), pp. 140-144.

W. K. P.

Remizov, Aleksei Mikhailovich (1877-, Russian poet and novelist), was born in Moscow into an old merchant family. He received a religious upbringing and in his childhood and youth visited many monasteries. After graduating from the Alexandrovsk Commercial School, he enrolled in the faculty of natural sciences at the University of Moscow. Later he was expelled for political activity and spent several years in exile; he was sent to various provinces, including some very remote corners of Russia. His writings began to be published in 1902, predominately in symbolist periodicals. In 1904 Remizov was freed from police surveillance and permitted to settle in St. Petersburg, where he lived until 1921. At that time he emigrated, first to Germany, then to Paris. His first book appeared in 1907.

Remizov's own philosophical outlook plays an important role in his works. The religious-ethical problem is fundamental for him. He depicts the world as a domain of evil spirits, in which the guiding force is a blind and irrational fate. His tales reflect his own youthful experiences which he represents in images of brutality and fantastic monstrosities. His first novel, Prud (1907; The Pond), displays in its bestial nightmares Remizov's revulsion to city life. Many of his works, Chasy (1904; Eng. tr., The Clock, 1942), Neugomonny buben (1909; The Unhushable Tambourine), Pyataya yazva (1912; Eng. tr., The Fifth Pestilence, 1927), reflect his negative reaction to the life of the provincial towns of Russia. Remizov's aversion to the urbanization of Russia is seen in his Krestovye Syostry (1910; Sisters of the Cross) and Slovo o pogibeli zemli Russkoi (1917; Lament for the Ruin of Russia), and he blames the Westernizing process begun by Peter for Russia's afflictions.

Although Remizov has not been a popular writer, his works, both in their peculiar peasant style of narration—the skaz—and in content, have greatly influenced Russian fiction, particularly that of the postrevolutionary period. The works of such authors as Zamyatin (q.v.), Rukavishnikov, Pilnyak (q.v.), and Bulgakov (q.v.) bear his mark. His own works link him with Gogol and Dostoevski (q.v.), and stylistically Remizov is close to Leskov.

See: K. Chukovski, Psikhologicheskiye motivy v tvorchestve A. Remizova (1922); D. A. Gorbov, "Mertvaya krasota i zhivucheye bezobraziye," Krasnaya nov, 1926, No. 7; D. S. Mirsky, Contemporary Russian Literature (1926).

O. M.

Renan, Ernest (1823-1892, French historian and critic), born at Tréguier in Brittany, was intended by a pious mother for the priesthood; he spent long periods of his maturity in the Holy Land, but chiefly in order to examine with a historian's eye the physical setting of a faith which he had determined as he came of age to study scientifically. For most of his life he was a resident of Paris. He had gone there in 1838 to prepare for the great Seminary of Saint-Sulpice, from which he definitely withdrew in 1845; he had been a brilliant and not docile pupil. He turned scholar and teacher and began to write for the Revue des deux mondes and the Journal des débats with an early developed charm of style which, in a variety of books, was to hold the attention of tout Paris for decades. As a Semitist he was appointed to a chair at the Collège de France (1862), gave one lecture, and so offended orthodoxy that the course was stopped and the professor removed; in 1870 the new provisional government restored Renan to his position, and he subsequently (1883) was made director of the famous center of learning. The scandal of 1862 was principally about a reference, in Renan's introductory discourse, to Jesus as an "incomparable man" (not necessarily, for historians, divine); in 1863 was published his most widely known book, the Vie de Jésus (Eng. tr., 1863), of which 60,000 copies were bought by an excited public in less than six months and which was attacked by more than 300 different pamphlets in the first three months. Renan was elected to the French Academy in 1878. His outstanding contributions as historian are the Histoire des origines du christianisme (1863-1883, including the Vie de Jésus; Eng. tr., 1888-1890) and the related Histoire de peuple d'Israël (1887-1893; Eng. tr., 1888-1891, 1895). In his later years his reputation was European. He relaxed by composing Dialogues et fragments philosophiques (1876; Eng. tr., 1883) and Drames philosophiques (1888; Eng. tr., The Abbess of Jouarre, 1888; Priest of Nemi, 1895; Caliban, 1896). Many of the ideas developed in Renan's subsequent writings are in his basic L'Avenir de la science; pensées de 1848, which was not actually published until 1890 (Eng. tr., 1891). The posthumous Essai psychologique sur Jésus Christ (1921, written 1845) shows a moralist who was to be as fascinated all his life by essential problems of human nature as were Sainte-Beuve and Taine (q.v.)—and this may be the most durable feature of all his works.

Renan said his own ethnic formula would be "a Celt, mixed with a Gascon [his maternal grandfather], with a mongrel dash of Laplander." There is occasional whimsicality allied to much poetry in the enthusiasms and intuitions of this man, most of whose life was given to austere labors of erudition (the total number of his books and articles is 1039), who kept from his early training something of the sacerdotal and who is charged with having become near the end a dilettante, an intellectual voluptuary, an enchanter particularly dangerous to youth. William James, less Celtic, no Gascon, and not flippant, speaks of later days of "sweet decay."

Renan greatly affected literary criticism even though not much of his own writing deals with belles-lettres. Anatole France often composes pieces in a Renan manner, showing, the unfriendly would say, how the manner may be used perversely. Renan is relativistic, devoted to history as newly conceived in the 19th century, enthusiastic about new developments in science and a close friend of the great chemist Berthelot, a disciple of Hegel and an advocate of the doctrine of "becoming" as opposed to "being"—or to go much further back he is definitely Heraclitean rather than Eleatic. One must respect the infinite variety of points of view, expect change, and not believe consistency necessarily a virtue. The essence of criticism, he said, is to enter into modes of life different from our own. He made a study of Galilee as a sort of fifth Gospel, to help understand in their setting the first four. He was tempted, he admits in the widely read and engaging Souvenirs d'enfance et de jeunesse (1883; Eng. tr., Recollections of My Youth, 1883), always to be of the opinion of his interlocutor. A youthful, fragmentary, somewhat autobiographical novel, Patrice (written 1849, published 1908), contains, in a more emphatic style than Renan later approved of, good examples of his critical mind at work. He talked of polychrome printing where varieties of delicate distinctions would be indicated by differences in amount and color of ink. The pages which constitute the famous Prayer at the Acropolis (Souvenirs) are an excellent specimen of his consummate art and delight in nuances (a key word with Renan); it is here he says that to hate nothing, to love nothing, absolutely, is the part of wisdom. Recent studies of Renan have helped to show underneath the tolerance that may seem to approach flippancy what it is more fair to call an admirable intellectual hospitality and the deep seriousness of a man all his life under the influence of the Church which shaped his early years.

See: L. F. Mott, Ernest Renan (1921, in English); J. Pommier, Renan (1923); P. Lasserre, Renan et nous (1923) and La Jeunesse de Renan (1925-1932); H. Psichari, Renan d'après lui-même (1937).

H. S.

Renard, Jules (1864-1910, French novelist, playwright, and essayist), was born at Châlons, Mayenne. His father, a contractor, was of peasant stock, and his mother was a somewhat harsh and ill-tempered woman. Two years after his birth the family moved to Chitry-les-Mines in Nièvre. He began his secondary education at Nevers, planned to enter the famous Ecole Normale Supérieure of Paris, and was sent to Paris for further preparation at the Lycée Charlemagne. But he began to visit literary cafés and felt drawn toward writing. After military service he returned to Paris to a modest job, lived simply, and in 1888 married. From this time onward his bourgeois and disciplined existence was dedicated entirely to his family and to writing.

He helped launch the new Mercure de France in 1890, contributed critical articles and stories to this review, was noticed by the symbolists (see French symbolism). Encouraged by Alphonse Daudet (q.v.) and Jean Richepin (q.v.), he wrote for the humorous periodicals Rire and Gil Blas and for important newspapers, Echo de Paris, Journal, and Figaro. Among his novels, short stories, and essays are Crime de village (1888); Sourires pincés (1890); L'Ecornifleur (1892), which is his masterpiece; Coquecigrües (1893); La Lanterne sourde (1893); Le Coureur de filles (1894); Le Vigneron dans sa vigne (1894); Poil de Carotte (1894), which depicts a child drudge effectively if with less originality and less color than Jacques Vingtras by Jules Vallès (q.v.); Histoires naturelles (1896); La Maîtresse (1896); Bucoliques (1898); Les Philippe (1907); Nos Frères farouches (1908); Ragotte (1908). For these numerous productions Renard found his inspiration in the rustic mœurs of Nivernais, his home country, and in the intellectual milieu of the Left Bank of Paris. He was at the same time becoming a writer for the stage who frequented the Paris boulevards and developed friendships with Edmond Rostand (q.v.), Lucien Guitry, and Marthe Brandès. He composed in succession La Demande (1895); Le Plaisir de rompre (1898); Le Pain de ménage (1899); the play Poil de Carotte (1900), which continues to be presented successfully at the Comédie Française; Monsieur Vernet (1903); and La Bigote (1909), which is a caricature of his own mother. In 1907, through the militant friendship of Lucien Descaves (q.v.), he became a member of the Goncourt Academy. But he had kept in touch with the peasant life of Nivernais and had engaged in local politics there. An admirer of Claude Tillier, Victor Hugo, Michelet, and Jaurès, he was if not an ardent socialist at least a very warm believer in the republicanism and the lay movement of the provinces, and he showed the sincerity, the narrow-mindedness, and the stubbornness so likely to accompany these ideas. He took very seriously his responsibilities as mayor of Chitry which began in 1904. It is in this village that he was buried, with a civil ceremony, after his death in Paris, May 22, 1910.

The work of Jules Renard is a faithful reflection of his own life and personality. There are episodes of his childhood in Poil de Carotte, La Bigote, Crime de village; recollections of his sentimental and laborious youth in Paris in L'Ecornifleur, La Maîtresse, Le Plaisir de rompre; pictures of his peaceful bourgeois life in Le Pain de ménage. As for his more intimate nature—he was in turn complex and merely commonplace, cynical and naïve—this is revealed in his Journal (1925–1927), a posthumous publication of the highest interest for the historian of modern literature in France. Except for a particularly morose and often affected pessimism, which resulted in an abundance of acid comment, his works show no philosophical preoccupation. “I snap my fingers at guiding principles, moral problems, metaphysical fogs. I prefer to a beautiful book a beautiful page and to a beautiful page a beautiful sentence.” As a matter of fact his style, which is so deliberate as sometimes to be tense, has been praised for its classical qualities—exactness, sobriety, density, relentlessly minute realism. But he hardly achieves rhythm or movement and certainly not that deep humanity which constitutes the essential contribution of great French writers. One may accept the remark made by André Gide (q.v.) concerning the work of Renard: “Not a river, but a distillery.”

See: Henri Bachelin, Jules Renard, 1864–1910; son œuvre (1930); Léon Guichard, L'Œuvre et l'âme de Jules Renard (1935).

G. G.

Renn, Ludwig, (pseud. of Arnold Friedrich Vieth von Golssenau, 1889–, German novelist), born in Dresden, scion of an old and noble family, has Irish and Russian ancestors. Following tradition, he became an officer in 1911 and saw combat and staff service in the First World War. Changed in his whole outlook by the experiences of war, especially after he had “ceased to drink,” Renn began to write, in a factual style especially influenced by the travel books of Sven Hedin. After the war he turned to the political left and became a Communist. He studied at the universities of Göttingen, Munich, and Vienna and undertook extensive trips through the Mediterranean lands and Russia.

His fame rests on his first novel, Krieg (1928; Eng. tr., War, 1929), one of the few great books that came out of the First World War. It presents a simple factual acceptance of the war per se, with a minimum of reflection, sentiment, and didacticism, and as such is a more powerful indictment than any elaborate harangue could be. Wealth of individual experience, rigid discipline in the giving of facts, determined sifting of material, and concentration on the essentials make Krieg a true epic of the soldier of the front. The style of Renn is terse, graphic, and clear, revealing a complete mastery of his subject, a mastery which makes the effort of Remarque (q.v.) seem puny. Pertinent criticism of the conditions of military life is tempered by an insight into general human weakness, and the distribution of light and shadow is done with fairness and objectivity. The narrative gives in concise delineation the war experience of a straightforward, sympathetic character, and it is to be regretted that political bias and thoughtless criticism have caused wholly incorrect evaluations of Renn's book in Germany and abroad.

In his later works Renn was less successful. Nachkrieg (1930; Eng. tr., After War, 1931) gives a picture of the hopeless mess of contradictory and aimless political strife in the Weimar Republic. He did not succeed in integrating the huge amount of material. A later volume, Russland fahrten (1932), tells of his travels and impressions in Russia. Jailed for several years after Hitler's ascent to power, Renn escaped to Switzerland in 1936, where he wrote Vor grossen Wandlungen (1936; Eng. tr., Death without Battle, 1937). He took a prominent part in the Spanish civil war, after which he lived in France, writing the treatise Warfare: The Relation of War to Society (1939). He now lives in Mexico, where he published his valuable autobiographic novel Adel im Untergang (1944).

See: "Ludwig Renn, Germany's Proletarian Novelist," Living Age, CCCXLIII (1933), 509-512; W. K. Pfeiler, War and the German Mind (1941), pp. 150-164.

W. K. P.

Retté, Adolphe (1863-1930, French poet and religious writer), was born in Paris. His early childhood was spent in Belgium at the home of his maternal grandfather, Professor Borgnet, an eminent historian at the University of Liège. Retté's mother was a talented musician, and from her he seems to have inherited a sensitive and somewhat unstable nature. After a few unhappy years at a Protestant school at Montbéliard, Retté served in the French cavalry for six years. Then, settling in Paris in 1886, he became intensely interested in symbolism; two volumes of poetry, Cloches en la nuit (1889) and Une Belle Dame passa (1893), were published. Both of these books reflect a strong admiration for Mallarmé and for Gustave Kahn (qq.v.). A volume of prose, of strange and hallucinating beauty, entitled Thulé des brumes (1891), is an adventure in the world of fantasy and dreams. In 1893 Retté abruptly changed his aesthetic outlook and became interested in anarchism. Violent attacks, bearing Retté's signature, against Mallarmé and against social abuses appeared every month in the magazine Plume, and Retté's new outlook is reflected in Similitudes (1895) and La Forêt bruissante (1896), both of which have a dramatic form. Meanwhile Retté had married and retired with his wife to the little village of Guermantes. Penetrated by the rural atmosphere, Retté gradually became a pantheist, producing two volumes of inspired verse, Campagne première (1897) and Lumières tranquilles (1901). The death of his wife and that of Léon Deschamps, the director of Plume, thrust Retté even more toward nature for consolation, and between 1901 and 1906 he celebrated the beauties of the Forest of Fontainebleau. In 1906 occurred his conversion to Catholicism, an event which he felt to be miraculous and which he described in Du diable à Dieu (1907). Thereafter his life was spent in the service of the Church and in the composition of pious volumes, ranging from biographies of saintly figures to personal meditations. Unhappily, in this production, he revealed neither the artistry nor the literary care of his earlier books. When he died, after six years of seclusion at Beaune, he was almost forgotten in the literary world.

See: R. de Smet, La Vie populaire d'Adolphe Retté (1933); W. K. Cornell, Adolphe Retté (1942, in English).

W. K. C.

Reverdy, Pierre (1889-, French poet), was born at Narbonne, of well-to-do parents who encouraged his desire to become a poet. After leaving the lycée in 1910, he went to Paris. There the death of his father in 1911 made him almost wholly dependent on his writing, and he began a bitter struggle to survive. Several small volumes of poetry were published, Poèmes en prose (1915), La Lucarne ovale (1916), and Quelques Poèmes (1916). Little by little his work became known till by 1917 he was director of a review, Nord-Sud, presenting the work of such men as Apollinaire, Max Jacob, André Breton, and Louis Aragon (qq.v.) and fighting for a poetry which made no pretense of reproducing reality. After the war Reverdy avoided the fascination of dada, cubism, and surrealism and continued on his own way, winning wide recognition with Les Epaves du ciel (1924), a collection of his early work, and such books of poetry as Flaques de verre (1929), Pierres blanches (1931), and Ferraille (1937). A volume of criticism, Le Gant de crin (1926), has made his purpose clear. Reverdy's eyes are fixed on a spiritual world underlying solid reality; he is the poet of the impalpable, and for him the fleeting impressions of beauty or tragedy felt by the sensitive heart as underlying the most common scenes are the true material of poetry. Gifted with a keen intuition and the ability to make the reader join with him in perceiving the most subtle analogies, Reverdy works with allusion, concentration, half statement, till his poems become almost the overheard murmurs of a mystic rapt in ecstasy. This quality has become more and more pronounced in his verse since 1926, when he returned to the Catholic faith and settled near the Benedictine abbey of Solesmes. His work has had great though indirect effect on the younger French poets, to whom in his unselfish devotion to poetry and in the artistic purity of his work he has seemed the Mallarmé (q.v.) of this generation—so much so that Soupault (q.v.), Breton, and Aragon have not hesitated to proclaim him le plus grand poète actuellement vivant.

See: Régis Michaud, Modern Thought and Literature in France (1934); Christian Sènechal, Les Grands Courants de la littérature française contemporaine (1934); G. E. Lemaître, From Cubism to Surrealism in French Literature (1941).

C. W., Jr.

Reviczky, Gyula (1855–1889, Hungarian poet and writer), was born in Vitkóc and died in Budapest. He received his secondary school education in Léva and Pozsony and attended lectures at the University of Budapest. His life is a record of human defeat. He was brought up as a motherless child; poverty, misunderstanding, loneliness, unhappy love, tuberculosis, were his experiences. By nature he was a pessimist, a singer of moods, an introvert, conditioned by a penny-pinching existence that often defied the most elementary principles of a decent livelihood. As a young man he was a tutor, later a journalist. His neo-romanticism seemed a desertion of Hungarian folkish nationalistic literary traditions, and he was therefore accused of being a cosmopolitan when he was merely an unfortunate human being with a broad outlook. He translated some of the works of Kleist and Ibsen (q.v.) into Hungarian. His best story is Apai Örökség (1884; Parental Heritage). Of his lyrical volumes Ifjuságom (1874; My Youth) should be mentioned and also Magány (1889; Solitude). His collected poems, in two volumes, appeared in 1895. He somewhat influenced Dezső Kosztolányi (q.v.) among the 20th-century Hungarian poets. A literary society in the city of Léva was named after Reviczky.

Reviczky responded to the pessimistic philosophy of Schopenhauer and to the Christian view that this world is but a vale of tears. His nostalgic poems indicated the transitional significance of short-lived illusions. The elegiac tone shows what terrible difficulties Reviczky had when he was facing the grimness of life, and yet with what tender consciousness, sometimes with what pathetic courage he tried to discharge his obligations. Irrespective of whether he wrote about Pan or some other symbol of antiquity, about contemporary themes or about themes purely personal, his feeling of loneliness was the paramount leitmotif. Because of the sentimentality and a certain platitudinous character of his poems, many of them are apt to sound only superficially reflective; and while Reviczky no doubt had an artistic control over the medium of expression, this is not sufficient to make one forget the trite features of his work. As a critic of aesthetic problems (his essays were never published in a volume) he sometimes leaned upon ideas taken from other writers, but even so these essays were essentially expressions of his own taste and views. He could write forcefully when the occasion required; his "cosmopolitanism" formulated some of his theories, but they were also based upon the anti-oratorical, anti-bombastic taste of the poet.

See: P. Koroda, Reviczky Gyula összegyűjtött művei (1895); W. Kirkconnell, The Magyar Muse; an Anthology (1933).

J. R.

Reymont or Rejment, Władysław Stanisław (1867–1925, Polish short-story writer and novelist), was born in Kobiele Wielkie, Radom district, Russian Poland, of humble parents. He was one of a family of 10 children, most of them considerably older than he. His childhood, bleak and barren of normal youthful companionship, was spent on an impoverished farm on the outskirts of a depressing village and under the domination of a stern father, who kept his son a virtual prisoner at home, and an excessively pious mother. As a boy his only solace was books, smuggled to him by an older brother who had already left home. The work which fascinated Reymont most in the orgies of reading in which he indulged was Słowacki's fanciful drama of Polish pre-history, Lilla Weneda, and especially the scene in which the blind peasant-seer Derwid, prototype of certain characters of his own in Chłopi, phrases the national faith in the lines "But even in such nations as our own defeated one, Remains a certain strength . . ." Reymont was looked upon by his parents as the black sheep of the family, and from the record of his successive failures in meeting the tests of life one cannot blame them for holding this view. Not only did he fail in his entrance examinations for the school in Łódź to which he was supposed to be sent, but later he proved unable to remain for long in any school or to keep any position whatever. Finally, a penniless vagabond, he joined a traveling theatrical company and wandered with this for more than a year over the length and breadth of Poland. At the end of this time Reymont's father secured for his son a post in a station on the Warsaw-Vienna railroad. Here Reymont steeped himself in Sienkiewicz (q.v.), especially the trilogy of historical novels, and through this, though he did not know it at the time, found not only his proper vocation in life but a master and guide.

Reymont had longed from childhood to break with his family and to fare forth alone into "the great, wide world." Finally, in the autumn of 1893, with a ruble and three kopecks in his pocket, he actually set out. The first two years of freedom were spent in Warsaw in the most bitter poverty. Gradually, however, Reymont began to get a foothold as a writer, through short stories which were published in such journals as the Cracow Myśl (Thought) and the Warsaw Prawda (Truth) of Świętochowski (q.v.). His first significant work, the first also to foreshadow its author's future mastery of the art of mass description, was Pielgrzymka do Jasnej Góry (1895; A Pilgrimage to Jasna Góra), a brilliant report of scenes Reymont had witnessed at Częstochowa, the great Polish shrine at which he had thought for a while of becoming a lay brother. In Komedjantka (1896; Eng. tr., The Comédienne, 1920), a story of a wandering theatrical troupe, Reymont again demonstrated his almost uncanny gift for mass portraiture.

Reymont arrived on the literary scene at a moment of crisis in Polish letters: the positivists (see Polish literature) were still in control, but their slogans had already begun to sound somewhat spurious, for industry, in which they had placed their whole faith, was failing, just as poetry and dreams had previously done, to emancipate the Polish people from the dual yoke of poverty and foreign rule. It is not surprising, therefore, that Reymont should have turned, like Sienkiewicz, away from industry or that he should have portrayed the factory, in Ziemia obiecana (1899; Eng. tr., The Promised Land, 1927), a story of Łódź, as the great debaser and enslaver of mankind. Reymont deplored urbanization, and it was in instinctive revolt against urbanization's rapid advance in Poland that he turned to peasant life for his themes, to produce as his masterpiece the immortal Chłopi (1902-1909; Eng. tr., The Peasants, 1924-1925). Besides being a vast naturalistic prose drama of village life, The Peasants is a veritable encyclopedia of peasant customs and prejudices. Its tone, as might be expected, is generally grim and fatalistic, yet individual scenes are memorable because of their sudden, typically Slavonic bursts of color, movement, and emotional ecstasy.

Following the completion of The Peasants, Reymont digressed from the track he had hitherto pursued, to join the ranks of the psychological novelists who were then having a great vogue in Poland. His Marzyciel (1910; The Dreamer) and Wampir (1911; The Vampire) from this period, both tales growing out of an experience with spiritualism in which Reymont had previously been involved, are decidedly inferior. They prove beyond a doubt that Reymont was great only when he remained faithful to his own genius, which was that of a reporter, not of a psychoanalyst. In Rok 1794 (1914-1919; The Year 1794), a long novel of the stirring days of the Kościuszko insurrection, he returned to his proper field, the depiction of mass drama.

In 1920 Reymont visited the United States for the purpose of raising money for Poland among the Polish populations of such cities as New York and Chicago. In 1924 he was awarded the Nobel prize in literature. He was living at this time in Poland, devoting his time to writing and to the encouragement of projects leading to the improvement of peasant life. In August, 1925, he took part in the crowning experience of his lifetime, a great folk congress held partly in his honor. Four months later, on the fifth of December, he died at his home in Warsaw.

See: J. Krzyżanowski, Władysław St. Reymont; twórca i dzieło (1937); W. Borowy, "Reymont," Slavonic Review, XVI (1937-1938), 439-448.

M. M. C.

Ribeiro, Aquilino (1885-, Portuguese novelist), has won fame as the most accomplished fiction writer in modern Portugal, both through the vigor of his style and the diversity of his subjects. He is his most original when true to the life of his native province of Beira. He was born of peasant stock, in a mountain hamlet of the "rough and ascetic" backlands. When a student he was jailed for conspiring against the monarchy, but was able to escape and to continue his studies in Lausanne and at the Sorbonne in Paris. It was perhaps in Paris that he acquired the gentle but irreverent irony recalling Anatole France (q.v.) which pervades his stories and cools the ardor of their glorification of life and love. Nevertheless he did not lose the sense of human solidarity that made him join the Seara Nova (New Crop) and devote the best of his talent to recounting the humble lives of Portuguese peasants and fishermen. After 1910 he returned to teach grammar school and administer the ecclesiastic libraries seized by the republic. In 1917 he lectured at the University of Lisbon for a while, later joining the staff of the Lisbon Public Library. Keeping faith with his republican and anticlerical convictions, he has actively opposed the Salazar regime since 1926. Returned from another exile in France (1927-1934), he now lives in Portugal.

His style already attained maturity in his first book, Jardim das tormentas (1913; Garden of Storms), 11 tales about human frailty, written from 1910 to 1912 in Paris. Four of the tales introduced the Beira peasants, their worldly priests, haughty fidalgos, and corruptible magistrates. Other regional works followed, written in a rich vernacular and narrating stories of rural passions, relieved now and then by pantheistic landscapes and the pageantry of folklore, such as Terras do demo (1917; Lands of the Demon), Andam faunos pelos bosques (1926; Fauns Roam the Woods), and the diffuse Volfrâmio (1943; Tungsten), his latest, showing how the coveted metal has furnished the Demon with a new means of corruption. Not confined to regionalism, Ribeiro knows also how to analyze modern city life, as in his successful book O homem que matou o diabo (1930; The Man Who Killed the Devil). With the same ease he writes animal stories for children, such as Romance da raposa (2 vols., 1924; Novel of the Fox), or transplants the theme of Thaïs into a Portuguese setting in S. Banaboião anacoreta e mártir (1937; Saint Banaboião, Anchorite and Martyr). With a European conscience, he registers French reactions in 1914 and German prostration in 1920. He writes biography and history; he revives glories of past and modern national literature, such as the figures of Francisco Xavier de Oliveira and Brito Camacho.

His lifework is not yet done, but already he has amply fulfilled the hopes of Carlos Malheiro Dias, who in 1913 expected the author of Jardim das tormentas to give Portugal "a regional novel swarming with all the rustic figures of Beira."

See: Wilhelm Giese, "Aquilino Ribeiro," Archiv für das Studium der neueren Sprachen und Literaturen, CLIV (1928), 259-266; Castelo Branco Chaves, Aquilino Ribeiro (1937?).

G. M. M.

Richepin, Jean (1849-1930, French poet, novelist, and dramatist), the son of an army doctor, was born in Médéa, Algeria. His early years were spent in the atmosphere of an army garrison; then followed an education in Parisian lycées, a course in medicine at Douai, and, in 1868, the Ecole Normale Supérieure, which he left in 1870 to fight in the Franco-Prussian War. A period of bohemianism ensued, during which Richepin made his headquarters in Montmartre and supported himself by desultory journalism, yielding at intervals to a passion for wandering which took him over much of Europe and during which he worked at a variety of trades, from farm hand to juggler. In these years a group formed around Richepin, including such men as Ponchon, Bouchor, Nouveau (q.v.), and even for a while Rimbaud (q.v.), calling themselves les vivants, scorning conventions, both social and literary, interested in popular poetry and folk song, and believing that the proper material for the artist was the life of the common people and that the artist's achievement could best be estimated by the extent to which he appealed to the uneducated masses.

This revolt against convention and interest in the lower classes are evident in all Richepin's early work, which began typically with Les Etapes d'un réfractaire (1872), a study of Jules Vallès (q.v.), and are particularly marked in La Chanson des gueux (1876), his most famous book. In these poems Richepin continues the portrayal of the vagabond, the gueux, which is at least as old as Villon, writing of the lives of these wanderers both in Paris and in the provinces, with an unabashed realism and a use of argot which shocked his contemporaries. He was imprisoned and fined for outrage aux mœurs, but the book's reputation, and his, was made. There can be no doubt that Richepin did a great deal to capitalize on this notoriety; his striking physique, handsome face, and grand manner, plus his attitude of romantic defiance, completely satisfied the public's notion of all that a poet should be. Richepin, a born actor, adapted himself to what was expected of him, allowing romantic speculations to spring up as to his ancestry (actually he was descended from perfectly respectable countryfolk of the Ardennes) and encouraging the legend of his vagrant nature, familiarity with the seamy side of life, and excessive virility. Les Caresses (1877), poems written in frank praise of physical love, as well as Les Morts bizarres (1876), a collection of short stories in the style of Hoffman and Poe, increased his notoriety. In the following years there was no lack of work from his pen—indeed, all his life he was constantly turning out journalistic work of some sort in addition to his more formal productions—notably La Glu (1881), a study of a female Don Juan; Miarka (1883), the story, rich in local color, of a gypsy girl growing up among townspeople in Richepin's beloved district of Thierache; Les Blasphèmes (1884), a group of strident poems proclaiming Richépin's materialism and atheism; and La Mer (1886), poetry milder in tone, finding its inspiration in the sea and in the dangerous, humble lives of its followers. At the same time a series of plays were winning him an even wider popularity, especially Le Flibustier (1888) and Le Chemineau (1897).

Richépin's personal life grew more stable as the years passed (he was received into the French Academy in 1908), and his work, though still in the main concerned with the grotesque and the abnormal, lost much of its truculent style. He continued to be prolific in prose, poetry, and the drama, but none of the work he did after the turn of the century can be considered as having added to his stature, unless it be the charming dramatization—so unexpected from Richépin—of Perrault's La Belle au bois dormant (1907). He took with grace and humor the honors with which his later days were decked.

In his own day Richépin's personal charm inevitably influenced his critics; looking back on his work at present and divorcing it from the man, one can judge more soberly. Historically there is no doubt that it is of considerable interest. Richépin's depiction of the lower classes inspired many imitators; Le Chemineau can share with Rostand's Cyrano the credit for a temporary revival of the romantic drama in verse; and much of Richépin's prose and poetry can be said to have encouraged the development of naturalism (see French naturalism). From a purely aesthetic point of view Richépin's work does not fare so well. A few of the novels, Braves Gens (1886) and Le Cadet (1890) in particular, can hold their own, and there is, no doubt, a considerable body of good poetry scattered through Richépin's plays and volumes of verse. But most of his work seems not only dated but essentially superficial. He exploited his flamboyant personality to the utmost in his work. Fond of simple, direct, sensual pleasures, rough uncomplicated characters, a wandering, rootless life, he was able to present in a forceful way the surface of things but not their depths. His skillful rhetoric is too often hollow; the devices of technique which he perfected as he grew older, his ability to write a sonorous alexandrine or a theatrically effective scene, fail to hide the essential intellectual poverty of his work.

See: Jules Lemaitre, Les Contemporains, Sér. 3 (1894); Vance Thompson, French Portraits (1900); Henri d'Almèras, Avant la gloire (1902); F. W. Chandler, The Contemporary Drama of France (1920); Alphonse Sèche, Dans la mêlée littéraire (1935).

C. W., Jr.

Ridder, Alfons de (pseud. Willem Elsschot, 1882–, Flemish novelist), was born in Antwerp. After completing his studies at the Commercial College of his birthplace, he was active for many years at Schiedam (South Holland) and then established an advertising business in his native city.

His first novel, Villa des Roses (1913), immediately achieved great success, but more in the Netherlands than in Belgium. Ridder had from the start the pent-up, bitter tone of an excessive emotionality. His second novel, De Verlossing (Deliverance), also appeared before the First World War, though it did not receive its first important publication until 1921; and during the occupation of Belgium by the Germans he issued, through an unknown, small publisher at Antwerp, Lijmen (republished 1924; Roping-in People)—which passed unnoticed because of the circumstances. Ridder, greatly discouraged thereby, did not set pen on paper for more than 15 years. Only in 1933 appeared Kaas (Cheese), and since then he has again been composing regularly: Tsjip (1934; Cheep); Pensioen (1935; Pension); Het Been (1938; The Leg), a sequel to Lijmen; De Leeuwentemmer (1940; The Lion Tamer), a sequel to Tsjip. A reprint of Tsjip and De Leeuwentemmer together in one volume was issued in 1943 by Querido in New York.

J. G.

Rilke, Rainer Maria (1875–1926, German poet), was born in Prague, of old Bohemian and Alsatian stock. After a few unhappy early years (1886–1891) at the military academies of St. Pölten and Weisskirchen, a year at school in Linz and four in Prague, he moved to Munich. Untouched by the current naturalistic and impressionistic tendencies, he completed in 1894 a collection of indifferent love poems in the conventional style of the Heine tradition (Leben und Lieder). Even in his second and more distinctive volume of poetry, Larenopfer (1896), he revealed little beyond a sentimental attachment to his native city, Prague, and a lively though undisciplined sensitiveness to aesthetic impressions. He had not yet brought himself to the intensity of devotion or, above all, to the sharpness of specific observation that became the conspicuous quality of his later poetry. In Traumgekrönt (1897), Advent (1898), and Mir zur Feier (1899) Rilke moved towards a depersonalized idiom in an attempt to convey, in contemplation and suspense, the emotional oneness that henceforth characterizes his poetic landscape of things and creatures. The first part of Das Stundenbuch (Das Buch vom mönchischen Leben, written in 1899 and published in 1905 together with Von der Pilgerschaft, 1901, and Von der Armuth und vom Tode, 1903; Eng. tr., Poems from the Book of Hours, 1941) intensifies the impression of a fervent though loosely religious imagination.

From 1899 on, he wandered restlessly from one country to another; he traveled in Russia, learned Russian, and, on two occasions, in 1899 and 1900, visited Tolstoy (q.v.). Overwhelmed by the immensity of the Eastern landscape, he crystallized his discovery of the immeasurable presence of God in his delightful Geschichten vom lieben Gott (1900; Eng. tr., Stories of God, 1931). He seemed at home in all parts of Europe; whether in Paris or Munich, Scandinavia, Spain, Italy, or Switzerland, everywhere he developed and realized his characteristic sense of space and physical reality. For two years he lived in the painters' colony at Worpswede (Worpswede, 1903), where, determined to rid his poetry of all narrative or merely lyrical elements, he wrote most of the poems that were published under the characteristic title Das Buch der Bilder (1902, in two parts; 2d ed., enlarged, 1906). Superbly skillful though most of this work has seemed to some, to Rilke it still lacked that firmness of distinct bodies in space in which he felt most palpably the presence of a moving God.

His association in Paris with the great French sculptor Rodin represents perhaps the most significant turn in his poetic career. He had always found himself in sympathy with much of French culture, and he had translated Maurice de Guérin, Gide (q.v.), and Valéry (q.v.); but Rodin (like the equally influential Cézanne) became to him a symbol not so much of the French character in general as rather of a hardworking craftsman grappling with the completely significant world of tangible objects. The artist's work, Rodin insisted, is the only satisfactory mode of religious activity. Much of Rilke's happy recognition of this attitude entered into his account of the master (Auguste Rodin, 1903; Eng. tr., 1919). But the two volumes of Neue Gedichte (1907–1908), the second dedicated to Rodin, "mon grand ami," show the turn in Rilke's conception of the artist even more clearly; they contain his first distinctly mature poetry. In these poems he not only develops a peculiarly objective and sculptural form, which has, somewhat misleadingly, become known as Dinggedicht, but he advances from his earlier private and impressionistic aestheticism to an integration and transformation of his intense vision into more impersonal symbols. At the same time the poems in Neue Gedichte represent, together with the delicate and melancholy prose of his only major narrative work, Die Aufzeichnungen des Malte Laurids Brigge (1910; Eng. tr., Journal of My Other Self, 1930), the last work in which his impressions, however sublimated and embodied, supplied the material for and the aim of his poetry.

Now his life and his poetry began to change. In spite of his rapidly increasing fame and the astonishing popularity of his earlier, sentimentally melodramatic Die Weise von Liebe und Tod des Cornets Christoph Rilke (1906; Eng. tr., The Tale of the Love and Death of Cornet Christopher Rilke, 1932) and in spite of a singularly extensive correspondence with a large circle of friends (Briefe, 1929 ff.; various parts of Rilke's correspondence have been issued in English translation), there followed years of profound despair, frustration, and helplessness. In August, 1914, for once inspired by a feeling of solidarity with his countrymen, he passed through a brief period of exaltation and wrote, in the ecstatic style of Hölderlin's last poems, Fünf Gesänge. But this elation did not last. As early as the winter of 1911–1912 he had begun at the castle of Duino in Istria a series of elegies which he seemed unable to complete until, in an extraordinary burst of inspiration, he finished the last of the 10 poems in 1922, at Castle Muzot in the Swiss Valais. Duineser Elegien (1923; Eng. tr., Duinese Elegies, 1930) Rilke regarded as his supreme achievement; the elegies are, at the same time, the most impressive sequence of great poetry in modern European literature. Their theme is man's, and particularly the poet's, struggle for clarity and coherence; with two exceptions, they are written in a rhythmically dithyrambic vers libre, and even though they are naturally charged with elements of philosophical reflection, their appeal is, in the main, to the creative and nervous sensibility such as sustained the poet himself. The poems offer the evidence of an overwhelming religious crisis, but, with their recurrent emphasis upon the succession of struggle, death, and regeneration, they represent only one aspect of Rilke's vision. The other, his sense of joy, affirmation, and praise, is the keynote of Die Sonette an Orpheus (1923; Eng. tr., Sonnets to Orpheus, 1936), a series of 55 brilliant and exuberantly positive "songs," written in a state of astonishing inspiration while he finished the last of the Elegien. A few further poems, Späte Gedichte (1934; Eng. tr., Later Poems, 1938), which reiterate the allegorical manner of the later elegies, were published after his death; but with his two incomparable statements of the cosmic experience, progress, and achievement of the poet, Rilke ended a creative career which is as unique in recent times as it is difficult to appreciate.

To contrast him, as is often done, with his great German contemporary, Stefan George (q.v.), is merely to stress the peculiarly personal nature of his imagination. Unlike the rigidly stylized and monumental George, Rilke is ultimately a sensitive and, at his best, supremely realistic poet who succeeded in finding the symbols of a modern religious eloquence. It is perhaps not altogether just to dismiss most of his work prior to the Neue Gedichte as unoriginal and dangerously subjective. But it is true that many of even the more popular poems in Das Stundenbuch and in Das Buch der Bilder lack the authoritative gesture. Rilke was, after all, an artist whose perception and intensity of application were throughout most of his life greater than his powers of resolute mastery. In his earlier poems it is difficult to escape a feeling of glibness and unmerited ease of mystical intuition. The characteristic poetic figure of the "Angel," in which he frequently focuses and through which he realizes the strength of his overpowering inspiration, occurs in his early work as well. It is not until after the years of complete despondency, however, that the symbol of the Angel emerges in the Elegien, in severe and peremptory images, as the absolute of vision and completeness. Within the allegorical world of a modern paradise in which, innocently close to the animals, Rilke seeks his way, there is no immediate contact with God, but the Angel appears to the poet as does God to the medieval saint. To approach this source of terrible strength is a task almost too great for man: in children, lovers, and heroes Rilke felt it present, and of them the elegies say much. But the cardinal theme of the Elegien, especially of the superb fifth elegy, is the precariousness of human life. And if, as the work draws to a close, the sense of inadequacy gives way to one of trust and affirmation, it is because the poet transmutes what is merely seen or "blindly" lived into the exaltation of a vision (in the seventh elegy) and the acceptance (in the tenth elegy) of death as the final transformer. The experience of grief for the dead was probably for Rilke the most moving human experience (see the series of Requiem poems, 1909; Eng. tr., Requiem and Other Poems, 1935). In the Elegien, therefore, death resolves the discrepancies of man's life. But in the subsequent Sonette an Orpheus Rilke presents the complement to this vision. Here the poet's song serves to transform even the mutability of life into the permanence of absolute creation.

See: F. Olivero, Rainer Maria Rilke; a Study in Poetry and Mysticism (1931); F. Dehn, Rainer Maria Rilke und sein Werk (1934); F. A. Hünich, Rilke-Bibliographie (1935); J. F. Angelloz, Rainer Maria Rilke; l'évolution spirituelle du poète (1936); E. C. Mason, Rilke's Apotheosis (1938); E. M. Butler, Rainer Maria Rilke (1941).

V. L.

Rimbaud, Jean Nicholas Arthur (1854–1891, French poet), was born in Charleville in the northeast of France, the son of self-assertive, mettlesome parents. When 15 he had already written a number of skillful imitations of the romanticists (Vers de collège, 1932). The arrival of Izambard (January, 1870), a young anti-imperialist teacher, interested in modern writers, was the most striking event in the school life of Rimbaud. He encouraged the omnivorous reading of living poets and radical writers by his pupil, who became fiercely anticlerical and revolutionary. Thirsting for fame, on May 24, 1870, Rimbaud wrote to Banville (q.v.) a letter in which he called himself a "Parnassian," worshiping two goddesses, "the Muse and Liberty." On August 28 he boarded the Paris train without a ticket; for this offense he spent 10 days in jail. To his next flight, through Belgium, are due the series of poems including "Ma Bohême," "La Maline," and "Le Cabaret vert." On February 25, 1871, he again started, this time on foot, for Paris, where he spent about a month in abject poverty; on his return he resolved never to reenter his school. From April 4 to May 5 is the time of a problematic escape to the Paris of the Commune, affirmed by Delahaye, Godschoot, et al., denied by Izambard and his followers. He wrote then a plan, now lost, for a communist constitution, his first prose poems "Les Déserts de l'amour," and the two famous lettres du voyant (Lettres de la vie littéraire d'Arthur Rimbaud, edited by J. M. Carré, 1931) in which he declared his determination "to become a seer." Charles Bretagne, who encouraged his reading of books on occultism and magic, was the promoter of Rimbaud's dramatic "liaison" with Verlaine. The latter called Rimbaud to Paris, where the proud, cynical youth arrived early in September bringing his Le Bateau ivre. He found nothing but "emptiness and chaos" among Parisian writers, whom he met with sarcasm or silence, once even with violence, which drew fear and hatred upon him. He was then engaged in writing his first Illuminations (not published until 1887).

On July 8, 1871, Rimbaud and Verlaine went to London, where they frequented exiled French communists and led a "stormy, painful life." One can no longer entertain any doubt concerning the abnormal nature of their association. Meanwhile Mme Rimbaud vainly tried to retrieve her son's manuscripts of the "Chasse spirituelle" and "Les Veilleurs," his masterpieces according to Verlaine (q.v.), which the latter had left with his wife's parents and which seem to be hopelessly lost. Early in 1873, at Roche, during one of his flights from Verlaine, Rimbaud wrote new Illuminations and "atrocious stories [meant for] a pagan or negro book," i.e., Une Saison en Enfer (1873). Having again joined Verlaine on July 8, 1873, this time in Brussels, two days later he was shot in the wrist by his friend, who was sentenced to two years' imprisonment. Rimbaud completed Une Saison en Enfer at Roche. The whole edition of this work, except a few copies, remained forgotten in the publisher's cellar, where it was found by chance in 1901.

In November, 1873, Rimbaud bade farewell forever to poetry. Between 1873 and 1880 he oscillated between Charleville and many parts of Europe, earning his living in the most various temporary occupations. The remainder of his life Rimbaud passed in Aden and other Red Sea ports, now as the employee of a French exporting house, now as the explorer of the Ogaden and River Web countries, or again as an independent trader leading expeditions to Abyssinia. That he dealt in contraband firearms is certain. The question of his traffic in slaves is disputed (Enid Starkie, Rimbaud en Abyssinie, 1938; Poésie, November, 1941). In April, 1891, yielding to the increased agony of a fatal disease, Rimbaud began his return journey from Harar to France where, in Marseille, his leg was amputated. He died on November 10, when a number of his poems were about to be published as the Reliquaire edited by Darzens. His letters (Lettres de Jean-Arthur Rimbaud, Egypte, Arabie, Ethiopie, 1899; there are some factual errors in this edition), relating the progress of his illness, are worthy of the author of Une Saison en Enfer. The poems Rimbaud wrote before he was 17 are the offspring of anger and the crying out caused by "the deep and eternal wound" inflicted by life on the delicacy and audacity of youth. At the same time a strong realistic vein appears in condensed, sharply drawn scenes and still lifes. He himself is there with his mistrusts, "profound pities," awakening sensuality, and arrogance. However, these poems are primarily technical studies in which Rimbaud becomes a master of poetic expression. The superiority attained over earlier works by the "Chercheuses de poux" and "Voyelles," with their rich and airy orchestration, and that of Le Bateau ivre (1884) are due to the adventure or revolution related in his lettres du voyant. Rimbaud is now resolved to be no mere technician, but a seer, and to invent a mode of expression adequate to his visions and science of prosody. Le Bateau ivre, with its 100 stanzas of four alternately rhyming alexandrines, sings Rimbaud's soaring into the visionary world. The rush of images expressing flight and release which at the same time impose their physical ponderance hypnotize the reader.

When Rimbaud was writing his first 20 Illuminations (May–September, 1871), he was, so he tells us, acquainting himself with "simple hallucination" and noting down "des vertiges, des silences, des nuits," a fact which the Illuminations prove conclusively. The verse of these pellucid and poignant poems becomes increasingly freer so that, at last, "Marine" and "Mouvement" realize Banville's wish for free verse. The inventor of the 38 other Illuminations, from "Après le déluge" to "Solde," commonly called "prose Illuminations" (dates uncertain), appears both as a "fabulous opera" and a magician contriving festivities and disasters. All flares up in this meteor-like rush compounded of leave-takings, for Rimbaud felt himself "dedicated to a new disorder." Some of these later Illuminations are in free verse disposed like prose; in others prose and verse intermingle; others are pure prose poems. The "diamond prose" of this fearful virtuoso seems in turn impalpable, quintessential, or almost brutally material. But this language which Rimbaud called non-fixé belongs, first and foremost, to the realm of rhythm.

In Une Saison en Enfer, one of the barest and most dramatic human documents, Rimbaud disavows all his former leads. He is now concerned not with vision, but with the stark reality of life and death and primarily with that of his own hell: "I believe myself in hell, hence I am there." Let his race and country with their weakening vices, his "disgusting education" and Christianity, burn up. For when he proclaims "Through the spirit one reaches God," reaffirming a spiritual quest, he does not mean what, to him, has become but an outworn legend. Even under the symbolism of his liaison with Verlaine in "Délires I" or through the analysis of his artist's endeavors in "Délires II," he is solely concerned with the grasping of an immediate and essential reality. Rimbaud, having staked his all on art, has lost, and so let it be. Yet he remains free, scornfully hurling behind him whatever entrapped him. Une Saison en Enfer has the "abruptness of thought and style" Chateaubriand saw in Pascal and Bossuet. Its elliptical foreshortenings and compressions contribute extraordinary impact. Here again rhythm commands the diverse elements of style. A comparison of Ebauches (ed. by M. Yvert-Méléra, 1937) with the final text makes one realize how aware and deliberate an artist this visionary was and how perfectly articulated and organized his work.

See: P. Berrichon, La Vie de Jean-Arthur Rimbaud (1897); P. Claudel, preface to Rimbaud, Œuvres (Mercure de France ed., 1912); I. Rimbaud, Reliques (1922); M. Coulon, Le Problème de Rimbaud (1923); E. Delahaye, Souvenirs familiers (1925); Rimbaud, Edition critique, Vol. I (1939).

M. M.

Rivière, Jacques (1886-1925, French critic and editor), a native of Bordeaux, went to Paris at 17. In spite of an excellent record at the Lycée Lakanal, he was not admitted to the Ecole Normale Supérieure, where he would have prepared for a career of scholarship and teaching. More interested, indeed, in contemporary art, music, and literature than in his studies, he reveals his real preoccupations in letters to his friend and classmate, Alain-Fournier (q.v.). When Rivière married Alain-Fournier's sister Isabelle in 1909, he definitely gave up an academic career in philosophy to work with André Gide (q.v.) on the newly founded Nouvelle Revue française. Rivière first wrote notes on music and the dance, but having already had critical studies published in other magazines, he was soon encouraged to write more lengthy articles. The First World War broke in upon his career. He was taken prisoner in August, 1914, and spent four years in Germany and Switzerland. During his captivity his mind remained active: he observed his captors and his fellow prisoners, kept a journal, Carnet de guerre (1929), and made a record of his religious thought in A la trace de Dieu (1925). In 1919 he became editor of the Nouvelle Revue française, continuing its policy of publishing only the best of contemporary literature, and he preserved from oblivion the works of writers who had been killed in the war. In the midst of literary activity, in February, 1925, Rivière died suddenly of typhoid fever.

Although Rivière wrote two psychological novels, Aimée (1922) and Florence (unfinished; published posthumously in 1935), most of his work is critical. His first important study, "Paul Claudel, poète chrétien" (1907), which was one of the earliest attempts to explain Claudel's poetry, was first printed in the Occident. It was inspired by enthusiasm for the poet and was rewritten after exchanging a number of letters (see Rivière, Correspondance, 1907-1914, 1926) with the young diplomat, who, at Rivière's request, was attempting to show him the Catholic way out of doubt. The revision was included in Etudes (1911) with other early studies. Among further critical studies of individual writers are "Alain-Fournier" (1922) and "Rimbaud" (1914) printed first in the Nouvelle Revue française and later republished. A series of lectures explaining Marcel Proust was published posthumously as Quelques Progrès dans l'étude du cœur humain (1926). Among Rivière's best articles on general literary and philosophical problems are "De la sincérité envers soi-même" (1912) and the "Roman d'aventure" (1913), both published in the Nouvelle Revue française, and Moralisme et littérature, a lecture published only in 1932. His continued preoccupation with religion is shown in all his correspondence and in "De la foi" (Nouvelle Revue française, 1912) and A la trace de Dieu, while his interest in political discussions is evident in L'Allemand (1918), Russie (1927), and Pour et contre une société des nations (1930).

Rivière's method of criticism is based upon comprehension of the author's innermost impulsion and upon careful analysis and presentation of the work. He endeavors to reach the center of the philosophical or psychological problem, but never neglects the sensual delight to be found in the resulting work of art. He is usually guided in his choice of subject by deep enthusiasm, ardent curiosity, and keen sympathy. Perhaps the most interesting aspect of his writing is his own subtle and analytical mind. To him his thought had almost a sensual reality. It was also mobile and alive because he wished it to express accurately his nature, varying constantly under accumulated experiences.

See: "Hommage à Jacques Rivière, 1886-1925," Nouvelle Revue française, XXIV (1925), 387-829 (issue devoted to this author); Martin Turnell, "The Criticism of Jacques Rivière," Modern Language Review, XXXV (1940), 470-482.

B. P.

Rode, Helge (1870-1937, Danish poet, dramatist, and critic), was born in Copenhagen. His mother was the daughter of Orla Lehmann, national liberal leader; his father took active part in the Grundtvigian folk-school movement, but died early. Some of the most impressionable years of the poet's childhood—from the age of 9 to 16—were spent in Norway. Rode's permanent home, however, became Copenhagen, where in the garden suburb of Frederiksberg his tall ascetic figure was a familiar sight.

Rode is perhaps the most versatile writer and the most original thinker of the Danish neo-romantic, symbolistic movement of the 90's, which arose as a reaction against the overrationalization of Georg Brandes (q.v.). Rode's first collection of poems, Hvide Blomster (1892; White Flowers), reveals the stages of the spiritual awakening, the "breakthrough of the soul," to use the poet's own expression—the feeling of cold desolation over lack of faith, the agonized quest for truth behind the veils of nature, and finally, probably after a sudden mystic vision, the rapturous feeling of the individual "I" as part of the "Great I." In the next important collection of poems, Ariel (1914), perhaps the central work in Rode's life, the poet becomes an exulting ethereal being, a messenger, sent to teach man to throw off his bonds and to soar. The enigma of death, however, as seen, for example, in the utter loneliness of the drifting body of the drowned man, exerts gripping fascination. In Den stille Have (1922; The Quiet Garden, i.e., the cemetery), which opens with a simple beautiful tribute to the poet's mother, the old Norse belief in the living dead seems merged with Christian resurrection and Hindu mysticism. Death is merely an illusion. Surprising, delightful touches of humor appear in the tribute to the poet's father.

In Rode's dramas ideas are as important as characters. Kongesønner (1896; Sons of the King) presents symbolically and in Greek setting the two extremes: boundless exaltation in life versus negation of life; life, but in chastened form, conquers. Pantheism runs through the primitive, prehistoric Solsagn (1904; The Legend of the Sun). Ibsen's (q.v.) influence is felt in the modern, powerful Morbus Tellermann (1907; The Tellermann Plague) and in Flugten (1909; The Flight). Envy, hypocrisy, and ambition constitute the driving forces in these two plays, dealing with the scientific medical and the engineering worlds, and in Det store Forlis (1917; The Great Shipwreck), where the Titanic disaster and, in a larger sense, the First World War are indicated. Several dramas treat historical figures, one Tolstoy (q.v.), one Georg Brandes. The plays of the middle years of Rode's life—even some of his comedies, e.g., Døden paa Natcafé (1905; Death in the Night Restaurant)—are bitter, but they are not without hope. Generally there stands out against the mass of climbers a solitary, upright, fearless figure, capable of taking up the gauntlet, a representative of Ibsen's—and Rode's—future "third realm." Rode's women also as a rule are ethical forces. Characteristic again are the kind-hearted ne'er-do-wells, by-passed by Fortune.

Rode's numerous essays, which appeared in the post-war period, constitute mainly dialectical polemic discussions of the burning question of the day, science versus religion. In Krig og Aand (1917; War and Intellect) the poet places the blame for the war squarely—not upon man's stupidity, as Brandes does—but upon the tenets of Darwinism, upon naturalism, and the development of the superman morality. Salvation is to be found only in a return to religion, a deep, dogma-free religion, and in the establishment of a union of states.

See: H. G. Topsøe-Jensen, Scandinavian Literature from Brandes to Our Day (1929); Helge Kjaergaard, Die dänische Literatur der neuesten Zeit (1871-1933) (1934).

C. K. B.

Rodenbach, Georges (1855-1898, Belgian poet), was born in Tournai. Several months after his birth he was taken to Bruges, which he was later to immortalize in what is probably his best-known book, Bruges-la-morte (1892). He studied in Ghent, where, at the Collège Sainte-Barbe, he made the acquaintance of Emile Verhaeren (q.v.). Having obtained his degree in law, Rodenbach visited Paris (1878-1879). He returned to Belgium and opened a law office, but in 1887 went to live in Paris, where he died.

His first works, published in Belgium, were collections of poems about Flemish life: Le Foyer et les champs (1877), Ode à la Belgique (1880), La Mer élégante (1881), L'Hiver mon- dain (1884). The book which won him general recognition in France was La Jeunesse blanche (1886). It was in Paris that he composed his best work, always inspired, however, by his native land. His books include collections of poems: Le Règne du silence (1891), Le Voyage dans les yeux (1893), Les Vies encloses (1896), Le Miroir du ciel natal (1898); novels: La Vocation (1895), Le Carillonneur (1897), En exil (1920); plays: Le Voile (1894) and Le Mirage (1901). All are pervaded by an atmosphere of quiet and introspection. In Les Vies encloses he furnishes what is perhaps the key to a state of mind of his generation, shut out from the world, entirely dedicated to "son spectacle intérieur."

See: T. Derème, "La Poésie de Georges Rodenbach," Revue de Paris, Année XXXI (1924), Tome I, pp. 674-685; Pierre Maes, Rodenbach (1926).

P. B.

Rodríguez Marín, Francisco (1855-1943, Spanish scholar, folklorist, and poet), throughout his long life wrote some 150 volumes, dealing with the three fields he cultivated simultaneously and without interruption. He was also director of the National Library of Madrid and later of the Royal Spanish Academy. His first work, published in Seville, where he was born, was a volume of poetry. This was followed by others from time to time, and a volume of selections was published in 1941 under the title A la real de España (1871-1941). These poems, among which the madrigals and sonnets are especially worthy of mention, are excellent imitations of the poetry of Seville in the golden age. In the field of folklore he published rich and valuable collections of songs, proverbs, metaphors, and popular usages. But the greater part of his work and the most important is that which deals with the history of Spanish literature of the golden age. The merit of these works lies in the author's discovery of biographical data and documents on many classic authors, such as Luis Barahona de Soto, Pedro Espinosa, Mateo Alemán, Fernando de Herrera, and, especially, Cervantes. His editions of works by these authors contain extensive critical, historical, and philological notes. It may be said that no modern critic has known the language and the life of the 16th and 17th centuries as well as he. His wide firsthand knowledge of books and documents of this period enabled him to bring out the most authoritative annotated edition of Don Quixote and of several of the novelas ejemplares. He also published many articles and pamphlets dealing with a number of concrete points on the life and works of Cervantes. In addition to his erudition, which made him the most competent Cervantes scholar of our time, he was deeply identified with the spirit and character of traditional, popular Spain, as revealed in his witty, expressive, unmistakably Spanish style.

See: G. M. del Río y Rico, Biografía y bibliografía de don Francisco Rodríguez Marín (1917); A. Baig y Baños, Rodríguez Marín, documentador cervantino (1916) and Rodríguez Marín, anotador del "Quijote" (1932).

F. de O.

Rodziewiczówna, Marja (pseud. Zmogas, 1863-1944, Polish novelist), was born at Pieniuha, near Grodno, in Lithuanian Poland, of parents soon to be exiled to Siberia for participation in the uprising against Russian sovereignty in progress at the time of her birth. Reared by the Countess Karolina Skirmunt, Rodziewiczówna was educated in Warsaw at the Kuczyńska pension and later, after her father had inherited an estate at Hruszowa in Polesie, at a convent in Jazłowiec. On the death of her father in 1881, Marja cut her hair, put on men's boots, and, at first solely by the labor of her own hands and those of her peasants, later with aid from her royalties, made the poor, neglected estate of Hruszowa yield a living. She turned to writing not for self-expression, as Orzeszkowa (q.v.) did, but in order to preach to her fellow countrymen the gospel of hope and endurance in a hopeless and defeatist age. In a series of more than a dozen novels, the best of which is Dewajtis (1889), Rodziewiczówna portrayed with deliberate purpose the full, rich, often violently beautiful life of what she regarded as the citadel of her nation's tradition, her own Eastern Border, believing that an ideal, thus drawn, would win others of her fellow countrymen who were less convinced than she of their tradition's worth and too often were seduced by the foreigner. Heir of Mickiewicz and of Henryk Rzewuski, the author of The Memoirs of Soplica, as an immortalizer of the Border spirit, Rodziewiczówna was the most popular novelist with two generations of Poles, despite her dismissal by the cosmopolites and the literati as a mere "character."

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, I (1927), 231-246; G. Korbut, Literatura polska (1931), IV, 152-153; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej (1934), I, 118-124, 339-340.

A. P. C.

Roelants, Maurice (1895–, Flemish poet and novelist), was born in Ghent. After a début as a humanist poet of melancholy refinement and engaging charm (Het Verzaken, 1930; Renunciation), Roelants published three novels and a number of short stories which gave him wide renown in Holland and Belgium. He is a classicist, and the drama in his books is essentially internal. His novels reveal a shrewd but sympathetic analyst of human nature and have none of the traditional Flemish rural and folklore elements. Roelants's style is limpid but tense. In Komen en Gaan (1927; Come and Go), Het Leven dat wij droomden (1931; Life as We Dreamed It), and Alles komt terecht (1935; Everything Settles Itself), as well as in De Jazzspeler (1928; The Jazz Band Player), painfully acquired wisdom is meted out without condescension and with great subtlety.

J.-A. G.

Roland Holst, Henriëtte (1869–, Dutch poet and writer of prose), was born at Noordwijk near Leiden. She made her poetic début with a book of verse entitled Sonnetten en Verzen in Terzinen geschreven (1895; Sonnets and Poems Written in Terza Rima). It was hailed by Willem Kloos (q.v.) as a great piece of work that held the promise of greater things to come. In the years that followed her first publication she became an ardent adherent of the socialist cause. Compassion for the underdog and the desire to aid the proletariat in its fight for better living conditions and for organized action were henceforth the dominant motives of her life. She married the artist R. N. Roland Holst—her maiden name was Van der Schalk—and found in him a sympathetic fellow fighter for her social ideals. Her first socialist verses appeared in De Nieuwe Geboort (1902; The New Birth). In it she expressed the conflict within her when the loud voice of socialism entered the quiet of her former life, the sense of doubt and perplexity, the pain of nostalgic retrospect when she had followed the voice. In her later poetry, Opwaartsche Wegen (1907; Upward Ways) and De Vrouw in het Woud (1912; The Woman in the Wood), perplexity and doubt have yielded to an ardent faith in the justice of her cause. In 1910 was published her drama, De Opstandelingen (The Rebels), which she described as "an imaginative picture of the essence of the Russian upheaval as a proletarian revolution." This was before the outbreak of the First World War, which led to the seizure of power by the Bolsheviks. She joined the Dutch Communist Party and championed its cause with her ready pen.

She wrote, among other books, Kapitaal en Arbeid in Nederland (1902; Capital and Labor in Holland), Geschiedenis van den proletarischen Klassenstrijd (1909; History of the Proletarian Class War), a life of Jean Jacques Rousseau (1912), a life of Garibaldi entitled De Held en de Schare (1920; The Hero and the Crowd), Communisme en Moraal (1925; Communism and Morality). In Verzonken Grenzen (1918; Submerged Bounds), written after the triumph of Communism in Russia, she sings the dawn of the new day, in which the bounds that separate man from man and class from class are submerged by the sea of love whose promised tide she saw coming in. The book contains magnificent verse. In the creative impulse of her visions thought blossoms into image as naturally as the bud opens into the rose, and it is to this plastic power that her poetry owes its beauty. We may not believe in the message, we cannot help believing in the poetry. As poetry it will be read when the message will have lost its appeal.

A. J. B.

Rolland, Romain (1866–1944, French novelist, playwright, and musicologist), was born at Clamecy in Burgundy. His poor health as a boy, the early love of music instilled in him by his pious mother, his solitude as a child, and the hero worship fostered by his early reading of Shakespeare—all combined to develop in him a sympathy with artists "the masters of the world, the great Defeated." At the Ecole Normale Supérieure (1886–1889) he specialized in history with Gabriel Monod. In 1886, oppressed by the materialistic life about him, he wrote to the great seer of Europe, Tolstoy (q.v.), seeking spiritual guidance. A long letter from Tolstoy (published February, 1902, by Péguy, q.v., in Cahiers de la quinzaine) affected his aesthetic profoundly, although he has stated (in an unpublished letter of 1933) that from the beginning he sensed the extreme result of Tolstoy's aesthetic theories and could not acquiesce in Tolstoy's complete "condemnation of art." He lived in Rome from 1889 to 1891 studying at the Ecole Française d'Archéologie et d'Histoire. There he learned from the aged Malwida von Meysenbug, the friend of Kossuth, Mazzini, Louis Blanc, Wagner (q.v.), and Nietzsche (q.v.), "the intimate relationship between the true France which is hidden and the true Germany which does not raise its voice—the best Germany; it will survive" (preface to Letters of Romain Rolland and Malwida von Meysenbug, 1933). In Rome he began a cycle of Renaissance drama. From 1891 to 1912 he taught at the Ecole Normale Supérieure and the Sorbonne; in 1895 he published his doctoral thesis, L'Histoire de l'opéra en Europe avant Lully et Scarlatti (still a definitive work and the first thesis primarily on music ever accepted by the Sorbonne), and soon began his Tragédies de la foi: Saint Louis (1897), expounding the power of faith on a whole people, Aërt (1898), illustrating "national exaltation," and Le Triomphe de la raison (1899), presenting the typically Romain Rolland heroism, "the conqueror conquered." Les Loups, played in March, 1898 (Eng. tr., The Wolves, 1937), first published as Morituri under the pseudonym Saint Just, was inspired by the Dreyfus affair. The play is noteworthy for its simplicity, rapidity, and directness; it was subsequently incorporated (along with Le Triomphe de la raison) in the partially completed cycle of 10 Revolutionary dramas, of which the best known are Danton (1900; Eng. tr., 1918), Le Quatorze juillet (1902; Eng. tr., The Fourteenth of July, 1918), Le Jeu de l'amour et de la mort (1924; Eng. tr., The Game of Love and Death, 1926), and Robespierre (1938). Le Temps viendra (1903) is based on an episode in the Boer War. During the writing of these plays Rolland had been clarifying his idea of a People's Theatre and published an essay, Le Théâtre du Peuple (1903; Eng. tr., 1918), wherein he found little for the ouvrier in the traditional classic or romantic French repertory and proposed the creation of a new form of drama built on the glorious tradition of French history. Rolland's interest in the "great Defeated" inspired his little book, very rare and comparatively unknown, Millet (1902), published only in English. This and the very popular, 85-page Vie de Beethoven (1903; Eng. tr., 1909), the Michel-Ange (1905, rewritten 1906; Eng. tr., 1912), and the Vie de Tolstoï (1911; Eng. tr., 1911) are his monuments to his heroes.

The great novel Jean-Christophe, conceived in 1886, written in part in Italy in 1889, and published serially in the Cahiers de la quinzaine from 1904 to 1912 (in book form, 1905-1913; Eng. tr., 1910-1913), brought Rolland to the fore in the literary world, especially with the youth of all countries. The work has been translated into many languages, including Indian dialects. The novel criticizes contemporary civilization, especially French materialism, through the eyes and thoughts of the German-born musician Jean-Christophe

Krafft—Jean, the most common name of man, Christopher, bearing the light of understanding, and Krafft symbolizing the force which the always feeble Rolland admired. It is an uneven work, often called a symphony, with its crashing climaxes of instrumentation and its contrasting andantes and pastorales; Rolland moves through France and Germany with a keenly observant satire, ruthlessly exposing weaknesses. It was complemented, after the war, by a similar novel about a woman, L'Ame enchantée (1922-1933; Eng. tr., The Soul Enchanted, 1925-1934), of which the first volumes are very fine.

The enemies created by Rolland in Jean-Christophe found their revenge in attacking him for his pacifistic papers from 1914 to 1919. The outbreak of the war had found him in retirement in Switzerland, whence he appealed to the intellectual leaders of France, Germany, Spain, Italy, and the United States to campaign for a cessation of hostilities (see Au-dessus de la mêlée, 1915, Eng. tr., Above the Battle, 1916, and Les Précurseurs, 1919, Eng. tr., The Forerunners, 1920). His novel Clérambault; histoire d'une Conscience libre pendant la guerre (1920; Eng. tr., 1921) presents in readable form the kernel of his ideas on war, even though he denies their autobiographical significance. Rolland was pilloried in many publications and accused of many crimes against the state and civilization; Clemenceau threatened him with imprisonment. After 1919, in addition to the seven-volume novel L'Ame enchantée, the play Robespierre, and other books already mentioned, Rolland wrote Mahatma Gandhi (1924; Eng. tr., 1924), Vie de Ramakrishna (1929), and Vie de Vivekananda (1930). He was attracted to Communism as a political theory and was an honored guest of Maxim Gorky (q.v.) in Russia, but no book resulted. In 1938 he returned to France to live.

Jean-Christophe remains Rolland's most significant work. It is the first great novel in any language about a musician, treating fully the problem of the artist in an alien world. The author's credo centers on the principle that all art manifestations should convey moral truth, which for him seems to be faith in humanity, a pantheistic religion, and continued insistence on the virtues of great artists. He follows Tolstoy in his belief that art should primarily bring men together. He feels that the true greatness of France is the humble man close to the soil and that although France has had questionable leaders its traditions, history, and culture will keep it great.

See: P. Seippel, Romain Rolland; l'homme et l'œuvre (1913); P. J. Jouve, Romain Rolland vivant, 1914-1919 (1920); J. Bonnerot, Romain Rolland; sa vie, son œuvre (1921); S. Zweig, Romain Rolland; The Man and His Work (1921); C. Sénéchal, Romain Rolland (1933).

W. H. B.

Romains, Jules (pseud. of Louis Farigoule, 1885-, French novelist, dramatist, essayist, and poet), was born in a village of Le Velay. He grew up in his native Cévennes Mountains and in Montmartre, where his schoolmaster father had been transferred. After a brilliant record at the Ecole Normale Supérieure (1906-1909), where he received degrees in both science and literature, he held professorships at Laon, Brest, Nice, and Paris (1909-1919). His literary vocation came in 1903 in the form of a poetic revelation of the oneness of even the most fortuitous human groups. The sociological and psychological implications of that experience led Romains to generalize it into a literary theory, unanimism, according to which collective emotions transcend those of the individual and the poet gives groups (the couple, the village, the theatre audience) a keener awareness of their personality. In his early poems—L'Âme des hommes (1904), La Vie unanime (1908), Odes et prières (1913), and the prose poems of Puissances de Paris (1911)—he explored the "souls of streets" and raised the group to a status of divinity which he described in Manuel de déification (1910). At the same time he illustrated his theory in tales and novels such as Le Bourg régénéré (1906), which describes the rebirth of a community inoculated with a revolutionary idea; his masterpiece, Mort de quelqu'un (1911; Eng. tr., The Death of a Nobody, 1914, reissued, 1944), in which an obscure death creates a new and more interesting life; and Les Copains (1913; Eng. tr., The Boys in the Back Room, 1937), with its series of youthful pranks upsetting and welding together the inhabitants of two dull towns. In Donogoo-Tonka (1920) he again examined, with dry humor, the possibilities of the hoax as a creator of group consciousness. And his first two plays, L'Armée dans la ville (1911) and the beautiful Cromedeyre-le-Vieil (1920), both in verse, studied the group soul of the city in crisis. During the 20's Romains was to become, with his farces Knock, ou le Triomphe de la médecine (1923; Eng. tr., Doctor Knock, 1925), M. Le Trouhadec saisi par la débauche (1923), and Le Mariage de M. Le Trouhadec (1925)—all produced by Louis Juvet (q.v.)—

the outstanding comic dramatist of his day. Meanwhile his three-volume Psyché (1922-1929; Eng. tr., The Body's Rapture, 1933) portrayed the raptures of love on both the physical and the psychic planes.

In 1932 began to appear the monumental cyclic novel, Les Hommes de bonne volonté (Eng. tr., Men of Good Will, 1933-), which aims to depict modern French life in about 30 volumes. By 1945 no fewer than 24 volumes had appeared. Long developments of thrilling plot illumined by flashes of humor, laborious historical re-creations punctuated with brilliant analyses, and palpitatingly real episodes, contrasting with imaginary interviews of the great, make up a variegated human comedy in which there is no hero unless it be France itself. Romains's unanimistic technique frequently aids him in producing vast frescoes of Paris going to work in 1908, of the armies moving up to Verdun in 1916, of the victory parade in 1919. The high point of the work is reached by the two volumes dealing with the defense of Verdun. While writing this magnum opus, Romains has sought relaxation in well-meaning, elaborately reasoned essays on political subjects; during the 30's, despite Nazism, he ardently sponsored a Franco-German rapprochement. But his naïve and vainglorious Sept Mystères du destin de l'Europe (1940; Eng. tr., Seven Mysteries of Europe, 1940) invalidated his claims as a political thinker. From 1938 to 1941 he served as international president of the P.E.N. Club. As a satirist in fiction and drama, as a powerful creator of a world of characters, as an intellectual force, Jules Romains is one of the most typical and most vigorous writers of the epoch. In 1946 he was elected to the French Academy.

See: B. Crémieux, XXe Siècle (1924); A. Cuisenier, Jules Romains et l'unanimisme (1935).

J. O'B.

Roman, Ronetti (1853-1908, Rumanian playwright), was educated in foreign lands and upon his return established himself in the town of Roman. From 1868 to 1872 he wrote articles in Hebrew in various periodicals. He taught German in a Bucharest school for some time. In 1877 he gave his first Rumanian satirical sketch, Domnul Kanitverstan (Mister Kanitverstan), and in 1878 his poem Radu which made him widely known. About that time was published fragments of another poem, "Iwan," in Convorbiri literare (Literary Conversations) and in the almanac Dacia, edited by Caragiale (q.v.). An intimate friend of Caragiale and Eminescu (q.v.), he also wrote for the newspaper Timpul (Time). In 1893 he took up the Jewish question in Rumania in his pamphlet Două măsuri (Two Measures). For a while he acted as translator at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Bucharest. The last years of his life he spent on his estate in Moldavia where he managed his farms and wrote his famous Manasse. The play was produced in 1900 at the Bucharest National Theatre and created a great stir. Numerous polemics followed, and the question of Jewish assimilation was once more revived.

Manasse is the prototype of the old orthodox Hebrew, who leads a model and respected life among his fellow men. He receives a mortal blow when his only granddaughter marries a Christian. He remains faithful to his tradition and rejects assimilation with Rumanian Christians. The play is enriched by pictures of a world in motion, of the Christian and Jewish communities of a Moldavian town, by portrayals of the many types of business people and officialdom, and particularly of Zelig Shor, the cynic. Manasse was produced in many languages and interpreted by celebrated and eminent players; it was played in Saint Louis, Missouri, with the title New Lamps and Old. Aside from its racial and religious significance, Manasse marks real progress in the development of the Rumanian drama. Its characters are enduring and universal.

See: S. Podoleanu, 60 scriitori români de origină evreiască (1937).

L. F.

Romanov, Panteleimon (1884–1936, Russian novelist and short-story writer), born in a village near Tula, in Central Russia, of a noble family, studied law at the University of Moscow. Before the Revolution of 1917 Romanov had been dreaming of a vast epic in eight volumes under the general title Rossiya (Russia); only the first was actually published (1917). But after years of preparation he abandoned this ambitious project and concentrated on writing short stories, which made him one of the most popular Soviet writers in the 20's. In 1923–1928 his books occupied the first place in lending libraries throughout Russia. His fame was due to the fact that he described the new mode of life resulting from the Revolution. A keen observer, provided with a sense of humor and an extensive knowledge of various strata of Russian society, Romanov gave a broad picture of innumerable changes in social conditions and in the mentality of his fellow countrymen. New bureaucrats, peasants, workmen, party members, young students or old intellectuals, were represented in his sketches with the directness and accuracy of a literary camera. They were often called "the minutes of our times." Romanov, like a literary thermometer, registered all the ups and downs of social temperature in Soviet Russia between 1922 and 1930. A great impression was produced by his collection of short stories on the theory and practice of love during the first period of the Revolution (Bez cheremukhi, 1926; Eng. tr., Without Cherry Blossom, 1930). His novels dedicated to different aspects of moral conflicts in Soviet Society—Novaya skrizhal (1928; Eng. tr., The New Commandment, 1933), Tri pary shelkovykh chulok (Tovarishch Kislyakov) (1931; Eng. tr., Three Pairs of Silk Stockings, 1931), Sobstvennost (1933; Property)—are badly constructed and lack psychological insight, but they nevertheless can serve as literary illustrations of a certain period. The value of Romanov's work lies in the factual material and the true reflection of everyday life in the U.S.S.R. during the first postrevolutionary decade. Its aesthetic importance is doubtful.

M. S.

Rørdam, Valdemar (1872–, Danish poet), is, like so many of his Danish fellow craftsmen, a product of the idyllic Danish country parsonage—roses, beechwoods, a straw-thatched, rambling house, the singing of nightingales, the "white nights," the gentle melody of golden, waving wheatfields. He was born at Dalby on the island of Zealand. He made his literary début at the age of 23 with a collection of poems, Sol og Sky (1895; Sun and Sky); the promise of these came to some fulfillment in his next collection, Tre Streng (1897; Three Chords). There followed his own version of the epic poem, Bjovulf (1898; Beowulf); Dansk Tunge (1902; Danish Tongue) and a realistic versified novel, Gudrun Dyre (1902), which betrayed unusual virtuosity rather than depth of feeling.

Rørdam is one of the most prolific of Danish lyricists. Other important works are Den gamle Kaptajn (1908; The Old Captain), imbued with intense patriotism and over-embellished with alliteration; Jens Hvas til Ulvborg (1922–1923; Jens Hvas of Ulvborg); Sangen om Danmark (1923; The Song of Denmark); Blomstervers (1925; Flower Stanzas). These and numerous other collections of flowing verse show a strong influence of Holger Drachmann (q.v.) and also a most keenly attuned ear, all his own, for the poetic possibilities of the Danish language. One may say that almost every line in Rørdam's works sings; he has something of the lilt of Swinburne. Rørdam has translated into Danish a number of Kipling's poems; he has also translated Reymont's (q.v.) novel-cycle about the peasants of Poland.

In Rørdam one finds a most remarkable blending of an intense, almost chauvinistic Danish nationalism, an astounding gift for anarchistic metrical innovation, and perhaps the most finely strung ear of his time for the sweetness, the gentleness, and the smooth flexibility of his native tongue.

See: Christian Rimestad, Fra Stuckenbergt til Seedorf, II (1923); Helge Kjaergaard, Die dänische Literatur der neuesten Zeit (1871-1933) (1934).

G. St.

Rosegger, Peter (1843-1918, Austrian short-story writer, novelist, and poet), was born in Alpl near Kriegslach in Styria. Rosegger was of peasant stock, but lacked the physical strength for farm work; instead he was apprenticed for four years to an itinerant tailor. In this trade he traveled through the surrounding region, working in the homes of peasants; he came to know the characters, customs, and problems of the country people as intimately as the woods and mountains of his native province (see his autobiographical works Waldheimat, 1877, Eng. tr., Forest Farm, 1912, and Als ich jung noch war, 1895). Almost without formal education, he wrote numerous and varied works in High German and in the Styrian dialect and sent a large bundle of these to Dr. Swoboda, an editor in Graz. Swoboda at once recognized Rosegger's talent and provided the means for his education. Rosegger left school in 1869; in that year two books of dialect poems, Zither und Hackbrett and Tannenherz und Fichtennadel, were published. Almost immediately he became well known, and throughout his life he was among the most popular writers in German-speaking countries and enjoyed a considerable reputation abroad.

In his depiction of peasant life Rosegger had important predecessors in Berthold Auerbach and Johann Peter Hebel. His work, however, seems to owe more to personal observation and experience than to literary influences. It was primarily the lot of the Austrian peasant which interested Rosegger, and his best work deals with the rural scene. He had great narrative gifts, considerable humor, and a flair for describing eccentric characters. His most successful writing is to be found in such short tales as those in the collections Neue Waldgeschichten (1884) and Allerhand Leute (1888) and in episodes within his longer works. His full-length novels are often too didactic for modern taste. Even though most of his characters are convincingly and often realistically drawn, they have a tendency to voice the author's own opinions. A favorite theme is the struggle of the peasant against capitalism, especially against the tendency to incorporate the small farms in great estates and to use the land for hunting (Jakob der Letzte, 1888). Rosegger's ideal was a patriarchal, pre-industrial society. He was bitterly opposed to factories, socialism, militarism, and above all to modern cities; his attempts to describe urban life are not convincing. The idea of loyalty to traditional morals and customs and to one's family and native farm is a recurrent leitmotif. For all his cult of the peasant, Rosegger's work is clearly distinguished from the "blood and soil" school of the 1930's by its Christian and ethical elements. He was deeply interested in religious problems (Der Gottsucher, Eng. tr., God-Seeker, 1901; I.N.R.I., 1905, Eng. tr., 1905). Though a Catholic (if far from orthodox), he was a defender of the Protestant cause in Austria. Always didactic in his fiction, Rosegger tended more and more to take an open stand on all problems of the day; he founded the periodical Der Heimgarten in 1876 to ensure his influence among the public.

Rosegger was enormously productive; his collected works (1913-1916) fill 40 volumes. His work is of uneven quality: he is weakest in dealing with abstract problems, strongest when telling simple stories of country people. He is generally considered a predecessor of the "Heimatkunst" of the early 1900's.

See: Hermine and Hugo Möbius, Peter Rosegger (1903); A. Vulliod, Peter Rosegger; l'homme et l'œuvre (1912; German tr. by Moritz Necker, 1913); J. Nadler, "Peter Rosegger," in Neue österreichische Biographie, Abt. I (1923).

H. C. H.

Rosso di San Secondo, Piermaria (1887-, Italian playwright and novelist), born in Caltanissetta, Sicily. Despite his travels and a particular fondness for Holland and Germany, Rosso has always cherished a strong attachment for his native island. Even in his early youth he seems to have been especially sensitive to the rugged, tropical beauty of Sicily which nourished and excited his intrinsic cally sensual nature in no small measure.

From his novels La Fuga (1917) and La Donna che può capire, capisca (1923) and from his prelude to Marionette, che passione! (1918), one is able to get a fairly accurate portrait of Rosso di San Secondo's philosophical and emotional personality. In these writings he sees man bewildered and dazed after his exile from a heavenly world. For man's everyday existence Rosso has a lofty contempt which often finds expression in bitter irony and cynicism; he views man's efforts to attain a measure of happiness on this earth, his temporary abode, as futile and doomed to failure. Only those who rebel against the strictures of society can ever hope to find release from futility. Generally, however, those of his protagonists who do find ultimate release achieve this by self-destruction or by becoming identified with the mentally unbalanced. It was natural for Rosso the dramatist, early in his career, to turn his back on the conventional, bourgeois theatre. He becomes a fellow traveler of the grotteschi and a close kinsman of Pirandello (q.v.), since the dramatic vision of these writers springs from the same skeptical, negative view of life—although Rosso's outlook is not quite so captious as that of the grotteschi. He is determined to infuse a breath of poetry into our apparently vain and useless reality. But temperamentally he is too aloof, too divorced from common humanity to be able to synthesize and transfigure our social, ethical, and psychological concepts into a superior vision of life. His frantic urge to present something vital and significant is dissipated in the projection of lyrical-symbolical situations of an abstract nature. Yet, despite these defects, he has enjoyed a certain popularity, not only in Italy but on the Continent and in South America, and is even considered by serious critics as second in importance only to Pirandello.

The first work to win him widespread acclaim and the one which has remained most characteristic of him is the already mentioned Marionette, che passione!, where three anonymous people confess to and conflict with each other in tragical poses in a public place and finally in a restaurant. This is a very clever and original work. Curiosity is piqued from the very beginning and interest is sustained. Yet with the dénouement of the play one remains unconvinced and even baffled. These characters are not the ordinary people they at first seemed to be. Driven by a passion which robbed them of pride, will, and reason, they are on the threshold of insanity. They have been reduced to the status of puppets, and the wire which controls their frenzied movements is their passion. The audience has been duped by the author, who has ingeniously given the illusion of good theatre. La Bella Addormentata (1919), considered by many as his second best play, is really a scenic presentation of a folk tale with allegorical implications. Carmelina, a peasant ingenue, jilted by the Tremulous Notary, becomes the village prostitute known widely as the Sleeping Beauty because she appears like one in a trance. As a passive and unwitting instrument in the hands of Bluecheeks, her procuress, she still retains a certain purity which captivates those who gaze upon her. One day she awakens from this state of stupor: a new life is stirring within her. It is to preserve the purity of her unborn child that she rebels against the coercion of Bluecheeks. And it is the Black Man from the Sulphur Pit who comes to her rescue. He is an impetuous, romantic figure whose code is the primitive, rustic chivalry of Verga's Cavalleria rusticana, except that his interest is purely platonic. This "adventure in colors," as Rosso himself defines this work, comes to an end when the Black Man compels the Tremulous Notary to marry his victim made pregnant by another. Here again Rosso succeeds in casting a spell—but here again there is no drama. In the first two acts of Il Delirio dell'oste Bassà (1925), he shows the inner conflict which arises when a widower, having determined to keep intact and unsullied the memory of his idyllic married love, finds that the call of the flesh is stronger than his ascetic determination. As in Amara (1919), Per far l'alba (1919), and L'Ospite desiderato (1921), Rosso displays either an exasperating inability or an almost perverse delight in wasting themes potentially capable of yielding authentic dramas. In these plays which also treat of instinct and frustration he is clever, witty, and even brilliant, but he invariably permits both events and characters to degenerate into a gruesome pattern. La Danza su un piede (1923) and Lazzarina fra i coltelli (1923) concern themselves with the contrast between Life and Reason. There is no doubt that Rosso's perception of life's values and meaning is unique, startling. Given his remarkable dramatic and poetic gifts, there is little doubt that he would have produced the masterpiece everyone expected of him had he been willing or able to invest his personal world with a more compelling logic and a more genuine humanity.

Other plays are Primavera (1927), La

Roccia e i monumenti (1923), L'Avventura terrestre (1925), Una Cosa di carne (1925), Notturmi e preludi (1926), Tra vestiti che ballano (1927), Febbre and Canicola (1927), La Fidanzata dell'albero verde (1935). Among his novels are La Morsa (1918), La Festa delle rose (1920), La Donna senza amore (1920). His short stories and other prose works include Ponentino (1916), Io commemoro Lolletta (1919), La Mia Esistenza d'acquario (1919), Palamede, Remigia ed io (1920), C'era il diavolo o non c'era il diavolo (1929), and Luce del nostro cuore (1932).

See: A. Tilgher, Studi sul teatro contemporaneo (1928), 153-185; Arnaldo Boccelli, "Scrittori d'oggi," Nuova Antologia, CCCLXVII (1933), 612-614.

P. P. M.

Rostand, Edmond (1868-1918, French poet and dramatist), was born in Marseille, of a well-to-do and cultured family. On marrying the poet Rosemonde Gérard, he presented her with a volume of verse, Les Musardises (1890). Soon afterwards, at a time when stark naturalism triumphed on the stage, he undertook to revitalize the old romantic drama in verse, enlisting in the process the friendship and assistance of some of the foremost contemporary actors. Le Bargy interpreted Les Romanesques (1894); Sarah Bernhardt at the height of her glory created the title roles of La Princesse lointaine (1895), La Samaritaine (1897), and L'Aiglon (1900); the inimitable Coquelin headed the cast of Cyrano de Bergerac (1897), and Lucien Guitry that of Chantecler (1910). Cyrano de Bergerac, by no means a faithful rendering of the true historical figure but a clever and lively reconstruction of the Louis XIII period in which he lived, enjoyed the most enthusiastic popular reception ever granted a poetic drama and has preserved, despite the rationalizations of hardened critics, its ever fresh and youthful appeal. It spread Rostand's fame far and wide, forced for him—at the age of 33—the doors of the venerable French Academy and, one must add, made him a slave to his tremendous reputation. Laboring under the glare of unwanted publicity, he produced Chantecler, his most uneven, yet his most remarkable work, a bold experiment in dramatic technique which carries to the boards the animal world of La Fontaine. Chantecler by any standards but those of Cyrano would have been called a success; instead, it was pronounced a failure. Shaken in health and spirit, Rostand ended his days in virtual retirement at his luxurious villa

"Arnaga" in Cambo (at the foot of the Pyrenees) and lived long enough to see his two sons, Maurice and Jean, enter upon literary careers of their own.

There can be no doubt that Rostand set himself up ostentatiously as the successor of Victor Hugo and shared the latter's exalted conception of the poet as a teacher of lofty ideals. His romanticism, however, retains a distinct Southern flavor. It basks in the dreamy, unreal sun of his native province. Rooted in the ancient tradition of Italo-Provençal chivalric literature, mixing the old themes of love and war, it revels now in pathos and préciosité, now in grandiloquence and bombast, only to end with a flourish—beau geste, panache—the very arabesque of which carries a suggestion of wistfulness and futility. Thus Rostand's best-known characters, Cyrano, the would-be poet and lover; the eaglet (Napoleon II) deprived of his wings; Chantecler, the cock who discovers that his crowing does not make the sun rise—all illustrate their creator's diffidence and reveal sadness and frustration beneath their superficial bravura. Paradoxically enough, Rostand's theatre, the object of equally extravagant praise and abuse in his lifetime, is being reassessed today in terms of this very sincerity and valued, over and above its emotional thrills, as a lucid and moving dramatization of his own sense of unfulfillment.

Most of the plays of Rostand have been translated into English.

See: Jean Suberville, Edmond Rostand; son théâtre, son œuvre posthume (1921); Paul Faure, Vingt Ans d'intimité avec Edmond Rostand (1928); M. J. Premela, Edmond Rostand (1933); Rosemonde Gérard, Edmond Rostand (1935).

J.-A. B.

Rostworowski, Karol Hubert (1877-1938, Polish tragic dramatist), often called the Polish Mauriac (q.v.) and regarded generally as the principal heir of Wyspiański (q.v.), was the leading representative in Free Poland of orthodox Catholicism and of the conservative spirit which had its abode principally in Cracow. Born in Rybna near Cracow of a well-to-do gentry family, Rostworowski was early marked for a career as gentleman farmer and sent to study agriculture. He was diverted from this by 10 years (1898-1908) of study abroad, mostly in Germany where he was greatly influenced by Wagner and Kant, and returned to Cracow to make his début as a writer with a drama, Pod górę (1910; Uphill), which he himself later withdrew from circulation. Always deeply spiritual, Rostworowski went through formal conversion to the Catholic faith of his fathers at this time, and the experience, together with the horrors of the First World War, left him with an abiding sense of sin and of man's depravity, on the one hand, and of man's unity with the divine, on the other. Man's relationship to God became his sole preoccupation. It was the theme not only of the classic tragedies of his first period—Judas z Kariothu (1912; Judas Iscariot), Kaligula (1916), and the mystery Miłosierdzie (1920; Charity)—but also of his later trilogy of contemporary life—Niespodzianka (1929; The Surprise), Przeprowadzka (1930; The Way Up), and U mety (1932; At the Goal)—in which the expiation of a crime is traced through three generations of a family "on the way up." A towering figure of a man, "with the profile of a Caesar and the gestures of a Savonarola," Rostworowski became, in his final, somewhat cloistered years just outside Cracow, a kind of legend.

See: E. Breiter, "K. H. Rostworowski," Wiadomości literackie, 1938, No. 8; K. Czachowski, "Rostworowski—Polish Tragic Dramatist: 1877–1938," Slavonic Review, XVII (1938–1939), 677–688.

A. P. C.

Roth, Joseph (1894–1939, Austrian novelist), was born in Schwabendorf, Volhynia, son of an Austrian and a Russian Jewess. Left to the care of relatives, this unwanted child grew up with a strong desire for social distinction which, he felt, could be attained by a fine education; as he was about to enter the University of Vienna, the First World War broke out, and Roth volunteered. After the war he eked out a scant existence as cinema usher and journalist and for a few years contributed to the distinguished Frankfurter Zeitung. In 1933 Roth returned to Vienna and after the move toward Anschluss fled in 1936 to Paris. In 1939, overcome by the distress of personal misfortune and exile, Roth committed suicide.

Roth's unsheltered youth developed in him the understanding and sympathy remarkably apparent in each of his novels. His wisdom, his gentleness, and his strength grew out of the pain and poverty of his childhood and the disappointments of his later life. In his most accomplished novel, Hiob (1930; Eng. tr., Job, 1931), the story of a "modern wandering Jew," Roth might have been describing himself in the character of the patient and gentle father; and the torment in the soul of the youngest son is the anguish Roth had known as a youth shunned for his poverty and his Jewish blood. His own experiences provide the realistic portraits of human types and the bitter incidents of a life skeptically surveyed: the Jewish clientele of Hotel Savoy (1924), the disillusioned Austrian officer returning from the war (Die Flucht ohne Ende, 1927; Eng. tr., Flight without End, 1930), the gradual moral disintegration during the period of inflation (in a family novel, Zipper und sein Vater, 1928; in a political novel, Rechts und Links, 1929), the mystical allegory of a Russian army officer seeking his soul's redemption amid the horror of warfare on the Eastern front (Tarabas, ein Gast auf dieser Erde, 1934; Eng. tr., Tarabas, a Guest on Earth, 1934). His last and strange novel, Die Legende vom Heiligen Trinker (1939; Eng. tr., The Legend of the Holy Drinker, in K. Mann and H. Kesten, Heart of Europe, 1943), is significant for the parallel that could be drawn between Roth and the main character, a destitute foreigner in Paris, depending on chance for a living and spending on drink whatever money came into his hand. In Juden auf der Wanderschaft (1927) and Der Antichrist (1934; Eng. tr., 1935) Roth pleads for racial and religious tolerance.

In his earliest novels, Rebellion (1924), April; die Geschichte einer Liebe (1925), and Der blinde Spiegel (1925), Roth did not usually achieve the firmness of form and subject matter to be found in his epic-like study of imperial Austria (Radetzkymarsch, 1932, Eng. tr., Radetzky March, 1933, and its less powerful sequel, Die Kapuzinergruft, 1939), in his Beichte eines Mörders (1936; Eng. tr., Confession of a Murderer, 1937), or in his very original presentation of Napoleon as seen through the eyes of an adoring servant (Die hundert Tage, 1936; Eng. tr., Ballad of the Hundred Days, 1936).

See: F. Bertaux, A Panorama of German Literature from 1871 to 1931 (1935), pp. 251–255; A. Werner, "Four Tragic Jews", Jewish Outlook, February, 1942.

V. L.

Roumanille, Joseph (1818–1891, Provençal poet and raconteur, promoter of the Felibrige movement), was born at Saint-Rémy-de-Provence, "the town of gardens," near Avignon. Like Frédéric Mistral (q.v.), he was an educated man of the soil who had spent his childhood among the country people, speaking their language. He attended the Collège of Tarascon and began his career as an usher and teacher in a private school. He later occupied the position of proofreader in a printing house and finally established himself as a publisher and bookseller in Avignon. His shop became famous as a literary center. Roumanille wrote his first Provençal verses for the mere purpose, he said, of satisfying a literary fancy, of showing what could be done with that home speech which had been "dishonored" by low and coarse rhymesters. He also told how, some time later, he resolved to use it as a sole means of literary expression because his mother had been unable to understand a poem he had written in French. The important fact, however, is that he was living at a time when various trends were leading toward the Provençal renaissance. The rebirth of the provinces was being fostered by scholars, especially historians and philologists, and by the popular poets of the romantic era. Roumanille was still a young man when he conceived the idea of purifying the vernacular of his region. It was with this purpose in mind that, a few years later, he edited an anthology of contemporary poetry, Li Prouvençalo (1852). Assuming the role of a Provençal Malherbe, he applied his own simplified system of spelling to all the pieces contained in the book. His next step was to induce those poets who were singing in "the language of their mothers" to attend meetings where the destiny of the home speech, and especially the adoption of a common orthography, would be discussed. Thus he became lou rampelaire de touti lis ange troubaire (the recruiting sergeant who drummed up all the angelic troubadours). His activities were to lead to the founding of the Felibrige (1854). The program of this literary school, whose initial aim was the revival of the language and literature of the ancient troubadours, became more ambitious with the rising fame of Mistral, but Roumanille had been its true and active promoter. There lies the principal title to fame of him who was called le père du félibrige.

Unlike other Felibres, Roumanille did not publish his works with a face to face translation. He was writing for a limited public, the countryfolk of Provence. His first book, Li Margarideto (1847; The Daisies), was a collection of short poems, of a sincere, delicate, and tender realism, written in a light and easy style. He republished them in a larger volume, Lis Oubreto en vers (1859; Minor Works in Verse), which contained Christmas carols, didactic stories, and other types of familiar poetry. That same year appeared also Lis Oubreto in prosa, a book of selected political articles and pamphlets written during the Second Republic. Roumanille displayed much verve and great talent as a defender of traditional order. He was one of the first to use Provençal prose effectively, making everybody laugh, even his opponents. His real fame as a writer, however, rests principally on the short stories that, from 1855 to his death, he contributed to the Armana prouvençau, the annual organ of the Felibrige.

Roumanille is not a great poet, but he is an inimitable storyteller, a good observer of human nature, a wholesome "Rabelais de famille," as he has also been called. He was able to raise the popular tale to a certain literary dignity and turn it into a genre that satisfied both the common people and the well-read man, amusing them while teaching a lesson. Some of his best stories were published in book form, Li Conte prouvençau e li cascareleto (1883) and Contes provençaux par Joseph Roumanille avec le texte provençal et la traduction française (1911). Many of them had previously appeared in Parisian newspapers and reviews, translated and commented on by authors such as Alphonse Daudet (q.v.), Paul Arène, and Armand de Pontmartin. Among the best known are "Lou Curat de Cucugnan," "Lou Mege [physician] de Cucugnan," and "L'Ermitan de San Jaque," presented by Daudet as "Le Réveillon de Saint Jacques."

See: Saint-René Taillandier, "La Nouvelle Poésie provençale," Revue des deux mondes, October 15, 1859, pp. 807-844; P. Mariéton, F. Mistral, A. de Pontmartin, et al., Revue félibréenne, VII (1891), 65-84, 107-118; E. Ripert, La Renaissance provençale, 1800-1860 (1917), pp. 361-403; J. Aurouze, "Roumanille," Feu, XXII (1928), 192-197.

A. V. R.

Roussel, Raymond (1877-1933, French novelist, dramatist, and poet), in his life as well as in his work might almost be mistaken by the casual reader for an invention of the surrealists, who have hailed him as a precursor and a genius. Out of the mass of legend which surrounds him, this much seems clear. He was born in Paris of wealthy parents, and with no necessity of making a living or even of engaging in any useful occupation, he turned to literature as one would to a hobby. Eccentric in the extreme and undoubtedly neurotic (he was for some time under the treatment of Pierre Janet, who has described his case in De l'angoisse à l'extase, 1926, Vol. I, pp. 132-138), he wrote with no regard for literary fashion or popular approval, relating in prose or verse fantastic tales of adventure which abounded in the supernatural and were filled with impossible inventions. His great fortune enabled him to have his work published in luxurious format and, since he had a passion for the theatre and eventually adapted most of his work for dramatic presentation, to secure public performances of these plays by first-rate casts. His major works include La Doublure (1897), La Vue (1904), Impressions d'Afrique (1910), Nouvelles Impressions d'Afrique (1910), Locus Solus (1914), L'Etoile au front (1925), and La Poussière de soleils (1927). Comment j'ai écrit certains de mes livres (1935), left by Roussel to be published posthumously, is of paramount importance in describing his peculiar theory of composition.

It is almost impossible to give in any reasonable compass an adequate idea of the content of Roussel's works; it can only be noted that they suggest more than anything else a weird blend of Roussel's favorite authors, Verne, Loti (q.v.), Dumas père, and Camille Flammarion, with overtones of paranoia. Like the douanier Rousseau in painting, Roussel depicted the world with a naïve precision, wrote with a directness and lack of sophistication which probably only the most sophisticated can fully enjoy, piled melodramatic cliché upon cliché with the most delightful results. He spent most of his last years in travel and died in Palermo.

See: Roger Vitrac, "Raymond Roussel," Nouvelle Revue française, XXX (1928), 162-176; Jean Cocteau, "Note," Nouvelle Revue française, XLI (1933), 464-465; Michel Leiris, "Raymond Roussel," Nouvelle Revue française, XLIV (1935), 575-582.

C. W., Jr.

Rovetta, Gerolamo (1851-1910, Italian novelist and dramatist), was born in the city of Brescia of a family whose position and affluence permitted him at an early age to mingle with and observe all levels of society in his own and other Italian cities. He spent much of his time in Milan, then, as now, a center of great literary and industrial activity. His easy circumstances may also explain his unwillingness to submit to an artistic discipline which might have raised his best works to the rank of masterpieces. No literary innovator, Rovetta was fortunate in possessing a gift for observation and accurate reproduction which coincided with the requirements of the currently popular verismo (see Italian literature). Although these qualities are not apparent in his first novel, the excessively sentimental Mater dolorosa (1882), they are very evident in his first mature work, I Barbarò: Le Lacrime del prossimo (1885). Best and most representative of his novels is La Baraonda (1894), which depicts the materialistic society of Milan during the years of economic expansion following political unification. He describes the histrionic expatriot promoter, the quick enthusiasms of the speculating public and their swift and violent disillusionments, the inability of the aristocrat to cope with the unscrupulous parvenu, who, in turn, falls prey to the omnipotent and merciless financier. Virtue means weakness, evil alone is strong; Rovetta's uncompromising adherence to this formula, here as in Il Tenente dei lancieri (1896) and La Signorina (1900), sometimes brings his characters dangerously close to the level of caricature. This and an overabundance of detail detract from the effectiveness of his considerable gift for simple, unaffectedly powerful narration.

Most of Rovetta's extensive dramatic production exhibits a similarly extreme version of the verist formula (I Barbarò and La Baraonda were both dramatized by him, in 1890 and 1905 respectively). His La Trilogia di Dorina (1889) is not only its best expression but one of the most successful efforts of the teatro verista. Here in three rather widely separated moments in his heroine's progress from virtue and helplessness to vice and power, Rovetta presents a brilliant affirmation of his cynical credo. Alla città di Roma (1888), I Disonesti (1893), La Realtà (1895), and Papà Eccellenza (1906) are different illustrations of the same theme, with the last-named offering one of his best character studies. In 1896, sensing the renewed interest in the historical drama and, perhaps, seeking relief from the narrowness of naturalism, he turned to the early years of his century for Principio di secolo. His second attempt in this genre, Romanticismo (1901)—the title was a term contemptuously applied by the Austrians to early Italian efforts for freedom—enjoyed immense popularity through its convincing re-creation of the fervor of the struggle for independence so recently completed. With this possible exception, however, his historical manner is definitely inferior to the naturalistic.

Whether Rovetta was primarily a novelist or a dramatist is difficult to decide, largely because he was, himself, almost never able to separate his techniques. His novels make excessive use of dramatic dialogue, a defect which he recognized by describing L'Idolo (1898) and La Signorina (1900) as romanzi dialogati; many of his plays, on the other hand, attempt a breadth of canvas suited only to the novel, which results in a disproportionate number of macchiette, characters without intimate life. La Trilogia di Dorina is probably his most striking single work, but it is rather in his novels that he makes his greatest contribution, that of a chronicler of his times.

See: B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, 2d ed., III (1922), 163-167; G. Mazzoni, L'Ottocento, (1934), p. 1011; L. Tonelli, Il Teatro contemporaneo in Italia (1936), pp. 146-152.

A. T. M.

Royère, Jean (1871-, French poet and critic), was born in Aix-en-Provence and after receiving his Licence ès Lettres at Lyon went to Paris with the intention of studying philosophy. He soon tired of that subject, however, and turned first to politics and then to poetry. In 1905 he became editor of Ecrits pour l'art and in 1906 founded the review Phalange, which until the First World War was the rallying ground of the successors of symbolism (see French symbolism). His first book of verse, Exil doré, was published in 1898, and by 1920 he had added to it four small but distinguished volumes. All this work was collected in Poésies (1924); since then one more volume of his verse, Orchestration (1936), has appeared. In such collections of essays as Clartés sur la poésie (1925), Frontons (1932), and Le Point de vue de Sirius (1935), he has discussed the technique of poetry and criticized most of the chief modern poets with sensitivity and understanding, though with more intellectualism than will please some tastes. Royère can challenge Valéry (q.v.) for the distinction of being the most notable disciple of Mallarmé (q.v.) and the Abbé Bremond (q.v.) for that of the most subtle theorist of "pure poetry." From the point of view of literary history, his chief distinction is undoubtedly that of having more than any other man carried the theory and practice of orthodox symbolism on into the last two decades. As a practicing poet he is interested chiefly in sonorities, verbal music, veiled suggestion, rather than direct statement. Though his work is in the main not excessively "difficult" (certainly much less so than that of Valéry), he has from the very beginning taken as his ideal "une poésie qui contraignît le lisant à autant d'initiative que l'écrivain."

See: Paul Fort and Louis Mandin, Histoire de la poésie française depuis 1850 (1926);

Henry Derieux, La Poésie française contemporaine, 1885-1935 (1935).

C. W., Jr.

Rozanov, Mikhail Grigoriyevich, see Ognyov, Nikolai.

Rozanov, Vasili Vasilyevich (1856-1919, Russian philosopher, publicist, and critic), was an exceptionally original, bold, and controversial figure in Russian letters, scarcely known abroad, but regarded by some critics as the foremost mind of his generation. His chief recognition came from the Right, and he was at first regarded as a Slavophile and a conservative. He transcends these definitions, however, by the extreme independence of his views. He believed in the three principles of individuality, wholeness, and unity, and he attacked the contemporary regime for its failure to uphold these. The Revolution of 1905 evoked in him a passing enthusiasm, but the agnosticism and compulsory sameness of the radicals repelled him. Nevertheless he believed in the apocalyptic significance of the Revolution and the coming regeneration of Russia. At heart Rozanov was nonpolitical, with a profoundly mystical, religious philosophy opposed to systems, and an advocate of the supreme value of the human personality. His attitude toward religion was complex: he was an amoralist who proclaimed the naturalistic religion of procreateness centered round marriage and the family, and at the same time he was profoundly sympathetic to Christianity. His criticism of the Church attacked its asceticism. Throughout his life there existed in him a painful conflict over the meaning of Christ's teachings, finally resolved on his deathbed in a radiant acceptance. A puzzling dualism characterized many of Rozanov's conceptions, as in his attitude toward Russia, the Revolution, and the Jews. The core of his thinking, however, shows that Rozanov valued most in man his attraction to religion and repulsion from positivism.

Born in Vetluga of a poor, middle-class family, Rozanov graduated (1881) from the faculty of law and philosophy of the University of Moscow. For many years he taught history and geography in provincial secondary schools. Dissatisfied with the academic disciplines, he went to St. Petersburg (1893) to enter the civil service. There he became affiliated with the conservative press, serving on Novoye vremya (New Time) until its suppression in 1918. In 1880 he married the extraordinary Apollinaria Suslova, the former mistress of Dostoevski (q.v.), then a woman of about 40. It was a singularly unhappy relationship that soon ended, and by 1889 Rozanov had formed a new union with Varvara D. Rudneva, the "Friend" often cited in his pages, who became his perfect companion. He traveled occasionally in Italy, France, and Germany. The 1917 Revolution swept all economic security from under him, and he died in extreme poverty and neglect.

Rozanov's first book was O ponimanii (1886; On Understanding), a polemic of 757 pages directed against the University of Moscow and the result of five years' labor. Though unsuccessful, it attracted the attention of Strakhov, the Slavophile publicist, who introduced him to the conservative press. In 1890 he published Legenda o velikom inkvizitore (The Legend of the Grand Inquisitor), foremost of his early works, the first attempt to plumb the mind of Dostoevski and a critical analysis of phenomenal intuitive penetration containing some of his most brilliant paradoxes; included is a remarkable chapter on Gogol that placed the latter for the first time in his true relationship to Russian literature. From then on Rozanov issued a series of works on philosophy and religion: Krasota v prirode i yeya smysl (1894; Beauty in Nature and Its Meaning), setting forth his historical outlook and containing a valuable chapter on V. S. Solovyov (q.v.); Religiya i kultura (1899; Religion and Culture); Literaturnye ocherki (1899; Literary Sketches); V mire neyasnago i nereshyonnago (1901; Among Riddles and Mysteries); Semeynyi vopros v Rossii (1903; The Family Problem in Russia); Okolo tserkovnykh sten (1906; In the Shadow of Church Walls); Russkaya tserkov (1906; The Russian Church); Kogda nachalstvo ushlo (1909; When the Authorities Were Away), praising the buoyancy of the 1905 Revolution; Tyomnyi lik (1911; The Dark Face) and Lyudi lunnago sveta (1913; Moonlight Men), formulating his metaphysics of Christianity; Solitaria (1912; Eng. tr., 1927) and Opaushie listya (2 vols., 1913-1915; Fallen Leaves), which are the summits of Rozanov's stylistic mastery; Iz vostochnykh motivov (1915-1919; Oriental Motives), disclosing the secret of the ancient religions; Apokalipsis russkoy revolyutsii (1918-1919; The Apocalypse of the Russian Revolution), on the rebellion against Christianity. One must also note his brilliant preface to Fyodor Shperk's Ontology; or, The Metaphysics of Pure Being (London, 1922).

See: E. Gollerbach, V. V. Rozanov (1922; this appears in abridged form in Rozanov, Solitaria, Eng. tr. by S. S. Koteliansky, 1927);

D. S. Mirsky, Contemporary Russian Literature (1926), pp. 163-172.

N. S.

Rubió i Ors, Joaquim (1818-1899, Catalanian poet and scholar), is intimately associated with the literary movement known by the name of Renaixença (see Catalan literature). He abandoned a career in the church for one in letters. In 1847 he was appointed to the chair of general and Spanish literature in the University of Valladolid; in 1858 he moved to the University of Barcelona as occupant of the chair of universal history of literature. His major efforts were directed toward the revival of the Catalanian language and literature. In 1839, under the pseudonym "Lo Gayter del Llobregat," (The Piper of Llobregat) he published his first Catalanian composition in the Diario de Barcelona (Barcelona Daily). No one, with the exception of the editor of the newspaper, knew the identity of that new troubadour who, with exemplary faithfulness, kept writing Catalan poems for the most important daily papers of Catalonia. His verse was widely and avidly read. In 1841 he collected in the book now entitled Lo gayter del Llobregat the pieces previously published, with other new ones and an important prologue in which he demanded literary independence for Catalonia and urged love and veneration for the native tongue. The prologue had the value of a political-literary manifesto.

Rubió i Ors was one of the restorers of the poetic festival known as the Jocs Florals (see Catalan literature) in 1859. He produced works of literary investigation for different Catalanian and foreign journals and with his friend Josep Maria Grau began the publication of a collection of old Catalanian writers. His work has had a wide influence in the Catalan-speaking countries.

See: Francisco Tubino, Historia del renacimiento literario contemporáneo en Cataluña (1880); Marcelino Menéndez y Pelayo, prologue, in Rubiό i Ors, Lo gayter del Llobregat (1889); Manuel de Montoliu, Manual d'història crítica de la literatura catalana moderna (1922).

J. M. M. i V.

Rueda, Salvador (1857-1933, Spanish poet, novelist, and playwright), was born in Málaga, in the South of Spain, of humble parents. His literary education was scant, and the success he had in the field of Hispanic letters was the result of a powerful and exuberant poetic intuition. Although Rueda cultivated also the novel and drama forms, his literary fame was gained as a poet. From 1885 to 1900 the pen of Salvador Rueda completely dominated the field of Spanish verse.

His poetic production can be described in three words, color, fluidity, and fecundity. A master of easy rhythm, with his tireless pen he exalts all that surrounds him, in a profusion of sonorous, polychromatic effects. The Spanish critic Clarín (see Alas, Leopoldo) wrote the prologue for Cantos de la vendimia (1891), En tropel (1892) appeared with a prologue by Rubén Darío, and the great Spanish writer Unamuno (q.v.) is the author of the prologue to Fuente de salud (1906). Mi estética (1918) is Rueda's last book. It can be said that the work of Salvador Rueda begins and ends with him. He does not follow in the footsteps of the great traditional Spanish poetry, nor does he really create poetic forms which might perpetuate his name. His poetry is neither transcendental in content nor revolutionary in form. It is simply poetry of the senses which, on striking the ear, fills us with melody and rhythm. His poems are never worked out with the technique and discipline which normally go into the making of a literary work; but their richness of sound, their musical quality, may very well account for the almost unprecedented, if not enduring, popularity of Rueda. Very few Spanish poets have attained such fame as he briefly enjoyed, not only in Spain but in all Spanish-speaking countries.

To Salvador Rueda belongs the honor of having introduced to Madrid literary circles the great Nicaraguan poet, Rubén Darío, the real founder of the new literary movement known as modernismo. With the growth of modernismo Rueda's poetry was relegated to second place, and he lived his last years under the shadow of a really unjust oblivion.

See: A. González-Blanco, Los grandes maestros, Salvador Rueda y Rubén Darío; estudio cíclico de la lírica española en los últimos tiempos (1908); F. de Onís, Antología de la poesía española e hispanoamericana, 1882-1932 (1934).

M. de M.

Rumanian literature. Rumanians have constituted a large and homogeneous population since the year 107, when Trajan conquered Dacia. They have clung to their ancestral traditions; land tillers and shepherds, they have preserved even their ancient costumes of white cloth flowered with gracefully colored patterns. To the Latin foundation and structure of the language, Slavonic and other tongues have contributed amply. Although industrial cities rise here and there, and Bucharest the capital is quite comparable to other European centers, the country has been basically rustic—and possessed of a native folklore the literary possibilities of which have not yet been fully appreciated. Modern Rumanian writers have been particularly interested in occidental fashions, have been eager to avoid the oriental influences normal in this borderland between West and East. Some of them have also known how to exploit, with great success, the resources of the nation itself.

When in 1852 Vasile Alecsandri (1819-1890) wrote Miorița (The Lambkin), a popular ballad "corrected" by him, the first native masterpiece saw the light of publicity and the cornerstone of modern Rumanian poetry was laid. The very old song which he adapted is obviously a fragment from a longer poem lost in the vague past. As it appears in Alecsandri's version it preserves its lyric mood. And such lyricism characterizes the subsequent poetry. It was about 30 years after the publication of Miorița that Mihail Eminescu (q.v.) built the marble palace of his romantic dreams, a monument of verse craftsmanship. Blending his Western education with painstaking study of ancient peasant lore, Eminescu actually molded a poetic language as yet unsurpassed in Rumania. Disappointed in love, fleeing the commonplace and tedious, sinking more and more into his inborn sadness, he was fascinated by Kant and Schopenhauer. Descending deeper into the realm of thought, he included in his poetic world fin-de-siècle pessimism and Hindu Nirvana. The mind of this genius darkened in the prime of life, and death, in an insane asylum, cut short the radiance and warmth, richness and depth of Eminescu's verse. In his 60 completed poems occidental technique and village song blend, with unprecedented beauty. Alexandru Macedonski (1854-1920), rival of Eminescu and forerunner of Western inspirations, uses forms which in ultimate development suggest the French manner. Macedonski, in fact, wrote a book of sonnets in that language, Bronzes (1897). George Coșbuc (1866-1918) begins the epopee of peasantry, and he is nearer to the soil, singing the daily life of the people and their love for the fields. Dimitrie Anghel (q.v.) creates a world of suave sentiments, of gossamer-like flowers scented with charm. Among many others of more or less vitality, Tudor Arghezi (1880-) is markedly original.

Ion Creangă (q.v.) establishes a solid native prose. Born of peasants and educated first in his village and later in the capital of Moldavia, Jassy, he excels in retelling the ever refreshing tales of the nation and climaxes his efforts with Amintiri din copilărie (1880; Childhood Reminiscences), in which the people's lore and superstitions, work and play, hopes and disappointments, are treated with a somehow primitive and certainly bold skill. Mihail Sadoveanu (1880-) follows Creangă, with an art of his own, enlarging the scope of such fiction, writing of the mountains, forests, valleys, and streams of the land, depicting them with intimate knowledge, and painting vast murals of historic deeds. Sadoveanu's short stories and novels evoke the past, reflect the life of small towns, and above all mingle the temporary feelings of his characters with the eternal palpitation of nature. More impregnated by Western models, Alexandru Vlahuță (1858-1919) shows other ways for the future novel in Dan (1894). Duiliu Zamfirescu (1858-1922) in his serial beginning with Viața la țară (1894; Country Life) adds valuable material to the indigenous novel. Of the younger generation, Liviu Rebreanu (1885-) is recognized as an accomplished novelist in his Ion (1920), where the passion to own land stands out against a background of Transylvanian farm life, in Pădurea spânzuraților (1922; The Forest of the Hanged), an episode of the First World War, and other works.

The aboriginal religious theatre and popular puppet plays are still entertaining the masses in their numerous tiny hamlets and villages. In the larger towns and cities modern theatres produce the world's most recent drama, in translation, and at times the best of the native drama. With Ion Luca Caragiale (q.v.) comedy reaches maturity. O noapte furtunoasă (1879; Stormy Night) and Cuconul Leonida față cu reacțiunea (1879; Mister Leonida Faces the Reaction), followed by O scrisoare pierdută (1884; The Lost Letter) and De ale carnavalului (1885; Carnival Adventures), comedies of character and manners, show the inherent conflict in an oriental society which is embracing new occidental ways of life; in spite of their age and the change of customs these plays are still successfully produced. In Năpasta (1889; False Accusation) Caragiale takes up the peasant drama and, although there are moments in it as profoundly significant as in Tolstoy's (q.v.) Power of Darkness, the play does not approach in quality the author's comedies. Drama, in the deeply serious sense, comes of age with Manasse (1900) by Ronetti Roman (q.v.), where the author combines consummate technique and natural dialogue. It is the tragedy of Jewish and Christian misunderstandings, showing Roman's belief in assimilation and humanitarian solutions. Outstanding today, Victor Eftimiu (1889-) refreshes the stage by offering a poem in five acts, Înșiră-te, mărgărite (1911; Story without End), in which the people's fairy-tale characters take shape and voice. Cocoșul negru (1913; The Black Cock) continues and somehow perfects this theme.

Literary criticism counts two eminent writers, Titu Maiorescu (q.v.) and Constantin Dobrogeanu-Gherea (q.v.), opponents in the debate on "art for art's sake" vs. "art with a tendency." According to Maiorescu, the poet is an individual living in a world of his own, pursuing a dream of perfection conceived only by him and understood by the initiated few. It is thus that he interprets the poetry of Eminescu. In the light of Dobrogeanu-Gherea's conception of art, proceeding from Taine (q.v.), Eminescu on the contrary was not the detached genius, indifferent to the struggles of his downtrodden nation whose language he glorified, but the direct result of economic, social and political conditions. Art is the production of environment and time, as well as of race, and should embody a tendency. From the seeds of Dobrogeanu-Gherea's ideas germinated the Poporanist (People's) movement. Constantin Stere (1865-1936), its inspirer and leader, succeeded in bringing together most of the talented authors of the time. Seconded by Garabet Ibrăileanu (1871-1936), he emphasized the importance of the people and also the duty of intellectuals to work for the progress of the villager. Unconsciously leaning towards the Dobrogeanu-Gherea tradition, but more inclined to accept Maiorescu's aesthetics, Nicolae Iorga (q.v.), the historian and statesman as assassinated by Nazi-inspired Iron Guardists, considering the village as the foundation of Rumanianism, called his fellow writers to a new crusade for the emancipation of the oppressed. He wanted the man of letters to seek inspiration in the hamlets where the natives with their lore, songs, and tales have survived all the trials of time and shifting conditions. The criticism of the younger set, interesting and versatile, has followed in the main about the same trends.

See: G. Adamescu, Contribuțiune la bibliografia românească (1921-1928); L. Feraru, "The Development of the Rumanian Novel," Romanic Review, XVII (1926), 291-302, The Development of Rumanian Poetry (1929), and "Rumanian Literature," New International Encyclopaedia Supplement (1930), Vol. II.

L. F.

Rusiñol, Santiago (1861–1931, Catalan novelist, dramatist, and essayist), was born in Barcelona. His father was a businessman, and the son followed this example until he was 25. This period of his life and the atmosphere of Barcelona at that time are described in his novel (which was later dramatized) L'auca del senyor Esteve (Spanish tr. by G. Martínez Sierra, 1908). From then on until his death he devoted himself to painting and to literature. He died at Aranjuez, a royal country place with which his memory will always be associated, for he was the painter of its gardens. He painted the gardens of all the regions of Spain; it was in this field that he achieved his greatest artistic success, his work showing great originality. His book Jardins d'Espanya (1903; Spanish tr., Jardines de España, 1914) contains 40 reproductions of these paintings with comments by the author. His literary works, which were almost always written in Catalan and translated into Spanish, were many and varied and achieved great popularity throughout Spain. They include collections of articles on life, travels, and scenery such as Anant pel mon (1896), Oracions (1897), Fulls de la vida (1898), and L'illa de la calma (ca. 1922; Spanish tr., La isla de la calma), the last a description of the island of Majorca. He is the author of novels as well, the most outstanding being El poble gris (1902; Spanish tr. by G. Martínez Sierra, 1904), a satirical description of small-town life. But most famous of all are his dramatic works, among them the operetta L'alegria que passa (1901; Spanish tr. by Vital Aza, La alegría que pasa, 1906), El pati blau (1903; Spanish tr., El patio azul), and El mistic (1904; Spanish tr. by J. Dicenta, El místico, 1904). El mistic enjoyed a huge success in all Spain because of its religious and historical significance, dealing as it did with the life of the greatest of Catalan poets, the priest Jacint Verdaguer (q.v.). In all these many and diverse works there exists the unity which comes from the temperament of the author—a blend of humor and sentimentality, of the joy of living and wry skepticism, of brutal realism and romantic idealism.

See: G. Desdèvises du Désert, Le Théâtre catalan de Santiago Rusiñol (1906); Rubén Darío, Cabezas (1919), pp. 29–35; J. Ochoa, Santiago Rusiñol; su vida y su obra (1929); J. Passarell and A. S. Escó, Vida, obra i anècdotes d'en Santiago Rusiñol (1931).

F. de O.

Russian literature. The violent death of Tsar Alexander II in 1881 came at the end of Russia's greatest age of fiction. Dostoevski

(q.v.) died in 1881 and Turgenev (q.v.) two years later. Tolstoy (q.v.) lived on to 1910, but in 1880, after he had experienced his unique spiritual transformation, he turned his back on the kind of art that had produced War and Peace and Anna Karenina. In another respect, too, the assassination marked the end of an old and the beginning of a new literary era. There followed a period of black reaction. The revolutionary movement was suppressed, radical publications were banned, and in general progressive intellectual thinking dwindled to a vanishing point.

In such circumstances it was only natural that during the reign of Alexander III (1881–1894) literature should react violently against the utilitarian direction and social significance of the preceding period. Authors eschewed the tendentious and preferred to grapple with a content of more universal implications. The new criticism no longer cried out for literature with a social purpose; it called for more attention to form and beauty.

The towering shadow of the white-bearded prophet Tolstoy dominated the fiction writers between 1880 and 1900. It was the great novels before his spiritual revelation that they sought to imitate and not the occasional but fine tales that seemed to drop from his pen by chance after 1880 amid a sea of religious and didactic works. One of the first and best of the new generation of fiction writers influenced by Tolstoy and partly by Turgenev was V. M. Garshin (q.v.). The fame of his tragically brief creative life rests on a series of short stories, the most notable of which, particularly "Krasny tsvetok" (1883; Eng. tr., "The Scarlet Blossom," in The Signal and Other Stories, 1912), reveal a moral sensitivity and an infinite compassion for the injured and thwarted victims of man's inhumanity. The matter and not the manner of his narratives pleases, and his fondness for the morbid became the hallmark of so many writers of this feckless age.

If radicalism had a real literary representative during this period of repression, it was V. G. Korolenko (q.v.). His first important work, "Son Makara" (1885; Eng. tr., title story in Makar's Dream and Other Stories, 1892), written in the year he was allowed to return to Russia from exile in Siberia, is the story of a Yakut. Succeeding tales draw upon his Siberian experiences. With a poet's feeling, and directly in the tradition of Turgenev, he describes the stark beauty of the snowy wastes of the North. His characters are often victims of man's exploitation. At best, Korolenko's radicalism is a form of idealism, a yearning after that state of society when man's innate goodness will finally triumph. Invariably he brings his stories down to earth by a delightful humor, as charming as Gogol's funmaking in his early tales. Korolenko deserves a place as a minor classic among Russian writers.

Indeed, Korolenko's rank as a writer of fiction would have been first among his contemporaries if his principal rival had not been Anton Pavlovich Chekhov (q.v.). It was not until "A Dreary Story" in 1889 that Chekhov entered upon his mature period. Here we find that mutual lack of understanding among characters and the psychological development of a mood that combine to form the familiar "Chekhovian state of mind." In this new manner there soon followed those perfect little masterpieces, "The Duel," "Ward 6," "An Anonymous Story," "My Life," and others. They are tight, compact expressions of autumnal moods; subtly contrived emotional and symbolic overtones fit naturally into a marvelously unified construction. His characters lack individuality, for the emphasis is placed on the creation of a poetic atmosphere. This same trait is also very pronounced in his highly popular and unique dramas. The striking undramatic quality of his plays is not an innovation, as is commonly supposed, but simply a further refinement of something already found in certain plays of Ostrovski and especially in those of Turgenev. As in the stories, the dominant note is one of gloom, depression, and futility subtly intensified by an underlying emotional symbolism.

After the golden age of poetry with Pushkin and his immediate disciples (1800-1840), the muse was silenced, or nearly so, by the wonderful flowering of prose fiction. Only the lyric sweetness and exquisite craftsmanship of Tyutchev and Fet and the social realism of the vigorous verse of Nekrasov could compete for public favor with the great novels. In the late 80's and early 90's, however, there was something of a revival in poetry. "Beauty" and "melancholy" became popular themes. The so-called "civic poets" mouthed their melancholy over social injustice in indifferent verse, and the "art for art's sake" poets indulged a melancholy love for pure beauty which they distilled from a variety of lost causes.

The most popular of the civic poets was S. Y. Nadson (q.v.). His principal rival for popular favor was A. N. Apukhtin (q.v.), whose poetry reflected the same impotent regret, but it was a hedonist's regret for the lost pleasures of youth and was expressed in a more virile, realistic verse.

Rising considerably above the thriving but undistinguished level of poetry during this period was the verse of V. S. Solovyov (q.v.). A man of extraordinary contrasts in his intellectual life, Solovyov has won the reputation of being one of Russia's most brilliant philosophical thinkers and cleverest writers of nonsense verse. In poetry he combined the verbal wit and funmaking of a Thomas Hood with the profound mystical experiences of a Blake. His longest poem, Tri svidaniya (1891; The Three Meetings), reveals a characteristic thinness of form, but it also combines in a paradoxical manner humorous irreverence with a mystical meaning at once sublime and baffling.

Beneath the oppression and sense of frustration in the 80's and 90's, revolutionary forces were slowly but surely gathering. A new force had also entered the prolonged struggle against autocracy—that of Russian Marxism. The fundamentally scientific doctrine of Marx appealed strongly to disillusioned intellectuals and brought new hope to the whole radical movement. By a miracle of compromise, all liberal and radical forces managed to form a united front against the government; their efforts culminated in the disastrous 1905 Revolution. The high hopes of the revolutionists were blasted, and their disillusion found expression in literature in an antipolitical individualism, in the growth of aestheticism, and often in fiction of a pronounced erotic nature.

The popular school of fiction at this time, and one that drew much of its inspiration from the realism of Chekhov, had as its earliest and most powerful representative Maxim Gorky (q.v.). His initial service was to liberate Russian realism from its conservative traditions, for the realism of the great novelists from 1850 to 1900 had been subject to the same restraints and conventions as the realism of English Victorian fiction. Gorky belonged to the provincial proletariat, and he already had had a background of bitter experiences among the lost men and women of Russia's lower depths when he attracted international notice before he was 30 with two volumes of collected stories (1898). The tales strike a characteristic note—profound interest in the misery of Russia's masses. In these forgotten people Gorky sees a poetry, a dignity and beauty, and a strength that will one day enable them to throw off their shackles.

To Gorky's second period belong novels such as Foma Gordeyev (1899; Eng. tr., 1901), Mat (1907–1908; Eng. tr., Mother, 1907), and Matvei Kozhemyakin (1911), concerned with the vicious life and immorality of provincial Russia. Their somber, bitter realism is only occasionally relieved. Endless talk about the “meaning of life,” a penchant for philosophizing of which Gorky never rid himself, is one of the worst features. This same fault serves to make his plays rather bad imitations of Chekhov, although Na dne (1902; Eng. tr., The Lower Depths, 1912) achieved vast popularity both in and outside of Russia. This period of novels and plays was soon followed by another, in which Gorky devoted himself largely and with great success to autobiographical writing and to a wonderful volume of recollections of the authors he had known.

Gorky's radical activities before 1917 and his declared sympathies for the Communists won him a place as the foremost literary figure of the Soviet Revolution, a place that he retained until his death in 1936. He performed many valuable cultural services for the new regime, and hordes of young Soviet authors regarded him reverentially as their master. Although most of his fiction presents a picture of Russian life that is so dark, cruel, and ugly, it is not essentially pessimistic, for rising above the pervading gloom is always the vision of another brighter and happier Russia. Gorky always leaves one with the feeling that Russia is still the most wonderful country in the world, where “even the fools are original.”

Around Gorky and his publishing firm Znaniye there rallied a group of writers who reveled in outspoken realism and went as far in the direction of revolutionary protest as the government authorities would permit. Prominent among them were Y. N. Chirikov, V. V. Veresayev (q.v.), Ivan Shmelyov (1875–), A. Serafimovich (q.v.), and Skitalets (S. G. Petrov, 1868–). Of greater stature, however, were three or four authors who belonged to Gorky's generation and in certain respects were influenced by him, but they were all men of original ability, and at least two of them possessed literary talent of a very high order.

Poyedinok (1905; Eng. tr., The Duel, 1916) made A. I. Kuprin (q.v.) famous over night. This novel of army life was the logical successor of a series of early stories, in which morbid young army officers brood over the meaning of life, and wretched soldiers suffer under the brutality of their superiors. There is more of the influence of Chekhov than Gorky in it, and the character drawing is well done. Kuprin's succeeding novels, such as Izumrud, Sulamif (1908; Eng. tr., 1923), and Yama (1912; Eng. tr., 1922), also popular, represent a falling off in artistic power. Something of a sensation seeker in subject matter, his considerable ability was often forced to serve themes for which he had no natural aptitude.

I. A. Bunin (q.v.) was a nominal follower of Gorky in his youth, but he has closer literary ties with such predecessors as Turgenev, Tolstoy, and Chekhov, and in some respects he is a finer artist than any of the writers of Gorky's generation. Although a poet of some distinction, it is as a novelist that he has achieved his greatest fame. His stories began to appear as early as 1892, but his first novel, Derevnya, was not published until 1910 (Eng. tr., The Village, 1923). This book was followed by some of his best fiction—Sukhodol (1912; Eng. tr., “Dry Valley,” in The Elaghin Affair and Other Stories, 1935), Chasha zhizni (1914; The Cup of Life), and his famous story Gospodin iz San Frantsisko (1916; Eng. tr., The Gentleman from San Francisco, 1923). In The Village Bunin left behind him the sentimental stories of his early period and wrote a bitter realistic social novel of the misery and primitivism of Russian country life. The peasant is faithfully portrayed. Gorky's fault of excessive philosophizing, in The Village, is overcome in “Dry Valley,” perhaps Bunin's greatest work, the concentrated story of the disintegration of a landowning family told from the point of view of a female servant. Bunin is a strange combination of the realist and the romantic, and at his best he is one of the most original writers of Russian prose today.

The author who for a time became a serious rival of Gorky for popular favor was Leonid Andreyev (q.v.). His first short stories show the influence of the new realism of Gorky, and in his favorite themes of death and sex he was inspired by Tolstoy's later fiction. After the failure of the 1905 Revolution, Andreyev catered to the widespread disillusion by treating death and sex in a morbid and sensational manner. He became the leader of a short-lived group of fiction writers whose outlook was entirely nihilistic. His early style, learned from Tolstoy's problem stories, is restrained, logical, and effective; later he is sensational, shrill, rhetorical, and full of bad taste. Yet this second style was tremendously admired in his day as he used it in such famous stories as “Krasny smekh” (1904; Eng. tr., The Red Laugh, 1905), “Tak bylo” (1906, Thus It Was; Eng. tr., title story in When the King Loses His Head and Other Stories, 1920), “Judas Iscariot” (1907; Eng. tr. in The Crushed Flower and Other Stories, 1916), and “Proklyatiye zverya” (1908; The Curse of the Beast). Andreyev became a specialist in madness and horror, and his persistent message was physical death and the annihilation of society, morals, and culture. Occasionally he would revert to his early restraint, as in two of his finest tales, "Gubernator" (1906; The Governor) and "Rasskaz o semi poveshennykh" (1908; Eng. tr., The Seven Who Were Hanged, 1909), the latter a story of five terrorists and two common murderers. Although highly representative of one phase of the period in which he lived, Andreyev by no means measured up to the qualities of the best artist. There was more tinsel and fake than sincerity and human sympathy.

In this fiction of pessimism the only popular rival of Andreyev was M. P. Artsybashev (q.v.). His enormously successful novel Sanin (1907; Eng. tr., Sanine, 1914) was a response to the sexual emancipation that reflected one aspect of the nihilism of despair gripping the intelligentsia after the failure of the 1905 Revolution. The theme was one that has been run into the ground in modern fiction—he true to yourself and follow your natural inclinations. With Artsybashev, the natural inclinations were all reduced to carnal desire.

Various forces were at work in the 90's in opposition to the Gorky-Andreyev school and particularly to the dominance of social significance and nihilistic thought in literature. There was a definite turning away from civic morality to aestheticism, from duty to beauty, and cultural and individual values were stressed at the expense of political and social values. Most of the participators in this movement were brilliant intellectuals; their efforts represented a degree of cultural refinement that had never been achieved by any literary group in Russia hitherto. Aesthetic, mystic, and religious philosophers took part in this revolt against the civic-minded intelligentsia, and much of the impetus was provided by those extraordinary painters and writers on art, Diaghilev and Benois, in their lavish monthly magazine, Mir iskusstva (The World of Art), founded in 1898.

One of the earliest and most influential of the modernists was D. S. Merezhkovski (q.v.). After an initial volume of conventional verse in 1888, he emerged as the champion of the "new ideas" of a group of writers, among whom were prominent his talented wife, Zinaida Hippis (q.v.), N. M. Minski (q.v.), and Volynski (A. L. Flekser, 1863–1926). A certain vagueness characterized the revolt in its early stages, but over the next few years Merezhkovski devoted a stream of philosophic criticism, historical novels, plays, and pamphlets to elaborating his central idea concerning the opposition of the Greek conception of the sanctity of the flesh and the Christian conception of the sanctity of the spirit and the necessity of synthesis. This antithetical approach in one aspect or another dominated nearly everything he wrote, until it resulted in a kind of ideological madness that seriously vitiated his literary performance. In one of his best-known works, Tolstoi i Dostoyevski, Tolstoy becomes the "seer of the flesh" and Dostoevski the "seer of the spirit." Merezhkovski was the founder of the Religious-Philosophical Society which provided, at the turn of the century, a meeting ground for God-seeking intellectuals.

Religious-philosophical speculation became the province of some of the most original minds. As in the case of Merezhkovski, Dostoevski inspired much of this theorizing. V. V. Rozanov (q.v.) first attracted general attention by his study Legenda o velikom inkvizitore (1890; The Legend of the Grand Inquisitor), a penetrating commentary on the incident in The Brothers Karamazov. In a series of later works he went on to attack the ascetic religion of Christ to which he opposed the primitive naturalistic religion that he found in the Old Testament. There was a pronounced amorality in his thinking that takes the form of a phallic symbolism.

Like him, Leo Shestov (q.v.), also an irrationalist and an amoralist, found his starting point in Dostoevski, but he was also much influenced by Nietzsche (q.v.), who attracted many Russian writers at this time. Shestov warred against idealism in all its forms (e.g., Potestas Clavium, 1916). He was a seeker after God, but it was a God divorced from the good and reason, a God that transcended the traditional standards of morality and logic. Besides being highly independent thinkers, Rozanov and Shestov are remarkable for the excellence of their prose style.

The emphasis upon aesthetics and mysticism in the works of such writers as Merezhkovski, Rozanov, and Shestov provided an easy transition to symbolism, for a mystical interpretation of the world was an aesthetic principle held in common by nearly all the Russian symbolists between 1890 and 1910. Baudelaire and Mallarmé (qq.v.) helped to inspire this new movement, but Russian writers, unlike the French, deliberately made a philosophy of symbolism as well as a new form of poetical expression. A new vocabulary or, better, a new way of using old phrases, a subordination of sense to sound, and a symbolic use of words produced that impression of obscurity which became associated with writers of the movement. Everything became significant to them, not in itself, but as a reflection of something else.

Perhaps to V. Y. Bryusov (q.v.) belongs the credit for starting the movement with a collection of poems published in Ruskiye simvolisty (Russian Symbolists) in 1894. For some 10 years he had been regarded as a kind of poetical fraud, and his verses had been the chief butt of the critics, but by 1906 he had won his long battle and was accepted as the head of a school that represented the whole of Russian poetry at the time. His poem Stephanos, published in 1906, aroused enthusiasm, and his review, Vesy (The Balance), was accepted as the most cultured and authoritative publication in the country. Though a weaver of gorgeous imagery that is often more gaudy than meaningful, Bryusov's poetic and even his prose style frequently bears the traces of chilly, studious premeditation.

K. D. Balmont (q.v.) shared with Bryusov the honor of being one of the first of the symbolists in the field by virtue of his early volume of verse, Pod severnym nebom (1894; Under Northern Skies). There is more sound than sense in Balmont's poetry, nothing of the intellectual quality of Bryusov's, and very little of the symbolic quality characteristic of the whole school. Succeeding volumes of verse added to his reputation for possessing a sense of form and richness of rhythm almost unique among Russian poets. But in his voluminous later works the richness began to cloy and the patterns of sound became monotonous.

Bryusov and Balmont were more interested in the language of poetry than in its content, and their symbolism was more a matter of theory than practice. With this movement, however, were soon associated a group of writers, some of them of remarkable talent, who brought a subtle intellection and at times a profound philosophical quality to the literature of symbolism. Zinaida Hippis reveals in both her prose and her poetry a fondness for abstract ideas and an unusual skill in psychological observation. A more flawless and delicate symbolist poet was I. F. Annenski (q.v.), whose Kiparisovy lavets (The Cypress Chest), published in 1910, a year after his death, contains a small collection of lyrics that for compression, subtleness, and precision were scarcely equaled by any of the other symbolist writers.

Annenski was a classical scholar of some note, but he failed to make the Greek spirit as definite a part of his intellectual equipment as did a still greater Greek scholar and contemporary symbolist poet, Vyacheslav Ivanov

(q.v.). The mystic religions of Greece have left their mark on Ivanov's thought in a curious identification of Christ and Dionysus. Like most of the symbolists, he welcomed the Revolution of 1905 and became the prophet of a new revolutionary philosophy that has been popularly denominated mystical anarchism. Between 1905 and 1911 Ivanov remained the leader of the Petersburg symbolists, opposing his doctrine that art was a mystical religious activity to that of the Moscow symbolists, headed by Bryusov, who believed that the autonomy of art must be preserved against religion and philosophy. His best verse is contained in two volumes entitled Cor Ardens (1911), in which the ornate style reaches a high degree of perfection. Ivanov's poetic language has a carefully wrought Byzantine richness about it, and the prevailing subject matter is metaphysical. After the 1917 Revolution he accepted the new order and lent his great talents to the Communist cause.

Of the symbolist writers already mentioned, all had enjoyed the educational and cultural advantages that went with belonging to upper-middle-class families. One of the most remarkable authors in the whole symbolist movement, and one of the most refined poets of the earlier group, came from the lower class and made his way to fame under trying material circumstances. This was Sologub (q.v.). He did not receive widespread recognition until the publication of his extraordinary novel, Melki bes (1907; Eng. tr., The Little Demon, 1916). Sologub's peculiar Manichaean attitude towards life, in which he rejected the visible world as something inexpressibly vulgar for an ideal world of beauty of his own creating, is fully revealed in this novel. In The Little Demon the real world is depicted as one of incredible misery and squalor, fearfully symbolized by the hero Peredonov, one of the most striking characters in Russian fiction since Dostoevski. Other novels followed, and also short stories and plays, but the essence of the opposition between Sologub's ideal heaven and the evil diversity of the real world in which he lives is most beautifully and compellingly reflected in his poetry. Unlike the other symbolists, his vocabulary, diction, and meters are traditional, though employed with precision and felicity, but he uses words as symbols, in which the secondary and not the ordinary meaning is consistently emphasized.

Perhaps the most original and at the same time the most difficult of the symbolists was Andrei Bely (q.v.). Bely's symbolism is expressed through a curious combination of two planes of existence, the actual and the fantastic or irrational. He dissociates reality, changes its proportions, and then substitutes for it a weird, subjective world of his own that is a blend of naturalism and apocalyptic mysticism, in the realization of which Bely often indulges in delightful flights of humor. Although notable as poet, particularly for his metrical experiments, his most important contributions are in prose fiction. A series of novels, starting with Serebryany golub (1910; The Silver Dove) and followed by Peterburg (1912) and Kotik Letayev (1920), to mention only the more notable productions, reveals Bely as an exceptionally original novelist. The direction of his fiction varies from the most difficult philosophical and symbolic writing to a clear Tolstoyan realism, and his style, in its most extreme form, has some of the characteristics of James Joyce's later prose.

An author often associated with Bely, both as a symbolist and a prose stylist, is A. M. Remizov (q.v.). One phase of his creative process is thoroughly dominated by a profound knowledge of folk legends and tales, and his manner is deeply influenced by skaz, i.e., a language based on the living speech of the folk. The other important aspect of his creative process is his realism as exemplified by his novels. Such tales as Povest o Ivane Semyonoviche Stratilatove—Neuyomny buben (1909; The Story of Stratilatov), an account of provincial life with some striking character creations, and Pyataya yazva (1912; Eng. tr., The Fifth Pestilence, 1927), another story of provincial life in all its ugliness, are written in a rich, ornamental, and highly mannerized style. Later novels are deliberately simple. Like Bely, he applies to his prose the infinite care that is customarily applied to poetry, and the results have had a powerful influence on succeeding writers of fiction.

Two clear directions had been manifesting themselves in symbolist literature. The first, aesthetic, emphasized refinement of form; the second laid stress on religious-mystical feelings and the creation of dreamworlds often realistically envisaged. These fuse in the works of the greatest of the symbolist poets, A. A. Blok (q.v.). His first volume of poetry, Stikhi o prekrasnoi dame (1904; Verses about the Lady Beautiful), contained the history of the poet's mystical "love affair" with a person identified with Sophia, the Divine Wisdom, a feminine hypostasis of the Deity, the subject of Solovyov's Tri svidaniya. The meaning evades anyone who is not well versed in the mystical experiences of Blok, but the verbal music of this volume revealed a poet of consummate technique. In a subsequent volume, Blok's mystical mistress deserts him and is replaced by an obsession for a strange woman who haunts his dreams. The poet in his disillusionment turns to more earthy and material themes, many of them effectively handled in a characteristic combination of realistic irony and romantic lyricism.

Blok reached his poetical maturity about 1908. Lyrics and longer pieces of great power followed, in which one occasionally obtains a glimpse of a new love—a love of Russia. With this new love came a dawning political consciousness that manifested itself fitfully between lengthening periods of despair. After the 1917 Revolution he found himself on the side of the Soviets, like Bryusov and Bely, but perhaps for different reasons, since Blok saw in the revolt a great cleansing fire that would purify the soul of Russia. And this conception of the Communist Revolution found expression in his greatest poem, Dvenadtsat (1918; Eng. tr., The Twelve, 1920), a miracle of revolutionary mysticism and metrical harmony. After this tremendous effort, Blok's revolutionary enthusiasm and poetic fervor gave way again to his chronic despair and passive gloom, and he died three years later (1921), his fame secure as perhaps the greatest Russian poet since Lermontov.

The Twelve was the swan song of symbolism. Blok's own development led him from the abstract in symbolism to the actuality of life. As early as the winter of 1912–1913 new forces began to appear. Two symbolists, Sergei Gorodetski (1884–) and N. S. Gumilyov (q.v.), issued a manifesto, in which they declared a revolt against "the mists, shadowy forms, and vague outlines" of symbolism, and announced their intention to "sing the praise of the living world." A new school was formed, called the Acmeists, and its three chief disciples were Gumilyov, a poet of genuine power, Anna Akhmatova (q.v.), who wrote brief autobiographical poems notable for their vivid realism and chiseled language, and Osip Mandelstam (q.v.), a poet who laid much stress on form.

Further opposition to symbolism appeared at this time in the declaration and poetry of still another school—the futurists. Igor Severyanin (q.v.) was one of the earliest in the field, quickly followed by Velimir Khlebnikov (q.v.), with his savage onslaughts on grammar and syntax, and the immensely talented Vladimir Mayakovsky (q.v.), who overwhelmed his readers with manifestoes that demanded the destruction of all literary traditions in the name of a new flesh and blood art that would do away with the pale aestheticism of the symbolists and the dry academism of the classics. The poetic program of the original futurist, the Italian Marinetti (q.v.), was adopted with Russian variations: verse must now celebrate the modern era of the metropolis, of telephones, cinemas, airplanes, and skyscrapers, and it must do it with a special "wireless imagination" and in a style emancipated from syntax and punctuation.

Meanwhile Russia was plunged into the First World War, which had little immediate effect upon the course of literary development. The February Revolution of 1917 that overthrew the monarchy aroused general enthusiasm, but there was no time for literature. The Bolshevik October Revolution which quickly followed and resulted in the defeat of the Provisional Government was pregnant with all the dark forces of civil war.

The fratricidal struggle lasted from 1917 to 1920, and during these terrible years widespread material privations and the lack of any means of publication almost completely interrupted literary production. Since long prose works were out of the question, poetry was nearly the only literary fare. And much of this was scribbled on scraps of paper and publicly recited by poets to half-fed and half-clothed gatherings in cafés. The man who sprang into sudden fame at this time was Mayakovsky, the futurist, but now he had boisterously accepted the Revolution and roared forth to bewildered listeners a poetry filled with fierce slogans that glorified the proletariat and condemned the bourgeoisie and their effete literature. His principal rival was Sergei Yesenin (q.v.), a peasant by birth. Apart from the coarse aggressiveness of his "hooligan poetry," he celebrated in lyrics of ineffable sweetness the joys of the village that would come with the new regime.

The animosities of civil strife and the obvious shape of things to come soon forced nearly all writers to take sides in the bitter struggle. Many of the older writers left the country. Serafimovich, Sergeyev-Tsenski (q.v.), and Vercsayev stayed behind; Bryusov joined the Communist Party, but was never happy in his allegiance and died in 1924; and Blok embraced the Revolution, but he too lived only a short time after it.

Certain definite tendencies began to manifest themselves. Marxian critics demanded that a Communist culture should be developed that would reflect the political, social, and economic ideals of the new proletarian regime. In 1920 the Proletkult was organized, to direct the struggle for a proletarian culture on an international scale. The spiritual struggle and tragic sense of futility of the old literature of the intelligentsia were banished and were replaced by a brave acceptance of life and a practical activism.

In their insistence upon the social tasks and duties of the new proletarian literature, the Proletkult authors fell into hopeless wrangling over means and ends. Two schools of thought arose. The moderate school, supported by Trotsky, A. V. Lunacharski, and the critic Voronski, argued that it was impossible to create a proletarian literature by government fiat and that at first much of value could be learned from the old bourgeois art and culture. The extremists, known as the On Guard group, frankly favored the idea of literary dictatorship and demanded a definite class-literature. They were supported by Mayakovsky's LEF (Left Front) group. For a time the moderates won out. One fortunate result was that the pages of the new periodicals were opened to the nonpolitical members of still another group, the Serapion Brothers, founded in 1921. Most of these writers were intellectuals and capable of producing work of high artistic value, but they insisted upon the creative freedom of the individual. At the same time other young authors who, like the Serapion Brothers, accepted the Revolution as an accomplished fact, although they did not personally adhere to Communism, were encouraged to produce by the new dispensation; they were not hostile to the new order, and later most of them definitely accepted it. Trotsky labeled them "fellow travelers" (poputchiki), and their efforts helped materially in inaugurating the first positive step forward in Soviet literature.

This first advance manifested itself mostly in fiction and coincided with the period of the NEP (New Economic Policy, 1922-1928). It was almost inevitable that this initial phase should deal with the wealth of material provided by the Revolution and civil war. Stirring events of violence and adventure, many of them lived by the young writers themselves, were eagerly seized upon. One of the earliest works to attract attention for its gruesome depiction of revolutionary violence was Goly god (1922; Eng. tr., The Naked Year, 1928) by Boris Pilnyak (q.v.), who is attracted more by the chaos and the barbaric actions let loose by revolution than by its hopeful ideology.

One of the most brilliant of the early writers on civil war themes is Vsevolod Ivanov (q.v.). At first he concentrated his efforts mostly on depicting guerrilla warfare in Siberia in Partizany (1922; The Partisans) and Bronepoyezd 14-69 (1922; Eng. tr., Armored Train 14-69, 1933). His civil-war characters are vivid and real, primitive in their emotions and actions, and he has a gift for handling mass scenes.

Another able painter of the romantic side of the civil war is Dmitri Furmanov (q.v.), whose best book, Chapayev (1923), is an authentic document of a peasant who became the popular commander of a whole division and saved Uralsk from the White forces. Also dealing with authentic material is Isaak Babel's (q.v.) Konarmiya (1926; Eng. tr., Red Cavalry, 1929), a collection of stories based on the author's experiences with Budyonny's Cossacks. These brief sketches are told with extraordinary concentration and a consummate mastery of the racy language of the Cossacks.

On the whole, this early fiction dealing with the Revolution and civil war was concerned with forthright realistic or documentary narrative and eschewed the psychological analysis of the old Russian masters. Although the initial tendency had been to condemn all literature of the past in building a new proletarian culture, the very leaders of the Communist Party stressed the need of learning from the best prerevolutionary writers. And over this early period of the New Economic Policy novelists began to appear who treated themes connected with civil strife, but with a different emphasis and often in the traditional manner of Dostoevski, Tolstoy, and Chekhov.

Konstantin Fedin (q.v.) was one of these authors, and his novel Goroda i gody (1924; Cities and Years) aroused great interest. It is the story of a Russian prisoner of war in Germany who returns to engage in revolutionary activity. The hero is a self-centered intellectual, and the story concerns his inner struggle, in which he eventually betrays the Revolution. Fedin treats revolution not as a glorious event, but as a profoundly disturbing psychological problem.

There is the flavor of Chekhov's Russia in Fedin's tales and of Dostoevski in the spiritual doubts of his heroes. Dostoevski's influence, however, is much more pronounced in the art of Leonid Leonov (q.v.), one of the most distinguished Soviet novelists. In Leonov's first full-length novel, Barsuki (1924; The Badgers), a typical Dostoevskian psychological approach is employed in the development of characters cast against a background of revolution. The theme is the fierce antagonism between town and village represented in two brothers, one a city-bred Communist, the other a village kulak.

Leonov's tendency to blend analysis with the description of social events and their implied psychological problems became more pronounced in his later works. Critics praised his fiction as a bridge between Soviet realists and the classics of the past, a compliment that clearly indicated the bankruptcy of the early attempts to create a self-contained proletarian literature by laboratory methods. This link with the past is still more deeply rooted in A. N. Tolstoy (q.v.), who had acquired literary fame before the Revolution. Of first-rate importance is his trilogy, Khozhdeniye po mukam (1921-1941; partial Eng. trs., The Road to Calvary, 1923, Darkness and Dawn, 1935; complete tr., Road to Calvary, 1946), in which he presents a picture of Russia before, during, and after the Revolution. The picture is authentic, most of the characters are thoroughly alive, and his language, as nearly always with A. N. Tolstoy, is most effective.

Alexander Fadeyev's (1901-) first novel, Razgrom (1926, The Rout; Eng. tr., The Nineteen, 1929), betrays the obvious influence of Leo Tolstoy in its fresh realism and clear psychological insight. Like Vsevolod Ivanov, Fadeyev exploits his special knowledge of Siberia, for Razgrom paints a broad, exciting picture of the civil war in that region. The work won him immediate fame, and he took a place among the leading Soviet writers with his next and longest novel, Posledni iz Udege (The Last of the Udegs), which began to appear in 1929. Again the locale is Siberia and the main action concerns the civil war.

These writers of fiction in the early period of Soviet literature vary in their technique, yet it is clear that a well-marked tendency to return to the traditional realistic manner began to increase after 1927. Some authors, however, were confessed followers of the modernistic, almost James Joycean, technique of Bely and Remizov.

The period of the New Economic Policy was succeeded by the first Five-Year Plan which Stalin inaugurated in 1928. The slogan was "Socialism in One Country," and again, as in the days of the Proletkult, an attempt was made to regiment literature. A few interested Communists, with the critic Averbakh in the lead, seized control of the Russian Association of Proletarian Writers (RAPP) and laid down the uncompromising program that the depiction of the Five-Year Plan and of the class war within its framework was the only problem of Soviet literature. An extensive campaign began, and all who refused to hew to the line found themselves outlawed. The results of this "planned literature" were for the most part unsatisfactory. Widespread discontent arose, and finally in 1932, largely through the influence of Gorky, a government edict dissolved the Russian Association of Proletarian Writers, and the literary dictatorship was brought to an end. A general Association of Soviet Writers was formed which was thrown open to all; leading authorities expressed the belief that the majority of Soviet authors sympathized with the efforts of socialist construction and that it was pointless to demand of them outward proofs of political loyalty. The extremists were defeated and once again the lesson was driven home that literature can not flourish in chains.

The Five-Year Plan, in fact, provided plenty of material for fiction, and various writers treated it in various ways. Leonov, after his novel Vor (1925; Eng. tr., The Thief, 1931), which dealt with the period of the New Economic Policy, turned his attention to socialist reconstruction in two novels Sot (1930; Eng. tr., Sot, 1931, American title, Soviet River, 1932) and Skutarevski (1933; Eng. tr., 1936). The first of these deals with the transformation of a northern wilderness into a busy center of the paper industry, and the second concerns a large-scale electrification task. Scientific technicalities abound in these tales of socialist reconstruction, but Leonov's characteristic Dostoevskian concern for the "inner man" and his spiritual doubts over the blessings of the Revolution are everywhere in evidence.

Another fellow traveler, Pilnyak, took up the theme of reconstruction in his novel Volga upadayet v Kaspiskoye more (1930; Eng. tr., The Volga Falls to the Caspian Sea, 1931). The plot involves the family tragedies of three engineers who are engaged in the task of diverting the course of a river, and the narrative is freely sprinkled with the technical details of construction, a practice generally adopted by the novelists of this period, and one that may have had an educative value but makes for hard reading. The novel clearly suggests that Pilnyak found it hard to accept the vast industrialization program. In his more recent work, Sozrevaniye plodov (1936; The Ripening of the Fruit), he evinces for the first time what seems like a sincere enthusiasm for the aims of the Soviet regime.

One of the most laboriously documented novels of socialist reconstruction was F. V. Gladkov's (q.v.) Energiya (1933; Energy). He had previously written a tremendously popular novel, Tsement (1924; Eng. tr., Cement, 1929), that had described the zest with which the workers turned to social and economic reconstruction once civil war had ended. Energiya tells the story of Dneprostoi and of the men and women who built the vast construction. What was intended to be a great human epic of socialist labor and triumph runs dangerously close to being simply the excessively detailed reporting of a tremendous feat of engineering.

Much better as a reconstruction novel was Valentin Katayev's (q.v.) Vremya vperyod! (1932; Eng. tr., Time, Forward! 1933), which tells the story of shock brigades competing in the pouring of cement. The action consumes only 24 hours, and the narrative moves with verve and excitement, for Katayev, one of the best Soviet novelists, is a master in depicting external action. While obvious sincerity, real joy, and justifiable pride were manifested in much of this fiction concerning the extraordinary accomplishments in the rapid industrialization of the country, a great many second-rate novels were turned out that pandered to the propaganda motifs of reconstruction at the expense of art. The unvarying pattern of Communist workers frustrating the efforts of bourgeois wreckers grew monotonous and often stupid.

To this period also belongs the flowering of the genius of perhaps the greatest novelist in Soviet literature—Mikhail Sholokhov (q.v.). He began his long epic of Cossack life, Tikki Don (The Silent Don) in 1926–1930, but interrupted it to write Podnyataya tselina (1932–1933; Eng. tr., Virgin Soil Uplifted, American title, Seeds of Tomorrow, both 1935), a novel dealing with the life of the new collective-farm Cossacks. Sholokhov then returned to his masterpiece, which was not finished until 1940. He is the most Tolstoyan of Soviet novelists. There is much of Tolstoy's epic sweep and his wonderful sense of realism in The Silent Don (Eng. tr., 1942; this translation earlier appeared in two volumes, And Quiet Flows the Don, 1934, The Don Flows Home to the Sea, 1940), and Sholokhov's restraint and sense of proportion, his delicate handling of contrasts and parallels, and the simplicity of his character drawing are qualities that remind one of Tolstoy.

In the whole development of fiction up to this point, there was no lack of criticism of Soviet life, a fact not commonly appreciated abroad. Satire was a favorite weapon, and although it was often directed against capitalist civilization, satire of the vices and foibles of Soviet life and the absurdities of Soviet officialdom was freely tolerated, provided it did not attack the fundamental ideals of the new order.

Y. I. Zamyatin (q.v.), an older writer, was a powerful satirist; Ilya Ehrenburg (q.v.) combines a clever vein of satire with a bright attractive style; Bulgakov's Dyaboliada (1925; The Deviliad) pokes fun, not always good-natured, at Soviet life and bureaucracy; Katayev's fine novel Rastratchiki (1927; Eng. tr., The Embezzlers, 1929) is a mordant satire on two naïvely irresponsible state officials who steal; and two of the most recently popular satirical and humorous writers and devoted collaborators have been Ilya Ilf and Yevgeni Petrov (qq.v.). The most widely read Soviet humorist, however, is Mikhail Zoshchenko (q.v.). An early member of the Serapion Brothers, he lately has become a loyal supporter of the Soviet regime. More than 10 volumes of his short stories have been published. Small incidents and comic trifles are most often his themes, but beneath the humor there is always latent a deft criticism of the abuses, foibles, and vices of Soviet life.

During the period of the Five-Year Plan, and even earlier, novelists by no means neglected those vitally real ethical problems that arose from the conflict of the new Communist conscience and ideals with the traditional views on sex, love, marriage, and the family. Such problems concern Sergeyev-Tsenski, a writer of the old school, who has become a prominent Soviet novelist. The transition from bourgeois Russia to the new Soviet society is the principal theme of his series of ambitious novels beginning with Preobrazheniye (1923; Eng. tr., Transfiguration, 1926). With a somewhat similar theme in mind, Panteleimon Romanov (q.v.) designed a series of novels under the general title Rossiya (Russia), but he soon abandoned this larger project for separate novels on less complicated aspects of the early period of Soviet life. Yuri Libedinski (q.v.) also addresses himself to ethical and social problems, especially in his best work, Rozhdeniye geroya (1930; The Birth of a Hero), in which he writes of love, family, and education in Soviet society.

In the early days of the Revolution, Mayakovsky and his followers rang the death knell of symbolism. But the futurism that displaced symbolism soon betrayed its inadequacies. The telegraphic language and wireless imagination of the futurists baffled the proletariat. And Mayakovsky eventually abandoned his poetic excesses, brought his muse down to the proletarian earth, and turned his great talents with a will to the service of the Revolution. He wrote poems about bread prices, the New Economic Policy, the food supply, and international events. He declared war on sensibility, meditation, and tenderness, and no doubt his denying these qualities, which were a genuine part of his nature, contributed to the disillusionment that helped to bring about his unfortunate suicide in 1930.

By insisting upon the communal function of verse, Mayakovsky exercised a tremendous influence on subsequent poetry. His demand that Soviet poets participate in social creation and life was enthusiastically accepted by many younger writers, but none of these followers could equal the effectiveness of his message, and certainly none possessed the unique dynamism of his rhythms.

The poetry of this first period after the Revolution was declarative, spacious in its ideas, and given to abstract heroics. Soon the poets, like the novelists, were split into various factions by the conflicting demands made upon them by authority, Communist conscience, and socialist needs. Poets found their way out of these controversies with much more difficulty than the novelists. Complicated questions of form and poetics in general were stumbling blocks not easily surmounted by the young untrained peasant and proletarian poets who came to the fore. Unlike fiction, Soviet poetry, except for the works of a few first-rate artists, remained for an excessively long time in a transitional stage. In the struggle between rationalism and emotionalism, mere affirmation of faith unsupported by poetic convictions and imaginative vision led to a reiteration of banalities no less flat than those in the bourgeois verse these young Soviet poets so fiercely condemned.

The real early poet laureate of the Revolution was not Mayakovsky, but Demyan Bedny (q.v.), a "Bolshevik whose weapon is poetry," as Trotsky described him. Much of his verse (there are more than 15 volumes of it) consists largely of satirical and humorous commentaries on daily events in Soviet life. A good deal of his poetry hardly rises above the level of doggerel, but the best of it has the authentic ring of genuine folk poetry.

The young writers most immediately influenced by Mayakovsky liked to think of themselves as proletarian poets, although their connection with the working class was often tenuous indeed. They began to flourish after 1923, and by far the most popular of them for a time was A. I. Bezymenski (q.v.). For all these younger proletarian poets, devotion to the Communist Party took precedence over devotion to the muse. In bombastic verse that had about as much musicality as a loud yawp Bezymenski arrogantly dismissed the past and geared his numbers to proletarian realities, as in one of his early works, Kak pakhnet zhizn (1924; How Life Smells). As he gathered experience, the party and political propaganda were used less ostentatiously as themes, and a growing realization of the sterner tasks confronting the socialist regime began to creep into his verse.

Among this group of proletarian poets, Alexander Zharov (1904-) is a paler and duller disciple of Mayakovsky; Nikolai Ushakov (1899-), in his Vesna respubliki (1927; The Spring of the Republic), is authentically Mayakovskian but possesses a more lyric strain; and Mikhail Golodny (pseud. of M. S. Epstein, 1903-), Ivan Doronin (1900-), and Mikhail Svetlov (1903-) are less proletarian in their themes and more romantic in their treatment of them. A proletarian poet with a larger vision and richer talent than any of those already mentioned is Vasili Kazin (q.v.).

Bezymenski, in his Poema o lyubvi (1932; Poem about Love), had condemned Mayakovsky's unsocial act of suicide, but Nikolai Aseyev (q.v.) honored the dead master's memory in his long narrative poem, Mayakovski nachinayetsa (1940; Mayakovsky Starts Off). Aseyev, one of the early futurists and followers of Mayakovsky, accepted the Revolution at its outset and is now regarded as one of the foremost Soviet poets.

An offshoot of futurism was constructivism, a vague movement dedicated to subordinating the imagery and vocabulary of poetry to the theme. The principal theoretician is Kornely Zelinski (1896-), and the chief poet of the movement is Ilya Selvinski (q.v.). Selvinski is a realist who stresses the social function of poetry, and in several long verse tales he often displays the art of the novelist as much as that of the poet, but he is quite capable of lyric flights. Another constructivist, although many influences worked upon him, was Eduard Bagritsky (q.v.), who died young. Highly talented and with a particularly fine lyric gift, he wrote on a large variety of themes, many of them having no relation to the Revolution, though there can be no doubt about his sympathies.

Boris Pasternak (q.v.), who began to write under the influence of the futurists, is generally regarded as the leading Soviet poet today. Essentially lyric, his attempts at long verse narratives, such as Spektorski (1926) and God 1905 (1927), are not well sustained. Pasternak finds it difficult to identify his muse with political and socialistic themes, although he has tried on occasion. For he is primarily an individualist—a highly cultured one—and a romantic, who writes with passionate intensity on the traditional subject of nature, which serves so often as a background for personal lyric utterances. His striking originality finds fullest expression in his language and in varied poetic forms. It is a difficult, elliptical, obscure language, with unorthodox syntactical turns, but the musical and rhythmical effects, built up on the intonations and cadences of ordinary speech, are wonderfully successful.

Pasternak's principal rival for top honors in Soviet poetry today is Nikolai Tikhonov (q.v.), although this author possesses neither the same sheer poetic power nor equal originality. On the other hand, he is relatively free of the difficult language and complicated handling of themes that have prevented Pasternak from winning wide popularity. It is not easy to place Tikhonov in any particular poetic school, for since the time of his early narrative verse tales—Orda (1922; The Horde) and Braga (1923; Brew)—to his later ballads on civil-war themes and his recent poems, he has consistently and independently developed his art largely as a medium for treating romantic themes of revolution in a realistic manner.

It is clear that in its performance in Soviet Russia poetry has lagged behind fiction, as indeed in Western Europe and America over the last 20 years. The doubt, despair, and negation of so much of Western European verse, however, have been absent; Soviet poetry has even been characterized by exuberance and an almost excessive determination to mirror life, albeit a socialistic life. In its efforts to condemn a whole world of emotive complexes and values, Soviet poetry inevitably became a literature of fierce conflicts and action. But the constant, driving change of the new life, which was more easily assimilated by fiction, has proved a deterrent to the healthy growth of poetry, which requires periods at least of calm and contemplation. Most recent Soviet verse, however, bears a promise of greatness for the future; form is grasped with more sureness, and a clear vision of the socialist state lends inspiration where doubt and conflict had formerly confused and enervated positive affirmation.

It has become a critical commonplace to observe that the Soviet theatre is perhaps the finest in the world but that a comparable dramatic literature has failed to materialize. Certainly the native repertoire has not kept pace with the outstanding development in the art of the theatre, yet on a comparative basis the whole corpus of Soviet plays written during the last 25 years is not markedly inferior to that of any nation in the West or of America.

As in all Soviet literature, the drama has also faithfully reflected the rapid political, social, and economic changes. The dramatists earliest upon the scene were mostly of the intelligentsia and in some cases had practiced their art before the Revolution, such as A. N. Tolstoy, K. A. Trenév (1878-), Nikolai Erdman, A. V. Lunacharski (1873-1933), B. S. Romashov (1895-), and Sergei Tretyakov (q.v.). Futuristic, romantic, and realistic tendencies are apparent in their plays, none of which, however, won any enduring success.

A second group of dramatists, most of them peasant and proletarian writers, were concerned with propaganda plays, often crudely executed, and also with plays on the civil war and social problems, such as Alexander Nevevov's Povest o babakh (1923; A Tale of the Womenfolk), Gladkov's Vataga (1923; The Band), and Vladimir Bill-Belotserkovski's (1884-) Ekho (1924; Echo) and Shtorm (1926; The Storm).

A third group of dramatists, to which belong young Soviet writers with a postrevolutionary training, have contributed plays of considerable merit. Among the best of these dramatists are A. N. Afinogenov, Vladimir Kirshon, V. V. Vishnevski, and N. F. Pogodin.

As in fiction, the pronounced tendency of the drama has been in the direction of realism, in which attempts were made to grapple with the conflicts induced by the swiftly changing tempo of Soviet life. People soon wearied of the forthright propaganda plays, such as Mayakovsky's bizarre Misteriya Buf (1918; Eng. tr., Mystery Bouffe, 1933) and Tretyakov's rather crude drama of imperialism, Rychi Kitai! (1926; Eng. tr., Roar China, 1931). A few of the civil-war plays, especially Ivanov's Armored Train 14-69, Bulgakov's Dni Turbinykh (1926; The Days of the Turbines), and Trenév's Lyubov Yarovaya (1926), were well constructed and strikingly realistic.

The Five-Year Plan was as prolific in plays as it was in novels, and a monotonous sameness attended both. Plays were formed to a stereotyped pattern and were often hopelessly and boringly didactic. The invariable theme was a bit of villainous wrecking on a construction job or a collectivized farm, in which the counterrevolutionary plotters were foiled and the good Communists triumphant. Afinogenov's (q.v.) fine drama Strakh (1931; Eng. tr., Fear, 1934) was an exception; although the usual counterrevolutionary conspiracy is present, the play also attempts to solve in terms of individual and not mass psychology the significant moral problem of the Revolution's right to terror. Vladimir Kirshon's (q.v.) Khleb (1930; Eng. tr., Bread, 1934) and N. F. Pogo-din's (q.v.) Temp (1930; Eng. tr., Tempo, 1936) were also much better than the average Five-Year Plan plays, despite poor construction and careless language. And Olyosha's (q.v.) Spisok blagodeyani (1931; List of Blessings), very much like Afinogenov's Fear, leaves room for the workings of individual psychology in dramatizing the conflict between individualism and socialism.

Most recent tendencies in Soviet drama in no sense lessen the emphasis upon realism, but they are running in the direction of a fuller comprehension of the individual's problems in a collectivist society. There is a deeper searching into the cause and effect of universal human behavior. And coupled with this is an earnest concern with the Russian people as a whole, unconditioned by time, a tendency that is reflected in historical plays and in the dramatic adaptations of great novels of the past, such as Tolstoy's Anna Karenina and War and Peace.

More sympathetic understanding than critical explanation is required in order to grasp the real significance of the development of Soviet literature. Ever since its existence began Soviet Russia has been in an almost constant state of emergency, and this fact has often dictated the frequent radical changes and sharp reverses in the life and culture of the country. On the surface there was an abiding impermanency. The more enduring values and universal constants of human behavior, however, were never very far beneath the surface, and this was quite true in the swiftly changing literary trends. The highly specialized Communist conscience in the novels, let us say, of Nikolai Ostrovsky (q.v.)—Kak zakalyalas stal (1936, How the Steel Was Tempered; Eng. tr., The Making of a Hero, 1937) and Rozhdennye burey (1937; Eng. tr., Born of the Storm, 1939)—could give way to ethical and idealistic trends, to the universal emotions and values that transcend all classes, in the works of a score of other novelists.

Thus one may discern in recent trends distinct links with the past, for social idealism and an interest in the human soul had been pronounced aspects in the literary production of the old intelligentsia. Even the historical novel, of which the past furnished some few brilliant examples, has taken on the proportions of a widespread movement in Soviet Russia, as it has recently in America. The tendency of foreign critics to dismiss this eager interest in the historical past as an enforced escape from dangerous contentious themes of the present is hardly justified. It is only natural that Soviet writers should evince a desire to apply their dialectic method in an effort to reinterpret the past in the light of the present. The method is usually the brutal, realistic one, devoid of sentimental romancing, that has been used so successfully in writing on the civil war, and in most cases the documentation is extraordinarily full.

Pyotr Pervy (1929-1934, Peter I; Eng. tr. of Vol. I, Peter the Great, 1932) of A. N. Tolstoy is one of the finest of these Soviet historical novels. He treats the period of the great tsar as one of transition, not unlike that of the present-day Russia, and one can see in the sympathetic portrait of Peter a forerunner of Lenin or Stalin. Where A. N. Tolstoy is largely deficient—in the psychology of his characters—another older writer, Sergeyev-Tsenski, admirably succeeds. Since his expansive novel on the Crimean War, he has recently embarked on a theme connected with the First World War, Brusilovski proryv (1944; Eng. tr., Brusilov's Breakthrough, 1945).

Two other older writers have devoted themselves to historical fiction. Aleksei Chapygin (q.v.) has produced Razin Stepan (3 vols., 1926-1927), a thrilling tale of the 17th-century Russian Robin Hood, presented as a kind of early "Bolshevik" leader, but with the authentic atmosphere and local color of Stenka Razin's time exactly recreated. The Tsusima (1933-1934; Eng. tr., Tsushima, 1936) of Aleksei Novikov-Priboi (q.v.) is on a quite different theme—a chronicle of the sinking of the Russian fleet in the Russo-Japanese War.

Yuri Tynyanov's (q.v.) historical novels are concerned solely with literary figures of the past—Kyukhlya (1925), a story of the pathetically comic Decembrist poet and friend of Pushkin, Küchelbecker; Smert Vazir-Mukhtara (1929; Eng. tr., Death and Diplomacy in Persia, 1938), which tells the story of the famous dramatist, Griboyedov, in the early years of the 19th century; and Pushkin (1936), which portrays the great Russian poet. Tynyanov is more of a scholar than a novelist; his documentation is impeccable and the atmosphere of the past is admirably reproduced, but his characters come to life with difficulty. In these historical novels, and in many others of less note, one is impressed by the repeated emphasis upon the patriotic motif. It is not so much an arrant chauvinism or nationalism as a glorification of the unity and heroism of the past with an appeal for similar qualities now in resisting the enemies of the socialist fatherland. For Soviet Russia was well aware of the dangers from without, and this note of patriotic warning against a definite enemy—Japan—was plainly sounded in Peter Pavlenko's (q.v.) novel Na vostokey (1937, In the East; Eng. tr., Red Planes Fly East, 1938).

A new force is apparent in Soviet literature which clearly sets it apart in the last 25 years from the literature of any other country. The total production, which has been enormous, is thoroughly penetrated by social consciousness and a profound responsibility to the people. Despite the constant flux and new demands of the present, Soviet literature has many of its roots in the past, but it ceaselessly endeavors to integrate all the best elements of the past and present in an effort to create the vision of a glorious future.

The new note may perhaps best be described by the much debated critical slogan, "socialist realism," that first appeared in 1932. However new the term, exponents of socialist realism existed in Russia long before the advent of the Soviets. For writers such as Belinski, Herzen, Chernyshevski, and even Tolstoy, who believed that the individual and the community were not opposing but complementary factors in each other's well-being, were in a sense devotees of socialist realism. Of late, bourgeois realism has displayed a degree of defeatism, frustration, and pessimism that suggests a progressive disintegration of the modern society which it describes. With a loss of faith has come a loss of social consciousness, and the bourgeois writer tends to become self-centered and hostile to the community.

The difference between the Soviet realist and the bourgeois realist is essentially a difference between faith in life and lack of faith. Behind the Soviet writer's accurate description of reality is a desire to obtain a clearer understanding of all that must be abolished and all that must be built up. If there is tragedy in his works, there is no pessimism. Socialist realism attempts to integrate literature and life, to direct the creative present towards a more meaningful creative future. Soviet literature has scarcely begun to realize its vast potentialities, but its present vitality, positive affirmation, and soaring faith give promise of a great future.

See: D. S. Mirsky, Contemporary Russian Literature (1926); Literaturnaya entsiklopediya, Vols. I-IX, XI (1929-1938); M. Maizel, Kratki ocherk sovremennoi russkoi literatury (1931); M. Selivanovski, Ocherki po istorii russkoi sovetskoi poezii (1936); Janko Lavrin, An Introduction to the Russian Novel (1942), Paul Miliukov, Outlines of Russian Culture, ed. by Michael Karpovich (1942), Part II; A. Kaun, Soviet Poets and Poetry (1943); E. J. Simmons, An Outline of Modern Russian Literature, 1880-1940 (1943); Gleb Struve, 25 Years of Soviet Russian Literature, 1918-1943 (1944).

E. J. S.

Ruyra i Oms, Joaquim (1858-1939, Catalan prose writer), is the author in whom the narrative prose of the Renaixença reached its fullest development, an outstanding figure in all Catalan literature and unquestionably supreme in his genre during the 19th and 20th centuries. His literary initiation came late; it was not until he was 45 that he produced his first book, Marines i boscatges (1903; Seascapes and Coppices). These pieces are models of prose, with all the immutable characteristics of his style; they had been awarded prizes in 1895 at the Jocs Florals (the paramount poetic festival of the Catalan-speaking countries, restored, in 1859, through the impulse of the Renaixença). The stories "Mar de llamp" (Sea of Lightning) and "Les senyorestes de mar" (The Young Ladies of the Sea) in particular revealed his great narrative talent. The style was hailed as "trail blazing"; and in 1902, when Jacobé (Jacob) was awarded a prize at the same poetic festival, Josep Pijoan enthusiastically exclaimed that the Jocs Florals of that year would forever be identified by Jacobé, a short novel "evoked from landscapes possessing a soul," with throbbing figures, with tragic shades, profoundly human.

After Marines i boscatges Ruyra i Oms became silent; a grave cardiac illness attacked him, and he moved to the Canary Islands in search of rest. It was not until 16 years later that he reaffirmed the first impression with La Parada (The Stop), a collection of stories and short novels. During these years there had been notable changes in the literary tendencies of Catalonia; Ruyra, however, true to himself, a real genius and creator, remained faithful to his initial aesthetic creed. He stood apart from the influence of French naturalism (q.v.) and still farther away from romantic affectations of a sentimental tendency. He himself confessed that although many times, suspecting a lack of balance in his imagination, he read Zola (q.v.), the French author soon began to lose prestige for him, and he finally could not abide a single page of Zola's novels. Ruyra's style, although deeply personal has a marked classical-

Catalonian basis. The unanimously favorable reception which public and critics gave to Ruyra's new work was linked with the success of Marines i boscatges and of Jacobé—and the fact is that Ruyra's art will be, for all ages, removed from tendencies and schools. "Amidst my suffering," he wrote when he produced his second book, "I have enjoyed a privilege granted to few men: for, having passed a great number of years dead, as one might say, I have had the pleasure of seeing that my work survived."

Joaquim Ruyra i Oms was born in Gerona, where he pursued the studies of his secondary education; in the University of Barcelona he studied law, abandoning it at the moment when he was to get his degree. He retired then to his ancestral house in Blanes, where he was to write, unhurriedly, with the patience of an embroiderer, the marvelous pages in which the figures of his creation—sailors, workmen, farm boys—are observed not only in their external characteristics but also in the most hidden folds of their simple, candid, and frequently contradictory souls. His penchant for mathematics, to which he had recourse as a means of relaxation from his literary labors, explains in part, perhaps, his style, wherein simplicity, harmonized with a perfect clarity and order of thought, is outstanding. All his work, furthermore, reveals a lofty moral purpose, but one, notably, that is never dull. The same combination is found in his poetic production, especially in "El pais del Pler," an allegorical poem. Many short articles of his, which have their own originality, were published in Catalan journals, such as the Renaixença, Veu de Catalunya (The Voice of Catalonia), Juventut (Youth), Il·lustració catalana; all these pieces, along with the works already mentioned, and his latest books, Pinya de Rosa (1920; Cone of Roses) and Entre flames (In the Flames), were to be collected in a complete edition of his works planned by the Institució de les Lletres Catalanes, but the project was interrupted by the invasion of 1939. In Arenys de Mar, where Ruyra used to spend a part of the summer, he wrote, finally, En garet a l'enramada, an adaptation for the stage of one of his short stories, presented in the Poliorama Theatre in Barcelona. He translated into Catalan poems of Mosco, Horace, Dante, Verlaine (q.v.), Racine, and tales of Erckmann-Chatrian. Some of his own works have appeared in Spanish, Italian, French, Finnish. He was a member of the Institut d'Estudis Catalans, the most highly esteemed institution of Catalonia, distinguishing himself in the philological branch of that body, to which he contributed countless idioms gathered from among the people and which were to enrich the great projected language dictionary, patiently prepared by the Institut, a work also interrupted by the events of 1939.

In 1938, at 80 years of age, he was honored by the Catalonian writers and by the Govern de Catalunya in a ceremony of intimate simplicity which took place in the Conselleria de Cultura. When the complete invasion of Catalonia took place, Ruyra remained in Barcelona where he died after a short time. During the war, his attitude—much to be admired because Ruyra was ruined by the resulting revolution—was governed by the Christian and patriotic virtues which were a part of his very fiber and soul. He declared that he would feel himself to be less a Christian if, to defend any theologically isolated religious interests, he should resort to the anti-Christian violence of the Falangists and aid in the destruction of the living work of God, his country, his Catalonia. This explains the official silence at the time of his death. A simple family note—in Spanish—announced to the grief-stricken Catalonian people the death of their great prose writer.

See: J. M. Capdevila, "La obra de Joaquim Ruyra," Hora de España, XXI (Sept., 1938), 73-82; C. Riba, "Memoria de Joaquim Ruyra," Revista de Catalunya (Barcelona), 4th period, No. 95, pp. 9-16.

J. M. M. i V.

Rydberg, Viktor (1828-1895, Swedish philosopher, poet, and novelist), was born in Jönköping, in the south of Sweden, in humble circumstances. After a long and hard struggle he succeeded in obtaining a classical education at the University of Lund and finally became one of the leading scholars of his time in philosophy and the history of religion. It was, however, in fiction that he first achieved prominence. His first novels, Fribytaren på Östersjön (1857; Eng. tr., The Freebooter of the Baltic, 1891) and Singoalla (1858; Eng. tr., 1903) are romantic adventure stories of the Swedish Middle Ages, but in Den sista Athenaren (1859; Eng. tr., The Last Athenian, 1869), which is reminiscent of Kingsley's Hypatia, he describes the conflict between Hellenic Neoplatonism and early Christianity with a decided preference for the former. He then turned to religious and philosophical studies, combatting the narrow "fundamentalist" views of the time. A trip to Italy in 1870 resulted in Romerska dagar (1875-1876; Eng. tr., Roman Days, 1879), a series of character studies in which he advocates the democratic spirit and attacks the principle of barren aestheticism.

He finally changed from prose to poetry, translating the first part of Faust (1876) and publishing an original collection, Dikter (1882; Poems). In these we find him at his best, notably in the stirring "Cantata" for a university festival at Uppsala. He describes the march of humanity in terms of the children of Israel's journey through the desert, in which the four academic faculties of theology, law, medicine, and philosophy are brought into play to meet the various crises of the pilgrimage. Most of Rydberg's poems are symbolic, but they also include pure lyrics and several charming pictures of Swedish domestic life, in particular "The Bathing Children." All the poems, and indeed his prose works as well, are characterized by an extraordinary grace and purity of form. He translated Poe's "The Raven" and developed another motive taken from the same author in "The Two Bells." Lyric beauty in Rydberg is nearly always subservient to an underlying idea.

In his later life Rydberg returned to the Middle Ages in his novel Vapensmeden (1891; The Armorer) and to philosophical and mythological studies. There is a firm unity in his product as a whole. He stands out as a seer and prophet in the cause of spiritual progress and freedom of thought. In him we are continually reminded of Arnold's "sweetness and light," but his style exhibits the vigor of the viking as well as the clarity of the classicist.

See: C. W. Stork, Anthology of Swedish Lyrics (1917; revised and enlarged ed., 1930); F. Böök, Sveriges moderna litteratur (1921), also published as Vol. III of O. Sylwan, ed., Svenska litteraturens historia (1919-1921), pp. 3-20; C. W. Stork, "The Poetry of Victor Rydberg," in A. C. Baugh, ed., Schelling Anniversary Papers (1923).

C. W. S.

S

Saar, Ferdinand von (1833–1906, Austrian novelist, dramatist, and poet), born in Vienna, has been unjustly neglected in recent literary criticism, both in Germany and abroad. While there is little reason to revive interest in his carefully composed but unoriginal plays or in his poems with their classical echoes, his two collections of short stories Novellen aus Österreich (2 vols., 1897) and Schicksale (1889) deserve attention both for their intrinsic value and for the place they occupy in the history of German literature.

A plea for their reconsideration may be supported on a number of grounds. Saar's style of writing strikes a happy medium between academic correctness and idiomatic raciness; local dialect elements are admixed in moderate doses only. As a chronicler of Austrian middle- and upper-class life he imparts a deep understanding of the racial, social, and national difficulties under which the old Austro-Hungarian monarchy disintegrated. His characters—artists, officers, businessmen, and civil servants—all foreshadow the decadence and final catastrophe which overtook this overrefined culture, whose final euthanasia Schnitzler (q.v.) was to make the dominant theme of his work. And what especially distinguishes Saar is his most serious concern for the impending decline and his attempt to indicate, more by instinct than with clear consciousness, a possible regeneration. Such sources of renewed vitality he taps in at least two of his stories, "Die Steinklopfer" (1874; Eng. tr., The Stonebreakers, 1907) and "Die Troglodytin" (1889). The former has been referred to as the first tale of a workingman in German literature—the deeper implication being that the author here senses the inner strength invested in the working classes. The other story contrasts the healthy sensualism of a child of nature with the conventional standards of bourgeois life. While Saar was not enough of a revolutionary to release the full force of naturalism into life and literature, he at least pointed the way for a younger generation.

See: A. Bettelheim, Ferdinand von Saars Leben und Schaffen (1909).

H. B.

Sagarra i Castellarnau, Josep Maria de (1894–, Catalan poet and playwright), born in Barcelona of an aristocratic family, a descendant of one of the branches of the ancient Comtes-Reis (Count-Kings), has made on Catalan letters an imprint of unparalleled sincerity which has imparted an unmistakable tone to the contemporary lyric poetry of his country. After an elementary education from the Jesuits of Barcelona, he studied law at the university of that city. But he never practiced that profession and devoted himself, from an early age and with extraordinary industry, to literature. His first verses were published when he was 12. At the age of 18 he took a trip through Italy which had definite influence upon his taste and his desire to be a writer. An intimacy with outstanding men of the Renaixença facilitated his access to the small Catalan literary world, which saw one of the hopes of its lyric poetry in this pale youth. At the age of 20 he produced his Primer llibre de poemes (1914; First Book of Poems), followed by El mal caçador (1916; The Bad Hunter), Cançons d'abril i de novembre (1918; April and November Songs), Cançons de taverna i d'oblit (1922; Songs of the Tavern and of Forgetfulness), Cançons de rem i de vela (1924; Songs of the Oar and the Sail), Cançons de totes les hores (1925; Songs of All the Hours). In all this verse one feels originality in style and spirit; he touched the sensibility of his compatriots and had numerous imitators. He uses a living language, direct and without pedantry, elevated through its grace to poetic inspiration. His popularity is easily understood; from the time of the Renaixença the Catalan reader had encountered little but archaisms and artifice whereas Sagarra, like Verdaguer and Maragall (qq.v.) indeed, drew idioms for his poems from the people. But, in distinction from his predecessors (with whom he has many points of contact, especially with Maragall), he used, daringly, words which would have seemed inadequate for literature to anyone who did not feel the deep desire for sincerity. His particular manner is clearly discernible in his first novel, Paulina Buxareu (1919), and in All i Salobre (1929; Garlic and Salt), Cafè copa i puro (1929; Coffee, Liqueur and Cigar), and Vida privada (1932; Private Life). For the last-named work he was awarded the Crexells prize of the Generalitat (1932).

In 1918 he decided to write for the theatre; his first poetic plays, Rondalla d'esparvers (1918; Serenade of Blackbirds) and Dijous

Sant (1919; Holy Thursday), were an indication of the ease with which he was to progress in dramatic art; the very tone of his poetry seemed the most suitable for the renovation of the Catalan theatre, which had turned away from verse. The popularity he attained was extraordinary; from L'estudiant i la púbbil·la (1921; The Student and the Maid) to Roserflorit (1935; Rosebush in Bloom) he was a central figure. Important theatrical works are: Les veus de la terra (1923; The Voices of the Soil); Marçal Prior (1926); L'assassinat de la senyora Abril (1927, in prose; The Slaughter of Lady April); L'hostal de la glòria (1931; The Inn of Glory), for which he received the Ignasi Iglésies prize of the Generalitat. These dramatic poems alternated with farces such as La Llúcia i la Ramoneta (Lucy and Little Raimona) and Amàlia, Emèlia i Emilia (1929). He also cultivated the tragic poem in Judit (1929; Judith) and La filla del carmesi (1930; The Crimson Daughter). As a result of his extraordinary facility and excessive productiveness, his theatre did become somewhat affected, with recurring types and analogous situations, but was constantly redeemed by the grace and originality of his vocabulary. The same eagerness to portray a popular type and present him with qualities of faith and love, intermingled with the most diverse passions—exemplified already in El mal caçador—inspires his most famous and long poem, El Comte Arnau (1928; Count Arnau), in which Sagarra, in spite of the monotony of some passages, attains real genius. His last book of poems, La rosa de cristall (The Crystal Rose), with which he won the Folguera prize of the Generalitat, demonstrates the continuity of his poetic conception.

When the military insurrection broke out in 1936, Josep Maria de Sagarra, who had written in a column entitled "L'Aperitiu" (a model of original prose which deserves to be collected in an anthology) in the weekly journal Mirador (Watchtower) certain diatribes against the disturbing elements of the extreme leftist position, became fearful of reprisals and left for France. There he continued his Catalan version of Dante's Divina Comedia. General Franco's victory could not ease Sagarra's position, since in addition to belonging to the party Acció Catalana, whose candidate he had been for deputy, he possessed an incorruptible Catalan nationalistic sense, incompatible with the Castilian idea of assimilation fostered by the new Spanish regime. In 1941 he returned to Catalonia, but his literary life, at least as far as its external expression is concerned, has not found, in his native country, the slightest opportunity to manifest itself.

See: J. Folguera, Les noves valors de la poesia catalana (1919); C. Giardini, Antologia dei poeti catalani contemporanei, 1845-1925 (1926).

J. M. M. i V.

Saint Exupéry, Antoine de (1900-1944, French aviator and writer), was born in Lyon. He came from an old French family, and one of his ancestors fought with the Americans at Yorktown. His books show the clear traces of a good literary and humanistic education and close affinities with the French "moralists" of the 17th century. He was attracted, soon after the First World War, by a life of action and adventure. He flew as a pilot over the most dangerous sections of the air-mail service established by the French over northwest Africa, the South Atlantic, and South America. He narrowly escaped death in several accidents, some of which are related with a modest and moving restraint in his books.

His first volume, Courrier Sud (Eng. tr., Southern Mail, 1933) revealed him in 1929 as the epic poet in prose of aviation and as an acute analyst of the changes brought about in the modern relationships between man and woman by the self-abnegation of an airman's career. His second novel, Vol de nuit (1931; Eng. tr., Night Flight, 1932), was not marred, like the first, by a weak plot and unconvincing sentimentality. André Gide (q.v.) introduced it in a striking preface, and it was hailed at once as a masterpiece. Underneath an austere and almost Nietzschean picture of the inhuman role of a leader of men, the book reveals a deep reverence for the nobleness of man. The style, terse and laconic, devoid of mannerisms and obscurity, is rich with splendid images. After eight more years of travel, adventure, and silent meditation, Saint Exupéry's best work to date was published, Terre des hommes (1939). Lewis Galantière's able translation does not, by its English title (Wind, Sand, and Stars, 1939), render the two characteristic features of the book—a new vision of the earth, seen from the air as an insignificant but beloved planet, and a profound affection for the humblest men. The book is not technically a novel, but a series of tales or vignettes, interspersed with moral and psychological reflections. It preaches no message, but an exalted faith in man's courage and heroism, in the beauty of friendship, of wisdom, and of spiritual freedom, is everywhere present. The same qualities are conspicuous in Saint Exupéry's fourth book, published in New York, Pilote de guerre (1942; Eng. tr., Flight to Arras, 1942). It is the story of a hopeless sortie accomplished by the author as a captain in one of the reconnaissance crews of the French air force in the tragic days of May, 1940. The facts count for little. The book is mostly an introspective analysis of the flyer's mind and a groping but moving attempt at a statement of his philosophy. He asks the harrowing question, "What is the meaning of war and death?" He answers with an earnest reassertion of his faith in his country, in civilization, in the ultimate victory of love and fraternity. Through their unique position among the books of the decade 1930-1940, through their avoidance of facile effect, their incisive simplicity of style, their gospel of sacrifice and heroic hope, Saint Exupéry's works have deserved to be called the "Chanson de Roland of our century."

Saint Exupéry was reported missing over southern France in the summer of 1944.

H. P.

Sáinz y Rodríguez, Pedro (1897-, Spanish scholar and critic), was born in Madrid, where he became professor of bibliology in 1926, after teaching at the University of Oviedo. Most of his studies have been in the fields of Spanish mysticism and of the Spanish 19th century, as exemplified by La mística española (1926), for which he was awarded the National Prize for Literature; Introducción a la historia de la literatura mística en España (1927); Estudio sobre la historia crítica literaria en España: D. Bartolomé Gallardo y la crítica de su tiempo (in Revue hispanique, Vol. LI, 1921, pp. 211-595); and Obras escogidas de Bartolomé José Gallardo (1928). Two other publications, La evolución política española y el deber social de los intelectuales (1924) and La evolución de las ideas sobre la decadencia española; discurso leído en la inauguración del curso académico de 1924 a 1925 (n.d., ca. 1925), show a mild political aspiration which was to blossom in 1933 when he became a member of the Agrarian Party. Since Franco's victory he has been made a member of the Spanish Academy, and he was the new regime's minister of education, 1938-1939.

F. S. y E.

Salacrou, Armand (1900-, French playwright), was born in Rouen. He began to work as a journalist, but soon turned his talents to the theatre. The first 10 years of Salacrou's career in the theatre are represented by the program of the student in the later play, L'Inconnue d'Arras: "I wish to be compromised with my own generation." Such was Salacrou's own desire. He made his début with a one-act piece, Le Casseur d'assiettes (1924). Tour à terre (1925) proved disconcerting to the majority of the critics, but was warmly defended by Lugné-Poe (q.v.) and Henry Bidou; Pierre Brisson, insisting on its "absolute originality in literature," used a phrase which connotes both high praise and severe criticism. Le Pont de l'Europe (1927) was no less heatedly discussed. It consisted chiefly, with slight dramatic action, of a poem in which a king, reminiscent of Hamlet, expressed in eloquent monologues his dream of becoming "the world's passer-by." The principal character of Patchouli (1930) was another dreamer for whom love was something else than happiness. In it Salacrou gave unbounded liberty to his imagination, accepting no literary discipline and yet producing a play impressively lyrical and bitter.

Salacrou's sympathy for failures was again evident in Atlas-Hôtel (1931). "God himself has failed; all great enterprises fail"—such was the final speech of Auguste, the Don Quixote of the hotel business. La Vie en rose (1931), as the author himself admitted, was nothing more than an excuse for songs, costumes, and setting, offered by one born at the beginning of the century who recalled pre-war days through the eyes of his childhood. Les Frénétiques (1934) was a vigorous satire of the movie world and its conventional characters, although Salacrou himself did not entirely succeed in creating original figures. In L'Inconnue d'Arras (1935) he took for his subject the few seconds granted a dying man to see his life pass before him and to evaluate its true worth. This creation, tender and fantastic, gives Salacrou high rank among dramatists of his generation.

P. B.

Salaverría e Ipenza, José María (1873-1943, Spanish essayist), was born in Vinaroz in the region of Valencia. Of a modest family of Basque origin, he supported himself from an early age. He traveled extensively in Spain and throughout America. Although he cultivated the novel, it was in the journalistic article and especially in the essay that he excelled. As distinguished from the other Spanish essayists of his period, principally those of the Generation of '98, who preached a political and social transformation for Spain in accord with the forward movements of Europe, Salaverría consistently advocated a return to the old national traditions as the only source of Spanish revival. Faithful to this tenet, his principal themes deal with Spain and her heroes, as in Vieja España (1907), Inigo de Loyola (1909), Afirmación española (1917), España: Pueblos y paisajes (1936), Retrato de Santa Teresa de Jesús (1939), and A través del Poema de El Cid (1941). Salaverría had a thorough knowledge of the Hispanic American peoples as a result of his continuous travels, and many articles, some of them published in the Nación of Buenos Aires, deal with these countries. All of these works, such as El poema de la Pampa, Martín Fierro y el criollismo español (1918), Los conquistadores: Origen heroico de América (1919), Bolívar el Libertador (1930), and El castellano en América (1939), show the same affirmation of faith in traditional Spanish elements. Other essays, Nuevos retratos (1930) and La generación del 98 (1936), consist of appraisals of contemporary Spanish writers from a traditionalistic point of view. Salaverría's family origin led him also to study certain aspects of Basque life, as in Alma vasca (1922) and Iparraguirre, el último bardo (1932).

See: A. González-Blanco, Los contemporáneos, III (1910), 45-86.

E. G. L.

Šalda, František Xaver (1867-1937, Czech critic, poet, and novelist), is the most prominent literary critic in Czech literature. He was born in Liberec (northern Bohemia), the son of a civil servant. He studied law at the University of Prague, but became a free-lance writer and editor of several critical journals. From 1916 he taught the history of French literature at the University of Prague. In 1928 he founded a journal, Šaldův zápisník (Šalda's Notebook), which he wrote himself from cover to cover until his death.

Šalda was a practical critic—a master of portraiture, of psychological interpretation, stylistic analysis, and critical judgment—rather than the expounder of a systematic literary theory. He shifted his point of view frequently in his long career and changed his allegiances, but there is continuity behind the baffling variety of his judgments. He always advocated a vital, contemporary art: this made him in the 90's a champion of symbolism against naturalism and after the First World War the godfather of "proletarian" poetry. He wanted a highly poetical, metaphorical poetry and disapproved of all purely naturalist or didactic writing. But in spite of his stress on form and expression, Šalda was never an aesthete pure and simple; he always understood the responsibility of the artist to society and, especially in his later life, saw literature in close connection with religion and philosophy. His work expanded more and more to a general criticism of society and modern civilization, and in his last years his voice was widely listened to as that of a moralist and prophet. Šalda managed to combine a belief in the value of the individual and of individuality with a stress on the necessity for superpersonal values in literature. The scope of his changing interests can be suggested by noting that his studies include all major figures of modern Czech literature and range over many other literatures as well. He has written on Rousseau and Rimbaud (q.v.), on Flaubert and Zola (qq.v.), on Shakespeare and Dante; he has discussed such subjects as the immortality of a work of poetry and the relation of art and religion. He has surveyed modern Czech literature several times and has made and unmade the reputation of many Czech writers. Šalda has used all forms of criticism, from careful analyses of style to synthetic and wide surveys of development, from fierce polemics to lyrical meditations. His criticism is written in a very personal style which combines in the vortex of a dynamic temperament the most diverse elements; learned terminology is encountered cheek by jowl with trivial colloquialisms, lyrical metaphors with drastic sarcasms. His critical work has been collected under such titles as Boje o zítřek (1905; Battles for Tomorrow); Duše a dílo (1913; Soul and Work), his best volume; Juvenilie (1925; Early Writings); Mladé zápasy (1934; Young Struggles); and Časové a nadčasové (1936; Matters Ephemeral and Eternal). Much of his best writing, however, is still scattered in pamphlets, buried in files of short-lived periodicals and newspapers, or mixed with ephemeral polemics in the nine volumes of Šaldův zápisník (1928-1937).

Šalda was not content with being a literary critic. For a time he was prominent in art criticism largely as an early champion of French impressionism. These articles are collected in Tajemství zraku (1940; The Mystery of Sight). Besides, he was himself a creative writer of great ambitions. His poetry is symbolist in style and is preoccupied with problems of death; it sometimes compares with the best work of Sova (q.v.) or Březina (q.v.), the two Czech poets he admired most. His poetic quality is well represented in a collection of elegies, Strom bolesti (1920; The Tree of Pain), written at the death of the novelist Růžena Svobodová (q.v.), who was his intimate personal friend. Šalda's long novel, Loutky i dělníci boží (1917; Puppets and Laborers of God), seems stilted and cerebral and is overloaded with discussion, but there is good work in his short stories, collected in two volumes, Život ironický a jiné povídky (1912; The Ironical Life and Other Stories) and Dřevoryty staré i nové (1935; Woodcuts Old and New). A philosophical legend, half essay, half visionary story, Pokušení Pascalovo (1928; Pascal's Temptation) is particularly impressive. His three attempts at drama were failures.

See: A. Novák, "F. X. Šalda jako kritik," in Zvony domova (1916); R. I. Malý and F. Pujman, eds., F. X. Šaldovi k padesátinám (1918); J. Hora, ed., F. X. Šaldovi k 22. prosinci 1932 (1932); O. Fischer, Šaldovo češtvi (1936); F. Goetz, F. X. Šalda (1937); J. Mukařovský, "F. X. Šalda," Slovo a slovesnost, III (1937), 65-78; B. Lifka, ed., Na paměť F. X. Šaldy (1939).

R. W.

Salinas, Pedro (1892-, Spanish poet and critic), was born in Madrid and graduated from its university. He was lecturer of Spanish in Paris at the Sorbonne from 1914 to 1917 and in 1918 became professor of Spanish literature at the University of Seville. He has taught since then at several Spanish and foreign institutions. In 1936 he established his residence in the United States and holds at present a chair in Johns Hopkins University. One of the most active Spanish intellectuals, he has traveled widely as a lecturer in Europe and America; he organized the section of contemporary literature in the Centro de Estudios Históricos of Madrid and was executive secretary of the Universidad Internacional de Santander (1933-1936). A typical representative of the many-sided contemporary spirit, he is both international and very Spanish in character and taste; a man awakened to the realities of his time and an artist of subtle intellectual—almost abstract—inspiration; a translator of Proust (q.v.) and the author of a modern version of the oldest Spanish epic (Poema de Mio Cid, 1926).

Salinas belongs to the poetic generation of the post-war period together with García Lorca, Jorge Guillén, and Rafael Alberti (qq.v.). They were the four writers who attained early recognition, emerging with a genuine literary value from the confusion of the moment. Lorca and Alberti had a spontaneous inspiration and a direct relation with Spanish traditional poetry; Guillén and Salinas—older and to a great extent fully developed when the new movements began—leaned towards an intellectual type of poetry with an outward simplicity obtained only through complex mental processes. Salinas followed the tendency of spiritual lyricism which in Spain had as the outstanding master Juan Ramón Jiménez (q.v.). At his point of departure he could be related also to Unamuno and Antonio Machado (qq.v.) and the French current towards "pure poetry." Among the Spanish classics, his sensibility brings him closer to the Neoplatonic poets, Garcilaso, or the mystics. His relation with Góngora—to whom his generation rendered a special cult—is limited to a taste for conceptismo and for play with the meaning of words, but he avoids the sensual delight of Gongorism in descriptive imagery. His poetry is made of psychological subtleties, his images are built upon concepts or ideas rather than on sensations. The external world is for him a sort of formless life. The poet's task, his joy, consists in giving it order and sense. Salinas says in Reality and the Poet in Spanish Poetry (1940; published only in English), a lucid critical work, that "the poet places himself before reality . . . in order to create something else." Here is the key to the interpretation of Salinas's own poetry. All his books (Presagios, 1923; Seguro azar, 1929; Fábula y signo, 1931; Amor en vilo, 1933; La voz a ti debida, 1933; Razón de amor, 1936) present, when seen in this light, an extraordinary example of unity in the development of a main poetical idea. The themes, often taken from the most modern aspects of city life, may change, but they always express a poetic eagerness to transform the external perception into a superior unchangeable reality from which are derived the emotions—love, happiness, and a kind of metaphysical anguish—that are found in the poetry of Salinas. His poetic method is a sort of "modern, interior conceptismo," as Leo Spitzer defines it, or perhaps a playful exercise of the mind in which humor and wistfulness are delicately blended. Salinas will never be a popular poet, but his work represents an original expression of the spiritual impasse of our time. The poet, lacking a profound faith, re-creates from within a world of ideas and symbols which, however illusive, offers him the joys of certainty.

The two aspects of the personality of Salinas are independent but not unrelated.

His scholarly readings are reflected in his poetry. To teaching and criticism he brought an alert sensibility. His main works in this field, besides those already mentioned, are his edition (1925) of the Poesías of Meléndez Valdés and his Literatura española siglo XX (1941). An ample selection of his poems has been translated into English by Eleanor L. Turnbull (Lost Angel and Other Poems, 1938, Truth of Two and Other Poems, 1940, with Spanish and English on opposite pages).

See: Angel del Río, "El poeta Pedro Salinas; vida y obra," Leo Spitzer, "El conceptismo interior de Pedro Salinas," and Margot Arce and Sidonia C. Rosenbaum, "Pedro Salinas; bibliografía," Revista hispánica moderna, VII (New York, 1941), 1-32, 33-69, 69-73.

A. del R.

Salmon, André (1881-, French poet, novelist, and critic), son and grandson of artists, was born in Paris and has lived there most of his life, but two trips to Russia profoundly influenced his childhood and adolescence. As one of the artists and poets gathered around Apollinaire (q.v.), he qualified as a cubist with his first verse, Féeries (1907) and Le Calumet (1910), while his articles helped spread cubism. The Russian Revolution and a third trip to Russia brought forth Prikaz (1919), a fervent, though dispassionate epic, the feverishness of which Salmon intensified in another epic of his own restless generation, L'Age de l'humanité (1922). After a brief incursion into dadaism, Salmon rediscovered his early conviction that "art must be given back to life"; he turned to novels and stories, for which his journalistic training provided the "total realism" of brute facts and his poetic vision the jerky pattern of mythic "illogism." Such was the meaning of the poetic debate of Le Livre et la bouteille (1920), in which Salmon had chosen the "bottle," the Dionysiac intuitive grasp of reality, rather than the methodical approach of the "book." Already apparent in Tendres Canailles (1913), a novel of an underworld à la Carco (q.v.), that tendency burst forth in La Nègresse du Sacré-Cœur (1920; Eng. tr., The Black Venus, 1929), the fantastic kaleidoscope of the new bohemia, painted against a backdrop of pathetic and grotesque gangsterism. Salmon, meantime, had pursued his interest in art, and while producing novels, sketches, and souvenirs, Le Manuscrit trouvé dans un chapeau (1919), L'Entrepreneur d'illuminations (1921), Archives du club des onze (1922), Voyages au pays des voyantes (1931), he was becoming, as it were, critic-in-ordinary to the modern painters, with his numerous monographs and essays, especially L'Art vivant (1921), Propos d'atelier (1923), Cézanne (1923), André Derain (1923), Modigliani (1926), and Chagall (1929).

Salmon will remain one of the most authentic poets of his generation. Under a mask of clowning fancy or through the glaring violence of topical events, the broken design of his "poetic reporting" re-creates the turbidity of the modern world, the only justification of which lies in the miraculous blossoming of the ever novel facts, "the true symbol of which is inscribed somewhere else, in some other book."

See: M. Cowley, "André Salmon and His Generation," Bookman, LVI (1923), 714-717; G. Bounoure, review in Nouvelle Revue française, XXXIII (1929), 839-845; G. E. Lemaitre, From Cubism to Surrealism in French Literature (1941), pp. 136-141.

C. L. B.

Salten, Felix (1869-1945, Austrian novelist), was born in Budapest but lived in Vienna from childhood until forced into exile at the age of 70 by the advent of the National Socialist regime in Austria. Salten first became known at the beginning of the 20th century as an able journalist and theatrical critic. His long association with the Viennese Neue freie Presse, the most influential organ of the Austro-Hungarian Empire in the years before the First World War, enabled him to wield considerable authority, to make and unmake literary and stage reputations. His own dramatic efforts were unsuccessful. His novels, humorous, satiric, erotic, for a long time found no echo outside his native land. With the appearance of Bambi in 1923 (Eng. tr., 1928), however, Salten attained international vogue. This tender tale of a deer's life in the forest had been preceded by Der Hund von Florenz (Eng. tr., Hound of Florence, 1930) two years earlier and was followed by many other animal tales in which human beings, their passions, and their problems were portrayed through the medium of their four-legged brothers. Salten was the last president of the Austrian P.E.N. Club before its disintegration in 1933 under Nazi attack. During the Second World War he found refuge in Switzerland.

S. L.

Salvemini, Gaetano (1873-, Italian historian and political writer), was born in Molfetta, Apulia, one of 13 children in a family whose support devolved upon him early in his youth. He studied in Florence, with the help of a small scholarship, and started teaching in 1895, first in high schools and then (1900) in the University of Messina. In the Messina earthquake of 1908 he lost his wife and his four children. In 1910 he was called to Pisa and in 1916 to Florence.

His scholarly pursuits, which soon distinguished him as a master in medieval and modern Italian history, did not prevent him from intense political activity. He began by being identified with the Socialists, but his rugged liberal personality and his positivistic training soon made him the agrarian democrat that he has remained ever since. He led the constitutional fight of Apulian peasants against the union of great landholders and government forces and was their candidate in 1911. He was defeated at elections owing to a combination of corruption and strong-arm tactics on the part of the authorities, which he described in a biting pamphlet against Giolitti, Il Ministro della mala vita (1910). The subservience of Socialist deputies to Giolittian paternalism was one of his favorite targets. He opposed the Libyan war as imperialistic and economically pointless, but in 1914 he took the side of Bissolati for intervention in the First World War and joined up as a second lieutenant in 1915. Since he consistently maintained that the war was one phase of the fight against imperialism, he put up a staunch opposition to the Right and the nationalists and strongly resisted their annexationist claims on South Tyrol and Dalmatia. Branded as a "renunciator," he was nonetheless elected in 1919 as a deputy of the Rinnovamento party. In 1920 he accused Mussolini of having stolen a large part of the funds gathered in South America for D'Annunzio (q.v.); Mussolini thereupon challenged Salvemini to a duel, but refused to clear himself. After the Matteotti crisis and the subsequent emergency laws, Salvemini, together with Carlo Rosselli, who was his friend and pupil, launched the first underground paper, Non Mollare (Don't Give Up). He was jailed in 1925, but released before his trial owing to an amnesty and escaped to France. He lived for a few years between Paris and London and in 1932 came to the United States, where he has lectured extensively. In 1934 he was called to the Lauro de Bosis lectureship in Harvard University. The Sereno Medal of London University was awarded to him in 1943.

Salvemini is one of the leading figures, if not the leading figure, of anti-Fascism. Most of the young anti-Fascist leaders of the 1920's were his friends or his pupils. Beginning in 1926 he undertook, almost single-handed, to piece together from abroad the available evidence on Fascist Italy and to provide the first really historical treatment of the material. His political activity since 1938 has become that of an American citizen and of an expert on Italy. Since 1941 he has dedicated himself chiefly to the task of showing, in connection with the Italian problem, in how many ways American and British policies are inconsistent with the idea of a "democratic war." But his influence as an Italian writer in Italy has remained considerable, as has been demonstrated since the liberation of Italy. The initial program of the Action Party, published in 1943, was closely patterned on what Salvemini had taught 20 years before.

Salvemini is a man who has kept telling drastic truths in incisive and often brilliant style. One critic, Nicola Chiaromonte, has said of him: "He is not really a politician, but has been all his life and consistently remains a political pamphleteer of that 18th century stem which had some good shoots in Italy too. Such as he is, Salvemini is for Italians much more of a representative figure than Croce himself."

Salvemini's literary production is enormous, but mostly scattered in articles and pamphlets. Among his major works are: Magnati e popolani a Firenze (1899); Studi storici (1901); Mazzini (1912); La Politica estera di F. Crispi (1919); Tendenze vecchie e necessità nuove del movimento operaio italiano (1922); Mussolini diplomate (1932); La Rivoluzione francese (1905; 2d revised ed., 1924); Under the Axe of Fascism (1936); What to Do with Italy (1943; in collaboration with G. La Piana).

See: P. Silva, Chi è Gaetano Salvemini (1919); E. Rota, Una Pagina di storia contemporanea: Gaetano Salvemini (1919); M. D'Andrea (Nicola Chiaromonte), review of Salvemini and La Piana, What to Do with Italy, in Partisan Review, X (1943), 458-463.

G. de S.

Samain, Albert (1858-1900, French poet and dramatist), was born in Lille, of a lower-middle-class family. Forced by the death of his father to abandon his studies, he went into the sugar brokerage business. Tiring of this occupation which left him too little leisure, he soon obtained a small clerkship in the Department of Instruction in the Prefecture of the Seine. Henceforth he had time to devote himself to literature, as he had long wished. He began to frequent the bohemian group of the period. It was in the journal Chat noir that the first of his poems appeared. He took part in the founding of the Mercur de France (1890), and a great number of his poems appeared in this review. In 1893, pressed by his friends, he made a selection of his poems which he entitled Au jardin de l'enfante and which was issued by the Mercur de France in an edition of 350 copies. A few months later (March 15, 1894) a highly favorable article of François Coppée (q.v.) in the Journal made Samain famous overnight. The first edition, quickly sold out, was followed in 1897 by a new one, which was augmented by a work not yet published, L'Urne penchée. The next year the French Academy awarded him the Archon-Despérouses prize. In spite of the fact that he was suffering from tuberculosis, Samain prepared another collection of poems, Aux flancs du vase, which was published in 1898. The volume had little success. The death of his mother added to the grief which he felt from this disappointment. His health steadily worsening, he used his last strength to write Polyphème (published only in 1906), a poetic drama in two acts. It was his last work. Shortly afterwards, on August 18, he died at Magny-les-Hameaux, at the home of his friend Raymond Bonheur whose hospitality he had accepted. After his death his friends selected his best poems which they published in a posthumous collection, Le Chariot d'or (1901). His short stories, collected in one volume and also published by his friends, scarcely add to his fame. Polyphème was played successfully for the first time at the Théâtre de l'Œuvre in 1904, then at the Comédie Française, May 19, 1908. A great number of his poems and a manuscript called "Pensées et réflexions" are still unpublished.

The life of Albert Samain was monotonous, discreet, almost colorless; no great passion agitated his soul, and no unusual suffering exposed him to deep unhappiness. Since these sources of inspiration were lacking, he followed a great number of traditional literary themes. Critics have pointed out numerous imitations of literary models. His first poems, many of them unpublished, show the influence of the Parnassian school. The satanism of Baudelaire produced the excessive interest in perversion and the eroto-mystic mania of certain sonnets in Au jardin de l'enfante. He took up a great number of the themes of romanticism; in fact, he never completely freed himself from this influence. His love for Greece inspired in him the graceful idyls, the rapid little tableaux colored with antiquity, found in Aux flancs du vase. He belonged also to his own age: the influence of symbolism, especially that of Verlaine and Mallarmé (qq.v.), is perceptible in his works. From the symbolists he accepted the musical conception of poetry. He is not a vers librist, neither does he adhere to the rigid credo of the Parnassians. He helped to facilitate the compromise which was to find its conclusion in what is called the vers libéré. In spite of all these influences, he remained an individual and belonged to no school, although he borrowed most judiciously. If one considers symbolism as the conclusion of the different movements succeeding each other in the 19th century, it is evident that Samain is one of its best representatives in that he assimilated not only the best of the romantic and Parnassian doctrines, but also whatever was new and likely to live among the eccentricities and the paradoxes of the new aesthetic.

See: Léon Bocquet, Albert Samain; sa vie, son œuvre (1905); Albert de Bersaucourt, Albert Samain; son œuvre (1925); Georges Bonneau, Albert Samain, poète symboliste (1925).

H. U. F.

Šantić, Aleksa (1868–1924, Serb poet), was born and lived all his life in Mostar, Herzegovina, a province that was occupied by the Austro-Hungarians in 1878 and annexed by them in 1908. After business school training in Ljubljana and Trieste, he settled down in his native town where he became the editor in chief of the review Zora (1896–1901; Dawn). In this capacity he came into the focus of the life of this region which, by its cultural and national consciousness, showed a stubborn opposition to the German Kulturträger. The product of his patriotic inspiration during the liberating Balkan Wars of 1912–1913 is the book Na starim ognjištima (1913; On the Old Hearths). During the First World War he was taken by the Austrians as a hostage, but he survived the war and saw the realization of his dream—the union of the Yugoslav peoples.

During his life Šantić wrote six volumes of poetry (1891, 1895, 1900, 1908, 1911, 1913), as well as some dramatizations in verse, the best of which are Pod maglom (1907; In the Fog) and Hasan-Aginica (1911). He also translated Heine's Lyrisches Intermezzo (1897–1898), prepared an anthology of translated German poets, Iz nemačke lirike (1910; From German Lyrics), made a Serbian rendering of Schiller's Wilhelm Tell (1922) and translated Pesme roba (1919; Poems of a Slave) from the Czech writer Svatopluk Čech (q.v.).

Šantić shows two main characteristics:

melancholy concerning the past and an ardent love for his nation, especially for the common man. His lyrics are striking in their emotional sincerity and simplicity; they have vigor, courage, and consolation. Very often the purity of design is classical as well as deeply moving. In his day Šantić gave perhaps the most adequate expression of the collective national soul, of the common sufferings and longings, and in that sense he is his nation's spokesman.

See: S. Petrović, Aleksa Šantić (1934); D. Subotić, "Aleksa Šantić," Slavonic Review, III (1924-1925), 194.

P. A.

Sanz del Río, Julián (1814-1869), Spanish educator and philosopher), born at Torrearévalo, Soria, is Spain's first modern thinker. His life and thinking were conditioned by four factors. His humble, peasant parentage gave him moral qualities of profound uprightness. His desolate birthplace taught him to revere nature with a religious sense that instilled in him a lasting admiration for science (which for Sanz del Río meant the projection into nature of an anxious soul in quest of the Absolute). He came to feel strongly the impact of romanticism on philosophy, through the Neo-Kantian schools of Schelling, Fichte, and Krause. He was much affected by the antagonism of the Roman Catholic Church and of certain intolerant Catholics, who made a political issue of Sanz del Río's serene, objective method; while he went in quest of the Light that man needs to achieve his full spiritual and intellectual development, his Catholic enemies saw in this quest nothing but rank heresy.

Sanz del Río's determination to uplift his countrymen was so sincere, so little mixed up with petty political or religious issues that his first published work, Apuntes sobre diezmos (1837), is written to oppose the idea of suppressing the Church's tithes. Later, in 1854, he indicated to the minister of public instruction, among other university changes, the need of establishing two full chairs of liberal theology, so that the secular priests might have a much better preparation than they were getting in the seminaries. But his Ideal de la humanidad para la vida (1860) was put on the Index, and his Roman Catholic adversaries made his life so miserable and precarious that Sanz del Río had to devote much of his time to defending himself.

With the help of an uncle, a liberal priest, Sanz del Río had been able to study the humanities, theology, and law at Granada and Madrid. His moral quality is shown by the early giving up of his law practice, the petty dealings and subterfuges of which he could not stomach, for the study of philosophy. In 1844 he obtained a fellowship to study in Germany and went to Heidelberg, where disciples of Krause were teaching. At Heidelberg he lived with the famous historian Georg Weber, whose Universal History he later translated, with a significant introduction and valuable commentaries (4 vols., 1853-1856). One of his friends at Heidelberg was Henri Amiel (q.v.). On his return to Madrid, Sanz del Río refused to teach philosophy, for which he did not yet feel adequately equipped, and withdrew to nearby Illescas, where he spent almost 10 years studying and pondering over philosophical problems. In 1854 he did become professor of the history of philosophy at the University of Madrid, and his lectures were attended by the most prominent and best-known scholars and statesmen of his time. In 1867 he resigned because the minister of public instruction had demanded that all professors sign a confession of faith and an oath of allegiance to the Catholic Church.

Sanz del Río became primarily a teacher of teachers who later were to have a tremendous influence in contemporary Spain, such as Francisco Giner de los Ríos, Manuel B. Cossío (qq.v.), Adolfo Posada, and many others. In philosophy his most noteworthy contributions are Sistema de la filosofía metafísica (1860), Análisis del pensamiento racional (1877), and El idealismo absoluto (1883). Like Krause, Sanz del Río tries in these works to bring together two categorical imperatives, the psychological and the ontological. He starts with the intuition of the "I" and then tries to determine the general properties or the knowledge of the Absolute Being through this intuition, since perception is the reception of the object and its retention in the "I." In his Ideal de la humanidad he discusses a "fundamental human society" in which the same political constitution would bring all men into a permanent peace, a society of families bound by a harmonious alliance with God, reason, and nature. In another work, Filosofía de la muerte (1877), he studied the meaning of death, from purely philosophical categories, and here particularly he has shown his fearless thinking, following each step of each syllogism to its ultimate, dauntless conclusions.

See: Gervasio Manrique, Sanz del Río (n.d., ca. 1934); J. B. Trend, "Sanz del Río, the Much-abused Philosopher," in The Origins of Modern Spain (1934), pp. 30-49; Pierre Jobit, Les Educateurs de l'Espagne contemporaine: Les Krausistes (2 vols., 1936).

F. S. y E.

Sarcey, Francisque (1827-1899, French theatrical critic), born in Dourdan, Seine-et-Oise, said that, in 40 years of professional theatregoing, he had attended 15,000 performances without one hour of boredom and without a moment of undue deference to the tyranny of directors and stars. This claim is not without foundation; his real popularity with the French bourgeoisie of his time rests not merely upon his own announced identity with any theatregoer but, perhaps chiefly, upon an individualism and independence to which he was able to give effective expression in his familiar, rather commonplace prose. Most of his comments were published, on innumerable Mondays, in the Paris Temps.

His definitely academic training, started at home (his father was the principal of a boarding school at Dourdan) and completed in Paris secondary schools and at the Ecole Normale Supérieure, where he was a classmate of the cerebral Taine (q.v.), proved no check at all upon his enjoyment of a neatly spun vaudeville or a bombastic heroic play or melodrama. From a great predecessor, Lessing, who was revealed to him by his friend De Suckau, he adopted a motto which helped him in the very midst of realism and naturalism to maintain a kind of middle course: "Nature is one thing; Art, and mainly theatrical Art, is another." Foreshadowing seemed to him the basic essential of a good play; la scène à faire was in his view an out and out necessity for any well-developed stage work.

"Uncle Sarcey" became a sure guide for the taste of an immense public and the reliance of playwrights in quest of prompt success—until in the 1890's the trend towards symbolism (see French symbolism), to which he was not sympathetic, made him seem out of date. Quarante Ans de théâtre (8 vols., 1900-1902) remains as testimony of a continuous and sensible devotion to dramatic criticism. The public lectures which Sarcey gave, mainly in connection with the revival of older plays, were not of the same standard; some of them are remembered as slightly absurd. In the midst of the Second Empire, Sarcey was a liberal and attached to leftist periodicals. Novels (Etienne Moret, 1876; Le Piano de Jeanne, 1876), memoirs

(Le Siège de Paris, 1871), and a book entitled Le Mot et la chose (1862) complete the record of his publications; they do not add greatly to his importance.

See: J. Claretie et al., introduction to Vol. I (1900) of Sarcey, Quarante Ans de théâtre.

F. B.

Sardinha, António (1887?-1925, Portuguese poet and journalist), unexcelled as the singer of rural Portugal, was also the spiritual father of "integralismo," a Portuguese variant of the French "Action Française" (see Maurras, Charles). Born in Monforte de Alemtejo, of peasant stock, he always remained attached to his native province, until his premature death at Elvas. Even before leaving the University of Coimbra in 1911 he had embarked on a journalistic career; he became chief editor of the daily A monarquia (The Monarchy) and later directed A nação portuguesa (The Portuguese Nation). Guided by the critic Moniz Barreto (q.v.), he and the poet Lopes Vieira (q.v.) founded the movement known as Integralismo Lusitano (1914), advocating a return to the Catholic monarchy and an Atlantic Empire closely allied with Spain. After the murder of Sidónio Paes, the monarchist deputy Sardinha was exiled in 1919 and spent the following three years in Spain. He returned to Portugal, but died before seeing nationalism triumph.

As a poet Sardinha knew how to express pure human emotion. Thus love for a woman moved him to write the sonnets of Chuva da tarde (1923; Evening Rain), and grief over the death of a little son the elegies of Era uma vez um menino (1926; Once upon a Time There Was a Boy). But most of his verse and prose remained at the service of traditions whose revival, he thought, would save Portugal from disintegration. Not only did he proclaim, like Teixeira de Pascoais (q.v.), the revigorating virtues of saüdade (sad memories) and the Messianic myth of King Sebastian, but he foreshadowed the "blood and soil" mysticism of the Nazis, when he identified himself with his forebears and the soil of Alemtejo in Tronco reverdecido (1910; New Shoots from an Old Trunk) and A epopéia da planície; poemas da terra e do sangue (1915; The Epic of the Plain; Poems of Blood and Soil). Exiled in Toledo, the nationalist poet expressed the longings of his "old Lusitanian heart" in the sonnets of Na corte da saüdade (1922; At the Court of Saudade). Also written in exile, Quando as nascentes despertam . . . (1921;

When the Springs Awaken . . .) exalts rural Portugal in beautifully tender poems, vibrating with childhood memories and premonitions of early death.

Sardinha devoted most of his energy, however, to political journalism. He developed a fluid, self-possessed style recalling the balanced prose of Eça de Queiroz (q.v.) and the subtle, icy rationalizations of Charles Maurras. Having begun his crusade with O valor da raça (1915; The Value of Race), he summed up his partisan views on history and politics in A aliança peninsular (1926; The Peninsular Alliance).

See: Ramiro de Maeztu, "Prólogo," in La alianza peninsular (1930); Mendes dos Remédios, História da literatura portuguesa, 6th ed. (1930), p. 574.

G. M. M

Sardou, Victorien (1831–1908), French dramatist, was born in Paris. After an attempt at medical studies, he undertook various occupations, such as giving private lessons in science; since he wanted to devote himself to his theatrical vocation in spite of his family's opposition and could not expect any assistance from them, he had to earn money to be financially independent. His first play, La Taverne des étudiants, given at the Odéon in 1854, was a complete failure. Disgusted, he stayed away from the stage for four years; then, having married an actress, Mlle de Brécourt, he became connected with the famous Déjazet, who agreed to play the main role in Les Premières Armes de Figaro (1859). Sardou's productiveness is astonishing, and likewise his versatility which, if we except tragedy, enabled him to write all kinds of plays—vaudeville (Les Premières Armes de Figaro), pure comedy (Les Pattes de mouche, 1860), high comedy of manners (Nos Intimes, 1860; La Famille Benoiton, 1865; Nos Bons villageois, 1866), comedy of character (Séraphine, 1869), historical drama (Patrie, 1869; La Haine, 1874), historical comedy (Monsieur Garat, 1860; Madame Sans-Gêne, 1893), a problem play (Daniel Rochat, 1880), political satire (Rabagas, 1872), farce (Divorçons, 1880). There were also farcical plays such as Les Pommes du voisin, a dark melodrama perhaps parodical (Les Diables noirs), fairy plays such as Don Quichotte, plays with showy costumes such as Les Merveilleuses, operatic scenarios such as Les Barbares for Saint-Saëns, and finally, among the dramas especially written to set off the various gifts of Sarah Bernhardt, Fédora (1882), Théodora (1884), La Tosca (1887), Gismonda (1894). His Thermidor (1891), against the Terror, evoked a violent uproar, with debates in the Chamber of Deputies, and was suspended after two performances. Robespierre (1899) and Dante (1903), written for Sir Henry Irving, were never played in French. Sardou was elected a member of the French Academy in 1877.

Perhaps no other 19th-century French dramatist has stirred so many audiences and acquired a comparable reputation in Europe, America, and Asia. At the beginning of the 20th century, Japanese actors were playing Patrie in Tokyo in Japanese. On the other hand, there is no dramatic writer who, during his lifetime, has been less spared by critics. University critics were almost ferocious.

In objective appraisal there can be little debate as to Sardou's stagecraft, his talent for endowing a play with life to the least detail. For scenery, costumes, and the setting of the masses in motion, a reconstitution such as Théodora at the Porte Saint-Martin remains famous. And if Théodore Barrière, author of Les Faux Bonshommes, greeted him in his youth as the incarnation of the theatre, it is because at an early age Sardou showed himself unrivaled, even compared with Scribe, in inventing plays with one dramatic situation after another, in rapid succession, which hold the curiosity of the audience in suspense. His style was lively, sparkling, often biting. In many of his comedies he showed such an understanding of actualité that Jules Claretie once called him a "dramatic barometer."

But Sardou tried too exclusively to entertain and carry the onlooker through various emotions by means of the unexpected and thrilling turns of his plots and sacrificed, far too much, character study and real life. This does not mean that he did not thoroughly understand the human heart. Read, for instance, the quarrel between Theodora and Justinien or the great love scene in Gismonda, perhaps one of the most beautifully written of the contemporary theatre. A revival of La Famille Benoiton at the Odéon made even a severe critic like Doumic (q.v.) admit that Sardou had painted from life certain aspects of the manners of the Second Empire. Yet (see his own French Academy speech, published in 1878) he was inclined to study men and events too much from a merely theatrical point of view. His characters are often like silhouettes, and he offers too frequently a rather unreal synthesis of pure comedy in the two first acts and of drame and comedy in the last three. A purely comic strain often alternates strangely with an almost caricatural manner. Nor is the too free use of wit in the dialogue true to reality. We observe the author even more than the character, and when he happens to make a show of conventional and sentimental morals, we are surprised at so naïve an outburst from so clever a writer.

Divorçons, undoubtedly one of Sardou's masterpieces, is perhaps also the masterpiece of 19th-century farcical plays. In Patrie and in La Haine the dramatist rises to heroic heights, lofty emotions. His best comedies, in spite of their defects, will always offer to the student of manners useful documentation; whenever he wanted to be, he was a very good portrayer of his time. Above all, Victorien Sardou—and this is not a minor merit—was able to amuse, charm, and move two generations of Frenchmen and make them forget for a few hours the troubles and worries of everyday life.

See: H. Rebell, Victorien Sardou (1903); G. Mouly, La Vie prodigieuse de Victorien Sardou (1931).

L. All.

Sarment, Jean (1897–, French actor and dramatist), was born in Nantes. He attended the lycée in that city and after finishing his studies went to Paris. His talent attracted the attention of Réjane, the famous actress, and of the popular actor Max Dearly. He studied dramatic art at the Paris Conservatory. In 1917, when Jacques Copeau (q.v.), the director of the Vieux Colombier, left for America with a company of actors, Sarment joined the troupe and spent two seasons in New York. On his return to France he joined the company of Lugné-Poe (q.v.) at the Théâtre de l'Œuvre and played leading parts in plays by Ibsen and Strindberg (qq.v.). Sarment's first two plays, La Couronne de carton (1920) and Le Pêcheur d'ombres (1921; Eng. tr., Rude Awakening, 1939), were produced in that theatre, and the author played the leading roles in both. The plays were very favorably received and are still considered by critics to be among his best. Le Pêcheur d'ombres, though its plot bears no resemblance to that of any of Ibsen's plays, has an Ibsenian flavor. The hero of the play is a young poet who is suffering from amnesia and who, when cured, finds life too ugly to endure. There is always a definite romantic tendency, especially in the earlier plays of Sarment. His characters seek to escape from their humdrum existence; it is invariably the idealist for whom Sarment shows his sympathy. Sometimes the characters like to imagine themselves greater than they are, as in Je suis trop grand pour moi (1924). Sarment wrote more than 20 plays in prose and in verse and acted in them as well. They were produced at the Comédie Française, the Odéon, and in many other European theatres.

See: Lucien Dubech, "Le Théâtre de M. Jean Sarment," Revue universelle, XVII (1924), 251–255; L. Delpit, Paris—Théâtre contemporain, I (1925), 99–101, II (1938), 20–21, 149–151; Edmond Sée, Le Théâtre français contemporain (1928), pp. 162–165; M. E. Coindreau, La Farce est jouée (1942).

H. H.

Sars, Johan Ernst (1835–1917, Norwegian historian and political essayist), born in Florø, was long a professor at the University of Christiania (from 1874). His father, Michael Sars, was a pioneer in modern zoology, his mother was a sister of one of the leading Norwegian poets in the middle of the 19th century, Johan Sebastian Welhaven, and he received strong impulses both from the methods of science and from the formal demands of poetry. Stimulated to historical thinking by Buckle, to scientific generalizations by Comte and Spencer, to the grasp of laws in historical facts by Guizot, Tocqueville, Fustel de Coulanges, and other French historians, to passionate search for unity in the national history of Norway by Björnson (q.v.) and by contemporary politics, Sars created the first great synthesis of Norwegian history in his capital work, Udsigt over den norske historie (4 vols., 1873–1891; View of Norwegian History). Here he showed the virtual continuity of national development from the first historical times down to the present, even through the "dark" centuries of foreign domination. Indeed Sars found the germs of decay even in the very elements of greatness and those of a new rise in essentials of the downfall, and arrived at general historical laws of the growth and decline of nations. The immediate effect of his work was the shaping of national thought in Norway. He undertook his historical work with the program of rousing the nation to fight for full political and intellectual independence, and he became a spiritual leader in this fight, popularizing his historical ideas in pamphlets and articles, working as journalist and editor of magazines. In his historical works and essays he proved a brilliant portraitist, often with a touch of irony, and the paradoxical antithesis that was at the foundation of his historical thought, put, as it were, its mark even on his style, which was no doubt influenced by French manners of writing. All this made his essays delightful reading, though they often angered his opponents by their scathing polemics against obsolete conceptions or against undignified servility to authorities. He wanted to throw open the door for all modern science and new ideas, and the magazines of which he was coeditor from 1877 to the end of the century were pioneers in this task.

See: H. Koht, in Nordmaend i det 19de aarhundrede, III (1914), 69-98, and in Forhandlinger i videnskaps-selskapet i Kristiania (1917), pp. 95-112; J. S. Worm-Müller, in Norsk historisk videnskap i femti ar (1920), pp. 25-41.

H. K.

Sartre, Jean Paul (1905-, French philosopher, critic, novelist, and dramatist), a Parisian by birth, wrote between 1936 and 1940 certain studies in the realm of psychology which, though deeply original, remained little known except to initiates (L'Imagination, 1936; Esquisse d'une théorie des émotions, 1939; L'Imaginaire, 1940). A series of critical essays, published in the Nouvelle Revue française (on François Mauriac, q.v.; John Dos Passos, William Faulkner, et al.), introduced him to the general public. There followed a novel, La Nausée (1938), which evoked in most somber tones the hopelessness of man's situation in the midst of a universe where "nothing, absolutely nothing, justifies his existence." A volume of short stories (Le Mur, 1939) seemed to emphasize further the author's cynicism and despair, his sense of "the absurdity of it all," his blunt and scornful appraisal of human motives and behavior. By and large, Sartre's production of these earlier years, however talented and morbidly fascinating it may have been, received only part of the attention which it deserved.

The situation was sharply modified during the Second World War. Public interest was thoroughly aroused by knowledge of Sartre's valiant role in the French resistance to the German oppressor, and more especially by the manner in which, with his spectacular drama Les Mouches (1943), set in Argos under the reign of Aegisthus, he managed to delude Nazi censorship and issue a stirring call on behalf of liberty. Later, audiences listened spellbound to his one-act play, Huis-Clos (1944), a remarkably taut and dense symbolization of Hell in the form of a bare, cheap hotel room where three persons—a man, two women—are forever condemned to each other's presence: "l'Enfer, c'est les Autres." In 1943 Sartre also produced his monumental, 700-page philosophical treatise, L'Être et le néant. He now reached a position of singular eminence in the world of French letters. Much was being written, including a novel by his disciple and friend, Simone de Beauvoir (L'Invitée, 1943), about the "cénacle" of the Café de Flore of which he had become the principal and most picturesque ornament. His prestige was currently likened to that of Maurice Barrès or André Gide (qq.v.) in former days, and some enthusiasts, hastily coining the word "Sartrism," predicted that the new system would displace Bergsonism (see Bergson, Henri) as the most modern expression of French philosophical thinking. The fact is that a considerable following, which included a number of fashionable ladies, was converted to existentialism overnight.

Existentialism as propounded in L'Être et le néant is the French naturalization of German phenomenology, itself grafted on the century-old philosophy of Søren Kierkegaard. Sartre fully recognizes his debt to Husserl and Heidegger, but likes to point out that the existential viewpoint is already implicit in the Cogito of Descartes. Reality (notwithstanding positivism) has no meaning save for the mind—that is the starting point. However, the existentialists add, it does not follow (as idealism would have it) that all reality is in the mind. The outer world exists. "Human reality," in fact, is a centrifugal force incessantly directed toward physical objects or other persons treated as physical objects. It yearns to achieve the wholeness and self-identity which is the attribute of things without losing the self-consciousness which is the attribute of man. This, according to Sartre, is a logical contradiction. Human existence, therefore, will be characterized by a lack, a void, a frustration. While it is because of this very incompleteness that we are capable of freedom, our liberty itself is a function of "le néant." It is born in anguish (cf. the "concept of dread" of Kierkegaard) and carries us toward the unpredictable realization of our essence which will not be complete till the day of our death.

It will readily be seen that all of Sartre's works—his treatises, his novels, his dramas—are but different wings of the same "existential" edifice, to be ultimately crowned by a system of ethics. The attitude expressed in La Nausée represented a preliminary and indispensable stage. We are now promised a new humanism, the first glimpse of which may be afforded by the triptych of novels entitled Les Chemins de la Liberté (L'Age de raison, Le Sursis, La Dernière Chance, the first two published in 1945) and the essay entitled L'Existentialisme est un humanisme (1946). This new humanism Sartre defines as "without illusions (that is to say, divorced from religious experience), but full of confidence in the grandeur of humanity; hard, but without useless violence; passionate yet restrained; striving to paint the metaphysical condition of man while fully participating in the movements of society."

That a starkly pessimistic writer should emerge as a spiritual leader and a moralist in the old French tradition is not only compatible with existential tenets in general but with Sartre's temperament as well. Of his many complexes some are deeply personal; others he holds in common with his generation—that of the 1920's. The significant fact, however, is that Sartre's intellectual life, though at times "dangerous" in the Nietzschean sense, never sank to the depths of nihilism which engulfed some of his contemporaries. The Ecole Normale Supérieure of his day (1924–1928) was largely under the sway of Alain (see Chartier, Emile), whose steady questioning of all accepted values found its own corrective in rugged individualism and dialectical vigor. The "official" teachings of the Sorbonne may have proved repulsive to the student Sartre as they did to his roommate and constant companion, Paul Nizan (see Nizan's Les Chiens de garde, 1932). Nevertheless, it is characteristic of him that he should have accepted the yoke and discipline of an academic career, first in the provinces (Lycées of Laon and Le Havre), then in Paris (Lycée Condorcet), until the time when he was satisfied that he had found a plausible answer—universal perhaps, well-integrated at any rate—to the riddle of his own existence. Thus the varied and massive production that followed was not the improvised venture of a dilettante; it was an orderly release of pent-up energy.

See: Simone de Beauvoir, Pyrrhus et Cinéas (1944); H. J. Ayer, "Novelists-Philosophers: Jean-Paul Sartre," Horizon, XII (London, 1945), 12–26, 101–110; Jean Beaufret, "A propos de l'existentialisme," Confluences, N. S. (1945), Nos. 2–6; Claude Edmonde Magny, "Système de Sartre," Esprit, Année XIII (1945), pp. 564–580, 709–724; R. Campbell, Jean-Paul Sartre, ou une Littérature philosophique (1945).

J.-A. B.

Savinkov, Boris Viktorovich (pseud. V. Ropshin, 1879–1925, Russian terrorist and novelist), born in Kharkov, Ukraine, is one of the most colorful figures in the annals of revolution. As a youth he joined the Social Revolutionists. Deported to Vologda, he escaped via Archangel to Geneva. There he entered the secret terrorist unit of the party, the Fighting Brigade, and returned in disguise to Russia to organize first the assassination (1904) of Von Plehve, minister of the interior, and second that of the Grand Duke Sergei (1905). His prestige in the party exalted by his brilliant daring and inexhaustible resources, he proceeded to engineer a series of conspiracies—including several attempts on the life of Nicholas II—attended by numerous hairbreadth escapes. After the first 1917 Revolution he became Kerensky's minister of war. Violently anti-Bolshevik, he fled in October and thereafter fomented counterrevolutionary activities of wide range and ferocity. In 1924 he re-entered the U.S.S.R. and was instantly arrested and tried (August 27–29). Death sentence was commuted to 10 years' imprisonment. Mysterious circumstances yet surround his apparent suicide on May 7, 1925.

Savinkov's literary work is fascinating in a documentary sense rather than as pure literature. His four books, all more or less autobiographical, provide an intimate and indispensable account of the early terrorists' activities and of their macabre psychology. Kon bledny (1909; Eng. tr., The Pale Horse, 1917) is already a classic example of this genre. This pseudo novel, together with To chto ne sluchilos (1913; Eng. tr., What Never Happened, 1917), Kon voronoi (1923; Eng. tr., The Black Horse, 1924), and Vospominaniya terrorista (1926; Memoirs of a Terrorist), leaves an indelible impression of the spiritual tragedy of the political destroyer and of his paradoxical mixture of fanaticism, egotism, and self-sacrifice.

See: B. Pares, review of Delo Borisa Savinkova (n.d.; The Trial of Boris Savinkov) in Slavonic Review, IV (1925–1926), 760–769; Y. Sazonova, review of Vospominaniya terrorista in Souremennyya zapiski, XXXI (1927), 463–466; H. Danjou, "Notre Ami l'assassin," Les Œuvres inédites, No. 112, October, 1930, pp. 283–324.

N. S.

Savoir, Alfred (1883–1934, French dramatist), born in Łódź, Poland, went to France, where he substituted Savoir for the family name, Posymanski. His Le Baptême (1908) and La Sonate de Kreutzer (1925) present a bitter and cruel picture of life, quite different from that portrayed in his better-known light and witty comedies such as La Huitième Femme de Barbe-Bleue (1921), La Grande Duchesse (1924), Passy 08-45 (1928), and Lui (1929; Eng. tr., He, 1933). He invented a new type of dramatic entertainment, a kind of symbolic farce or vaudeville of ideas, of which good examples are Le Dompteur (1925), La Couturière de Lunéville (1923), and Le Figurant de la gaité (1926). Le Dompteur, translated into English as The Tamer; or, English as It Is Eaten, sets the pattern for this type of play: a brutal lion tamer who believes in strict discipline is set opposite a philosophical Englishman, a firm believer in the freedom of the will. The tyranny of the tamer wins the circus lady whom they both love, while the philosopher is eaten by the animals he pities. Such a grotesque situation offered abundant opportunity for the ingenuity and fantasy of Savoir. Many of his plays were turned into films, and toward the end of his life he was actively engaged in promoting an international association of writers of original plays for the cinema. His plays, well written and cleverly constructed, reflect certain aspects of his epoch, but now seem ephemeral and artificial.

J. F. M.

Scarfoglio, Edoardo (1860–1917, Italian editor and critic), was born at Paganica, Aquila, and died in Naples. He was editor of several newspapers, founder of the Mattino, and for a time husband of Matilde Serao (q.v.), many of whose works he published. An important figure in politics and letters, he never attained an outstanding position in either. Mixing violent feelings with pessimism and cynicism, he considered himself a buccaneer floundering in nonheroic waters. Frequently his newspaper experiences took the form of piratical adventures in which the sword often proved more effective than the pen. He fought several duels, including a famous one with his old friend D'Annunzio (q.v.) and one with Felice Cavallotti, outstanding representative of democracy in politics and romanticism in literature. His first book is the only one of verse he ever wrote (Papaveri, 1880), and is no worse than many other Carducci (q.v.) imitations of the period; his short stories (Il Processo di Frije, 1884) exaggerate the folkloristic, rugged, primitive life of the peasant of the Abruzzi; his several books of travel (In Levante e a traverso i Balkani, 1890; Le Nostre Cose in Africa, 1895; Itinerario verso i paesi d'Etiopia, 1895–1896; Il Cristiano errante, 1897) are interesting and vivid reporting, with a nostalgic yearning for the countries described that exhausts itself in the pen rather than in active participation or conquest. Scarfoglio's literary fame is based chiefly on his Libro di Don Chisciotte (1885; reprinted 1911, 1925), which is more important as a personal tribute to the Roman literature of the new Italy than for its literary acuteness and insight. He shows his lack of judgment by preferring Capuana to Verga (qq.v.)! But in his effective description of the youthful D'Annunzio transformed by Roman Circes into a sort of gigolo he demonstrates his mastery of caricature. In his last few years Scarfoglio's powerful invectives were directed against English imperialism (Il Popolo dai cinque pasti, 1915; La Guerra della sterlina, 1915).

Much of Scarfoglio's correspondence is in private hands and is of too intimate a character to be published. Many articles may be found in the files of old newspapers, but only an interest in Scarfoglio's bullying, bragging, and boasting prose would warrant examining them. An anthology of his works, prepared by Alberto Consiglio, was published in 1932.

G. P.

Schaeffer, Albrecht (1885–, German poet, novelist, and essayist), was born in Elbing, West Prussia. His childhood was spent in Hanover. He studied in Munich and in Berlin, tried his hand at journalism, but soon gave it up and settled in the Inn valley of southern Bavaria. He was writing poetry at the age of 14, and all his early compositions were in metrical form—poems, romances, verse epics, plays—with the exception of the novel Helianth (1920), which established his reputation as a writer. Helianth is a three-volume novel of apprenticeship in the tradition of Goethe's Wilhelm Meister and Gottfried Keller's (q.v.) Der grüne Heinrich, deeply concerned with the meaning and value of art. The young author's guiding spirit was Stefan George (q.v.). With him he revolted against materialism and cheap opportunism, seeking "the radiant mystery of things" and their adequate poetic expression. A searching study of George forms the major essay in his volume Dichter und Dichtung (1923). Schaeffer, like so many of his contemporaries, is also attracted by psychological analysis and naturalistic description of abnormal events and human situations. Some of his short stories, e.g., Der Hund (1918), Der höllische Sebastian (1928), Das Opfertier (1936), as well as episodes in most of his works pay tribute to naturalism (see German naturalism, French naturalism) although an undercurrent of mysticism seems to suggest subtler, symbolic meanings.

Religion of a mystical and speculative but emphatically Christian kind, the classics, nature and life close to the soil, are the dominating elements in Schaeffer's work. Der göttliche Dulder (1920) retells the adventures of Ulysses; Parzival (1922) is a new and brilliantly imaginative adaptation of the medieval epic; Aphaia: Der Weg der Götter, Völker und Zahlen (1937) gives a mystical interpretation of certain numbers and their relations to religion, art, and the evolution of national cultures, based on the proportions of an ancient Greek temple. On the other hand, Schaeffer's latest novels, Cara (1936) and Ruhland: Lebensbild eines Mannes (1937), grew out of the deep contentment which their author had found at last in working the land and sharing the community of country people. They are not "novels of the soil"; their characters' foremost concern is still with problems of the spirit, and their primitive living does not lead to an oversimplified type of human experience. Ruhland is Faustian in its restless search for lasting spiritual satisfaction and represents in composition and style as well as in its thought a synthesis of realistic observation, imaginative interpretation, and ethical intent which makes it an outstanding example of the German character novel. Schaeffer left Germany before the Second World War and is at present living in the United States.

See: W. Muschg, Der dichterische Charakter (1929); Schaeffer, "Siebengang: Eine Selbstdarstellung," Die neue Rundschau, Jahrgang XLV (1934), Bd. II, pp. 312-321.

E. M. F.

Schäfer, Wilhelm (1868-, German novelist and essayist), was born into a peasant family in Ottrau, Hesse-Nassau. He spent his early life near Düsseldorf and for a period of several years was a schoolteacher at Vohwinkel and Eberfeld. Later he had a chance to travel in Switzerland and France; in 1900 he moved to Berlin where, in close friendship with Richard Dehmel (q.v.), he worked as a free-lance writer. He soon felt the need for the strength and traditions of his native soil, and in 1900, after having published more than five volumes of narrative prose—some of them influenced by the novels of Björnson (q.v.)—he founded the magazine Die Rheinlande, in which he gathered together material relating to the history and folklore of western Germany. Schäfer's celebrated versions of the Rhineland sagas (Rheinsagen) appeared in 1908, written in his characteristically straightforward and warm prose. At the same time he developed the old literary medium of the short and significant anecdote, of which he and Johann Peter Hebel (1760-1826) have written the most distinguished examples in German literature (Gesammelte Anekdoten, 1929; Wendekreis neuer Anekdoten, 1937). In all his work a strong sense of the writer's pedagogical responsibility (see his Pestalozzi tale, Der Lebenstag eines Menschenfreundes, 1915) is coupled with a lively feeling for historical continuity and pride in the national heritage (Die dreizehn Bücher der deutschen Seele, 1922; Der deutsche Gott, 1923; Auf Spuren der alten Reichsherrlichkeit, 1933; Deutsche Reden, 1933; Theoderich, König des Abendlandes, 1939). In his many narratives, especially perhaps in his most popular novel, Der Hauptmann von Köpenick (1930), he conveys the generosity of his humor, and the seemingly casual skill of a born storyteller, through a language which was originally impressionistic, but has gradually grown more definite in its plasticity and steadiness of rhythm.

Since 1918 Schäfer has lived in Ludwigs-hafen (Lake Constance). He became an early member of the Prussian Academy of Art and, more recently, of the Akademie der Dichtung.

See: O. Doderer, ed., Bekenntnis zu Wilhelm Schäfer (1928); Schäfer, Mein Leben (1934) and Meine Eltern (1937); H. Langen-bucher, "Wilhelm Schäfer zum 70. Geburtstag," Zeitschrift für deutsche Bildung, XIV (1938), 32-41; W. Steinborn, "Dichterische Existenz," Das Innere Reich, IV (1938), 1208-1237.

V. L.

Schäffer, Albrecht, see Schaeffer.

Schaffner, Jakob (1875-1944, Swiss novelist), was born in Basle, raised in an orphanage, and then made to serve an apprenticeship to a cobbler, though his ambition was to become a teacher. As a journeyman cobbler he traveled all over Europe and in the process discovered and developed his ability as a writer and was soon able to live by his pen. The latter fact is a measure of his natural talent; Schaffner possesses indeed an unusually spontaneous power of expression, is a master in bringing to life the greatest variety of European scenes, and enters with astounding psychological understanding into almost any German dialect.

Yet he was far too much interested in social and political life to succumb to the danger of becoming a mere virtuoso. The unfair treatment he received in his youth may have kindled in him that spirit of revolt against bourgeois ideals which permeates the very style of his books, to say nothing of their content. Ever since his early autobiographical novel, Konrad Pilater (1910), heralded the dissenter from Swiss middle-class aspirations, Schaffner was different from and often opposed to his countrymen. He is passionate and temperamental to a fault, and his characters show none of the serene tranquillity or exasperating heaviness which is associated with Swiss writing; his women no less openly than his men defy conventional standards and claim the right to follow instinct or intellect. But after the First World War, and no doubt under the influence of pressing social problems, Schaffner's work was marked by a transition from non-cooperative individualism to the serious effort for reconstruction. Unfortunately the remedies he began to advocate only widened the gulf separating him from his compatriots. For Schaffner, who had always been a firm believer in the possibility of combining patriotism with socialism, cast his lot in with German National Socialism whose good points, as he saw it, he tried to interpret for Switzerland. That he was not an uncritical adherent of the German form of totalitarianism is evidenced by his spirited account of a "strength through joy" trip, in Volk zu Schiff (1936). Today Schaffner stands fully discredited as a social and political reformer in the eyes of his countrymen, and his reputation as a novelist has suffered proportionately. The time will however come when we can again do justice to his creative work, and it is safe to assume that his voluminous autobiographical novels—Johannes (1922), Die Jünglingszeit des Johannes Schattenhold (1930), and Eine deutsche Wanderschaft (1933)—will then be enjoyed both for their documentary value and for their imaginative and stylistic vividness.

See: R. Faesi, Gestalten und Wandlungen schweizerischer Dichtung (1922), pp. 168–203; P. Fässler, Jakob Schaffner; Leben und Werk (1937).

H. B.

Schaukal, Richard von (1874–, Austrian poet, novelist, and essayist), was born at Brünn in Austrian Moravia, the son of an apothecary. He studied law at the University of Vienna, entered the service of the Austrian state in 1897, and achieved considerable distinction as a state official; when the Austrian monarchy collapsed in 1918, Schaukal gave up his position and lived thereafter in retirement in a suburb of Vienna. Schaukal's literary production, though not extensive, is of high quality. While his prose fiction (Eros Thanatos, 1906; a collection of stories) is respectable, his few essays (Giorgione, 1907) noteworthy, and his translations of French poets (Baudelaire, Verlaine, Nachdichtungen, 1906) distinguished, he is likely to live longest through his lyric poetry, the first of which was published before he was 20 (Gedichte, 1893). It is in this field that a genuine development is discernible in his work. Sloughing off a certain amount of affectation and posing, a blasé weariness and pallor, Schaukal began to come into his own around 1900 and steadily grew thereafter in power and assurance. At the same time he was establishing the principles that were more and more to govern his lyric utterance. These are mainly three, insistence upon the validity and necessity of tradition in life as in art, consistent and conscious advocacy of the "aristocratic" point of view, the conception of artistic form as central and not peripheral. Constantly filing and polishing his poems, he reissued them as if executing a trust (Ausgewählte Gedichte, 1909; Gedichte, 1891–1918, 1918). There is also a marked trend toward conservatism in style as in subject matter.

See: J. Nadler, Schaukals lyrisches Werk (1932).

B. Q. M.

Schaumann, Ruth (1899–, German poet, sculptor, and graphic artist), was born in Hamburg, the daughter of an army officer who was killed in 1917 in the battle of Verdun. At the age of six she became seriously ill and has been in delicate health ever since. While still at school she felt the urge to write. In 1917 she went to Munich to begin her training as an artist, but another serious illness kept her in bed for several years. It was then that she wrote most of her deeply religious poems which appeared in her first book, Die Kathedrale (1920). They are expressionistic in style and reveal a fervor of devotion akin to that of the medieval mystics. The same spirit expresses itself in her religious sculpture of that period which is strongly influenced by Gothic art. A trend towards a simpler and more personal style (volksliedhaft) is already noticeable in her collection of poems Der Knospengrund (1922) and in Das Passional (1922), the story of the Passion of Christ. It becomes more and more marked in her later works (short stories, fairy tales, novels, plays) with their faith, child-like humility, and wonder towards God and his creation. In 1924 Ruth Schaumann entered the Catholic Church.

Marriage did not interfere with her literary and artistic endeavors. Her talents are happily combined in books of verse and prose, some of them written for her children and illustrated with her sensitive drawings and woodcuts (Die Kinder und die Tiere, 1928; Die geliebten Dinge, 1930). The outstanding qualities of her poems and unpretentious tales are her convincing sincerity and her quiet and delicate approach. Where she attempts more, the lack of touch with reality and her consciously limited scope of thinking and feeling result in vagueness and absence of color.

See: R. Hetsch, Ruth Schaumann Buch (1933).

O. S. F.

Schendel, Arthur van (1874–, Dutch novelist), was born at Batavia, Dutch East Indies. He studied English language and literature, intending to become a high school teacher. He taught for a number of years in England and Holland, but in the 90's began to devote himself exclusively to creative writing. He made his literary début with a short story called "Drogon" (1896), a medieval tale of a shy, passionate eccentric who seduces his brother's wife when her husband has gone to the Holy Land. In 1897 followed "De Schoone Jacht" (The Beautiful Chase), another strange, fantastic tale of medieval life.

Not until 1907 did his peculiar talent show itself in full strength in Een Zwerver Verliefd (A Wanderer in Love). It tells of the monk Tamalone's restless longing for distant lands and of his love for the girl who had been entrusted to his protection by her lover. Een Berg van Droomen (1913; A Mountain of Dreams) takes the reader into a fairy-tale world of dreamlike imaginings. With the appearance of Het Fregatschip Johanna Maria (1930; Eng. tr., The "Johanna Maria," 1935), Van Schendel turned from dream to reality. It is the biography of a sailing vessel, one of the last of Holland's merchant marine that survived the coming of the steamship. The hero of his tale is Jacob Brouwer, the sailmaker of the brave ship. He has known her from the day that she was launched, he has served among her crew with a devotion such as no man gives to a soulless thing, he has at last become her owner and must suffer the pain of parting with the dear one, unable to rescue her from the scrap heap which becomes her burial place. It is a restrained, objective record of a simple life that approaches greatness through its generous surrender to a single devotion. The book was hailed at once as a masterpiece and awarded the annual prize of the Maatschappij der Nederlandsche Letterkunde (Society of Netherlands Literature) as the most distinguished literary work of the year. The best known among his later novels are De Waterman (1933; The Waterman), De Rijke Man (1936; The Rich Man), and Grauwe Vogels (1937; Eng. tr., Grey Birds 1939).

Van Schendel's technique is that of the unemotional recorder. His narrative lacks dramatic quality. It never breaks into dialogue. His characters move speechless through his stories, like figures that one sees in dreams. Van Schendel, nevertheless, is regarded by his Dutch contemporaries as Holland's greatest living novelist. A group of his admirers proposed him, in 1939, as a candidate for the Nobel prize.

A. J. B

Scherer, Edmond (1815–1889, French critic and publicist), was born in Paris, of Swiss forebears. He was in some respects the Protestant counterpart of Ernest Renan (q.v.) An ordained minister in the Reformed Swiss Church, he was one of the many victims of 19th-century science, losing his faith and breaking with the Church in 1861. He left Geneva at that time and made Versailles his home. He was associated until his death with the famous daily, Temps, of which he was one of the founders and editors. An unusually prolific writer, Scherer contributed more than 3300 articles of a literary or political nature to the Temps and to learned journals and periodicals. Though a politician of some note (he was senator in 1875), his title to fame rests largely on his contributions to the world of letters. Throughout his long career at the Temps (26 years), he seldom failed to publish under the heading "Variétés" a substantial weekly article on literature. The most significant of these articles were republished under the title Etudes sur la littérature contemporaine (10 vols., 1863–1895). These studies in literature are characterized by their straightforwardness, penetration, literary taste, and cosmopolitan nature. Dealing in the main with French letters, Scherer's studies include outstanding names and works in English, German, Spanish, and Italian literature. His articles on English literature were translated by George Saintsbury under the title Essays on English Literature (1891).

When Sainte-Beuve died (1869), the distinction of succeeding the renowned author of the Lundis fell upon Scherer. As an admiring disciple of Sainte-Beuve, Scherer was consistently, though not servilely, faithful to his master's method of looking for the man behind the author in a literary work. A book reveals the soul and temperament of its author to the critic who deserves his name; one of the chief tasks of the critic should then be to understand the more or less veiled message about himself which the writer wittingly or unwittingly transmits in his work, and the critic should present it to his readers in a detailed pen picture. Scherer's manner is less circuitous, or less discreet, than that of Sainte-Beuve. With a few bold, well-studied strokes he strives to produce and leave a lifelike, lasting impression on the reader's mind.

Scherer was admittedly influenced by Hegel, on whose work he wrote an article deemed a literary event at the time of its publication in the Revue des deux mondes (February 15, 1861). Like many of his contemporaries, Scherer adopted a relativistic philosophy. When he is dealing with literature, however, he for the most part forgets his theories on historical criticism; he is far less interested than many in unearthing the numerous, often doubtful influences that have brought about the genesis and development of a literary work. The finished product itself as a work of art and the author's ideas about life and its gravest concerns—these, above all, attract Scherer's attention. His characteristic qualities are sincerity and literary taste; his neat, sober, rapidly moving and incisive style is that of a thinker whose prime concern is the true and the beautiful.

Though Scherer's contemporaries (among these Sainte-Beuve and Renan) held his work in high esteem, his influence during his lifetime and since has never been very great. Reasons for the relative obscurity of a man who seemed to deserve better of posterity can be conjectured. Scherer's point of view and style were not entirely French, since his background and education were in great part Swiss; his somewhat puritanical approach to literature was not always acceptable to or understood by the Parisians for whom he wrote; a too exclusive independence and "ivory-tower" attitude left Scherer on the margin of social and literary circles where the climate of opinion on belles-lettres often originated; finally, Scherer judged democracy severely at a time when popular hopes ran high in this new experiment, and he expressed undisguised pessimism about the destiny of France under a democratic regime (see La Démocratie en France, 1883). In spite of Scherer's unpopularity in his own country, all those who have respect for keen literary taste and refined intellectual honesty may well continue to consult his articles.

See: O. Gréard, Edmond Scherer (1890); E. Boutmy, Taine, Scherer, Laboulaye (1901); N. Tremblay, La Critique littéraire d'Edmond Scherer (1932).

N. J. T.

Schickele, René (1885–1940, German novelist, poet, and dramatist), manifests in his life and works the fate of a citizen in a boundary land between two great cultures. Son of a German father and a French mother, he grew up in Alsace, a country sadly split in its loyalty by the cleavage between Germany and France. He studied in Strassburg, then turned to journalism and the publishing of magazines. His first volumes of poetry were collected in Der Ritt ins Leben (1905). Torn between the elemental "natural force" of his paternal ancestry and the greater "historical force" exerted by France, he developed his ideal of the supernational European who is indebted to both "fatherlands." Der Fremde (1907), Schickele's first novel, reveals the contradictory elements in the character of its author, who later alternated between expressionist and impressionist modes of style. Several volumes of poetry were followed by the novel Benkal, der Frauentröster (1914), an impressive fantastic vision of the coming war and its implicit absurdity. After the outbreak of the war—Schickele was then living in Berlin—he wrote within a few months the successful drama Hans im Schnakenloch (1916). The hero, a full-blooded, impetuous farmer, stands between two nations and two women. When the hour strikes, all about him make clear decisions and know where they stand; only Hans is torn within himself. Death in the French army, which he expects to be defeated, is the last hope of the fugitive from home. Soon banned in Germany and condemned in France, the drama gives evidence of the trend of Schickele's development.

In December, 1914, he had become the editor of Die weissen Blätter. He transferred the publication from Berlin to Zurich and made it the effective mouthpiece of European anti-war sentiment, counting among its contributors literary leaders from many lands. Schickele himself became an advocate of a revolution which would know no force other than that "of the heart, of persuasion, and of a joyful example." Soon disappointed after the war, he retired to the Black Forest and wrote the trilogy, Das Erbe am Rhein, the epic of Alsace and the Alsatians, comprising Maria Capponi (1925; Eng. tr., 1928), Blick auf die Vogesen (1927; Eng. tr., Heart of Alsace, 1929), and Der Wolf in der Hürde (1929). The great problems of politics are seen from the point of view of a cultured but kind-hearted human being. The brilliancy and clarity of the South are accepted and portrayed as objectively as the mysticism of weaving mists in the Black Forest. To Schickele's way of thinking the solution of the problems between France and Germany may be achieved in terms of concrete humanity.

Driven to France after 1933, Schickele wrote the novel Die Flaschenpost (1937), the tragedy of an individualist who in the confusion of modern times finds ultimate peace in an insane asylum. A book on D. H. Lawrence (1934) had shown Schickele as a lucid and passionate interpreter of creative genius.

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Neue Folge: Im Banne des Expressionismus, 4. Auflage (1927), pp. 324-326, 571-578.
W. K. P.

Schlaf, Johannes (1862-1941, German dramatist and novelist), was born in Querfurt, Saxony, where he received his early education until his parents moved to Magdeburg in 1874. In childhood he showed literary and artistic inclinations which his parents discouraged and suppressed. At the Gymnasium he knew Conradi (q.v.), who impressed him greatly. After two semesters at Halle, where he switched quickly from theology to philosophy, he completed his training as a philologist in Berlin (1887). He became a member of the literary group "Durch" (q.v.), where young enthusiasts like Heinrich and Julius Hart (q.v.), Bruno Wille, Wilhelm Boelsche (q.v.), Leo Berg, et al. were discussing the requisites of "modern" literature. Already familiar with the new trends and basically in sympathy with them, Schlaf accepted an invitation to collaborate with Arno Holz (q.v.) in putting such theories into practice. The winter of 1887-1888 yielded a series of sketches, three of which were published as Papa Hamlet (1889), under the joint pseudonym Bjarne P. Holmsen. Their accurate presentation of everyday life in its most prosaic and minute details was carried out with scientific precision and utilized photographic and phonographic techniques. Mannerisms and speech differences of each character were carefully noted and became valuable adjuncts of these milieu studies which aimed not at interpreting but depicting life. They presented, in fact, only the depressing meanness and squalor of bourgeois society. The literary value of these sketches is intrinsically small, but their immediate effect was important: they launched German naturalism (q.v.), from which emerged Gerhart Hauptmann (q.v.). Earlier and similar sketches, "Die papierne Passion," were finally published in a collection, Neue Gleise (1891), together with Papa Hamlet and the drama Die Familie Selicke (1889). The last, a drab and depressing milieu study of an incompatible bourgeois marriage which gradually killed any hope of happiness for the whole family, set the pattern of consistent naturalism (konsequenter Naturalismus).

After 1892 Schlaf and Holz wrote independently and indulged for years in disputes regarding their individual shares in their joint efforts. A reasonable and fair estimate must emphasize that Schlaf had the deeper poetic nature while Holz was the energetic and aggressive theorist who formulated the principal ideas of German naturalism and gave final form to their cooperative writings. Schlaf published Meister Oelze (1892; revised 2d ed., 1908), technically perhaps the best naturalistic drama, though never successful in the theatre. Quite in contrast to the crass naturalism of these works are the delicate impressionistic sketches of idyllic contentment far from city turmoil and strife, In Dingsda (1892) and Frühling (1894). After a serious nervous collapse (1893-1896), Schlaf wrote further dramas and stories, followed by ambitious novels that attempted to combat the decadent spirit of the age and to present the problematic nature of modern man in terms of a new positive faith in spiritual values. He stressed psychological analysis of human character in conflict with the world and itself. These novels, Das Dritte Reich (1900), Die Suchenden (1901), and Peter Bojes Freite (1902), were followed later by another trilogy, Der Kleine (1904), Der Prinz (1906), and Am toten Punkt (1907), in which literary artistry seems secondary to philosophical and religious interests. Schlaf also wrote essays on Whitman, Verhaeren (q.v.), and Mactierlinck (q.v.) and translated from their works. Religious and metaphysical problems absorbed him more and more until he lost himself in mystical speculations. Less ambitious works like Miele (1920) and Der Weihnachtswunsch und anderes (1924) are more satisfying because Schlaf is at his best in shorter works where restraint and concentration of effort produced little masterpieces. His place in literary history, however, depends upon his early work with Holz, which profoundly influenced the literature of the 90's.

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Neue Folge: Im Banne des Expression- ismus, 4. Auflage (1927), pp. 19–25, and Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, 19. Auflage (1928), pp. 191–201, 384–394.

W. A. R.

Schlumberger, Jean (1877–, French novelist and philosopher), born at Guebwiller in Alsace, belongs to an influential Protestant family of rich industrialists. He counts among his ancestors members of the famous Bernouilli family, and through his mother he is related to a long line of writers from Malezieu to Guizot. Obligated to leave Alsace when he was 15, so as to retain his French nationality, he attended the Lycée Condorcet in Paris. After earning his diploma of Licencié ès Lettres, he became interested in the history of religions, but finally devoted himself entirely to literature. In 1906 appeared, in Péguy's (q.v.) Cahiers de la quinzaine, Schlumberger's novel Heureux qui comme Ulysse—which he was subsequently to work over and lengthen by two parts under the title L'Inquiète Paternité (1911). In 1909 he was one of the founders of the Nouvelle Revue française, with his friend André Gide (q.v.); the two had parted company amicably with Péguy and the Cahiers. Both Gide and Schlumberger were of a very well marked Protestant mentality, intellectually rather than emotionally inclined; at the same time both were deeply concerned with the moral aspects of life. They virtually founded what might be called a school of Protestant casuistry (in the sense of a system for dealing with cases of conscience), the most representative novel of which is Gide's La Porte étroite. Gide, Schlumberger, and, in his own way, Pierre Loti (q.v.) represent the Protestant reaction against the materialistic or pantheistic philosophies which had prevailed for some years in France, just as Bourget (q.v.), the author of Le Disciple, and his group (Bazin, Bordeaux, qq.v., and others) are the protagonists of a parallel movement among Catholic writers. Both Gide and Schlumberger remained true to their introspective method and consistently opposed individualistic ethics to authority—with this difference, however, that Gide ultimately indulged in very bold theories in his endeavor to escape conventionalism at any cost (L'Immoraliste, Les Faux-Monnayeurs, Corydon), while Schlumberger remained more reticent and at least in expression more orthodox.

Most of Schlumberger's novels were published after the First World War: Un Homme heureux (1920); Le Camarade infidèle; roman d'un démobilisé (1922); Le Lion devenu vieux (1924), a roman historique in which the author imagines the thoughts that may have been those of the aged Cardinal Retz forced to surrender to the intolerant and despotic Richelieu. The greatest success in the literary career of Schlumberger has been Saint-Saturnin (1931). Saint-Saturnin is the name of a family estate in Normandy which its owners consider a sacred trust; the weak-mindedness of the present head of the family jeopardizes the safety of the estate, and the question arises as to how far the irresponsible man should be respected. The discussion of practical problems of life is continued in a novel that may be considered a sort of sequel to Saint-Saturnin, Histoire de quatre potiers (1935), in which the successful building up of an industry without involving the enslavement of its employees is discussed.

But the analysis of the problems of the soul remains paramount with Schlumberger, as is testified by his three traités, or essays, all of 1927: L'Enfant qui s'accuse, Césaire, ou la Puissance de l'esprit, Dialogues avec le corps endormi. The last brings up the eternal problem of body and soul inseparably bound to each other; while the body is asleep, the soul may try to rise to la contemplation de Dieu. In 1934 Schlumberger, in Sur les frontières religieuses, refers to himself as "un libre croyant"; and in 1936 he rereads Corneille and finds in the old exponent of the morale du devoir a real delight (Plaisir à Corneille; promenade anthologique). A novel published in 1940, Stéphane le glorieux, deals with a very complex cas de conscience during the First World War; somewhere in the Balkans the hero Stéphane is almost forced by circumstances to commit a crime, and the memory of this crime remains a burden on his spirit. In 1941 Schlumberger published a volume of essays, Jalons.

Schlumberger was interested in the theatre, but did not win much recognition. Two of his plays were given at the Vieux Colombier, Les Fils Louverné (1914) and La Mort de Sparte; a brief play, L'Amour, le prince et la vérité, is presented as a divertissement.

In 1942 the French Academy awarded to Schlumberger its Grand Prix de Littérature.

A. Sz.

Schmidtbonn, Wilhelm (pseud. of Wilhelm Schmidt, 1876–, German dramatist, novelist, and poet), was born in Bonn, the son of a merchant. He studied music at Cologne, then literature at the universities of Bonn, Berlin, Göttingen, and Zurich. He was for several years dramaturgist of the municipal theatre at Düsseldorf and editor of the journal Masken. For reasons of health he had to leave the Rhineland and now lives in Ascona, Switzerland.

He is a prolific writer. His numerous dramas, novels, and stories show a wide variety, but the line of his development stands out clearly. Beginning under the influence of naturalism (see German naturalism), he struggled to find meaning in the realities of life. This struggle is reflected in the stories Uferleute (1903) and Raben (1902), the novel Der Heilsbringer (1906), the dramas Mutter Landstrasse (1901), Der Graf von Gleichen (1908), and Der Zorn des Achilles (1909). Gradually he found himself and experienced the joy of living in a few happy years before 1914. During these years he wrote the dramas Hilfe! Ein Kind vom Himmel gefallen (1910), Der spielende Eros (1911), and Der verlorene Sohn (1912), the poems in Lobgesang des Lebens (1911), and 23 legends collected in Der Wunderbaum (1913). He was thrown back into doubts and dark moods by the First World War (see the drama Die Stadt der Besessenen, 1915, and the translation of a mystery of 1452, Die Passion, 1919). After the war his leitmotif became the restoring of human trust and love; he wrote, "Nur der Dichter versteht, der allen Freund ist." Among the dramatic works were Der Geschlagene (1920), Die Schauspieler (1921), Die Fahrt nach Orplid (1922), and Maruf, der tolle Lügner (1924). The main narrative works were the story Die Flucht zu den Hülflösen (1922), a collection of fairy tales Der Garten der Erde (1922), a novel Der Verzauberte (1924), a collection of short stories Geschichten von den unberührten Frauen (1925), and the novel Mein Freund Dei; Denkmal eines jungen Lastträgers (1927). In the two main works of the 30's Schmidt-bonn deals with the memories of his home town and his own life. The scene of the novel Der dreieckige Marktplatz (1935) is Bonn towards the end of the 19th century; An einem Strom geboren; ein Lebensbuch (1935) relates in more than 100 sketches "the fairy tale of my life." The more fantastic side of Schmidt-bonn's narrative talents appears again in the novel Hü Lü (1936).

See: Chor um Schmidtbonn (1926); A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Neue Folge: Im Banne des Expressionismus, 4. Auflage (1927), pp. 111-118; M. Tau, ed., Das Wilhelm Schmidtbonn Buch (1927); H. Pongs, "Rheinische Stammesseele in der Dichtung der Gegenwart," Dichtung und Volkstum, XXXIX (1938), 105-106.

W. R. G.

Schnitzler, Arthur (1862-1931, Austrian dramatist and novelist), was born in Vienna and began his career as a physician, a profession in which his father and his brother made records of excellence. He edited the Internationale klinische Rundschau from 1887 to 1894 and contributed scientific articles on hypnotism, neurasthenia, telepathy, and psychotherapy. His earliest nonscholarly publications appeared at the close of the 1880's in Viennese periodicals under the pseudonym Anatol, a name that he soon selected for the hero of his first playlets. These playlets appeared in book form in 1892. They were followed by the full-length play Das Märchen (1894) and by the more successful drama Liebelei (1895; Eng. tr., The Reckoning, 1907). Thereafter he devoted himself almost entirely to a literary career, producing plays, novels, and short stories in rapid succession.

At the turn of the century Schnitzler, together with Hermann Bahr, Richard Beer-Hofmann, and Hugo von Hofmannsthal (qq.v.), formed the center of a literary movement known as Jungwien, a movement that stood in violent opposition to the naturalism of Berlin (see German naturalism) as well as to the pseudo-classicism of Grillparzer and his Viennese epigones. Jungwien dominated Austrian letters until the First World War.

Schnitzler's medical background is reflected in his literary works. His wisest comments are generally put in the mouths of physicians, his raisonneurs. Illness is a favorite theme with him, and the consciousness of death constantly haunts his characters. Indeed, the call of life sounds so alluring to them because they envisage so vividly their inevitable end. They never forge ambitious plans that require decades to mature, but rather seek to experience the fast fleeting moments so intensely that nothing is left for future hours. They never submit to present aches and anxieties for the sake of remote joys that may not materialize. They do not strive for fame, wealth, or power. They eschew grandiloquence. They float on in a continuous intoxication of tenderness and mild passion, adding a little aroma, charm, and friendliness to the bleakest atmosphere.

Schnitzler avoids dogmatic generalizations. Sin, vice, guilt, are for him obsolete expressions. He holds that there are no panaceas for life's ills. Every human being is unique. Hence every relationship between human beings is a unique relationship. It must be studied thoroughly and diagnosed accurately in all its complexities before a specific remedy can be prescribed. The medicine that cures in one case may act as a poison that kills in another. Schnitzler's answers to problems are offered by him merely as possibilities and not as final solutions. Indeed, he often succumbs to the temptation of satirizing good-naturedly in one work the very opinions that his hero or heroine fervently defends in another work. The one theme running through all his plays and novels is that some people are alive while countless others are reposing under the sod. He therefore begs those who live to cease moaning and to avoid darkening with cares their all too few days on earth.

Schnitzler caught in his gentle hand the last golden glow of Vienna's setting glory and converted it to art. In the best of his plays (Der einsame Weg, 1903, Eng. tr., The Lonely Way, 1915; Der junge Medardus, 1910; Das weite Land, 1911, Eng. tr., The Vast Domain, 1923; Professor Bernhardt, 1912, Eng. tr., 1913; Der Gang zum Weiher, 1927), in his autobiographic novel Der Weg ins Freie (1908; Eng. tr., The Road to the Open, 1923), and in numerous short stories, the peculiar culture and atmosphere of this former capital of the Danubian dual monarchy continue to live on, even as in the songs of Franz Schubert and in waltzes of Johann Strauss.

See: J. Körner, Arthur Schnitzlers Gestalten und Probleme (1921); R. Specht, Arthur Schnitzler (1922); S. Liptzin, Arthur Schnitzler (1932, in English).

S. L.

Scholz, Wilhelm von (1874–, German dramatist, novelist, lyric poet, and essayist), is a distinguished writer of versatile talent. As a descendant of the older, conservative bureaucracy (his father was secretary of finance, in Bismarck's cabinet), Scholz has striven to maintain for the literary arts a place apart from the turmoil of everyday life, yet accessible enough to exert a formative, cultivating influence upon the sensitive and educated reader. Born and reared in the traditions of the 19th century, he has kept aloof from the changing tendencies of the present, alternating his residence between Berlin and Lake Constance. From 1910 to 1923 he was dramatic director of the stage at Stuttgart. Since then he has remained an independent writer, except for serving as president of the Deutsche Dichterkademie at Berlin for several years.

After symbolistic beginnings in such dramas as Der Besiegte (1899) and Der Gast (1900), Scholz has consistently interpreted the world of poetry as a net of irrational, magic relations superimposed upon the world of reality. Consequently most of his works deal with dreams, hallucinations, and related demonological topics, achieving at times a singular transparency, especially in the treatment of historical situations of the Middle Ages. Among his dramas, Der Jude von Konstanz (1905), Vertauschte Seelen (1910), Gefährliche Liebe (1913), Der Wettlauf mit dem Schatten (1922), and Die gläserne Frau (1924) have met with widespread success. His adaptations from Calderón, as well as his revival of the miracle and the marionette play, have been well received. Esoteric impressions are also conveyed in the novels to which the author turned rather late in life. Among these Perpetua (1926) and Der Weg nach Ilok (1930) express the tragic struggle between the natural and the supernatural in man. His short stories, the genre in which Scholz is a master, appeared in two collections, Erzählungen (1924) and Die Gefährten (1937).

Aside from a few collections of lyrics (Der Spiegel, 1908, and Neue Gedichte, 1913) and from several autobiographical works (especially Wanderungen, 1934, and Jahrhundertwende, 1936), which abound in remarkable nature descriptions, Scholz's significance rests upon his theoretical writings (Gedanken zum Drama, 1905, 2d revised ed., 1915; Der Zufall, eine Vorform des Schicksals, 1924; Droste-Hülshoff, 1904; Hebbel, 1905) and upon his many editions of German classics (Deutsches Balladenbuch, 1905; Deutsche Dramaturgie, 1907–1912; Deutsche Mystiker, 1908; Mörike, 1922; Novalis, 1922; Hebbel, 1923; Eichendorff, 1924; Das Bodenseebuch, 1925; Das Buch des Lachens, 1938). He is coeditor of Die grossen Deutschen (1935–1937), five volumes of German biographies. As a creative stylist he is a champion of the well-chosen and meticulously presented written word, phrase, or situation.

See: F. Droop, Wilhelm von Scholz und seine besten Bühnenwerke (1922); H. M. Elster, "Wilhelm von Scholz; sein Leben und Schaffen," in Preussische Jahrbücher, CCXXVIII (1932), 60–78; O. Loerke, "Wilhelm von Scholz," Die neue Rundschau, Jahrgang XLVI (1935), Bd. I, pp. 206–214.

H. R.

Schröder, Rudolf Alexander (1878–, German poet and essayist), was born in Bremen, of a patrician family in that republican Hansa town. With his cousin, Alfred Walter Heymel, he founded in 1898 the review Die Insel (1898–1902) and the Insel-Verlag, one of the distinguished publishing houses of Germany; in 1912, with Hugo von Hofmannsthal and Rudolf Borchardt (qq.v.), he helped to establish the Bremer Presse, which set a high standard for presswork and literary quality. In both undertakings his purpose was to build up a national tradition and at the same time to encourage the revival of arts and crafts, a movement in which he played an important role. He took part in the First World War, in the navy and then in the Brussels administration. As a Protestant and a conservative, Schröder kept aloof from neopagan and totalitarian tendencies. About 1934 he left his home city, and now lives near the Chiemsee, in Bavaria.

Highly gifted in many ways—as an architect and decorator, a painter, a writer of witty and elegant verse (Hama, 1908)—he concentrated more and more upon poetry. To him German literature owes translations of The Rape of the Lock (1908); the Odyssey (1910), the best version since that of Voss, and the Iliad (1943); Horace (1935); Vergil's Georgics (1924), Eclogues (1926), and a canto of the Aeneid (in Corona, 1931) and Racine (also in Corona, 1932), the first adequate versions of both poets; many Flemish and Dutch lyrics (e.g., Guido Gezelle, q.v., 1917, and Geerten Gossaert, 1929); and three plays of Shakespeare. Among his prose translations is Ciceros Cato der Ältere über das Greisenalter (1924). He is one of the few German poets who have taken up the great Latin and French tradition (see his essay on Racine).

His prose is stately and leisurely, reflective and meandering (Der Wanderer und die Heimat, 1931; Aus Kindheit und Jugend, 1934). Some of his most revealing pages deal with the secrets of poetry and of religious faith (Zur Naturgeschichte des Glaubens, Kunst und Religion, 1936; Die Aufsätze und Reden, 2 vols., 1939). But, first and last, Schröder is a lyric poet, one of the most eminent of his time, more lofty and pure, perhaps, than passionate, faithful to tradition; his style and tone are definitely his own, strangely uninfluenced by his contemporaries, and he—unlike some of them—never overstrains his art. His greatest achievements (the philosophical sonnets "Die Zwillingsbrüder," the elegy "In memoriam," some of his odes and religious poems) he wrung from his profound pessimism. He clings to what may last, country, friendship, poetry, faith. With the years his religious heritage asserted itself strongly; he studied the history of Protestant verse (Dichtung und Dichter der Kirche, 1936; Die Kirche und ihr Lied, 1937; Luther und sein Lied, 1942) and revived the art of hymn writing.

For a time his poems were scarcely noticed and out of print. A new edition of his earlier work has been contemplated (Unmut, 1899; Lieder an eine Geliebte, Empedokles, Sprüche in Reimen, all 1900; An Belinde, 1902; Sonette zum Andenken an eine Verstorbene, 1904; Lieder und Elegien, 1911). To the collection of his mature poetry, Die weltlichen Gedichte (1940), and his religious poems, Mitte des Lebens (1930), have been added Ein Weihnachtslied (1935), Ein Lobgesang (1937), Osterspiel (1938), and Kreuzgespräch (1939).

See: J. Hofmiller, Zeitgenossen (1910), pp. 289–313; J. Nadler, Literaturgeschichte der deutschen Stämme und Landschaften, Bd. 4 (1928), pp. 770–772; H. von Hofmannsthal, Die Berührung der Sphären (1931), pp. 143–159, 349–351; Werke und Tage: Festschrift für R. A. Schröder zum 60. Geburtstag (1938).

H. St.

Schuré, Edouard (1841–1929, French dramatist and critic), was born in Strasbourg, where he received his education, finally taking a degree in law at the university. Instead of settling down to an advocate's practice, however, he traveled in Germany (1864–1865) and Italy (1871–1873), producing meanwhile his first two books, Histoire du lied (1868) and L'Alsace et les prétentions prussiennes (1871). After his return from Italy he settled in Paris. There he wrote for the Revue des deux mondes and the Nouvelle Revue and soon became well known for his essays on the history of religions and on the drama.

Like certain other Frenchmen of his generation, Schuré revolted against the materialism of science, the skepticism of Renan (q.v.), the determinism of Taine (q.v.), the naturalism of contemporary literature. In his opinion the traditional church offered no refuge for such spirits as himself, since, though it had not lost its faith in the divine, it had limited this too much. Schuré at length found his own solution in a poetic nationalism (a recherche de l'âme celtique) and in a theosophy which received its final direction from Rudolph Steiner. In art, impressionism and symbolism seemed to him to be respectively a mere rendering of sensation without any shaping concept and a game of analogies with no real metaphysical profundity. He turned, therefore, for inspiration to the Greek tragedies, the poems of Shelley, the operas of Wagner. In Les Grands Initiés (1889; Eng. tr., The Great Initiates, 2 vols., 1922) and Précurseurs et révoltés (1904) he wrote of the great inspired figures of the past, poets and prophets. One of the first French Wagnerites, he fought tirelessly to win a hearing for the German master, in whose work he saw a sense of art as a spiritual force and a recognition of the deep spiritual fountains of the German people. Not content with explaining Wagner's purpose (Richard Wagner; son œuvre et son idée, 1875), he attempted himself to perform a similar task. In Les Grandes Légendes de France (1891) he presented as an inspiration to his contemporaries those bits of French legend which he felt had the supreme value of representing un élément essentiel de son âme collective. At the same time, in a series of mystical plays, Le Théâtre de l'âme (3 vols., 1900–1905), he attempted to create a spiritual drama which, like Wagner's at Bayreuth, would approach the status of a religious ceremony. Schuré's criticism may still be read with interest and pleasure, but his plays, though not without occasional happy touches which recall Maeterlinck (q.v.), are for the most part so studded with the clichés of the romantic drama as to seem ridiculous to the modern reader.

See: Alphonse Roux and Robert Veyssié, Edouard Schuré (1913).

C. W., Jr.

Schwob, Marcel (1867–1905, French scholar, essayist, poet, and novelist), born at Chaville in the Ile-de-France, came of a very cultivated family of rabbis and physicians. His childhood was spent in Nantes. He was given a careful education, was very precocious, and won many prizes; in 1882 he entered the Collège Sainte-Barbe in Paris. He was early familiar with German and English as well as with the classical languages. He became particularly fond of Apuleius, Petronius, and Anacreon; he had a juvenile enthusiasm for Poe and admired Hugo greatly. From Sainte-Barbe he went to the Lycée Louis-le-Grand, where he made friends with Gsell, Léon Daudet (q.v.), and Claudel (q.v.) and began to dream of great literary achievements—a monumental Faust or a Prometheus. In 1885, so as to be done with his military duties, he enlisted and served his one year. He became interested in argot and tried to reconstitute the speech of the companions of Villon, a subject which remained near to his heart all his life (Etude de l'argot français, 1889; Le jargon des Coquillards en 1451, 1890). He began to write poetry (Mimes; poèmes en prose, published in 1894), prepared for the Ecole Normale Supérieure, soon became interested in Sanskrit, and pursued his humanistic training in that direction.

Schwob started his journalistic career in the Evénement, at the same time sending to the Echo de Paris stories which were later included in his collections Le Beau double (1892) and Le Roi au masque d'or (1893). He was one of the early contributors to the Mercure de France, the newly founded organ of the symbolists. Jarry (q.v.) dedicated to him his Ubu Roi. This multifarious intellectual activity and productivity resulted in a sort of mental anarchy which is reflected in Schwob's most striking but very perplexing Le Livre de Monelle (1894; Eng. tr., The Book of Monelle, 1929).

Then came the catastrophe. Schwob's health gave way; a serious operation left him an invalid. From that time he was what his biographer calls "the Schwob of legends." His zestful life was only a memory. Like Proust he was a frail human wreck, but with remarkable flashes of genius. He could still put in long hours of study in libraries and in the archives of Paris. He translated Moll Flanders (1895), and from old manuscripts and hagiographies he extracted a little masterpiece, La Croisade des enfants (1896; Eng. tr. The Children's Crusade, 1898), and a series called Vies imaginaires (1896), in which he re-creates the lives of interesting men, suggesting that the so-called documented lives of the conventional biographers can only be travesties. In 1896 was published another volume of miscellaneous articles, called Spicilege, which is considered, with Le Livre de Monelle, particularly representative of his incoherent, mystifying, and suggestive mentality. In spite of his precarious health, Schwob continued to see friends and correspond with them—Meredith, Stevenson, Gourmont (q.v.), Valéry (q.v.), Mirbeau (q.v.), and others. For reasons of health he went to Samoa, where he spent several months (1901–1902). With Paul Morand (q.v.) he adapted Hamlet for Sarah Bernhardt, for whom he also adapted F. M. Crawford's Francesca da Rimini. After a trip to Italy, Spain, and Portugal, he tried once more to complete his work on Villon and opened a course on the Grand Testament at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes Sociales, but after a few weeks of illness death overtook him. He also left, unfinished, the Parnasse satyrique du XV^{me} siècle, published posthumously in 1905.

Schwob realized that his writings were often cryptic and frequently felt called upon to write prefaces to his books. Even Le Livre de Monelle must remain open to almost any interpretation; Pierre Champion calls it a gospel of pity and a manual of nihilism. Schwob had met in 1891 a little prostitute, Louise, who was to die two years later, wasted away by tuberculosis and other diseases; he had taken the greatest care of her and claimed to have remained inconsolable over the loss of that creature whose utter stupidity was an everlasting delight to him and at the same time an incentive to his pity. The echoes of Dickens, Tolstoy, Dostoevski, De Quincey, are obvious. But Schwob's pity led him to utter denial; let man do away with everything: "Destroy, destroy, destroy." There was a constant tug of war between the omniscient Schwob, held by his own accumulated documentation, and the genius who tried to escape the thralldom of mere scholarship. Schwob's case may be compared with that of Baudelaire who, unable to satisfy his ardent idealism, fed his soul on the horror which life inspired in him, on the unfathomable imbecility of mankind, on disgusting sensuality, on the beauty of ugliness.

In 1895, just over a year after Louise's death and eight months before his illness began, Schwob met his second great love in Marguerite Moreno, a distinguished actress of the Comédie Française. They were married in London in 1900; Schwob's letters and travel diaries addressed to her evince his devotion.

Notable among Schwob's last publications was a savage satire on journalism, Mœurs des diurnales (1903). Written under the pseudonym Loyson-Bridet, this work is largely inspired by Rabelais; its wit, however, proved too subtle and learned for the general public.

Schwob's complete writings have been edited by Pierre Champion (Œuvres complètes, 10 vols., 1927-1930).

See: Pierre Champion, Marcel Schwob et son temps (1927).

A. Sz.

Scott, Gabriel (1874-, Norwegian novelist), was born in Leith, Scotland, the son of a Norwegian seamen's pastor. When he was seven years old, the family removed to that part of southern Norway which became the background of his works, a region where nature and people are softer and gentler than in the mountainous interior. Scott wrote a number of rather pale stories, poems, and fairy tales before the First World War seemed to release his latent powers. Two novels under the general title En saga om fædrelandssind (A Saga of Patriotism), Jernbyrden; historien om Jan Vibe (1915; Ordeal by Fire; the Story of Jan Vibe), and Enok Rubens levnedsløb (1917; The Life Story of Enok Ruben), describe the hard times which Norwegians had passed through in the decades following 1770. They were grim tales. The idyllic note which characterizes much of Gabriel Scott's production was struck in Kilden eller Brevet om fisken Markus (1918; The Fountain, or the Letter about the Fisherman Marcus), the story of a poor fisherman who finds the wellspring of contentment in his own soul. The mystic-religious element is present also in Stien eller Kristofer med kvisten (1925; The Path, or Christopher with the Twig), the story of a crippled herdsboy. Det gyldne Evangelium (1921; Eng. tr., The Golden Gospel, a Legend, 1928) is a fairy tale in book form relating humorously how Our Lord and St. Peter visited the earth and what they saw there. Gabriel Scott has written also novels and short stories about folk life including sympathetic tales of the vagrant gypsies. His memoirs, in the form of a novel En drøm om en drøm (The Dream of a Dream), appeared in 1940, and a selection of lyric verse Årringer (Annual Rings, as of a tree) in 1945.

H. A. L.

Seedorff Pedersen, Hans Hartvig (1892-, Danish poet, traveler, and journalist), born in Aarhus, Jutland, is a natural lyricist, but one with a fine cultural background. He is par excellence a devotee of joy and beauty, particularly in his early poems, as in the collection Hyben (1917; Rose-hips). He appears at times as "Sorgenfri" (Carefree), a bacchant in the "Inn of Gladness," one who hopes for resurrection in the shape of grain, aquavit. Paralleling his conviviality a strong Dionysian strain runs through a few of his other most original poems, showing the mystical, irresistible, well-nigh sleep-walking effect of sex urge (as in "Pigens Møde med Pan"; The Maid's Meeting with Pan). The poet's popular sailor songs, on the other hand (as "Styrmand Anderssons Hjemkomst"; Mate Andersson's Homecoming), roll and rollick. His ballads are rich in baroque humor. In some of the early poems Death appears as the dark foil that accents exulting life. Gradually, however, in later collections Death changes character, becomes Friend, until the poet's belief in immortality shines through. Joy in life—this life—remains.

Seedorff Pedersen's travels (a trip around the world besides various other long expeditions) have borne fruit both in his sometimes langorously sensuous, sometimes socially realistic poems and in his prose travel books (e.g., To Tredje, Eldorado, 1929; Two Third-Class, Eldorado). As constant flow and ebb in the poet's life, the outward longing to see and grasp the great rich world is followed by the homeward surge of feeling, the longing and love for Denmark, expressing itself in exquisite poems on Danish nature. Seedorff Pedersen has also written the stirring poem, now a rallying song, "Der rider en Konge" (1943; A King Is Riding), in homage to Christian X on his 73d birthday. And he has worked tirelessly for closer inter-Scandinavian ties.

See: Christian Rimestad, Fra Stuckenbergt til Seedorff, II (1923); Helge Kjaergaard, Die dänische Literatur der neuesten Zeit (1871-1933) (1934).

C. K. B.

Seghers, Anna (pseud. of Netty Radvanyi, 1900-, German novelist), was born in Mainz and educated at Cologne and Heidelberg. In 1925 she married a Hungarian sociologist; with him and their two children she fled to Paris in 1933 and eventually to the anti-fascist colony in Mexico City.

Almost without exception, her novels urge social reforms. She early wrote, in direct and reticent prose, a powerful portrayal of the hopelessness of a village oppressed by monopoly, Aufstand der Fischer von St. Barbara (1928; Eng. tr., The Revolt of the Fishermen, 1929). There followed less impressive pleas for the German peasantry (Der Kopflohn, 1933) and for the German miners (Die Rettung, 1934) and then a sympathetic account of the 1934 Socialist uprising in Austria (Der Weg durch den Februar, 1935). The insistent anti-fascist message of Anna Seghers is heard again in the novel concerning the refugee problem in Europe, Die Gefährten (1932), but above all, and the more emphatically because of her husband's having been in a concentration camp, in a stirring tale written in the flashback manner of the movie scenario and dealing with the German underground, Das siebte Kreuz (1942; Eng. tr., The Seventh Cross, 1942).

V. L.

Seidel, Ina (1885-, German poet and novelist), was born in Halle an der Saale. She has been steeped in literature throughout all her life. The prolific and successful historical novelist, Georg Ebers (1837-1898), was her mother's stepfather; and her husband, Heinrich Wolfgang Seidel (1876-), who is also something of a writer (Erinnerungen, 1912; Abend und Morgen, 1934; Das Seefräulein, 1937), is the son of Heinrich Seidel (1842-1906), the once popular author of the delightfully sentimental story, Leberecht Hühnchen (1881). She married in 1907, hovered for months between death and life after the birth of her first child, and in this period of solitude and spiritual growth her soul turned to self-expression in poetry. Her first beginnings were in the lyric (Gedichte, 1914; Neben der Trommel her, 1915; Weltinnigkeit, 1918). Before the First World War began, however, she had already conceived the nuclear theme of her final masterpiece, and in 1917 she issued her first work of fiction, Das Haus zum Monde. Five years later she had already gained enough strength and substance to compose a powerful and significant novel, Das Labyrinth (1921; Eng. tr., The Labyrinth, 1932), the life story of a strange and enigmatic figure, George Forster, whose career she traced more on the psychic than on the material plane.

But Ina Seidel was not yet fully equipped for the theme which she had first set herself, and definite and ultimate expression came only in 1930, in Das Wunschkind (Eng. tr., The Wish Child, 1935). This story of a widowed mother, who has literally wrested her child from the reluctant clasp of fate, only to lose him to a more inexorable destiny in the Prussian Wars of Liberation, is one of the great books of its generation, perhaps one of the outstanding documents of our time—a story which only a woman could have written, but one which some woman had to write. It places the author on a level with the greatest women writers of Germany.

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Dritte Folge: Dichter aus deutschem Volkstum (1934), pp. 149-165.

B. Q. M.

Seifullina, Lidiya Nikolayevna (1889-, Russian novelist), was born at Varlamovo in Orenburg province. She was the daughter of a converted Tartar and a Russian peasant woman and received her education in the high school of Omsk. After teaching school for some years, she went briefly on the stage (1907-1909) and subsequently took up literary work. During the early part of the Revolution (1917-1918) she belonged to the Social Revolutionary Party and long maintained comparative independence. Her literary career began only in 1922 with the novel Pravonarushiteli (Criminals) followed by Peregrnoi (1923; Manure), comprising four stories, and the short novel Virineya (1925). Seifullina generally gives a psychologically accurate and objective estimate of her characters, who all belong to the revolutionary period. She makes no effort to embellish her pictures and writes in a direct, lively, and simple style. As in the case of her heroine Virineya, she frequently (and perhaps unconsciously) portrays the emptiness of a soul deprived of faith and moral standards, and not even her loyalty to the prevailing ideology can hide this situation from her. The story Tanya (1934) portrays the confused notions of a Communist child.

See: G. Reavey and M. Slonim, Soviet Literature; an Anthology (1934), pp. 129-140; G. Struve, 25 Years of Soviet Russian Literature (1944), pp. 61-63.

S. H. C.

Seillière, Ernest (1866-, French critic and humanist), was born in Paris. He was a brilliant student and in 1886 entered the Ecole Polytechnique. Following his graduation he studied philosophy and history for two years at the University of Heidelberg and perfected his knowledge of German. He made his literary début with a study on Homer, Une Excursion à Ithaque (1892). The following year he gave a translation of a famous Swedish poem, Nadeschda. Four years later his Etudes sur Ferdinand Lassalle, fondateur du parti socialiste allemand (1897) was published, followed by a collection of essays, Littérature et morale dans le parti socialiste allemand (1898). He was a very prolific writer, especially well known as an enemy of romanticism. His studies closely parallel the antiromanticist campaign conducted by the much more profound and acute critics, Charles Maurras (q.v.) and Pierre Lasserre. Their conclusions are the same as his, but whereas Lasserre and Maurras identify the sources of French romanticism as foreign, Seillière traces it back to the quietist doctrines of Fénelon and Mme Guyon. His antiromanticist works include Le Mal romantique (1908), Les Mystiques du néoromantisme (1911), Les Origines romanesques de la morale et de la politique romantiques (1920), Du quietisme au socialisme romantique (1925), Sur la psychologie du romantisme français (1933). Seillière also wrote many volumes to support his theory of "mystic imperialism," such as La Philosophie de l'impérialisme (1903-1908) and Mysticisme et domination: Essais de critique impérialiste (1913). He was elected to the French Academy in 1946.

See: R. Gillouin, Une Nouvelle Philosophie de l'histoire moderne et française (1921); G. M. L. Boudeau, Ernest Seillière (1925).

P. B.

Selander, Sten (1891-, Swedish poet and critic), was born and lives in Stockholm. He made his début with Vers och visor (1916; Verses and Songs) and Gryning (1917; Dawn), followed by several volumes of poems which depict especially the modern city-dweller's restless, critical feeling about life. In general there is a manly seriousness about his work. A sound portrayal of reality and of the duties of the individual, love of home, a feeling of human brotherhood, and a longing for the "twilight of youth" are outstanding elements of his poetry. He is a visionary, rich in color and verbal music, as in his collection Tystnadens torn (1918; The Tower of Silence). Selander has translated Fitzgerald's Rubaiyat (1919). He is a leader in the new generation of poets and after publishing an anthology of their work under the title Den unga lyriken (1924; The Young Lyricists), where a list of his earlier works may be found, he brought out two volumes of Levande svensk dikt från fem sekel (1928; Living Swedish Poetry of Five Centuries). As a critic he has shown special interest in the literatures of English-speaking peoples, and has published several collections of essays, including Européer, amerikaner och annat (1930; Europeans, Americans, and Other Subjects).

See: C. W. Stork, Anthology of Swedish Lyrics (revised and enlarged ed., 1930); "Selander," in Nordisk familjebok (1932).

C. W. S.

Selvinski, Ilya (1899-, Russian poet and playwright), born at Simferopol, became known primarily as the protagonist of constructivism in poetry during the 1920's and early 1930's. Constructivism was an offspring of futurism, with emphasis on the note of modern industry and its technique designed for greater speed, economy, and capacity. The constructivists demanded the "loadification" (gruzo-fikatsia) of the poetic style, "the increased load of functions per unit of material," and the "loadification" of the word—the power unit—with meaning. They also urged "localization," or local semantics: the choice of specific words in their local meanings for characterization or description. The group was disbanded in 1930, but Selvinski persisted for several more years in composing verse in accordance with the principles he had helped to formulate and advocate.

Selvinski's first volume of poetry, Rekordy (1926; Records), was followed by a long narrative poem of the civil war, Ulyalyaiev-shchina (1927; The Ulyalyaiev Band), another long poem about the Fur Trade Company (Pushtor, 1929), and several plays in verse, such as Komandarm 2 (1929; Army Commander 2), Pao-Pao (1933), and Rytsar Yoann (1939; Johann the Knight). Selvinski has kept some of the formalistic features of futurism, the unusual and striking vocabulary and rhymes, the novel and varied rhythm, and the deliberate obscurity ("estrangement," ostraneniye). But he had outgrown the iconoclastic bombast of futurism in the early 1920's and now reflected the postrevolutionary tendencies of constructive organization. Though much concerned about form, he packs or "loads" his form with social content. Selvinski displays an extraordinary avidity for visual and auditory sensations, and he employs his constructivist precision with rare skill, so as to make the reader feel, see, and hear his objects, scenes, and emotions. In the Rytsar Yoann, scenes from the Bolotnikov rebellion in the 17th century, Selvinski discards his mannerisms and employs regular iambs in the Pushkin tradition.

A. K.

Sender, Ramón José (1902–, Spanish novelist, critic, and playwright), was born at Alcolea de Cinca in Aragon. The son of country gentry, at 18 he broke with his family, going to Madrid, where he secured employment and attended the university until recalled by his parents. In 1922–1923 he fulfilled his military service, taking part in the ill-fated Moroccan campaign. Returning to civilian life, he resumed the journalistic career begun a few years earlier and in 1924 was appointed to the editorial staff of the Sol of Madrid. An advocate of political and social reform, he took an active part in the antimonarchical movement that led to the establishment of the republic (1931). Meanwhile his career as a novelist was initiated with Imán (1930; Eng. tr., Earmarked for Hell, 1934, American title, Pro Patria, 1935), a brilliant first novel. In 1933 he visited Paris, Berlin, and Moscow. When the civil war started in 1936, he enlisted in the Loyalist army, serving as an officer for two years. His wife, who had been captured in rebel territory, was put to death as a republican sympathizer. On the fall of the republic he escaped to France, where he was interned before finding refuge in Mexico. Since 1942 he has lived in the United States.

Sender's work, besides numerous novels, comprises plays (e.g., El secreto, 1935, Eng. tr., "The Secret," One Act Play Magazine, Vol. I, 1937, pp. 612–626; "La llave," unpublished in Spanish, Eng. tr., "The Key," Kenyon Review, Vol. V, 1943, pp. 201–218; Hernán Cortés, 1940), short stories (Mexicayotl, 1940), and essays and criticism, mostly "leftist" in approach (e.g., "El novelista y las masas," Leviatán, Madrid, May, 1936, pp. 31–41; for his present attitude, not necessarily at variance with his earlier outlook, see his important article, "On a Really Austere Aesthetic," Books Abroad, Vol. XVI, 1942, pp. 119–123). Sender's outstanding contribution, however, has been as a novelist. Imán—based on firsthand knowledge—is an unforgettable picture of the horror and sufferings of war. His preoccupation with social problems, already apparent in Imán, comes to the fore in O.P. (Orden público) (1931), which was inspired by his own experience as a political prisoner in 1927. El Verbo se hizo sexo (Teresa de Jesús) (1931), a novelized biography of St. Teresa, represents a deviation in his work at this point, yet it is characteristic in its emphasis on human values. His overwhelming interest in the problems of today brought him back to the contemporary scene in his next three novels. Siete domingos rojos (1932; Eng. tr., Seven Red Sundays, 1936) deals with an abortive workers' revolution in Madrid that supposedly took place after the advent of the republic. Viaje a la aldea del crimen (1933) was written in protest against a real event, the brutal repression by state police of a peasant uprising in the Andalusian village of Casas Viejas, a repression so shocking to public opinion that the Azaña cabinet was forced to resign. Moved by the evils and corruption that persisted in the social structure, Sender next wrote one of the most estimable Spanish works of recent years, La noche de las cien cabezas—novela del tiempo en delirio (1934), a bitter fantasy which passes in review many of the weak and despicable types met with in modern society; the novel inevitably recalls the magnificent phantasmagoric visions of Quevedo and of Goya. In Mister Witt en el Cantón (1935; Eng. tr., Mr. Witt among the Rebels, 1937) Sender again turns to the past, depicting this time the gallant but short-lived effort to set up a popular, federalist regime at Cartagena in 1873. From his experiences in the recent civil war came Contraataque (1938; Eng. tr., The War in Spain, American title, Counter-Attack in Spain, both 1937), a straightforward, moving account of the heroic defense of Madrid. Proverbio de la muerte (1939), written under the impact of personal tragedy and of the triumph of fascism in Spain, is Sender's most serious and most ambitious work to date. Overburdened with "scientific" explanations and psychological subtleties, it nevertheless commands respect for its attempt to arrive at a personal, vitalistic philosophy. It marks, too, an important change in the writer's development, in that his concern with the individual, present in his work from the beginning, becomes now the focal point of his writing. This is brought out clearly in the novels that follow. In El lugar del hombre (1939; Eng. tr., A Man's Place, 1940), though the novelist still sees "man's inhumanity to man" and points it up, moreover, by placing it in a peaceful rural environment, he is preoccupied with the individual's need to find a place of dignity and value in society. Epitalamio del prieto Trinidad (1942; Eng. tr., Dark Wedding, 1943) shows the individual faced with the cruelty and barbarism of life itself. To the average reader, however, the author's presentation of a Mexican penal colony as a symbol of the world must seem forced, and the book carries, therefore, less conviction than Sender's other works. More recently, Sender has begun to view in retrospect his own life. In Crónica del alba (1942; Eng. tr., Chronicle of Dawn, 1944) he goes back to his childhood days in Aragon, portraying with tenderness, grace, and humor the unfolding of a boy's character and mind. The novel has been announced as the first of a series that will provide a chronicle of the Spain of our time.

Sender's novelistic work, though still unfinished, assures for him an important place in modern Spanish literature. His writing is at once realistic and imaginative, his characters, in whatever setting, alive and meaningful. His art draws its strength from a deep consciousness of social wrongs and from sympathy with man's long, painful, upward struggle.

See: Sir Peter Chalmers Mitchell, introductory notes to Sender, Seven Red Sundays (1936), Mr. Witt among the Rebels (1937), and The War in Spain (1937); David Lord, "This Man Sender," Books Abroad, XIV (1940), 352-354.

W. L. F.

Serafimovich, Alexander (pseud. of Alexander Serafimovich Popov, 1863-, Russian novelist and short-story writer), was born of Cossack parents, in a village of the Don Region. He attended school in a neighboring town that now bears his name. Studying later at the University of St. Petersburg, he came under the influence of Alexander Ulyanov, elder brother of Lenin and revolutionist, who was executed in 1887. The same year Serafimovich was deported to the White Sea where he wrote his first short story, "Na ldine" (1888; On an Ice Floe), followed by many others written after his return to his native Don in 1890. Based on his studies of the lives of fur hunters and fishermen of the North, of peasants, miners, railway and factory workers of Southern Russia, all these stories are devoted to the underprivileged and the exploited. The 1905 Revolution found him in Moscow. His "Sredi nochi" (1906; In the Night), "Zhivaya tyurma" (1907; The Living Prison), and other stories of this period are vibrant with sympathy for the revolutionary movement. Immune to the escapist individualism which prevailed after its defeat, he devoted his first novel, Gorod v stepi (1910; The City in the Steppe), to the workers ruthlessly exploited during the early industrial expansion in the Don Region. He was front-line correspondent during the First World War and, writing for Pravda, witnessed many of the campaigns of the civil war. One of these campaigns, fought in the Northern Caucasus, is the theme of his Zhelezny potok (1924; Eng. tr., The Iron Flood, 1935), acclaimed a great achievement of social realism. Member of the Communist Party since 1918, Serafimovich has attained the highest honors in his country.

Serafimovich's style, often colorless and impersonal in his earlier work, later tends to an exaggerated intensity of color and expression and occasionally becomes declamatory. There is, however, a brutal grandeur in some of the scenes of The Iron Flood; and though not a master of psychological introspection, Serafimovich can be vigorous and convincing when dealing with mass impulses and passions.

See: V. Veshnev, A. S. Serafimovich kak khudozhnik slova (1924); N. Fatov, A. S. Serafimovich (1927).

L. S.

Serao, Matilde (1856-1927, Italian novelist), was born in Patras, Greece, of a Greek mother of distinguished family, Paolina Bonely, and a Neapolitan father, Francesco Serao. Brought to Italy at the age of four, she studied in Naples under her mother's direction, attended normal school, obtained a post in the Telegraph Office, and had her first writings accepted by Neapolitan journals. She soon turned her vast energy to journalism and fiction and attained in both a high degree of success and much fame. In 1882 she removed to Rome where, together with Edoardo Scarfoglio, Carducci, and D'Annunzio (qq.v.), she helped to make Capitan Fracassa the sprightliest Roman paper of its day. In 1884 she married Scarfoglio, and their combined journalistic ventures in Rome and Naples enjoyed varied success for two decades. The Naples Mattino, founded and edited by them, was for many years the most substantial newspaper in southern Italy. Upon her separation from her husband in 1904, Serao also left the Mattino, and founded her own daily, the Giorno, which she edited until her death in Naples in 1927.

Matilde Serao's literary production is contained in some 50 volumes which include, besides her widely read novels and short stories of Neapolitan life, many novels in a cinematic style of loves and scandals in high life, books of travel, plays, literary essays, mystery stories, books of religious edification (a volume of prayers, another on San Gennaro, a third on the Madonna and the saints), diaries, letters, a book on etiquette. Her significant work on Neapolitan and also on Roman subjects of the 1880's, which gives her an eminent place in Italian fiction, is to be found in some 10 volumes, all but two of which appeared in the decade 1881-1891.

Fantasia (1883) is a bold psychophysiological study of feminine perversity; its heroine, the neurotic, flighty Lucia, is ever weaving fancies "on God, the Madonna, the affections, on everything." An excellent English translation, Fantasy, by the American novelist Henry Harland, with an introduction by the English critic Edmund Gosse, appeared in 1890. La Virtù di Checchina (1884) is an engaging narrative about a middle-class wife whose virtue is saved by her fright of a doorman's scrutinizing look. La Conquista di Roma (1885; Eng. trs., The Conquest of Rome, 1902, 1906), which recounts the failure of a little deputy with Roman ambitions, is notable for its masterly descriptions of the new, tumultuous Rome of the 1880's. Il Romanzo della fanciulla (1886) is a collection of stories of middle-class girls and their lives of decente miseria, their yearnings for a less restricted existence, their dreams of love. Vita e avventure di Riccardo Joanna (1887) tells the story of a turbulent, not too ethical journalism encamped in the new capital. All'erta, sentinella (1889; Eng. tr., On Guard, 1901), a collection of Neapolitan stories, includes, besides the first one which gives the title and which is a remarkable account of a convict's attachment for the prison warden's child, "Terno secco," a breath-taking tale of three lottery numbers and their effect on the lives of the people of a whole segment of Naples, and "O Giovannino o la morte," a girl's tragic idyl, beautifully told. Il Paese di cuccagna (1891; Eng. tr., The Land of Cockayne, 1901) again presents Naples and the consuming Neapolitan mania for the lottery. It contains powerful descriptions of the teeming, ragged populace, their endless toil and childbearing, their chronic want, their sunless lives, their fanatic religious fervor, their weekly renewed dream of well-being through the lottery ticket. La Ballerina (1899; Eng. tr., The Ballet Dancer, 1901) describes the pathetic, sordid life of a chorus girl neither beautiful nor gifted, and Suor Giovanna della Croce (1901; Eng. tr., "Sister Giovanna of the Cross," serially in Living Age, July-September, 1901) is the tragic tale of a cloistered nun forced back into the world through civil appropriation of her order's properties.

Ventre di Napoli (1884) is Serao's only non-fictional work of unusual merit; it is a social-economic study of the Neapolitan slums of the 80's and was instrumental in bringing about their clearance.

See: Benedetto Croce, "Note sulla letteratura italiana nella seconda metà dal secolo XIX: Matilde Serao," Critica, I (1903), 321-351; Henry James, Notes on Novelists (1914), pp. 294-313; Ugo Ojetti, As They Seemed to Me, tr. by Henry Furst (1928), pp. 208-214.
A. M. G.

Sergeyev-Tsenski, Sergei Nikolayevich (1876-, Russian novelist and short-story writer), born in a little village of the province of Tambovsk, began his career in 1904 in the transitional period between the old realists and the new realist-symbolists. Unlike his contemporaries Andreyev and Artsybashev (qq.v.), whose reputations, now faded, were once internationally celebrated, Sergeyev-Tsenski at first won only a moderate acclaim, but his work has quietly and steadily grown in vitality and concentrated excellence until today he is regarded as one of the U.S.S.R.'s most significant literary artists, while yet virtually unknown abroad. Little is known of his personal life. His first work won him serious attention, though it was criticized for an overexuberance of style. Some seven volumes of his tales appeared before 1914. The years of the war and the Revolution he spent in the Crimea pasturing cows and working on a vast trilogy, Valya (1923-1926), designed as a history of the mentality of the Russian intelligentsia during the first two decades of this century. The first volume, Preobrazhenie (1923; Eng. tr., Transfiguration, 1926), concerns a Hamlet-like architect, Aleksei Ivanovich, torn between the desire to avenge his seduced wife and the call of new life, which counsels the futility of vengeance. The Crimean background shows the author's mastery of a richly colorful and evocative landscape. Other tales followed, of increasing artistic distinction. Three of his best short stories have been translated into English: "The Man You Couldn't Kill" (John Cournos, ed., Short Stories Out of Soviet Russia, 1929, pp. 101-116, and A Treasury of Russian Life and Humor, 1943, pp. 309-318); "Womenite Farm" (Slavonic Review, XII, 8-12); "The Arákush" (Slavonic Review, XVII, 282-296). In 1939-1940 appeared the three volumes of Sevastopolskaya strada (The Sevastopol Harvest), a tribute to the heroism of the plain Russian soldier during the defense of that city in the Crimean War. Brusilovski proryv (1944; Eng. tr., Brusilov's Breakthrough, 1945) is a historical novel of the First World War.

Sergeyev-Tsenski's work as a whole exhibits an interesting evolution in methods, materials, and conception of life. The early phases show his preoccupation with the psychopathology of existence; the principal themes are death, cruelty, the tyranny of fate, the loneliness of man. A growing revitalization alters this fatalistic outlook, and his later work evinces a positive, life-affirming character, realistic, tragic, and humane. Its tensions and conflicts, it is worth noting, are consistently on an individual and nonpolitical plane.

See: D. S. Mirsky, Contemporary Russian Literature (1926), pp. 141-144; V. Pozner, Panorama de la littérature russe contemporaine (1929), pp. 203-206.

N. S.

Sérgio de Sousa, António (1883-, Portuguese essayist and historian), primarily a rational philosopher and social reformer, has also done writing in many other fields. He was born in Daman (Damão), Portuguese India. When his father, the governor, was recalled, nine-year-old Sérgio went to Portugal with his family. A descendant of aristocrats, colonials, and admirals, he followed the career of a naval officer, abandoning it in 1910 for politics and belles-lettres. Convinced of the urgency of reforms in Portugal, he tried to impress the young élite with his ideas on culture, education, and political economy; he adhered to the group called Renascença Portuguesa (Portuguese Renaissance) and its review A águia (The Eagle) in Oporto, founded the review Pela grei (For the People's Sake) in 1917 with the economist Ezequiel de Campos, and later, on his return from publishing work in Brazil (1919-1920), participated in the organization of Seara Nova (New Crop), a cooperativist group of educators, economists, and writers, in whom he saw an intellectual élite capable of guiding the republic. Married early to a publisher's daughter, herself an educator, he became editor of her father's Os serões (The Soirées) and then of Lusitânia, an exemplary review of Portuguese studies. Named librarian at the National Library in Lisbon, he was active founding writers' organizations and promoting the União Cívica (Civic Union), a vast political association. In 1923 he entered the government as secretary of education but soon resigned, unable to carry out any reforms. Because of his leading part in the 1927 revolt against the dictator Carmona, he had to flee to Paris. Later he returned to Lisbon and was temporarily imprisoned on publishing a volume of history in 1941, but he continued to write with the courage of his convictions, a staunch defender of freedom of thought.

He became first known through his Notas sobre Antero de Quental (1909; Notes on Antero de Quental). Besides translations of rationalists such as Spinoza, Leibnitz, Descartes, and Bertrand Russell and countless articles on national problems, he resurrected numerous works of 17th and 18th-century reformers of Portugal, in order to "reform Portuguese mentality." The Ensaaios (5 vols., 1920-1936; Essays) contain most of his didactic studies, including some on literature (e.g., on Oliveira Martins, q.v.). He turned political historian in O Desejado (1924; The Longed-for King), attacking with documents the romantically vague and indolent Messianism of the nationalists, abhorrent to him, the disciplined, critical thinker. From then on he eagerly engaged in many personal polemics. He also rewrote Portuguese history from an economic standpoint, starting with the dynamic thesis of a struggle of "the policy of transportation" against "the policy of fixation," i.e., of the maritime city merchants against the landowners in the provinces. He outlined his findings in Bosquejo da história de Portugal (1923; Eng. tr., A Sketch of the History of Portugal, 1928) and then expanded them to História de Portugal (only in Spanish tr. by J. Moneva y Pujol, 1929, "Colección Labor," VI, No. 206). He has more recently been working on a larger Portuguese edition, the first volume of which was published in 1941.

Sérgio has rightly been called a "universal man," being a poet—his first book was Rimas (1908; Rhymes)—a mathematician, philosopher, economist, historian, literary critic, journalist, educator, politician, and, above all, a humanist.

See: Juan Moneva y Pujol, "Prólogo," in Spanish translation (1929) of Sérgio, História de Portugal, pp. 7-13; Hernani Cidade, "António Sérgio," Seara Nova, August 25, 1932.

G. M. M.

Serra, Renato (1884-1915, Italian critic), was born in Cesena. He graduated from the liceo there at the age of 15 and went to study literature with Giosue Carducci (q.v.) at the University of Bologna. He graduated in 1904 with a dissertation on Petrarch's Trionfi. After some time spent in Florence, he returned to his native city in 1908 and the following year became librarian of the Biblioteca Comunale Malatestiana of Cesena, a post which he held until he was called to arms in April, 1915, as a lieutenant in the infantry. He was killed on the Podgora front in July of that year, leading his company to the attack.

Serra was an assiduous reader from early childhood, and his years of leisure as librarian in the quiet little Malatestiana gave him the time to acquire a very wide range of literary experience. To Serra it was the intimate experience of literature that mattered. For him in fact literature was a way of life. His important work is found in his essays on Pascoli and Panzini (qq.v.), an essay on the state of Italian literature in 1913 entitled Le Lettere (1914), and his Esame di coscienza di un letterato, written as he made ready to enter the war (1915). His published work is contained in two small volumes (Scritti di Renato Serra, 1938). In it one enjoys the work of a keen mind, direct and honest, sensitive, and objective. Serra's observations on his contemporaries, on contemporary Italian literature, and above all on the temper and moral fiber of the period do not lose value as time passes. It is clear, however, that his name is known and respected in Italy as much for what he held the promise of becoming as for what he was, and as much for what he seemed capable of writing as for what he wrote. The criticism which he left views its subject with a sure command of its own taste and sensibilities. Serra died at the age of 31. He was already capable of that rare achievement, an ability to enter into a question, literary or otherwise, with his whole soul and yet not to confuse issues. Serra insisted on seeing the whole question, without divisions or abstractions from it. He was persuaded, as he said, that every generation needs sometimes to make its own esame di coscienza and to draw up its own moral balance. He came near to fulfilling that need for his own generation, at least for those of it who, like himself, died young in the war.

See: L. Russo, Problemi di metodo critico (1930).

C. S. S.

Séverin, Fernand (1867–1931, Belgian poet, essayist, and critic), was born in Grand-Manil, a small village near Gembloux, in the Walloon country. His first poems appeared in the Wal-lonie, and very soon after he joined the Jeune Belgique group (see Belgian literature in French). But he never indulged in the Baudelairian and Parnassian imitations that characterized the early works of many of his colleagues and found inspiration in preromantic and early romantic poets such as André Chénier and Lamartine. He was also strongly influenced by Wordsworth and Keats.

A deep love of nature is to be felt in all of Séverin's poems, a pastoral lyricism, pervaded with a sort of pantheistic exhilaration in his early works, and later, clearly under the spell of spiritualism and faith. The poems in Le Lys (1888) were already budding into Vergilian blossoms, and these gave their full fragrance in Le Don d'enfance (1891). These short poems, written in truly classic verse forms, in simple but harmonious language, struck a chord unknown to the poets of the Jeune Belgique. Séverin, among his companions, represents an idyllic and serene poet, as surprising in their group as La Fontaine among the solemn French classic poets of his time. Un Chant dans l'ombre (1895) and La Solitude heureuse (1904) developed his innate qualities with a more visible tendency toward a classical style and the traditional meters of French poetry. His inspiration was progressively detaching itself from any link with materiality. He indulged in descriptions of imaginary landscapes which resemble the background of Watteau's pastorals. Poèmes ingénus (1909) concludes the pantheistic cycle of his poems.

Long a teacher in several Belgian high schools (athénées), Séverin became a professor of French literature at the State University of Ghent in 1907. Among the writers of the Jeune Belgique, his best friend was Charles van Lerberghe (q.v.). The two spent their vacations together in the Ardennes and also traveled in Italy. In 1924, 20 years after the death of his friend, Séverin published the letters written to him by the poet of La Chanson d'Eve. A year later appeared his own last poems, La Source au fond des bois (1925). Séverin has brought into Belgian poetry a sense of Elysian landscape which is distinctly Walloon and in striking contrast to the Promethean tumult pervading the poems of most of the French-writing poets of Flemish descent.

L. K.

Severyanin, Igor (pseud. of Igor Vasilyevich Lotarev, 1887–1942, Russian poet), born in St. Petersburg, was considered at about the time of the First World War to be the leader of the ego-futurist school of poetry. Actually there has always been more of the ego than of the futurist in his verses. From the first volume of his poems, Gromokipyashchy kubok (1913; Thunder-seething Cup), through his later collections, such as Zlatolira (1914; Golden Lyre), Ananasy v shampanskoy (1915; Pineapples in Champagne), and Victoria Regia (1915), Severyanin espoused "all powerful egoism," free from reticence and convention. "I, genius Igor Severyanin, I am film-screened omni-urbanly, I am ubi-cordially enthroned," is typical of his "I-I-I" poetry. He is on familiar terms with 'Ego-God,' and nonchalantly he proclaims: "Venus has given herself to me, and I am universally renowned." His alleged futurism is limited to his facile innovations in word combinations and in the usage of non-Russian terms expressive of Western civilization in its showy externals. His gaudy phrases and words savored of boudoirs and barrooms, and they flattered the taste of middle-class audiences before whom Severyanin recited, or rather chanted, saccharine verses in a titillating rhythm, studded with such foreign exotics as "lilac ice cream," "pineapples in champagne, I am arrayed à la Spain," "Garçon, improvise a brilliant five o'clock." After the Revolution, Severyanin lost his ephemeral popularity. He migrated to Estonia, where for a while he produced repetitious verses and then became silent.

Discriminating critics and poets have valued in Severyanin a genuine musical quality and an aptness for fresh images that may be discerned through his loud gaudiness. Were it not for the swift popularity he had gained, Severyanin might have outgrown his vulgar mannerisms. Here and there his poems reveal an authentic talent, as when he takes up Russian rustic themes. Unfortunately such poems, whose high quality roused the admiration of leading symbolists, such as Sologub and Bryusov (qq.v.), drown in the mass of garish ostentatiousness.

A. K.

Sforza, Carlo, Conte (1872–, Italian diplomat, statesman, and writer), was born in Montignoso della Lunigiana, north of Lucca. He entered the diplomatic service in 1896. After various other appointments he was attached in 1915 as Italian representative to the Serbian court, took part in the Macedonian campaign, and after the war was Italian high commissioner in Turkey until 1919. He was appointed under-secretary for foreign affairs by Nitti and then became minister of foreign affairs in the Giolitti cabinet of June, 1920, remaining in charge until July 4, 1921. During his tenure of office he negotiated the Treaty of Rapallo with Yugoslavia, thus crowning a policy of friendly understanding with the Eastern neighbors which he had undeviatingly advocated since 1917 and for which he found a valuable friend and ally in Prime Minister Pashich. Sforza's opposition to the expansionist and aggressive designs of Italian nationalism in the Near East earned him the enmity of the group that was to shape the foreign policy of the Fascist Party: he was bitterly denounced as a "renunciator" and public enemy. In 1922 he was appointed ambassador in Paris, but resigned, with a sharply worded telegram, as soon as Mussolini came into power. Thereafter he used the freedom of speech still allowed to him as a senator for documented attacks on Fascist policy, but his life became unsafe, his house was burnt down, and in 1926 he was obliged to leave Italy. He lived mainly in Paris and Brussels and after 1940 settled in the United States, where he wrote and lectured extensively. In 1943, following the Italian armistice, Allied authorities permitted him to return to Italy, where he supported a policy of national union and offered to collaborate with any anti-Fascist government on the single condition that the king be removed as a traitor to the Constitution. His policy met with hostility on the part of the British cabinet, and at last under Allied pressure he entered the Badoglio-Togliatti cabinet in March, 1944, with the full knowledge that he was sacrificing a large part of what he had stood for undeviatingly since 1922, but believing that this was required of him for the good of his country.

Sforza's work as a writer is distinguished by an extensive knowledge of the international political scene and by a wise and civilized perception of the factors which would promote European understanding rather than strife. Never a nationalist, he has tried to reach an unprejudiced appreciation of other countries' problems as well as those of his own, thus living up to a classic tradition of Italian statesmanship. His style is that of a diplomat, sometimes uneven in organization and scholarship, but brilliant and seasoned with firsthand experience.

His principal books have all been written during the period of exile. Makers of Modern Europe was published in London in 1930, and Les Frères Ennemis appeared in 1933 in Paris. The following have been published in the United States: Dip'omatic Europe since the Treaty of Versailles (1928); Europe and Euro- peans (1936); Fifty Years of Diplomacy in the Balkans (1940); The Real Italians (1942); Contemporary Italy. Its Intellectual and Moral Origins (1944).

G. de S.

Shaginyan, Marietta Sergeyevna (1888–, Russian poet and novelist), of Armenian descent, was born in Moscow. Her father, a professor of medicine, died early, leaving his family in want. At the age of 15 she began to contribute articles to periodicals, and eventually, supporting herself by journalism, she obtained a degree in philosophy. She continued her studies in Germany, where she undertook a pilgrimage to Weimar; Goethe's thought had a powerful and lasting influence on her. Shaginyan developed in her youth an intensely earnest attitude towards life, an intellectualism which she later struggled to overcome, and a passionate love for learning and for all forms of creative effort.

Shaginyan is the author of several novels, short stories, and dramas and of numerous articles devoted to current events, literary criticism, philosophy, and social problems. Together with her husband, Y. S. Khachatryan, she published studies on Armenian folklore. But it was poetry, which she later abandoned, that first brought her success; her Orientalia (1912) was rated among the best productions of the younger symbolists. Her first novel, Svoya sudba (1918; One's Own Fate), is largely of philosophical inspiration. Social motives appear in Peremena (1922; The Change); they are emphasized in later works, namely in her series Mess-Mend (1925–1926), which uses the devices of a mystery novel to present a violently grotesque picture of capitalist society collapsing in a world revolution (for the title the author took at random two words from an English-Russian dictionary). To the literature of socialist realism Shaginyan contributed a novel, Gidrotsentral (1931; The Hydroelectric Station), describing with a wealth of technical detail the building of a power plant in Armenia. The more recent Semya Ulyanovykh (1938; The Ulyanov Family) is the first part of a novel describing the life of Lenin.

Shaginyan's style is objective and precise. Intricate plots are developed in a manner which is more narrative than directly suggestive of reality. She rightly disclaims any influence of the Russian realistic novel and traces her literary parentage to Voltaire, to Pushkin, and also to Wilkie Collins, whom she greatly admires.

See: V. Kirpotin, "Shaginyan," in Bolshaya sovetskaya entsiklopediya, LXI (1934), 788–

790; Shaginyan, "Mirovozzreniye i masterstvo (Avtobiografiya)," in Sobraniye sochineni, I (1935), 30–71.

L. S.

Shestov, Leo (pseud. of Leo Isaakovich Schwartzmann, 1868–1938, Russian philosopher and critic), was the first Russian philosopher to interest Europe in his thought. Fundamental to him is the idea that God is above good and reason and that the search for this amoral and irrational God is the supreme quest in life. He is a consummate master of polemical style, one who uses logic to refute logic. An internationalist, without roots in any soil, he bears the superficial appearance of a skeptic and a nihilist, but in reality his central idea is a positive one, the shaking free of the human psyche from its ancient bonds.

Shestov was born in Kiev of a wealthy Jewish merchant family and educated in the law faculty of the University of Kiev. He came late to philosophy, by way of literature. His first book was Shakespeare i yego kritik Brandes (1898; Shakespeare and His Critic Brandes), in which he attacked Brandes (q.v.) for his positivism and nationalism. Shestov's war against idealism in any form characterized all his later works, beginning with Dobro u uchenii Tolstovo i Nietzsche (1900; Good in the Teachings of Tolstoy and Nietzsche) and followed by Dostoevski i Nietzsche (1901); these two works contain the whole force of his destructive criticism. Thereafter appeared a long series of books and articles, including many studies of individual figures in literature and philosophy, as Ibsen, Chekhov (Anton Tchekhov and Other Essays, 1916), Berdyayev (qq.v.), Buber, Plotinus, St. Augustine, Luther, St. Paul, Husserl, and Kierkegaard. Chief among these volumes are Aposeoz bezpochvennosti (1905, The Apotheosis of Groundlessness; Eng. tr., All Things Are Possible, 1920); Velikie kanuny (1910–1912; Great Vigils); Nachala i kontsy (Beginnings and Ends); Potestas Clavium (1916; The Power of the Keys), in which Shestov passes from modern individualists to the accepted religious leaders of the past, in whom he discovers the same truth as did Dostoevski and Nietzsche (qq.v.). In 1917 Shestov left Russia for Paris, where he lived until his death. His last work includes Les Révélations de la mort: Dostoevski-Tolstoi (1923); La Nuit de Gethsémani (1923), a study of Pascal; La Philosophie de la tragédie: Dostoevski et Nietzsche (1926); Sur les confins de la vie: L'Apothéose du dépaysement (1927); Pages choisies (1931); Skovannyi Parmenid: Ob istochnikakh metafizicheskikh istin (1931; The Shackled Parmenides: On the Sources of Metaphysical Truth); Dans le taureau du Phalaris (1933); Kierkegaard i eksistentsialnaya filosofiya: Vox Clamantis in Deserto (1936; Kierkegaard and Existential Philosophy); Athènes et Jérusalem (1938); Constantine Leontiev, a study of the Russian philosopher.

See: Boris de Schloezer, preface to Shestov, Les Révélations de la mort (1923); D. S. Mirsky, Contemporary Russian Literature (1926), pp. 172–175; N. Berdyayev, "Leo Shestov i Kierkegaard," Sovremennyya zapiski, LXII (1936), 376–382.

N. S.

Shklovski, Victor Borisovich (1893–, Russian critic and novelist), a prominent exponent of formalism, undertook a series of studies in literature soon after graduation from the University of St. Petersburg. His work was interrupted in 1917 when he was sent to the front as commissar of the Provisional Government. Returning to Petrograd after many wanderings and adventures, he resumed his literary work, but in 1922, implicated in a political conspiracy, he left Russia for two years, which he spent mostly in Berlin. There, among other works, he published his autobiographical Sentimentalnoye puteshestviye (1923; Sentimental Journey).

Shklovski presents his critical views in a manner which is often brilliant, if at times rather paradoxical and aggressive; as originally expressed, they are based on the belief that literature is autonomous and that its students should be concerned neither with content in the traditional sense nor with social and economic conditions, but solely and specifically with the form and the structure of a work, with finding out "how it is made." Shklovski, furthermore, interprets literature primarily as a rediscovery of reality. Literature renders new and unusual, and thereby directly visible, a too familiar world, to which we respond with merely automatic recognition. The effect is achieved by breaches of familiar associations, shifts of planes or angles of perception, the use of new words and images, and various other devices which Shklovski calls "rendering strange." His views are presented in a noticeably attenuated form in later works, Tekhnika pisatel'skovo remesla (1928; The Technique of the Writer's Craft), Material i stil v romane Lva Tolstovo "Voina i mir" (1928; Material and Style in Leo Tolstoy's Novel War and Peace). These were followed by several historical and biographical narratives, one of which, Minin i Pozharski

(1940; Minin and Pozharski), is devoted to the traditional liberators of Russia from the Polish invaders in the 17th century. He returned to literary criticism with a vivid and penetrating study of Mayakovsky (q.v.), with whom he was closely connected (O Mayakovskom, 1940; On Mayakovsky).

See: Gleb Struve, Soviet Russian Literature (1935), pp. 201–215.

L. S.

Sholem-Aleikhem (pseud. of Sholem Rabinowitz, 1859–1916, Yiddish novelist and humorist) was born in Pereyaslav, a small town in the province of Poltava, Russia. He received his early education in the neighboring community of Voronkov, the model for Kasrilivke, locale of many of his famous short stories. His talent as humorist was already manifested in his boyhood, when he managed to discover a ridiculous aspect in every situation and a caricature in every person. Until his 13th year his studies were largely limited to the Bible and sacred books, but when in his 14th year he read his first secular novel, Defoe's Robinson Crusoe, his imagination was intensely stimulated and he wrote his first immature novel, about a Jewish Crusoe. Encouraged by his father, he continued with the composition of poems, novels, dramas, and aphorisms in Yiddish, Hebrew, and Russian. Before the end of his 20's, his reputation was well established with the Yiddish reading public. As editor of Die Yiddishe Folksbibliothek in 1888 and 1889, he attracted the best Yiddish writers, especially since temporary wealth enabled him to play the role of a Maecenas. But soon his wealth came to an end. The ex-banker, ex-broker, and ex-businessman had to devote the last quarter century of his life, his best years, to a desperate struggle for bread. Yet the more difficult his economic plight became and the poorer the state of his health, the more did he seek relief in laughter. In his bitterest years he created the humorous character Tovyeh der Milchiger (Tovyeh the Dairyman), the lighthearted pauper who drives his rickety wagon and sorry nag along the dusty road between Kasrilivke and Yehupetz—equivalents of Gotham and Abdera—in search of a bare pittance but whose thoughts traverse the entire globe and reach up to God. Though severest trials assail this simple being, Tovyeh wipes away the unwelcome tear, strikes up a merry tune, and rejoices that he still lives in God's sunlight on this beautiful earth.

Sholem-Aleikhem taught a people steeped in tragedy to laugh at its troubles. His naratives of small-town life in the ghetto provinces of tsarist Russia are comparable in quality and in kind to Gottfried Keller's (q.v.) satiric tales of the petty bourgeoisie of Seldwyla in Switzerland. He loves his men and women for their weaknesses and their follies no less than for their quiet heroism and their inarticulate idealism, but his deepest love is reserved for the children who refuse to grow up and to accept the established order of things. The most attractive of these children is the orphaned boy Motel Peisem Chazans, who cannot quite adjust himself to adults' concepts and who manages to turn every situation topsy-turvy. Motel Peise is to the Yiddish reader what Tom Sawyer is to the American.

Sholem-Aleikhem died in New York, where he had found a refuge soon after the outbreak of the First World War. His fame has grown constantly since his death and now spans the continents. His tales have been dramatized for the New York stage and for Russian films. Twenty-seven of them have appeared in English translation in The Old Country (1946). His anecdotes and aphorisms are retold and reprinted wherever Jews of Eastern European origin congregate. He forms with Mendele mocher sform and Yitzchok Leibush Peretz (qq.v.) the triad of classical Yiddish literature.

See: Maurice Samuel, The World of Sholom-Aleikhem (1943).

S. L.

Sholokhov, Mikhail (1905–, Russian novelist and short-story writer), is the most substantial artist of Soviet literature, and of its many diverse exponents the one most widely appreciated at home and abroad. He is the first great epic recorder of the Don Cossacks and the poet of their landscape. His work is bulky rather than merely prolific, and unlike many of his colleagues he has never been an experimentalist in form. His fame rests largely on two vast novels, the many excellences of which grow naturally out of the great main stream of objective realism. His distinction derives from the fact that he is a Communist who has taken hitherto untouched material and expressed with abundant virility and historical truth the new Soviet conception of socialist realism. The measure of his power is seen in the complete dominance of the artist over the propagandist.

A Cossack himself, Sholokhov was born in the hamlet of Kruzhino in the stanitsa or township of Veshensk on the banks of the Don. His father was a jack-of-all-trades from Ryazan. His mother, half Cossack, half peasant, learned to read so as to write letters to her son; she was killed by German bombs in 1942. The parents had no property, nor were they formally married until 1912, when the boy was legitimized; thereafter he appeared on official documents as "son of a middle-class citizen." Sholokhov served in various military and civil capacities during the Revolution. He was in turn soldier, handy man, statistician, food inspector, freight handler, mason, bookkeeper, and journalist. In 1923 he began writing for Komsomol newspapers and for periodicals. His first book, Donskie rasskazy (1925; Tales of the Don), a group of four short stories, was followed by another, Lazorevaya Step (1926; The Azure Steppe), both dealing with the life of the Don Cossacks in the civil war and the first years of NEP. The stories outline the conflicts of class interests among the Cossacks, a theme developed on a heroic scale in the subsequent novels. The endings are uniformly tragic, though not without hope for a happier future. Among the most interesting are "Smertnyi vrag" (Deadly Enemy), "Chervotochina" (Dry Rot), and "Chuzhaya krov" (Alien Blood). Whereas in these early tales the leaders of the village are isolated from the people, in Sholokhov's later work they are wholly integrated with the masses.

In 1926 Sholokhov began working on Tikhii Don (The Quiet Don), his major opus, which occupied him 14 years. The first volume (1928) was followed by three others. The whole appears in English as two consecutive novels, And Quiet Flows the Don (1934) and The Don Flows Home to the Sea (1940), later combined in one volume as The Silent Don (1942). Before the appearance of the fourth volume the work had run into 79 editions, totaling four and one-half million copies, printed in 38 separate languages of the U.S.S.R. It was translated in 32 countries abroad, in 14 European and Asiatic languages. With the sensational success of the first volumes Sholokhov became the ranking novelist of the Soviet Union, a position he still occupies and one in which he continues to grow. In its great length (1300 pages), in its panoramic sweep and its numerous characters, as well as in its vitality and veracity, there is much to justify the comparison first made by Maxim Gorky (q.v.) with War and Peace. On the other hand, it lacks the depth of character analysis and the universality of Tolstoy's masterpiece, and it falls short of attaining the miraculous control of material in the older classic. The reasons for these differences exist apart from Western standards of artistic merit. Sholokhov was following the Marxian line in avoiding subjective emphasis: he is deeply concerned with people, but in the generic sense rather than as individuals. Furthermore, his Cossacks are not complex Europeans, but a primitive race governed by the most elemental instincts in their fighting, mating, cultivating the soil. What is tragic in the book is the inevitable sacrifice that occurs when an ancient, simple way of life is forced by history into a totally new social mold. The main import, however, is not tragic, but life-affirming. The real protagonist is not the Cossacks themselves, with all their exuberant vigor, their savage cruelty, their untapped reserves of social creativeness, nor even the Cossack land, though it is wonderfully portrayed in all its sensuous beauty; rather it is the dynamic unfolding of the dialectical conception of history to which both individuals and groups must adapt or be swept aside. The book depends for its unity on this principle, the most striking demonstration of which is seen in the chief character, Gregor Melekhov. Torn by opposing forces, he fights first on one side, then on the other; he cannot adjust to the new order, however, and he is progressively denuded of his possessions, of his family, and finally of his self-confidence, his integrity, even his animal courage, ending in surrender and probable death. Sholokhov's power is such that there is no trace of schematism or dogma; the clash and struggle are deeply felt, deeply realized. It is of no little significance that owing directly to Sholokhov the Cossacks regained their status as a distinct people, a recognition hitherto withheld by the Soviet government.

In the midst of working on Tikhi Don, Sholokhov produced his second novel, Podnyataya tselina (1932-1933; Eng. tr., Virgin Soil Upturned, American title, Seeds of Tomorrow, both 1935), another study of the Cossacks and the tragicomic vicissitudes incident to the organization of collective farming among a pastoral people famous for centuries for their extreme individualism. Strictly sociological, without the thematic grandeur of the first novel, this book nevertheless has its own power, full of racy naturalism, poetic gusto, and naïveté. It quickly sold over a million and a half copies, and by order of the government every supervisor of a collective farm was required to read it. Both novels have been given operatic form with music by Ivan Dzerzhinski and are among the most popular in repertory. Tikhi Don has also been filmed, and Podnyataya tselina made into a play.

Already assured of a distinguished place in Soviet literature, Sholokhov gives promise of an even finer accomplishment. Until 1941 he lived in Veshensk with his wife and three children, taking an active part in cultural and political affairs. He was awarded the Stalin prize of 100,000 rubles and also the Order of Lenin. He was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences and a deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. Like all other Soviet writers he gave himself over wholly to the war effort following the German invasion and served at the front as reporter and in other capacities.

See: V. Goffenshefer, Mikhail Sholokhov (1940); Isidor Schneider, "The Quiet Don Flows Home," Soviet Russia Today, IX (1941), 10-11, 32.

N. S.

Sienkiewicz, Henryk (1846-1916, Polish journalist, short-story writer, and novelist), was born in the village of Wola Okrzejska, province of Podlasie, Russian Poland, of Polish gentry stock said to have been crossed at some remote date with a strain of Tartar. His mother, Stefanja Cieciszowska, being herself of a poetic temperament, instilled in her son a love of literature and a desire to interpret his country to the world through the written word. In 1866 Sienkiewicz entered the famous Warsaw Szkoła Główna and remained in that institution even after its reorganization as a Russian university in 1869, graduating in 1870 in the same class with Świętochowski (q.v.). Sienkiewicz made his literary début in the positivist journal Przegląd tygodniowy (Weekly Review; see Polish literature) with a critical account of a performance by the popular actor Rapacki in Nos Intimes by Sardou (q.v.). His first published story, Na marne (1872; In Vain), held out little promise of the talent Sienkiewicz was ultimately to display. In 1876 Sienkiewicz journeyed to the United States, partly to carry out his mother's injunction to learn to write by traveling, partly in order to escape the spiritual suffocation of life in Russian Warsaw. For a while he lived in Modjeska's famous Polish "Brook Farm" in California. During his absence from Poland his name was kept alive there by a series of "Listy z podróży" (Travel Letters), written in a manner reminiscent of Dickens and Harriet Martineau and appearing regularly in Gazeta polska. From his American experiences came also a number of short stories, the most memorable of which is the immortal "Latarnik" (1882; Eng. tr., "The Light-House Keeper," in Yanko the Musician and Other Stories, 1893), a moving story of a homesick Polish exile.

On his return to Poland, refreshed by his years abroad, Sienkiewicz quickly won a nation-wide reputation. His best works from this period are the realistic Z pamiętnika korepetytora (1879; A Teacher's Memoir) and Janko muzykant (1879; Eng. tr., Yanko the Musician, and Other Stories, 1893), a sympathetic tale of a poor peasant lad who dreamed in vain of possessing a violin.

In 1883 began what may be called Sienkiewicz's heroic period, with the publication in the Warsaw journal Słowo of his long novel Ogniem i mieczem (Eng. tr., With Fire and Sword, 1890). This proved to be but the first of a series of three great historical novels (Potop, 1886, Eng. tr., The Deluge, 1891, and Pan Wołodyjowski, 1888, Eng. tr., Pan Michael, 1893) in glorification of Poland's struggle for national existence in the 17th century. The first of the three, a stirring account of the siege of Zbaraż by the Cossack chieftain Chmielnicki and his Turkish ally Tugai Bey, together with the heroic defense of the fortress by Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, calls into bold relief an outstanding Polish trait—military valor. The second dramatizes not only this quality but also the piety of the Pole, as it depicts the defense of the shrine of Jasna Góra by the monk Kordecki. The final volume of the trilogy portrays the defense of still another Polish outpost, the bastion of Kamieniec in Podolia. It was a far cry indeed from the young Sienkiewicz of Na marne, with his positivist's aversion to feeling and his repudiation of love as a motive in human affairs, to the mature Sienkiewicz of the trilogy, with his clear implication that blind, unreasoning love is the noblest of all motives. That Sienkiewicz would arrive ultimately at this conviction might, however, have been predicted from 1875, when in his first novel, Stary sługa (The Old Servant), he represented blind loyalty and devotion as knightly qualities. While Sienkiewicz always appreciated the praise accorded him by the critics for his psychological novels, Bez dogmatu (1891; Eng. tr., Without Dogma, 1893) and Rodzina Połanieckich (1895; The Połaniecki Family), it was for his historical novels, especially the trilogy, that he preferred to be remembered, since these were the fulfillment of the consuming ambition of his life.

Aside from the trilogy, the novel Sienkiewicz found most difficult to write was Krzyżacy (1900; Eng. tr., Knights of the Cross), for the story deals with the obscure period of Germany's eastward expansion (13th and 14th centuries), when eyewitness chroniclers were few. Less difficult was the popular Quo vadis? (1895; Eng. tr., 1896), a romance of the days of Nero, in the writing of which Sienkiewicz found Tacitus a gold mine of precise detail.

Sienkiewicz is regarded by most Poles as the national interpreter of Poland par excellence. On the 30th anniversary of his literary début (1900), the entire nation arose as one man to do him honor. Five years later (1905) he was awarded the Nobel prize in literature.

During the First World War, Sienkiewicz abandoned work on a novel of Napoleonic times which he had begun, to devote his entire energy to the cause of Polish independence and to the activities of the International Red Cross. He died in Switzerland in the midst of this work.

See: P. Chmielowski, in "Henryk Sienkiewicz," Nasi powieściopisarze (1895); L. E. Van Norman, "Henryk Sienkiewicz's Poland," Bookman, XLIV (1916-1917), 412-426; Wiadomości literackie, 1924, No. 43 (entire issue); M. M. Gardner, The Patriot Novelist of Poland: Henryk Sienkiewicz (1926); E. E. Ledbetter, comp., Polish Literature in English Translation (1932), pp. 25-27, bibliography of translations; J. Birkenmajer, "Henryk Sienkiewicz," Thought, XIV (1939), 579-593.

L. E. V. N.

Sieroszewski, Wacław (1858-, Polish novelist), was born at Wólka Kozłowska in Mazovia, Russian Poland. A brief schooling preceded two years of apprenticeship to a locksmith, after which he was sent to study in the technical school of the Warsaw-Vienna Railroad Company. Attracted, as were so many of his generation, by socialism, Sieroszewski plunged with his whole heart into this movement, only to be arrested in 1878 and sent to Siberia. In Yakutsk, where he was held for 12 years, he turned his enforced leisure to good use by mastering the language and lore of the natives and by collecting material which he was later able to publish through the Petersburg Geographic Association. On his return to Poland in 1891, Sieroszewski occupied himself with writing. In 1902-1903 he made a journey to the Far East. This, like his Siberian experiences, yielded him rich material for a series of novels and tales. Arrested again in 1905, he escaped abroad, returning to Poland in 1914 as a legionary with Piłsudski. A wanderer all his life, Sieroszewski was at home and contented in any part of the world. He was looked upon in Free Poland as the Nestor of the writing guild and was accorded high honors as the figure responsible for making the Orient and the primitive races of the Siberian wilderness literary material in Polish.

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, I (1927), 51–66; G. Korbut, Literatura polska (1931), IV, 155–156; K. Czachowski, Wacław Sieroszewski; życie i twórczość (1938).

A. P. C.

Sigurjónsson, Jóhann (1880–1919, Icelandic dramatist and poet), was born at Laxamýri in Þingeyjarsýsla in the North of Iceland. His parents were well to do, and there was poetic talent in his mother's family (e.g., Jónas Hallgrímsson, pioneer of the romantic movement). The boy was able to follow his inclination to study, and, being attracted to natural science, he chose the study of veterinary medicine in Copenhagen (1899). He had almost finished when he determined to devote his whole time and energy to becoming a writer—a great and famous writer it must be. As a short cut to literary fame he decided to write plays in Danish. He was thus the first of his compatriots to cut across the narrow confines of his mother tongue (spoken by a population of about 100,000) to gain a wider audience, and more were to follow his example. He was soon one of the most brilliant members of the bohemian art circle in Copenhagen, a group which tasted the excesses of French fin-de-siècle decadence and shared the soaring ambitions of Nietzschean geniuses.

His first two plays, Dr. Rung (1905) and Bóndinn á Hrauni (1908; Eng. tr., The Hraun Farm, 1916), were immature, but the latter treated an Icelandic subject for the first time. With Bjærg-Eyvind og hans Hustru (1911; Icelandic, Fjalla-Eyvindur, 1912; Eng. tr., Eyvind of the Hills, 1916) Sigurjónsson attained meteoric fame. He was acclaimed by the best critics such as Brandes (q.v.) and wooed by both the Scandinavian and the German stage (Fjalla-Eyvindur was first produced in Reykjavík December 25, 1911, in Copenhagen May 20, 1912). The fame of the play spread even to France, England, and America; a French critic gave the author a seat of honor beside Scandinavia's big three, Björnson, Ibsen, and Strindberg (qq.v.). Later Victor Sjöström was to make one of the first artistic films out of the play. Fjalla-Eyvindur is based upon an Icelandic folk tale about real 18th-century outlaws (sheep thieves). In the play Fjalla-Eyvindur's wife becomes the true hero, living for her love only and perishing in the end because her love is shattered against the elemental forces of hunger in the wilderness. This great tragedy is projected against the colorful background of Icelandic folkways and magnificent mountains. It is ennobled by the rich lyric expression of the author, who has left other perfect gems of lyric poetry apart from the songs in his plays. His next play, Ønsket (1915; Icelandic tr., Galdra-Loftur, 1915; Eng. trs., Loftur, 1939, "Loft's Wish," Poet Lore, XLVI, 99–146), was also based on a folk tale. Loftur is an Icelandic Faust whose towering ambition is to harness the powers of darkness—for higher purposes. He fails utterly because of his selfishness. The same ambition burns in Løgneren (1917; The Liar), a play drawn from Njála, the most famous of the Icelandic sagas. These two works, though good, did not attain the success of Fjalla-Eyvindur.

Sigurjónsson's untimely death cut short a career of unusual brilliance. Those who knew him have all agreed that his life was beautiful poetry even to a greater degree than his written works. He left an unfinished play, Elsa, which points to a new, more subdued period in his development.

See: L. Pineau, "Un Poète dramatique islandais, Johann Sigurjonsson," Revue, XXV (1914), 52–67, 188–201; A. Møller, "Islandsk Digtning i nyeste Tid og Danmark," in E. Skovrup, ed., Hovedtræk af Nordisk Digtning i Nytiden (1921), pp. 356–364; G. Gunnarsson, "Einn sit ég yfir drykkju," in Rit eftir Jóhann Sigurjónsson, I (1940), xiii–xlviii; S. Nordal, "Jóhann Sigurjónsson," Timarit Máls og menningar, 1940, pp. 111–124.

S. E.

Silfverstolpe, Gunnar Mascoll (1893–1942, Swedish poet), born in Rytterne, Västmanland, is among the less prolific of modern masters of the Swedish lyric. His total poetic production is contained in five rather slender volumes—Arvet (1919; The Heritage), Dagsljus (1923; Daylight), Vardag (1926; Common Day), Efteråt (1932; Afterward), and Hemland (Homeland; 1940). This body of poetry was, however, only a part of his quiet and restrained but not unimportant contribution to modern Swedish cultural life. During his life he held many positions of trust directly identified with cultural strivings of the day, among which may be mentioned those of curator of the Royal Art Collections from 1920 to his death, secretary of the Bellman Society, 1919–1934, and officer of the Swedish Pen Club. Besides being active in newspapers and magazines as one of the more sensitive critics of the day, he made more extended critical and scholarly contributions in such works as Prins Eugens konst (1935; The Art of Prince Eugene) and Bokbindare i Stockholm, 1630-1930 (1930; Bookbinders in Stockholm, 1630-1930), and was one of the most active translators of representative English and American verse (Vers från väster, 2 vols., 1922-1924; Verse from the West, together with Karl Asplund). In his creative work he is primarily the poet of memories of the past, a poet who has his roots firmly imbedded in the ancient Swedish countryside with all of its finest aristocratic traditions. He never wearies of glorifying the Swedish herregård (landed estate), with its gracious culture, its elegance, and its warm basic humanity; he writes of the closed circle of the home, with its solid intimacies and its unspoiled ebb and flow of spontaneous organic life; he sings of simple everyday pleasures in a manner not unlike that of Wordsworth, one of his favorites among the English poets. For Silfverstolpe as for Wordsworth poetry was in essence "emotion recollected in tranquillity," a thing of fine and dignified restraint. In its preoccupation with the simple life and the past Silfverstolpe's work reflects, usually with a most subtle indirection, a sense of homelessness in the brutally complex pattern of modern existence, though his last volume of poems, Hemland, reveals that he was not without deep personal feeling for unfortunate victims of the present ghastly world conflagration.

His poetry on the whole is a rather slender but everywhere sensitive and genuine expression of deep spiritual loyalty to an anciently rooted Swedish cultural tradition facing gradual strangulation at the hands of insensitive onrushing modern industrial civilization. As such Silfverstolpe's work takes its modest place alongside of that of Heidenstam and Lagerlöf, Karlfeldt and Österling (qq.v.), each of whom worked with similar materials in a similar spirit of fine piety for a past that is rapidly disappearing from the present-day Swedish scene.

A. G.

Silone, Ignazio (pseud. of Secondo Tranquilli, 1900-, Italian novelist and critic), was born in Pescina dei Marsi, Aquila. His family, landed residents of the province, provided him with an education in Catholic schools, but Silone spent most of his boyhood and youth, according to his own preference, in close and working contact with the peasants of the countryside in which he was born. After the death of his mother and five brothers in the 1915 earthquake, he and a surviving brother quit the Abruzzi for Rome, where later Silone edited the youth paper, the Avanguardia. In 1921 he visited Russia, returning afterward to Trieste to edit the labor paper, the Lavoratore. It was not long before the Fascists seized this paper and issued warrants for the arrest of its editor and his assistants. Silone's brother was captured and subsequently beaten to death in jail. Silone himself escaped pursuit, found shelter with the peasants of his native province, and remained in Italy for a number of years. In 1930 he broke with the Communist Party, in which he had held membership for some time. In 1931 he was smuggled across the border into Germany, traveled from there to other parts of Europe, and settled finally in Switzerland, where he lived until 1944. The fiction, history, and criticism he wrote during those years of exile had the curious distinction of being unknown only in the country to whose literature they made their unique and considerable contribution. In 1944, with the end of Fascism, Silone returned to Italy and resumed political life as a member of the Socialist Party. Soon after, he became editor in chief of the newspaper Avanti.

While virtually everything Silone has published up to the present springs from a total rejection of fascism and a corresponding devotion to an ethical conception of socialism, it is as a novelist rather than as a critic of society that his claim upon contemporary attention has been greatest. The cogency of his fiction lies in its humanity, its intelligence, its liveness, and its irony. This last is the over-all tempering element: deeply Italian and appropriate, it is an irony that derives, not from aloofness, but on the contrary from great and offended love. In this, as in his genius for conveying the flavor of peasant life, Silone recalls inevitably another great Italian realist, Giovanni Verga (q.v.).

All Silone's writings reveal, with varying stress, the Fascist degradation of Italy and point to the need for an understanding and a solution of her problems arrived at through contact and experience rather than remote reflection and theory. Explicitly he links the idea of socialism with that of liberty, but does not assume liberty to be a necessary or natural outcome of socialism. Like Mazzini, of whom he writes revealingly (in The Living Thoughts of Mazzini, 1939; published only in English), he expects his country to be saved not by outside intervention, but from within. Writing in 1939 he declared himself to be a member of no political party, but "an anti-fascist partisan" in the civil war raging throughout the world; and expressed his disappointment with the parties and programs of a Left which had lost all effective contact with reality. As to the Second World War, far from solving the problem of fascism, he saw it as only too likely to result in the "fascistization of the democratic countries," and was unable to condone those socialists who "with the very best possible antifascist intentions . . . put their own theories in mothballs" in order to cooperate with men of opposing ideologies in the struggle against a common enemy. It remained open to the convinced socialist (and Silone's life has borne this out) to refuse all compromise and to live in strict accordance with an ethical ideal.

All this is illustrated in the spiritual odyssey of Pietro Spina, protagonist of Silone's Bread and Wine (1936; original Italian published later, Pane e vino, 1937) and of his The Seed beneath the Snow (1942; original Italian version not yet published). Pietro Spina returns from exile to Italy, from realms of revolutionary theory to realms of human reality and, after experiencing some of the blockages and deviations to which man's love of liberty is subject, finds himself home at last in the "poor, barren country" which is "the country of his soul." Spina sheds a falsified social partisanship in favor of a concrete and living Christian morality and shares his life with the humble company of those who can truly break bread with him in poverty, faith, hope, and charity. In Bread and Wine the spiritual travels of the principal character are built into the structure of a novel that conveys above all the pulse and color and sound of Italian life. The Seed beneath the Snow, its sequel, is less satisfying as a work of art, primarily because it tries to combine satire, symbolism, and realism and fails to fuse them.

Fontamara (1933; Eng. tr., 1934), while simpler in pattern and narrower in scope than those that followed, had a greater popular success. During the first year of publication it appeared in a total of 19 different translations and in 17 languages; it is a brief masterpiece of concrete narration and bitter portraiture recording the lives of a handful of Abbruzzese peasants (cafoni) under the impact of the "new government."

Notable among Silone's nonfiction writings is his history of Fascism, Il Fascismo; le sue origini e il suo sviluppo (published only in Switzerland in its German translation, Der Faschismus; seine Entstehung und seine Entwicklung, 1934), a serious and objective account of the beginnings and early years of the Fascist movement in Italy. The School for Dictators (1938; published only in English) is a somewhat labored satiric treatise on the proper grooming of modern tyrants. Written in the form of a series of quasi-classic dialogues between an aspirant to American dictatorship, a scholarly American windbag, and a European who styles himself Thomas the Cynic, it treats acidly of the manner, attitudes, dreams, and myths of dictators past and current.

In addition to the books mentioned, Silone has published numerous critical and political articles in American and European periodicals. His most recent work is the drama, Egli si nasconde (1945; Eng. tr., And He Hid Himself, 1946), based in theme and character on the novel Pane e vino.

I. B.

Silva Gaio, Manuel da (1860–1934, Portuguese poet, novelist, dramatist, and critic), son of the novelist António de Oliveira da Silva Gaio (1830–1870), was born in Coimbra, where his father was a professor and journalist. He studied law in the university of that city and in 1927 was named secretary of the law school.

The most decisive influence in his first poetical and critical works and in his novels is to be found in the philosophical and scientific doctrines of the unfortunate Guilherme Moniz Barreto (q.v.), with whom he was joined by the bonds of a strong friendship and to whom he dedicated a beautiful biographical-critical study, Os novos: I, Moniz Barreto (1894; The Newcomers: I, Moniz Barreto). Previously he had composed a carefully written story, O pecado antigo (1893; The Ancient Sin), with vivid rural scenes but with too many feuilletonistic surprises and coincidences. In the historical vein, but in a style replete with mannerisms, he made a start in the theatre with Na volta da Índia (1898; The Return from India). The work attracted no attention, though it reveals a certain psychological penetration in its view of India by a Portuguese of the 16th century and in the awakening of the hero's saüdade (longing) when confronted with the exotic. The poem "O mundo vive de ilusão" (1896; The World Lives on Illusion) is obscure and confusedly pessimistic. Silva Gaio's first book of poetry, Mondego (1900), marks the intelligent revival of the Portuguese pastoral theme in modern times; some of these pieces, such as "Dias correntes" (Ordinary Days; Part III of the eclogue "Lemano"), are the best of their type. He never abandoned his interest in this brilliant Portuguese school, and a little before his death two delicate and elegant studies on the subject were published, Bucolismo: I, Bernardino Ribeiro; II, Cristoval Falcão (1932-1933).

Silva Gaio's deep interest in classical literatures and in a revival of humanistic studies in his country is related to another aspect of the Portuguese Renaissance movement. He left evidence of this tendency in works of his own—always very careful, perhaps coldly correct at times, but worthy—in the poetry of Chave dourada (1916; Golden Key), D. João (1925), and Sulamite (1928) and in the essays Da poesia na educação dos gregos (1917; On Poetry in Greek Education) and De Roma e suas conquistas (1919; On Rome and Her Conquests). His two novels Ultimos crentes (1904; Last Believers) and Torturados (1911; The Tormented) merit special mention. In the first of these a strange company of sailors, isolated from the world on a deserted beach, live out the last illusions of the myth of King Sebastian. They await the Encoberto (King Don Sebastião) until they think they see him coming over the horizon, and then all die when they try to save him. In Torturados three characters, in a series of renunciations, seek without success a state of intellectual and moral perfection. This affords the author an opportunity to outline extraordinary psychologies that are in conflict with a norm and possessed by a vehement desire to excel, which life itself is sure to overcome. The type seen in the poet Miguel de Gouvêa is of an almost autobiographical richness, and all the characters are described not so much through their acts as by their thoughts and creative plans. Silva Gaio's critical work includes Eça de Queiroz (1919), Eugénio de Castro (1928), João de Deus (1930), and Os vencidos da vida (1931; The Failures).

All told, the extensive and varied writings of Silva Gaio are a reflection of the uneasiness and hesitations that the culture of his country felt during the first third of this century. While appreciated only by a select minority of his contemporaries, his art is of the kind which does not disappear. On the one hand it was refined and aristocratic, on the other it had deep roots in Portuguese tradition and a universality due to the author's pervading humanistic ideal.

See: Fidelino de Figueiredo, Estudos de literatura, I (1917), 6-22.

R. M. L.

Sirin, Vladimir, see Nabokov, Vladimir Vladimirovich.

Sivle, Per (1857-1904, Norwegian poet), was a farmer's son from Voss in western Norway. For years he made his living as a journalist. He published several short stories in the dialect of his home district and a short working-class novel in the traditional literary language, Streik (1891; Strike). His chief and lasting work, however, was, from 1884, a number of national poems, some in Riksmål and some in Landsmål (see Norwegian literature), often taking their subject from national history, all of them battle songs for Norwegian independence. By their epigrammatic form and imaginative power they became classics, standing up like living sculpture and still today stirring Norwegian minds. In particular the one-stanza poem "Vi vil oss et land" (1894; We Will a Country for Us) is a cherished song of the nation. His collected works (Skrifter) were published in three volumes, 1909-1910.

See: A. Hovden, Per Sivle (1905).

H. K.

Siwertz, Sigfrid (1882-, Swedish prose author and poet), was born in Stockholm and educated at Uppsala. He attracted general attention with his volume of short stories De gamla (1909; Old People). With the novel Selambs (1920; Eng. tr., Downstream, 1923) his promise was fully realized. Since then he has done his best work in collections of short stories, such as En handfull dun (1922; A Handful of Feathers). Though dealing usually with artist types, which he handles with great delicacy and humor, Siwertz can also be robust, as in his clever story "The Lady in White," where he contrasts the healthy give-and-take of married life with the sentimental confidences of "spiritual affinity." He is fond of sailing and has done spirited pictures of summer life in the islands of the Stockholm archipelago. In poetry his chief success has been with Taklagsölet (1923; Roof-tree Ale), a dramatic piece for the dedication of the Stockholm Town Hall. Siwertz has recently been made a member of the Swedish Academy.

It is in Selambs (The Selamb Family) that Siwertz has shown greatest authority. This novel is a study of degeneracy through the five members of one family. The description of profiteering as exhibited in the eldest son is a real social document. All the characters of the book are exponents of ruthless selfishness in various forms, from morbid sex inhibition to violent primitivism. It is certainly not cheerful reading, and yet at least a solution is suggested by antithesis with the young men and women who exhibit so clearly what not to be.

In all his work Siwertz is an accomplished stylist. His plastic and colorful prose is a pure delight. What could be better than the scenes in "Leonard and the Fisherman," where the young artist in woodcuts is calmed and reassured by the philosophy of the quaint old fisherman, who turns out to be also, from his former position as a sceneshifter, an addict of grand opera? The two go behind the stage in a performance of Tristan: "Like a living, overwhelming stream of actuality the music burst forth through all the dusty rubbish of illusion." It is in such passages that Siwertz proves himself a master equally in perception and expression.

See: C. W. Stork, tr., Modern Swedish Masterpieces (1923); H. A. Larsen, ed., Sweden's Best Stories (1928); G. Bach, The History of the Scandinavian Literatures, ed. by Frederika Blankner (1938).

C. W. S.

Sjöberg, Birger (1885-1929, Swedish poet, novelist, and composer), was for most of his life a resident of Hälsingborg on the south coast of Sweden. No recent volume of Swedish verse has won more immediate popularity than Fridas bok (1922; Frida's Book). It pictures with quiet humor and sentiment the life of a small Swedish town. It was followed by Kriser och kransar (1927; Crises and Crowns), a collection of poems of great warmth and pathos, of what one may call disharmony of soul, and of lyric imagination, and, posthumously, by Fridas andra bok (1929; Frida's Second Book). His popular novel Kvartetten som sprängdes (1925; The Dispersed Quartet), though of loose composition, has deep feeling and such a "classical gallery" of characters that it has become one of Sweden's best stories, and was in 1935 successfully dramatized and staged by the author's brother, Gösta Sjöberg.

Sjöberg continued the illustrious tradition of Karl Mikael Bellman, the great 18th-century improviser, who sang his own music to the accompaniment of a guitar. As Bellman pictured the gay life of Stockholm, so does Sjöberg reproduce the homelier scenes of his present-day environment. For some time no musical evening at Stockholm was complete without a performance of "Spanish Moonlight," in which the impetuous hero is carried in imagination to Granada, and then back to the more chaste endearments of his northern sweetheart. Sjöberg's originality has won him a place that is likely to be secure for some time.

See: C. W. Stork, Anthology of Swedish Lyrics (revised and enlarged ed., 1930; J. Landquist, "Sjöberg," in Humanism (1931).

C. W. S.

Skerlić, Jovan (1877-1914, Serb literary historian, essayist, and national leader), is one of those men who leave their stamp on an era. At the beginning of the 20th century and up to the First World War, all Serbian literature and also the entire public life of the country evolved under the directives and auspices of this great figure.

He was born in Belgrade and became the highest expression and exponent of the strivings and aspirations and ideals of the small Serbian capital. He studied French and comparative literature at the University of Belgrade as a disciple of Bogdan Popović (q.v.) and as leader of socialist students took a keen interest in contemporary social and national problems. Serbia and Montenegro were then the only free Yugoslav countries, and the dream was to liberate and unite all the members of the South Slav nations, notably the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. Advocating this idea through countless articles and lectures, Skerlić became the most ardent spokesman of a bellicose generation. At the same time, thoroughly acquainted with French political and intellectual life, he wanted the Yugoslav nation to develop on purely democratic lines. Also, as an adherent of the philosophical ideas of the French writers Comte and Guyau, Skerlić emphasized on every occasion the social note in artistic creation and succeeded in discrediting the "art for art's sake" movement.

From 1899 to 1901 Skerlić continued his studies at Paris and Lausanne. He became a follower of Georges Renard, and it was under Renard's influence that his spiritual evolution attained its definite form. His doctor's dissertation, L'Opinion publique en France d'après la poésie politique et sociale de 1830-1848 (1901), shows the nature of his interests. Beginning in 1901 Skerlić taught French and Yugoslav literature at the University of Belgrade.

As a man of wonderful personal magnetism, and as a gifted orator—he was called "John the Golden-mouthed"—Skerlić acquired very great prestige. Young men from all the provinces of the Yugoslav nation, most of which was under foreign rule at this time, gathered at the University of Belgrade and looked to Skerlić as their prophet. At one word from the master, "Skerlić's youth" was ready for any sacrifice, as indeed was proved in the Balkan Wars of 1912 and 1913 and in the First World War. In his last year Skerlić, made a member of Parliament in 1912, devoted ever more time to politics and was flooded with invitations to visit and lecture in the various unliberated provinces. His sudden and mysterious death, at the age of 36 and when he had seemed in the best of health, was charged by many of his followers to Austro-Hungarian politicians, for whom he obviously was a grave menace.

Skerlić was exceedingly active as an author. First as a collaborator and then as the editor in chief of the best Serbian literary review Srpski književni glasnik (Serbian Literary Herald), he was the ever-vigilant chronicler and arbiter of the entire literary production among Yugoslavs. Hundreds of his essays, studies, and reviews were published in Srpski književni glasnik; the best were collected in Pisci i knjige (10 vols., 1907 ff.; Authors and Books). Other important works, mostly in the domain of literary history, are Pogled na današnju francusku književnost (1902; View of Contemporary French Literature); Uništenje estetike i demokratizacija umetnosti (1903; Annihilation of Esthetics and Democratization of Art); Jakov Ignjatović (1904); Omladina i njena književnost (1848-1871) (1906; The Youth Movement and Its Literature); Vojislav J. Ilić (1907); Francuski romantičari i srpska narodna poezija (1908; The French Romanticists and Serbian Folk Songs); Srpska književnost u 18om veku (1909; Serbian Literature in the 18th Century); Svetozar Marković (1910); Istorijski pregled srpske štampe 1791-1911 (1911; Historical Review of the Serbian Press); Istorija nove srpske književnosti (1914; History of Modern Serbian Literature, complete ed.); Današnji srpsko-hrvatski nacionalizam (1913; Contemporary Serbo-Croatian Nationalism).

As a literary historian Skerlić adopted Taine's (q.v.) theory that every work has to be studied as a product of its environment and time. Contemplated from this standpoint, the whole evolution of Serbian literature was illuminated by a new light. Skerlić is famous not only for his scholarship but also for his style. His writings are crystal clear, composed in a vigorous, persuasive, and picturesque manner, full of sparkling wit and vivid imagery. In the white heat of creation he was occasionally incorrect about documents, sometimes hasty. But he left his own mark on whatever he touched.

See: B. Popović, "Jovan Skerlić kao književni kritičar," Srpski književni glasnik, September 1, 1920; Srpski književni glasnik, May 16, 1924 (whole issue devoted to Skerlić on the 10th anniversary of his death); V. Hilojević, Jovan Skerlić (1937).

P. A.

Skjoldborg, Johan (1861-1936, Danish novelist), the son of a poor crofter in Thy, Jutland, became a schoolteacher. His first book, En Stridsmand (1896; A Fighter), was a tribute to the men who wrest a living from the stubborn heath land along the North Sea. It was followed by Kragehuset (1899; The Crow's Nest). A stronger agitatorial purpose is evident in Gyldholm (1902), the novel that brought him recognition in literary circles. It is a dark picture of the misery and degradation of the laborers on Denmark's manorial estates in the 80's and 90's. These estates, he declared, were islands of retrogression in the land. Their laborers were untouched both by the cultural-religious forces that centered in the rural folk high schools and by the new socialistic labor movement. But the youngest and strongest of the group, Per Holt, stirred to revolt by a terrible tragedy in his own home, went out from Gyldholm to face a strange world and an unknown fate—symbol of a class emerging from bondage. Skjoldborg is before all else the spokesman of the small crofters. His books have become the property of the very poor and have been a moving force in the Crofter Movement. His early works were all in the service of social reforms. Later he turned not only against the materialism that came with industrialization, but also against what he called the "centrifugal" tendency of modern life. In the midst of an over-organized society, he pleaded for simplicity and singleness of purpose. Love of home, devotion to the land, and absorption in work seemed to him the enduring values. This is the theme of Nye Mænd (1917; New Men) and Jens Jakobs Sønner (1920; Jens Jakob's Sons). A more definite religious bent is evident in Præsten i Løgum (1921-22; The Parson at Løgum). Skjoldborg has a considerable narrative gift and a clear, firm style which in his nature descriptions rises to poetic beauty. But his chief hold over the reader is by virtue of his broad human sympathies.

See: Helge Kjaergaard, Die dänische Literatur der neuesten Zeit (1871-1933) (1934).

H. A. L.

Skram, Amalie (1847-1908, Norwegian novelist and dramatist), came from a middle-class family in Bergen. When very young she married a sea captain, whom she divorced after a short and unhappy marriage. Later she married the Danish writer Erik Skram, in whose country she lived the greater part of her life.

Her first important work, Constance Ring (1885), reveals her as a disciple of the naturalistic school which at that time, through the influence of Flaubert and Zola (qq.v.), had begun to dominate the younger generation of Norwegian writers. It is the story of a tragic marriage, told with all the reveling in minute details which characterizes naturalism. Much more original and intense is Forraadt (1892; Betrayed), also a novel dealing with the problems of marriage. Other novels published during this period are Knut Tandberg (1886) and Lucie (1888), the latter remarkable for its pictures of life in the Christiania of those days. In 1893, after other rather unsuccessful attempts at playwriting, she presented the conflict between an independent, unconventional spirit and a humdrum, Philistine outlook on life in a play, Agnete (1893), which has retained all its power of passionate persuasion and remains one of the most remarkable contributions to the 19th-century Norwegian theatre.

The work which has assured for this writer a place among the masters of Norwegian letters is the great epic novel Hellemyrsfolket (4 vols., Sjur Gabriel, 1887; To venner, 1887, Two Friends; S. G. Myre, 1890; Afkom, 1898, Offspring). This is a family chronicle, the sad tale of generation after generation of miserable people, doomed by their own weakness, seemingly predestined to a life of poverty, squalor, and crime. The background of the novel is the town of Bergen, where the novelist had spent her childhood and youth, and the book is alive with its sights and sounds and smells. An almost uncanny insight into the very depths of human nature makes her reveal to her readers the criss-cross of motives directing the life of her unsavory hero, S. G. Myre, the son of incurable drunkards, himself a vain, weak coward who by devious means succeeds in getting into the middle-class environment he has always wanted to belong to, but who ends his life in prison. A deep, genuine sense of human destiny, of the unescapable logic of fate, permeates this somber epic in which the author's naturalistic conception of a world dominated by biological factors is transformed and illumined by a poet's feeling of tragic necessity.

Among Amalie Skram's other books mention should be made of the polemical novel, Professor Hieronymus (1895), the somewhat sentimental Julehelg (1900; Christmas), and a collection of short stories, Sommer (1899; Summer).

See: Antonie Tiberger, Amalie Skram (1910).
O. P. G.

Sládek, Josef Václav (1845–1912, Czech poet and translator of Shakespeare), is the first Czech poet to show intense interest in America. Sládek was born in Zbiroh (west of Prague) and studied science at the University of Prague. In 1868 he came to the United States, where he lived for two years as a teacher and journalist. After his return to Europe he became a teacher of English at the Prague Commercial College. He died, after a long illness, in his native village.

Sládek's personal relations with Vrchlický (q.v.) and Zeyer (q.v.) as well as his editorship of Lumír, the journal of the group, put him into the camp of the "cosmopolites," but his poetic practice was rooted rather in the native tradition of folk poetry. He was most successful as a poet when he wrote short lyrics in the simplest style, some humorous and whimsical, some expressly addressed to children or written as if sung by peasant boys and girls. Sládek was also a good poet of his personal sorrows—the early death of his first wife, his long struggle with disease, his return to traditional religion. He wrote much political verse of distinction, expressing an intense patriotism and a strong belief in the peasants as the core of the nation. Sládek also composed short epics and idyls of country life as well as the more conventional descriptive and meditative poetry. At his best he is a genuine poet who revived the style of folk poetry and filled it with personal content.

His more important volumes are Básně (1875; Poems), Jiskry na moři (1879; Sparks on the Sea), Světloú stopou (1881; On a Bright Trail), Sluncem a stínem (1887; In Sun and Shade), Selské písně a české znělky (1889; Peasant Songs and Czech Sonnets), and Starosvětské písničky (1891; Old-World Ditties). Sládek's stay in America bore fruit in descriptive sketches and informative articles on American life and literature (collected as Americké obrázky, 2 vols., 1914, American pictures) as well as in translations of American and English poetry. He translated Longfellow's Hiawatha (1872), Bret Harte and Aldrich, Byron and Coleridge, and, with especial success, Burns. Beginning in 1894 he undertook a complete translation of Shakespeare's plays, of which he finished 32. Sládek's Shakespeare is still standard in Czech, faithful, poetic, though somewhat academic, too polished, and not concise enough in the greatest tragedies. Recent translations of individual plays—Macbeth by Otokar Fischer (q.v.), Julius Caesar, The Merchant of Venice, A Midsummer Night's Dream, and Twelfth Night by Erik Saudek—are superior, but no one has matched Sládek's general achievement.

See: E. Chalupný, J. V. Sládek (1916); F. Strejček, J. V. Sládek (1916); R. Wellek, "Vykleštěný Shakespeare," in Kritika (1924); F. X. Šalda, Šaldův zápisník, IV (1932), 337–352.

R. W.

Slataper, Scipio (1885–1915, Italian poet and free-lance writer), was born of an Italian mother in Trieste, where his father's family, originally Slavic, had become Italianized. He met death on the Podgora front, almost in view of his native city, in the war that gave Trieste to Italy. His name has a prophetic meaning: golden pen. He began writing while very young, but his true spirit did not find expression until, going to Florence to register at the university, he came in contact with the Voce group—which served as the spark that lighted his spiritual torch. At times he experienced a feeling of inferiority, coming as he did from a provincial town, finding himself placed on an equal footing with veterans, and suddenly precipitated into the current of the most advanced thought of Italy and the most daring streams of European art criticism. His contribution however was of the highest quality. He brought to the Voce a realistic knowledge of the complexities of Irredentismo; for the first time Italians were made aware of the complexity of the problem of Trieste, with its Slavic population and its economic rivalry with Venice. He also used his knowledge of German, acquired in an Austrian high school, to translate the Judith (1911) and the Tagebuch (1912) of Hebbel and to give the first critical appreciation of this tragic playwright in Italian. In addition, he had so completely entered into the spirit of the Voce that during an absence of Prezzolini (q.v.) he acted as editor of this periodical.

An idealistic love, ending tragically for some unknown reason in the suicide of his beloved, brought him near desperation and made him seek a refuge and solitude in the environs of Trieste, in a region called the Carso. He emerged from this emotional crisis with the book upon which rests his fame, Il Mio Carso (1912). It expresses the ideal of the generation of the Voce, which tried to find in the sincerity of autobiography an antidote to the rhetoric of D'Annunzio and to the infantilism of Pascoli (qq.v.). Il Mio Carso is a work in which deep poetic sentiment and crude realism are mingled in a spasmodic and tormented style which seems to take its tone from the harsh, arid, tense character of the region itself. Slataper viewed life and art as a conflict of forces, a token perhaps of the conflict within himself between his Slavic blood, his Italian culture, and his German education. The moral issue dominates all his work; he is an admirer of moral will, which explains his love for Hebbel, and of Ibsen (q.v.), about whom he wrote his doctoral dissertation (published by his professor, Arturo Farinelli, posthumously in 1916, though incomplete). The Lettere (1931) to three young women—one his first fiancée, the second his future wife, the third a friend—also published posthumously, show him as a young Galahad surrounded by admiration and love. Each woman is treated differently: terrifying love, presented with a certain amount of literary device, for the first, serious love and honest realism for his wife, and a certain friendly compassion for the third.

The lesser contributions, literary (Scritti letterari e critici, 1920), and political (Scritti politici 1925), made to the Voce, the Resto del Carlino, and, curiously enough, to a magazine for children, the famous Giornalino (of Luigi Bertelli), were dominated by the impulse or necessity of the moment.

For a brief period preceding the First World War he taught Italian in Hamburg at the Colonial Institute. His was a noble life. He successfully overcame numerous financial and political difficulties. His native city, where he had incurred the enmity of many of the inhabitants by speaking the truth, finally became reconciled to him after his heroic death on the field of battle. A street of Rome bears his name.

See: G. Stuparich, Scipio Slataper (1922).

G. P.

Ślonimski, Antoni (1895–, Polish poet, critic, and playwright), was born in Warsaw, the son of a distinguished Jewish physician. A bitter foe of bigotry, reaction, and especially of racialism, he was also one of the leading pacifists in Free Poland. As a cofounder of Skamander (see Polish Literature), Ślonimski stood at the forefront of the progressive intellectuals of his country. His weekly feuilletons in Wiadomości literackie (Literary News), appearing under the rubric "Weekly Chronicle," were notable for their common sense, cosmopolitan temper, and fearlessness, as were also his theatrical reviews in the same journal.

Besides several small volumes of verse, Słonimski wrote a number of satirical comedies, among these Wieża Babel (1927; The Tower of Babel); Murzyn warszawski (1928; The Warsaw Negro), a satire on the literary hack; Lekarz bezdomny (1931; The Homeless Physician); and Rodzina (1934; The Family), a brilliant take-off on "isms." A collected edition of Słonimski's poems was published in 1929. During the Second World War, Słonimski was active in Polish liberal circles in England; many of his articles appeared in Robotnik polski (The Polish Worker), and several volumes of his poetry were published, including Alarm (1940) and Popiół i wiatr (1941; The Ash and the Wind), a memoir of ruined Warsaw.

See: K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 307-316, 706-707; A. P. Coleman, New York Times Book Review, December 22, 1940, pp. 8, 18.

A. P. C.

Slonimski, Mikhail Leonidovich (1897-, Russian novelist and short-story writer), a son of an editor of Vestnik Yevropy, was born at Pavlovsk. After graduating from a Gymnasium, he enlisted in the army (1915), and two years later embarked on a literary career, subsequently identifying himself with a group of young writers who called themselves the Serapion Brothers (1921-1922). His impressionistic short stories of that period, which revealed Slonimski as a conscientious and talented artist, reflected the disorganization in human relations brought on by the war and the Revolution (Shestoi strelkovy, 1922; The Sixth Fusiliers). In Mashina Emery (1924; Emery's Machine) he first attempted to determine man's significance in an apparently meaningless world, an effort that undoubtedly prepared the ground for the first of his short novels, which deal with Soviet life, Lavrov (1927; The Lavrovs), the story of an intellectual who is unable to find his place in society. This book is also a milestone in Slonimski's transition from impressionism to psychological realism. Sredni prospekt (1928; The Middle Avenue), a tight novelette of intrigue, is an excursion into the world of NEP tradesmen demoralized through lack of social consciousness. With Foma Kleshni (1931) Slonimski returned to the characters of Lavrov, but the determined old Bolshevik Kleshni is less lifelike than the intelligentsia who surround him. After Povest o Leviné (1935; The Story of Leviné), a sketch of a leader of the Bavarian Communists, Slonimski reinterpreted some of his early material from a more constructive point of view (Proshchaniye, 1937; The Farewell). His Predsedatel gorsoveta (1943; The President of the Town Soviet), a collection of stories, deals with people caught in the stresses of the recent war.

See: R. Messer, "O tvorchestve M. L. Slonimskovo," Zvezda, 1932, No. 6, pp. 159-172; A. Gorelov, Put sovremennika; o tvorchestve Mikh. Slonimskovo (1933).

P. A. P.

Slovak literature (see also Czech literature). The Slovaks, a West Slavic nation of about two million, had no distinct literature of their own in earlier centuries but used Czech as their literary language. Their political fate was, however, very different from that of the Czechs: they never had a state of their own and after the destruction of the Great Moravian Empire about 900 formed a part of Hungary. Following the defeat of the Bohemians in the Battle of the White Mountain (1620), Protestantism was suppressed in Bohemia and Moravia. The more tolerant religious conditions of Hungary allowed Czech Protestant literature to continue in Slovakia. A case can even be made out for the statement that the Czech Protestant tradition was preserved in Slovakia. Slovaks writing in Czech certainly played a considerable part early in the 19th century in the Czech national revival. Jan Kollár (1793-1852), an important romantic poet and the founder of Pan-Slavism, and Pavel Josef Šafařík (1795-1861), the founder of Slavonic archaeology, both came from Slovak Protestant homes, wrote in Czech, and felt themselves to be members of the Czechoslovak nation. František Palacký (1798-1876), the great historian of the Czech nation, was born in Moravia, but received his education in Slovakia, which was then attracting Czech Protestants because of its greater religious freedom. A Catholic priest, Antonín Bernolák (1763-1813), had advocated writing in the West Slovak dialect and had found one practicing poet, a Protestant, Jan Hollý (1785-1849), who wrote dreary and extremely artificial imitations of Vergil and Homer in this language. But the movement had failed to take root. Slovak as a literary language was successfully established only in 1844, when L'udevít Štúr (1815-1856) and Jozef Miloslav Hurban (1817-1888), both originally Protestant clergymen, published an almanac, Nitra, in the Central Slovak dialect. Štúr developed and defended the language in theoretical writings, and soon gifted poets arose who used it with skill and success. Andrej Sládkovič (1820-1872), Samo Chalupa (1812-1883), Janko Král' (1822-1876), and Ján

Botto (1829–1881) are the outstanding names of a group of highly romantic poets. One good novelist, Ján Kalinčák (1822–1871), can be described as an early realist, a humorous observer of the life of Slovak peasantry and landed gentry.

The reasons for the “separation” from Czech are not far to seek: the Slovaks felt that the Czechs were politically impotent and that no help could be received from them. The use of the local dialect was recommended by good patriots as the best defense against the government-sponsored spread of the Magyar language. Theories about the peculiar value of every local dialect, and especially of Slovak which, according to some scholars, was supposed to be the original language of the Slavs, worked powerfully in the same direction. However deplorable the separation turned out to be from a political point of view, Slovak must be described as a full-fledged literary language; it is used on all stylistic levels for all purposes, even though it is extremely similar to Czech.

After the Austrian-Hungarian Compromise of 1867 the situation for Slovak writers for a time became worse. The Magyars made a determined attempt to eradicate the use of the language, especially for higher purposes. Schools conducted in Slovak were successively closed, and by 1914 there was no education in Slovak beyond the elementary level. Slovak literature was kept alive by a tiny band of enthusiasts who could appeal only to an extremely small reading public. During these worst years two important writers arose, Svetozár Hurban Vajanský (q.v.) and Hviezdoslav (q.v.). Hurban, with pro-Russian orientation and Pan-Slav romanticism, is most important as a novelist who, under the influence of Turgenev (q.v.), wrote fine pictures of the gentry society in Slovakia. Hviezdoslav is largely prominent as an epic poet, best in poems with local rural setting, who also wrote biblical dramas and translated Shakespeare into Slovak. His sympathies were with the Czechs, and his poetry shows the influence of his Czech contemporaries, Čech (q.v.) and Vrchlický (q.v.).

In 1898 a group of Slovak intellectuals founded a review called Hlas (The Voice). With democratic ideals and critical standards largely inspired by Tomáš Masaryk (q.v.), they opposed the romantic ideology and the placing of hope in Russia and in the local gentry. Independently of this critical group, the realist novel had found excellent practitioners in Slovakia. Martin Kukučín (pseud. of Matej Bencúr, 1860–1928) depicted Slovak life in extremely vivid sketches and short stories and later, when he had lived for years in Dalmatia and in South America, wrote ambitious novels on the problem of emigration. Dom v stráni (published serially in 1904, in book form in 1922; The House on the Slope), with its setting among the Dalmatian peasants, is his acknowledged masterpiece. Jozef Gregor Tajovský (1874–1946) and a woman writer, Timrava (pseud. of Božena Slančíková 1867–), wrote with realistic technique novels and stories which can be called critical and moral studies of Slovak village life. It was not until the early 20th century, and undoubtedly as a belated echo of Western European artistic movements, that a few Slovak poets turned away from didacticism and the depiction of Slovak reality and cultivated a purely personal art. Ivan Krasko (pseud. of Ján Botto, the younger, 1876–) is a refined, melancholy poet touched by the “decadence” of some Western Europeans, while Janko Jesenský (1874–1915) wrote harder, more intellectual and satirical poetry which escaped the conventions of rhetorical romanticism hitherto prevalent in Slovakia. But these were individuals without followers. On the whole, literary life in Slovakia up to 1918 was limited and provincial.

The liberation of the Slovaks and their union with the Czechs in 1918 wrought an almost miraculous change. Slovak suddenly became the official language of the country. A legal and learned terminology was developed. Slovak became the language of the schools from the lowest to the newly founded Comenius University at Bratislava. The reading public expanded so rapidly that Slovak books were published in editions almost 10 times the size of those before 1914. With the exception of strolling companies, no Slovak theatre had existed before the war, but now a national theatre was established at Bratislava and permanent theatres were opened elsewhere. Both poetry and the novel flourished. Poetry, under strong Czech and French influence, became especially diversified and highly cultivated. Among the older poets, two Protestant ministers, Vladimír Roy (1885–1936) and Martin Rázus (1888–1937), stood out. Roy, who had studied in Scotland, translated English poetry and wrote melancholy reflective verse. Rázus was a rhetorical, political writer who became prominent both as politician and as novelist. His novels and autobiography are in fact chronicles full of topical detail and political discussion rather than works of art. The best poetry in Slovak was written by two younger men, who had also studied Protestant theology; these two, Emil Boleslav Lukáč (1900–) and Jan Smrek (pseud. of Jan Čietek, 1898–), present, furthermore, a striking contrast to each other. Lukáč is strongly under the influence of French symbolist poetry (see French symbolism), especially that of Claudel (q.v.). His inspiration is religious, while his style is highly intellectual and even dialectical. Smrek is melodious, sensuous—even sensual—and glorifies the earth and its pleasures. Smrek in his later work shows the influence of Czech “poetism” which is also dominant in a group of younger poets of leftist political orientation, among whom Laco Novomeský (1904–) is the best known. With this group, which leans toward futurism, certain Catholic poets made another very sharp contrast. Two younger men, Rudolf Dilong (1905–) and Pavel G. Hlbina (pseud. of Pavel Gašparovič, 1908–), both priests, write distinguished verse which shows a knowledge of Březina (q.v.), Claudel, and Bremond (q.v.). Thus Slovak poetry reflects most of the modern movements and practices with competence and refinement the most diverse techniques.

The novel, which had been largely confined to a realistic analysis of life, also expanded after the First World War with a great variety of themes. An older writer, Ladislav Nadáš-Jégé (1866–1942), created the Slovak historical novel with Adam Šangala (1923), a picture of the 17th century; he also wrote less successful, erotic, society novels (e.g., Cesta životom, 1930, The Journey through Life). Petr Jilemnický (1901–), a Czech by birth who writes in Slovak, composed social novels of the conflict between the peasant and industry (e.g., Pole neorané, 1932, The Unplowed Field) or attempted pictures of Soviet Russia, which he knows from a two-year stay and whose creed he embraced fervently. Milo Urban (1904–) is possibly the most distinguished of the recent Slovak novelists. In three novels (Živý bič, 1927, The Living Scourge; Hmlý na úsvite, 1930, Fogs in the Dawn; V osidlach, 1939, Trapped) he is a critical chronicler of the Slovak village during and after the First World War. The picture of the struggle between the primitive mountaineers and the encroaching modern civilization is drawn by Urban without the usual false sentimentality toward the traditional forms of life. All these authors are, in principle, still within the bounds of realistic techniques. Such conventions are broken only by Gejza Vámoš (1901–), a physician, who is preoccupied with the pathology of the middle class and uses burlesque and expressionist techniques reminiscent of Vančura (q.v.). Two other genres, Slovak criticism and Slovak drama, lack distinction. Criticism is mostly dependent on Czech models, those of F. X. Šalda (q.v.) in particular, and the drama rarely goes beyond realistic comedies or moralizing treatises.

Up to 1918, then, Slovak literature had been constantly handicapped by the political oppression. And there had been no urban centers, no middle class except a rural clergy. The nation was sharply divided into Catholics and Protestants, into gentry and largely illiterate peasants. Literature emancipated itself only very slowly from romanticism and the romantic glorification of the primitive. Since 1918 conditions have changed in favor of a wider outlook and more varied themes, but the sudden expansion and the influx of ideas from abroad have had its dangers. Too many Slovak writers are closely dependent on analogous Czech developments. During the Second World War left-wing sympathizers like Petr Jilemnický and Gejza Vámoš went into exile. Others like Milo Urban adapted themselves. But literary life was almost at a standstill.

See: J. Vlček, Dejiny literatury slovenskej (1890, reprinted 1923); S. Krčméry, Prehľad dejín slovenskej literatúry a vzdelanosti (1920); D. Chrobák, Rukoväť dejín slovenskej literatúry (1932; 2d ed., 1936); A. Pražák, “Literatura slovenská,” in Československá vlastivěda, Vol. VII (1933); P. Selver, “The Literature of the Slovaks,” Slavonic Review, XII (1933–1934), 691–703; J. E. Bor, Poezia povojnového Slovenska (1934); A. Mráz, Povojnový slovenský román (1938).

R. W.

Snoilsky, Carl Grefve (1841–1903, Swedish poet), born in Stockholm, became a diplomat at the early age of 20. His career took him to Italy at the time of Risorgimento, and he was equally carried away by the splendor of the past and by the exploits of Garibaldi. A strain of Polish blood on the paternal side may help to account for his love of revolution. Aristocratic, vigorous, and healthily sensual, he reminds us of Byron: like his brilliant predecessor he was an intense lover of Italy and Spain, an ardent hater of political and social oppression. He is, however, a gayer, less egocentric spirit.

His Dikter (Poems), published in 1869, irradiated Swedish poetry with a joy of life that had been lacking since the time of Tegnér. The grandeur of Roman ruins, the voluptuous charm of Sorrento, the whole glowing pageant of “the land of the myrtle,” was caught up and carried to the North in the melody of his verse. Fortunately too he was an admirable craftsman, partly no doubt through the influence of Horace.

But although his early success was so starting, it seems probable (Sir Edmund Gosse to the contrary, notwithstanding) that there is more of enduring worth in his Sonnetter (1863-1873; Sonnets) and Svenska bilder (1886; Pictures of Sweden). The sonnets in particular are masterly, both in design and in execution. He continued to write lyrics and ballads throughout his life, changing to a more compressed and reflective style, with the accent on Sweden's martial achievements and on sympathy with the laboring classes. The mission of poetry, he believed, was to bring beauty to those most in need of it; he provides both the thrill of heroic romance and a high-hearted recognition of present-day humanity. There is a rousing trumpet note in his orchestration as well as the softer strains of flute and violin; he can be at once a Wagner and a Mozart.

See: C. W. Stork, Anthology of Swedish Lyrics (1917; revised and enlarged ed., 1930); F. Böök, Sveriges moderna litteratur (1921), also published as Vol. III of O. Sylwan, ed., Svenska litteraturens historia (1919-1921), pp. 47-65.

C. W. S.

Söderberg, Hjalmar (1869-1941, Swedish dramatist and writer of fiction), was born in Stockholm and studied for a short time at Uppsala. Beginning as a government clerk, he drifted for a time, interesting himself particularly in Anatole France (q.v.), whom he translated. He had a decided success with his first novel, Martin Bircks ungdom (1901; Eng. tr., Martin Birck's Youth, 1930), and later held the stage with his play Gertrud (1906), but it was in the very short story that he achieved a unique position. These stories, usually told in the first person, are at times sheer tragedies, after the manner of Maupassant (q.v.), but are more often realistic character sketches of penetrating humor. Their disarming simplicity conceals an art that can only be appreciated after many readings, for they sound hidden depths of human consciousness. Söderberg's first collection, Historietterna (1898; Little Histories), was followed by several others.

In mood the author is the complete skeptic. "I believe in the lust of the flesh and the eternal loneliness of the soul." But his skepticism is never bitter, as often with Anatole France. There is a cool detachment and impartiality about him. Above all he had a casual rightness of statement, which compels one to believe that everything happens exactly as he says. His favorite subjects are the helpless folk whom circumstances and their own weaknesses entangle in the cobweb filaments of life. But although, as with the modern French masters named, the irony of fate is much in evidence, there are other motifs in the stories of Söderberg. He can be droll, he can indulge in a fairy tale such as "The Accomplished Dragon." And he has a special gift of drawing philosophical conclusions from trivial occurrences, as in "The Cup of Tea," where he is put out of a restaurant for being the only one there not taking stronger drink.

The only regret of Söderberg's many admirers is that he wrote so little. In his later years he turned from fiction to studies of religion, of course in the skeptical vein. He will be remembered chiefly as the portrayer of Stockholm life at the turn of the century. For his particular type of short story, which is in some respects not unlike that of Katherine Mansfield, it would be hard to match him anywhere in modern literature.

See: J. Mortensen, Från Röda rummet till sekelskiftet (1919); C. W. Stork, tr., Modern Swedish Masterpieces (1923); H. A. Larsen, ed., Sweden's Best Stories (1928); Söderberg, Selected Short Stories, tr. by C. W. Stork (1935).

C. W. S.

Soffici, Ardengo (1879-, Italian artist, poet, and essayist), was born in Rignano, near Florence. After a long sojourn in Paris as an art student, Soffici returned to Italy and was soon a leading contributor to the Voce, the Florentine weekly that was to exert much influence on the subsequent trend of Italian cultural and political life. Through a series of lively articles Soffici made known the works of Degas, Cézanne, Renoir, Gauguin, Van Gogh, Matisse, Picasso, and others. The first exposition in Italy of Europe's most famous impressionists was organized by him.

Soffici really started as a French writer. A decade of Parisian life in artistic milieu and in the company of Guillaume Apollinaire (q.v.) had had a marked influence upon him. His first writings were contributions to periodicals like the Plume, Mercure, Occident, and above all the Soirées de Paris. Later Soffici abandoned his early futuristic sympathies for a gradual but steady return to his native Italian classical traditions. In his Italian writings there is almost no mention of his French literary activity. In Arlecchino (1914) and Giornale di bordo (1915), Soffici emerged as an attractive and varied Italian literary personality. Nothing he has written since can compare with these two works either in style or human feeling. Giornale di bordo is a sort of diary or log of his most intimate thoughts. Arlecchino describes Tuscan life in colors as rich and diverse as those on the palette of a painter. The reader accompanies the author on rambles through his beloved Tuscan countryside with nature at all seasons and in all moods. The artist-writer sees green skies, white rain, ashen clouds, orange shadows. He thrills at the fragrance of earth soaked by a heavy rain. He has a Baudelairian sensitivity to odors. No detail of his surroundings escapes him; in fact the small things are for him the great, significant things. The shining flight of an insect, a step in the night, a drop of water reflecting the sky: these are of utmost importance. Soffici writes: "I often feel too much of a poet to like poetry. Nature speaks to me so affectionately that the introduction of any art between me and nature seems to disturb, obscure and falsify our communion."

Reproached by critics for his many contradictory tendencies—he has been liberal and traditionalist, idealist and realist, provincial and cosmopolitan—Soffici retorts that his artistic vision has been sharpened by these contradictions, which, he feels, are characteristic of nature itself. The one permanent quality that permeates every work of Soffici is art. Even Kobilek (1918), the story of Soffici's experiences in the First World War, is an artistic experience rather than a military one.

See: G. Papini, Stroncature (1916), pp. 261–272; R. Serra, Le Lettere (1914); G. Prezzolini, Amici (1922), pp. 143–158; A. Baldini, Amici allo spiedo (1932), pp. 21–28.

P. M. R.

Søiberg, Harry (1880–, Danish novelist), was born in Ringkøbing on the North Sea coast of Jutland, went to sea as a mess boy, became a bookbinder, and a passionate socialist agitator. His first book, Syg Slægt (1904; Sick Generation), published when he was 24, is a not very effective drama. His next volume, Øde Egne (1906; Desolate Regions), a collection of short stories, revealed unusual ability to depict nature and to delineate moods and manners as observed in the frugal homes scattered among the sand dunes of the Jutland coast. In Folket ved Havet (1906; The People at the Sea), Søiberg is still surer of himself and succeeds in painting a realistic and colorfully vivid canvas of the fisher families and their deep affinity with the rough, stern scenery of the coast. Various minor works followed, and then De Levendes Land (1916–1920; The Land of the Living) appeared in the form of a cycle, describing, maturely and deftly, life in the region which Søiberg had chosen for his own. Here is the ancient struggle between broad humanitarianism and religious bigotry, between light and darkness, examined on the dual background of the roaring sea and the First World War. Again fishermen and their families are revealed in their hours of sorrow and joy, of suffering and pleasure, of economic worries, and constant religious friction. Søkongen (1926–1930; Eng. tr., The Sea King, 1928), a trilogy, follows in the main the same lines, but is more searching, more revealing, and more painstaking in psychological analysis. A number of shorter novels appeared between De Levendes Land and Søkongen, and also subsequently, but it is in these two works that Søiberg has so far attained the peak of his art. Although there might seem danger of monotony, Søiberg surprises by his ever deeper insight into the thoughts and the souls of the Jutland fishers and constantly finds something which no one else has discovered.

See: K. K. Nicolaisen, "Harry Søiberg," Illustreret Tidende, November 11, 1921; Helge Kjaergaard, Die dänische Literatur der neuesten Zeit (1871–1933) (1934).

G. St.

Sologub, Fyodor (pseud. of Fyodor Kuzmich Teternikov, 1863–1927, Russian poet and prose writer), was born in St. Petersburg, the son of a tailor. His father died when Sologub was still very young, and his mother was obliged to work as a maid for a well-to-do family. He was educated at the St. Petersburg Teachers' Institute and in 1882 began his career as a teacher. His first literary effort was published in 1884. In 1907 he retired from teaching and dedicated himself entirely to literature. Although Sologub remained aloof from the revolutionary movement of 1917, he stayed in Russia.

Sologub occupies a special niche among the symbolist writers. He was the oldest, in actual age, among them; he also was the first to receive public recognition as a symbolist poet. His poetry, combining realism with fantasy, is ultra-decadent in its themes, favoring motifs of self-deification, demonolatry, and glorification of pain and death. In style Sologub is a master of classical form, and it was this artistry that brought him recognition as a poet. Like his verse, his novels constantly counterpoise the real and the fantastic, thus suggesting the illusory quality of what one normally regards as the real. His prose masterpiece, Melki bes (1907; Eng. tr., The Little Demon, 1916), first published serially 1892–1902, is a brilliant satire that derives its effect from its symbolism. Peredonov, the name of its hero, became an adjective connoting all that was petty and base. Of Sologub's other novels, Tvorimaya legenda (published serially, 1908-1912; The Created Legend) deserves mention, as do Navii chary (1912; Phantom Charms) and Zaklinatel'nitsa zmei (1921; The Charmer of Snakes).

See: A. Gornfeld, "Fyodor Sologub," in S. A. Vengerov, ed., Russkaya Literatura XX veka, I (1914) 14-64.

O. M.

Solovyov, Vladimir Sergeyevich (1853-1900, Russian poet and philosopher), most brilliant of the many talented children of Russia's great historian, S. M. Solovyov, was born in Moscow and reared in a patriarchal, severely religious atmosphere. Related, on his mother's side, to the Ukrainian mystic philosopher Skovoroda, Solovyov began early to display a predisposition toward mysticism. Upon finishing the Fifth Moscow Gymnasium, he enrolled in the physico-mathematical faculty of the University of Moscow, but soon transferred to the historico-philological faculty. Although between 14 and 18 he had experienced a period of religious negation, by the time he was 20 he had evolved an anti-positivist, religious philosophy. His master's thesis on "The Crisis of Western Philosophy" reflected the influence of the Slavophiles and the Schelling-Hegelian school of Russian thought; of Schopenhauer and Hartmann, a blending of German philosophy with oriental mysticism; and, finally, of Plato.

In 1875, as docent of the University of Moscow, Solovyov went to England where, in the British Museum, he studied the mystical literature on Sophia, the Divine Wisdom of God. While in London, he saw a vision of Sophia who bade him travel to the Arabian desert, a summons he obeyed. Afterwards he traveled in Italy and France. In 1876-1877 he lectured at the University of Moscow and then went to St. Petersburg, where he delivered a series of public "Lectures on Godmankind." In 1880 he defended his doctoral thesis, "Critique of Abstract Origins," and became professor at the University of Moscow. Following the execution of the assassins of Alexander II in 1881, Solovyov delivered a public address condemning capital punishment and as a result was obliged to give up his professorial career. Thereafter he devoted himself to writing.

Solovyov's philosophical writings are voluminous and reflect his philosophical Welt- anschauung, yet they have had little influence on Russian literature proper. Not so his single volume of verse, Stikhotvoreniya (1891; 7th ed., 1921; Poems). His poetry, marked now by reflective profoundness, now by irreverent wit, conveyed his most intimate thoughts and his mystical interpretation of reality. The "younger generation" of symbolists—Bely, Blok, and Vyacheslav Ivanov (qq.v.)—accepted it as the revelation of a poet-prophet, and such a poem as "Mily drug, il ty ne vidish . . ." (Friend Beloved) became a testament for them. Poets who refused to accept the reality of the tangible world as the ultimate reality and sought justification for an irrational belief in another world found support of their beliefs in Solovyov's poetry. Sophia, the Wisdom of God (also the Eternal Feminine Soul), plays a vital part in the philosophy of Solovyov. To her he devoted his seventh lecture on Godmankind and Part III of his dissertation La Russie et l'Eglise universelle (1889). Sophia also appears as the Muse that inspires his poetry. Much of the poetry of both Alexander Blok and Andrei Bely is motivated by the symbol of Sophia, appearing as the Beautiful Damsel, or Russia, or under whatever other guise.

See: E. Trubetskoi, Mirosozertsaniye VI. Solovyova (2 vols., 1913); S. M. Solovyov, "Biografiya V. S. Solovyova," in V. S. Solovyov, Stikhotvoreniya, 6th ed. (1916).

O. M.

Sorel, Georges (1847-1922, French social philosopher), generally recognized as the outstanding theoretician of revolutionary syndicalism, was born in Cherbourg, of a typical bourgeois family. He entered the Ecole Polytechnique (1865) and became a highway engineer. In 1892, at the age of 45, he abruptly abandoned his profession in order to devote all his time to the study of social problems. His wife, who came from the working class, is said to have done much in bringing about this decision. When she died in 1897, Sorel retired to a modest villa at Boulogne-sur-Seine near Paris, to erect "a philosophical monument worthy of her memory."

By far Sorel's most famous book is his Réflexions sur la violence (1908; Eng. tr., Reflections on Violence, 1912)—a modified and enlarged version of several articles first published in the Italian Divenire sociale (1905) and in the Mouvement socialiste (1906-1907). This work offers a curious mixture of Proudhon's economic federalism, Marx's "catastrophic" interpretation of history, Nietz-sche's (q.v.) hero worship, and Bergson's (q.v.) definition of movement as an "indivisible whole." Progress and revolution, according to Sorel, follow a subconscious pattern. Only in action, rebellion, and violence do men discover what they want and why they fight. It is unfair, therefore, to expect from militant syndicalism a precise exposition of its aims and purposes. Militant syndicalism is not rooted in ideas. It constitutes one tremendous intuitive force, a genuine élan vital of unpredicted and unpredictable consequences, a spontaneous surge which draws its strength from and finds its symbolical expression in "myths" and "images" such as that of the general strike. Through the incentive of the general strike the workers' collective soul will rise to a "sublime" feeling truly consistent with the exalted mission of the proletariat. At the same time the bourgeoisie, vitally threatened and aroused from its unwholesome lethargy, will resist the growing aggressiveness of labor and undergo in turn a process of rejuvenation.

The startling fact about the Réflexions sur la violence is that it does not uphold a class theory. Sorel is much less preoccupied with the proletariat for its own sake than with the proletariat as the catalytic agent of a new social order to be brought about through a war of purification. Should labor weaken in its determination, the same end might still be sought and reached by means of the opposite policy—namely, by bolstering the fighting spirit of the bourgeoisie in order to rekindle the cooling ardor of the working classes. This willingness on Sorel's part to play one side against the other for what he sincerely considers the best interests of both explains to a large extent his many shifts and brazen contradictions. His early association with the parliamentary socialists did not survive the Dreyfus affair, the outcome of which, in his opinion as well as in that of Charles Péguy (q.v.), was a "complete moral anarchy" and a drowning in politics of the mystical victory that had been won (see La Décomposition du marxisme, 1908; La Révolution dreyfusienne, 1909). It was then (about 1898) that Sorel turned to the labor unions as to the standard-bearers of pure, uncompromising socialism (many articles of this period were gathered later in his Matériaux pour une théorie du prolétariat, 1919). However, the gospel of "holy violence" did not have the desired effect upon the workers, who seemed more intent on obtaining the immediate satisfaction of higher wages and better living conditions. In 1910 Sorel is found sympathizing with extreme conservatism in the person of Paul Bourget (q.v.) whose play, La Barricade, "transposed" the Sorelian creed for the benefit of the bourgeoisie. For several years he collaborated on the Revue critique des idées et des livres and on the short-lived Indépendance (1911–1913), side by side with confirmed nationalists and royalists (Léon Daudet, Charles Maurras, qq.v., Georges Valois, Jean Variot). In the late stages of his career he lavished equal praise on Lenin (see "Pour Lénine," appendix III to the 5th ed. of the Réflexions sur la violence, 1921), and on Mussolini whose blueprint of a corporate state was avowedly an extension of Sorelian syndicalism to all classes of society.

Throughout these metamorphoses Sorel maintained the fierce anti-intellectualistic attitude which, early in his crusade, inspired him to condemn Socrates' rationalism for having shaken the heroic traditions of Greece (Le Procès de Socrate, 1889). Pluto-democratic ideology, which tends to dissolve the class spirit, appeared to him equally vain and baneful (Les Illusions du progrès, 1908). All told, his vision of the world of tomorrow was that of a technician and a moralist. Sorel the engineer, far from being the enemy of industry and production, counted on man-made instruments to free us some day from the deterministic yoke of nature (Introduction à l'économie moderne, 1903, and "Les Préoccupations métaphysiques des physiciens modernes," Revue de métaphysique et de morale, Vol. XIII, 1905, reprinted in Charles Péguy's Cahiers de la quinzaine, 1907). Sorel the moralist—a moralist of almost puritanical mold—dreamed of injecting a high dose of spiritual energy into the material body of present-day civilization. How to moralize technology? That was the question. The multiplicity—or the debatability—of Sorel's answers should not hide from the historian's view the singleness of his purpose.

See: Gaëtan Pirou, Georges Sorel (1927); Jacques Rennes, Georges Sorel et le syndicalisme révolutionnaire (1936); Victor Sartre, Georges Sorel: Elites syndicalistes et révolution prolétarienne (1937); Rainer Heyne, "Georges Sorel und der autoritäre Staat des 20. Jahrhunderts," Archiv des öffentlichen Rechts, Neue Folge, Bd. 29 (1938), pp. 129–177, 257–309; Paul Delesalle, "Bibliographie sorélienne," International Review for Social History, IV (1939), 463–487; Simone Malvigna, "Il pensiero politico di Sorel e il fascismo," Rivista internazionale di filosofia del diritto, XIX (1939), 69–106.

Sorge, Reinhard Johannes (1892–1916, German dramatist and poet), born in Flüelen, Switzerland, went to school in Berlin. As a student in Jena he came under the influence of Richard Dehmel and Stefan George (q.v.), but was most deeply stirred by Nietzsche's Zarathustra (e.g., Gericht über Zarathustra; Vision, posthumously published, 1921). He found his peace in Rome, in his conversion to Catholicism. In 1916 he was killed in action. His first drama, Der Bettler (1912), which was honored by the Kleist prize, introduced and influenced the expressionistic movement on the German stage. It was followed, after Sorge's conversion, by religious mysteries, Guntwar, die Schule eines Propheten (1914), Metanoëite (1915), and König David (1915), and by Mutter der Himmel; Sang in 12 Gesängen (1915). Posthumously published were Mystische Zwiesprache (1922), Preis der Unbefleckten; Sang über die Begebnisse in Lourdes (1924), Der Jüngling: Die frühen Dichtungen (1925), and Nachgelassene Gedichte (1925).

See: W. Spaet, R. J. Sorge (1921); M. Rockenbach, R. J. Sorge (1923); S. Sorge, R. J. Sorge: Unser Weg (1927).

W. R. G.

Souday, Paul (1869–1929, French journalist and critic), born at Le Havre in Normandy, prepared to be a teacher, but chose instead a career of writing. As a reporter for the Temps he came into personal contact with many prominent writers. After essaying musical and dramatic criticism, Souday was appointed to the staff of Opinion, for which he edited the bimonthly "Chronique littéraire" (1908–1910). In 1912 he became official literary critic of the Temps, writing under the caption "Les Livres" (1912–1929). The two collections of essays published 1913–1914 were facetiously entitled Les Livres du Temps. A third volume appeared posthumously (1930). Souday also contributed shorter, front-page articles treating a variety of subjects. A fighting tone is apparent throughout all these works.

In 1927 Souday published an edition of Voltaire's Mémoires and Mélanges divers, containing the startling preface "Voltaire démiurge." The volumes Marcel Proust, André Gide, and Paul Valéry appeared shortly afterwards. A noteworthy book is La Société des grands esprits (1929), in the introduction to which the author significantly remarks: "I have contempt for Disraeli, because he would have preferred to be Alexander rather than Homer." The posthumous Dialogues critiques and a de luxe Liège edition of Bossuet (both 1929) close the series of Souday's publications. The battling critic died suddenly at the peak of his achievement. The sale of his library in March, 1930, brought to light an interesting correspondence with some of the most eminent writers of the day.

Souday fought relentlessly the conception of criticism as an inferior genre. The role of judgment was prominent in his criticism. His militant defense of intellectualism won for him the title "guardian of French culture." Ideologically Souday is a disciple of the 18th-century philosophes, with marked faith in the forces of civilization. Like Voltaire he turned against the Church, which he considered an obstacle to progress. In literature and art the critic had well-defined "adorations" and "abominations." His preference was undoubtedly for the chaîne classique. He accepted "essential" romanticism, which for him meant the rebirth of both the artistic and critical senses, i.e., Renan as well as Hugo. The "abominations" include all forms of what he called l'illusion mystico-sentimentale. Henri Brémont (q.v.) and "pure poetry" furnish an example: the mystical abbé defined poetry in terms of "ineffable realities." Souday contended that true art is a "construction" and that there is nothing "mysterious" about poetic genius.

See: R. Kemp, "Paul Souday parmi ses livres," Nouvelles littéraires, July 13, 1929; F. Ambrière, "Défense de Paul Souday," Mercure de France, CCXCIII (1939), 510–511.

G. M.

Soupault, Philippe (1897–, French poet, novelist, critic, and political analyst), born in Chaville near Paris, lived recently in Tunis where, in 1942, he was imprisoned by the Vichy authorities. After his liberation, he spent two years in the United States and is now back in France. The story of his prison days is related in his latest book, Le Temps des assassins (1945; Eng. tr., Age of Assassins, 1946).

The influence of Lautréamont, Rimbaud, and Apollinaire (q.v.) and his group, as well as Soupault's own disgust with "the bourgeois," led him to play a prominent role in the dadaist revolt and dictated his first poems, collected in Aquarium (1917) and Rose des vents (1920). But he and Breton (q.v.), already dissatisfied with negative dadaism, had just discovered the process of automatic writing, and their joint experiments, bringing forth Les Champs magnétiques (1921), engendered surrealism. Soupault, however, did not continue in that direction: his new collections of poems, Westwego (1922), Wang-Wang (1924), Georgia (1926), were not typically surrealist, and he soon devoted himself to the kind of "literature" he despised and wrote novels. Actually these never were anything but lyrical fictions through which Soupault sought to break man's essential bondage and free him from the prison of his personality. Dream, adventure, delusion, vice, even crime—such are the tools to which, in their supreme undertaking, turn the heroes of these fascinating books: Le Bon Apôtre (1923), a sort of "Dialogues de Soupault, juge de Philippe"; A la dérive (1923), the dream narrative of a restless, adventurous destiny; En joue (1925), the ironic satire of the shallow man of letters whose vain efforts at freeing himself lead to insanity; Le Nègre (1927), the nightmarish pursuit of a freedom ever denied by ancestral shackles; Les Dernières Nuits de Paris (1928; Eng. tr., Last Nights of Paris, 1929), the pseudo-detective hallucination whose villain and heroine is Paris herself, with her mysterious ensnaring rites that act like charms over her devotees. Soupault was now extending the scope of his inquest by studying, with powerful insight, those other artists whose creative efforts might also have been directed toward absolute emancipation: Henri Rousseau, le Douanier (1927); William Blake (1928; Eng. tr., 1928); Paolo Uccello (1929); Charlot (1931), the lyric image of that true adventurer of the screen, Charlie Chaplin; Baudelaire (1931); and Debussy (1932). More recently he published Souvenirs de James Joyce (1944) in the same vein.

Then, continuing his evolution, Soupault turned to politics. One who already, in his autobiography, Histoire d'un blanc (1927), had heralded the coming revolution, now looked at the world and took its pulse; he studied reports and statistics, wrote documented and sagacious articles, lectured, interviewed, reported. It was a weary world, full of anxieties, looking upward to its own liberation, not unlike the psychological world that had been Soupault's: he must have judged it worthy of his solicitude.

See: F. Ribadeau-Dumas, "Carrefour de visages: Philippe Soupault," Revue des revues, CLXXIV (1926), 268–273; L. Martin-Chauffier, "Présentation de Philippe Soupault," in Soupault, Histoire d'un blanc (1927), pp. 3–11; B. Crémieux, Inquiétude et reconstruction (1931), pp. 97–124; H. J. Dupuy, "Philippe Soupault, ou la Poésie spontanée," Renaissances, Vol. XVII (1945).

C. L. B.

Sousa Viterbo, Francisco, marquês de (1845–1910, Portuguese historian), was born in Oporto. After preparing himself for a medical career in Lisbon, he abandoned this profession in favor of historical investigation. In 1881 he became a professor in the School of Liberal Arts in Lisbon; illness forced him to relinquish his post in 1901, though he continued to do scholarly work until the time of his death. He was interested in many aspects of history, archaeological, literary, biographical, musical, geographic. In all these fields he collected rich materials with methodical care. Despite the fact that he lacked broad historical vision and, by temperament, shunned dramatizations and interpretative syntheses in the manner of Oliveira Martins (q.v.)—Viterbo's work represents a cautious reaction against the dangers of the arbitrary criticism and hasty generalizations of that writer—he was much more than a mere exhumers of data. His prefaces, notes, and commentaries give evidence of a clear conception of historical values, in addition to a delicate sensibility, already evident in his youthful literary works. His work is extensive and varied; enormous masses of documents and data overlooked by archivists were saved by him from destruction. In addition to his biobibliographical works on Camões, Damião de Góis, Friar Luis de Sousa, et al., his most solid contributions include the work on nautical history, Trabalhos náuticos dos portugueses nos séculos XVI e XVII (2 vols., 1890–1894; Nautical Works of the Portuguese in the 16th and 17th Centuries), which served to revive interest in the history of the discoveries of the Portuguese navigators, and the Notícia de alguns pintores portugueses e de outros . . . que exerceram a sua arte em Portugal (3 vols., 1903–1911; Notes on Some Portuguese Painters and Others . . . Who Practiced Their Art in Portugal), which stimulated the investigation of the history of national art. His studies on the history of industrial trades (ofícios industriais) has been called an "epic of national work."

See: V. Ribeiro, Sousa Viterbo e a sua obra (1915); F. de Figueiredo, História da literatura realista, 1924 ed., pp. 296–301.

E. G. D.

Sova, Antonín (1864–1928, Czech poet and novelist), ranks after Machar (q.v.) and Březina (q.v.) as the most prominent poet of the generation which began writing in the 1890's and achieved fame and maturity in the early 20th century. Sova was an impressionist who, especially in his later work, used many of the techniques of symbolism. He was born at Pacov (southern Bohemia), the son of a schoolteacher, and entered the service of the Prague Municipal Library, of which he became director late in his life. He died in his native town, after suffering long from a spinal affliction.

Sova started his writing career with realistic sketches in verse and with little landscapes somewhat in the style of Coppée (q.v.), but he soon turned to an introspective lyricism in which he gave expression to the struggles, conflicts, and tragedies of a highly sensitive soul. Possibly his best work can be found in the collections of intimate lyrics (e.g., Zlomend duše, 1896, A Broken Soul, or Lyrika lásky a života, 1907, Lyrics of Love and Life) in which the poet also hints at the tragedy of his unhappy married life. These are mostly song-like verses full of sensitive observations and analyses, with only slight attempts at symbolic implications. This personal poetry, which continued as an undercurrent until the death of Sova, was, at least in the public mind, overshadowed by Sova's increasingly ambitious attempts at symbolist poetry, at grandiose visions and cosmic meditations, written in free verse in a style somewhat resembling the hymns of Verhaeren (q.v.). Ještě jednou se vrátíme (1900; We Shall Return Again), especially the section "Údolí nového království" (The Valley of the New Kingdom), expresses best his generous hopes of a utopian future of humanity; other collections (e.g., Krvácející bratrství, 1920, The Bleeding Brotherhood) voice the poet's faith in democracy and universal socialism. These visions shade off imperceptibly into a considerable mass of political hymns and invectives. The best-known poem ("Theodoru Mommsenovi," 1897) is Sova's sharp answer to the German historian Theodor Mommsen, who had recommended breaking the hard Czech skulls, but much of Sova's work on these themes is rhetorical and even dull. Sova also wrote distinguished ballads in the tradition of Czech folk poetry (Kniha baladická, 1915; A Book of Ballads) and a considerable body of prose, which suffers, however, from excessive lyricism and descriptiveness. Among the novels, Ivův román 1902; Ivo's Romance) is the study of an unhappy weakling, Výpravy chudých (1903; The Campaigns of the Poor) depicts the poet's struggles against poverty and indifference in a slight fictional disguise, and Toma Bojar (1910) attempts a social theme from peasant life in his native district. Sova's finest work in prose is found in the bitter short stories O milkování, lásce a zradě (2 vols., 1909; Of Flirting, Love, and Betrayal). Sova was primarily a man of feeling, a poet of the most delicate, evanescent shades of emotional conflicts, a sensitive painter of landscapes as states of his mind. He is at his best in traditional song forms, in melancholy meditations, in the "flowers of intimate moods" as he called one of his first collections, Květy intimních nálad (1891). His ambition led him into the poetry of ideas, forced him to take the role of a national prophet; but he failed, for his social and religious outlook was vague and too dependent on his shifting emotions. Sova, the original enemy of Parnasian eloquence and bombast, the master of small forms, was seduced into attempting prophetic poetry which turned all too frequently into blurred and even empty rhetorical exercises. But Sova's mastery of nuance, the delicate melody of his early pieces, the sensitive impressionism of his landscapes, have inspired much later verse—like that of S. K. Neumann (q.v.)—and constitute an important contribution to the body of Czech poetry.

See: F. X. Šalda, "A. Sova," in Duše a dílo (1913), and A. Sova (1924); L. N. Zvěřina, A. Sova (1919).

R. W.

Spanish literature. Spanish romanticism had a meteoric existence, swift and dazzling. By about 1850 its fire had gone; Larra and Espronceda had died, and the two great survivors of the romantic generation, the duque de Rivas and Zorrilla, simply prolonged for some years themes and attitudes of greater perpetuating than creative force. Already at the apogee of the romantic period certain writers of only ordinary aesthetic stature, the so-called costumbristas—Mesonero Romanos and Estébanez Calderón were the most prominent—had sown, in their articles about customs and in their partial descriptions of the society of their day, the seeds of realistic art. Towards 1850 Fernán Caballero utilized these fragmentary visions of the realistic to form something more complex and inclusive, evolving the novel of customs from the scattered costumbrista material in the articles and coupling for the first time in Spanish literature of the 19th century the novel and realism—an alliance destined to be mutually inspiring.

There begins then, thanks to Fernán Caballero and to Pedro de Alarcón (q.v.), the ascendant curve of the realistic view of life and literature. The complete triumph of this tendency is seen from 1875 to 1885, the great realistic decade. During this period were published El escándalo (1875), El niño de la bola (1880), and La pródiga (1882) of Alarcón; El sabor de la tierruca (1881) and Sotileza (1884) of José María de Pereda (q.v.); Doña Perfecta (1876), Gloria (1877), Marianela (1878), and Lo prohibido (1884-1885) of Benito Pérez Galdós (q.v.); Pepita Jiménez (1874), Doña Luz (1879), and Las ilusiones del Doctor Faustino (1875) of Juan Valera (q.v.); Un viaje de novios (1881) and La tribuna (1883) of Emilia Pardo Bazán (q.v.); Marta y María (1883) and José (1885) of Armando Palacio Valdés (q.v.); a considerable portion of the Humoradas and Pequeños poemas of Ramón de Campoamor (q.v.); Gritos del combate (1875) and La pesca (1884) of Gaspar Núñez de Arce (q.v.). In these works, taken as a whole, Spanish realism is completely represented; no essential characteristic is lacking. In the realm of literary theory also this decade witnessed the appearance of two works of paramount importance: La cuestión palpitante (1883; originally a series of newspaper articles) of Pardo Bazán, in which there is brought forward for public discussion the problem of artistic realism, and the Poética (1883) of Campoamor, in which this artist brings dangerously near to one another, within the realm of theory, the concepts of poetry and prose. There is repeated in Spain that phenomenon of the apparently inevitable attraction between the realistic view of life and the novelistic genre. The period produces an abundance of novels and novelists with varying tendencies. Since the 17th century, Spanish literature had not considered the world and man as subject matter worthy of novelistic treatment with the attention and intensity which characterize that era, Fernán Caballero, as successful pioneer, Alarcón, Pereda, and Valera are the top-ranking authors here. The Spanish realistic novel itself seems conditioned by strict laws of place and time. It is always a regional and local novel. Pereda shuts himself in the mountains of Santander, as did his forbears of the first century; there he erects a vigorously regionalistic novel and on these heights raises the banner of a mountaineer conception of life. Galdós, at first glance apparently more national in outlook, cannot conceal his special predilection for the Madrilenian and the Castilian; more than any other writer he is the costumbrista of the Madrid of the 19th century, and this characteristic always complements the human quality of his novels. Valera, a man accustomed to living in foreign lands, nevertheless almost always chooses for the scenes of his novels his native Andalusia. So the realistic novel is an enormous storehouse of landscapes, types, and customs of the different regions of Spain; the realistic novelists involuntarily present us with a copious inventory of the elements of Spanish reality, both those which lend themselves to the most casual observation and those which best adapt themselves to detailed description. Pardo Bazán observed of their work in its totality that "they are writing the poem of modern Spain." Indeed by obeying on occasion too servilely the law of the time in which it flourished, the Spanish realistic novel risked the loss of permanent values and in many instances devoted itself too much to the multifarious social and political problems of the moment.

Even more than from disunion, Spain was suffering then from the uprooting of political and social ideals; during the 19th century, civil war never ceased except in appearance and for brief periods. And the realistic novel had its own civil war, centered especially on the clerical problem. The influence of the institutions of the Catholic Church on the life of society and the individual is the theme of this discord. One group—Alarcón, Pereda, and later a novelist of less imposing stature, Padre Luis Coloma (q.v.)—defends the position of the Church passionately and unreservedly. Another group, of which Galdós (otherwise a spirit of profound religious sentiment) becomes the leader, attacks the Church position with equal oversimplification, scant reserve, and no less passion. Both of these attitudes should be respected for the element of good faith and earnest desire for the truth that they contained. But it is questionable whether all the polemics and politics have been aesthetically absorbed and advantageously assimilated by novelistic art. In a majority of cases such issues weaken or render entirely impossible the artistic functioning of the novelistic organism and prevent its attaining a result which is general, human, and not restricted to any period. Valera indeed, as a notable exception, was able to escape the tendentious, defending the novel, in his works and in his essay Apuntes sobre el nuevo arte de escribir novelas (1886-1887), as a simple work of art and amusement. And Galdós in his later years as a novelist rises far above the limited critical position of his début. Poetry too, like the novel, often descended to the merely timely and circumstantial. Campoamor, in his Doloras, Pequeños poemas, and Humoradas, throws wide the gates to realism and surrenders unconditionally. The themes and the petty little people of so-called everyday life, sentimentalism in its most conventional form, current skeptical intellectualism, and universally comprehensible and nugatory pragmatic formulas are the worst ingredients of his poetic realism. Núñez de Arce makes naturalistic use of description and sometimes appears to let his poetry be dominated by the current political ideology. Standing apart and on the heights, like an element of less density, without realistic deadweight, is the poetry of Gustavo Adolfo Bécquer (q.v.), a solitary and tender romantic voice, remote from the commonplaces of Campoamor and the supplicatory verse of Núñez de Arce. Bécquer's lyric poetry, the expression of a refined romanticism, flowers strangely in this generation. His verse and some verse like it, e.g., that of Rosalía Castro (q.v.) and her imitators, should be considered not only as a belated expression of romanticism but as a harbinger of lyric currents of the present day, transmitting romantic sensibility from century to century.

There were comparable tendencies in the theatre. There was a realistic theatre, concerned with the problems of contemporary society, even before the realistic novel had been completely elaborated. From 1856 to 1863 there were presented in Madrid El tejado de vidrio (1856), El tanto por ciento (1861), and El nuevo don Juan (1863) of Adelardo López de Ayala (q.v.), works of observation of daily life which, although sometimes written in verse, are the very antithesis of poetry. Another noteworthy dramatist, Manuel Tamayo y Baus (q.v.), follows a parallel road in La bola de nieve (1856), Lo positivo (1862), and Lances de honor (1863). But Tamayo is also the author of dramas such as Locura de amor (1855) and Un drama nuevo (1867) in which logical construction does not exclude pure romantic sentiment. And the great dramatic figure of the period, José Echegaray (q.v.), carries human passions as the motivating forces of dramatic action, as well as a deliberate striving for effects, to heights at least as exalted as those of the romantics of 1840. Not even in the midst of realism can the theatre of objective observation and analysis produce notable works free of the great poetic and romantic stage tradition of the Spanish past. The authors of the second half of the 19th century do not succeed in really interrupting the influence of the romantic theatre, and in fact their works—picturesque, replete with theatrical effects and dazzling metrical form—constitute a link between the romantics and the verse dramatists of the 20th century.

The relation of Spanish realism to European realism of the same period, especially in the novel, is a highly controversial matter. For some this relationship is extremely close.

Pereda, on the other hand, was almost insulted that one should connect him with anything foreign. Today it is hard to believe that the Spanish novel of the 19th century was an entirely national form of art, surrounded on all sides by the vast expanses of European realism but miraculously saved from any contact with it. But neither can it be considered simply as an offshoot of foreign realism and a faithful imitator of alien accomplishments. With the picaresque novel in the 17th century, Spain had already opened the first laboratory of realistic technique in the novel, and many foreigners had learned much there. But it is certain that Spanish fiction of the more recent period under discussion is neither archaic—save in rare instances, as with Pereda or Estébanez Calderón—nor merely the result of importations. Faithful to a deep-seated and ancient voice of its own, it harmonizes this with the choir of European voices of its period, from which it draws something and to which it in turn makes contribution. A characteristic difference from French naturalism (q.v.) and its devotees is found in the reluctance, even the utter unwillingness, of many Spanish novelists to make their novels a literary projection of the prevailing European convictions about determinism, positivism, the promise of experimental science. The Spanish writer does with what he has before him as contemporary French authors are doing: he observes it and describes it. But as soon as he treats of psychological reality and the intimacies of the soul, he draws away from the French school and paints a human being more varied in his reactions. Religious faith, confidence in free will, a vital spontaneity, and anti-nihilism are found in many Spanish novelists along with the most orthodox, realistic conception of novel writing. Thus is to be explained Zola's (q.v.) amazement at the fact that Pardo Bazán, militant follower of naturalism, was at one and the same time a sincere Catholic.

From 1885 to the end of the century signs of malaise and omens of change are discernible in the apparent aesthetic unanimity of realism. Even among those who accepted it there is weariness with the positivistic view of humanity; the horizons are scanned in search of beacons. Almost all the great novelists ended their careers in the last years of the century, or early in the following, with their eyes turned in new directions. Thus there is Galdós in Nazarín (1895) and in Halma (1895) immersing himself in pseudo-mystic subtleties, attenuating his characters until they are mere shadows. Pardo Bazán is no longer the same writer of vigorous realism and in La quimera (1905) and La sirena negra (1908) allows herself to be seduced by the excesses of spiritual decadence. What realism there is in Valera turns into hyperborean mists in the last and strangest of his novels, Morsamor (1899). During these years Palacio Valdés, wisely aware that something in the realistic mechanism had failed to function, enhances his fame and personal influence by abandoning the naturalists' essential pessimism and by turning to what is more moderate and tranquil. The same thing occurs in the theatre. There are echoes of Ibsenism (see Ibsen, Henrik) in Echegaray and Galdós. And although in lyric poetry the first dissenting voices come from across the seas, already some Spaniards—Ricardo Gil and Salvador Rueda (qq.v.)—emphasize the distance which separates them from the reigning poetry of Campoamor and Núñez de Arce. Clarín (pseud. of Leopoldo Alas, q.v.) lives with perhaps more intensity than anyone else the spiritual upheaval of these times; he feels himself between two worlds, neither of them his. After having paid tribute to the naturalistic technique in one of the best Spanish novels in this genre, La Regenta (2 vols., 1884–1885), he turns to new interests. In his essays everything becomes a complaint against barrenness, a censure of Spanish isolation, and an appeal for foreign influences. He notes the absence of "lyric rapture" and begs that "the windows be thrown wide to the four winds of the spirit." And in this complaining and longing attitude, this fugitive from realism clasps hands with Angel Ganivet and Miguel de Unamuno (qq.v.), those two harbingers, pioneer architects of the future. Of unequalled importance in the betterment of Spanish spiritual life is the silent and austere work of the Institución Libre de Enseñanza, guided by the lofty spirit of Francisco Giner de los Ríos (q.v.) and continued until our time by his pupils, among whom Manuel B. Cossío (q.v.) is conspicuous. Without being directed to the strictly literary element of Spanish culture, Giner's labors for the refinement of sensibility exerted an influence on some of the most illustrious writers of these years and gave a great impetus to literary renovation.

General chronology and literary chronology coincide in Spain in 1900: a new century begins and a new literature is initiated. The 20th-century writers bring to literature a marked desire for a rebirth. They are customarily considered in terms of "the Generation of 1898" and "modernism." Both terms are exact and representative of quite different but by no means mutually exclusive tendencies. With few exceptions all of these writers are somewhat '98 and somewhat modernist; only the proportion varies. Thus considered, in the interplay of the two impulses the writers of these decades transcend the limitations of any literary school; they represent a new attitude on the part of all Spanish artists and intellectuals, a new view of spiritual problems such as press them with urgency at this time. A new manner of thinking runs parallel with a new manner of feeling; there comes, inevitably, a new manner of writing. The new mission, Azorín (q.v.) affirms, is to refine Spanish sensibility. José Ortega y Gasset (q.v.) defines it as learning to think more sternly, more austere. Ramón del Valle-Inclán's (q.v.) motto is to write with more artistry and charm. The novelty and richness of the literature of the 20th century come from an infinite variety of elements which in their fusion produce a literary spirit much more complex, profound, and refined than that of the preceding generation.

By "the Generation of 1898" Azorín designated a group of writers who appeared at the turn of the century and who represented the vehement desire for a profound renewal in the national spirit. In his novel La voluntad (1902) Azorín is already clearly conscious of the "Generation." In 1913, in his book Clásicos y modernos, he offers this designation to literary history in three articles, tracing the genesis and early development of the movement. Some have even questioned its existence. It does seem, however, that the formula or the concept corresponds exactly to a patently clear reality and that it is historically authentic and extremely useful in the comprehension of recent Spanish literature. Ganivet, Unamuno, Jacinto Benavente (q.v.), José Martínez Ruiz (Azorín), Pío Baroja (q.v.), Antonio Machado (q.v.), and, on a plane of inferior literary value, Ramiro de Maeztu (q.v.) constitute the first group of the Generation. Some years later Ortega y Gasset and Ramón Pérez de Ayala (q.v.), notwithstanding certain new tonalities in their work, maintain faithfully the essential spirit of the Generation of 1898, which is prolonged until the present day by some of the latest writers.

Nothing of importance occurs in Spanish literature during that eponymous year, that famous '98. But in the national history it is the year of the "disaster," of Spain's defeat in the war with the United States and the loss of her last overseas colonies. Through the gaping fissure opened in the self-satisfied and complacent bourgeois society of the Regency there enters the national consciousness a powerful gust of spiritual excitement, of restlessness, discontent, and disillusion, which influences the young men, impelling them toward a common motive for action—the good of Spain. The national tragedy functions as a lens, catching the spiritual energies of the new writers and joining them in concentrated form on a single, shining focal point, lo español. For that which distinguishes the “man of ’98” is that he thinks Spain, feels Spain, and loves Spain over and above all his other activities, converting it into a completely preferred subject of mental preoccupation, making it the measure of his art, of his life. “Spain is undiscovered,” writes Unamuno. The Generation passes through two stages, two moods. One, which is not lasting, immediately follows the disaster: in evidence are seemingly discouraged souls, apparently languid wills, and certainly pitiless criticism of lo español. This critical attitude is to be seen in Unamuno, Azorín, and Maeztu in their youthful years. Their devotion to Spain clothes itself in ascetic and disciplinary garb; they castigate the very flesh of the native country—precisely because they aspire to a high spiritual perfection and believe this is the best approach. Already in 1902 Azorín understood the tragic necessity of his generation, the need to consider sternly what they loved most: “perhaps this ferocious analysis of everything is necessary for a synthesis in the more or less near future.” But in a few years this manner, only apparently negative, evolves, and notes of affection, esteem, admiration, are heard. Ortega y Gasset says, “Having disowned one Spain we are now in the honorable course of finding another.” Azorín interprets tenderly and skillfully the classic authors whom he formerly fustigated. The tonal pessimism of the first stage reveals its motives; there is an almost amorous contemplation of Spain, and one feels the deep devotion to her essential qualities.

A generation of questioners, the favorite queries of these writers were: “Where is Spain?” “What is Spain?” “What is the Spanish soul?” They were a generation of searchers too. The men of ’98 set out like quixotic knights-errant in search of the Spain of Dulcinea, the ideal, and were scornful of the material Spain of Aldonza. How and where to find it? One route they rejected, that of the official Spain of the immediate past; its political forms and conventional patriotism constituted an unreal, an untrue Spain, said Ortega. The right way is quite another. Introspection becomes important. Appearances are to be shunned; one must penetrate deeply in search of essentials. Unamuno utters the cry “Within!” and formulates his theory of tradition: this is not to be found in the superficially historical, in the conventionally great deeds of illustrious men, but resides in the historical substrata, conveyed from century to century by the millions of humble beings who live in the fields and villages unmindful of the vain rumblings of historical “events.” Those of the Generation of 1898 treat Spain as though they were before a palimpsest; scornful of the visible writing they search in the parchment for the first, original, unadulterated, secret message.

They show a predilection for certain permanent themes. They write of a Castile unadorned, naked, and clean, nearer to the eternal in its almost complete lack of changes through the years. The limitless landscapes without habitation are meant to explain mystic longings and quixotic eagerness, “the land with a soul.” The small villages, not contaminated yet by modernity, seem to be standing still, on the fringe of the historic. The humble folk repeat the attitudes of an ancient humanity. The people and the land appear as the unconscious treasurers of the purest Spanish spirit. And the essentially Hispanic leads to the essentially human. The ardor of these men of the Generation of 1898 indeed suggests characteristics of religious life and feeling; they live like the ascetics of a Spanish humanity. This devotion to Spain has nothing of the exaggeratedly patriotic, political, or materialistic in its make-up. They expressly abominate these things. Unamuno, at the conclusion of his essay on Spanish tradition writes: “Man is what we must search for in our souls . . . eternal tradition is universal, cosmopolitan.”

Another characteristic of the Generation seems at first glance to be a contradiction—their definite Europeanism. But to be a European is a correlative mandate to being a Spaniard; “Spain is undiscovered, and can be discovered only by Europeanized Spaniards.” To be a European is to be receptive to modern currents of thought, to breathe the air of the world with European lungs, to live in a space that is broad and without frontiers. This the men of ’98 determined to do. There can be noted a radical difference in their devotion to Spain when it is compared with the romantic attitude, as seen in Rivas and Zorrilla, for example, who were distrustful of foreign things and hostile to them, or with the realistic position of such writers as Alarcón, Pereda, even Galdós. The men of ’98 read European literature; they brought to Spain what they considered the best elements of it and lived a life doubly rich and intense. Unamuno was an indefatigable reader of the great literatures; Ortega y Gasset was in the very center of the great currents of the European thought of the day.

This "bilateralism" has other aspects. The Generation couples a sense of aristocracy and spiritual distinction, an abhorrence of the commonplace, with profound devotion to pure folk elements. What is scorned and excluded is a plebeian intellectual mediocrity related to social and official mediocrity. The literature of the men of '98 is never crude or commonplace, no matter how many popular elements it absorbs, and never vaporous or artificial, no matter to what heights it aspires. And there is an analogous bilateralism in the capacity of these writers for utilizing precise observation, minute details, for "strolling and observing" in order to attain spiritual power in the literary product; in the essays of Azorín fineness of line and realistic exactitude account for surprising spiritual effects. There also coexist a highly primitive love for the Middle Ages—El poema del Cid, Juan Ruiz (by virtue of considering this period as nearest the fountainhead of the purely Spanish element)—and a passion for modernity, the exaltation of the very latest European writers.

The scrutinizing zeal, the spiritual tenseness of the Generation, are projected predominantly in the essay and in a new kind of lyricism. From the extended essay, such as Unamuno's Del sentimiento trágico de la vida (1913) and Ortega y Gasset's España invertida (1922), to shorter and more various forms, the essay is the genre most favored by the new writers. It serves as a vehicle for the most intellectual element, for the critical attitude embraced in the phrase, of Nietzschean origin, "the reexamination of values." There are essays which are pure confession, an examination of conscience, in an ardent confidential tone, such as the best of Unamuno's; others are more objectively critical, or they are didactic and aspire on a lofty plane to renovate the intellectual repertory of Spain, such as many of those of Ortega y Gasset and of Azorín. A third type of essay brings certain branches of technical knowledge within reach of the lay reader and injects into literature scientific ideas and experimental attitudes (e.g., the essays of the doctors, Gregorio Marañón et al.). The essay of this period in all its varieties is directed toward a vast public, offered not only in magazines but in the daily papers—always with a certain dignity of tone and rarely with any excessive simplification.

Some of the best pages of literary Spanish of today are to be found here. And the spiritual urge, the interior force which animates the new generation, overflows the essay and ends inevitably in lyricism. Lyricism vibrates in the prose of a man of such intellectual vigor as Ortega y Gasset, and a great essayist such as Unamuno is a true lyric poet. As will be seen, there is a parallel current in modernism.

The spiritual attitude of the time did not leave any comparable imprint on the theatre or the novel. Pío Baroja, the best and most prolific novelist of the 20th century, has quickened greatly the plodding pace of the narrative art of the realistic period. His straightforward and vivid descriptions give evidence of a much more personally selective vision; but there remains apparent in his work a predominance of the realistic conception of the novel and an ideology subservient to the scientific attitude and to the pessimistic conclusions characteristic of realism. Pérez de Ayala, Azorín in some curious attempts, and Valle-Inclán have indeed transcended, sometimes decisively, the novelistic formulas of the 19th century. In the case of the theatre, Benavente figured conspicuously during the first years of the new movement, and his sharp criticism of the bourgeois milieu and his technique of elegant naturalness set him apart as a powerful new force. Then he draws away from the attitude of rebellion maintained by his companions and conforms more and more to average taste. The brothers Serafín and Joaquín Álvarez Quintero and Carlos Arniches (qq.v.) maintain a realistic tradition in their best works without seeking innovations, although they may consciously assume attitudes of a popular cast in the manner of the Generation of 1898. Valle-Inclán, of energetic dramatic temperament, charged his admirable "esperpentos" and dialogued works with drama, but did not succeed in creating what could be called, strictly speaking, a theatrical work. There flourishes widely and with numerous variations a verse theatre, almost always an offshoot of the romantic theatre, devoted to national historic themes. Its ablest exponent is Eduardo Marquina (q.v.), and it continues more recently with José María Pemán.

With regard to literary style, the Generation has certain definite aims—sobriety, graveness of tone, restrained ardor. Its refinements, and it has them, are not flaunted in the modernistic manner. Fleeing from the pomp and glitter of oratorical prose, these men preserve a natural elegance; they find the distinction and patrician quality of their style, paradoxicalcally, "by immersing themselves in the common people," as Unamuno advised. Instead of the descriptive technique of the realists, who are loosely inclined to set down all they behold, the men of '98 use a descriptive method which deals with essentials, which operates through the delicate selection of detail and through propriety and skill in designations. Just as they search behind the apparent forms of Spanish reality for the soul of Spain, so in their descriptions of persons and places one senses beneath (as in the essays of Gabriel Miró, q.v., and Azorín) a delicate tremor which indicates the presence of something deeper and more abiding.

Before Azorín had coined the name Generation of 1898, it was customary to designate the new literature of the 20th century as "modernism" and its practitioners as "modernists." But it is necessary to distinguish, as already indicated, even though there is cross-fertilization. Modernism is, in its origin, more Hispanic American than Spanish. It was the reigning and resounding literary modality in all Hispanic America from approximately 1890 to 1910. The young Hispanic American writers of that time were dissatisfied with the academic conventionalism of the period which was stifling the poetic spirit; from nonconformity they progress to rebellion, from rebellion to the establishment, as opposed to the discredited casticista regime, of something quite new. Their modernism makes its appearance as a mass of explorations, discoveries, and conquests relative to the basic concept of literature and its language, particularly that of poetry. It is the result of a skillful appropriation of various foreign literary currents of the 19th century, principally French, and of the fusion of these diverse elements into a happy synthesis. This work was carried out by a group of poets, scattered over the vastness of all Hispanic America, from the Río Grande to the Plata, who, though separated and not guided by any previously reached agreement, moved in unison. They were impelled by the force of a true spirit of the times, mysteriously shared, which had as its aim the regeneration of Spanish poetry.

The new modernistic sensibility is complex. A parade of opulent aesthetic splendor is harmonized with an affected simplicity in the Pre-Raphaelite manner. Refinement is sought in all its forms. The history of art is retraced in search of beauties already perfected; the hope is to duplicate these in the new literature, which thus takes on many reflected tonalities. Conventional morality becomes outmoded. A show is made of sensuality; it is paraded in affected postures and, in order to be more enticing, is insidiously combined with a refined sentimentalism. There results a brilliant préciosité, both in art and in living. A greater contrast to the mediocrity and commonplaceness of the Spain of the Regency could not be imagined.

The modernists dipped into the vast repertory of poetic concepts and language of the French and, to some extent, of the American lyric—Victor Hugo, the Parnassian school, Verlaine (q.v.), the decadents, Poe, Whitman. The complexities of the modern foreign lyric act to refine Spanish poetic language, bringing to it graces and subtleties that it had not known for centuries. Certain verse and strophic forms, the alexandrine, the enneasyllabic, the pareado, the ballad, are taken from the French; free verse perhaps owes more to North American poetry. Casal and Martí in Cuba, Silva in Colombia, Gutiérrez Nájera and Díaz Mirón in Mexico, are important figures of the modernist movement. But there stands out particularly the Nicaraguan Rubén Darío (1867–1916). In his Azul (1888) and Prosas profanas (1896) the new poetry is fully formulated. And he transports it to Spain, which was already so aware, in Clarín and Unamuno and especially in Salvador Rueda among the poets, of the sickness afflicting literature.

When Rubén Darío arrived in Spain in 1899, young Spaniards, as eager as the Hispanic Americans to rehabilitate poetry, were fascinated with the magical formulas of salvation which the great poet offered them. Latent Spanish modernism comes out to meet the already existing modernism of the Hispanic Americans. The publication of Darío's Cantos de vida y esperanza in the symbolic year 1905, the tercentenary of Don Quijote de la Mancha, confirms the sense of a common cause, the liberation of the maiden, Poetry. Spaniards are captivated by a display of qualities hardly present in their national lyric poetry since Góngora—lexigraphic brilliance and novelty, boldness of images, exquisite musicality.

Perhaps the three most important names in Spanish modernism are those of Valle-Inclán, Manuel Machado (q.v.), and Juan Ramón Jiménez (q.v.).

The modernistic air indeed circulates, with all its perfumed richness and as a vivifying wind, through the whole expanse of Spanish letters and reaches its farthest corners—even though some of the Generation of 1898 resist in terms of simplicity, naturalness, and a strictly national tradition. Certain authors, such as Valle-Inclán, inhale it with the full power of their lungs; Manuel Machado and Juan Ramón Jiménez, while receptive, are already more temperate. If what is artificial in modernism did not altogether penetrate Spanish literature and if so many Spanish authors remained unmoved in their human position as regards eternal values, it is clear that much was integrated, and advantageously. Certain benefits stand out: liberation from casticismo; the incorporation into the Spanish thought stream of modern world literature (the great foreign authors of the 19th century who had been thought so revolutionary and extravagant come to be accepted and even highly esteemed); the extensive refinement and enrichment of poetic expression; the sense of collaboration between Spain and the Hispanic American countries in a common endeavor, the labor of innovation. Two distinct and independent forces, modernism and the Generation of 1898, ultimately coalesce in a great final result, the palingenesis of the literary spirit in the Spanish-speaking world.

The results of the zealous renovating efforts can now be clearly seen. Unamuno, Valle-Inclán, Azorín, Antonio Machado, Juan Ramón Jiménez, and Ortega y Gasset have transcended the reputation of eccentricity under which they struggled during their heroic years; the very lights which they lit now play on them fully and reveal them in their greatness as masters and guides. Spanish literature rises considerably in tone. Horizons are enlarged. The new ideas from abroad enter the country as soon as formulated and circulate freely; close attention is paid to outside literary schools and to their efforts; the Revista de Occidente and its editorial house, both under the direction of Ortega y Gasset, are instruments of inestimable importance in this work. At the same time the study of Spanish language and literature by new methods, the work principally of the Centro de Estudios Históricos and its school of philologists—Ramón Menéndez Pidal, Américo Castro, Tomás Navarro (qq.v.), José F. Montesinos, and Dámaso Alonso (q.v.)—reveals to innumerable new writers the import of their relation to their own classics. These authorities, as distinguished from the casticistas of a former period, do not invoke from the past rigid models that would subjugate, but rather essential vitalizing elements that serve to amplify the means of more abundant self-expression at the present time.

The decrease in the number of themes not strictly poetic or literary now becomes noteworthy in this 20th-century literature. Fewer sallies are made into social and political fields; there is less of the anxious contemplation of the whole Spanish scene; above all the focus is now on poetic creation. The vastness of the renovating labor of 1900 imposed on that generation the ideal of an extremely wide area of action; the ideal of the new writers involves more concentration. This does not betoken the lack of extensive curiosity on the part of literary youth, but a desire to confine itself to a basic mission and fulfill this conscientiously and with the energy inherent to complete devotion. The aspiration for quality rather than quantity simply means carrying to its ultimate literary conclusion the crusade against the vulgar and the commonplace which Unamuno and Rubén Darío, each from his own pulpit, had for so long been preaching. One result is less cultivation of the genres which lend themselves most readily to extension and digression, the novel and the essay; of more import are the new developments in the genre most capable of quintessences and concentration, lyric poetry. Lyricism, in various forms, is the distinguishing mark of the period.

This lyricism is integrating and straightforward. On the one hand it profits from the great traditions, the Romancero, the poetry of the Cancioneros of the 15th century, the achievements of Lope de Vega and Góngora; and on the other hand it is aware of the different schools of the new Europe, such as futurism, dadaism, surrealism, and "pure poetry," and revamps all this in its own forms, such as the ultraism of Pedro Garfias and Guillermo de Torre (q.v.) and the creationism of Gerardo Diego (q.v.) and Juan Larrea. Here is a generation of lyric poets with personalities as varied as they are original. The poetry of Jorge Guillén (q.v.) is a lyrical interpretation of the world. Federico García Lorca (q.v.), as though heeding the advice of Unamuno, "immerses himself in the Andalusian common people"—and assimilates all of modernism's modes of expression. There merge in Rafael Alberti's (q.v.) poetry, always with an original and pleasing result, Hispanic landscape and peasantry, Gongoresque splendors, and strange delvings into the subconscious. A little later, in a new group made up of Luis Cernuda, Vicente Aleixandre, Emilio Prados, and Manuel Altolaguirre (qq.v.), appears a poetry of introspective vein, characterized by a refined cultivation of sentimental intimacy, for the expression of which they have recourse at times to surrealist formulas. This group is now so far removed from the first generation of the 20th century that only at a few certain points of contact—in the poetry of Juan Ramón Jiménez, for example—can one consider it within the limits of this tradition. The lyric attitude which dominates this period overflows poetry and passes into prose. Ramón Gómez de la Serna (q.v.) tarries awhile in all the literary genres—is he a novelist, a short-story writer, an essayist, or what?—but the basis of his work is a highly personal lyricism, half hopeless, half jovial. José Bergamín (q.v.), an intellectual lyricist, arrives at his thought through fanciful flourishes and poetic conceits in essays. The novel, a fallow genre during these years, is marked with poetic elements in Benjamín Jarnés (q.v.). The theatre either is authentically and profoundly poetic in the dramas of García Lorca or pretends to be so, clothing itself in metrical garb in the ancient manner. Literary criticism, not only in its most technical and professional wing with Dámaso Alonso, Amado Alonso (q.v.), Valbuena Prat, and Díaz Plaja but also in a freer group with Antonio Marichalar (q.v.) and Torre, sets for itself as a favorite task the analysis and elucidation of the poetic phenomenon.

The civil war, begun in 1936, has distorted the natural course of Spanish literature, disarranging all its elements; the consequences and ultimate effects are difficult to discern. Some authors have remained in Spain; others have emigrated. The political question has again erupted into literature. In the writers who favor Franco this is seen in a return to nationalistic casticismo and in the frequency of historical themes infused with patriotic or religious sentiment. In the opposing group the authors bend in love and pity over mangled Spain and lean toward a community of feeling with the people in their struggle. It seems predictable that the residence overseas of the large number of writers who have emigrated to the Hispanic American countries and their contact with these lands and peoples will bring to Spanish literature spiritual growth and experiences of significant value.

See: J. Yxart, El arte escénico en España (2 vols., 1894–1896); F. Vézinet, Les Maîtres du roman espagnol contemporain (1907); R. Cansinos-Asséns, La nueva literatura (4 vols., 1917–1927); S. de Madariaga, The Genius of Spain and Other Essays on Spanish Contemporary Literature (1923); A. F. G. Bell, Contemporary Spanish Literature (1925; revised ed., 1933); H. Petriconi, Die spanische Literatur der Gegenwart seit 1870 (1926); G. de Torre, Literaturas europeas de vanguardia (1927); D. K. Arjona, “‘La voluntad’ and ‘abulia’ in Contemporary Spanish Ideology,” Revue hispanique, LXXIV (1928), 573–672; J. Cassou, Panorama de la littérature espagnole contemporaine (1929); Leslie A. Warren, Modern Spanish Literature (2 vols., 1929); C. Barja, Literatura española: Libros y autores modernos, revised ed. (1933), and Literatura española: Libros y autores contemporáneos (1935); H. Jeschke, Die Generation von 1898 in Spanien (1934); F. de Onís, Antología de la poesía española e hispanoamericana, 1882–1932 (1934); P. Salinas, Literatura española siglo XX (1941).

P. S.

Spire, André (1868–, French poet), born in Nancy, published his first vers libre after intensive preparation both as a social-minded intellectual and as a literary craftsman. Captivated by Desjardin's (q.v.) program for moral regeneration, he founded a society to rehabilitate unfortunates by helping them help themselves. But the Dreyfus affair, in which he fought a duel, converted him from palliative methods, and (with Daniel Halévy) he founded a night school for working-class students. From 1898 to 1902 he specialized in labor problems for the Office du Travail and from 1903 to 1914 organized cooperative banks for the Agricultural Ministry. After serving at the Peace Conference, he continued in social work until he was driven from France by the Nazis. He emigrated to America in 1941.

Dissatisfied with the technical innovations of symbolism, Spire sought a scientific basis for the rhythm of vers libre. Working at the Collège de France he measured the pitch, intensity, and duration of vers libre in order to establish the prosodic system based on accent, which he followed exclusively thereafter.

Et vous riez! (1905) reflects the frustrations of a social ameliorator who takes refuge in creative individualism, realizing he cannot remake society. But his social passion reappears, in limited area, in Poèmes juifs (1908), bitter, violent verse of a nonreligious Jew in behalf of his minority. Magnetized by “this eternal tomorrow that draws me on,” he turned to ideas in action and exposed the obscurantist dangers fostered by pseudo-Bergsonism (Vers les routes absurdes, 1911). Reacting to the 1919 peace with an ironical drama on man's nostalgia for earthly paradise (Samaël, 1919), he issued the same year Le Secret, his richest collection. Here he has become master of his lyric materials and has achieved the beginnings of serenity. Poèmes de Loire (1929) marked the growth of certainty: "The World is desire and yearns to be possessed," and this his subsequent writing translated into lyrical variations.

Despite his preoccupation with social problems, Spire's contribution lies in subjective lyricism—subtle or fierce irony ("Etudiantes," "Acacias," "Ces Grèves"), philosophic reflections ("Immortalité," "Volupté," "Friselis"), passionate cries ("Nudités," "Ecoute Israël"), and subtle pictures that expand with meaning ("Baisers," "Corps humain"). The unmistakableness of his personal idiom led Richard Aldington to classify him as "not Parnassian, Symbolist, Unanimist, Expressionist; but Spireiste."

See: Richard Aldington, "André Spire," English Review, XXXI (1920), 345-348; Frédéric Lefèvre, "Une Heure avec M. André Spire, poète et essayiste," Nouvelles littéraires, January 31, 1931; Stanley Burnshaw, André Spire and His Poetry (1933).

S. B.

Spitteler, Carl (1845-1924, Swiss poet and novelist), was born in Licstal near Basel, where he studied before accepting a position as tutor in Russia. Later, he taught and became an editor in Bern and Basel; he died in Lucerne. Spitteler was a most original writer, as bold in his formal innovations as he was in his defiance of traditional ways of thought. Keeping aloof from the fashion of his days which favored the development of realism into consistent naturalism, he for many years directed all his energies toward the creation of one towering epic, Der olympische Frühling (first version, 1900-1905; revised, 1910). This work, for which the poet evolved even his own metrical form, has long defied all attempts at aesthetic and historical classification. It appears quite unexpectedly in the evolution of German literature; it is both original and daring in its use of Greek mythology, blending theogony with cosmogony and alternating between a solemn, heroic presentation of the Greek gods and their whimsical reduction to the scale of ordinary mortals. Some critics have hailed this epic as a true successor to the Iliad and The Divine Comedy, while others can see little more in it than an untimely tour de force. The fact that Spitteler was awarded the Nobel prize must be taken as at least a tribute to his courageous independence, if not also to his partial success.

What possible justification could there have been for a poet so utterly to disregard current practice, for a writer to create a work which seemingly has no bearing on modern problems and to choose a form which all historians of literature relegate to the past? For Spitteler the theory of evolution as applied to art holds, if at all, only with second-rate productions; a genius is under no compulsion to fall in step with the so-called tendencies of his time. Epic contemplation is a faculty wholly sui generis, characterized mainly by a serene objectivity towards all manifestations of life. The concomitant philosophy indeed is more likely to be a pessimistic realization of the incongruity of man's efforts. If, however, the epic writer finds himself unable to proffer illusory remedies for our ills, he will compensate us with a display of riotous beauty: brilliant imagery and linguistic originality form a sufficient justification for his work and constitute a valuable contribution to civilization.

It can hardly be denied that Spitteler's epic comes close to fulfilling the promise. Yet such is the modern preoccupation with social and political issues that for many readers not even the eruption of sheer imagination and creative will power of Der olympische Frühling will satisfy. Spitteler himself must have been aware of some such insufficiency, for prior to and concurrently with his great masterpiece he composed a number of prose works dealing with everyday affairs. True enough, he used to refer to these parerga as mere stylistic exercises or as concessions to the realistic vogue; yet it would seem that through them he established and maintained contact with the tradition of his native country and that he was hoping all the while to effect a final synthesis between austere form and vital content. This he achieved indeed in his late epic Prometheus der Dulder (1924), modestly designating it as a recast of his Prometheus und Epimetheus (1881). Spitteler now voices his firm belief in the primacy of ethical over aesthetic values, for the second version is as direct in its moral insistence as the first was inconclusive. Prometheus reappears as the embodiment of those basic virtues on which the well-being of society depends; he radiates a perfect integration of classical fortitude with Christian candor, in words and deeds a strong exhortation for us to remain modest while active, magnanimous while firm, and to spare no effort to conquer our impatience with our fellow men.

See: R. Faesi, Spittelers Weg und Werk (1933); E. M. Butler The Tyranny of Greece over Germany (1935), pp. 316-322.

H. B.

Spoelberch de Louvenjoul, Charles de (1836–1907, Belgian bibliophile, bibliographer, and critic), was born in Brussels and died in Royat, France. He is the author of remarkable critical and bibliographical studies on George Sand, Alfred de Musset, Charles Sainte-Beuve, Théophile Gautier, Prosper Mérimée, Marceline Desbordes Valmore, and especially on Honoré de Balzac. He possessed to an extraordinary degree the faculty of penetrating the mind and the life of the authors he studied, never deviating from the most positive and strict documentation. His Histoire des œuvres de Honoré de Balzac (1879) is a monumental masterpiece of literary and bibliographical scrutiny and criticism. In 1880 he added to it Un Dernier Chapitre de l'histoire des œuvres de H. de Balzac and in 1901 La Genèse d'un roman de Balzac: Les Paysans. Une Page perdue de H. de Balzac was published in 1903. Endowed with the keenest spirit of research, he discovered and published a number of hitherto unknown manuscripts of the above-mentioned romantic authors.

L. V.

Šrámek, Fráňa (1877–, Czech fiction writer, poet, and playwright), was born in Sobotka (eastern Bohemia). Known principally as the leading novelist of Czech impressionism, he is a master in describing and suggesting the most evanescent, momentary emotions and moods. Especially in his later work he successfully evokes the atmosphere of adolescent sexuality, its joys and sorrows, its exaltations and melancholy, when the whole of nature seems to be wrapped in a mist of complete animality. Šrámek's sheer joy in instinctive animal life appealed to a generation which had just gone through the horrors of the First World War and then discovered somewhat naïvely that life goes on and is worth living. The title of his best novel, Tělo (1919; The Body), suggests a program, but this story of a girl of strong sexual instincts is little more than a sensitive chronicle of meetings and partings, vacillations and temptations of lovers, against a lightly sketched background of war. An earlier novel, Stříbrný vítr (1910; The Silver Wind), largely concerned with students and the problems of puberty, is more of an attack on a society which hampers the free expression of instinct, and some of Šrámek's books of short stories and sketches are filled with an instinctive antimilitarism which condemns war as the enemy of love and life (e.g., Žasnoucí voják, 1924, The Perplexed Soldier).

But Šrámek is not a writer concerned with ideas; he is, even in his prose, a lyrical poet. The quintessence of his mood is possibly in the small collections of his poetry, among which Splav (1916; The Weir) is the most memorable, and in his lyrical plays, where delicately and compassionately he paints young people in the throes of sexual passion. Léto (1915; Summer) and Měsíc nad řekou (1922; The Moon above the River) are the two plays which were successful on the stage. Šrámek is a specialist of narrow range, but he is a genuine artist, who has failed only when, as in certain of his recent books and plays, he has attempted contemporary problems and more ambitious complex compositions.

See: J. Knap, ed., Kniha o Šrámkovi (1927); J. Durych, Ejhle, člověk (1928); F. X. Šalda, Časové a nadčasové (1936); J. Knap, Fráňa Šrámek (1937).

R. W.

Sremac, Stevan (1855–1906, Serb short-story writer and novelist), was born in Senta, in the province of Bačka, and educated in Belgrade in the house of his uncle, the prominent historian Jovan Djordjević. Through his uncle he became imbued with love for the nation's past and studied history at the University of Belgrade. Later he taught this subject in high school, mostly in the town of Niš, where he lived many years. A fervent patriot, he served in the army as a volunteer during the Serbo-Turkish wars of 1876–1878.

Sremac attempted a series of literary glorifications of the most distinguished personalities of his country's past; he prepared romanticized biographies of Serbian heroes and knights, enveloping them all in a poetic veil and presenting them under the common title Iz knjiga starostavnih (6 vols., 1903–1909; From the Ancient Books). He was far more effective in painting contemporary life. His long story Ivkova slava (1875; Ivko's House Patron Saint), depicting humorously the picturesque milieu and old stock types of the town of Niš immediately after its liberation from the Turkish yoke, captured the public imagination. He also wrote Limunacija na selu (1876; Fireworks in the Village), Pop Ćira and Pop Spira (1898; Priest Ćira and Priest Spira), Božićna pečenica (1898; The Christmas Roast), Vukadin (1903), Zona Zamfirova (1907), Kir Geras (1908). Ivkova slava and Zona Zamfirova—the latter, also about life in Niš, is undoubtedly the author's best work—have been dramatized and frequently produced on the Serbian stage.

Thoroughly acquainted with several Serbian provinces, Sremac depicted their local characteristics, their completely different spiritual formation and ways of life. He was interested primarily in the lower classes of this society, in the petty bourgeoisie, sometimes even in failures, believing that in these individuals unrestrained by conventions, human nature is most clearly expressed. He wrote with liveliness and verisimilitude. At the same time he was instinctively a humorist, with the gift of perceiving in every man and every situation the ridiculous aspects. His works are full of witty observations, jokes, unexpected comic developments of character and event. He mocked the human race by drawing its typical foolish figures, but his shafts were not poisoned; the reader doubles up with laughter, but neither despises nor hates these poor fools. Only when the author delineated political circumstances and reformers alien to him, since he was himself an intolerant traditionalist and conservative, did his humor occasionally pass into satire or even caricature. Probably the best Serbian humoristic novelist, Sremac is also an excellent realistic writer whose gallery contains unforgettable portraits.

See: J. Skerlić, "Stevan Sremac," Pisci i knjige, Vol. IV (1909); P. Popović, "Stevan Sremac," preface to Sremac, Pop Ćira i Pop Spira, revised ed. (1936).

P. A.

Stadler, Ernst (1883-1914, German poet and scholar), was born in Colmar, Alsace, and studied Germanics in Munich and Strassburg. With René Schickele (q.v.) he founded the periodical Der Stürmer in 1902. In 1903 he studied at Oxford, some years later (1908) began lecturing on Germanics at Strassburg, and in 1910 was appointed professor at Brussels. He was killed in the First World War. Besides well-articulated articles on literature (1910), he wrote two books of poems; the first, Praeludien (1904), is not very important, but the other, Der Aufbruch (1915), is one of the most beautiful and disciplined examples of the early German expressionistic style. Although this book was influenced by Whitman and Verhaeren (q.v.), Stadler adds to their "strömendes Weltgefühl" the deep mysticism of his homeland and an explosive, dynamic quality of his own. In contrast to most of the young expressionists, he never destroys but rather masters language with definite artistry. The visionary poem "Der Aufbruch," which gave the volume its name and in which he foresaw the World War and his own death, was later regarded as symbolic of the emerging generation of expressionist poets.

See: H. Hestermann, Ernst Stadler (1929).
K. P.

Staff, Leopold (1878-, Polish poet), was born in Lwów, Austrian Poland, the son of a proprietor of a confectionery shop. Reared in good middle-class surroundings, Staff received his formal education in the Gymnasium and university of his native city. Lwów was the center of great literary and artistic ferment at this time, caused in part by Kasproicz, and this circumstance, together with the boy's own natural inclination and the city's traditionally buoyant, ecstatic atmosphere, conspired to lead Staff to a literary career. In his youth he was powerfully influenced by the works of Nietzsche (q.v.), in his later life no less powerfully by St. Francis of Assisi. Wide travel abroad, in Italy, Germany, and France, and experiences as a prisoner of war in Russia likewise played a part in molding Staff into a poet. He lived a life apart from the angry currents of his times, remote in his scholar's tower, there translating the masterpieces of world literature and fashioning the exquisite lyrics by which he will be forever remembered. A pure poet, and even a poet's poet, Staff was the supreme poet of Free Poland. In the early 30's a uniform collected edition of his works was issued in celebration of his three decades of creative activity.

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, I (1927), 153-172; Wiadomości literackie, 1929, No. 289 (entire issue); W. Borowy, "Leopold Staff," Slavonic Review, XI (1932-1933), 145-158; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, II (1934), 33-44, 391-395; Geoffrey Potocki, tr., Pologne littéraire, 1934, No. 91.

A. P. C.

Stanković, Borisav (1876-1927, Serb story writer, novelist, and dramatist), is considered the best Serbian narrative writer in the first decades of the 20th century. Born in South Serbia, in the small town of Vranje, which was till 1876 under Turkish rule, Stanković's mind was pervaded by the patriarchal atmosphere of this region. Even after completing his college studies in Belgrade, becoming a civil servant, and settling down in the capital of Serbia, he felt a deep nostalgia for his native town and dedicated all his efforts to depict it as faithfully as possible.

His first collections of short stories, Iz starog jevandjelja (1899; From the Old Gospel), Božji ljudi (1902; God's Children), and Stari dani (1902; The Old Days), enriched Serbian literature with pictures of an exotic world, fast disappearing, which still presented incarnations of a picturesque oriental sensuality and Slavic sensibility. Although the heroes of these collections have a narrow horizon and limited spheres of action, their interior life is extremely intensive and profound. Their principal motive force is erotic passion, which seldom culminates in happiness and bliss, but almost always in exaltation and pain, storm and suffering, vehemence and fatality. It is rightfully claimed for Stanković that his work was "one great love fever." His play Koštana (1902) is about a Gypsy dancer of that name who, after having succeeded in making men fools and disrupting whole families, was forced to marry a ne'er-do-well so that others might escape her dangerous influence. This play is really a most stirring love poem. The novel Nečista krv (1911, Impure Blood; Eng. tr., Sophka, 1932) perhaps does not succeed in depicting as adequately as was intended the degeneration of a family, but it offers a series of marvelous types of other days, with their mentalities, customs, and ways of life. The play Tašana (1915) is much weaker than Koštana, although there are high moments and poetically melancholy details as in the earlier drama. The author's last work, Pod okupacijom (1929; Under Foreign Occupation), relates the hard years under the Austro-Hungarian occupation during the First World War.

Stanković's work is of limited scope; he portrays local types of a single region. Moreover, his language contains many archaisms and provincial twists. But, although his entire work was written in prose, Stanković is positively the most lyric temperament in Serbian literature, and he does interpret with consummate art one aspect of Serbian life at the very moment of its passing from the patriarchal era to the modern times.

See: J. Skerlić, reviews of Stanković, Koštana and Božji Ljudi, in Pisci i knjige, Vols. I (1907), V (1911); B. Lazarević, "Borisav Stanković," in Impresije iz književnosti, Vol. I (1912); M. Grol, "Jubilej Borisava Stankovića," Srpski književni glasnik, May 1, 1924.

P. A.

Stefánsson, Davíð (1895–, Icelandic poet, playwright, and novelist), was born at Fagriskógur in Eyjafjörður. His father was a member of Parliament; his mother came of a literary family, her brother being a well-known folklorist and a prolific writer. Soon after graduating from the Gymnasium in Reykjavík, Stefánsson made his literary début with Svartar fjaðrir (1919; Black Feathers), a volume of poems, which won him instantaneous acclaim and a stipend to travel to Italy. After that the poet devoted himself for the most part to his art only. Six volumes of poetry have appeared (1919–1936), as well as three plays, Munkarnir á Möðruvöllum (1926; The Monks at Möðruvellir), Gullna hliðið (1941; The Golden Gate), Vopn guðanna (1943; The Weapons of the Gods), and the novel Sólon Islandus (2 vols., 1940). For more than a decade he has held the post of librarian at the public library of Akureyri in Eyjafjörður.

Davíð Stefánsson is the best representative of the new national romanticism in Iceland, as he is also the most popular of living Icelandic poets. Especially in his early poetry, he is a hedonist, a proud self-willed poet, who sings of wine and women in passionate, sometimes sadistic tones—though he has, too, the tenderest chords on his lyre. His diction is always easy, his form usually light; the tempo is often borrowed from nursery rhymes, lullabies, and folk dances, and his imagery is saturated with Icelandic folklore. Yet he can use other forms, for instance in his impressions of Italy. He is at his best in his ballad-like poems, sometimes telling a story with sly humor, sometimes abandoning himself to moods of romantic horror or defiance, to nostalgia for mother earth. Rarely is a note of social criticism heard, and then never in the class-conscious way of the leftist poets.

Just as his poetry harks back to folk poetry, ballads, dances, and tales, so his plays are historical, the first a satire of the monks, the second a folk tale embodied in 18th-century beliefs and manners. Most interesting is the novel about Solon Islandus, the Icelandic megalomaniac tramp, whom Stefánsson sees as a symbol of his own small and inferiority-complexed nation. The book is reminiscent in that way of Ibsen's (q.v.) Peer Gynt. It is done in a quiet, but none the less very effective, realistic manner.

See: S. Nordal, "Tvær miklar skáldsögur," Lesbók Morgunblaðsins, November 24, 1940; R. Beck, "Davíð Stefánsson skáld," Tímarit Þjóðræknisfélags Íslendinga, XXVII (1945), 51–68.

S. E.

Steffen, Albert (1884–, Swiss novelist, poet, dramatist, and philosopher), born in Murgenthal, is undoubtedly the most interesting figure in contemporary German Swiss literature. Endowed with a deeply compassionate nature and highly sensitive to the problematical aspects of modern civilization, he was in no danger of merely emulating the popular tradition of Alfred Huguenberger (1867-), Jakob Christoph Heer (1859-1925), and Ernst Zahn (1867-), who with their realistic peasant novels or idealizing Alpine stories for a time all but monopolized the sphere of literary entertainment. Steffen's first novel Ott, Alois und Werelsche (1907), left no doubt that his literary ancestors were Tolstoy (q.v.) and Dostoevski (q.v.) rather than Keller (q.v.) or Gotthelf, indicating as it did a most fervent desire to make the Sermon on the Mount a practical and strict rule of conduct. Christian humanism, the basis of Swiss intellectual and religious culture, underwent in Steffen's work a profound revival and transformation. His metaphysical novel, Sucher nach sich selbst (1931), and even more so his essays, Frührot der Mysteriendichtung (1940), give a comprehensive survey of his religious view of existence. For Steffen the mystery of Christ and his redeeming death represent the archetype of all human life; we must all endeavor to atone for the sins of mankind because we are all equally to blame for them. Furthermore he holds that this so-called Christ-impulse in us, once it is awakened and brought to bear on life, will prove the most efficient aid in the solution of contemporary social and political ills. It is not to be wondered at that Steffen, with such mystic leanings and his ardent advocacy of reform, should have identified himself more and more with Rudolf Steiner's anthroposophic movement, of which Steffen became the leader after the death of Steiner in 1925.

Since then Steffen's work has been wholly pressed into the service of anthroposophy, to explore its mystic implications and to propagate its social message; as a result of this he lost his appeal for all but his particular devotees. It is only in recent years, perhaps under the stress of world conditions, that Steffen has been trying again to reach a wider audience by being more explicit and by using symbols and characters which can be generally understood. This is illustrated when he evokes the tragedy of pure idealism exemplified in the life and death of Woodrow Wilson (Friedenstragödie, 1936) or when he presents the figure of Pestalozzi to show that in the struggle between Alexander I and Napoleon for world domination the final victory belongs to the tenderhearted humanitarian and friend of all mankind (Pestalozzi, 1939). For the moving scenes of this play Steffen's countrymen will forgive him an occasional excursion into distant mystic lands, since they are evidence enough of his being in tune with the humanitarian tradition of Switzerland.

See: A. von Sybel-Petersen, Albert Steffen und sein Werk (1934); R. J. Hofrichter, Three Poets and Reality (1942), pp. 73-99.

H. B.

Stehr, Hermann (1864-1940, German poet and novelist), born in Habelschwerdt, started with a number of short stories (Der Graveur, Meicke der Teufel, both 1898; Der Schindelmacher, 1899) and was quickly labeled a naturalist. But even his earliest works reveal a much more intense reliance on the psychological and psychic qualities of his characters than on their physical environment. Any disturbance in the emotional or intellectual balance seems to have attracted him more than social or political problems, perhaps because he felt his real strength to lie in an almost pedantic but very often truly penetrating power of psychological analysis. His favored theme in these years concerns the explosion of pent-up emotions, usually revenge or hatred dating back to some gross injustice.

This psychological naturalism, though it determined Stehr's style for a long time, was gradually superseded by the religious and mystic tradition of his native Silesian world; it became more and more evident that Stehr was a descendant of Jakob Böhme and Angelus Silesius and the heir of a mysticism further deepened by his study of Lao-tse, Gautama, Ekkehart, Spinoza, and Kant. But the transcendental way of looking at the world in no way thwarted his creative abilities as a novelist. Although one would expect the experience of a mystic union with God to find its chief outlet in brief lyrical utterances, Stehr succeeded in permeating even long novels with his religious fervor. He was not so much interested in stating the final results of his philosophy as in showing the way in which religious longings arise and unfold in human beings. The irresistible growth of the divine spark in us, its flickering and extinction or its triumphant expansion into heavenly light—these are the themes of Stehr's second period, in such novels as Leonore Griebel (1900), Der begrabene Gott (1905), Drei Nächte (1909), and Geschichten aus dem Mandelhause (1913). They all purport to show that a genuine desire to establish contact with God enriches even the most earthly and humble existence. How can we live close enough to God so as to partake of his spirit and to understand the world with at least a fraction of his insight and wisdom? To find an answer is the task with which Stehr sends his God-seekers into the world. Der Heiligenhof (1918) marks his nearest approach to a solution, to the creation of at least one figure filled to the brim with divine powers. But the result is achieved at the expense of a normal human existence. Little Helen, the daughter of a wealthy farmer, attains an almost saintlike life. She is born blind and is, it first appears, beyond all medical help; shut off from the visible world she turns inward to grasp and absorb God. Other characters around her, spurred on by her vision, catch an occasional glimpse of this higher world. Yet with all these honest efforts the novel ends on a tragic note; saintly Helen is rudely awakened into normal life, through a sudden realization of her own erotic nature. As an immediate result of this she gains her normal sight, only to lose her hold on the supernatural and to become engrossed in the lower desires of mankind. Self-administered death remains her only defense against such degradation. Stehr has retold the same story from the viewpoint of the man who became chiefly responsible for Helen's downfall, in Peter Brindeisener (1924). The conclusion remains the same; Peter, who once longed to become initiated through Helen into the mysteries of true existence, also ends by destroying his own life.

Perhaps for a mystic who has trained himself to see all opposites sub specie aeternitatis it matters little whether we succeed or fail in this world; crime or virtue, glory or defeat, all are ordained by the will of God. But Stehr's strong instinct balked at such quietism. Discovering as he did that this passive resignation is the result of religious intellectualism, of a tendency to experience religion in terms of philosophy instead of apprehending it by action, he began to experiment with a new set of literary characters who, rather than speculating about religious matters, endeavor to incorporate them in the conduct of their daily lives. His popular violinmaker stories, Der Geigenmacher (1926) and Meister Cajetan (1931), are attempts in this direction. The religious yearning of these craftsmen is no less intense than it was in Stehr's earlier work; its progress, however, is no longer recorded in the form of philosophical definitions but of manual skill and production; the quality of the instruments created in the workshop is now made to reflect and measure the growth of inner perfection. Perfect as these stories are from an artistic point of view, they do not solve Stehr's most pressing problem of bringing man's religious consciousness to bear on life in a direct and concrete manner.

With his last significant novel, Nathanael Maechler (1929), Stehr came much closer to the real absorption of vita contemplativa in vita activa; in words reminiscent of Goethe's Faust he here voices his belief that God looks with favor on man's incessant striving in the realm of human interests, provided it be directed towards the promotion of good will among men and permeated with a feeling of infinite gratitude towards God. A simple and for that reason perhaps all the more convincing enactment of mystic revelations in everyday life is found in Gudnatz (1921), a story which treats of the conversion of a war profiteer into a fervent practical Christian.

Stehr's poems illustrate in briefer compass the same development of his mind. They likewise show his original aversion to being satisfied with the impressionistic apprehension of the surface of things, his ability to fathom mystic experience and to create a language capable of expressing religious ecstasy, his final conviction that religion is essentially a practical concern and a powerful incentive to social action.

See: W. A. Reichart, "Hermann Stehr and His Work," Philological Quarterly, X (1931), pp. 47-61; E. Freitag, Hermann Stehr; Gehalt und Gestalt seiner Dichtung, Vol. I: Weltanschauung (1936); G. Blanke, Hermann Stehrs Menschengestaltung (1939); K. S. Weimar, The Concept of Love in the Works of Hermann Stehr (1945).

H. B.

Stephansson, Stephan Guðmundsson (1854-1927, Icelandic-Canadian poet), was born at Kirkjuhóll in Skagafjörður, of poor but intellectually alert parents who tried to eke out a living in three different cottages in Iceland before they moved to America in 1873. Here Stephansson took land three times: in Wisconsin, in North Dakota, and finally in Alberta, Canada, near Markerville, where he lived as a hard-working farmer until his death in 1927. He married in 1878 and had eight children, losing two sons before he died. He never had any formal education, but as a boy in Iceland he had read the sagas, which he retained ever after in memory, as his poems show. From the 1890's onward his poems appeared in Icelandic periodicals and weeklies in Winnipeg. His first volume of poems was Á ferð og flugi (1900; On the Go), but most of his poems were gradually published in the collection Andvökur (6 vols., 1909–1938; Wakeful Nights), the name referring to the fact that he composed most of his poetry while others slept. Other publications were Kolbeinslag (1914; Lay of Kolbeinn), Heimleiðis (1917; Homeward Bound), about a trip to Iceland made on the invitation of grateful countrymen, and Vigslóði (1920; On the War Path), about the First World War. His letters are being published in Iceland.

Stephansson never assimilated the spirit of English literature, though he read it. He saw the New World from the point of view of the Iclander and of the pioneer. The attitude was, perhaps, one-sided, but certainly not a narrow one, and it was sustained by the unrelenting idealism and manliness of the poet. He was an ardent liberal and a thoroughgoing individualist—a king in his farmer's realm. Related to this are his anti-clericalism, even atheism, and his hatred of all capitalistic exploitation, whether it was that which he saw rampant in America or that in the imperialistic wars (e.g., the Boer War) of Great Britain. Nor had he any sympathy for either side in the First World War, and he said so in terms that might have cost him dearly had his language been better understood by his ruling fellow Canadians.

But Stephansson was not only a prophet crying in the wilderness. He was also a poet sensitive to the shifting seasons and to the charms of nature even in his adopted land. He has described the prairie, the wide, checkered cornland of the Middle West, and the Canadian Rockies in magnificent poems.

Yet above all he was an Icelandic poet. His homeland is crystallized in beautiful visions in his poems, and figures from the old sagas and romances haunt his mind and take on new symbolic value in his poetry. These and the language had been the sole heritage of the boy when he left his fatherland. They were destined to bear fruit a thousandfold in his new environment. All are agreed that Stephansson is one of the greatest poets that Canada has fostered—perhaps the greatest. Some have even claimed that he is among the most distinguished poets that America has ever had, and one critic, Cawley, rates him as “greater than Poe, greater even than Whitman and Emerson.”

See: W. Kirkconnell, “Canada's Leading Poet,” University of Toronto Quarterly, V (1936), 263–277; F. S. Cawley, “The Greatest Poet of the Western World: Stephan G. Stephansson,” Scandinavian Studies and Notes, XV (1938–1939), 99–109; S. Nordal, introduction to Stephansson, Andvökur, úrval (1939).

S. E.

Sternheim, Carl (1881–1943, German critic, dramatist, and novelist), was born in Leipzig. Although the son of a banker and merchant, he chose the profession of writer. After two unimportant plays, Ulrich and Brigitte (1909) and Don Juan (1910), he began in his first comedy, Die Hose (1911), the exposition of the general theme of all his further productions: the denunciation of the corrupt and intellectually dishonest bourgeois man who constantly perverts art. The various aspects of this theme were depicted in 10 other plays, published with Die Hose under the significant title Aus dem bürgerlichen Heldenleben (1922). A certain “Bürger Schippel” is here presented as the outstanding bourgeois type that deserves nothing but scorn and ridicule. He and his like, Sternheim suggests, drove Germany into the First World War and lost it, because he is a man without principles and ethical standards. Two books of a critical character, Berlin oder Juste milieu (1920) and Tasso oder Kunst des Juste milieu (1921), serve as prose commentaries on the ideas of these plays; two novels, Europa (1920) and Fairfax (1921; Eng. tr., 1923), interpret the same theme on a less national, but more European basis. They are, at the same time, typical specimens of so-called expressionistic prose. In the two novels this medium was worked out with much skill, but in his later writings it became a mannerism. Sternheim continued to ridicule society for its shortcomings in the comedy Die Schule von Urznach oder die neue Sachlichkeit (1926), a satire on the modern craze of dancing, in J. P. Morgan (1930), a sketch of American life, and in Aut Caesar, aut Nihil (1931), a sort of prophecy of the new political ideology. For more than 20 years he virtually exiled himself from Germany, but in the years before his death again made his home in Berlin.

A. Bu.

Stjernstedt, Marika (1875–, Swedish novelist), born in Stockholm, is one of the more eminent of contemporary women novelists in Sweden. Her mature work is everywhere characterized by a sharp intelligence and a warm human feeling, the best traits of a distinguished and romantic ancestry—her father was a Swedish general of fine old military and civil service stock, her mother, a Polish countess, whose lineage can be traced far back into the primitive military aristocracy of the Ukraine and Lithuania. During the First World War Marika Stjernstedt worked untiringly for the cause of France, an evidence of the inclusiveness of her interest in broad human and social values. She is perhaps the most cosmopolitan, in both experience and outlook, of literary women in present-day Sweden. Though her first novels were rather inconsequential efforts in the superficial "psychologizing" manner of Paul Bourget (q.v.), she soon found a form more purely her own in the two novels Landshövdingens dotter (1911; The Governor's Daughter) and Daniela Hertz (1912), twin studies in two sharply contrasting female types, half sisters, the one a person of profound domestic and social instincts, the other a thoroughly anti-social creature, who experiments not unsuccessfully with an extreme form of individualism in conscious head-on revolt against a bourgeois social order. That the First World War deepened Marika Stjernstedt's social conscience as well as her understanding of human nature is evident in the novels which came from her pen in the 20's and 30's, novels that are concerned for the most part with a number of psychologically related but otherwise fairly diverse treatments of the self-supporting unmarried woman who prizes her personal freedom and yet has certain strongly developed moral and social instincts. Fröken Liwin (1925) is the tragedy of a young woman textile expert who attempts, in the long run unsuccessfully, to establish a fine mother-daughter relationship with her illegitimate daughter, issue of an unfortunate love affair with a young artist. Resning i målet (1925; Higher Aims) is an intelligent though somewhat late-born contribution to the discussion in Scandinavian literature of feminine education, one of the darling themes of the 1880's which had been resurrected, in somewhat different forms, just after the turn of the century by Sigrid Undset (q.v.) in Norway and Elin Wägner (q.v.) in Sweden.

Three other novels by Marika Stjernstedt should be mentioned: Von Sneckenströms (1924), an interesting treatment of a Catholic family's experience in practicing its faith in a modern Protestant environment; Spegling i en skärva (1936; Images in a Broken Glass), a finely balanced study of the fate of an upper-class Russian family during and after the Red Revolution; and Man glömmar ingenting (1940; One Forgets Nothing), a sober and penetrating analysis of a modern woman's thwarted passion and its consequences upon her later individual development. Of these three novels perhaps Spegling i en skärva is most representative of Marika Stjernstedt's art, with its careful building up of milieu, its sensitive treatment of character, and its deep human pathos entirely free of any particular propagandistic leanings.

See: M. Stjernstedt, Mitt och de mina (1928); K. Strömberg, Modern svensk litteratur (1932), pp. 167-170; S. Ahlgren, Orfeus i folkhemmet (1938), pp. 60-73; M. Lindqvist, Människor (1938), pp. 115-128.

A. G.

Stoessl, Otto (1875-1936, Austrian novelist and essayist), was born in Vienna, the son of a physician. He studied law and became an official of the Austrian railroads. Soon after the First World War he was pensioned. Though only partly of Austrian origin, he was deeply devoted to Austria. For a long time he was an adherent of Karl Kraus (q.v.); however, he eventually rallied to the tendencies of neoclassicism as represented by Paul Ernst (q.v.). Politically, his beliefs may have been oppositional, perhaps moderately socialist; but as a slow-working, conscious and conscientious artist, he followed a great tradition, specifically that of Stifter, occasionally giving vent to his pessimism and, less often, to his satirical vein.

He intended to collect and partly to reshape his writings for the edition of his Gesammelte Werke, of which only four volumes were published, between 1933 and 1938: Arkadia, Schelmengeschichten, Geist und Gestalt, and Schöpfer. The first contains some of his verse, the third some of his essays. They are critically and carefully conceived and worth reading, as are his Gottfried Keller (1904), Conrad Ferdinand Meyer (1906), and Adalbert Stifter (1925) and the prose collection entitled Lebensform und Dichtungsform (1917). Stoessl scarcely intended to include some early writings (e.g., Leile and the plays Waare and Tote Götter, both in collaboration with Robert Scheu, all 1898), but would not have omitted the delicate dramatic idyl, Der Hirt als Gott (1920), and some unpublished plays of his later years (e.g., Basem der Grobschmied). His limited but solid fame rests upon the best of his stories and novels. Some of them move slowly, but all are written in a thoughtful and sober language: Kinderfrühling (1904), In den Mauern (1907), Sonjas letzter Name (1908), Egon und Danitza (1910), Allerleirauh (1911), Morgenrot (1912), Was nützen mir die schönen Schuhe (1913), Unterwelt (1917), Das Haus Erath (1920; the story of an Austrian family, one of his best efforts), Irrwege (1922), Sonnenmelodie (1923), Menschen-dämmerung (1929).

See: J. W. Nagel and Jakob Zeidler, Deutsch-österreichische Literaturgeschichte, ed. by Eduard Castle, Bd. 4 (1937), pp. 1739-1740; K. Riedler, Otto Stoessl (1939).

H. St.

Storm, Theodor (1817-1888, German lyric poet and story writer), was born in Husum, Schleswig. He completed his law course and settled in his home town as attorney, fully expecting to end his days there. But he took a firm stand against Danish oppression and became an exile in 1853. After three unhappy years in Potsdam he found a new home in a smaller town in rural surroundings, Heiligenstadt, to the southeast of Göttingen. When Schleswig became German in 1864, Storm returned to Husum to practice his profession. In 1880 he retired to near-by Hademarschen to devote himself exclusively to literature. In 1846 Storm had married his cousin Constanze Esmarch. She was his inspiration, his most appreciative and sensitive reader. When she died in 1865 his muse seemed silenced. Then he married Dorothea Jensen, whose ardent love, not entirely unreciprocated, had perturbed the early years of his life with Constanze; only gradually was full happiness with the second wife achieved. One of his finest Novellen, Viola tricolor (1873), has its roots in this tragic experience.

Storm's life and art are centered in his home. He is the family man of a small town. And this town is Husum. In an elegiac mood of nostalgic longing it was celebrated by Storm as die graue Stadt am Meer. Once an important mercantile center with a busy harbor, Husum had become the home of small tradespeople and a few well-established families for whom the past loomed large. It is for this reason that so many of Storm's stories tell of the past. Storm's fine patriotic pieces spring from a deep love for his home, its immediate landscape and its people. Larger political aspects affect him only as they touch his own life. His first Novelle, Immensee, published in 1851 (Eng. tr., 1858), is an idyl in which a deep joy of life is pervaded by a gentle melancholy. A sterner mood is also already apparent: from a dream of lost happiness the old man (Storm himself) turns to his work. A comparison of the first Novelle with his last, Der Schimmelreiter (1888; Eng. tr., The Rider of the White Horse, 1915), reveals the whole change from idyllic renunciation to gripping tragedy. Not only are the hero and the heroine made of sterner stuff, they are also seen in the immediate reality of their busy life. The Novellen, more than 30 in number, embrace a wide variety of subject and mood. Zur Chronik von Grieshus (1884; Eng. tr., A Chapter in the History of Grieshus, 1908), Ein Fest auf Halderslevhus (1885; Eng. tr., A Festival at Halderslevhus, 1909), and Aquis Submersus (1876; Eng. tr., 1910) are based on ancient chronicles. In these as in the old Nibelungenlied love ends in tragedy. Aquis Submersus, the story of an artist, is considered Storm's finest by many critics. In sharp contrast to its tragic gloom stand two other tales of artists, Eine Malerarbeit (1867) and Psyche (1875), the one the victorious struggle of a hunchback against adversity, the other a triumphant song of happy love. Many of Storm's stories deal with family life and its problems. A deep insight into the riddle of human life, a sensuous immediacy of experience and presentation, are coupled with a free play of poetic fancy. There is something subtly lyrical about all of Storm's Novellen, even those most intensely realistic, and this is perhaps their greatest charm. In this respect Storm seems akin to his younger Danish contemporary, Jens Peter Jacobsen (q.v.).

Indeed, Storm is also a distinguished lyric poet. Many of his poems have a narrative element, but the best of them describe a situation ("Ein Sterbender," "Eine Frühlingsnacht"). Some are tragic, others abound in humor and depict a real joy in life ("Sommermittag," "Juli," "Von Katzen"). Storm depicts his native landscape with impressionistic vividness, the coast line with its shallows at the ebb of tide, the lonely heath wrapped in autumn fogs, or the same heath a purple sea of color under the warm August sun. Of the German lyric poets Storm loved most Eichendorff and Mörike. He was among the very first to discover the latter's rare genius. The perfect lyric poem is for Storm one whose first, immediate appeal is purely sensuous, from which sensuous appeal the inner meaning quite naturally and unobtrusively evolves.

See: Gertrud Storm, Theodor Storm; ein Bild seines Lebens (1918).

F. Br.

Stössl, Otto, see Stoessl.

Stramm, August (1874-1915, German poet and dramatist), born in Münster, Westphalia, attended the Gymnasium at Eupen and at Aachen. His Catholic mother wanted him to study for the priesthood, but his Protestant father insisted on his entering the federal service. Obeying his father, he nevertheless found time to enroll at the universities of Berlin and Halle; in 1909 he was made a doctor of philosophy. Later in his career he held the position of postal inspector in Bremen and Berlin and still later was called into the Reichspostministerium. In 1914, as a captain in the reserve, he joined the army and the next year died at the Russian front.

For 20 years no publisher accepted his works; in 1913, however, a friend, Herwarth Walden, published the drama Sancta Susanna in his periodical Der Sturm, and Stramm became a leader in the "Sturmgruppe," a literary circle representing the extreme in expressionism. The next year appeared his love songs, Du, and the dramas Die Haidebraut (Eng. tr., The Bride of the Moor, 1914), Rudimentär, and Die Unfruchtbaren, which are of a somewhat daring character. Three more plays of a similar type (Erwachen, Kräfte, Geschehen) were published in 1915. His war verses were published posthumously with the title Tropfblut (1919). His plays are so-called Schreidramen, consisting to a great extent of ecstatic ejaculations. His lyric poetry, too, often takes this bizarre form, usually in lines of one syllable. To call these expressionistic explosions genuine poetic atrocities may not be too severe a judgment, but at any rate they should be recorded as phenomena of literary history.

See: H. Jansen, Der Westfale August Stramm als Hauptvertreter des dichterischen Frühexpressionismus (1928).

F. S.

Strauss, Emil (1866–, German novelist), now generally recognized as outstanding, was born in Pforzheim, Swabia. He studied philosophy, German literature, and economics in Freiburg, Lausanne, and Berlin. After his return from Brazil, where he spent two years (1892–1894) as a farmer and teacher, Strauss devoted his energy to agriculture and writing. As a novelist he remained outside the current literary movements, developing his style and his philosophy of life consistently and independently. Strauss first became widely known through Freund Hein (1902), describing the childhood and adolescence of a musical genius who, humiliated and discouraged over his repeated failures in high school mathematics, takes his own life. The book was meant as a psychological novel but was interpreted by the public as an attack upon a heartless school system. Strauss, who is related to the famous Austrian family of musicians, sees in music the purest expression of the divine in human life. This is revealed in Der Spiegel (1919), essentially a Bildungsroman based on the life of his great-grandfather. A soldier by family tradition, Joseph is seized by a Rousseauistic longing for the simple life, becomes a farmer and then, impelled by an urge to find himself, a monk. A heavenly vision finally reveals to him that he should serve God as a musician. The monastic reform in Austria frees him from his vows. He leads a happy married life until his wife accepts a large legacy in his absence. He dissolves the marriage, since the struggle for existence has become necessary for his happiness. It is part of the heroic conception of life which Strauss presents in his works that man must prove his mettle in the storm and stress of life. We must remain loyal to ourselves and defend our convictions and ideals even against our loved ones. Thus in the historical novel Der nackte Mann (1912) Captain Gösslin causes the death of his friend, the margrave, who is about to attack the captain's native city of Pforzheim by night. Thus Colonel Sampiero in the historical drama Vaterland (1923) must kill his beloved wife to save his native Corsica from an ignominious peace which her gentle nature hoped to attain.

One of the crucial tests of life, according to Strauss, is to find a life partner who, as if predestined by fate, is the necessary complement of one's own self. This becomes evident especially in the second of the two outstanding collections of Novellen, Hans und Grete (1909) and Der Schleier (1920), both of which are centered around the theme of love. If we are not wide-awake in the decisive moment, we may forfeit our own and another's happiness, like Baptiste who thus condemned two people to lead a mediocre instead of a full life. By his momentary hesitation Gerard, in "Der Skorpion" of the second collection, so mortally injures the pride of the woman who offers him her love that he brings death upon himself and insanity upon his beloved. The moment when the baroness covers the youthful adventure of her mature husband with her veil, thus winning him back through this token of confidence and unalterable love, is the climax of Strauss's most perfect Novelle which gave the second collection its title. The baroness has an earlier though more lowly predecessor in the unforgettable figure of the forgiving wife as she appears in the humorous Swabian tale Der Engeltwirt (1901). Except for a few scenes in this story and a few early Novellen, Strauss's stories have unmistakable South German character and background, and his style grows out of the "heartly" popular idiom of this region, much as Gottfried Keller's (q.v.) language is rooted in the Swiss dialect.

Emil Strauss is directly concerned with the welfare of his nation. In the bulky novel Das Riesenspielzeug begun in 1924 and finished in 1933 (published 1934), we find the sentiment expressed that the important question is not how to increase our bank account or how to carve out a career for ourselves but what we can do to promote a healthy development of our people. The "Riesenspielzeug" is an experimental farm near the Swiss border conducted by a group of people dissatisfied with the social order in Germany after Bismarck's retirement. Almost all types of Germans are assembled here at one time or another, and many vital social problems are discussed. But the communistic experiment as such proves a failure. In the end we foresee that Dr. Haugh, the practical idealist, will marry Berta, the daughter of an ancient peasant family, and that they will take over the farm.

The fact that some tenets in Strauss's works coincided with those of National Socialism helped to increase the author's popularity, although he personally had never desired this.

See: Fritz Endres, Emil Strauss (1936).

E. Hof.

Strauss und Torney, Lulu von (1873–, German poet and prose writer), born in Bückeburg, was married to the publisher Eugen Diederichs in 1916. She is a compatriot of Annette von Droste-Hülshoff to whom, as both her prose and her verse show, she is closely akin. Like Annette she is firmly rooted in the soil of her homeland. Strangely unrevealing as to her emotional experiences and her inner life, even her lyrics are likely to assume an objective quality and approach the ballad. In her narrative prose direct speech plays but a minor role. Her heroes are sparing of words: a thought wells up, a long harbored desire becomes a firm resolve and its sole expression is a firmer setting of the lips while the averted eyes gaze off into the distance. An earthbound realism, which depicts every significant detail, is coupled with a visionary intensity that would pierce this earthly veil. All these things are true both of Annette and of Lulu von Strauss und Torney.

The latter's first published work of importance is a collection of peasant tales, Bauernstolz; Dorfgeschichten aus dem Weserland (1901). The theme of the opening story is peasant pride. The daughter of a rich farmer marries a laborer. She is as proud as her father, and her husband is equally proud. This stubborn pride wrecks their lives. A second collection of short stories, Sieger und Besiegte (1909), contains her finest and most powerful Novelle, "Auge um Auge." It is a story of the days when merry King Jerome ruled over the Kingdom of Westphalia. Blundering oppression and ruthless demands result in sporadic outbursts of revolt. An eye for an eye, a life for a life, is the law of the peasantry. The action moves forward relentlessly to its close, where the old farmer assumes the responsibility for the death of the French officer who has killed the farmer's wife. Though it was the son who had exacted vengeance for the death of his mother, the old man dies so that the son may live and the farm remain in the direct line of descent. A similarly heroic and tragic touch characterizes her longer novels. The first of these is Luzifer (1907), in which a 13th-century heretic forsakes the trinitarian doctrine for a belief in four gods. The fourth god is Lucifer, the innocent force of evil that is inherent in all life. The author's next novel is Judas (1911). Its setting is the Westphalian countryside in the days when the theories of the French Revolution stirred the peasantry to revolt. The following novel, Der jüngste Tag (1921), her masterpiece, has its setting in the same landscape in the days of the Anabaptists.

The verse of Lulu von Strauss und Torney ranks with her prose fiction. In her collected poems and ballads one group bears the significant title "Mutter Erde." Earth is our mother from whose womb we spring and to whose womb we return. Her life is our life. The majestic song of the beeches, "Grüne Zeit," marks the pinnacle of Frau Lulu's lyric art. It is the one forest song in German verse that rivals Gottfried Keller's (q.v.) "Waldlied" in concept and in rhythm. Her ballads place her among the very first masters of this form in our time. Many have a historical setting and deal with great heroic figures, others deal with our day and the hero may be an aged peasant who dies content when he has garnered his last sheaf. The collected poems and ballads were published in 1919 in Reif steht die Saat. The opening poem struck the keynote. For years the grim reaper had been an all too frequent guest. He had garnered aplenty. Now he listens to the song of the widow Mara who woos him because she loves life's fullness and knows that love and death are inseparable. The final enlarged collection of the author's verse bears the title Erde der Väter (1936).

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, 10. Auflage (preface 1919), pp. 710-712; H. Naumann, Die deutsche Dichtung der Gegenwart (1923), pp. 167, 212, 264.

F. Br.

Streuvelds, Stijn (pseud. of Frank Lateur, 1871-, Flemish novelist and short-story writer), was born at Heule, near Kortrijk (Courtrai). His mother was a sister of the poet Guido Gezelle (q.v.). He was for 15 years the village baker at Avelghem. But in 1906 he moved to Ingoyghem and, from then on, devoted himself entirely to writing. Stijn Streuvelds is a product of the Flemish soil, he feels himself part of it, he knows the life of its peasantry because it is his own, and depicts it with the plastic power of a Brueghel. He does not belong to any school, he does not proclaim any program or theory of art, he just writes from the same natural urge that makes his Flemish countryside burst into bloom in the spring. Nature is the dominating power in all his stories. Everything that happens to his characters is predetermined by their subjection to Nature. Hence Streuvelds is a fatalist. Nature's dark, incalculable designs shape man's destinies, especially in his earlier tales, Lenteleven (1899; Spring Life), Zomerland (1900; Summer Land), Zonnetij (1900; Sun Tide), Doodendans (1901; Dance of Death), and the novel, Langs de Wegen (1902, Along the Roads; Eng. tr., Old Jan, 1936). The influence of Strindberg and Dostoevski (qq.v.) no doubt colored his pessimism. In later stories, however, a serener mood prevails. In Stille Avonden (1905; Quiet Evenings) he sounds a note of tenderness and compassion and hope. Here disillusionment gives way to a contented acceptance of life. Nature still dominates the scene but no longer like an inexorable nemesis. In the novel De Vlaschgaard (1907; The Flax Field) the story is that of the progress of the seasons through the land, and on that vast scene, against the backdrop of the sky, his characters move charged with passions whose explosion is an intrinsic part of the cosmic drama. There is a biblical grandeur in this story that gives it rank among the great novels of modern times. There is, it is true, a certain similarity among all his tales that results from his exclusive interest in only one phase of life, that of the lowly tiller of the soil. Streuvelds, in consequence, is apt to be repetitious. In that respect he is inferior to Balzac, Flaubert (q.v.), and Zola (q.v.). He has sought strength in limitation. He is a great narrator, but only in his narrowly restricted genre. When he tried for once, in Dorpslucht (Village Atmosphere), to paint the village bourgeoisie, or to reanimate the past in his retelling of the legend of Genoveva of Brabant, the result was a failure. He is exclusively the epic poet of the Flemish soil and its humble tiller and, within that limited range, a very great one.

See: A. de Ridder, Stijn Streuvelds, zyn leven en zyn werk (1908) and La Littérature flamande contemporaine (1923).

A. J. B.

Strindberg, Johan August (1849-1912, Swedish dramatist, novelist, short-story writer, poet, and essayist), was born in Stockholm, the fourth in a family of 11 children. Various circumstances of his home life provided the hypersensitive Strindberg with acute and sometimes morbid memories of unpleasantness: a round of births and deaths, stern, unrelenting parents, insufficient funds, a feeling of being unwanted, and a sense of inferiority. At school things were no better until he reached the Stockholm Lyceum, at which institution his intellectual curiosity was awakened by a study of the natural sciences. He made a false start at Uppsala in 1867, returned to Stockholm after a semester, taught grammar school, was a physician's assistant, made an attempt to become an actor, did some writing, and was back at the university for the fall term of 1870. He remained there two academic years, spending much time in reading and writing. By the early spring of 1872, when he gave up his university studies, Strindberg was busy with his ninth literary opus. A play, I Rom (1871; In Rome), presented at the Dramatic Theatre, had attracted the attention of King Charles XV, and a grant of money from the royal funds resulted.

Although he expended much time and energy in study and experiments devoted to the sciences, it is as a creative artist that Strindberg has a permanent reputation. All his labor in the sciences was but a getting for literary spending. It took much experience, a great variety of activities, to furnish material for some 70 dramas, a dozen and more novels, many short stories, historical sketches, satires, travel tales, poems, and innumerable essays (the Landquist edition of Strindberg's collected works has 55 volumes). His first outstanding literary composition was the prose version of Mäster Olof (Eng. tr., Master Olof, 1915), a drama written in 1871–1872 but refused by theaters and publishers alike and hence not printed or produced until 1881. This was a work that revealed Strindberg as a dramatist of the highest rank as well as a master of the Swedish language. His early reputation, however, must be credited to Röda rummet (1879; Eng. tr., The Red Room, 1913). This book was hailed as the first naturalistic social novel of the Scandinavian North, but it was by no means solely dependent on objective observations. Strindberg, then unacquainted with Zola (q.v.), was influenced by Flaubert (q.v.) and the Goncourts (q.v.). At the same time he also owed much to Rousseau and Dickens. His naturalism was not then or later unqualified.

From 1874 to 1882 Strindberg was an assistant at the Royal Library in Stockholm. During this period he married Siri von Essen, and three children were born of this union. Between 1883 and 1889 he and his family were traveling about Europe, for the most part in France and Switzerland, with Strindberg coming and going even more often than his family. He returned to Stockholm temporarily in October, 1884, to stand trial on charges of blasphemy arising from the publication of Giftas (1884; Married), the first collection of stories with this title. Although freed of the charges, Strindberg received a violent nervous shock from which he never fully recovered. The second collection of Giftas stories (1885; Eng. tr., one-volume edition of the two collections, Married, 1913) reveals a gravitation toward misanthropy. Thenceforward the domestic scene, especially the cruel battle of the sexes, receives prominent attention. Note, for example, Fadren (1887; Eng. tr., The Father, 1907), Kamraterna (1888; Eng. tr., Comrades, 1912), Fröken Julie (1888; Eng. tr., Julie, 1911; later translated as Miss Julia and Countess Julia), Bandet (1893; Eng. tr., The Link, 1912), Dödsdansen (1901; Eng. tr., The Dance of Death, 1912). It must also be remarked that Strindberg was thrice married, thrice divorced, and five times a father.

Among his literary outpourings in the 80's are the four autobiographical novels captioned Tjänstekvinnans son (Eng. tr. of the first of these, also entitled Tjänstekvinnans son, The Son of a Servant, 1913), all written in 1886, with the first three volumes published during 1886–1887, the fourth in 1909. The novels are an index to the extreme subjectivism of Strindberg's writings, and they are also forerunners of expressionism and "stream of consciousness" books. The later autobiographical sketches Inferno (1897; Eng. tr., The Inferno, 1913) and Legenden (1898; Eng. tr., Legends, 1912), derived from a period of intense suffering, are transmuted into the Till Damaskus dramatic trilogy (3 parts, 1898–1904; Eng. tr., To Damascus, 1933–1935). In the trilogy, experiences are set forth directly from psychic apprehension without correction by reference to a plane of sensuous reality. Artistic manipulation obtains, but subjective distortion is cultivated. In dramas like Ett drömspel (1902; Eng. tr., The Dream Play, 1912) and Spöksonaten (1907; Eng. tr., The Spook Sonata, 1916; later translated as The Ghost Sonata) the lack of objective analysis is still more pronounced.

Strindberg worked as only a great artist can, exploiting at the same time diametrically opposed moods, settings, and dramatic personae. Thus during the 80's when bitterness dominated so much of his work, he was also writing prose fiction such as the utopian Lycksalighetens ö (1884; The Isle of the Blessed); the delightful story with its setting in the Stockholm archipelago, Hemsöborna (1887; The Dwellers of Hemsö); the novelette, Den romantiske klockaren på Rånö (1888; The Romantic Sexton of Rånö); and the travel sketches, Bland franska bönder (1886–89; Among French Peasants).

After his nervous crisis of the 90's Strindberg returned to Sweden to take up permanent residence. Once more he wrote feverishly. There were historical plays such as Gustav Vasa (1899; Eng. tr., 1916), Erik XIV (1899; Eng. tr., 1931), Carl XII (1901), Kristina (1901), and Bjälbo-Jarlen (1908; The Earl of Bjälbo). And there were chamber plays, written for the Intimate Theatre which he established in 1907—Oväder (1907; Eng. tr., The Thunderstorm, 1913) and Brända tomten (1907; Eng. tr., After the Fire, 1913). Likewise during this period he wrote his two most cutting satires, Götiska rummen (1904; Gothic Rooms) and Svarla fanor (1904; Black Flags).

No simple formula will characterize Strindberg, no brief space can do him justice, and no label of school or literary movement may be unqualifiedly attached to him. He is without doubt the greatest dramatic artist that the Swedes have produced, perhaps the greatest literary genius that has come out of Sweden.

Most of the plays mentioned here may be found in the following collections: Plays, tr. by Edith and Warner Oland (3 vols., 1912–1914); Plays, four series, tr. by Edwin Björkman (1912–1916); Easter and Other Plays, tr. by C. D. Locock, E. Classen, E. Palmstierna, and J. B. Fagan (1929); Lucky Peter's Travels and Other Plays, tr. by C. D. Locock, E. Classen, Elizabeth Sprigge, and C. Napier (1930); Master Olof and Other Plays, tr. by C. D. Locock and Joan Bulman (1931).

See: A. Engström, August Strindberg och jag (1923); G. Lindblad, August Strindberg som berättare (1924); M. Lamm, Strindbergs dramer (2 vols., 1924-1926) and August Strindberg, Del I: Före infernokrisen (1940); C. E. W. L. Dahlström, Strindberg's Dramatic Expressionism (1930); A. Jolivet, Le Théâtre de Strindberg (1931); J. Bulman, Strindberg and Shakespeare (1933).

C. E. W. L. D.

Strug, Andrzej (pseud. of Tadeusz Gałeczki, 1873-1937, Polish novelist), was born at Konstantynówka near Lublin, Russian Poland. He was educated in the Lublin Gymnasium, his companions there being the famous pleiad of Lubliners who from 1891 to 1894 kept the University of Warsaw constantly in a patriotic ferment. Strug himself studied not in Warsaw but at the Puławy Agricultural Institute. He was, however, no less ardent a patriot than his friends in Warsaw and was arrested with them in 1894 and deported to Archangel. On being released he engaged even more actively than before in conspiratorial activities, now as a member of the Polish Socialist Party. When the party was forced to go underground after 1905, Strug settled in Paris and devoted himself to the task of recording in fictional form his experiences as a revolutionist. His most important work from this period was Ludzie podziemni (1908; Workers Underground). During the First World War, Strug served in the field with Piłsudski and in 1918 settled in Warsaw. Up to 1926 he took an active part in politics but following the May coup found himself in the opposition and withdrew from the political arena. Strug's most ambitious work was the antimilitarist novel of the First World War, Żółty krzyż (1933; The Yellow Cross), unfortunately not a success artistically on account of its diffuseness. Strug was a great revolutionist and a man of sterling character, and his chronicles of the revolutionary epoch of 1905 may well assure him literary immortality.

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, I (1927), 193-212; Wiadomości literackie, 1938, No. 10 (entire issue).

A. P. C.

Stuckenberg, Viggo (1863-1905, Danish lyric poet, novelist), was born on Zealand and lived long under straitened circumstances as a teacher in Copenhagen. Stuckenberg's home, however, with the poet's wife Ingeborg as muse, drew a small group of talented youthful writers, Sophus Claussen (q.v.), Johannes Jørgensen (q.v.), and others.

The problems and the creeds of the 80's and the 90's appear in procession before us in this author's works. Rationalistic realism and the young poet's own high hopes of a new dawn ushered in by enlightenment (see Georg Brandes) color Messias (1889; The Messiah). Disillusioned naturalism with stress laid upon poverty, sordidness, and the power of inheritance and environment marks Asmadaeus (1899). Symbolistic neo-romanticism in the form of haunting medieval mysticism appears, however, in the ballad drama Den vilde Jaeger (1894; The Wild Huntsman), showing the effects of the "new awakening of the 90's." Clearly confessional, on the other hand, is the novelette Fagre Ord (1895; Fair Words). Vejbred (1899; Eng. tr., By the Wayside, 1917) presents in strangely beautiful rhythmic prose youth's eternal quest for high adventure. Stuckenberg is, however, greatest in his poetry, particularly in the collection Sne (1901; Snow). The soul of the poet is here laid bare—in the deep straightforward love for Ingeborg, in the despair that shook the roots of his being when she left him, in the confession of his faith. Stuckenberg's philosophy is valiant and well-tried: life is bitter, but woe to him who laments and counts his wounds; go through the flames. Life still deserves all praise. Love in Stuckenberg is a tremendous force, at times a witchery that blasts life, but love is also "the lonely blade of green grass growing on the stony road." As to religion the poet believes that "a God exists somewhere, but One who turns in disgust from those who grovel before Him, a God who watches if man walks unconquered through the gates of life." Certain symbols recur frequently in Stuckenberg, e.g., snow (peace), but the poet's language is infinitely shaded and rich in effects. Life vouchsafed Stuckenberg devoted friends and a second brief spell of happiness when he remarried not long before his death.

See: H. G. Topsøe-Jensen, Scandinavian Literature from Brandes to Our Day (1929); Helge Kjaergaard, Die dänische Literatur der neuesten Zeit (1871-1933) (1934).

C. K. B.

Suarès, André (1868-, French poet, critic, and essayist), cuts in modern French letters the same quixotic figure which his uncouth appearance and jet black hair worn at shoulder's length presented long ago to his classmates of the Ecole Normale Supérieure (1886–1889). In 1935 the French Academy awarded him its Grand Prix de Littérature as a token of belated recognition for an impressive array of works the unity of which lies in the author's contention that he is first and foremost an errant knight of Beauty. Thus his title Le Voyage du condottière, which otherwise covers a three-volume series of Italian impressions (Vers Venise, 1910; Fiorenza, 1932; Sienna la bien-aimée, 1932), takes on a symbolic meaning. It describes the tumultuous journey of a soul naturally inclined toward an earthly, sensuous realism, but dragged down to the depths of negation and despair by the "tragic," bitterly logical realization that the world (and the self) forever escapes our grasp except in the silent possession of death, except, too, in the miracle of poetic vision which alone, in the words of Spinoza, has the power to make things verae seu reales—i.e., to transmute transient truth into permanent reality.

Suarès's poems, whether called Images de la grandeur (1901) or Rêves de l'ombre (1937), presuppose an almost omniscient mind, equally conversant with sciences, especially mathematics and philology, and the arts. Music is an essential ingredient (Wagner, 1899; Debussy, 1922; Musique et poésie, 1928), closely allied to drama which Suarès practices in a semiclassical, semi-Shakespearian vein (La Tragédie d'Elektre et d'Oreste, 1905; Cressida, 1913; Polyxène, 1925). Likewise, he will go to Japan as a model for some of his poetry (Haï-Kaï d'Occident and Soleil de jade, both 1928), all over Europe in his literary criticism (Trois Hommes: Pascal, Ibsen, Dostoïevsky, 1913; Poète tragique: Portrait de Prospero, 1921; Goethe le grand Européen, 1932; Trois Grands Vivants: Cervantes, Tolstoï, Baudelaire, 1937), through the length and breadth of human experience in his numerous essays (Voici l'Homme, 1906; Sur la vie, 2 vols., 1912; Valeurs, 1936).

With one exception (Sur la mort de mon frère, 1904), Suarès the private man withdraws into jealous seclusion. Biographical information about him is extremely scarce and further obscured by his habit of espousing, as it were, the personalities of great figures of the past, of celebrated characters of fiction (Prospero, Don Juan, Manon), even of "doubles" created by his own imagination (André de Séipse, Yves Scantrel, Caerdal). However, despite the fact that Caerdal—the condottière—poses as a Celt from Brittany and that, to a German scholar, Suarès exemplifies der nordisch Mensch, the truth is that he was born in Vallon-de-l'Oriol, a Marseille suburb, from Portuguese and half-Jewish ancestry. The sonorous magnificence of his style, the healthy quality of his work (for all its somber hues), not to mention a loving "portrait" of his native town (Marsiho, 1933), bespeak his Southern origins. His own claim, besides, is that he is, culturally at least, a "Phocæan Greek," an exponent of Hellenistic ideals, forcefully opposed to all forms of "barbaric" hegemony, whether political (Roman) or racial (Germanic). The note which rang through his Nation contre la race (2 vols., 1916) reappears, only amplified, in his recent Vues sur l'Europe. This, his latest book, was written in 1936 but withheld because of its possibly "dangerous" controversial character. Pathetically enough, it was released in 1939, when it seemed timely and appropriate to throw diplomatic caution to the winds.

See: Frédéric Lefèvre, Une Heure avec . . . I (1924), 249–266; Gabriel Bounoure, reviews in Nouvelle Revue française, XXXII (1929), 866–875, XLV (1935), 623–627, XLIX (1937), 500–504; M. Martin du Gard, Harmonies critiques (1936), pp. 138–148.

J.-A. B.

Suckert, Curzio (pseud. Malaparte, 1898–, Italian publicist and short-story writer), born in Prato in Tuscany, came to prefer his pen name (which is a play on Napoleon's last name) to his own. He was one of the most genuine representatives of the adventurous youth which made Fascism possible in Italy. At 16 he volunteered with an expedition of Garibaldians who went to France. He fought valiantly, was wounded in the Argonne, and later enlisted in the Italian army. After the First World War he was for two years a diplomat, then turned free lance writer and newspaper correspondent. However, he never became an outstanding figure in Fascism and always preserved his own originality and independence of thought—which in 1933 brought him five years of confinement on the island of Lipari and later procured him other annoyances from the Fascist police. As a writer, he enjoys an international reputation as a brilliant political interpreter, as well as a colorful critic, of Fascism. His books, translated into English, French, and Spanish, present Fascism as the reaction of Italy to Europe or as a provincial agricultural traditional country life opposed to a plutocratic bourgeois city life. For some years, with Maccari and Longanesi, he represented the literary school called the Strapaese, or ultra-national.

In his Italia barbara (1925) he championed what foreigners generally objected to in Italians: poverty, the stiletto, and the lottery. He preferred the inn to the grand hotel, bare legs to silk stockings, street brawls to election fights. One of his books, Technique du coup d'état (1931; Eng. tr., Coup d'état, the Technique of Revolution, 1932), is replete with paradoxical observations about the means resorted to by Lenin and Mussolini in seizing power. He also wrote stories, half-whimsical, half-realistic, where Tuscany, land of genius and arrogance, plays the title role. Russia, Palestine, and Norway form the background for other tales, e.g., Sodoma e Gomorra (1931); in these he enjoys picturing Voltaire attempting to discover what kind of sin was committed by the citizens of Gomorrah; or the Freudian jealousy of a Nordic minister for his daughter who closely resembles his lost wife. Part of the story of his exile in Lipari (Fughe in prigione, 1936) was translated: "On the Island of Lipari," Yale Review, Summer, 1935. He always writes with a rich vocabulary, a touch of originality, a sort of impudence and directness. There is a decided charm in his adaptations of popular rhythms. Originally he owed much to Soffici (q.v.), but more and more he has followed his own bent.

During the Second World War he was sent to Finland, Germany, Rumania, Croatia, and Russia as a correspondent; and from these experiences came forth Kaputt (1944), a first-rate book, anti-German, anti-Fascist, full of color, of cruelty, of laughs, of paradoxes, revealing Malaparte as a powerful story-teller, similar to Axel Munthe, author of San Michele. From the king of Sweden crocheting beautiful designs to the noble Jews of the ghetto of Warsaw, from the squadron of horses frozen in a lake of Finland to the Spanish ambassador's dog who became frenzied at the sound of airplanes—jailers and jailed, men and animals, parade humorously and humanly before the reader.

See: A. Baldini, Amici allo spiedo (1932), pp. 5-11; G. Ravegnani, I Contemporanei, Ser. 2 (1936), pp. 341-348.

G. P.

Sudermann, Hermann (1857-1928, German dramatist and novelist), was the son of a brewer whose family, of the Mennonite faith, originally had come from Holland; his mother belonged to a local family. His birthplace, Matziken, lies close to the Russian boundary line of East Prussia where German and Lithuanian racial elements are inextricably mixed. Despite their poverty his parents managed to give him a good education. He attended first the University of Königsberg in East Prussia, then the University of Berlin where he went at the age of 20. Except for short travels he was never to leave the capital of the Reich. Sudermann's development was somewhat influenced by the writer Hans Hopfen, into whose home he came as a teacher for Hopfen's children. After a lean beginning as an editor of a small political weekly, Sudermann began writing short stories. A collection of these appeared in 1886 under the title Im Zwielficht. He then wrote two novels, Frau Sorge (1887; Eng. tr., Dame Care, 1891) and Der Katzensteg (1889; Eng. tr., Regine, 1894); neither won attention until the overwhelming success of his first play, Die Ehre (1889; Eng. tr., Honor, 1915).

From then on, one play after another came from his pen in rapid succession. The best known are Sodoms Ende (1891; Eng. tr., The Man and His Picture, 1903), Heimat (1893; Eng. tr., Magda, 1896), Die Schmetterlingsschlacht (1893; Eng. tr., The Battle of the Butterflies, 1914), Das Glück im Winkel (1895; Eng. tr., The Vale of Content, 1915), Morituri (1896; Eng. tr., 1910), Johannes (1898; Eng. tr., John, 1902), Die drei Reiherfedern (New York, 1898, Stuttgart, 1899; Eng. tr., The Three Heron's Feathers, 1900), Johannesfeuer (1900; Eng. tr., St. John's Fire, 1904), Es lebe das Leben (1902; Eng. tr., The Joy of Living, 1902), and Blumenboot (1906). In the last named he returned to a kind of social drama which he had begun with Sodoms Ende. Sturmgeselle Sokrates (1903) was meant to be political comedy, Stein unter Steinen (1905) is an ex-convict drama. The novel Das hohe Lied (1908; Eng. tr., The Song of Songs, 1909) and the historical play Strandkinder (1909) mark the end of Sudermann's first period. The plays he wrote before the First World War, Der Bettler von Syrakus (1911), Der gute Ruf (1912; Eng. tr., A Good Reputation, 1915), and Die Lobgesänge des Claudian (1914), demonstrated somewhat new approaches to the dramatic field, but they were only mildly successful.

When Sudermann turned toward patriotic topics during and after the war (e.g., Das deutsche Schicksal, 1921), the public ignored his efforts. But at the same time he found a fertile field for his pen in the stories, legends, and beliefs of his East Prussian home, and his volume of prose Litauische Geschichten (1917; Eng. tr., The Excursion to Tilsit, 1930) is generally regarded as his best work. In Frau Sorge he had attempted to show the inner development of a man, but with insufficient stylistic means; here he is the simple storyteller who forgets most of the tricks of his other trade. The autobiographical Bilderbuch meiner Jugend (1922; Eng. tr., Book of My Youth, 1923) leads to the third and last phase of his life, during which he produced three important novels, Der tolle Professor (1926; Eng. tr., The Mad Professor, 1928), Die Frau des Steffen Tromholt (1927; Eng. tr., The Wife of Steffen Tromholt, 1929), and Purzelchen (1928; Eng. tr., The Dance of Youth, 1930).

Alfred Kerr, Sudermann's bitterest critic, once said that his successes were the result of his mistakes. There is a great deal of truth in that statement. At the time when his first plays were performed, the public was starving for theatrical fare—ready to overlook the artificiality of his characters and plots, the insincerity of their moralizing, the surprise turns and other theatrical tricks with which the scenes were studded. His plays have made good moving pictures. By the end of his second period the critics had caught up with him. The public began to grow cool toward his plays. Realizing that without worth-while subject matter his plays would keep on being failures, he turned again to prose writing and discovered in the peasants and the folklore of his Lithuanian home a true wellspring of epic material. Although even his later prose is not free from some of the flaws of his early works, his theatrical mannerisms are less disturbing. Thus his prose is likely to live on, but his plays may not survive the sentence pronounced upon them by such critics as Alfred Kerr and Maximilian Harden who likened them to the products of Kotzebue, Augier, Feuillet, or Sardou. More recently, Hans Naumann, in reevaluating Sudermann's Sodom's Ende, forecast a more friendly interpretation of his work.

See: A. Kerr, Das neue Drama, I (1917), 219–284; K. Busse, Hermann Sudermann; sein Werk und sein Wesen (1927); A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, 19. Auflage (1928), pp. 373–383.

W. N.

Sully-Prudhomme (pseud. of René François Armand Prudhomme, 1839–1907, French poet) was a Parisian by birth. He prepared for the Ecole Polytechnique, thought seriously of entering the Dominican order, worked for a time in the great Schneider factories at Le Creusot, studied law and philosophy, and finally, as a sequel to an unhappy love affair, became a poet. "Le Vase brisé" (in Stances et poèmes, 1865) revealed best his "blessure fine et profonde" and proved so popular that it is now a hackneyed piece. Les Epreuves (1866), Les Solitudes (1869), Les Vaines Tendresses (1875), and the posthumous Epaves (1907) belong to the same elegiac inspiration, tactfully confidential and equally removed from romantic emotionalism and Parnassian frigidity.

As early as 1869 Sully-Prudhomme's translation of the first book of Lucretius, together with the accompanying preface, heralded a new trend. Les Destinées (1872), La Justice (1886), and Le Bonheur (1888) are increasingly ambitious attempts to create the so-called "scientific-philosophic poem" envisioned by André Chénier a century earlier. However disputable the merits of the performance, it must be said for the author that he achieves on occasion a beautiful ethereal quality in his use of symbols and that he is besides the only poet of his times who gives an impression of solid competence in the fields of science and metaphysics. Here again Sully-Prudhomme, although usually classified with the Parnassians, stands athwart the line which divides them from the romanticists. No self-appointed Messiah like Victor Hugo but no nihilist like Leconte de Lisle (q.v.), he lifts poetry from some of the gloom into which positivistic pessimism had plunged it for a generation and teaches his belief that the road to happiness lies through pain, self-sacrifice, and brotherly love. "Le Zénith," a poem of circumstance published in the Revue des deux mondes in 1876, commemorates the fatal ascent of three balloonists who anticipated present-day excursions into the stratosphere. This lofty composition, dedicated to man's intrepid quest for the truth, gives a cue to Sully-Prudhomme's own lifework and to the reasons why he, a member of the French Academy since 1881, was deemed worthy of the Nobel prize (1901).

See: Camille Hémon, La Philosophie de M. Sully-Prudhomme (1907); Ernest Zyromsky, Sully-Prudhomme (1907); Edmond Estève, Sully-Prudhomme, poète sentimental et poète philosophe (1925); Pierre Flottes, Sully-Prudhomme et sa pensée (1930).

J.-A. B.

Supervielle, Jules (1884–, French poet, story writer, and dramatist), was born in Montevideo, Uruguay, of a French family which had come originally from the Basque country. He made his first journey to France at the age of eight months; his parents died when he was still an infant. His life has been divided between Spanish America and France. Studies in the law, political science, and modern languages seemed to be leading to a career in diplomacy. Then he married, and dedicated himself to poetry.

"I started from zero," he once wrote to a close friend. His first slender volumes (Brumes du passé, 1901; Comme des voiliers, 1910) were feeble imitations of the Parnassian manner. His Poèmes (1919) and his Débarcadères (1922) contain admirable lines and show a definite gift; fuller realization comes with Gravitations (1925), not actually surrealist although long considered so. Subsequently, and thanks in part to the friendship and counsel of Jean Paulhan, director of the Nouvelle Revue française, Supervielle has made constant progress as a literary artist.

After several experiments in fiction (L'Homme de la Pampa, 1923; Le Voleur d'enfants, 1926; Le Survivant, 1928) he found the right formula for himself in 1931 with his first short stories, L'Enfant de la haute mer, which were followed somewhat later by L'Arche de Noé (1938) and Le Petit Bois (1942). These three collections reveal a narrator whose tone is unique in French letters—a marvelous fusion of the tender and the burlesque, of grandeur and simplicity. Supervielle has also written plays (Bolivar, 1936; La Belle au bois, 1932; La Première Famille, 1936), a volume of souvenirs (Boire à la source, 1933), an adaptation of Shakespeare (Comme il vous plaira, 1925). But he continues to put into his poetry a considerable part, and perhaps the very best part, of himself: Le Forçat innocent (1930), Les Amis inconnus (1934), La Fable du monde (1938), and finally the wartime Poèmes de la France malheureuse (1941) mark finer and finer craftsmanship and increasing depth.

Although Supervielle generally lives in a universe of restless fancy, although he has claimed for poetry a rarely explored domain (that of the most recondite feelings) and produced an abundance of myths, he has never been indifferent to history. The Boer War, the First World War, the Spanish civil war, and the French defeat of 1940 have all had echoes in his poetry. At the same time history never utterly absorbs him; he remains also the poet concerned at once with the humblest objects and with the sweep of the planets through space and the poet of sentiments so elementary as to be too often neglected (the simpler relationships of love, paternity, and the like).

Supervielle is the most unassuming and the least arriviste of men, yet his human qualities, coupled with his talent, have won him, especially from about 1930, the admiration and the affection of younger writers. Two testimonial numbers of the periodicals Avant-Poste (1935) and Regains (1938) prove the impression he has made. At least five or six of the poets who have written about him consider him a foil to Rimbaud (q.v.)—which most certainly does not mean an anti-Rimbaud—or at least as complementary to Rimbaud. Supervielle accepts the human situation: he is not one who is "in revolt against death," he is a complete man also (as he writes in a letter), "a literary anarchist" at the outset and in the final stage "classic." Of his total work, which is extensive, part undoubtedly is perishable; the rest is likely to endure as long as our civilization.

See: C. Sénéchal, Jules Supervielle (1939).
E.

surrealism. Following close upon political chaos and social upheaval at the end of the First World War, surrealism brought to a head a gradually intensified indictment of some 70 years' standing in French literature and art, directed at the same time against the otherworldly escapism of the romanticists and against naturalism's close adherence to external reality.

The poet had long been represented as a captive trying to tear down his prison walls. Then as science gradually cleared up one after the other the mysteries of the physical world, the ultimate barrier to the unknown assumed an ever greater impermeability. Yet even more resolutely did the poet take up the cry by which, according to the surrealists, Charles Baudelaire (q.v.) had launched "the great modern tradition" in the last two lines of his "Voyage": to find something new in the abysses of the unknown whether the adventure lead to heaven or perdition. And as science in the latter part of the 19th century made of the metaphysical or speculative infinite a less satisfactory haven for the seekers of the unknown, the poet was ready to substitute for it what Renan (q.v.) called l'infini réel and to illustrate in art the concept of an infinite based on the unconditional acceptance of concrete reality. But the word reality gradually ceased to be identified with anything like a stylized "nature" and, on the contrary, was sought in deliberate distortions of accepted views of physical and human nature. The first major examples of this subversive concept of reality were revealed around 1870 in the works of Lautréamont and Rimbaud (qq.v.) and in Mallarmé's (q.v.) Igitur. These were conscious steps towards disregarding natural objects and phenomena by a refusal to imitate them in literature and towards dehumanizing emotions. Here were the beginnings of a mystical atheism that was to form the core of surrealism.

This process of breaking down the accepted concept of nature reached a crisis during the First World War at the hands of a group of notorious demolitionists known as dadaists. But soon a number of young intellectuals, graduating from the excesses of dada, formed their own coterie about 1920, which they called surréalisme following Guillaume Apollinaire (q.v.) who had used the word surréaliste to designate a reality above the accepted and obvious one. André Breton (q.v.) was the father of the movement, and he had as his principal co-workers for varying periods of time Philippe Soupault, Louis Aragon (qq.v.), Georges Hugnet, René Crevel, E. Mesens, and Paul Eluard (q.v.). A host of painters became their associates in this systematic, quasi-scientific experimentation with surreality. Their principal journals were Littérature, organized in 1919, about a year before the official advent of surrealism, and Révolution surréaliste (1924–1930), transformed in 1930 into Surréalisme au service de la révolution. The aims, theories, and quarrels of the surrealists were publicized in two manifestoes in 1924 and 1930 by André Breton. Surrealist experiences with what might be called the fourth dimension in literature involved simulation of mental disorders—which according to Breton was to replace the ballad, the sonnet, and the epic form—spiritualist seances, automatic writing, willful dreaming, and sexual aberrations. In 1928 the surrealists celebrated the 50th anniversary of Jean Martin Charcot's publication of studies in hysteria and accepted him as one of their precursors because he had shown scientifically the possibilities for the human mind to conciliate reality with the dream and to experience this conciliation without exterior stimuli or artificial hypnosis.

Yet it is not in its exhibitionism, psycho-physiological theories, and journalistic anarchy that surrealism's contributions to a new mysticism and its effects on literary form are to be found. It is rather in the more authentically literary works, principally Breton's Nadja (1928), Aragon's Le Paysan de Paris (1926), Crevel's L'Esprit contre la raison (1927) and Le Clavecin de Diderot (1932), and Eluard's Les Dessous d'une vie, ou la Pyramide humaine (1926), that the surrealists crystallized, in a fusion of poetry and prose, a new philosophy of reality. In most of these writings the concept of order is attacked as the primary obstacle in the way of man's exploration here on earth of the infinite. Humanity has been basing its evaluations of natural phenomena, they say, on a preconceived notion of order and then attributing this man-conceived order to the merveilleux. It is disorder, then, that has been inconceivable. And now a reliance on Providence, generally considered the manifestation of the mystical order of things, must give way to the worship of hazard or chance, the mystical manifestation of the inconceivable but existent disorder of things. By extracting this "divine" disorder, left so long undisturbed in concrete entities, the surrealists hope to perceive the concrete face of the infinite. "The concrete form of disorder is the outer limit of the mind," said Aragon in Le Paysan de Paris, the Bible of this new metaphysics. If the mind can sufficiently free itself from logic to be receptive to this disorder, then it will have overpowered the laws of nature and risen above what Crevel calls le bric-à-brac réaliste: gravitation can disappear, fruits and flowers don new colors, night change place with day, the living and the dead hold hands, and the whole movement of existence pause in eternal expectancy. Breton's Nadja, the most authentic of surrealism's brain children, was a product of this mysticism as she loomed on the literary horizon gracefully hiding her face behind the heavy, nonexistent feather of her hat and saw a blue wind passing in the trees.

Glaring peculiarities which exposed the surrealists to criticism and ridicule were the obscurity of language and the antisocial note emanating from many of their manifestoes. Yet neither of these tendencies is a pose or an aim in itself. The oddities of language arise out of an attempt to create a new foundation for literary imagery. For centuries comparison had furnished this basis. Now, dependent as it is on logic, comparison is no longer considered adequate. The poet's eye discerns the merveilleux in the contradictions that appear within the generally accepted realities. The new imagery must be based not on comparison but its opposite, contradiction: it is this contradiction in language expressing the disordinate in nature as perceived by the irrational qualities of mind that is the essence of surrealism. As for the antisocial character, it came as a natural consequence of the poet's withdrawal from the ordinate aspects of physical nature: the illogical turn of mind which creates the new reality possesses something of the mystical disorder it sees in inanimate things and in cultivating the inner disorder spurns the qualities of mind and emotions which are the symbols of man's stability—love of home, love of country, love of humanity. But these traits of surrealism were short-lived, and when viewed in relation to the passion and fearless literary experimentation of which they are but the superficial tinsel, they lose the importance that pseudo surrealists and the critics of these have attributed to them.

The historical importance of surrealism lies in the fact that it is not a detached phenomenon in itself but part of a long development in poetic thought. Some of today's most challenging poets passed early in their careers within the wide orbit of this spiritual crisis—Aragon, Breton, Eluard, and others such as Pierre Reverdy and Jules Supervielle (qq.v.) who were never officially surrealists. Its bravura days came to a quick end. Many of yesterday's iconoclasts, who were at first touched a little by the insanity they tried to imitate, have become sober literary workmen. But they have not relinquished their dream of representing a materio-mystical experience with its locale somewhere outside both life and death. And on this intermediary plane a new image has been cultivated, freed of the "cheville," released from the bondage of excessive symbolism and pure abstractions, and assuming a stark concreteness without which the surrealists believe that there can be no poetry.

See: M. Raymond, De Baudelaire au surréalisme (1933); G. Hugnet, "Préface," in Petite Anthologie du surréalisme (1934); A. Béguin, L'Ame romantique et le rêve (2 vols., 1937); G. E. Lemaître, From Cubism to Surrealism in French Literature (1941). "Interview with André Breton," View, October–November, 1941, p. 2; M. Nadeau, Histoire du surréalisme (1945).

A. B.

Svensson, Jón (1857–1944, Icelandic novelist), was born at Möðruvellir, Hörgárdalur, North Iceland. As a boy he was offered free education in France by Catholic missionaries in Iceland, with a view to making a convert out of him. He became a Jesuit and a teacher in Denmark. Just before the First World War he began to write down the memories of his youth that he had so often told to his pupils with marked success. The result was the book Nonni (1913; "Nonni" was his own pet name as a boy), the first in a long series of Nonni books that have become extremely popular reading among boys, especially Catholic boys, all over the world. Written originally in German, they have since been translated into many languages. Of the other books in the series, these may be mentioned: Nonni und Manni (1914), Sonnentage (1915), and Die Stadt am Meer (1922).

Svensson wrote with classic and telling simplicity of the adventures of his childhood, of his first trip to Denmark, of his early days in Copenhagen, of excursions about the smiling Danish islands. His subjects are often seemingly commonplace, but he holds the attention of both young and old as if he were telling an adventure story. He had two aims: to educate young readers in good Christian ways and to impart to them some of his own deep-felt love for his distant homeland. Svensson was an extremely popular lecturer in Catholic Europe and elsewhere. As an octogenarian he went on a lecture trip around the world, visiting America and Japan, where he was hailed by the youngsters as if he were a new Hans Christian Andersen. Returning to Europe just before the Second World War, he died in Cologne on November 1, 1944.

See: P. Bourget, "Introduction," Récits islandais: Nonni et Manni, Nonni et Elis (1924); H. Hannesson, "Nonni áttæður," Eimreiðin, XLIII (1937), 413–431; J. Hrubý, Nonni, skald z pulnocni výspy (1939).

S. E.

Světlá, Karolina (pseud. of Johanna Mužáková, née Rottová, 1830–1899, Czech novelist), is the most important woman novelist of her country in the second half of the 19th century. Světlá came from a well-to-do merchant family in Prague and married a Gymnasium teacher. Her pseudonym is the name of her husband's native village in the Ještěd Mountains of northern Bohemia, where many of her novels are placed. Later in life she became a close friend of Jan Neruda (q.v.). She died in Prague.

Světlá's work stands on the brink of modern realism. Her novels are either pictures of the Prague bourgeoisie or canvases of country life in the Ještěd Mountains which on a background of vivid folkloristic details depict moral conflicts, especially of women torn between love and duty. In several books Světlá studies religious problems, for which she offers the solution of religious liberalism. Světlá was a strong and even austere moralist, an ardent patriot, a feminist, a liberal thinker, a lover of the mountains and simple peasants. In some ways she can be compared with George Eliot, but her art is frequently marred by farfetched artificial plots, remnants of conventional romanticism, and undigested moralizing. Her best books are the series devoted to the people in the Ještěd Mountains: Vesnický román (1867; A Country Story), Kříž u potoka (1868; The Cross at the Brook), Frantina (1870), and Nemodlenec (1873; The Atheist). Her attempts at historical novels, set in the 18th century, are less successful (e.g., Zvonečková královna, 1872, The Queen of Bells). She wrote many short stories as well, among which Hubička (1871; The Kiss) has served as the basis of the libretto for an opera by Smetana.

See: T. Nováková, K. Světlá (1890); L. Čech, Karolina Světlá (1891); A. Novák, Myšlenky a spisovatelé (1914).

R. W.

Svevo, Italo (pseud. of Ettore Schmitz, 1861–1928, Italian novelist), was born and, except for five years in a German commercial school (1873–1878), educated in Trieste. After working in a bank until 1897, he became a manufacturer and remained in industry in his native city until his death. James Joyce, who taught him English (1906–1914), discovered his talent and called Svevo to the attention of Larbaud (q.v.) and Benjamin Crémieux whose praise brought him great recognition in the 20's. From Paris his fame spread to Italy. He left three novels, a group of short stories, and a play. The novels—Una Vita (1893), Senilità (1898), and La Coscienza di Zeno (1923; Eng. tr., The Confessions of Zeno, 1930)—are remarkable chiefly for their scrupulous psychological analysis and their use of the stream-of-consciousness technique. Like Zola (q.v.), who influenced him, Svevo aims to reproduce life in the smallest and often most tawdry detail; but his self-questioning heroes are closer to those of Dostoevski (q.v.) or to the contemporaneous Salavin of Duhamel (q.v.). His chief character is always an ineffectual, mediocre man striving to shape his life despite his own lack of will, showing great ingenuity in overcoming absurdly small obstacles but never coming to grips with the real problems. A peculiar mixture of fundamental pessimism and farcical humor, especially notable in the story Una Burla riuscita (1928; Eng. tr., The Hoax, 1929), marks all of Svevo's work. His simple, dry style often betrays his Austro-Italian ancestry and his bilingual education.

See: F. Sternberg, L'Opera di Italo Svevo (1928); "Omaggio a Svevo," Convegno, February 25, 1929.

J. O'B.

Svobodová, Růžena (née Čápková, 1868–1920, Czech novelist), was the leading woman fiction writer of her country in the early 20th century. She was born in Mikulovice near Znojmo (southern Moravia), but spent most of her life in Prague. She married the novelist F. X. Svoboda, who had a good reputation among the early Czech realists. Later she became the intimate friend of the critic F. X. Šalda (q.v.). She died in Prague.

Mrs. Svobodová began to write books in the atmosphere of later 19th-century naturalism and feminism: her early books, e.g., Na písčité půdě (1895; On Sandy Soil), are studies of sensitive, refined women who are crushed by the brutality of men and the stupidity of conventional society. The tone of accusation is strident, the style rhetorical. Later Mrs. Svobodová changed both her outlook and technique very considerably, and her best work was done early in the 20th century. She became less pessimistic and feminist, less preoccupied with the problem of the "misunderstood" woman. Her themes widen, though she still likes to depict the tragedies of sensitive women's souls and their erotic disillusionments. Mrs. Svobodová now preaches a remedy in collective love and sacrifice. She analyzes the fatal consequences of hedonistic aestheticism—she herself never quite escaped its atmosphere—and even attempts metaphysical themes of death, nature, and immortality. The technique has become that of impressionism: there is much of visual metaphor, delicate observation, knowledge and influence of the plastic arts. The style is most elaborately chiseled, ornate, and frequently precious. The novels suffer from her inability to draw the characters of men and to handle large themes. Especially her most ambitious work, Zahrada irémská (1921, The Garden of Irem; in six parts, uncompleted), which attempts a symbolic picture of the whole of our civilization, is lifeless and overburdened by unassimilated discussion. Zamotaná vlákna (1898; The Twisted Threads) and Milenky (1902; Sweethearts) are much better composed, but have sensational and sentimental plots. Mrs. Svobodová is at her best when she writes short stories, and particularly when she can use forms derived from traditional folk art, such as fairy tales, ballads in prose, and legends. Plameny a plaménky (1905; Flames and Little Flames), Marné lásky (1907; Frustrate Loves), Posvátné jaro (1916; Sacred Spring), and Po svatební hostině (1916; After the Wedding Feast) are surpassed only by Černí myslivci (1908; Black Foresters), a col lection which is unified by its finely described setting in the Bezkydy Mountains of Moravia. The charming childhood reminiscences, Rdĵ (1920; Paradise), remained a fragment.

Mrs. Svobodová was a sensitive, self-conscious artist of great ambitions who unfortunately, in spite of her ethical and social feelings, never escaped the aestheticism of her youth. Her reputation is today under an eclipse, partly because she has been immoderately overpraised by F. X. Šalda, partly because her problems and outlook (the misunderstood woman, admiration for the aristocracy) as well as her frequently affected style seem remote at this time.

See: F. X. Šalda, two essays in Duše a dílo (1913) and In memoriam R. Svobodové (1921).

R. W.

Swedish literature from 1830 to about 1870 had been one of middle-class liberalism and had reflected, with more or less intensity, the desire for social betterment. But at the end of this period many of the democratic reforms demanded had been carried out; consequently writers turned from material and political questions to the more religious and philosophical, and polite letters became "nobly realistic" or idealistic. The radical tendencies from abroad did not affect profoundly, if at all, such authors as Snoilsky, Wirsén, and Rydberg (qq.v.). Snoilsky, poet, aristocrat, and "Sweden's last classicist," continued during the naturalistic agitation of the 80's to treat historical personalities with sympathy and understanding in his usual elegant form. Wirsén, prolific lyricist, sharp critic, sworn conservative, and long secretary of the Swedish Academy, remained until his death (1912) the determined antagonist of naturalism. Rydberg, Hellenic humanist and sponsor of religious liberalism, wrote reflective lyrics in the style of Goethe and made an excellent translation of the first part of Faust (1876). But he was, also, Sweden's greatest novelist before Strindberg, and perhaps of all time. Typical of his humanism in prose form is Vapensmeden (1891; The Armorer), which deals with religious intolerance during the Reformation. Prominent dramatists of the Rydberg era were Frans Hedberg (1828-1908) and Harald Molander (1858-1900), who was also a novelist and capable theatre director.

These authors tended to preserve at least a modicum of balance and moderation in Swedish letters during the more turbulent "period of the Eighties," as it was called, when native, classical restraint was battling with new, revolutionary ideas from Denmark, Norway, England, and France. Yet the conservative and radical elements remained co-existent, even at the height of the naturalistic revolt, though this movement predominated for several years and prose fiction even threatened to supplant verse as the prevalent mode of expression. The leader of the movement for naked truth and merciless analyses of all modern problems and conditions was, of course, Strindberg (q.v.), Sweden's most stimulating and influential—also most irritating—literary genius and her greatest dramatist. His novel Röda rummet (1879; Eng. tr., The Red Room, 1913), which is generally considered the convenient starting point of "the Eighties," was followed by several powerful, ultrarealistic products, often pathological, the artistry of which was later to be discarded by the restless author himself for a series of provocative historical dramas, superb stories of the common people, and works of a symbolic, romantic, or expressionistic character. Strindberg is the personified paradox of changes and contradictions—he was in turn an atheist, a Nietzschean, a Christian, an individualist, and a democrat; the variety and quantity of his output are enormous; yet a vital proportion of his work is one constant, often agonizing, confession. His versatility included poetry, but he is much better in prose, and as for genres he is best of all in the drama. Strindberg's literary policy was pursued, in a more subdued manner, by Anne Charlotte Leffler (1849-1892), who dealt primarily with the woman question; by the more gifted but unhappy Victoria Benedicks-son (q.v.), who with a deeper understanding of social problems treated the same theme, though glorifying marriage, and in a fresh, humorous tone described the life of her native Skåne; and especially by the productive and widely read Geijerstam (q.v.), who at first gloomy and terrifying but interesting, dealing with the abnormally psychological and delving in crime, later turned actually domestic and sentimental, as in Mina pojkar (1896; Eng. tr., My Boys, 1933), or gay and humorous, as in his popular folk plays. Another eminent writer of the period was Tor Hedberg (q.v.), poet, critic, and theatre director, whose fondness for soul analysis is represented in the novel Judas (1886) and who subsequently wrote a meritorious political drama, Johan Ulfstjerna (1907). The transition from the naturalism of the 80's to the neo-romanticism of "the Nineties," so called, is typified by the lyric poet Ola Hansson (q.v.), who after portraying in an original manner and with photographic realism the moods of his native Skåne, later, like Strindberg, proclaimed the superman ideal, and plunged into mystical meditations colored by Catholicism. Another poet from the same province, A. U. Bååth (q.v.), shared with Hansson a deep sympathy for the oppressed and neglected people of society.

Swedish literature was not long satisfied with the prospects of lurid realism alone. Even lyric poetry, some of it in a realistic vein, could not be wholly suppressed during the 80's, for Sweden's muse is essentially lyric and the foremost masters of Swedish belles-lettres before Strindberg had generally employed verse as their chief medium. So the demand for a more elevated style, whether in verse or prose, for idealism, beauty, imagination, and the sovereign rights of the individual artist were resuscitated during the last decade of the 19th century. Poetry no longer occupied the exclusive position it had formerly held, and Swedish prose fiction and drama were destined in consonance with modern tendencies everywhere to retain, relatively, a more prominent place than before 1880; with the 1890's came an abundance of both verse and prose, and both of exceptional quality. In fact Swedish literature between 1890 and 1930 attains its highest eminence in history, with four contemporary names of first rank—Lagerlöf, Heidenstam, Karlfeldt, and Fröding (qq.v.), the last two pure poets, the first three Nobel prize winners. If we add these names—Hallström (q.v.), brilliant master of the short story; Levertin (q.v.), Heidenstam's talented Jewish friend and collaborator, the authority on the Swedish rococo period, poet, essayist, and noted critic; and Engström (q.v.), unique humorist, caricaturist, and inimitable interpreter of the life of farmers and fishermen—we realize that this was Sweden's richest period. Most of these authors have either wholly or in part been translated into English, as have dozens of others, and the fame of Selma Lagerlöf and Strindberg is universal. Lagerlöf is probably the most beloved of all modern Scandinavian authors and, with the understandable exception of Hans Christian Andersen, the most popular of all time. Most readers of good literature are well acquainted with her saga-and-legend milieu, whether of her native Värmland, as in Gösta Berlings saga (1891), or of Italy or Jerusalem. Outstanding qualities are her artistic taste and "naïve geniality," as well as a fairy-tale style, with a delicate balance of the real and the unreal that is truly independent of time or space. Besides, she is an undisputed master in her own story technique, and the effect is that of wholesome, moral idealism. This is true also of Heidenstam's work, in which the colorful romanticism of an oriental background, absorption in foreign travel, and later a serene, optimistic humanism and classicism prevail. Heidenstam is both a first-rank poet and a great novelist, and in the latter capacity especially seeks national themes from the era of Charles XII and the middle ages of Sweden to depict, with universal application, the duty, heroism, suffering, and sacrifice of a struggling people. Karolinerna (1897–1898; Eng. tr., The Charles Men, 1920) has become a "tragic national epos" of Sweden, with the people as heroes led by their hero king, not to victory but defeat. Karlfeldt, native of Dalecarlia and long secretary of the Swedish Academy, has with great vigor and humor immortalized in poetry the beloved scenes of that province and the solid, proud qualities and traditions of its people. In content he can be either gay or serious, and his plastic form and precise, sonorous language place him, in modern Swedish poetry, next to Fröding in artistic accomplishment. As for the latter, poet and noble philosopher par excellence, he is the greatest verse artist that Sweden has produced. Fröding's faithful, almost naturalistic descriptions of the life of the lower classes, his unsurpassed, and probably unsurpassable, rhymes and rhythms, his lyric beauty, and his extraordinary, profound, yet vagabond humor remind one of the immortal Swedish 18th-century bard, Bellman. Fröding was the first Swedish poet to follow the rhythm of the spoken tongue. Burns is said to have been his teacher; but the simplicity, melodic nuances, and general artistry of his poems are peculiarly his own. Many of those localized in Värmland approach the style of the folk song. He is a true humorist, with gaiety and melancholy blended, and has remained popular in all social circles. Insanity marred his later years, and his early death caused great sorrow in Sweden. In 1897 appeared Folk-skollärare John Chronsoughs memoarer (The Memoirs of Public School Teacher John Chronsough) by August Bondeson (1854–1906). This was an outstanding, highly original classic of Swedish humor, based on the simple life of a country school teacher. Even the brilliance of so many greater literary luminaries did not wholly eclipse its success.

After 1900 there is no definite single trend in Swedish literature. There is no school: each writer seems to go his own individual way—a Swedish characteristic in most aspects of life—while still remaining sensitive to all winds that blow, whether native or foreign. What impresses the student of the period is, first of all, the number of able creative writers: at least 50 more should be mentioned here, not to speak of a score of gifted authors in related fields. We need only name, e.g., the poets and novelists Dan Andersson, Harry Blomberg, Daniel Fallström, Karl Erik Forslund, Carl Filip Larsson, Axel Lundegård, Moa Martinson, Ture Nerman, Sten Selander, and the humorist Birger Sjöberg (qq.v.). Nor does this include the Finnish group, many of whom have written in Swedish. In general, short stories and novels continue to hold a dominant place, dealing realistically and psychologically with all phases and problems of the present day; several authors, such as Didring, Hjalmar Bergman (qq.v.), Hedberg, and Söderberg (q.v.), have written successful plays; a new generation of lyricists have described the modern city, since Stockholm has now become a world center; and the southernmost province of Skåne has produced two distinguished poets, Ekelund and Österling (qq.v.). There is an abundance of good humor, but the prevailing tone, of the prose literature in particular, is one of dark seriousness, pessimism, and disillusionment, with severe attacks on all forms of hypocrisy and social shortcomings. While it reflects Sweden's economic growth and prosperity, it deals preferably with "earth's stepchildren," such as the church, business, politics, America, the First World War, the labor movement, and various cosmopolitan currents, all furnishing backgrounds for fiction, with critical or ironical analyses of life's problems. Many authors localize their best works in their native province or region, as Selma Lagerlöf, Fröding, and Karlfeldt had done. Thus Olof Högborg (q.v.) honors Norrland; Vilhelm Moberg and Elin Wägner (qq.v.), Småland; G. Ullman (q.v.), Halland; Siwertz (q.v.), Stockholm; and the Skåne poets just mentioned extol the beauties of that fertile province. There has developed a special, broad, home-region cult, in Swedish called hembygdsdikt, with faithful reproductions, in verse and prose, of the character of the people, local nature scenes, and the traditions of the author's environment.

From 1900 to 1914, says a Danish critic, a certain restlessness prevailed in Swedish letters, but through the softening influence of the 90's their skepticism and realism became more refined and their form more aesthetic. This is illustrated by the works of Söderberg, who first interprets the generation's gloom in the autobiographical novel Martin Bircks ungdom (1901; Eng. tr., Martin Birck's Youth, 1930). He then turns, with greater success, to short stories, which are brief, elegant masterpieces in plastic, perfected prose, with biting sarcasm hurled at the hypocrisies of sex and religion. Sometimes he can create a really comic scene, as in Kyrkoherdens kor (1903; The Parson's Cows). He has received impressions from J. P. Jacobsen and Anatole France (qq.v.), whereas his more bitter and intensive contemporary in the same field, Hallström, draws inspiration from Schopenhauer. Equally skeptic and resigned is Bo Bergman (q.v.), poet and short-story writer, to whom life is a hopeless existence, but who is more intimate and melancholy. In his fiction he deals, as so many of his confreres do, with less fortunate characters and the tragic incidents of everyday life and in an exquisite manner has reproduced the "fine poetic moods of beautiful Stockholm." Johan Henning Berger (q.v.), impressionistic portrait-trayer of big-city life, has located some of his novels among the struggling Swedish immigrants of America, as Bendel & Co. (1910). Ossiannilsson (q.v.), poet and prose writer, lover of strong, colorful language and historical supermen, is the militant champion of social democracy, yet he sensationally exposes political conditions and attacks class hatred and party discipline, as in Barbarskogen (1908; The Barbarian Forest). He is a revolutionary but patriotic crusader. In 1906 appeared the monumental research novel Den stora vreden (The Great Wrath), by Högborg. It is a remarkable historical culture epos, on broad lines, of the Norrland region during the reign of Charles XI and Charles XII. It is a battle between the common people, with their legends and beliefs, on one hand and the ruling clergy and officials on the other. Its Tendenz is wholly democratic—the greatest good for the greatest number. Sven Lidman (q.v.) began as an author of erotic poems, passed through a stage in which a whole series of novels, in a national, conservative vein, glorified the Silfverståhl family, and finally entered a religious period, writing novels with penetrating psychology and artistic maturity. Siwertz, an interesting, intellectual artist, was born the same year as Lidman, Elin Wägner, and Nordström (q.v.) and is one of the best stylists among the younger Swedish writers. He too made his debut with a collection of poems, but won real distinction in prose fiction, most of it localized about Lake Mälaren, as Mälarpirater

(1911; Mälar Pirates), a charming, light-hearted, boys' book, like Tom Sawyer. Some of his work utilizes the dark background of the First World War, but in America he is best known for his strong, two-volume novel Selambs (1920; Eng. tr., Downstream, 1923), which exposes the selfishness of wealth. Nordström is a prose-epic portrayer of Norrland, and in particular Ångermanland, the region first made popular, in a more primitive, romantic manner, by Pelle Molin (1864–1896). Nordström is "almost too heavily realistic" in his art, but his descriptions, notably of the fishermen, are based on personal experience. Elin Wägner, now a member of the Swedish Academy, is the good-humored sponsor of the modern woman, for whose moral and social independence she has consistently fought. She has also described the post-bellum Vienna and the Ruhr Occupation. Didring, author of the Norrland drama Midnattssol (1897; Midnight Sun), has written a significant novel trilogy, Malm (1914–1919; Ore), describing the building of the Lapland railway to the Norwegian border, and as master of dialogue and technique is one of the most successful of modern Swedish dramatists. Hjalmar Bergman, who started his literary career in 1905 with a romantic drama on the Holy Virgin, soon turned to grotesque but human prose pictures of small-town life in Sweden, especially Bergslagen. His greatest success is Markurells i Wadköping (1919; Eng. tr., God's Orchid, 1924). A play based on this novel is said to be "the generation's best [Swedish] contribution to the drama," and his comedy Swedenhielms (1925; The Swedenhielm Family) has been hailed as a real "theatrical triumph." He is the representative of humor and unrestrained fantasy. In lyric poetry Ekelund and Österling were the foremost representatives during the first two decades of the 20th century. Ekelund, author of aphorisms of a pure, severe character, reveals a personality in the style of the antique, while Österling, as an idyllic realist, has a milder, more human attitude of life. Both are influenced by the traditions of their native province, Skåne.

Since the beginning of the First World War, when many old values disappeared, the central idea in Swedish fiction, in so far as there is any, has been to portray the everyday life of the present. This is seen, e.g., in the philosophical "prose poem" Hemmabyarna (1916; The Home Villages) by Hans Larsson (q.v.), where the author finds comfort for the future in reminiscences of youth and the contemplation of his native Skåne. Inspired by social, political, and moral ideas, many authors have presented and interpreted with talent and artistry not only Swedish but world events and problems. Gustaf Hellström (q.v.), the author of profound discussion-novels, living in Paris and London, becomes Sweden's foremost foreign correspondent; Marika Stjernstedt (q.v.), who specializes in the modern woman's love and personality problems, writes about France; Anna Lenah Elgström (1884–), fiction writer, treats of America. Martin Koch (q.v.) becomes a pioneer of proletarian literature, with powerful descriptions of labor milieus; Fabian Månsson (1872–1938) discusses peoples' movements and writes heavily documented historical narratives; Vilhelm Moberg produces intensive, boldly realistic, and unforgettable novels the scenes of which are laid in Småland; Agnes von Krusenstjerna (q.v.) introduces Freudian psychiatry and "sexual romanticism"; and Valdemar Hammenhög (1902–) prefers to describe the workmen bourgeoisie. Other talented prose writers are Harald Beijer (1896–); Frans Bengtsson (q.v.), also a poet, who has written an excellent work on Charles XII; Karin Boye (q.v.), another poet of ability; Dagmar Edquist (1904–); Olof Hedberg (1899–); Harry Martinson (q.v.); Ivan Oljelund (1892–); Ivar Lo-Johansson (1901–); Mathilda Malling (1864–1942); Martin Gunnar Serner (1886–), a prolific novelist who writes under the pseudonym Frank Heller; and Hazze Zetterström (1877–1946), editor and humorist.

During the last generation Swedish poetry, as intimated above, has had to retreat somewhat before the novel, but still it has exhibited remarkable lyric strength. The most original of the younger lyrists, and the leading representative in the 1920's, is Pär Lagerkvist (q.v.), who has written metaphysical symbol-poetry in an expressionistic technique. He has also attempted to widen the scope of the drama, believing it should be more imaginative. Erik Blomberg (q.v.), journalist and translator of French, German, and English verse, has interpreted the human spirit and defiance à la Lagerkvist; G. M. Silfverstolpe (q.v.) has paid special homage to family life; Karl Asplund represents the poetry of love and the sea; Bertil Malmberg (q.v.) sounds the contrasts between reality and the world of beauty; Erik Lindorm (1889–1941), a socialist agitator, has described the oppressed poor of Stockholm; the strongly suggestive, musical verse of Hjalmar Gullberg (q.v.), characterized by piety, tenderness, and revolt, is said to have had considerable influence since 1930; Ragnar Jändel (q.v.) is the representative of religious tension among proletarian poets; Artur Lundkvist (1906-) and Harry Martinson are the leaders of the labor lyricists who are reputed to have made a sensational entree at the end of the 1930's. Both these men delve into sexual romanticism culminating in a form of primitivism. The modern Swedish output in lyric poetry is large and varied, though it may be too early to judge its permanent value.

Remarkable, also, is the quality and quantity of critical studies and literary histories written in Sweden between 1870 and 1940. And still more noteworthy, perhaps, is the high standard of literary reviews maintained by the daily press as well as the wide scope of subjects and countries covered by these reviews. Dramatic criticism—and Sweden has since Strindberg produced a number of highly successful plays not to speak of translations and presentations of foreign works—has ever remained thorough and sympathetic. Here we can mention only a few names of the outstanding Swedish critics and literary historians: Ruben Gustafsson Berg (1876-), Anton Blanck (1881-), Fredrik Böök (1883-), Gunnar Castrén (1878-), Nils Erdmann (1860-), Olof Otto Urban von Feilitzen (1834-1913), Torsten Fogelqvist (q.v.), Yrjö Hirn (1870-), Martin Lamm (1880-), John Landquist (1881-, generally regarded as the successor to Levertin), Johan Mortensen (1864-1940), Henrik Schück (1855-, the Nestor of the group), the brothers Torsten and Werner Söderhjelm (1879-1908 and 1859-1931, respectively), Sven Stolpe (1905-), Otto Sylwan (1864-), Fredrik Vetterlund (1865-, Karl J. Warburg (1852-1918), and E. H. G. Wrangel (1863-1940). Of these Castrén, Hirn, and the Söderhjelm are, or were, politically, Finns. To the above list should be added the name of the late Archbishop Nathan Söderblom (1866-1931), liberal author in the field of religious scholarship, and that of Ellen Key (q.v.), feminist and renowned writer on social topics.

Brief mention only can be made here of the rich Swedish creative literature of Finland. Zacharias Topelius (1818-1898) continued to publish immortal children's stories after 1870; Karl August Tavaststjerna (1860-1898) wrote fresh, impressionistic lyrics based on his own times; Hjalmar Procopé (1868-1927) was an acknowledged poet of rank; Bertil Gripenberg (q.v.) has translated Oscar Wilde; Harald Hornborg (1890-) has written novels with historical background; Runar Schildt (1888-1923) contributed short stories and dramas; Jarl Hemmer (q.v.), a poet, has written a powerful novel based on the Finnish civil war, En man och hans samvete, (1931), which has been translated as A Fool of Faith (1935); the novels of Sally Salminen (1906-), Katrina (1937) and Mariana (1940), are well known in America; and Mikael Lybeck (1864-1925) distinguished himself as poet, novelist, and dramatist.

See: Sveriges national-litteratur, Vols. XV-XXX (1910-1922); Fredrik Böök, Sveriges moderna litteratur (1921), also published as Vol. III of Otto Sylwan, ed., Svenska litteraturens historia (1919-1921); Nordisk familjebok (23 vols., 1923-1937); Henrik Schück and Karl Warburg, Illustrerad svensk litteraturhistoria (7 vols., 1926-1932); H. G. Topsøe-Jensen, Scandinavian Literature from Brandes to Our Day (1929); Svensk uppslagsbok (30 vols., 1930-1937).

A. B. B.

Świętochowski, Aleksander (1849-1938, Polish publicist, historian, and dramatist), was born at Stoczek, a small town in the province of Podlasie, Russian Poland, famous as the scene of an important military victory by Polish peasants in 1831. In 1866 he entered the Szkoła Główna in Warsaw and was graduated from this institution, along with Sienkiewicz (q.v.), in 1870, after it had been reorganized as a Russian university. On graduation he became at once a coeditor of the progressive journal Przegląd tygodniowy (Weekly Review; see Polish literature) and continued to contribute to this even during his absence from Warsaw (1874-1876) as a student of philosophy in Leipzig. Świętochowski was convinced, partly as a result of his studies at home and abroad, partly by the spectacle of collapse at home which followed in the wake of the late insurrection (1863), that revolutionary romanticism, which had sustained the Polish nation since the Partitions, had demonstrated its bankruptcy. Comtian positivism seemed to offer a more effective program, and Świętochowski became the chief apostle in Poland of this philosophy. First by way of the Przegląd, later (after 1881) through his own journal Prawda (Truth), he waged ruthless warfare on everything that had its roots in the emotions, preaching urbi et orbi a gospel of science and "organic work." Away with politics, down with nationalism, was his slogan, let us be realists and citizens of the world. Of his hundreds of polemical exhortations, three may be mentioned as outstanding: "Pasożyty literackie" (1871; Literary Parasites) and "Pleśń społeczna i literacka" (1871; Social and Literary Moldiness), both of which appeared in Przegląd piśmiennictwa polskiego (A Review of Polish Writing), and the celebrated call to "Manchesterism" (i.e., dedication of the national energy to economic and social reform rather than to parliamentarianism), "Nasze drogi polityczne" (1876; Our Course Politically), which appeared in the Przegląd.

Świętochowski tried his hand at the novel and also the drama, but without success. His failure as a dramatist, notably in the long trilogy Duchy (1905; The Spirits), in which he undertook to crystallize man's whole vast struggle from darkness into light, was due to the fact that he was a teacher and not an artist. As a historian, however, Świętochowski achieved conspicuous success with his great Historja chłopów (1925-1928; History of the Peasants).

Świętochowski was regarded by his contemporaries, most of whom he outlived, as the very "herald of truth." His keenness and utter ruthlessness in polemic, his passion and skill in advocacy, above all his brilliance as a writer, enabled him to achieve a virtual tyranny over the mind of his generation. At the end of his long life, however, in a swan song bitterly reactionary in its implications, Genealogja teraźniejszości (1936; Genealogy of the Present), he repudiated much of his own life's work. Too long withdrawal from the world, coupled with inability to adjust himself to new times, had brought him to the point of claiming for himself the right of sole legislator for mankind and of seeing in the past, as in the work of others, only evil—a blunder which avenged itself on Świętochowski's own work and reputation.

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, I (1927), 9-32; W. Feldman, Dzieje polskiej myśli politycznej w okresie porozbiorowym (1914-1920), pp. 152 ff.; Z. Szwiejkowski, "Alexander Świętochowski," Slavonic Year-Book, XIX (1939-1940), 228-236.

W. J. R.

Swiss literature in Alamannic. That part of the population of Switzerland which makes up its Germanic element (approximately three fourths of the total) is bilingual. For the last 200 years their educational system has been based on German, while the colloquial language, the vernacular, is Alamannic or Schwyzerdütsch (Swiss-German), which to the average German is just as unintelligible as Luxemburgish, Flemish, and Netherlandish. While many Swiss authors have been prominent in German literature, there has always been a homespun Alamannic literature for home consumption. Primarily supported by the Heimatschutz movement, it was favored in its development by several strong factors—the realistic trend in world literature, the deep structural gulf between standard German and the vernacular, the democratic structure of Swiss society where all classes use only the "dialect" in informal conversation. A political factor, opposition to German National Socialism, was added in 1933. A movement to make Alamannic the first of the four administrative languages of Switzerland, replacing German, was launched in 1936 by Emil Baer in his book Alemannisch, die Rettung der eidgenössischen Seele. Other important publications supporting this Alamannic movement are Emil Baer and Arthur Baur, Schribed wien er reded (1937); Arthur Baur, Praktische Sprachlehre des Schweizerdeutschen (2d ed., 1941); Adolf Guggenbühl, Warum nicht Schweizerdeutsch? (2d ed., 1937). The movement was and still is opposed by those who fear it might lead to extreme provincialism and deprive the Swiss intellectuals of many opportunities which they now enjoy. A fairly complete account of the lively discussion carried on in the press was given in the Mitteilungen des deutschschweizerischen Sprachvereins of 1936 and the following years (see also Schweizerische Hochschulzeitung, Vol. XI 1937, pp. 116-154). Professor Eugen Dieth and Catharina Hösli-Streiff have been leading a scientific-linguistic movement called Schwyzerdütsch, Bund zur Pflege der schweizerdeutschen Dialekte. A monthly magazine for popularization of Alamannic literature, Schwyzerlüt, was founded by Dr. G. Schmid at Fribourg in 1939.

Swiss-German literary activities went on independently of the political movement, which itself was possible only because there had been a flourishing Alamannic literature long before. Some Swiss authors who obtained international reputations by their German writings, both in prose and verse form, have in addition occasionally cultivated their "home dialect" for home consumption, e.g., Jakob Burckhardt (1818-1897), Adolf Frey (1855-1920), Otto von Guericke (1863-1940), all three professional scholars, and Alfred Hugenberg (1867-) and Dominik Müller (pseud. of Paul Schmitz, 1871-). Today no genuine Swiss writer can afford to be out of touch with his own people, and this contact is now more than ever brought about through the use of the "home dialect." In addition to the writers who only occasionally express themselves in their native language, there is an impressive array of intellectual leaders who have deliberately foregone tempting opportunities more international in scope for the less glamorous role of "dialect writers" in the home service. Among these are August Corrodi (1826-1885), who made translations into Swiss from English (the songs of Robert Burns) and from Latin (the Mostellaria of Plautus), Rudolf von Tavel (1866-1934), Meinrad Lienert (1865-1933), Zyböri (pseud. of Theodor Bucher, 1868-1937), Simon Gfeller (1868-1943), Josef Reinhart (1875-), Traugott Meyer (1895-), Oskar Eberle (1902-), and T. J. Felix (1900-). In Die Mundartdichtung der deutschen Schweiz (1924) Otto von Greyerz discusses the works of 142 recent authors, while G. Schmid's bibliography (Schwyzerlüt, Vol. III, 1940-1941, pp. 8-51) lists 219 names. The very existence of these literary patriots and their high significance in the picture of intellectual Switzerland would have completely escaped the eyes of foreign observers had it not been for Josef Nadler (1884-), who in his Literaturgeschichte der deutschen Schweiz (1932) gives several strikingly accurate characterizations.

A collection of earlier writings, mostly poetry, was published by Otto Sutermeister (1832-1901) in Schwyzer-Dütsch: Mundartliche Literatur der Neuzeit in ihren vorzüglichsten Vertretern (1882-1890), 83 booklets with biographical notes. Selections of lyric poetry were presented by Lcsezirkel Hotttingen, Aus allen Gauen (1896) and Schwyzerländli (1915); Otto von Greyerz, Im Röseliarte (6 vols., 1908-1912), Swiss folk songs; Robert Faesi, Die Ernte schweizerischer Lyrik (1928); Adolf Guggenbühl and Georg Thürer, Schwyzer Meie (1938), selections of 50 authors with biographical notes.

Outstanding lyric poets are Meinrad Lienert and Traugott Meyer. The poems of Meinrad Lienert deal with central Switzerland and its history. His collection 's Schwäbelpfyffli (3 vols., 1913), by which the dialect was definitely established as a language fit for the best type of poetry, is one large lyric portrait consisting of numerous single songs centering around the same object—his own people. Traugott Meyer (Mueterguet, 1929; Lueg und los, 1932; Im Läben inn, 1935) differs from Meinrad Lienert by a more accented interest in contemporary social problems. But with his sympathy for living and suffering fellow creatures he combines a deep love for nature which he expresses with exceptional skill, making wide use of onomatopoeia. His language is original, free of foreign patterns, genuinely Swiss, and untranslatable. Both Meinrad Lienert and Traugott Meyer have also published well-liked short stories and novels.

Masters in storytelling are Josef Reinhart, with a large number of publications (short stories and novels); Simon Gfeller (1868-1943); Karl Grunder (1880-); Emil Balmer (1890-); and T. J. Felix (Es mäntschelet, 1939). All of them have also produced plays, and Josef Reinhart enjoys a high reputation as a lyric poet. The greatest of all the prose writers is Rudolf von Tavel, a Bernese patrician. He is a master of the historical novel in which 500 years of Bernese history are portrayed in an unhurried style with an attitude of both pride and criticism towards the events described. Outstanding among his 15 great novels is Ring i der Chetti (1931; Links in the Chain), a colossal picture of 15th-century Bern.

The artistic level of dramatic production, originally limited to comedy, was considerably raised by Otto von Greyerz, who wrote humorous plays still popular today. The younger playwrights and stage managers, Cäsar von Arx (1895-) and Oskar Eberle, who influenced theatrical life decisively, use the dialect even for dramatic composition of serious character.

See: Otto von Greyerz, "Alemannische Mundartliteratur," in P. Merker and W. Stammler, Reallexikon der deutschen Literaturgeschichte, I (1925-1926), 9-16; A. Senn, "Verhältnis von Mundart und Schriftsprache in der deutschen Schweiz," Journal of English and Germanic Philology, XXXIV (1935), 42-58; A. Senn, "Rudolf von Tavel's historische Romane," Monatshefte für deutschen Unterricht, XXXVII (1945), 565-570.

A. Se.

Swiss literature in French, see Amiel, Henri Frédéric; Ramuz, Charles Ferdinand.

Swiss literature in German, see Federer, Heinrich; Keller, Gottfried; Meyer, Conrad Ferdinand; Schaffner, Jakob; Spitteler, Carl; Steffen, Albert.

symbolism, see French symbolism.

Szabó Dezső (1879-1945, Hungarian novelist, writer of short stories, essayist, and pamphleteer), was born in Kolozsvár, educated in his home town and in Budapest. For many years he was a professor of literature in various secondary schools in the provinces; but from his youth he was also devoted to creative work and eventually gave up professional teaching. For a time the attention of the reading public of the nation was centered upon him. Szabó was also an excellent orator.

His first essays and stories were published by Nyugat (West), but his irascible disposition soon put an end to this affiliation. He was always fond of French romantic literature, especially of Victor Hugo; he visited Paris and other parts of France on several occasions. As a raconteur and as a pamphleteer Szabó was spectacular; undisciplined and ridden with malice and distortion, he was capable of brilliance. In recent years his influence has diminished considerably. Some of his work has been translated into Czech and Rumanian.

After the end of the First World War, Hungary's position was desperate. Szabó, a Transylvanian by birth, deeply attached to the folkways of this region of Hungary which was included in enlarged Rumania, decided to write as the conscience of a mutilated Hungary. With the unabashed freedom of a frenzied romanticist he protested against everything that he considered unfair or criminal in relation to the destiny of the Hungarian nation. To outsiders he may have been incomprehensible, but not to many Hungarians. In his verbose yet dynamic novels, e.g., Az elsodort falú (1919; The Lost Village), Csodálatos élet (1921; Wondrous Life), Segítség (1925; Help), Kardcsöny Kolozsvárt (1932; Christmas in Kolozsvár), in his volumes of short stories, e.g., Napló és elbeszélések (1918; Diary and Stories), Mesék a kacagó emberről (1919; Tales about the Laughing Man), and in his erudite though wordy essays, e.g., Tanulmányok és jegyzetek (1920; Essays and Notes), Egyenes úton (1920; The Straight Road)—in all these one faces a writer whose purpose evidently was to be a Hungarian literary Savonarola. Szabó was willing to jeopardize his security for his convictions. His impulses and his ideas were thrown with uncompromising vigor into the turmoil of post-war Hungary. Bad taste and fragmentary poetry, melodramatic chaos and clarified truth, bitterness and an epigrammatizing hatred, nihilism and an eudaemonistic realization of the spirit, anxiety and certainty, prejudice and objectivity, mingle in the works of Szabó. All this explains the structural imperfection of his art, and also its controversial character.

See: J. Reményi, "Dezső Szabó, Hungarian Novelist and Pamphleteer," Slavonic Review, XLIV (1946), 105-109.

J. R.

T

Taine, Hippolyte (1828-1893, French critic and historian), born in Vouziers, was privately taught at home as a precocious child and then sent to school in Paris at 13, became the number one student of the entering class of 1848 at the Ecole Normale Supérieure, and remained the rest of his life a scholar-critic, perhaps the ranking one of his generation. In philosophy, his first interest (he composed a long essay on human destiny at 20), he was too unorthodox and perhaps too brilliant for the elders in power, but finally satisfied academic requirements by a doctoral thesis on the poetry of La Fontaine—his first philosophizing about literature. He received no early teaching appointment commensurate with his great talents, turned more and more to writing, was famous at 30. Articles on English literature (begun in 1856) became the well-known Histoire de la littérature anglaise (1864). An important initial collection of Essais de critique et d'histoire appeared in 1858. In 1864 he was made professor of aesthetics and the history of art at the Ecole des Beaux Arts and continued to teach there successfully for 20 years. In De l'intelligence (1870, April) he went back to his first love, philosophy—and psychology; then, shocked by French disasters of 1870-1871, he started to apply his analytic methods to the history of his own country and devoted much of the remaining 20 years of his life to Les Origines de la France contemporaine (1876-1893). He was given the orthodox blessing of membership in the French Academy at 50 (1878), but his views, in the Origines, offended both conservatives and radicals, and one has the impression concerning his final years of "an increasing moral solitude." Always fond of nature, he withdrew more and more to his estate by the mountain lake of Annecy; he was buried, as he had directed, on a secluded hill above this lake.

There was more warmth in the personality of Taine than he and his family have been inclined to reveal. He had attentive, admiring friends. Letters to his family show a tender husband and father. For years before his marriage (at 40) he was devoted to Elise Krinitz, woman novelist, who greatly loved him and undoubtedly influenced his earlier writings; Taine's family insisted upon keeping from the public the 400 letters he had written her (see J. Wright, Camille Selden, 1931). An autobiographical novel (Etienne Mayran, written about 1861, published 1909), cut short by Taine apparently because he felt he was telling too much, shows an adolescent of amazing will power, vitality, intellectual curiosity; at the point where the story breaks off the young Etienne is beginning "to see an order in all things." This is the same Taine who called a Beethoven sonata as beautiful as a syllogism.

Taine's doctrine is a direct result of his training and temperament—and thus to explain some part of him in terms of his circumstances is to acknowledge validity in his relativism. He follows Hegel, and less directly but quite definitely Spinoza; his essential views are already clearly stated in the preface to the first edition of the Essais of 1858 and exemplified in such an article of this early collection as "M. Troplong et M. de Montalembert." The most famous specimen of deterministic generalizations is the introduction to the Histoire de la littérature anglaise (Books are products). Already in the Philosophes français du XIXe siècle (1857) a vision of an ultimately realized cosmic unity (the Eternal Axiom is pronounced) is offered with something of the fervor of the Hebrew prophets, and the same note is struck even in the later somewhat cynical Vie et opinions de Graindorge (1867). At such moments Taine burns with an ardor that makes one forget the relentlessness of the systematizer; he appears as a very authentic poète de la raison. A man of this power is likely to dominate contemporaries. Taine did. Twentieth-century France has naturally not remained under the direct spell, but in 1928, the centennial year, the consensus of Paris reviews was that the Taine influence even where no longer identified as his was still all pervading. He has recently been opposed by the American scholar Albert Guérard (Literature and Society, 1935) and by the Italian critic Croce (History as the Story of Liberty, 1941).

See: V. Giraud, Essai sur Taine (1901); A. Chevrillon, Taine; formation de sa pensée (1932); M. Leroy, Taine (1933); K. de Schaedyver, Taine; essai sur l'unité de sa pensée (1938).

H. S.

Tamayo y Baus, Manuel (1829–1898, Spanish playwright), born in Madrid, came of a family of actors and was married to the niece of the great actor Isidoro Máiquez. He wrote a large number of plays prior to 1870. At that time he gave up the stage, becoming librarian first of San Isidro and later of the National Library.

Tamayo was a dramatist of transition, typical of the swing from romanticism to realism. He never recovered from a marked tendency toward sentimentality. His first works, of little note, were translations and adaptations of foreign plays. Later in his career he adapted Schiller's Kabale und Liebe and Die Jungfrau von Orleans. His early original plays were of the romantic-historical variety then in vogue. Locura de amor (prose, 1855) for example, was a successful dramatic treatment of Queen Juana la Loca's sad life.

The effort in France just before the mid-19th century to renew the classic tragedy had its repercussions in Spain. Tamayo's tribute was Virginia (1853), which the poet Quintana judged the best of all Spanish tragedies. From 1856 onward Tamayo devoted himself to contemporary problems, to social or thesis plays. La bola de nieve (verse, 1856) dramatizes the evils of jealousy. Lo positivo (1862), suggested by Léon Laya's Le Duc Job, teaches the not very new lesson that love and virtue are more important in marriage than money. Lances de honor (1863) attacks the duel. Los hombres de bien (1870) suggests that society is over-tolerant toward well-placed evildoers.

Un drama nuevo (1867; Eng. tr., A New Drama, 1915) is generally considered Tamayo's masterpiece. A play within a play, it involves Shakespeare in a less than graceful role. Alas! poor Yorick, as an old and jealous husband, tears his passion into more than tatters. There is, however, real intensity beneath the fustian rhetoric, and Tamayo's contemporaries liked melodramatic declamation. Taste has changed, and Tamayo was very much of his time and his milieu. He had real dramatic gifts, and his best scenes are highly effective. He was a man of the theatre who knew his business, a capable and workmanlike dramatist, not a great one. In religion and politics he was a traditionalist, and he always championed good bourgeois virtues.

See: E. Cotarelo y Mori, "Don Manuel Tamayo y Baus," in Estudios de historia literaria de España (1901), pp. 363–403; N. Siscars y Salvadó, Don Manuel Tamayo y Baus; estudio criticobiográfico (1906).

N. B. A.

Tarde, Gabriel (born Gabriel de Tarde, 1843–1904, French sociologist and philosopher), was long a magistrate in his native town of Sarlat, Dordogne. Several studies in criminology and penology earned him the post of director of criminal statistics at the Ministry of Justice in Paris (1894). Very early, however, Tarde's interest had extended to sociology proper. A series of brilliant works (Les Lois de l'imitation, 1890, Eng. tr., The Laws of Imitation, 1903; Les Transformations du droit, 1892; La Logique sociale, 1893; L'Opposition universelle, 1897; Les Lois sociales, 1898, Eng. tr., Social Laws, 1899; Les Transformations du pouvoir, 1899) brought about his appointment as a professor in the Collège de France (1899). During his short tenure two more books appeared (L'Opinion et la foule, 1901; Psychologie économique, 2 vols., 1902).

The almost exact antithesis of Emile Durkheim's (q.v.) sociology, that of Tarde remains undogmatic and atomistic. He does not admit of the "social fact" as a supra-individual entity and relies on the laws of "interpsychology" to explain all human relationships. The most fundamental of these laws is that of imitation. Men imitate each other and thereby modify each other. Traditions descend through the ages and fashions sweep throughout space in waves of influence which are subtly "transformed" in proportion as they unfold. When two or more "opposite" waves meet violently, the individual, confronted with a new set of circumstances, adjusts himself by means of an "invention" which is imitated in turn and starts on its course as a social phenomenon. Such, in fact, is Tarde's faith in the ability of the human mind to effect peaceful "adaptations" that a curious utopia of his, written in his youth and posthumously published (Fragment d'histoire future, 1904; Eng. tr., Underground Man, 1905), envisions an ideal society resting on disinterested love and wholly freed from coercion.

See: Alexandre Lacassagne, Alexis Bertrand, and Nicolas Vaschide, "A la mémoire de Gabriel Tarde," Archives d'anthropologie criminelle, XIX (1904), 501-536, 623-660 (contains also the first printing of Fragment d'histoire future, pp. 565-621); Célestin Bouglé, "Un Sociologue individualiste: Gabriel Tarde," Revue de Paris, Année XII (1905), Tome III, pp. 284-316; Amédée Matagrín, La Philosophie sociale de Gabriel Tarde (1910); Maurice Roche-Agussol, "Tarde et l'économie psychologique," Revue d'histoire économique et sociale, XIV (1926), 68-114, 273-319.

J.-A. B.

Teirlinck, Herman (1879-, Flemish short-story writer, novelist, and playwright), was born at St. Jans Molenbeek, a part of Brussels. He attended school there, was employed for a time in the municipal department of fine arts, taught Dutch literature in various schools, was manager of a furniture factory, became director of the Institute of Decorative Arts in Brussels, and was appointed by young King Albert his private counselor on matters of art and science. He made his debut as a writer with De wonderbare Wereld (1902; The Wondrous World), a collection of three stories of Flemish village life, which was followed by Het stille Gesternte (1903; The Still Constellation). Teirlinck did not know village life as does a man who is born and bred on the land. He wove somber and fantastic mysteries around the lives of these primitive souls. These tales have indeed a strange fascination, but lack the convincing power of the village tales by Stijn Streuvels (q.v.). From these he turned to his native element in Het Bedrijf van den Kwade (1904; The Demon in Action), in which Brussels is the setting of the plot. In Zon (1906; Sun) he revealed himself as an impressionist artist of the first order, a word painter of landscape, still life, and interiors closely akin to the old masters of the Dutch school. But his masterpiece, by common consent, is Mijnheer Serjanszoon (1908), an evocation of the 18th-century virtuoso: hedonist, aesthete, philanderer, quixotic victim of his love of beauty. Teirlinck's subtle and somewhat mannered style eminently fits the story of this précieux character. Then followed Het ivoren Aapje (1909; The Ivory Monkey), a novel of Brussels manners portraying the cosmopolitan life of a great city with all its feverish turmoil and its many sorts and conditions of men. It is perhaps this multifarious setting that creates in the reader a sense of bewilderment and incoherence. Teirlinck is an emotional observer devoid of the contemplative calm that can embrace wide vistas. His attention is constantly shifting and eagerly seizes upon each picturesque detail, so that his work lacks massiveness and structure. It is miniature art. That is why he is at his best as a teller of relatively short stories, such as Johan Doxa (1917). A gentle irony at play with emotion is the charm of this fine, tragic tale.

In the period following the First World War, Teirlinck turned to the writing of plays. De vertraagde Film (1921; Slow-Motion Picture) is enacted under water. The actors are but two: he and she, lovers who have sought death by drowning with the little child whose birth has brought disgrace upon them. During the few minutes that they struggle in the water their past existence, with its joys and sorrows, looms up before them. And reliving their lives, they want to go on living. The child that was the link between them is dead. The two who wanted to die because they could not renounce one another escape death and each other and part as strangers. They return to the city whose turmoil has not been disturbed by the little drama they have enacted. Here is influence of Maeterlinck (q.v.), but also, as the title suggests, of the motion pictures. Teirlinck is an innovator and a seeker of new modes of stage art. In Ik Dien (1924; I Serve), a dramatization of the Beatrice legend about the runaway nun who, after a life of debauch, returns as a penitent to her convent, medieval miracle play and stage effects from the movies are skillfully combined into a modern drama of great force and suggestive power.

See: A. de Ridder, La Littérature flamande contemporaine (1923).

A. J. B.

Teixeira de Pascoais, Joaquim (pseud. of Joaquim Pereira Teixeira de Vasconcelos, 1879–, Portuguese poet), was born in Gatão, Trás-os-Montes, on the river Tâmega, in the shadow of the Serra do Marão in northern Portugal, and this geography is one of the keys to an understanding of his work. A member of a noble family, he was educated in the University of Coimbra, where he studied law and established intimate contacts with the writers of the period. He has traveled in Spain, France, and England and delivered lectures in Madrid and Barcelona. He divides his time between the ancestral home where he was born and Lisbon, where he holds interesting tertulias attended by artists and intellectuals.

When Pascoais produced his first book of poems, Sempre (1897; Always), the reigning poetic mood was represented by two very significant books which had appeared five years before—Só (Alone) of António Nobre (q.v.) and Os simples (The Simple Ones) of Guerra Junqueiro (q.v.). These, with Oaristos (1890) of Eugénio de Castro (q.v.), and despite their differing techniques, constitute the high-water mark of the Parnassian and symbolist movements in Portuguese literature. The Terra proibida (1899; Forbidden Land) of Pascoais and his poems "Jesus e Pan" (1903; Jesus and Pan) and "Para a luz" (1904; Towards the Light) continue to reflect the aesthetic preoccupation with form associated with the above tendencies, although from time to time a verse presages his later, more truly characteristic thought. Vida etérea (1906; Ethereal Life) is the book in which is clearly seen what Pascoais is going to represent in contemporary poetry. Still showing the expressive elegance of Junqueiro and Eugénio de Castro and a preoccupation with the mystery of his own being and of the exterior world, he makes in fact a clear new start. Two lines reveal the book's dual inspiration, "May our flesh be strengthened by the bright sun of Homer" and "May the sweet and Christian light of the moon move our spirit." The shadows which fill his soul terrify him; anguish sharpens perception of multiple appearances in relation to the unity of being. Human beings and things are only impulses ascending toward his own conscience and approaching God who, thus conceived, is a creature of man and not his creator. What man produces is more important than man himself, and Don Quixote—as Unamuno (q.v.) maintained—outlives Cervantes.

It is in the great book Sombra (1907; Shadow) that Pascoais develops fully his naturalistic, pantheistic thought, his interpretation of God and the world. Here the poet reveals his dramatic conception of life and creates "a kingdom not of this world," since imperfection cannot constitute the reality of "immaterial but cosmic life." To be captured, this calls for vigorous processes of renunciation and marvelous intuition. Pascoais, for example, does not wish to be the star, but its radiated light; not the lover, but love. The greatness of this poet lies in his sincerity and in the strength of the human emotion with which his philosophical thought springs from his extremely sensitive nature. He is in communion with all existing things, with the living and the dead, with the stones, and with the mountains whose peaceful shadow he envies. Grief also has its shadow, its projection "so that the grief of Humanity be ever present in each human being." This solidarity joins past and future and in the Portuguese man finds its authentic expression in saüdade, a word which connotes both recollection and desire, especially of God. Indeed saüdade may come to be the authentic spirit of God as realized progressively in the body of the universe (Deus est in fieri).

In the year 1912 Pascoais gathered about him the majority of the best youthful elements in his country in the group called Renascença Portuguesa. Their banner was saüdosismo, and their vehicle of expression A águia (Ser. 1, 1910; The Eagle). Taken as a symbolical and unique characteristic of the Portuguese soul, the saüdade concept was connected with the old myth of King Sebastian and led to an exalted affirmation of authentic Portuguese values as a sure solution of the problems which faced the country.

Poets as distinguished as Augusto Casimiro, Jaime Cortesão, Ferreira Monteiro, and especially the poet from Alemtejo, Mario Beirão, were outstanding in the Renascença group. But the division within the group was not long in coming. The new faction, Seara Nova (New Crop), which developed into a group more political than literary, was headed by the notable thinker, António Sérgio. The name was taken from their journal, which first appeared in October, 1921. This review still survives heroically today in the totally adverse political atmosphere created by the dictatorship of Oliveira Salazar. The controversy with Sérgio was long and at times violent. Pascoais published his arguments in the journal A águia in 1913 and 1914, as well as in the brochures O espírito lusitano (1912; The Lusitanian Spirit) and O gênio português na sua expressão filosófica, poética e religiosa (1913; The Portuguese Genius in Its Philosophical, Poetical, and Religious Expression). While the schism of Sérgio, who was followed by Raul Brandão, Teixeira Gomes, Jaime Cortesão, and Aquilino Ribeiro (q.v.), implied a slipping toward liberal rationalism and a reform of political methods very similar to the objectives of Clarté of Paris during those years (see Barbusse), a further breach completely destroyed the coherence of the Pascoais group when the Integralismo Lusitano, patterned after the ideas of the Action Française of Maurras and Léon Daudet (qq.v.) in Paris and guided by a powerful thinker and expert polemist, António Sardinha (q.v.), was formed. This organization can be said in the long run to have furnished the political doctrine for the dictatorship inaugurated in 1926.

In the meantime Teixeira de Pascoais continued to produce poetical works, including the great poem Maranos (1911), in which converse the shades of Marão, of Don Quixote, the seasons, the saúde, and Maranos himself. Maranos is "the being who wanders through the world, who lives more from his own spirit than from the fruits of the earth," and who hears from supernatural voices the message for the salvation and glory of Portugal. Regreso ao paraíso (1912; Return to Paradise) is another great poem in 22 cantos in free verse, perhaps not characterized by as compact and pure emotion as the former, but one that has attracted great attention in Peninsular literature. Among his best and most recent poetic productions are the volumes O pobre tólo (The Poor Fool) and Painel (1935; Panel). He has also composed, in prose of an impressively poetic and philosophical quality, three biographies involving great and catastrophic events of the past: he treats the end of Greek and Semitic civilizations in São Paulo (1934; Eng. tr., Saint Paul, 1937), the fall of the Roman Empire in São Jeronimo e a trovada (1936; St. Jerome and the Thunder Storm), and the tragedy enacted from Waterloo to St. Helena in Napoleão (1940). Two dramatic pieces in verse, D. Carlos (1924) and Jesus Cristo em Lisboa (1917; Jesus Christ in Lisbon), written in collaboration with Raul Brandão, do not attain the level of the poet's really great work. At his best he is without doubt the contemporary writer who has most influenced the Portugal of this century with his thought and art.

See: M. de Unamuno, Por tierras de Portugal y de España (1911), pp. 27-35, and introduction to Spanish translation (1935) of Teixeira de Pascoais, São Paulo; A. González-Blanco, Estudio, Vol. XIX (Barcelona, 1917).

R. M. L.

Teixeira de Queiroz, Francisco (pseud. Bento Moreno, 1848-1919, Portuguese novelist), was born in Arcos de Val-de-Vez, Minho, and received his medical degree at Coimbra in 1878. His positivistic formation led him to embrace the experimental novel introduced into Portugal by Eça de Queiroz (q.v.). In 1915 he was a deputy and member of the government. He projected a vast novelistic plan with the intention of duplicating for Portugal La Comédie humaine of Balzac. He divided his work into two series of stories and novels: Comédia do campo (Comedy of the Countryside), in which he studied life in the villages of his native region, and Comédia burguesa (Bourgeois Comedy), in which are interwoven types and sectors from the society of Lisbon. In both series he followed the credo of the experimental school with all faithfulness, making "physiological and social" analyses on the basis of the most minute observation. From Primeiros contos (1878; First Short Stories), the first volume of the rural series, to Ao sol e à chuva (1916; Under the Sun and the Rain), which closes this cycle, he created beautiful pages reflecting the landscape and customs of the North and interpreting the regionalism of the Minho district by the processes of the realistic school. A facile and capable observer of the country life which he knew very well, he was not equally adept as an observer of urban life. Thus in his novels of the Comédia burguesa, which begins with Os noivos (1896; The Betrothed), the analysis of types—here of greater psychological complexity—suffers frequently from superficiality, although generally speaking it is redeemed by the minute objectivity of his realism. Perhaps the best of this series are D. Agostinho (1894) and Morte de D. Agostinho (1895; Death of D. Agostinho), in which are depicted the type of the old, ruined hidalgo in modern society. His style, characterized by great simplicity and impeccable correctness, takes on singular expressive plasticity in the description of rural surroundings.

See: J. Fernandes Costa, Elógio académico do Dr. Teixeira de Queiroz (1919).

E. G. D.

Teternikov, Fyodor Kuzmich, see Sologub, Fyodor.

Tetmajer, Kazimierz (1865–1940, Polish poet and novelist), was born at Ludzimierz, in the mountainous Podhale district of the then Austrian province of Galicia. His family on both sides was of the upper gentry. His father, marshal of the gentry of Nowy Targ, had settled in Podhale shortly after the uprising of 1830, in which he had participated. There were several men of letters among Tetmajer's ancestors on his father's side, notably Stanisław, an 18th-century translator of the classics; Karol, grandfather of Kazimierz, a well-known fabulist; and finally the celebrated uhlán, Józef (1814–1880), a poet and a distinguished mathematician. Tetmajer received his early education at home from tutors and from his gifted, high-spirited parents. He had an idyllic childhood, simple, natural, unspoiled by the extremes of either want or luxury. Until he left the mountains for Cracow in order to attend St. Anne's Gymnasium, he was exposed only to the most ideal influences: a countryside unsurpassed for natural beauty, the companionship of highly imaginative and poetic Podhale mountaineers, and a home atmosphere wholesome and sane. Tetmajer's father died when the boy was still in school, and the family fortune was lost about the same time. Mme Tetmajer stepped into the breach and saw her son safely through his studies, first at the Jagiellonian University, later at Heidelberg.

Tetmajer was temperamentally out of tune with the literary mood of his day. When his first work, Illa (1886), was published, poetry was not greatly admired in Poland, and most of those who in an age more friendly to imaginative literature might have been poets were carrying the banners of causes. Tetmajer had no desire to promote causes. He was what would be called today a "pure poet."

Although Tetmajer tried many literary forms—the drama, the novel, the short story

—it was in the lyric that he achieved greatness. His lyrics are different from those of the romantic poets who preceded him, having none of the spiritual, transcendental quality dominant in these. Tetmajer was no romanticist. He was a sensualist: women and nature alike he drank in with all his senses, but without romantic imagination. The sensual experience was intense, amounting to intoxication and escape into a kind of nirvana, and the sense of this Tetmajer was able to communicate superbly in the lyric. The works by which, besides his lyrics, Tetmajer will be longest remembered are his tales of the Podhale mountaineers, among these Na skalnem Podhalu (1903–1910; On the Rocky Heights of Podhale); Bajeczny świat Tatr (1906; The Fabulous World of the Tatras); and the two-volume cycle Legendy Tatr (1910; Tatra Legends), in which the rebel Kostka-Napierski and the Tatra Robin Hood, Janosik, play leading parts. A volume of translations, Tales of the Tatras, was published in London in 1941 and in New York in 1943. Though not the discoverer of the Tatra Mountains as literary material, Tetmajer was their most affectionate eulogist.

Tetmajer retired from the world about 1920. Almost blind, crushed by a series of personal sorrows and by the onrush of new times, he lived for years in a lonely room in Warsaw, a virtual hermit. He died in January, 1940, in a charity ward of a Warsaw hospital, a casualty of the Second World War.

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, I (1927), 133–151; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, I (1934), 177–189, 346–349.

A. P. C.

Tharaud, Jérôme (1874–) and Jean (1877–; French journalists and novelists), were born in Saint-Junien, Haute-Vienne, where their father was a notary. Financial difficulties obliged the family to move to Angoulême, and it was in the lycée of this city that Jérôme and Jean began their studies. In 1888 Jérôme entered the Lycée Louis-le-Grand in Paris. In 1895 he entered the Ecole Normale Supérieure, but never received his degree. He was sent as a teacher of French grammar and literature to the College of Joseph-Eotvos in Budapest: he was to stay there four years (1899–1903). Jean too had come to Paris and entered the Lycée Saint-Louis, where he remained from 1891 to 1898. He hoped to enter the military academy at Saint-Cyr, but failed in the oral part of the entrance examination. Having completed his year of military service, he returned to Paris to continue his studies. Jérôme, meanwhile, took advantage of his four months' vacation each year to travel in Italy, Russia, Germany, the Balkans, and Turkey, exchanging a voluminous correspondence with Jean, who joined him in his travels whenever possible.

The literary talent of the two brothers was revealed in their first book, Le Colporteur débile (1898). As an exercise in literary discipline they next adapted the Contes de la légende de la Vierge (published in 1902). Jérôme had formerly transposed into French several Hungarian folk tales. When the Boer War broke out in 1899, Jérôme wanted to serve as a war correspondent. As this was refused him, he followed the newspaper accounts very carefully and drew from them the inspiration for the novel Dingley, which he later wrote in collaboration with his brother (1902). As these literary activities were not sufficiently remunerative, the two brothers undertook to write newspaper and magazine articles and continued to do so through the years 1903-1911. They served as secretaries to Maurice Barrès (q.v.). In 1906 the Goncourt Academy awarded them its yearly prize. From 1908 to 1911 were published several versions of the life of Ravailac, and in 1908 they wrote a brief sketch of one of their compatriots, Paul Déroulède. La Maîtresse servante was published in 1911, La Fête arabe in 1912. When in October, 1912, war broke out between Turkey and Montenegro on the banks of Lake Scutari in Albania, Jérôme left for Cattaro as a reporter. Upon his return he discussed his impressions with his brother, and together they wrote La Bataille à Scutari d'Albanie (1913). From April to June, 1914, there appeared in the magazine Opinion, under the title L'An prochain à Jérusalem, the first of their many novels dealing with conditions in the Jewish communities they had seen. During the First World War, Jean served as a corporal, Jérôme as a simple private. They were sent to Flanders and to Champagne and then took part in an expeditionary mission to Morocco. They were later to write of their experiences in Rabat (1918) and Marrakech (1920). The Tharauds are excellent reporters and most of their novels are very well written reporter novels.

The French Academy awarded them its Grand Prix de Littérature on June 19, 1919. They were later elected as members of that venerable society, Jérôme in 1940, Jean in 1946.

See: A. Praviel, "Deux Grands Lettrés Limousins: Les Frères Tharaud," Corres- pondant, CCLXXXVIII (1922), 845-860; J. Bonnerot, Jérôme et Jean Tharaud; leur œuvre (1927); E. de Lamaze, "Jérôme et Jean Tharaud," Bulletin des lettres, 1938, pp. 335-339.

P. B.

Theer, Otakar (1880-1917, Czech poet), attempted, paradoxically, to achieve classical and sculptural effects in modern free verse. He was born in Czernowitz (Cernăuți, Bukovina), the son of an army officer, studied languages at the University of Prague, and joined the staff of the university library.

Theer's first volume of poems, Háje, kde se tančí (1897; Groves Where There Is Dancing), expresses a rather crude pagan sensualism. But Výpravy k Já (1900; Expeditions to the Ego) begins the development toward a poetry highly speculative and austere yet revealing a fresh sensibility for metaphor. In Úzkosti a naděje (1911; Anxieties and Hopes) and especially in his last volume, Všemu na vzdory (1916; In Spite of Everything), Theer succeeds in evolving a new type of free verse, according to strict self-imposed rules, and achieves a style of sharp classical outlines. In his thought he leans towards the titanic individualism of Nietzsche (q.v.) and cultivates the heroic ideal in life and death. This is also the theme of Theer's only tragedy, Faëthón (1917; Phaeton), a remarkably successful attempt to revive the form of the Aeschylean mythical drama and to give it a personal content of heroic frustrate ambition. Theer's early stories, decorative and romantic, were rejected by the mature artist. His criticism is valuable for a quality of sympathy, e.g., with an advocate of heroism like Corneille, rare in Theer's time and place. The pagan sensualism, the strong philosophical content, the striving for a severe classical form in free verse, make an original combination among the modern Czech poets. But Theer's art was too individual to find a wide audience or to exercise profound influence.

See: O. Fischer, A. Novák, O. Šimek, eds., Na paměť Otakara Theera (1920); A. M. Piša, Otakar Theer (2 vols., 1928-1933).

R. W.

Thibaudet, Albert (1874-1936, French critic), was born at Tournus in Burgundy, prepared himself for teaching, pursued advanced studies at the Sorbonne, and early showed his open-mindedness by taking his agrégation in history and geography although his primary concern was with belles-lettres. He taught at first in lycées, then lectured successfully in various universities abroad, York, Uppsala, Lausanne, and finally was offered the chair of French literature at the University of Geneva which he held from 1925 to the time of his death.

Always inclined to avoid trodden paths, he became an early contributor to Daniel Halévy's Cahiers verts with the study Paul Valéry (1924) and was soon a staunch supporter of the Nouvelle Revue française, to which he contributed an astounding number of articles. General recognition of his merit as a critic came after publication of La Poésie de Mallarmé (1912), which he himself calls an effort to be at once intelligent and equitable and in which he describes Mallarmé as "hanté par l'existence de l'être d'un non-être."

After service in the First World War he recorded his reactions to that conflict in the form of a commentary on the Peloponnesian War (Campagne de Thucydide, 1922). The problems of reconstruction of a France which had been upset ever since the Dreyfus affair, "a tumult among intellectuals," were taken up in two books; in Les Princes lorrains (1924) he writes of Poincaré and Barrès, and in La République des professeurs (1927) of Blum, Painlevé, and Herriot and the contrast between the leftist republic of the professors and the rightist republic of the littérateurs of the French Academy. Thibaudet's attitude towards modern poetry, already indicated in Mallarmé in 1912, is further developed in 1924 in his Triptyque de la poésie moderne: Verlaine, Rimbaud, Mallarmé. He discussed the philosophical trend of his times in Trente Ans de vie française (Les Idées de Maurras, 1920; La Vie de Barrès, 1921; Le Bergsonisme, 1923) and in Intérieurs: Baudelaire, Fromentin, Amiel (1924).

Thibaudet tried to reach a synthetic view of his own general philosophy in Histoire de la littérature française de 1789 à nos jours, never completed, which was edited by two friends (Bopp and Paulhan) soon after the author's death. Here he suggests a new approach to the study of literature, substituting for the usual classification by epochs one by generations: 1789 (with a special chapter on Napoleon), 1820, 1850, 1885, and 1914-1918, "the generation of the mutilated."

In addition to the monographs already mentioned Thibaudet also wrote Flaubert (1922), considered particularly good, and Mistral (1930), Stendhal (1931), and Montaigne (1937). Shortly after his death the Nouvelle Revue française published, under the title Chroniques de la Nouvelle Revue française, four volumes of Thibaudet's contributions (Réflexions sur la littérature, sur le roman, sur la politique, sur la critique) as well as several volumes of essays (Le Liseur de romans, Les Genres, Psychologie et critique, Physiologie de la critique).

A versatile critic, Thibaudet is representative of his own generation; he is neither dogmatic nor impressionistic, but mainly inquisitive. In his style, as is not infrequently pointed out, he combines dogmatic assertions with a curious hesitancy about making any general philosophic synthesis. An always alert curiosity, with a constant desire to be fair, restrains him here. His reputation may suffer with those who like to list and label their critics, as they can such men as Brunetière, Lemaître, France, Maurras (qq.v.). Thibaudet is an ever suggestive and well-informed writer, most definitely a free lance.

See: "Hommage à Albert Thibaudet," Nouvelle Revue française, XLVII (1936), 5-176.

A. Sz.

Thoma, Ludwig (1867-1921, German novelist and dramatist), was born in Oberammergau, of old peasant stock. For some years he practiced law in a small Bavarian town, then moved to Munich to become coeditor of Germany's brilliant satirical weekly Simplicissimus. Yet he never lost contact with the countryside and all that peasant life stands for. The firsthand knowledge of the Bavarian farmer enabled him to become the foremost regional writer of his native province. A keen observer, sensitive to tragic as well as humorous impressions and boldly using the racy Bavarian dialect, Thoma came to represent the South German modification of the naturalistic movement. But there is nothing doctrinaire about his style, which is controlled by emotion and mood rather than by dogmatic literary technique.

His moods and manners indeed are various. The humorist in him often yields to the temptation of writing for sheer entertainment. Lausbubengeschichten (1904), long a favorite in American colleges, is a good example of Thoma's ability to turn almost anything into hilarious comedy. The most opportune medium for the creation and propagation of laughter is, of course, the stage, and Thoma's dialect play Erster Klasse (1910) ranks high in German farcical literature, of which there is no great supply on hand. Often a strong desire to extol the beauty of peasant life induces Thoma to content himself with the role of a faithful chronicler of folklore, as in Hochzeit (1901), where the epic motif serves as a pretext for the unfolding of old customs prevailing among the Bavarian farmers. As a man of very liberal opinions and with the courage to express his convictions (even if this meant an occasional jail term), Thoma uses the stage as well as the novel to expose the follies of Prussian militarism and of ubiquitous bureaucracy. He preferably employs satire to drive home his lesson, as in Die Lokalbahn (1902) or Moral (1909; Eng. tr., Morality, 1909). Moreover, his deep concern with man directs him to social problems of a more general nature, for instance in Magdalena (1912) and especially in Der Ruepp (1922), the heartrending account of a once thrifty farmer who becomes a drunkard. Finally, Thoma on occasion succeeds in making all these creative veins subservient to great objectivity and lofty ethical purposes. Andreas Vöst (1905), easily his best novel, tells of a farmer who in seeking justice falls afoul of the law and has to serve a prison term. The substance of this work lies in the fearlessness with which Thoma attacks human inertia and hypocrisy; the hero embodies the essential qualities of a tiller of the soil, whose contact with nature sharpens his feelings for the natural rights of man and quickens his impatience with a ruling class which has lost sight of the basic needs of mankind. This peasant novel is far superior to modern specimens of "blood and soil" literature whose heroes are as unreal as the shepherds of the rococo period. Thoma, with all his love for and understanding of the farmer's life was intelligent enough to realize that the salvation of present-day society rests on cooperation among the various classes and between countryside and city.

See: A. Stark, Die Bauern bei Ludwig Thoma (1938); E. Cornelius, Das epische und dramatische Schaffen Ludwig Thoma's (1939).
H. B.

Thomsen, Grímur (1820–1896, Icelandic poet and essayist), was born at Bessastaðir, a manor near Reykjavík. He studied Hegelian aesthetics and literature at the University of Copenhagen; his Ph.D. dissertation (1845) was on Byron. For a long time he served in the Danish foreign service, but in 1866 he returned to Iceland, bought the place where he was born, and lived there until his death. He wrote several essays on literature and, besides Byron, introduced Runeberg to the Danes and his countrymen. His poems were published late in life: Ljóðmæli (1880; Poems), Ljóðmæli, nýtt safn (1895; Poems, New Collection), and, posthumously, Ljóðmæli, nýtt og gamalt (1906; Poems Old and New) and Rímur af Búa Andriðarsyni og Friði Dofradóttur (1906; Ballads of Búi Andriðarson and Friður Dofradóttir). The Ljóðmæli of 1895 contained translations from the Greek.

In no modern poet is the Old Norse-Icelandic heroic spirit crystallized so purely as in Grímur Thomsen. His ballads on the heroes of the sagas are unequalled in force and in fidelity to the originals. Undoubtedly his deep appreciation of the kindred Greek literature as well as his familiarity with contemporary aristocracy in Europe helped him to paint the proud figures, men and women, chosen from the sagas, the history of his native land, and the history of Europe. His verse is at times stiff and his diction rugged, but his poems are always alive with the heroic spirit.

See: S. Nordal, "Grímur Thomsen," Eimreiðin, XXIX (1923), 1–16; R. Beck, "Grímur Thomsen—a Pioneer Byron Student," Journal of English and Germanic Philology, XXVII (1928), 170–182.

S. E.

Þórðarson, Þórbergur (1889–, Icelandic essayist and poet), was born at Breiðabólstaður in Suðursveit, an out of the way district of Southeast Iceland. As a boy he earned the epithet ofviti (otherwise) for his intellectual precocity and consequent eccentricity. He became a sailor and a jack-of-all-trades, to pay for an education that he did not relish until he began the study of Old Icelandic language and literature with the celebrated scholar B. M. Ólsen at the University of Iceland (1913–1918). This study later bore fruit in a collection of folk tales and expressions from colloquial speech.

In 1917 he became interested in theosophy, yoga, and spiritualism, writing under this influence the first of his sparkling essays, "Ljós úr austri" ("Ex oriente lux"), in the periodical Eimreiðin (1919). Several years earlier there had appeared a little-noticed sheaf of poems, Hálfir skósólar (1915; Half Soles), which was in reality the first harbinger of modernistic (futuristic) poetry in Iceland, written in revolt against the romantic lyric effusions of the time. But it was with Bréf til Láru (1924; Letter to Laura) that he struck the first telling blow against the literary conventions, especially the standards of propriety, of the late 19th century. Bréf til Láru is a conglomerate of very personal essays, full of humor and satire. It was meant as a manifesto of socialism, and as such it is the first important piece of leftist literature in Iceland. Although it was written in a classical style (even if unusually rich and varicolored), it paved the way towards the new modernistic prose style first really achieved by Laxness. The "letter" created much stir, the author actually being deprived of a teaching job that he held at the time. Two years later he accepted a further consequence of his international socialism by sponsoring the international language Esperanto, to which cause he has devoted much of his time. After visiting Russia he wrote an enthusiastic book about it. His most mature work was yet to come, his own life story in many volumes, of which three have been published: Íslenzkur aðall (1938; Icelandic Nobility) and Ofvitinn (2 vols., 1940-1941; The Eccentric).

See: S. Einarsson, Þórbergur Þórðarson fimmtugur (1939).

S. E.

Thorsteinsson, Steingrímur (1831-1913, Icelandic poet), was born at Arnarstapi, Snæfellsnes, Iceland, the son of a high-ranking civil servant. The intelligent boy was sent as a matter of course to the Latin school in Reykjavík and then to the University of Copenhagen. There he was to study law, but he ended as a student of the Greek and Roman classics, graduating in 1863. After a decade of literary work in Copenhagen he returned to Iceland; he became a teacher and later the headmaster of the Latin school in Reykjavík, a position he held until his death.

In his poetry Thorsteinsson is a romanticist with a strong classical tinge. His lyrics—on love, on Icelandic nature—won a wider public in Iceland because they were used as texts to popular tunes. As a satirist he was even more effective, with epigrams sharp and to the point. His poems (Ljóðmæli) were published in 1881, 1893, and 1910.

Thorsteinsson was more significant, however, as a transmitter of culture than as an original poet. He was a gifted translator, and through his pen Icelanders became acquainted with many a poetic masterpiece of Goethe, Schiller, Tegnér, and Byron. He was especially fond of the Hungarian poet Petöfi. Most important of his translations are undoubtedly The Arabian Nights, the fairy tales of Hans Christian Andersen, and Shakespeare's King Lear.

See: J. C. Poestion, Steingrímur Thorsteinsson, ein isländischer Dichter und Kulturbringer (1912).

S. E.

Thovez, Enrico (1869-1925 Italian poet and critic), was born and died in Turin. He was an archeologist, director of the Civic Museum of Modern Art in Turin, and a painter as well as a man of letters. His name appeared for the first time on the literary scene when he discovered and denounced the so-called plagiarisms of D'Annunzio (q.v.) in the Gazzetta letteraria in 1896; today the sum of these plagiarisms has increased tenfold, but they are likely to be considered not so much thefts as loans that an enterprising individual repays with munificent interest.

Thovez hoped to attain fame as a poet with Il Poema dell'adolescenza (1901), but instead he won an important place in modern criticism through the notes, intended first for a preface to his verse, published later as a book on Italian lyricism, Il Pastore, il gregge e la Zampogna (1910). This is a highly critical analysis of all Italian poetry but especially of Carducci (q.v.) and D'Annunzio, both accused of lacking sincerity, inspiration, actuality, sensitivity. The accusation implied a preponderance of rhetoric, attributed to the influence of the Renaissance which, according to Thovez, had ruined Italian poetry. Dante and Leopardi are cited by him as free from that literary and definitely not lyrical coldness, rigidity, heaviness, characteristic of other Italian poets. Thovez's viewpoint, which has precedents in romantic criticism and even in Baretti and Bettinelli in the 18th century, excited much interest and, of course, much opposition on the part of Croce, Borgese (qq.v.), Gargano, and others. The pungent style of his exposition, often in the form of personal memoirs tinged with humor, with well-chosen examples and with skillful and unprejudiced comparisons, had an appeal that survived the transient controversies—and this is confirmed by the number of reprints of the work (1911, 1920, 1926). There is more lyricism in this book of literary analysis than in the poems of Thovez. Poemi d'amore e di morte (1922), his second book of poems, was no more successful than the first.

Thovez, in his iconoclastic rebellion, never inclined towards free verse or futurism; indeed he remained always attached to traditional literary forms. A turn of mind rather melancholic and an independence of spirit which permeated also his personal life kept him apart from the literary coteries and made him the target of many personal attacks. Not having succeeded as a poet or as a painter, he was accused of directing his bile against the poets and painters of his time who had been accepted as interpreters of Italy. Moreover, his attachment to foreign writings and his harsh criticism of the Italian national literature explain the accusations of lukewarm patriotism directed against him. His very name, of Savoyard origin, was an added incentive for this kind of attack.

Certainly Thovez did not enjoy a happy life, and one feels this in his works. Much of the substance of his criticism is now outdated, but the moral consciousness, the strength of his convictions and of his many skillful observations remain. He is the kind of non-conformist who appeals more because of his intransigent attitude than because of the actual message. His other works repeat the same motive of the first one (e.g., L'Arco di Ulisse, 1921) or refer principally to modern paintings (Il Filo di Arianna, 1924) or criticize certain disagreeable types that sprang up in society during the First World War (Mimi dei moderni, 1919; La Ruota d'Issione, 1925).

See: F. Durand, Enrico Thovez (1933).

G. P.

Tikhonov, Nikolai (1896–, Russian poet and novelist), was born in St. Petersburg. He began to write in 1914, but only after the Revolution did his verse appear in print. His ballads and lyrics, collected in Orda (1922; The Horde) and Braga (1923; Brew) and in a more complete volume in 1935, are prevailingly narrative in contents. The variegated experiences of Tikhonov are reflected in his poetry—his career as a hussar in the war of 1914–1917, as a carpenter, teacher, actor, and fighter of the Whites. The pathos of war and revolution is felt keenly in his verse, the more intensely because of Tikhonov's reserve. From the Acmeist school (an offspring of symbolism) Tikhonov learned to observe clarity, concreteness of image, severe precision. "Simple—like iron nails" is a characteristic simile of his that might be applied to most of his work, even to his bloodiest and most fantastic ballads.

Though not a member of any party, Tikhonov is sensitive to problems of humanity, and even in his lyrical effusions he shows a deep concern with the world outside of himself. He has shown his wide knowledge of Europe and Russia especially in his prose stories, Riskovanny chelovek (1927; Reckless Man), Kochevniki (1931; Nomads), and in his novel about the beginning of poison-gas warfare, Voyna (1931; War). In his cycle of poems about Europe, Tikhonov records his impressions of Europe on the eve of the Second World War. One feels the stifling air of fear and suspense that hovers over the cities and plains of the continent, but one is also aware of the poet's faith in the inevitable victory of free man. The militant optimism of a Soviet citizen dissipates Tikhonov's melancholy musings over the war hysteria of Europe. Since 1941 he has written a number of poems and prose sketches about the war. His Leningradskiye rasskazy (1942; Leningrad Tales) raises reportage to the peak of literary art.

A. K.

Timmermans, Felix (1886–, Flemish novelist), born in Lier, is the most important and most typical representative of a constant trend in Flemish literature toward the idyllic and sympathetic presentation of rural and small-town life in Flanders. A born raconteur, his writings are highly flavored with savory expressions. His attitude is moderately but essentially sensuous, and this endears him to his Flemish readers. His love for archaic and folklore elements, which he very cleverly incorporates in his writings (e.g., in Het Kinden Jezus in Vlaanderen, 1917; The Infant Jesus in Flanders; De Harp van St. Franciscus, 1936; The Harp of St. Francis), gives his books a Biedermeier atmosphere.

His first literary success came with Pallieter (1916; Eng. tr., 1924), a series of sketches about a lyrical, slightly Rabelaisian figure who lives in a strongly idealized Flemish landscape. This aesthetic sensualist spends his time enjoying the physical world and adding to these pleasures the delight of well-chosen readings from poets and mystics. Such frank but still morally conscious sensualism was exactly what the war-weary readers of 1916 desired. In one of his latest books, Boerenpsalm (1935; Peasant Psalm), Timmermans almost completely abandoned conventional decorative writing and achieved a novel of peasant life which, although it may be called in a sense synthetic, far surpasses in depth and significance his former works.

His art is devoid of spiritual implications. With Franciscan candor he enjoys life and interprets it with colorful simplicity and sly humor. In many instances his books are literary transcriptions of the illuminations of medieval manuscripts and of the paintings of the masters of the Flemish school. Pieter Bruegel (1928; Eng. tr., Droll Peter, 1930), a lyrical life of the great painter, is the most striking example of this quality of his writing. The immense popularity of Timmermans is not confined to the Dutch-speaking countries; his work has been translated almost entirely into German, and several of his books exist in English or American versions: Pallieter and Droll Peter as indicated and also Drieko- ningentryptiek (1923; The Triptych of the Three Kings, 1936).

See: M. Rutten, Felix Timmermans (1931).
J.-A. G.

Toller, Ernst (1893–1939, German dramatist and poet), was born in Samotschin, in the Prussian province of Posen. After graduating from the Bromberg Realgymnasium (1912), he studied law at Grenoble. At the outbreak of the First World War he joined the German colors, a volunteer. Invalided home in 1916, he continued his studies in Heidelberg and then went to Munich. In 1919 he was elected to the short-lived Bavarian Soviet Republic (Bayerische Räterepublik). As a consequence of his revolutionary activities he was sentenced in 1919 to imprisonment for five years. Toller left Germany in 1932. In a mood of despondency he committed suicide in New York City.

Toller has been aptly called "the most dominant and flagrant genius hatched by the German revolution." This is truly reflected in his dramas. Written in an extreme expressionistic style, they are revolutionary and ecstatic in character. Thus in Die Wandlung (1919; Eng. tr., Transfiguration, in Seven Plays, 1935) Toller unfolds in 13 tableaux ("Stationen") the horrors of war as he himself had experienced them. A similar technique is used in Masse Mensch (1920; Eng. tr., Man and the Masses, 1924), an attack on militarism, capitalism, mechanistic civilization, and other social phenomena, envisaging common brotherhood as the ultimate salvation of mankind. Die Maschinenstürmer (1922; Eng. tr., The Machine-Wreckers, 1923) deals with the Luddite riots in England in the early 19th century. In Hinkemann (1924; Eng. tr., Brokenbrow, 1926; Hinkemann, in Seven Plays, 1935) is pictured the tragic fate, this time not of the masses, but of an individual, a badly wounded war veteran. In Hoppla, wir leben! (1927; Eng. tr., Hoppla! 1928) Toller satirizes contemporary society. Feuer unter den Kesseln (1930; Eng. tr., Draw the Fires, 1935) revolves about the mutiny of the German sailors in 1917–1918 which led to the November revolution of 1918. Toller's revealing autobiography, Eine Jugend in Deutschland, appeared in 1933 (Eng. tr., I Was a German, 1934). His last drama, Pastor Hall (1939; in English only), treats of the successful struggle of a pastor to keep his faith, despite Gestapo persecution. This heroic figure represents Pastor Martin Niemöller. Written in realistic style, the drama is "Dedicated to the Day when this drama may be performed in Germany." Toller's outstanding contributions to the expressionistic lyric are Gedichte der Gefangenen (1921) and Das Schwalbenbuch (1923; Eng. tr., The Swallow-Book, 1924), both written in prison.

Toller was fundamentally an idealist, an expressionistic Schiller—exhorting man "to live in the Brotherhood of God, in which all men are equal" (Pastor Hall).

See: Paul Singer, Ernst Toller (1934); H. Lieberman, Ernst Toller; la tragedia de un espíritu inquieto (1939); W. A. Willibrand, Ernst Toller, Product of Two Revolutions (1941).

G. K.

Tolstoy, Aleksei Nikolayevich (1882–1945, Russian novelist and man of letters), was born at Nikolayevsk in the province of Samara (now Kuibyshev), on the Volga. As a child he led a solitary life, with abundant opportunity for imaginative dreaming and impressionable observation. Up to the age of 19, when he entered the Technological Institute at St. Petersburg for training as an engineer, he had no great inclination to write; it was contact with the symbolist poetry of Vyacheslav Ivanov, Balmont, and Bryusov (qq.v.) that first stimulated him to experiment with verse.

Though a member of the Social Democratic Party during the Revolution of 1905, Tolstoy took no active part in its operations and spent the next two years at the Polytechnic Institute in Dresden. His first collection of verse was published in 1907 under the title Lirika (Lyrics), and another collection called Za sinimi rekami (Behind Blue Streams) appeared two years later. About 1901 he had begun to write prose, composing stories of provincial life in realistic vein and often drawing for subject matter upon personal experience and acquaintances. With the First World War his style, as revealed in his articles as a war correspondent, gained appreciably in clarity and crispness.

After fighting in the White army, Tolstoy lived in Paris until 1922, when he returned to the Soviet Union. During his residence in Paris he had written dramas and short stories, as well as a novel called Syostry (revised 1928; The Sisters), the first part of his trilogy Khozhdeniye po mukam (The Road to Suffering; partial Eng. tr., The Road to Calvary, 1923, Darkness and Dawn, 1935; complete tr., Road to Calvary, 1946). In the course of his first years in the U.S.S.R., Tolstoy was clearly not at one either with his material environment or with the prevailing ideology, and his fiction, though often reflecting his education as an engineer, is frequently more fantastic than social in content (Vosstanie mashin, The Revolt of the Machines; Giperboloid inzhenera Garina, The Hyperboloid of Engineer Garin; Aelita). To this period also belong several dramas on events in modern history, including Zagovor Imperatritzy (1924; The Plot of the Empress), a wordy picture of Rasputin and his time. In 1928 Tolstoy published the novel 1918 as the second part of his trilogy and by that date was generally accepted as an able, if not entirely regenerate, "fellow traveler."

It was only with the appearance of Tolstoy's masterly historical novel Pyotr Pervy (1929-1934, Peter I; Eng. tr. of Vol. I, Peter the Great, 1932) that he attained his full stature. In this dramatic re-creation of the past Tolstoy gives the broadest scope to his narrative talents and his gifts of character portrayal and authentic dialogue. Though built around the imposing figure of Peter I, the novel is more than fictionalized biography, since it slights no aspect of Russian existence in the late 17th century during the first 26 years of the tsar's life and even introduces occasional scenes of the Muscovite barbarity which characterized the period. Peter's reign is treated as an age of transition, not unlike pre-war Russia, and there are obvious analogies between the tsar and the more modern innovators Lenin and Stalin. This novel consecrated Tolstoy's status as the foremost contemporary Soviet writer and, since Gorky's (q.v.) death, as the recognized spokesman of Russian letters. In 1936 he was thus hailed by Molotov as a loyal Soviet citizen and characterized as "a worthy example of that comradely status which admits of no class distinctions."

In 1938, with Khleb (Eng. tr., Bread, 1938), Tolstoy proceeded to offer a thrilling record of the defense of Tsaritsyn (Stalingrad), with forceful pictures of the major revolutionary heroes. Since he had experimented with children's stories in his youth, it was not surprising that in 1936 he should have achieved a notable success with a children's play, Zolotoi klyuchik (The Golden Key), the dramatized fairy tale of the puppet Buratino, a brilliantly sovietized Pinocchio in search of the golden key that opens the door to a land of happiness for children.

During the years of the Second World War, Tolstoy's writing more and more eloquently expressed his intense awareness of political and social life under the Soviets. The process of conditioning was long, but it eventually turned Tolstoy into a conscious and efficient exponent of Soviet ideology. The war also aroused in him an emotional loyalty toward the country for which his previous attachment had been merely sentimental and intellectual. By 1944 Tolstoy had also become, next to Lenin and Gorky, the author most widely read in Soviet Russia—convincing evidence of rapidly improving Soviet taste. The war demolished the last remnants of Tolstoy's previous ivory tower and inspired him to a strenuous series of official duties and literary tasks in the service of the country to whose rapid intellectual advance and patriotic fervor he so signally contributed. He was an interesting example of a gifted middle-class intellectual who worked his way through to a sympathetic understanding of the socialist environment and carved out for himself a dominant position among proletarian writers who had long viewed him with suspicion because of his background and personal history. Tolstoy's work, will, however, be subject to considerable revaluation when a longer perspective is applied to it.

See: Raisa Misser, A. N. Tolstoy, istoricheskii ocherk (1939).

S. H. C.

Tolstoy, Count Leo Nikolayevich (1828-1910, Russian novelist and moral philosopher), was born at Yasnaya Polyana, the family country estate in the province of Tula. After the early death of his mother and father, elderly female relatives brought him up. An unusual sensitivity won him the nickname "crybaby Leo," but in most respects he was a normal, healthy child. German and French tutors gave him his first lessons, and at the age of 16 he entered the University of Kazan to study oriental languages but soon transferred to the faculty of jurisprudence. Social life, lack of interest in his work, undermined his studies; he left the university in 1847 without a degree, convinced that the methods of his teachers and the subjects taught were futile. He was already beginning to manifest that anarchical attitude towards established order which characterized so much of his later thought and writing. Vague schemes of scientific farming and of bettering the lot of his serfs came to nothing, and the next few years were passed in visits to Moscow and St. Petersburg, where he frequented high society and sowed his wild oats. He had begun a painful examination of himself in his diaries and also had dreams of a literary career.

In 1851 the young Tolstoy abruptly turned his back on a life of social ease and went to the Caucasus with his brother Nikolai, an army officer at a frontier post. Tolstoy volunteered, saw active service against the mountaineers, distinguished himself for bravery, and eventually won a commission. While in the Caucasus he also completed and published his first novel Detstvo (1852; Childhood); its success encouraged him to continue his literary activities. He transferred in 1854 to the army operating against the Turks on the Danube, a few months later was stationed at Sevastopol, and took part in the famous defense of that city. His published Sevastopol tales made a profound impression because of their revelation of the horrors of war and of the suffering and bravery of the common soldiers of Russia. Tolstoy wearied of army life and obtained permission to return to St. Petersburg in 1855 (he eventually resigned his commission in 1857). He was greeted as a literary hero by Turgenev (q.v.) and other famous liberal writers, but resisted their friendly attempts to enlist his services in partisan literary efforts. His independence had already become the order of his being. By now his position in literature had been enhanced by the publication of the sequels to Childhood—Otrochestvo (1854; Boyhood) and Yunost (1856; Youth)—and several tales, Metel (1856; The Snowstorm), Dva Gusara (1856; Two Hussars), and Lucerne (1857).

In 1857 and again in 1860 Tolstoy traveled widely in Western Europe and acquired an abiding dislike for governments, politics, and the materialistic way of life in the West. In 1861 he settled down at Yasnaya Polyana, gave himself up to the affairs of his estate and to teaching peasant children, and developed and published highly original ideas on pedagogy, anticipating in some respects the theories of modern progressive education.

The persistent habit of searching self-analysis intensified and left Tolstoy thoroughly dissatisfied with himself. A spiritual crisis was postponed by his marriage in 1862 to Sofya Andreyevna Bers, a girl of 18. The next 15 years, perhaps the happiest of his life, were spent mostly at Yasnaya Polyana in raising a large family, in managing his estate, and in intense literary efforts. This was Tolstoy's greatest creative period: Voina i mir (1865–1869; War and Peace) and Anna Karenina (1875–1877) were published, and other works of fiction, Kazaki (1863; The Cossacks) and Polikushka (1863). He also began two more historical novels on the Decembrists and on Peter the Great, which he never finished, worked on several plays, and published his well-known educational texts, the Azbuki (ABC Books).

Tolstoy's world fame rests largely on the masterpieces War and Peace and Anna Karenina. Modern realism has never equaled the achievement of War and Peace. Each of the more than 500 characters on this vast stage has his own distinct personality and speaks his own language. Even the dogs, as one Russian critic remarked, are individualized. Many of the characters he knew in real life, but they are all passed through the alembic of his art. Truth and simplicity, the two canons of his artistic faith, are scrupulously observed. He wrote War and Peace in an atmosphere of love and family happiness, and the prevailing spirit of the book is an ecstatic love of life. This exuberance is lacking in Anna Karenina, although the novel achieves the same wonderful realism.

After 1876 Tolstoy began to feel more and more dissatisfied with a prosperous, self-centered existence. Indeed, in one mood of despair, he very nearly turned to suicide. He first sought salvation in the religion of the Russian Church, but in vain. The wisdom of the various philosophical systems he studied proved inadequate. Finally, reading of the Gospels convinced him that these sacred books contained the answers to all his questions; with the verse from Matthew (5: 39), "that ye resist not evil," as a cornerstone, he evolved his own conception of Christianity, from which he eliminated all the mystical and nonethical elements. The full account of his conversion, Isповед (1879; A Confession), is a work of extraordinary power and transparent sincerity.

During the last 40 years of his life Tolstoy published much to expound and defend his new faith (see especially Kratkoye izlozheniye Evangeliiya, 1881, A Short Exposition of the Gospels, and V chyom moya vera? 1882, What I Believe In). For him God is not personal but the representation of the supreme Good and Reason, and Jesus simply a great man whose ethical teachings happen to accord with the human conscience. The Kingdom of God is within you, Tolstoy maintained, and hence we achieve happiness only by doing right, by loving all men, and by abstaining from all forms of violence, from lust, hate, and anger. Such precepts brought Tolstoy into direct conflict with the state, which he did not hesitate to repudiate, along with war, army service, oath-taking. He applied his ethical and moral principles to social and economic conditions in Russia, and the results are summed up in his unusual book Tak chto zhe nam delat? (1886; What Then Must We Do?). He condemned private property, the traditional uses of money, and the exploitation of man by man. His beliefs led him to vegetarianism and an abstinence from intoxicants and tobacco. Followers soon flocked to him, his fame spread throughout the world, and Yasnaya Polyana became a kind of Mecca. The Russian Church excommunicated him; the government feared him and yet wisely left him in peace, although it vigorously persecuted many of his followers.

After his conversion Tolstoy wrote, besides his voluminous controversial works, a great deal of imaginative literature—but now in the light of his new faith. His changed views in this respect he explained in his unique work, Chto takoye iskusstvo? (1897–1898; What Is Art?). Art, he argued, is a means of emotional communion, and it is the business of the artist to infect his readers with the feelings he has himself experienced. If the feelings are good, it is good art. New standards obliged Tolstoy to reject or depreciate most of what has generally been considered the greatest art and literature, including his own earlier works. He now labored to achieve a classical simplicity of style and composed a number of short, highly moral tales to teach to the common people his principles. The best of his later works, based on his own inner experiences, are Smert Ivana Ilyicha (1886; The Death of Ivan Ilyich), the drama Vlast tmy (1886; The Power of Darkness), and the controversial novel on sex, Kreitserova Sonata (1889; The Kreutzer Sonata). They are grimly tragic and moving works, in which Tolstoy's artistic powers show no signs of flagging. Hadji Murad (1896–1904) and, to a greater extent, Voskreseniye (1889–1900; Resurrection) represent a reversion to the richer style of War and Peace.

Tolstoy's conversion brought about a marked change in his family life; he strove to live according to his new faith; if his family had permitted, he would have given away all his property. His children, with a few exceptions, and particularly his wife regarded with hostility this abrupt break with their past. Tolstoy's last years were saddened by new domestic tragedies and by a faithful wife now driven to hysteria by the actions of her husband and his disciples. With a vague desire to escape a home life become impossible, Tolstoy stole away secretly one night (October 28, 1910), accompanied by his personal physician, Dr. Makovitski. His health broke down and he died at Astapovo on November 8, 1910.

Tolstoy's works have been widely translated into English.

See: P. I. Biryukov, Biografiya Lva Nikolayevicha Tolstovo (1923); N. N. Gusev, Zhizn Lva Nikolayevicha Tolstovo (1927–1928); Ernest J. Simmons, Leo Tolstoy (1946).
E. J. S.

Torelli, Achille (1841–1922, Italian dramatist), was born at Naples, where his father, Vincenzo Torelli, edited the theatrical magazine Omnibus. His mother was Donn'Anna de Tommasi of the princely family of Lampedusa. Until the age of 16 he studied at the French Institute of Isidore Boubée in Naples. He won his first literary award at 17 with his play Dopo morto. His very earliest works include La Verità, awarded a prize at a contest sponsored by the prince d'Ottaiano, published in 1875, and Gli Onesti, published in 1877.

Torelli was but 26 years old when he achieved nation-wide fame with I Mariti (1867), which is generally considered not only his masterwork but one of the finest plays of Italian 19th-century drama. It was praised by such critics as Ferrigni, Capuana (q.v.), and Manzoni. I Mariti, a comedy in five acts, points the moral that it is a good husband that makes a good wife. The play is set in the worldly society of Naples' aristocracy, the author's own environment. In a series of lively tableaux (rather than in a carefully fabricated plot), several married couples appear on the stage. In an atmosphere of idleness, dissoluteness, and extravagance, these couples lead their wretched lives. Confronted with their children's matrimonial failures, the duke and duchess of Herrera, typifying conjugal harmony and loyalty of the good old days, give their youngest daughter, Emma, in marriage to a hard-working, middle-class lawyer, Fabio. A glamorous but worthless naval officer has caught Emma's fancy. Fabio, through his tactful and chivalrous behavior, endeavors to win the love of his capricious young wife. Emma eventually scorns the beau monde, its jealousies and unfaithfulness, and learns to appreciate the man to whom she has been married. This "parable of husbands" was praised by Benedetto Croce (q.v.) in particular for its "vividness, gracefulness, and lightness of touch." It has enjoyed uninterrupted popularity in Italy. Encouraged by its sensational success, Torelli wrote La Moglie (1869), Triste Realtà (1871), L'Israelita (1883), Scrollina (1885), Donne antiche e donne moderne (1886), and many other plays. For the Neapolitan stage he wrote various comedies (Core d'oro, Nun te ne 'ncaricà, etc.). Torelli frequently subjected his plays to modifications; Lo Buono Marito fa la bona mogliera (1889), e.g., is a dialectal, popularized version of I Mariti. Torelli's literary efforts were not confined to the theatre. A collection of his juvenile verses, Schegge (1878), was published, as well as a poem, Alla Vita e alla sua parola (1898), and a novel, L'Amore che dura (1884). As librarian of the Reale Biblioteca di San Giacomo of Naples, he translated and commented the Song of Songs (1895). There is also a volume of his lectures on L'Arte e la morale (1902).

Torelli is unquestionably seen at his best in I Mariti. None of his other works obtained much favor, although his plays are not lacking in skillfully delineated situations and in delicate character sketches here and there. Possibly under the impact of adverse criticism, Torelli aimed at subtleties which brought out his shortcomings. He remains, however, a significant exponent of early naturalism in Italian drama. No longer interested in national political problems, Torelli turned to psychological problems concerning human conduct and relationship. The moral of Torelli's writings is that true love is our main source of strength and consolation in the vicissitudes of life. Shortly after his 80th birthday, on which he was solemnly feted, Torelli died in Naples.

See: L. Tonelli, L'Evoluzione del teatro contemporaneo in Italia (1913), pp. 196-212; B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, I (1914), 333-345; A. Padula, Commemorazione del socio Achille Torelli (1924).

C. F. W.

Torre, Guillermo de (1900-, Spanish literary critic and poet), was born in Madrid and studied law in that city. He has recently been living in Argentina. He is one of the outstanding personalities of the vanguard movement in Spanish literature, and his name is associated with the so-called ultraism, of which he was one of the most enthusiastic defenders. His poetry, a reflection of his ultraistic creed, is collected in Hélices, poemas (1918-1922) (1923). The major part of his production is in literary criticism and was put to the service of the new conception of literature he had been espousing. In this work he has shown himself to be one of the most penetrating critics of the younger Spanish generation. Literaturas europeas de vanguardia (1925) is the most complete and successful of the many Spanish studies upon the varied literary tendencies in the contemporary period. Torre has collaborated actively on most of the Spanish and Argentine literary reviews launched since the end of the First World War and especially on the Spanish journal Ultra, an organ of ultraism, and the Argentine journal Sur.

See: Nicolas Jiménez, "Guillermo de la Torre y la nueva poesía," América (Quito). Vol. IX (1934), Nos. 54-55, pp. 24-33.

E. G. L.

Toulet, Paul Jean (1867-1920, French poet, novelist, essayist, and critic), was born at Pau in Béarn, to which his parents, Creole colonists from the island of Mauritius, had returned so that the child might be born in the ancestral land. An exciting discovery of exotic Mauritius and of mysterious Algiers and, back in his beloved Béarn, the carefree life of a gentleman farmer gave Toulet the vivid memories which enriched his later works. In 1898 he was in Paris, and although his first books remained unnoticed, his nocturnal life, his brilliant conversation, refined, mordacious, soon made him a legendary figure readily identified with his first hero, Monsieur du Paur, homme public (1898), the self-analyzing cynic, still capable of grandeur, whose sarcastic maxims are echoed in the bitter aphorisms of the posthumous "Almanach," Les Trois Impostures (1922). Under various pseudonyms Toulet then contributed to Vie parisienne and other magazines his versatile articles of art criticism and travel notes, his verse, the short stories which were to become Les Tendres Ménages (1904), and Mon Amie Nane (1905), the novel which probably first introduced the modern courtesan of literature, a precious little trinket, elegant and silly. A translation, Le Grand Dieu Pan (1901), of Arthur Machen's strange book and a charming poetical novel, Le Mariage de Don Quichotte (1902), complete the summary of his activity for that period. In 1912 Toulet's health compelled him to seek more favorable skies: he settled in the Basque country. He still worked hard, his health permitting, editing and rewriting stories not yet published in book form, incessantly polishing the little poems which had appeared only in magazines, fashioning new ones, reading, translating, and still indulging in brilliant conversation with his ever welcome visitors. Comme une fantaisie (1918), La Jeune Fille verte (1920), Les Contes de Béhanzigue (1921), and the delightful collection of poems, Les Contrerimes (1921), were the harvest of the years preceding his death.

His fame grew rapidly: excessive praise was heaped upon a man who certainly deserved more than a reputation for epigrams, but whose only merits apparently had been charm, versatility, and suppleness of style. He often mistakes bitterness for deep thinking. His maxims read like those of a La Rochefoucauld, revised and edited by a Rémy de Gourmont (q.v.). His stories bring to mind Stendhal and Laforgue (q.v.), and at times their poetic rhythm and richness of imagery announce Giraudoux (q.v.). He prided himself on being called a grammaticist because of the many archaic, almost incorrect, syntactic tricks he used and abused. Yet the real title to fame of this "literary dandy" remains the little book of poems, Les Contrerimes, in which he was able to mix humor with sadness, despair with tranquillity, simplicity with grandeur, in an exquisite, inimitable way. There is something in them of the haikai and the limerick; exoticism, real or conventional, alternates with the delicate intimacy of childhood memories or the euphuistic urbanism of Parisian gossip; their versatility, their perfection of form, their lack of sensationalism, enhanced by just enough preciousness, give them their charm. They please and irritate; because of them Toulet will remain among the "fantasist poets," although he should fare better. It is through them that he exerted his influence: Jean Pellerin (q.v.), Tristan Derème, owed much to them. Yet it is in them, as well as in the best of his prose, that the attentive reader will detect, through the sophisticated irony, the elaborate bitterness and the stylistic virtuosity of the writer, the real feeling, discreet but sincere, of a man who, more than anyone else, perhaps, deserved the title "gentleman of letters."

See: H. Martineau, La Vie de P.-J. Toulet (1921); F. Carco, Amitié avec Toulet (1934).

C. L. B.

Tousseul, Jean (pseud. of Olivier Degée, 1890–1944, Belgian novelist), was born at Landenne-sur-Meuse, province of Namur. The son of manual toilers, he received only elementary schooling, worked in the quarries, and became interested in agitation for social reform; then, dissatisfied with what he now calls his "years of vagabondage," he turned to literary expression and won fame. His experience gave him an intimate understanding of the problems of the humble. One of the rare Belgian writers who attempted to eke out a living by the pen, he scorned making any compromise with his ideals in order to gain popularity. He sought to copy nature in artless peasants rather than to fathom the subconscious primitive in the supercivilized.

Hence the poignant simplicity of his work. A first booklet, never reprinted, appeared in 1916: since then he published 12 collections of stories, nine of sketches and souvenirs, and 12 novels. In his own country he was rewarded by coveted prizes; abroad, there are translations into English, Dutch, German, Czech, and Russian. By the setting of his stories he belongs to the regionalistic tradition. Profoundly conscious of the influence of environment, he evokes primarily the soul of landscape as it may shape the thoughts and emotions of his characters. His village becomes a microcosm in which he discovers humanity. The essential unity of his inspiration proves that he found the center of equilibrium he sought in his days of storm and stress, while the variety of approach and of subject matter bars any suggestion of aloofness.

The title of one of his volumes, Images et souvenirs (1931), may stand as epigraph for all his work, for past and present are closely linked in his imagination. Fossils in the stone quarries aroused his interest in the history of the region which he recalls in some of the most successful stories, e.g., "Le Grand Malheur" (in Le Passé, 1933). An eclipse of the sun has terrified the villagers, who believe the end of the world at hand. Their reactions are dramatically portrayed in timeless scenes: are we at the beginning of the 15th century or on the eve of a 20th-century invasion of Belgium? Tousseul called L'Épine blanche (1936) a fairy story; it is actually set in the 18th century, but no reader can fail to recognize the author in the personage of the apothecary who seeks a "volatile drug" to anesthetize patients on the operating table. Here is a discreet souvenir of his own efforts toward social amelioration—a kind of autobiographical touch frequent in his work. After completing Jean Clarambaux (5 vols., 1927–1936), he admitted that the life of his hero and his own had often run parallel ways. His aspirations and ideals are shared by most of his characters. Jean Clarambaux, perhaps his masterpiece, and L'Épine blanche are his only books which have yet been published in English (1939 and 1944). The first, suggested by Rolland's (q.v.) Jean-Christophe, perhaps surpasses its predecessor in sustained poetic inspiration. In construction it betrays the technique of the conteur—the episodes, artfully wrought to produce a single impression, are loosely bound together. Yet the whole leaves an indelible memory in the reader. Tragedy and heroism alternate with idyllic scenes and homely realism to culminate in a matured philosophy of life. The fourth volume, La Rafale (1933), offers glimpses of the First World War seen from a village, the more convincing as friend and foe are impartially scrutinized. Among Jean Tousseul's titles to originality is the enlargement of the scope of fiction by the introduction of quarrymen and the perils of their profession. He never idealizes these helots of civilization but presents them for our admiration and pity as he knew them. Whether he relates incidents of heroism or portrays the brutal fury of intoxication, his realism rings true. It is sprung from sympathy based on dauntless idealism in search of a criterion of life.

See: D. Denuit, Jean Tousseul (1937); J. P. Bonnami, ed., Témoignages sur Jean Tousseul (1941).

B. M. W.

Tozzi, Federigo (1883-1920, Italian novelist), was born in Siena of lower-middle-class stock. His mother died when he was young, and he does not paint a very pleasant picture of his relations with his father (see Novale, 1925). He seems to have been a rather unruly youth, and, although he had opportunities, he lacked the discipline to submit himself to the process of formal education. For a time he worked for the state railways. As early as 1911 Tozzi started contributing to various periodicals and in 1913 at Siena, in collaboration with Giullioti (q.v.), he founded the Torre, which was regarded, not without reason, as a reactionary organ. His first book, La Zampogna verde (1911), is essentially D'Annunzian in character, which is perhaps hardly remarkable considering the influence of D'Annunzio (q.v.) on all the pre-war generation. The same thing may be said of La Città delle vergini (1913), the very title of which has a D'Annunzian ring. But with Tre Croci (1920; Eng. tr., Three Crosses, 1921) and Il Podere (1921), Tozzi comes into his own, and it is on these books that his fame rests.

In a way Tozzi is a transition writer, one might almost say a transformer, passing on the current of D'Annunzio and to a more limited extent Verga (q.v.) to the post-war generation. Certain elements of D'Annunzio he never shook off; the autobiographical urge, the glorification of some of the more melodramatic aspects of reaction, the taste for the perverse. Yet he shows clearly that he feels the great lack in D'Annunzio, which is moral force, even moral consciousness. It has been remarked that his characters are so many Andrea Sperelli's (protagonist of D'Annunzio's Il Piacere) who no longer enjoy the game of pleasure, but are incapable of escaping from themselves. They are in fact somewhere between Sperelli and Rubè (Borgese's, q.v., introspective hero of the early 20's). The subject matter of his novels perhaps more than anything else has led to the comparison with Verga. There is another much more significant resemblance to Verga in that Tozzi too went through a long period of apprenticeship; he had not indeed truly found himself at the time of his death. Like Verga he was of the type that matures slowly and is capable of growth long after other artists have made their work a formula. Tre Croci and Il Podere are not masterpieces in the sense that Verga's I Malavoglia or even D'Annunzio's Il Piacere are. But they are fascinating because of their promise and, as a matter of fact, will stand comparison with most novels of the time. It seems likely that, had Tozzi lived another 10 years, his own peasant exuberance and strength might have come more to the fore and forged out of the purely intellectual influences in his career something quite powerful and original.

See: D. Giullioti, L'Ora di Barabba (1920); P. Cesarini, Vita di Federico Tozzi (1935); E. De Michallis, Saggio su Tozzi (1936).

T. G. B.

Trakl, Georg (1887-1914, Austrian poet), shares with Ernst Stadler (q.v.) the rank of leading lyrical talent of German preexpressionism. He was born at Salzburg, Austria, son of a hardware dealer, studied in Vienna, and became a druggist at Salzburg, where he met his later friend and protector Ludwig Ficker, in whose magazine Brenner he published nearly all his poems. At the outbreak of the First World War he went with an ambulance corps to the Galician front, but soon had to be taken to the military hospital at Cracow for medical treatment. There he died from an overdose of poison, which he apparently had taken to end his suffering.

Trakl is an exclusively lyrical writer, endowed with an almost morbid sensitiveness and an unusually fine feeling for rhythm and color. His first collection of poems, Gedichte (1913), shows influences of Dostoevski (q.v.), Villon, George (q.v.), and Hofmannsthal (q.v.). From Nietzsche (q.v.) he inherited a deep cultural pessimism which caused him to interpret life in terms of sickness and decay. Unable to find a remedy for this cosmic evil, he indulged in an orgy of somber visions filled with pictures of putrefaction and death. The later poems, published under the title Sebastian im Traum

(1915), reveal a more wholesome, although by no means optimistic, concept of life. Under Hölderlin's influence he finds a pantheistic creed and establishes a spiritual community with mankind and nature, life and death. Trakl's language, less rigid than George's and less rhetorical than Hofmannsthal's, is free from expressionistic exaggerations. In the finest examples of this language there is reborn the solemn simplicity and nobleness of Hölderlin, with whom Trakl shows more affinity than with any other poet.

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Neue Folge: Im Banne des Expressionismus, 4. Auflage (1927) pp. 307-309, 430-433; W. Mahrholz, Deutsche Literatur der Gegenwart (1930), pp. 389-393.

E. J.

Trausti, Jón (pseud. of Guðmundur Magnússon, 1873-1918, Icelandic novelist and poet), was born at Rif, the northernmost farm in Iceland, on the shore of the Arctic. His parents were poor, and the famine of 1882 left indelible marks on the mind of the boy. He was, however, steeled by his experiences. In order to get books to read he learned the trade of printing, and he remained a printer to the end of his life. After an apprenticeship in Copenhagen he went to Reykjavík, living there until his death from influenza in the epidemic of 1918.

After two volumes of poetry and one historical play had appeared, Trausti finally found his place as an author in the broad social novel and the short story. In Halla-Heiðarbýlið (4 vols., 1906-1911; Halla and the Heath Cottage) he draws on a vast canvas the Icelandic rural scene as he had known it in his youth, teeming with characters, the figure of the poor cotter's wife Halla in the foreground gradually growing into heroic proportions. In Leysing (1907; Thaw) he uses economic changes, in Borgir (1910; Castles) the advent of new ideas in the church, as a background for his strong, conservative characters. Later he re-creates in Sögur frá Skaftáreldi (2 vols., 1912-13; Stories from the Eruption of Skaftá, 1783) the most crucial years in Icelandic history, when the nation almost perished in the terrible famine which was the aftermath of the eruption. After that he wrote a series of romantic novels based on the Icelandic middle ages (14th-16th centuries). As an apostle of progress and rugged individualism he reacted vigorously in Bessi gamli (1918; Old Bessi) against the coming socialistic tendencies. Though his style was uneven, Trausti's narrative talent was considerable, and his characters are always vibrantly alive.

See: S. Einarsson, "Jón Trausti," in Trausti, Ritsafn, I (1939), 7-39.

S. E.

Tretyakov, Sergei (1892-, Russian poet and playwright), born in Moscow, studied literature at the University of St. Petersburg, joined the group of "formalists" before the Revolution. After 1917 Tretyakov was active as a member of the futuristic movement and one of the leaders of Lef (Left Wing group of proletarian writers). In 1924 he was appointed professor of literature of the Russian department at the National University in Peking. Tretyakov stayed in China for two years and wrote a propaganda play against foreign imperialism in that country, Rychi Kitai! (1926; Eng. tr., Roar China, 1931), which had a considerable success in Russia. Tretyakov's plays are crude examples of the semi-futuristic, semi-symbolistic style of disciples of Mayakovsky (q.v.) in the 20's (Slushai Moskva, 1924, Listen Moscow; Pro-tivogazy, 1924, Gas Masks). After 1930 Tretyakov was active as a journalist. He produced several books on the collectivization of the Soviet agriculture (Mesyats v derevne, 1934, A Month in a Village; Tysyacha i odin trudoden, 1934, Thousand and One Work-days), a description of Eastern Siberia (Strana AE, 1932; The Land AE), a collection of sketches on Czechoslovakia (Strana na perekrestke, 1937; A Country at a Crossroad), and an interesting biography of a Chinese student (Dinshu-Hua, 1930). Tretyakov's literary activity was interrupted in 1938 for political reasons.

M. S.

Trigo, Felipe (1864-1916, Spanish novelist), was born in the province of Badajoz (Estremadura), to which he returned after studying medicine in Madrid to practice his profession. It was there he acquired that acquaintance with rural life later depicted in such novels as El médico rural (1912) and Jarrapellejos (1914). He soon became an army doctor and was stationed in Seville, where he devoted himself to journalism and literature in addition to his military duties and published a book entitled Etiología moral (1891). He was ordered to the Philippine Islands and was badly wounded in an uprising of Tagal prisoners. On his return to Spain he continued his journalistic activities, writing a series of articles collected in La campaña filipina (Impresiones de un soldado) (1897).

Upon being invalided out of the army he resumed the practice of medicine in his native province, and there he wrote his first novel, Las ingenuas (1901). This work achieved a great popular success; with it he embarked, fairly late in life, upon the second phase of his literary career, that of a novelist, which he continued in Madrid until he ended his life by his own hand.

The popularity of his first novel and of those which followed in rapid succession—Le sed de amar (1902), La altísima (1903), La bruta (1904)—was due to the boldness with which he handled sex themes. This won him many readers and a dubious fame as a pornographic writer and overshadowed his real literary gifts. There is nothing frivolous or deliberately immoral in his works; on the contrary, there is a fanatical faith in a new morality which is in keeping with the crisis of ideas at the end of the century and which in him was a combination of the materialism engendered by his profession as a doctor and of the idealism of his anarchist belief in free love. He began his career with a book on a moral theme and ended it with others of the same character—Socialismo individualista (1906), El amor en la vida y en los libros (1908). Neither by reason of his ideas or of his art can he be considered a great writer; but it is equally unjust to look upon him as a writer who has no place in literature. There is strength and originality in his novels which entitle him to a place of his own in the Spanish literature of his day.

See: H. Peseux-Richard, "Un romancier espagnol: M. Felipe Trigo," Revue hispanique, XXVIII (1913), 317-389; M. Abril, Felipe Trigo: Exposición y glosa de su vida, su filosofía, su moral, su arte, su estilo (1917).
F. de O.

Trindade Coelho, José Francisco de (1861-1908, Portuguese short-story writer), was born in Mogadouro, Trás-os-Montes. From this district, where he passed his childhood in contact with the rural milieu of the North, he was later to draw the materials for his best stories. He went to study law at Coimbra and took his degree in 1885. Subsequently he collected his impressions of student life in a book entitled In Illo Tempore (1904). He embarked upon a juridical career and was assigned to Portalegre, Alemtejo. Here he spent four years; and familiarized himself with another of the Portuguese regions characterized by the most typical popular life. In 1890 he was named magistrate in Lisbon. The following year was published the book to which he owes his fame, Os meus amores (My Loves), a collection of stories with rural atmosphere. Afterwards he wrote several juridical works and certain brochures on popular culture. He took his own life in 1908, a victim of grief and neurasthenia.

Endowed with marked talents as a storyteller, Trindade Coelho is one of the great regionalists of Portuguese novelistic realism, with a conception of rural life definitely his own. From the rose-tinted version of romantic idealism, writers had passed to the pitiless description of sentiments and brutally elemental passions as the only rural reality. Castelo Branco (q.v.) had initiated this phase, members of the realistic school had continued it, and Fialho de Almeida (q.v.) had given it its extreme development. Trindade Coelho, temperate in his descriptions, neither idealizes nor degrades. From Fialho, of whom he is considered a follower and whom he indeed admired, he inherits the preoccupation with style which in him makes for a prose of great expressive richness. However, he does not show the violence or disordered chromatic aberration of Fialho. On the contrary, his style is distinguished by smoothness and delicacy, by an effect of spontaneity and lack of effort. Its sobriety attains a simplicity of which no elements could be suppressed and yet is the result of a conscientious elaboration. Os meus amores comprises little sketches of village life which include some of the best pages of Portuguese regionalism. Across a certain tone of kindly irony which permeates his narratives—and which does not prevent his being one of the realists who has known best how to preserve a position of detachment from his work—he translates with great lucidity the relation of the characters to the surroundings. "Tipos da terra" (Local Types), "À lareira" (By the Fireplace), and especially "Idílio rústico" (Idyllic Love) are stories full of simple delicacy, of realism mixed with a subtle lyric sympathy for the milieu, of tragic elements intermingled with patriarchal simplicity. His talents as an objective observer, in combination with the virile calm of his concisely analytical style, his predilection for simple subjects and simple psychology, make of Trindade Coelho, despite his limited output, a writer of strong personality.

See: Luise Ey, Trindade Coelho (1918); Fialho de Almeida, "'Os meus amores' de T. C.," Os gatos, V (1933), 109-112.

E. G. D.

Tsvetayeva, Marina Ivanovna (1892–, Russian poet), was born in Moscow, the daughter of a professor of art and philology at the University of Moscow. As a child she lived a great deal abroad, attended secondary schools in Lausanne and Freiburg, and in 1898 followed courses in Old French literature at the Sorbonne in Paris. The first years of the Russian Revolution she spent in Moscow, but in 1922 she emigrated abroad and since that time has lived chiefly in Prague, Berlin, and Paris.

Tsvetayeva's poetic talent did not receive due recognition until the 1920's, when several volumes of her mature verse appeared almost simultaneously. Her first three books, Vecherni albom (1910; An Evening Album), Volshebny fonar (1912; The Magic Lantern), Iz dvukh knig (1913; From Two Books), already hint at genuine talent. Her later works, Versty (1922; Mileposts), Tzar-devitsa (1922; Tsar-Maiden), Razluka (1922; Parting), Stikhi k Bloku (1922; Poems to Blok), Molodets (1924; Bold Fellow), reveal her as a poet of great original creative power and unusual sensitivity to rhythm and sound.

See: I. Ehrenburg, Portrety russkikh poetov (1922).

O. M.

Turgenev, Ivan Sergeyevich (1818–1883, Russian dramatist, short-story writer, and novelist), was born in the Central Russian province of Orel. His mother, the wealthy and imperious daughter of serf-owning landed gentry, embittered by an unhappy marriage to an impecunious and dissolute army officer, gave scant thought to the upbringing of Ivan and his two brothers, who were abandoned to the kindly attentions of literate serfs. From Lobanov, his mother's household steward, Turgenev thus learned to read and write Russian and acquired his first taste for Russian literature.

After a year at the University of Moscow (1833–1834), he finished the basic course at the University of St. Petersburg in 1837. Turgenev's earliest literary experiments, dating from his university years, were poetic in form and Byronic in content. His first printed verse was published in 1838 by Souremennik (The Contemporary), a monthly founded by Pushkin. That same spring Turgenev enrolled at the University of Berlin, where for three years he studied philosophy (chiefly Hegel), classics, and history, seasoning his books with considerable travel. In 1842 he passed the St. Petersburg examinations for the master's degree in philosophy but, instead of entering upon a scholarly career, took a minor position in the Ministry of the Interior which he held for two years before turning all his energies to literature.

Since 1843, in fact, Turgenev's interests and associations had been mainly literary. In that year he made the beneficent acquaintance of the great critic Vissarion Belinski and saw in print both his narrative poem Parasha and his drama Neostorozhnost (Carelessness). He also conceived a lasting attachment for the French opera singer Pauline Viardot-Garcia which was largely responsible for his long residence abroad in later years. Between 1843 and 1856 Turgenev wrote a series of dramas, several of which reflect Gogol's realistic themes of country life, though his dramatic masterpiece, Mesyats v derevne (1849; A Month in the Country), exhibits a psychological accuracy and touches of impressionism which foreshadow Chekhov's (q.v.) technique. Turgenev's maturity as a realist in prose was signalized in 1847 by the appearance of Khor i Kalinich (Khor and Kalinich), a short story of peasant life and actually the first in the series later celebrated as Zapiski okhotnika (collected ed., 1852, Notes of a Hunter; Eng. tr. as Russian Life in the Interior or the Experiences of a Sportsman, A Sportsman's Sketches, etc.). Upon his mother's death, which made him the self-sufficient master of 15,000 acres and some 2,000 male serfs, Turgenev hastened to mitigate the lot of the latter. He freed the domestic staff, endowing them with fields and woodlands, while the serf farmers previously on forced labor for the owner were given a chance to acquire their own holdings.

The next six years (1850–1856), which Turgenev spent uninterruptedly in Russia, were the period during which he was most closely identified with Russian society and its aspirations. With A Sportsman's Sketches he struck a telling blow at the institution of serfdom and all the degeneracy and suffering it entailed. Though not comparable in violence with Uncle Tom's Cabin, the Sketches give a realistic picture of contemporary country life in an area remote from urban culture, emphasizing the bad effect exercised by serfdom on those who lived by it and with it. In Turgenev's view, it was debasing to the masters, and prevented any recognition of the serfs as human beings. The influence of the Sketches was the stronger because of the reserve with which they were written, and Alexander II once said that after he had read them he never lost sight of the necessity for emancipation.

Yet as literature the sketches, however ably composed, were at best genre, and of a type and tendency not uncommon in contemporary and previous Russian letters. Turgenev, though he remained a master of the short story to the end of his days, thus went on to broader portrayals of types which reflect the mood of society as influenced by currents of contemporary thought. Rudin (1856), his first major novel, depicts a well-educated intellectual of the 40's whose capacity for analyzing himself and others inhibits all fruitful activity. Even the love of a devoted and energetic girl cannot save him. After several false starts, he proves unable to harmonize word and deed and cannot master his environment. The parallelism between Rudin and Pushkin's Eugene Onegin is immediately apparent, and here Turgenev has been called an "intelligent and creative pupil of Pushkin."

In the summer of 1856 Turgenev left Russia for Western Europe and thereafter never made more than extended visits to his native country—a situation which, though its effect was not immediately sensible, eventually deprived him of intimate contacts with progressive Russian thought. Turgenev's second novel, Dvoryanskoe gnezdo (1859; A Nest of Gentlefolk), also treats the 40's and is really the swansong of the old patriarchal provincial life which was fading out with the dawn of a new era. Like Rudin, its hero Lavretzki is still measurably frustrated and wastes eight years in two love affairs, one trivial, the other tragic, before settling down to useful work as a country squire at the age of 45. Liza Kalitina, the heroine, begins the series of Turgenev's great female characters who are important in world literature as descendants of Pushkin's Tatyana and close kinswomen of the heroines of Henry James. She is, first of all, a strong woman contrasted with a generous but essentially weak man.

At bottom, Rudin and Lavretzki are both ineffective in varying degrees. But in his next novel, Nakanune (1860; On the Eve), Turgenev endeavored to create a more positive type in the Bulgarian Insarov, who marries a Russian girl but has burnt himself out in the service of his oppressed countrymen. It was perhaps Turgenev's hope that Russian Insarovs would soon appear, but he seems to have chosen a foreigner for his hero because the nature of the rising generation was not yet clear in his mind.

The appearance of this novel coincides with a significant break in Turgenev's friendships. Since 1847 he had published mainly in Souremennik, controlled in the late 50's by the poet Nekrasov but largely dominated by the young and brilliant radical critics Chernyshevski and Dobrolyubov. Turgenev's moderate liberalism was no more to their taste than their bumptious and uncompromising materialism was to his. An unfavorable review of On the Eve by Dobrolyubov provoked the final break, and from this point Turgenev published in the moderate Russki vestnik (Russian Herald). But his contact with the radical younger generation inspired Otsy i deti (1862; Fathers and Sons), the masterpiece among his novels. Bazarov, its hero—no longer an educated nobleman, a reflective country squire, or a resolute foreigner, but a university student of humble origin, a commoner scornful of the past, intolerant of slow-moving contemporary liberalism, eager for a decisive leap into a better future—is the immortal type of the energetic and impatient younger generation, shocking its elders and developing a tremendous head of steam even on the easiest grades. Though with Fathers and Sons Turgenev definitively alienated progressive sympathies of his own day, the fact that in such a period Turgenev carried his strong and appealing hero, not to positive triumph, but to accidental and pathetic infection and death, proves only that a novelist is often wiser than his critics. For exile or death would have been, in real life, Bazarov's only conceivable alternatives at the time.

Turgenev's last two major novels, Dym (1867; Smoke) and Nov (1872; Virgin Soil), though artistically meritorious, failed of popular success because they reflected his basic philosophy of progress step by step and his belief that the revolutionary movement was false and futile. Apart from his major novels, he also composed during his lifetime numerous short stories (some almost of novel length) which reveal his great stylistic gifts and psychological penetration, e.g., Pervaya lyubov (1860; First Love), Stepnoi Korol Lir (1870; King Lear of the Steppes), Veshnie vody (1872; Spring Waters), and Posle Smerti (1883; Clara Milich).

From the 50's to his death, Turgenev as an international figure was surpassed by no other Russian author before the appearance of Leo Tolstoy's (q.v.) great novels. He it was who first revealed the Russian spirit to the outside world. As the Danish critic Georg Brandes (q.v.) wrote, "he gave us the psychology of a whole race." Though seemingly without the neurasthenic depth of Dostoevski

(q.v.) or the epic sweep of Tolstoy, Turgenev himself suffered from handicaps of character and environment which are reflected in his works. His talent is more lyric than that of either Dostoevski or Tolstoy, and he surpassed them both in his feeling for nature and his capacity to describe it. Beyond that Turgenev still remains the greatest Russian prose stylist of all time. His health began to fail before 1880, and the illness which was to destroy him was finally diagnosed as an inoperable and excruciatingly painful spinal cancer, which caused his death at Paris on September 3, 1883.

There are two full translations of the works of Turgenev in English (by Constance Garnett and by Isabel Hapgood).

See: Edward Garnett, Turgenev; a Study (1917); Avrahm Yarmolinsky, Turgenev; the Man, His Art, and His Age (1926); André Maurois, Tourguéniev (1931, in French); R. A. Gettmann, Turgenev in England and America (1941).

S. H. C.

Turkish literature. Classical Turkish literature, extending in its richness from the 16th to the 18th centuries, stood by itself; it exerted no influence upon the literatures of other countries nor was it influenced by them—except that it faithfully followed the patterns of classical Persian literature. The situation became altogether different in the 19th century. Turkey then had to reckon directly with the dynamically expanding European powers and to take into account as never before the complex system of Western cultures. The leaders of the Ottoman Empire, as it retreated from Europe, had to yield to interior and exterior demands for modernization according to patterns from the West. Now came the period of Turkish history called that of the Tanzīmāt, the reforms; the first step was the liquidation of the Janizaries in 1826. The first newspaper was printed in 1831. Liberal political associations were formed, such as the Jeni Osmanlılar (New, or Young, Turks) in 1865. Schools of a European model and with European instructors were established, primarily for military purposes but also with a program for higher education; in the 1860's three institutions of major importance were founded—the Galata-Saray Lisesi, the American Robert College, and the Imperial Ottoman University of Constantinople. Definite changes in Turkish literature became apparent, language and style evolved, literary forms very new to the country, in novel and drama, were introduced. The literature was at first that of translation, and French writers exerted the preponderant influence. The “azhar” (flowery) style was abandoned. A multitude of Arabic and Persian words for which there still existed Turkish expressions were replaced by these, although in vocabulary literary Turkish remained, and still does today, overwhelmingly Arabic. An attempt was made to bring the literary language closer to the spoken, even to the colloquial language of the people.

In more recent Turkish literature, to understand which it is necessary to go back to about 1840, three phases are to be distinguished: the literature of the Tanzīmāt already mentioned; the “New Literature” (Edebijjāt-i Džedide); and the “National Literature” (Millî Edebiyat). (For earlier Turkish authors and for Turkish works published before the decree of Romanization of modern Turkish in 1928, the Orientalistic transcription is here used, and the new official Turkish orthography for what follows that date.)

Šināsî, the spiritual father of the Young Turkish movement, is the first significant writer of the Tanzīmāt epoch. He translated French verse, was a poet in his own right, and founded the first two nonofficial newspapers, Terdzümân-i Ahvâl (1860; Interpreter of the Situation) and Taşvîr-i Eşkâr (1862; Shaping of the Thoughts). Like his literary contemporaries, Zijâ Paşa and Nâmyq Kemâl, he was forced to flee his native country because his progressive ideas were subject to persecution. Nâmyq Kemâl wrote the first national Turkish drama, Vaṭan jâxud Silistre (The Fatherland, or Silistria), based on an event of the Russo-Turkish War, and he was soon banished to Cyprus. Writers continued nevertheless to fight the suppression of free thought in Turkey. An important literary critic, dramatist, and poet active a little later was Redžâ'i-Zâde Ekrem (1847–1913), author of a rhetorical essay entitled Ta'lim-i Edebijjât (Instruction in Literature). Abû-ẓ-Zijâ Tevfîq, littérateur and publisher, compiled a good anthology of Ottoman literature. Ahmed Midhat (1844–1913) was a prolific prose writer whose main work consisted of translations and fiction. The Albanian Šems-ed-Dîn Sâmi Frâšerî compiled the famous dictionary Qâmûs-i Türkî (Turkish Ocean [of words]) and the Turkish encyclopedia Qâmûs-el-A'lâm (Ocean of the Sciences). An eminent place among men of letters of this period was occupied by 'Abdu'l-Ḥaqq Ḥâmid (1852–1937), who introduced into his country European romanticism and European poetical styles. He was both poet and dramatist. Among his works are Nesteren, Eşber and Tezer (all three narrative); Tāryq, on the conquest of Spain by the 'Arabs; collections of poems entitled Şahrā (Desert) and Maqber (The Grave); works of fiction, Ölü (The Dead [Woman]) and Belde (The City, i.e., Paris).

The representatives of the Edebijjât-i Džedide formed a literary-political group and published the literary periodical Şervet-i Fünûn (Riches of Arts). The magazine had been created by Tevfîq Fikret (1867-1915), a poet whose style was modeled after French masters but who sang the praises of the Anatolian peasant. The group was in constant struggle against the reactionary and oppressive measures of the sinister 'Abdu'l-Hamîd. Among its members were the poet Dženâh Şihâb-ed-Dîn (1860-), often called the "Turkish Alfred de Musset," the novelist Mehmed Ra'ûf (Re'ûf; 1875-1931), Xâlid Zijâ (1866-), and Aḥmed Hikmet. Ra'ûf was influenced largely by Feuillet, Daudet (q.v.), Flaubert (q.v.), and Zola (q.v.), as in Džân-Fezâ (The Lovely One); he wrote many short stories, novels such as Ejlûl (September) and Sijâh Indžiler (Black Pearls), and a number of plays. Xâlid Zijâ, "the Alphonse Daudet of the Turks," published in the Şervet-i Fünûn his romances Mâvî ve Sijâh (Blue and Black) and Âşq-i Memnû' (Forbidden Love); numerous letters written during his travels in Germany were published in 1916. Aḥmed Hikmet is a novelist; his best-known work is probably Xâristân ve Gûlistân (Land of Thorns and Garden of Roses), published in Constantinople in 1901. The association Fedžr-i Âti (The Imminent Dawn) comprised another similarly progressive and antimonarchistic but very individualistic group of writers. These were completely under the influence of French symbolism (q.v.). To this group belong Jahjâ Kemâl (1885-); Aḥmed Hâşim (1885-1933), whose delicate poetry has been published under the titles Göl Sâ'atleri (Hours of the Lake) and Pejâle (The Cup) and whose prose is collected in the volume Turabâ-xâne-ji Laqlaqân (The Hospice of the Storks); and Şehâb-ed-Dîn Sülejmân (1885-), author of the dramas Çyqmaz Soqaq (Dead End), the excited discussion of which led to the foundation of the Fedžr-i Âti, and Fyrtyna (Storm).

The really modern writing is called by the Turks, as already indicated, Millî Edebiyat (National Literature). The term of course has historical as well as aesthetic implications. It became current just prior to the Young Turk revolution of 1908. The Young Turks were a progressive party whose chief aim was less the abolition of the sultanate and the old social structure based on oriental bureaucratic despotism than the creation of a national Turkish state after the pattern of the national states of Europe. The new ideology embraced Pan-Turkism and Pan-Turanism, variation of a totalitarian nationalism; the former was intended to include all Turkic tribes and nations (the majority of the Turkic nation are within the Soviet Union), and the latter was to include tribes and nations which were of "Turanian" origin (i.e., speaking not only Turkic but also Finno-Ugric languages). The Pan-Turanian movement found strong adherents for a time among the young intellectuals of Hungary.

As a result of the retreat of the Ottoman Empire from its former position of conquest in the Balkans, North Africa, Egypt, and Mesopotamia and in view of its obvious disintegration (not only national, as in the Balkans and Egypt, but also economic), the Young Turk movement pledged itself to the creation of a single national Turkish state and to the utmost possible concentration of the national forces, both politically and intellectually.

Unlike the writers of the classical era, the Young Turk authors were mostly not of the upper class. Many of them have been, or still are, teachers of the middle and higher schools. They are consequently much more closely connected with the people. Far better than the classical writers, who enjoyed a life secluded from the profanum vulgus, they understand the common man, above all the uncorrupted, valiant Anatolian peasant. They know his positive qualities—his tenacity, his capacity for the endurance of hardships, whether caused by life in a country whose ancient irrigation systems have been destroyed and never rebuilt or by a greedy and corrupt officialdom. They know his fidelity to the vatan (Arabic = fatherland); it was the Anatolian peasant who had fought for the glory of the sultans, the rulers of the faithful, and for the expansion of their God-protected empire.

Anatolia, the immediate home of the Turks, and the Turkish people became more and more the subjects of literature. These people were not the refined representatives of the class from which the "pillars of the imperial state" had been recruited; they had different manners and a different education; some of them were even without manners or education and totally illiterate. They did no understand the language of the upper class, almost completely Arabic and Persian; they spoke a more genuinely native language, using a more Turkic vocabulary; their language indeed had been despised by the educated and called qaba Türkçe (coarse Turkish).

Again there was much translation, and now not only from French but also from German, English, Italian, and Russian. With the elimination of many Arabic and Persian terms, the influence of Islam and of oriental patterns of style decreased. Turkish literature became basically more Europeanized. Fiction and the novel together with political essays formed the bulk of the new writing. Quantitative meter was abandoned in favor of syllabic. The theatre was likewise influenced, both through translations and attempts to copy European patterns.

The Millî Edebiyat has been prolific in writers, but it is still early to appraise them. Many are important now more for political than for aesthetic reasons. Time will be needed to differentiate the really great writers from the journalists or merely political essayists.

The long list begins with the novelist Ömer Sejjeddin (1882-1920); the poet and chief theorist of Turkish nationalism, Zijâ Gök Alp (1875-1924); and the publicist Mehmed Emîn (1869-). It also comprises such writers as Enis 'Avnî (pseud. Aqa Gündüz, 1885-), who wrote novels, e.g., Qatırdzy Oylu, the story of a robber chieftain of the period of decay under Mehmed III, 1595-1603; Fâlih Ryfqî (now: Falih Rifkî Atay; 1895-), a gifted essayist who fought for Turkish independence and the Young Turk revolution and whose articles were collected in the Eski Saat (Old Hour). Rûşen Eşref (now: Rûşen Eşref), also an essayist, is known for his translation of Vergil. He wrote a study on Tewfiq Fikret and a number of essays, such as Geçmiş Günler (Days Passed) and Damla Damla (Drop by Drop). Hâmdullâh Şubhî, an enthusiastic patriot, is a writer of fiction, e.g., Day Jolu (Mountain Road). Reşad Nûrî (now: Reşad Nuri) became suddenly famous for his great work Çaly Quşu ("Le Roitelet"). He also wrote Sönmiş Jyldyzlar (Stars Extinguished), Dudaqtan Qalbe (From the Lips to the Heart), Aqşam Güneşi (Evening Sun). Among his well-known dramas are Handžer (The Dagger), Ümidin Güneşi (The Sun of Hope), and Bir Gedže Fädzy'asy (The Tragedy of a Night).

Ja'qûb Qadrî (now: Yakub Kadri Karasmanoğlu) is undoubtedly the greatest and most brilliant of living Turkish writers. His significance for Turkish literature will remain outstanding, for his interests, capacities, and subjects reach far beyond the narrow national horizon of the major part of the Millî Edebiyat. He was born in 1889 in Cairo. His father was 'Abdu'l-Qâdyr bej, who belonged to a family of old Turkish nobility. His boyhood and youth were spent in Mağnisa and Cairo and in Smyrna where he met Şehâbeddin Sülejmân, who introduced him into the Fedžr-i Âti. He went to Constantinople only after the revolution. Maupassant, Daudet, and Bourget (qq.v.), whom he admired in his early years, did not continue to exert influence upon him, nor did Turkish men of letters such as Xâlid Zijâ and Mehmed Re'ûf. His critical ability as well as his truly great artistic capacities was developed very quickly, and this fact was important for his literary independence. Scandinavian literature, especially the work of Ibsen (q.v.), influenced his development and personality and is reflected in his work. During the period of the Russian Revolution, he was constantly attracted by the Russian moderns, especially Gorky (q.v.), and the younger revolutionary and postrevolutionary writers. The Russian classics were also not without effect upon him. He is perhaps the one Turkish writer who became so seriously and thoroughly acquainted with Russian literature that he was able to interpret it. For clearness and expression his novels may be compared to those of Maupassant and Flaubert (q.v.). He accurately describes and interprets the Turkish milieu, especially that of Anatolia; both in his short stories and in his novels he presents a vivid picture of these people, the middle and lower classes, the Anatolian peasant and his language, folklore, and mentality.

Nur Baba (Father Nur [Light]) is his first great story. It contains interesting descriptions of the little-known rites and costumes of the Bektâşî order; for his extreme candor he was attacked by some of the fervent nationalists. Other works are Bir Serendžâm (An Adventure); Kiralyq Qonaq (House for Rent); Sodom ve Gomore (Sodom and Gomorrah), which depicts the moral and sentimental crisis of Constantinople during the armistice at the end of the First World War; Hüküm Gedžesi (Night of Judgment), a history of the opposition under the Young Turk regime (1908-1918); Jaban (The World Outside); and Ankara, the heroic epopee of the city which became the capital. He also published a volume of prose poems, Erenler Barryndan (From the Garden of the Initiated), the title being a much used term of the Islamic mystics. He likewise wrote numerous articles and essays on aesthetics and politics, exhibiting profound knowledge of the problems of his time. He was for many years in the diplomatic service of his country and was Turkish envoy plenipotentiary to the government of Czechoslovakia in Prague, until the destruction of that republic in the spring of 1939.

Xālide Edīb (1883-), a strong Pan-Turkist and nationalistic moralist, is important among the women writers. Köprülü-Zāde Mehmed Fu'ād (1890-) is a fecund critic and the literary historian of modern Turkey, at present professor of Turkish language and literature at both the Ankara and Istanbul state universities. Other authors of some significance are Şadri Ertem, an excellent novelist; Maḥmūd Jesarī (now: Yesarī), a popular literary critic; Pejāmi Şafā (now: Peyami Safa), a novelist; and the poets Fārūq Nāfyz (1898-), who produced four volumes of verse between 1918 and 1928 (among them Čoban Čeşmesi, The Shepherd's Fountain), and Behdžet Kemāl (now: Behçet Kemāl), who sang of the deeds of Kemal's revolution. There are many young poets—Xālid Faxrī, Naẓīm Hikmet, Jašar Nābī, Nedžib Fāzyl, and Aḥmed Qudsī. The poet Mehmed 'Ākif (1873-1936) must be given a separate place. He was the author of the verses of the Turkish national anthem, but he stood alone against the trend of the times, remaining faithful to the Islamic traditions, so that public mention of him was for a while avoided.

Mustafa Kemal, "Atatürk" (1880-1938), first president of the Turkish republic, was a good political writer and stylist. He composed numerous political essays, among them the Nuṭuq (Discourse), a magnificent and lengthy speech delivered before the National Assembly.

See: E. J. W. Gibb, A History of Ottoman Poetry (6 vols., 1900-1909); O. Hachtmann, Die türkische Literatur des XX. Jahrhunderts (1916); Köprülü Zāde Mehmed Fu'ād, Bugünkü Edebijjāt (1923) and Türk Edebijjāt Ta'rixi (1926); Ettore Rossi, "Odierna tendenza letteraria e politiche in Turchia," Oriente moderno, IX (1929), 580-90; W. Barthold, Zwölf Vorlesungen über die Geschichte der Türken Mittel-Asiens, tr. from Osman-Turkish into German by Theodor Menzel (1935); S. Saussey, Prosateurs turcs contemporains; extraits choisis, présentés et traduits (1935).

K. H. M.

Tuwim, Julian (1894-, Polish poet), was born in the factory town of Łódź, of middle-class Jewish stock, and educated in the Russian Gymnasium there. In 1918 he burst upon the literary scene with a poem "Wiosna w mieście" (Spring in the City) that provoked wide discussion and controversy. A leading spirit in the Skamander (see Polish literature) group, Tuwim has often been called Poland's Walt Whitman. Because of his declared purpose to expand the scope of Polish poetry so that it would sing not only, as in the past, of rural charms and tender sentiments, but "of fortresses, cities, subways, factories, streets, soil, and everything under the sun," Tuwim is regarded as the founder of Polish futurism. A virtuoso of the written word, Tuwim is Poland's outstanding translator from the Russian, his renderings of Pushkin, for example, always equaling and sometimes even excelling the original. A man of the widest interests—bibliophile, anthologist (of "literary trifles"), lexicographer (of Bacchic terms)—Tuwim was Free Poland's most glittering literary phenomenon. A collection of his early poems appeared in 1933, and in 1942 an anthology of all his works was published in New York (Wybór pism; A Selection of Writings). One of Tuwim's most successful hobbies was the fashioning of rhymes for children. In this field his Lokomotywa (1938; Eng. tr., Locomotive, 1940) is to be noted.

See: E. W. Titus, "A Polish Author," Literary Review of New York Post, February 16, 1924; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 280-292, 708-710.

A. P. C.

Tvedt, Jens (1857-1935, Norwegian novelist), was born of a peasant family in Hardanger on the western coast of Norway. After graduating from a teachers' college he lived most of his life as a schoolmaster, journalist, and librarian in Stavanger. Apart from experiments in prose lyrics and plays his writing consists of more than 20 novels published from 1885 to 1928, written exclusively in Landsmaal describing the life of the people of the author's home region. Tvedt is the outstanding representative of the school of the "home-soil novelists." His first books shocked readers by their unvarnished descriptions of life in the small farms along the narrow fjords of the west, so different from previous somewhat roscate pictures of eastern peasant life. But Tvedt's realism is never brutal or morbid. Behind his careful and veracious description there is a strong optimism, a belief in the inherent health and vitality of the people; he shares their own common sense. His "classical realism" is far from naturalism and also far from the pale neo-romanticism of the 90's and is deeply rooted in Norwegian tradition. There is no psychological piquancy in his books, but one finds real life in them, sound feeling, and a natural harmony of subject and form; they are plastic in the classical sense. Outstanding are Vanheppa (1891; Bad Luck) and Madli und' apalen (1900; Madli under the Apple Tree), stories of everyday endurance of hardship, written with sympathy and genial humor, in a firm New Norse close to the style of the folk narrators. Tvedt's lyrical trend is conspicuous in the love story Djup jord (1904; Deep Soil), perhaps his most important work. In his later books the tendency toward didacticism and idyls takes the upper hand. Tvedt has strongly influenced the farm novel in Norway.

See: J. Bukdahl, "Jens Tvedt," in Norsk aarbok (1925), pp. 39-59, and in Det skjulte Norge (1926), pp. 62-71.

S. S.

Tynyanov, Yuri Nikolayevich (1894-1943, Russian novelist, scholar, critic, and translator), was born at Rezhitsa (Rezekne, Latvia) and graduated from the University of Petrograd (1918). He quickly established himself as a leader of the formalists, who studied literature as form or construction. While lecturing on the history of Russian poetry, he published Problema stikhotvornovo yazyka (1924; The Problem of the Poetic Language) and a collection of penetrating studies (Arkhaisty i novatory, 1929; Archaists and Innovators), dealing largely with prominent Russian poets. He has also translated Heine (3 vols., 1927-1934).

Tynyanov's creative work is derived from his interest in literary history and theory. His first novel, Kyukhlya (1925), which re-creates the quixotic figure of the poet Küchelbecker, friend of Pushkin and one of the Decembrist conspirators, is carefully documented and well constructed, but also manages to convey an air of spontaneity. However, in Smert Vazir-Mukhtara (1929; Eng. tr., Death and Diplomacy in Persia, 1938) history and theory gain the upper hand. The real hero of the novel is the year immediately preceding the assassination of the dramatist Griboyedov (1795-1829), then on a diplomatic mission to Persia, rather than the dramatist himself. An impressionistic technique is used to show Griboyedov going to his doom through a series of meetings with characters who represent various themes. Of Tynyanov's historical tales, the most original is "Podporuchik Kizhe" (1930; Eng. tr., "Second Lieutenant Also," in Soviet Short Stories, 1942); constructed on the premise of the absence of a hero, it is admirable technically but empty of life. The first two parts of the novel Pushkin (1936) represent a partial return to the methods of Kyukhlya; the development of the youthful poet is shown with realistic simplicity, while the subordinate characters form a rich gallery drawn from what is perhaps the most fascinating period of Russian literary and social history.

See: L. Tsyrlin, Tynyanov-Belletrist (1935); Y. Tager, "Tynyanov," in Literaturnaya entsiklopediya, Vol. XI (1938).

P. A. P.

U

Ukrainian literature. The last three decades of the 19th century in Russia saw Ukrainian literature laboring under grave political difficulties. The tsarist authorities viewed the development of Ukrainian culture with a jaundiced eye, because of a suspicion that it would lead inevitably to political separatism. As a consequence, a brief lucid interval of toleration in the early 1870's, during which there was a phenomenal upsurge of original work in music, drama, poetry, and scholarship (including monumental collections of folk poetry and folklore), was followed by a drastic ukase of Tsar Alexander II on May 18, 1876, by which Ukrainian books and newspapers were absolutely prohibited and the Ukrainian theatres closed. Only under the milder rule of Austria, in Galicia and in Bukovina, was it possible for Ukrainian literature to develop with any degree of freedom, and even there it had to struggle against strongly Pan-Russian movements that sought to destroy it.

Lemberg (Ukrainian, Lviv; Polish, Lwów) became for more than a generation the chief center of Ukrainian culture, a trend which was assisted especially by the printing projects of the Shevchenko Scientific Society, founded in 1873. The outstanding single figure in creative writing was Ivan Franko (1856-1916), a poet of remarkable industry and fecundity. Franko was the son of a peasant, originally of German stock, and in his youth suffered three periods of imprisonment for his political activities. He took his Ph.D. degree from the University of Vienna in 1894 and seemed destined for the chair of Ukrainian language and literature in the University of Lemberg, but his past espousal of socialism and Ukrainian nationalism thwarted this hope. He made a lean and precarious living as a hack journalist, yet found time for voluminous translations from German, Russian, and Czech and for a copious output of original work, especially his epic Moses (1905), in which the disheartened Hebrew leader symbolizes himself; Smert Kayina (1889; The Death of Cain), a misanthropic philosophical poem, influenced by Byron; Lys Myhyta (1890; Mickey Fox), a rollicking animal epic; several volumes of lyrics, predominantly melancholy; and a number of historical novels and tales of Galician life. Among Ukrainian poets, Franko is usually ranked second only to Shevchenko. He lacks Shevchenko's Burns-like zest of inspiration, but he has a much broader culture and an unusual capacity for artistic perseverance. So extensive was his output that he may almost be regarded as having created a modern Ukrainian literature single-handed. Among other Ukrainian authors who at this time made Galicia their center of operations were Panteleimon Kulish (1819-1897), poet, novelist, critic, and translator of 10 of Shakespeare's plays, and Alexander Konisky (1836-1900), poet, novelist, and dramatist. Still others whose work, forbidden in Russia, was now published in Galicia were Marko Vovchok (pseud. of Maria Markovich, 1834-1907), a gleaner of folk tales, and Ivan Nechuy-Levitsky (1838-1918), a novelist. In the background of this whole generation, but operating chiefly from exile in Switzerland and Bulgaria, was the notable scholar and political leader, Michael Drahomaniv (1841-1895), formerly professor of history in the University of Kiev. Associated with him as a pioneer was another professor, Volodimir Antonovich (1834-1908).

Bukovina was a secondary center of relatively unfettered activity. Here the chief writer was Osip Yuri Fedkovich (1834-1888), who spent his youth as an officer in the Austrian army. His lyrics and legends are suffused with the tenderness of the folk songs he had learned in his youth and with a sense of the beauty of the Carpathians. Isidore Vorobkevich (1836-1903) was a popular poet of considerable talent.

A striking development in the Greater Ukraine was the creation, after 1880, of a Ukrainian theatre by Marko Kropivnitsky (1841-1910) and a group of gifted associates such as Michael Staritsky (1840-1904) and Ivan Tobilevich (1845-1907). Among the best-known plays of these men are (to give the titles in English): Olesya, At the Census, Two Sevenths, and The Wild One by Kropivnitsky; Christmas Night, In the Dark, Bohdan Khmelnitsky, Marusia Bohuslavka, and The Last Night by Staritsky; and The Vagabond, The Landlord, The Unfortunate One, The Servant Girl, Martin Borula, and Conceit by Tobilevich.

Following close upon the authors already mentioned, and indeed overlapping them, came a younger generation, chiefly in the Greater Ukraine but publishing most of its work in Galicia. Such were the gifted poetess Lesya Ukrayinka (pseud. of Larissa Kvitka, née Kosach, 1872-1913), the author of dramatic poems and of several fine dramas in verse (Song of the Forest, In the Catacombs, Rufinus and Priscilla, The Drinking Bout, The Babylonian Captivity, In the Ruins); Mikola Kotsiubinsky (1864-1913), an eminent novelist, author of The Dream, On the Rock, Fata Morgana, On the Island, By the Minarets, Unknown, Laughter, The Début; Boris Hrinchenko (1863-1910), a great philologist, author of a four-volume dictionary of the Ukrainian language; Volodimir Samiilenko (1864-1925), poet and satirist; Vasyl Stefanik (1871-1936), a gifted Galician storyteller, graduate in medicine from Cracow University, who wrote such tales as The Darling, The Blue Book, and The Stone Cross; Agafangel Krimsky (1874-), novelist and translator from Arabic and Persian poets; Pavlo Grabovsky (1864-1902), poet and translator; Olga Kobylanska (1865-1942), a novelist of Bukovina; Bohdan Lepky (1872-1942), lyric poet, critic, and historian; and Alexander Oles (1878-), a lyric poet of great charm. Ultimately to tower above all these, however, was Michael Hrushevsky (1866-1934), the greatest of modern Ukrainian scholars. Trained at the University of Kiev, Hrushevsky was appointed in 1894 to the chair of Ukrainian history in the University of Lemberg. The results of a long life devoted to able research are to be found in his 10-volume Istoriya Ukrayiny-Rusy (1898-1937; History of Russian Ukraine) and in his three-volume Istoriya ukrayins'koyi lyteratury (1923; History of Ukrainian Literature). These are indubitably the greatest works in their field. Hrushevsky was in 1917–1918 the first president of the independent Ukrainian nation, with its capital at Kiev. He lived in exile, 1918–1924, but then returned to Russia. He died in 1934, broken by four years of imprisonment at the hands of the Soviet government.

The fate of Hrushevsky is typical of that of most Ukrainian writers under the first 20 years of the Soviet regime. Nationalism, which for nearly a century had been the major motivation of Ukrainian literature, now became a deadly political offense, and the pressure against it grew relentless, especially after 1930. Some of the Ukrainian authors succumbed to this pressure and conformed completely to the new order. Such were the poets Pavlo Tychyna, Maxim Rylsky, and Volodimir Sosiura and the novelists Andrei Holovko, Yuri Yanovsky, and Mikola Bazhan. Others were nominally Communist but struggled by devious means to perpetuate the nationalist point of view; and these, almost without exception, have been liquidated. Examples are the dramatist Mikola Kulish and the novelists Mikola Chvylovy, M. Kosoris, A. Olessich, Volodimir Gyszky, and O. Dosvitny. Still other authors were deliberately counterrevolutionary and were systematically sought out and shot, e.g., in 1930 Andrei Nikovsky, Sergei Yefremov, L. Starytzka-Cherniachivska, and M. Yevchenko and in 1934 Evhen Pluznyk, Gregory Kosynka, D. Falkivsky, Yuri Shkurupey, and Aleksa Vlysko. Ukrainian literature, in a world where colossal struggles of new orders were impending, had been fatally caught "between the pass and fell incensed points of mighty opposites."

See: B. Lepky, ed., Struny, antologiya ukrayinskoyi poeziyi (1922); S. Yefremov, Korotka istoriya ukrayinskoho pys'menstva (1924); A. P. Coleman, Brief Survey of Ukrainian Literature (1936); D. Doroshenko, History of the Ukraine (1939); M. Hrushevsky, A History of Ukraine (one-volume abridgment in English, 1941).

W. K.

Ullman, Gustaf (1881–, Swedish poet and short-story writer), born in the province of Halland on Sweden's west coast, restricts his literary motifs almost entirely to the primitive landscape and folk life of his native province. Though in this regional strain in his art he may be compared with Selma Lagerlöf (q.v.), greatest of Swedish regionalists in prose fiction, in most other respects Ullman's art is as far removed from Selma Lagerlöf's as it could well be. He lacks completely Selma Lagerlöf's rich, colorful fantasy, her light, playful humor, her love of apostrophe and paradox, her vividly pulsing prose style. Ullman's art is reserved, laconic, severely close to the earth. Even the poetry of his young manhood (Väst kust, 1903, West Coast; Caprifol, 1905; and Sångarbikt, 1910, Confessions in Song) indulges in no effusive lyricism, is everywhere sober, severe, restrained. His masters seem to have been the two great painters from Sweden's west coast, Karl Nordström, who has painted the coastal landscape in bare, massive, heroic lines, and Carl Wilhelmson, who has employed an almost equally severe brush in depicting the deep religious character of the people of this region. In Ullman's poetry the landscape dominates, though its folk life also occasionally enters upon the scene. In his prose fiction the people of his province come into a much more sharp focus. Many of these tales are simple straightforward tales of the folk, with no particular problem or theme; but the most successful of them are quietly probing studies of the pietistic religious psychology of the west coast folk, in which Ullman casts up accounts with the severe religious dogmatism ("Schartauism") which for a century has dominated the spiritual life of this region. His most important works on this theme are the collection of short stories Präster (1907; Preachers) and the short novel En flickas ära (1909; A Girl's Honor). Though Ullman has continued to produce of late years, his work reflects no new developments in either art or subject matter.

See: F. Böök, Resa kring svenska Parnassen (1926), pp. 103–115.

A. G.

Unamuno, Miguel de (1864–1936, Spanish philosopher, essayist, poet, and novelist), born in Bilbao of Basque ancestry, became a writer whose art and thought merge, both spontaneously and consciously, into something of the very essence of Spain. At the same time he endowed his country with a new awareness, a new sensitivity, and a new international perspective. For centuries Spain had lived bound by her pitiful attempts to find a position between the divine and the profane, the temporal and the eternal, the particular and the universal. Unamuno hailed the dilemma as a challenge for everyone in Spain and throughout the world who is not content with the dogmatic and nicely turned replies of any science, philosophy, religion, or art. Unamuno made the problem his problem and sought its origins by way of a vital dialectic which is integrated in beauty, in pages of unparalleled prose and verse. From the time of his very first writings the author proposed to stir the conscience of his readers without offering, as a goal, any fixed or systematic doctrine. And in his monumental Del sentimiento trágico de la vida (1913; Eng. tr., The Tragic Sense of Life in Men and in Peoples, 1921), he says: "My work—I was going to say my mission—is to destroy everyone's faith, faith in affirmation, faith in negation, and faith in abstention, and this because of my faith in faith itself; it is to combat all those who live resigned, be it to Catholicism, to rationalism, or to agnosticism; it is to make everyone live fearfully and hungrily."

Unamuno is close to the despairing souls of history—Job, Pascal, Spinoza, Sénancour, Kierkegaard. In their society he found himself, it may be said, and with their help he found his own Spain; through them, too, his vehement desire to project himself in an eternal perspective was strengthened. The battle represented in his brilliant books was matched by that of his everyday life, in a continual struggle with circumstances. As a young man he held the chair of Greek in the University of Salamanca, although he was never interested in so-called scholarly investigations. His personality overflowed the narrow limits of academic activity to make him a master of souls. He discovered his real milieu less in the university than in the spiritual richness of Salamanca itself, where his Basque character—his tenacious courage, timidity, monodeism, and dryness of expression—became Castilianized in the presence of the clear and open landscapes and in the atmosphere of beauty of one of the most elegant and rhythmical cities which Spain possesses.

From the vantage point of Salamanca, Unamuno, in successive experiences, apprehended and integrated in his soul and style the multifarious variety of enigmatic Iberia. The process gave Por tierras de Portugal y de España (1911) and Andanzas y visiones españolas (1922). Unamuno was the first to catch in a vital synthesis the essential meaning of Peninsular poetry, in Spanish, in Portuguese, and in Catalan. He did not stop here, because his sensitive and comprehensive understanding extended also to the lands of Hispanic America, whose literary originality he was one of the first to perceive and evaluate. In his work there live cordially side by side all those Hispanic differences which in everyday life have the appearance of mutually repellent dissociations—just as the contradictions and paradoxes in Unamuno, logically irreconcilable, take on meaning in a supreme, vital, and poetic unity.

The author struggled not only against dogmatism and intellectual fetters, but also against any political structure which would not permit the human being the free play of his impulses, even of his errors. Unamuno did not combat the monarchy during the first years of the 20th century, when Spain was living in a sort of "gentle anarchy" and when no one was facing the grave political and social problems which, later appearing as unavoidable questions, were to give rise to the greatest catastrophe in Spanish history. He began to attack Alfonso XIII when the latter showed signs of wishing to govern Spain dictatorially, especially during the dictatorship of General Miguel Primo de Rivera (1923–1930), established with the complicity of the monarch. Unamuno's violent writings cost him a long banishment (1924–1930). Upon his return to Spain he accepted the Republic of 1931 with enthusiasm and was elected a deputy to the Cortes Constituyentes. Soon, however, he showed his disagreement with the new regime because he considered it both too radical and too dogmatic in religious and social matters. Here, it must be admitted, is a real weakness in Unamuno; here he never expressed a single constructive idea and limited himself to the easy role of the iconoclast with both pen and word. Marvelously steady as an artist, in his life as a politician Unamuno was anarchical and the victim of whims. With his negative and harsh criticism he contributed extensively to the confusion of his country. When in 1936 the army rebelled against the republican regime, Unamuno apparently accepted willingly the overthrow of that badly prepared attempt at Spanish democracy. Soon, however, this illusion vanished too, if indeed it can be said that he ever really had it. To him is attributed the prophetic phrase, spoken in a formal university gathering in Salamanca in October, 1936, in the presence of the leaders of the military revolt: "You will conquer but not convince." A short while later he was dying in bitterness and desperation.

Few of the recent writers of Europe have had the full and vitalizing erudition of Unamuno. In him are found effective echoes of world literature, from classic antiquity to Shakespeare, Cervantes, Leopardi, and Whitman, and to the Dane, Kierkegaard, whose language he learned in order to understand him more fully. He never approached philosophy, science, or literature with a cold intellectual interest; his purpose was to fuse culture with his own anguish over the question of life and death, a basic problem with him and one which renders all else of secondary import. Thus it is that in the characters of his novels Niebla (1914; Eng. tr., Mist, 1928), Tres novelas ejemplares y un prólogo (1920; Eng. tr., Three Exemplary Novels and a Prologue, 1930), and La tía Tula (1921) he seeks out the essentially "personal" constituent of their make-ups, the ultimate representation of conscience which is sensed to be hovering between today and eternity and which "personalizes" everything about it. But the supreme pages of his work must be sought in his Ensayos (8 vols., 1916-1918), replete with profound visions; in them he has touched on a multitude of themes that go to the heart of the essential problems of present-day life. A noble example of his verse is the poem to the star, "Aldebarán" (in Poesías, 1907). This magnificent symphony reveals, as in a synthesis, what Luis de León, Pascal, and many others give but fragmentarily. It is characterized by a style the words of which are a ladder leading to the most moving exaltation, an ineffable exaltation in which man feels, at one and the same time, that he is losing and finding himself.

See: S. de Madariaga, The Genius of Spain and Other Essays on Spanish Contemporary Literature (1923); J. E. Crawford Flitch, "Introduction," in Unamuno, Essays and Soliloquies (1925); M. Romera Navarro, Miguel de Unamuno, novelista, poeta, ensayista (1928); H. Daniel-Rops, Carte d'Europe (1928), pp. 121-161; J. Marias, Miguel de Unamuno (1943).

A. C.

Undset, Sigrid (1882-, Norwegian novelist), is the most distinguished of present-day Scandinavian writers of prose fiction. Born in the charming little Danish town of Kallundborg, Zealand, she moved with her family to Christiania in 1884. Her early childhood in Christiania (treated in the autobiographical work Elleve år, 1934, Eng. tr., The Longest Years, 1935) was relatively happy; but the death of her father, a well-known archaeologist, when she was only 11 years old, forced the family into the narrowest of economic circumstances. Her education was curtailed, and it was necessary for her to accept employment in an office when she was 16 years of age. The early experience as a self-supporting young woman provided her, however, with much of the material for her early tales. The first of these, Fru Martha Oulie, appeared in 1907, to be followed in rapid succession by three more volumes of prose fiction dealing with modern young women, the collection of stories entitled Den lykkelige alder (1908; The Happy Age) and two novels, Jenny (1911; Eng. tr., 1921) and Vaaren (1914; Springtime). During these years was also published her first historical novel, Vigaljøt og Vigdis (1909; Eng. tr., Gunnar's Daughter, 1936). Nearly all of these early tales are concerned with the relation between man and woman, conceived primarily in ultimate ethical terms. She did not fall in line with the neo-romantic Norwegian literary vogue of the day (as represented in Gunnar Heiberg, q.v., and others) where "art" and "love" were looked upon as absolute antisocial concepts that had nothing to do with house and home and all of the practical circumstances of life. Instead Sigrid Undset's early tales conceive of love between man and woman as a matter of quiet everyday growth and development within the immediate limitations and obligations of homemaking. In Jenny, the most important of these early stories, the heroine finally meets a tragic fate because she half-consciously "experiments" with love, until it is too late for her to meet love's immediate crucial moral obligations as a mother and homemaker. In the matter of technique, Sigrid Undset's early work is marked by a sober, unpretentious realism, an almost artless directness and simplicity scarcely designed to attract a wide reading public—at least not until the partially sensational contents of Jenny made, in 1911, a more sharp and forcible impression. During the First World War Sigrid Undset's production fell off somewhat, and what she did write was of a rather miscellaneous kind: two volumes of tales (Splinten av troldspeilet, 1917, one story from which has appeared in an English translation, Images in a Mirror, 1938; and De kloge jomfruer, 1918, The Wise Virgins); a retelling of the King Arthur romances based on Mallory (Fortællinger om Kong Artur og ridderne av det runde bord, 1915); a literary study dealing with the Brontë sisters (Tre søstre, 1917); and a volume of essays on the woman question (En kvindessynspunkt, 1919). All of these volumes reveal an increasing preoccupation on the author's part with ethical matters, particularly with a new religious approach to ethical problems; and they serve therefore both as valuable documents in a study of Sigrid Undset's religious development and as an introduction to her later historical novels, in which ethico-religious concerns play such a preeminent part. In 1928 she was awarded the Nobel prize in literature. She took up residence in the United States in 1940.

It is in her two great historical novels, the trilogy Kristin Lavransdatter (1920–1922; Eng. tr., 1923–1927) and the tetralogy Olav Audunsson (1925–1927; Eng. tr., The Master of Hestviken, 1928–1930), that Sigrid Undset's claim to fame primarily lies, though some of her earlier work is to be included in the better prose fiction appearing in Norway in the years before the First World War, and though her later novels (beginning with Gymnadenia, 1929, Eng. tr., The Wild Orchid, 1931) certainly represent, despite their rather forced strain of religious apologetics, one of the high points in Norwegian fiction in the years before the Second World War. The two great novels reveal an absolute mastery of historical periods, with their dress and food habits, their customs and ways of thought, their broad backgrounds of political and military intrigue; but Sigrid Undset never permits the impedimenta of history in its more antiquarian aspects to interfere with her primary concern with the individual human being in his ceaseless moral struggle with the baffling materials of life. This is what gives her historical novels at one and the same time their warmly human everyday realism and their marvelously sensitive psychological perspective. In their purely narrative movement these novels are slow, leisurely, unhurried, proceeding with a quietly deliberate solemnity, never impatient of detail, ever subtly alert to all those minute forms and phases of outward phenomena which register their impressions upon human character and determine human destiny. This steady stateliness of general movement gathers itself together at times, leaps into a blazing intensity of feeling or of action in certain individual episodes, only to recede again into its unhurried way—as unhurried as the ceaseless processes of nature and eternity and God. Suffusing it all there is a note of unutterable majesty, even of sublimity—the poignant sublimity with which a story of human fate can become invested when a profoundly unhurried artistry touches it and bring it into the delicately penetrating focus of an intensely serious creative imagination. It is to be noted that in these novels the religious emphasis emerges much more sharply than it had in Sigrid Undset's earlier fiction, and not merely because these novels deal directly with a social order dominated by the medieval Church. Sigrid Undset herself became a convert to the Catholic Church shortly after the completion of Kristin Lavransdatter; and in most of her authorship since, particularly in Gymnadenia and its sequel, Den brændende busk (1930; Eng. tr., The Burning Bush, 1932), she has not been able to refrain from giving more or less direct expression to a dogmatic Catholic view of the modern human scene. As a recent Norwegian critic has pointed out, we may consider these two late novels dealing with modern life—together with Ida Elisabeth (1932; Eng. tr., 1933), Den trofaste hustru (1936; Eng. tr., The Faithful Wife, 1937), and the very important Madame Dorothea (1939; Eng. tr., 1940)—as one of the more important between-the-wars literary “contributions to a fundamental accounting with a materialistic-mechanical philosophy of life.” Sigrid Undset has come with the years to find in Catholic dogma the only solution to the problems of a modern world.

See: A. H. Winsnes, Norges litteratur fra februarrevolutionen til verdenskrigen, part 2, pp. 528–545, Vol. V (1937) of F. Bull, F. Paasche, and A. H. Winsnes, Norsk litteraturhistorie; Alrik Gustafson, Six Scandinavian Novelists (1940), pp. 286–361.

A. G.

Ungaretti, Giuseppe (1888–, Italian poet), born of Italian parents in Alexandria, Egypt, spent years in Paris absorbing French culture. From 1915 to 1918 he fought in the First World War, in France and in Italy (beautiful poems tell of this experience in an intense, sharp way, e.g., “Veglia,” “Peso,” “Soldato,” “San Martino del Carso”). He lived for some time in Rome. In late years he has been in South America, teaching Italian literature in the University of São Paulo, Brazil. Ungaretti has collaborated on many literary papers and reviews, among others the Lacerba (Florence), Voce (Florence), Popolo d'Italia (Milan), Littérature (Paris), Ronda (Rome), Europe nouvelle (Paris). In 1916 appeared Il Porto sepolto which was followed by La Guerre (1919) and Allegria di naufragi (1919). L'Allegria (1931) contains previous poems re-elaborated. More recently Ungaretti has produced a collection of poems, Sentimento del tempo (1933), and a book of poems translated from foreign authors, Traduzioni (1936).

Ungaretti is the most representative poet of the movement of pure poetry in Italy. Following the path traced by the French symbolists (see French symbolism), Rimbaud, Mallarmé, and Apollinaire (qq.v.), he searches for a condition of purity and lyrical essence. He aims to restore to words—as the critic Alfredo Gargiulo said—their original virginity and their reconquered lyrical primitivity. To convey in his poetry only the nude essence of his inspiration, Ungaretti tries to concentrate and polish his means of expression by various degrees, employing a complex technique. Therefore he repudiates the traditional metrical and syntactical systems, employing new devices, some of which, such as graphical and typographical innovations, have been identified with the attempts of the futuristi. Some extremely short poems (“Sera,” “Cielo e mare”) are good examples of Ungaretti’s effort toward concentration, of his attempt to reach the “state of grace,” to express the feeling of “illumination” and the sense of “magic” by which he feels himself possessed. The fundamental note of his lyrical temperament is the striving to reproduce the ineffable. In his elaborate and tortured mode of expression he appears as the central subject of his poetry, as a man in an effort at communication with nature, mystery, and God (“La Pietà,” “Cairo,” “La Preghiera,” “La Morte meditata”). He is the uomo di pena (man of sorrow), the poor heart afraid of his ignorance, the creature eternally exiled.

Ungaretti’s poetry is still very much discussed: some critics refuse to find in it any serious intellectual meaning and consider it somewhat of a voluptuous playing with words. Others, instead, because of his attempt to transfer into poetry human and essential values, transforming his experiences into a lyrical world at once individual and universal, have connected his name with those of Leopardi and Petrarch.

See: A. Bocelli, “Scrittori d’oggi,” Nuova Antologia, CCCLXII (1932), 422–428; P. Pancrazi, Scrittori italiani del novecento (1934), pp. 162–169.

E. C.

Unruh, Fritz von (1885–, German dramatist and poet), was born at Coblenz. Scion of a noble family, son of a Prussian general, he was educated for a military career at Plön and entered active service in the German army. The young officer pondered over the problem of the soldier, whose profession in times of peace is futile and in times of war seems nothing but subordination. From his musings came the drama Offiziere (1912), which Max Reinhardt produced with great success. Feeling that a military career was incompatible with the creative forces of a poet, Unruh resigned his commission and wrote the drama Prinz Louis Ferdinand von Preussen (1913), in which duty frustrates the hero’s judgment and desire. In 1914 Unruh was called back to the colors and fought through the First World War. His heart, however, battled for peace. The dramatic poem Vor der Entscheidung (written 1914, published 1919) was one of the first antiwar creations in Germany. In the narrative Opfergang (written in 1916 at Verdun, published 1918; Eng. tr., Way of Sacrifice, 1928) a metaphysical reason for war was sought but sadly found wanting. The idea of war was pursued to its mythical depth in the tragedy Ein Geschlecht (1916). Platz (1920), its sequel, showed that the revolution in Germany was a wrong solution. It did not bring forth the “new being,” the dream of the expressionists.

Unruh tried a political career, became a member of the Reichstag, and gave a dithyrambic oration in memory of the murdered Walther Rathenau. When the idea of revenge threatened the understanding between the nations, Unruh worked for greater amity by writing the travel book Flügel der Nike (1924), publishing his speeches (Reden, 1924), and giving the world the festival play Heinrich von Andernach (1925), a great plea for love among men. He foresaw in his drama Bonaparte (1927; Eng. tr., 1928) a coming dictatorship and appealed to his countrymen to be alert. The works which followed, Phaea (1930), Berlin in Monte Carlo (1931), Zero (1932), failed to impress. When the Hitler movement gained control, Fritz von Unruh, winner of the Kleist and Schiller prizes, left Germany for Italy and France and finally found refuge in America. Unruh is not a propagandist but a poet; his works offer difficulties because of their expressionistic style and their musical language. He does not want to convince the intellect but grip the feeling of mankind.

See: Fritz Engel, Fritz von Unruh und seine besten Bühnenwerke (1922); Wilhelm Geyer, Fritz von Unruh (1924); Robert Meister, Fritz von Unruh (1925); Richard Samuel and R. Hinton Thomas, Expressionism in German Life, Literature, and the Theatre (1939), pp. 47–51, 97–101.

H. Bf.

Uppdal, Kristofer (1878–, Norwegian novelist), was born in an interior valley of northern

Trøndelag, the son of a small farmer who, however, soon moved into a small neighboring town in order to work there. At the age of 18 the son started as a workingman on the construction of railroads and continued at such labor for the better part of the following 15 years. He joined the Workingmen's Trade Union and was for a time a local leader in this movement. In 1905 he made his debut as a poet and during the next 25 years published not a few small volumes of poetry, more and more of a speculative or philosophical character, in a highly personal style, written in the dialect, somewhat normalized, of his home district (e.g., På galgeberge, 1930; On the Mountain of the Gallows). His most important work, however, and in fact one of the outstanding products of modern Norwegian literature, was the series of novels he began publishing in 1910, which have for their subject the labor movement of recent years. The series started with five volumes appearing in the years 1911–1914, and was finished with five other volumes published 1919–1924, under a common title, taken from one of them, Dansen gjennom skuggeheimen (The Dance through the Shadow World). The plan of these novels is to present the psychological development of the Norwegian labor movement, from the primitive risings of unskilled and uneducated workers in the mines and on the roads up to national organization, the whole of it concentrated in the life, growth, and experiences of a few remarkable characters. The story is told with a flood of gorgeous colors and a red-hot intensity, and the heroes rise up in monumental, sometimes almost Gargantuan shapes. Pictured as the real source of the movement is an indomitable urge for self-assertion and mental expansion. The conflict arises from the double current in the souls of the workers who are making their own progress as a group and breaking away from the class of the farmers, but still always retaining the longing of the farmers for a fixed home. They are radical rebels against private capitalism, but firmly rooted in their peasant heritage, and therefore decidedly nationalistic in outlook. In the last volume of the series, Domkyrkebyggaren (The Cathedral Builder), in which the chief hero of the novel rises to national leadership, we can observe distinct traces of a schizophrenia that gradually took hold of the author and for 20 years stopped his production. Yet he had achieved a unique work of truly great dimensions.

H. K.

V

Vajda, János (1827–1897, Hungarian poet), was born in Pest (later Budapest) and died there. He had his secondary school education in Székesfehérvár. At the age of 18 he entered the University of Pest but soon abandoned intellectual pursuits for histrionic ambitions. For about a year he was a strolling actor, with hopes and no recognition. He fought in the Hungarian War of Independence of 1848–1849, and after the war he was sent in retaliation by the Austrians as a soldier to Italy. When in 1853 he returned to Hungary, he naturally sought the company of writers and poets, and was active as a journalist. In 1869 he was elected to the Hungarian Parliament. Vajda had an untamed spirit, a brooding disposition, probably a persecution complex, and his life was very unhappy. His first volume of lyric poems, Költemények (Poems), appeared in 1855. Egy honvéd naplójából (1869; From the Diary of a Home-guard) is considered one of his most representative works. He failed with his historical drama, Ildikó (1857; Ildikó). His poetic narratives, e.g., Találkozások (1877; Meetings), Alfréd regénye (1883; The Story of Alfred), are of minor importance compared with his lyric poems, but they sustain interest. His love poems, "Gina emléke" (The Memory of Gina), "Szerelem átka" (Curse of Love), "Húsz év múlva" (After Twenty Years), show boundless passion, excitability, misanthropic uneasiness. His philosophical poems, "Őszi tájak" (Autumn Scenes), "Végtelenség" (The Infinite), "A Váli erdőben" (In the Forest of Vál), "Halál" (Death), reveal his absorption in the cosmos and his reflective gratitude towards nature; they also reveal an inevitable loneliness. Vajda's collected poems were published the first time in 1881, and the improved edition in 1895. Endre Ady (q.v.) rediscovered him in the 20th century. There is a Vajda János literary society in Budapest.

Though born in a city, Vajda's childhood was spent in Vál, a trans-Danubian village, close to green pastures, fertile fields, woods, and gardens. His father was a forester. It seems that these childhood experiences determined the poet's affection for nature; he felt that nature never deceived him, and it was nature that sometimes consoled his restless, morbid, distrustful spirit. The woman he married disappointed him and some of his friends proved false. There was something of the feverishness of Byron and Lermontov and much of the pessimism of Leopardi in Vajda. True, he was not a master of form; often his yearnings and renunciations were stronger than his ability to give them flawless poetic form. Nevertheless he could reach the heights of a major poet, and when this happened his spirit, nurtured by solitude and melancholy, conquered formlessness with the sure power of a poetic genius.

See: Gy. Kerekes, Vajda élete és munkái (1901); P. Gyulai, Birdlatok (1911); A. Schöpfung, Magyar irók (1919); W. Kirkconnell, The Magyar Muse; an Anthology (1933).

J. R.

Valera, Juan (1824–1905, Spanish novelist, critic, poet, and diplomat), was born in Cabra, Córdoba, and spent his early years there and at Doña Mencía, where his mother, the marquesa de la Paniega, owned a large estate. His father, José Valera y Viaña, a retired naval officer, recognized his son's ability and spared no expense on his education. After completing his law studies, young Valera was early launched on a diplomatic career when his family secured for him an appointment as agregado to the duque de Rivas, ambassador at Naples. During his stay there (1847–1849), Valera studied Italian and Greek and greatly reinforced his native inclination toward the classical in art and literature. All his diplomatic posts—in Lisbon, Rio de Janeiro, and Russia and later as minister to Washington, Brussels, and Vienna—provided him with the opportunity of cultivating his mind and of writing long letters home in which he tells engagingly of his rich experience among the peoples and books of many countries.

Valera's literary work, a matter of 50 volumes, was, he would have us believe, but a parenthesis in his diplomatic career. He began by writing poetry (Ensayos poéticos, 1844; Poesías, 1858) and was disappointed that the public did not appreciate his verse which, though polished and correct, lacks spontaneity and deep feeling. He found it difficult at first to write prose, and it was not until his diplomatic career was interrupted in 1854 that he decided to try his hand at literary criticism. From then on he wrote for Spanish and later for Spanish American periodicals innumerable articles that fill many volumes of his Obras completas (1905; Vols.

XIX–XL). These articles are delightful causeries that reveal an extraordinary agility and yet constancy of mind, a broad culture, definite artistic criteria, and a detachment rare in Spanish critics. In his reviews of contemporary works, however, Valera is too discreet to be direct; even his famous criticism of Azul (1888), which first brought Rubén Darío to the attention of the literary world, is guarded in its enthusiasm and dwells mostly on Valera's oft repeated conviction that the servile imitation of French literature is harmful to Spanish American writers. More significant are his essays on general literary questions, such as Del romanticismo en España y de Espronceda (1854), or his studies and academic discourses on masterpieces of the past, such as Sobre el Quijote y sobre las diferentes maneras de comentarle y juzgarle (1864) and Sobre el Fausto de Goethe (1878). Valera wrote many substantial essays, too, on political, historical, and philosophical themes, e.g., Sobre el concepto que hoy se forma de España (1868), La revolución y la libertad religiosa en España (1869), La doctrina del progreso (1859), and El superhombre (1897); in the last two he shows himself to be very skeptical of absolute progress—especially in art—and of evolution toward the superman.

Valera won acclaim as a critic of authority and a master of Spanish prose, but his audience was as yet restricted. It was not until 1874, when he wrote Pepita Jiménez (first Eng. tr., 1886)—the novel on which his fame most solidly rests—that he became a popular author. He held consistently, from De la naturaleza y carácter de la novela (1860) to Apuntes sobre el nuevo arte de escribir novelas (1886–1887), that a novel should be entertaining rather than instructive, that as a form of art it has as its only end to delight with the creation of beautiful form. He berated the sociological and scientific aims of the naturalistic novelists and found intolerable their deterministic philosophy. Valera's most cherished belief was in the capacity of the mind to choose freely between good and evil. In Pepita Jiménez the hero, who is about to take holy orders, suddenly discovers his love for the attractive young widow, Pepita; most of the novel is a subtle analysis of his inner conflict which ends in his choosing to renounce divine for human love. This delicate psychological analysis, the natural beauty of the Cordovan setting, the amusing candor of the village folk and the rich popular savor of their language, all contrive to make the novel one of the great classics of modern Spanish literature. Valera's novels—

El comendador Mendoza (1877; Eng. tr., Commander Mendoza, 1893) and Doña Luz (1879; Eng. tr., 1891) and the later ones he dictated after he had become blind, Juanita la larga (1895), Genio y figura (1897), and Morsamor (1899)—are all simple, loosely woven tales, the action of which goes on in the mind or conscience of the main characters. Artistically, tales such as El pájaro verde and Parsondes (both 1860) and dialogues such as Asclepigenia (1878) are his most perfect works. They are written in his most characteristic manner, charming, shrewdly urbane, gently ironical, the manner of the intellectual epicure who ruminates on all the ideas and fancies ever conceived by man, remains in the end serenely and cheerfully skeptical of them all, but has enjoyed himself thoroughly and delighted his reader. In all of his thought Valera strikes a note—somewhat unusual in Spain—of tolerance, moderation, and harmony. Even in politics, as a member of the Cortes and later a senator for life, he always took the position midway between both extremes, and he never joined any party, for he was about equally opposed to the Neo-Catholic reactionaries and to the positivistic progressives. If Valera was not a great or original thinker, he was the greatest writer of Spanish prose since Cervantes, of whom his work is often reminiscent, in its humor, its indulgence toward human weakness, its good cheer, and especially in its style, which is classical without being archaic, naturally elegant, subtle yet luminous, and always delightful.

See: Manuel Azaña, introduction to Valera, Pepita Jiménez, "Clásicos castellanos" edition (1927), and La novela de Pepita Jiménez, (1929); Edith Fishtine, Don Juan Valera, the Critic (1933).

E. F. H.

Valéry, Paul (1871–1945, French poet and critic), was born in the Mediterranean town of Cette, near Montpellier. Son of a French father and an Italian mother, as a boy he spent his vacations in Italy, in particular in Genoa, whose magnificent architecture left a lasting impression on him. His schooling at Montpellier, first at the lycée and later at the school of law of the university, he found boring and unprofitable. His two great interests were architecture and poetry, the latter being stimulated by his discovery of Mallarmé and Verlaine (qq.v.) in 1889 and encounters with Pierre Louÿs and André Gide (qq.v.) in 1890. In 1891, after a month in Paris, during which he was admitted into Mallarmé's circle, and much heart-searching, he decided to give up the study of law. His verses were already being published by such little magazines as the Ermitage, the Conque, and the Revue indépendante, but he showed a strange reluctance to take his place as one of the younger symbolist poets. Instead, he turned from poetry completely. His Introduction à la méthode de Léonard de Vinci (Eng. tr., Introduction to the Method of Leonardo da Vinci, 1929) was published in the Nouvelle Revue (1895), and La Soirée avec M. Teste (Eng. tr., An Evening with Mr. Teste, 1925) in the Centaure (1896); he filled a prosaic post in the War Department from 1897 to 1900 and then, after marrying Mlle Gobillard, niece of Berthe Morisot, took an equally prosaic position with the Havas news agency.

Valéry's long period of silence was not disturbed until the winter of 1912–1913. By that time something of a legend had grown up about him: copies of his early verse and of La Soirée were treasured by connoisseurs, and Gide prevailed upon him to make some of this literary material more available by consenting to the publication, in one volume, of his scattered poems. Valéry wished to end the book with a short poem which would be in some sense a valedictory. He turned once again to the art he had abandoned over a decade before; and as he labored, what he had thought of as some 25 lines grew into his major work, La Jeune Parque, published by itself in 1917. La Jeune Parque is a difficult poem—the most difficult in the French language, Thibaudet (q.v.) has said—but even its difficulty and its appearance in a crucial war year did not prevent the critics from recognizing it as a masterpiece. Within the space of a few years Valéry became a major literary figure: La Soirée was reedited in 1919, and in 1920 three volumes of poetry, Odes, Le Cimetière marin (Eng. tr., The Graveyard by the Sea, 1932), and Album des vers anciens, appeared. Though even now Valéry could not be termed prolific, his silence, once broken, was not resumed. In the following years were published, besides many fugitive pieces, such important books as the volume of verse Charmes (1922) and the prose works Eupalinos (1923; Eng. tr., 1932), five collections of essays all called Variété (1924, 1929, 1936, 1938, and 1944; Eng. tr., Variety, 1927; Variety: Second Series, 1938), Pièces sur l'art (1934), and Regards sur le monde actuel (1931). In 1925 Valéry was elected to the French Academy, taking the chair of Anatole France (q.v.).

Had Valéry never written La Jeune Parque

and the poems that followed, it would be easy, his prose aside, to label him as a second-rate symbolist (see French symbolism) and to dismiss him. Even the most casual acquaintance with this later work, however, will convince the reader, no matter what his final estimate may be, that it cannot be lightly or easily dismissed—or even described. La Jeune Parque, taken alone, might be regarded as a continuation of the method and themes of Mallarmé; many of the poems in Charmes might suggest a continuation of a classic tradition, with touches of symbolism remaining from Valéry's youth. Perhaps Valéry can be best described as attempting to apply the techniques developed by the symbolists, as well as by modern philosophers and psychologists, to express the movements of man's consciousness and to do it in a strict prosody, since only such a prosody affords the poet adequate scope for a demonstration of his technical powers. Valéry is a great philosophical poet, in the sense that, today, philosophy is more concerned with how than with what it knows. Philosophy conceived of as didactic is impossible material for poetry—for Valéry at least—but when it becomes analytic he can welcome it with open arms. Here Valéry has the advantage of Mallarmé; the material of symbolism was generally personal and the symbol esoteric; but Valéry's subjects, though studied in him and with the appearance of individuality, are actually universal and in that sense impersonal. Le Cimetière marin and La Jeune Parque may at times be difficult in sense or expression, but they have the supreme merit of springing from a movement of thought and emotion through which, on some level and in some degree, each intelligent man passes. Even such poems as "Aurore," "Les Pas," and "Palme," specific and limited as their subject, the working of the poetic process, may seem to be, appear on more mature reflection universal as expressing, though necessarily concretely, general psychological truths.

If it can be said that Valéry was esoteric in anything, it was in the unusual, almost morbid importance he placed on the relation of potentiality to action. A series of antitheses characterizes his thought and his verse—appearance and reality, mind and body—but none is more prominent or more important than that of contemplation and action. The concept of an abstract "method" which would represent, in effect, the essence of all human thought, the idea of a being who through such abstraction had attained to the possibility of perfection in all fields, these speculations have constantly fascinated him. In the Introduction and La Soirée he imagined such a being and drew the necessary conclusion that for one of such pure and absolute potentiality action becomes impossible, except as a revelation of imperfection. To know oneself master of a technique should be enough; to demonstrate one's mastery through the actual writing of a poem or constructing of a building implies a desire to please the crowd or to be admired by them and is in itself admission of less than perfect self-sufficiency. How far such speculations go to explain Valéry's period of silence is hard to say, but it is obvious that besides furnishing him with the theme of much of his poetry they strongly colored his attitude towards his own work and that of others. Through the very fact of being a poet, Valéry chose action, of course, rather than the alternative silence of thought or dream, and in the conclusion of Le Cimetière marin he expressed his choice nobly. Yet it must never be overlooked that for Valéry-as-intellect, opposed perhaps to the sensuous Valéry-as-poet, creation is significant only when it is also a demonstration of rigor, of the successful, disciplined working of the intellect, of difficulty met on all levels and overcome. In writing a poem, he in a sense proves his potentiality of doing anything, since the poem is (beyond the individual act which has the value of its own immediate beauty) a demonstration of achievement according to the principles which underlie and make possible achievement in any field into which intelligence may venture.

As was to be expected, Valéry has been greatly admired and greatly attacked. There is a certain unfortunate pontificality about much of his criticism, and the irreverent reader may feel that he makes too great a parade of his interest in philosophy and mathematics, that he carries subtlety of thought to an extreme and unduly complicates simple matters. His emphasis on the poet as a technician as opposed to the romantic concept of him as an inspired mouth-piece has displeased the sentimental and is probably equally far from the mark. Yet there can be little doubt that as a critic his influence in just such matters has been beneficial. Certainly there is no doubt that he is a great poet on any grounds, a master of metrical effects and of language, capable of expressing the most abstract themes with a restrained richness of sensuous imagery almost unrivaled in French poetry.

See: Albert Thibaudet, Paul Valéry (1923);

F. Lefèvre, Entretiens avec Paul Valéry (1926); L. Estève, "Autour de Valéry," Revue de métaphysique et de morale, XXXV (1928), 55-105; V. Larbaud, Paul Valéry (1931); Edmund Wilson, Axel's Castle (1931); Gustave Cohen, Essai d'explication du Cimetière marin (1933); C. M. Bowra, The Heritage of Symbolism (1943).

C. W., Jr.

Valle-Inclán, Ramón del (1866?-1936, Spanish novelist, dramatist, and poet), is the supreme example in modern Spanish literature of art for art's sake. Born in Spain's old northwest province of Galicia, he appeared on the Madrid literary scene in the last decade of the 19th century and was soon noted as the most colorful of the younger writers. Legends quickly sprang up about this bizarre, romantic figure with his long beard, unshorn poet's locks, and air of hauteur and mystery, legends which he himself assiduously cultivated. When later he lost his left arm, as the result of an unfortunate altercation in a Madrid café, he stoically accepted the misfortune and characteristically made literature of it. Until his death in 1936 he played, with artistry and gusto, the role of paladin of decadence and aestheticism.

Valle-Inclán's writings—short stories, novels, plays, and poems—are a faithful reflection of his personality. Given his temperament, it is not surprising that he was early attracted to French fin-de-siècle literature. The marked influence of the latter is already apparent in his first work, Femeninas (1895), six short love stories of a refined and morbid sensualism. In evidence, too, is his stylistic gift, his aptitude for melodious phrasing. It was not, however, until the four short novels dealing with the amorous adventures of the donjuanesque marqués de Bradomín ("ugly, Catholic, and sentimental" and "cynical, unbelieving, and gallant as a cardinal of the Renaissance"), the celebrated Sonatas (Sonata de otoño, 1902; Sonata de estío, 1903; Sonata de primavera, 1904; Sonata de invierno, 1905), that Valle-Inclán's decadent-symbolist tendencies reached their full expression. The Sonatas (Eng. tr., The Pleasant Memoirs of the Marquis de Bradomín, 1924) established his position as a master of musical, evocative prose. Meanwhile he had turned for inspiration to the myths and folklore of his native province, creating a poetic vision of a legendary, archaic Galicia in the short novel Flor de santidad (1904) and in his first volume of verse, Aromas de leyenda (1907). The same background served for the more somber prose plays, termed comedias bárbaras—Aguila de blasón (1907), Romance de lobos (1908), Cara de Plata (1922)—which were centered around the memorable figure of the patriarchal hidalgo Don Juan Manuel de Montenegro and his untamed brood of rapacious sons, in a medieval-like setting of barbarity, lust, and superstition. In the trilogy La guerra carlista, comprising the novels Los cruzados de la causa (1908), El resplandor de la hoguera (1908), and Gerifaltes de antaño (1909), the author, largely through fictional characters (among them Don Juan Manuel de Montenegro and the marqués de Bradomín) and with characteristic emphasis on the colorful and the dramatic, evokes something of the spirit that animated the lost cause of traditionalism in the last Carlist War (1872-1876).

That Valle-Inclán was still devoted to the symbolist ideal was made clear as late as 1916 in the essay La lámpara maravillosa, his longest profession of artistic faith. But even before this time he had begun to change the tone of his work, stressing in certain writings the note of humor, always latent in him. Thus while the prose play El embrujado (1913) is still characteristic of his middle period, the new trend is observable in the facetious pirouetting of the verse play La marquesa Rosalinda (1913) and in the prose farce La cabeza del dragón (1914; Eng. tr., The Dragon's Head, 1918). In La pipa de Kif (1919), a volume of verse, the humor has become to a considerable extent strident and grotesque, announcing the transition to the next and final stage in his development. In Luces de Bohemia (1920), which he designates as an "esperpento" (i.e., a ridiculous, absurd person or thing), Valle-Inclán expounds his new attitude. "The tragic sense of Spanish life," says the author's mouthpiece, "can only be expressed with a systematically deformed aesthetic. . . . My present aesthetic is to transform, with the mathematics of a concave mirror, the classic norms." In consequence, the dominant note of Valle-Inclán's novels and plays from now on is one of burlesque tragedy, and his characters are puppets, ridiculous for the most part, manipulated against a grim, macabre background—the whole reminiscent of the caprichos of Goya. It is not only Spanish life that he sees thus; in the novel Tirano Banderas (1926; Eng. tr., The Tyrant, 1929) he depicts in lurid tones the tragicomedy of revolution in an imaginary Latin American republic (most suggestive of Mexico, which he had several times visited). His most important last works, the novels La corte de los milagros (1927) and Viva mi dueño (1928), show in similar "esperpento" fashion the corruption of Spanish court and aristocratic life shortly before the Revolution of 1868. They were to have formed part of a large cycle, left unfinished.

Valle-Inclán takes high rank among the writers of his generation (the so-called Generation of '98) as a creator of moods and poetic effects and as a stylist who brought new beauties and rhythms to Spanish prose.

See: S. de Madariaga, The Genius of Spain and Other Essays on Spanish Contemporary Literature (1923), pp. 128-147; C. Barja, Literatura española: Libros y autores contemporáneos (1935), pp. 360-421.

W. L. F.

Vallès, Jules (1832-1885, French novelist and radical journalist), was born in Le Puy-en-Velay and inherited the fiercely austere virtues of the peasants of that region. His childhood was unhappy, but he proved himself a brilliant student under the severe discipline of his father, a teacher, and was sent to Paris to the Lycée Bonaparte in 1848 to prepare for the Ecole Normale Supérieure. Very soon he was swept away by the revolutionary mood of the capital, took part in the manifestations in favor of Michelet in 1851, resisted the coup d'état of December 2, 1851, was imprisoned as a conspirator at Mazas in 1853. When set free he moved about in bohemian circles, dreamed of poetry and the theatre, cultivated the friendship of Gustave Planche, and finally won attention with a cynical pamphlet, L'Argent (1857). As a brilliant chronicler (1858-1868) for the newspaper Figaro he did a series of vitriolic portraits, published Les Réfractaires in 1865, which were a scathing retort to the sweetish romanticism of Murger; in 1866 was published La Rue, a collection of articles which first appeared in the Événement of Villemessant, in the Époque of Feydeau, in the Liberté of Girardin. In 1867, with the collaboration of the Goncourts, Zola (q.v.), and Cladel, he started a weekly of high literary quality, also called La Rue, in which all traditions were to be smashed. Between 1868 and 1870 he hurled various diatribes against the tottering government of Napoleon III and was again imprisoned and several times fined. In command of a battalion during the siege of Paris, he became a member of the Commune after the defeat, and in his Cri du peuple defended the rights of Paris against Thiers and the last remnants of liberty against the most fanatical of the revolutionaries. He was exiled, condemned to death par contumace (1872), and resided in England until the amnesty of 1880. While there he wrote La Rue à Londres (1883) and the greater part of his admirable trilogy, Jacques Vingtras. When he returned to France, he gave the finishing touches to his literary works, wrote excellent chronicles for the Réveil, and revived the Cri du peuple (1883) with the close cooperation of Séverine and Jules Guesde. He died in Paris on February 14, 1885; the tumultuous funeral ceremonies were both an apotheosis and a public scandal.

Vallès had a hypersensitive nature and was in permanent revolt against all the tyrannies of family, school, and society; he is a symbol of the incorrigible rebel, a pendant to Louis Veuillot and Léon Bloy (q.v.). The Jacques Vingtras trilogy (L'Enfant, 1879; Le Bachelier, 1881; L'Insurgé, 1886), essentially autobiographical, remains his masterpiece and also one of the most poignant documents of modern French literature. Paul Bourget and Maurice Barrès (q.v.) have hailed Vallès as one of the masters of French prose—a romanticist in his lyrical qualities, realistic in the cruel accuracy of his observing, very modern in tone, always lively. Vallès also has two outstanding classical characteristics, concision and naturalness. It has been said that he is a kind of bridge between the revolutionary romanticism of Les Misérables and the truculent realism of Zola and of the first manner of Huysmans (q.v.).

See: J. Richepin, Les Etapes d'un réfractaire (1872); P. Bourget, "Vallès," in Études et portraits (1928); G. Gille, Jules Vallès; ses révoltes, sa maîtrise, son prestige (1941) and Jules Vallès; sources, bibliographie, iconographie (1941).

G. G.

Vančura, Vladislav (1891-1942, Czech novelist, etc.), was the leading prose writer of Czech expressionism. He was born at Háj near Opava (then in Austrian Silesia), served in the First World War in the medical corps of the Austrian army, and became a practicing physician. He was executed by the Nazis on June 1, 1942, one victim of the "reprisal" for the assassination of Heydrich, the German "protector."

Vančura's writings are extremely varied both in subject matter and form. Pekař Jan Marhoul (1924; The Baker John Marhoul), his first success, glorifies the "poor in spirit" as well as the poor in earthly goods, in a style which points to the reading of Dostoevski (q.v.). Pole orná a vdalečná (1925; Fields and Battlefields) is an anti-war book of unsurpassed bitterness and horror. The following, much weaker book, Poslední soud (1929; The Last Judgment), returns to the theme of his very first novel. It depicts a feeble-minded Ruthenian peasant transplanted to the puzzling and cruel urban civilization of Prague. Markéta Lazarová (1931) represents a complete change of style and subject matter—the social pathos and the glorification of the “idiot” have disappeared. Vančura now tells a good yarn about robbers and knights, rapes and elopements. Only the display of language and of metaphor suggests that the author has ambitions beyond those of an adventure writer. In addition, the celebration of brute force and lust seems to represent a definite break with the past. Útěk do Budína (1932; The Flight to Buda) is, however, a fairly traditional psychological novel of marital difficulties which attempts to bring out the differences between the Czech and the Slovak character in the attitudes of the Czech hero and the Slovak heroine. Konec starých časů (1934; The End of Old Times) is again completely different: it is a whimsical revival of the Münchhausen theme, with grotesque setting and veritable fireworks of language and technique. Metaphors, slang, archaic Czech, are used with surprising effect, and the author deliberately breaks any illusion of reality by constant interference and manipulation of his materials. Vančura has become a virtuoso of storytelling and of linguistic inventiveness in these books, but he seems to have given up any attempt at a unified outlook on life or even art. Nevertheless the last book, Tři řeky (1936; Three Rivers), though badly composed, is a return to the early themes. It attempts to depict the spiritual growth of its hero through the First World War and the Russian Revolution.

It is difficult to find any unity in Vančura's artistic development: the interest of his work seems largely in the sheer virtuosity with which he managed the language and the technique of storytelling. He is possibly most successful in the short stories of one collection, Luk královny Dorotky (1932; The Bow of Queen Dorothy), for there he escapes his evident difficulties with large-scale composition and elaborate characterization. In spite of some deviations and mere tour de force, the theme of hatred for war and social oppression runs through his work. Vančura paid with his life for his convictions.

See: F. Götz, “V. Vančura,” in Básnický dnešek (1931); A. Vyskočil, “V. Vančura,” in Básnickovo slovo (1933).

R. W.

Van de Woestijne, Karel, see Woestijne.

Van Deyssel, Lodewijk, see Deyssel.

Van Eeden, Frederik Willem, see Eeden.

Vanglon, Henri, see Ghéon, Henri.

Van Lerberghe, Charles (1861–1907, Belgian poet and dramatist), was born in Ledeberg, near Ghent, of a father of old Flemish stock, endowed with scholarly and artistic curiosity, and of a very pious mother. He got his secondary schooling at the Collège Sainte-Barbe, a Jesuit institution, in Ghent. There he became a friend of Maurice Maeterlinck (q.v.). In 1894 he received his doctor's degree in “philosophie et lettres (philologie classique)” from the University of Brussels, where he had studied intermittently. Van Lerberghe traveled in France (Paris), England (London), Germany (Berlin, Munich), Italy (Rome, Florence), then settled in the historic little town of Bouillon, picturesquely situated among the wood-covered hills of the Belgian Ardennes.

Of a rather timid though gay disposition, he was essentially a dreamer whose exquisite sensitiveness and delicate love of life in all its forms could be summed up in these three lines of his: “Beware, lest thou mightst break anything, Tread upon anything, destroy anything, For life is sweet to all” (La Chanson d'Eve). He was a lover of the dreamlike delicacy of primitive painters like Botticelli and the Pre-Raphaelites, particularly of Burne-Jones and Walter Crane. Very well versed in foreign literatures, especially in the English, he was influenced by Shelley and Rossetti. On the French side it was the Parnassians who were his favorites—the delicate Prudhomme, the tenderhearted Coppée, the refined Heredia (qq.v.). A Parnassian in his all embracing love for beauty, he is a symbolist through his fluid, dreamlike form, his elusive descriptions of hardly tangible shades (“nuances”) of feelings which are more fleeting impressions than actual perceptions of his senses. It is in the mystical beauty of woman that Van Lerberghe finds his greatest inspiration: “Love nothing but beauty, And let this be for you, Woman, the only Truth.” This is the essence of his capital work, La Chanson d'Eve (1904), a collection of lyrical poems written in fluidly adaptable rhymed free verse, apparently disconnected, but following a straight line of development: the eternal tale of Woman passing through the innocence of childhood, waking up to the urge of love and the secret desire of knowledge followed by the radiant sadness of experience. An earlier volume of lyrics, Entrevisions, was published in 1898.

Van Lerberghe wrote one symbolistic drama in prose, Les Flaireurs (1889), an impressive, eerie piece of work—Death prowls around its victims—which perhaps inspired Maeterlinck to write L'Intruse. He also wrote one comedy, Pan (1906), a violent, frolicking satire against conventionalism and hypocrisy, in which this god, having come to live among the peasants of a Flemish village, causes havoc by shocking the traditional authorities.

See: A. Mockel, Charles Van Lerberghe (1904); F. Séverin, Charles Van Lerberghe (1922); F. Castillo Nájera, Un Siècle de poésie belge (1931; with Spanish translations and notes).

L. V.

Van Looy, Jacobus, see Looy.

Van Nijlen, Jan, see Nijlen.

Van Ostayen, Paul, see Ostayen.

Van Schendel, Arthur, see Schendel.

Vazov, Ivan (1850–1921, Bulgarian poet, novelist, and dramatist), was born at Sopot of a well-to-do conservative merchant family which had limited intellectual interests. He studied at Sopot and Plovdiv and in the latter place became acquainted with French authors such as Hugo, Lamartine, and Béranger; he also improved his knowledge of Russian. In 1870, while on a business trip to Rumania, he met the revolutionary leaders and writers, Karavelov and Botev, and determined to devote himself to the service of the common people. On the way back he met Petko Rachev Slaveykov, the prerevolutionary poet, in Constantinople. He gave up his plan of studying at the University of Zagreb after he learned of the death of his father during the Bulgarian insurrection and in 1879 became judge of the circuit court in Berkovitsa and later in Vidin. He later played a prominent role in political life in Plovdiv, but in 1886 was compelled to flee to Russia, where he settled in Odessa. In 1889 he returned to Sofia and spent the rest of his life there as a man of letters, the first in free Bulgaria to live by his pen. On October 2, 1920, he was honored by a national jubilee on the completion of 50 years of literary work. A year later he died of a heart attack.

During this half century Vazov worked in almost all fields of literature with marked success. His works were a whole literature in miniature as he set the standards in every form which he employed, lyric, epic, short story, novel, drama. He touched all sides of the national consciousness, whether it was the joy over the liberation, the sorrow over Macedonia, or the despair at the defeat in the First World War. Born to be a romanticist, he felt himself obligated to teach his people through his own kind of literature and he fulfilled his mission.

It is hard to single out individual poems or collections for special mention. In poetry there are such important collections as Izbavlenie (1878; Liberation); Epopeya na zabravenite (1879; Epos of the Heroes), a glorification of the pre-emancipation leaders of Bulgaria, written in a moment of disillusionment at the new state; Slivnitsa (1886), on the Serb-Bulgarian War; Pod nashete nebe (1900; Under Our Heaven); Pesni za Makedoniya (1914; Songs for Macedonia); Ne shte zagine (1920; It Will Not Perish), on the defeat of 1918. His greatest novel is Pod igoto (1893; Eng. tr., Under the Yoke, 1893), a tale of the beginnings of the Bulgarian revolt against the Turks, which has been translated into nearly all modern languages. There are also the Nova zemya (1894; The New Land), a continuation of Pod igoto; Kazalarskata tsaritsa (1903; The Empress of Kazalar), a tale of modern Bulgaria; and such studies of the past as Legendi pri Tsarevets (1920; Legends at Tsarevets), poems of the Second Bulgarian Empire at Trnovo. In comedy there is the Mikhalaki chorbadzhi (1882) and Sluzhbo-gontsi (1903; The Service-Chasers); in historical drama Borislav (1909) and Ivaylo (1911). Yet these are but a small part of the total output of this prolific writer. As a guide and a teacher he trained many Bulgarian writers and for at least a quarter century he was the accepted authority. More recently younger men have sought to escape from his sway, but Vazov is still generally accepted as the classic Bulgarian author and he bids fair to remain so for years to come.

See: T. Minkov, "Ivan Vazov," Bulgarski pisатели, IV (1929), 3–72.

C. A. M.

Vega y Oreiro, Ricardo de la (1839–1910, Spanish dramatist), son of Ventura de la Vega, the well-known writer of comedies of the middle 19th century, was born in Madrid. He became an employee of the Ministry of Public Works. In keeping with the tradition of his family he was devoted to the theatre, but unlike his father, of the Moratín school, he cultivated—with consummate skill—the sainete and the zarzuela, that is to say the so-called género chico. The sainete is a short comedy or farce concerning the life of the people or of the middle class; its characters speak the language of everyday life, replete with representative expressions and idioms. The aim is to amuse, not to appraise or moralize. The zarzuela is ordinarily a sainete with music, dancing, and singing. A traditional Madrid of the people provides the background. Ricardo de la Vega, very familiar with the types and ways of his native city, offers notable portraits, with sharp wit and a gifted realism. The reader or spectator less aware of Madrid will experience some difficulty in understanding the local slang, dialectical forms, intimate plays on words, and continual references to political and social happenings of the author's period. Ricardo de la Vega's most famous sainete is Pepa la frescachona, o un colegial desenvuelto (1886), and his best-known zarzuela is La verbena de la paloma (1894).

E. G. L.

Vercors (pseud. of Jean Bruller, 1902–, French novelist and essayist) founded with others in 1941, during the German occupation, the leading clandestine publishing house of France, Les Editions de Minuit. Its first publication was his own work, Le Silence de la mer (1942). In this tale and in another, La Marche à l'étoile (1943), he revealed by implication the impossibility of collaborating with the enemy and set an example of intellectual resistance that was followed by such writers as Mauriac, Aragon (qq.v.), and Cassou. His first work, variously attributed to all the great writers of France, was smuggled to England and America, where it was republished and translated. Since the end of the war a short story, Le Songe (1945), and a collection of articles, Le Sable du temps (1945), have appeared as well as several prefaces to the works of others.

Known before the war as an original illustrator under his real name, Vercors will keep his new name for his literary activity and continue to use the name Jean Bruller for his satiric drawings.

J. O'B.

Verdaguer i Santaló, Jacint (1845–1902, Catalan poet, prose writer, and mystic), was born in a small village in the district of Vich called Folgueroles. His father was an obscure stonecutter; his mother could lay claim to no other accomplishment than that of relating to the boy—who listened transported—the stories and tales which village folk tell one another on long evenings before the fire. A stonecutter and a talkative woman gave to the movement of cultural revival of Catalonia, Valencia, and the Balearic Islands known as the Renaixença the greatest Catalan poet of the 19th century.

While studying for the church Verdaguer worked as a farmhand and as a teacher. In 1865 his poetic gifts had their first public acclaim at the recently revived Jocs Florals, where he won two prizes. He became a priest and spent peaceful years among the two hundred parishoners of the village of Vinyoles D'Oris, in his native district. He also made several ocean trips, perhaps owing to delicate health, and was a chaplain on the ships of the Marqués de Comillas from 1873 to 1875. On the high seas he finished his famous epic poem, La Atlàntida, awarded a prize in the Jocs Florals in the year 1877—from which time his name spread through Europe and his works began to be translated into various languages. He then abandoned his employment as a ship's chaplain and entered the home of the Comillas as an almoner. His Idil·lis i cants místics (Idyls and Mystic Songs) was published in 1879. He was officially hailed as mestre en gai saber (master troubadour) in the year 1880, and indeed the unity of the Catalan-speaking countries has been frequently manifested in their admiration for him. He continued to write important books: Canigó (1885); Excursions i viatges (1887; Excursions and Trips); Lo somni de Sant Joan (1887; The Dream of St. John); Dietari d'un pelegrí a Terra Santa (Diary of a Pilgrim to the Holy Land); the trilogy dedicated to the child Jesus, Natzareth (1890; Nazareth), Betlem (1891; Bethlehem), and La fugida d'Egipte (1893; The Flight from Egypt).

A period of crisis and suffering then followed. Verdaguer became the victim of intrigues not yet thoroughly studied or understood. Works such as En defensa pròpia (1895; In Self-defense) and Flors del Calvari: Llibre de consols (1896; Flowers of Calvary: Book of Consolations) brought the personal drama of Verdaguer to the common people—who rose to support their great poet to the point of idolatry. The strong feelings which had been stirred by his powerful personality persisted and even cast a sinister shadow over his deathbed.

There can be no question of the healthy and virile quality of Verdaguer's writing. His language is selective, if popular in source; he is skillful in the avoidance of archaisms or vulgarisms. Without Verdaguer it would be impossible to explain the work of any of the later Catalan poets. Even those who at first glance seem to have received all their training in Paris, London, or Berlin are to be numbered among his debtors.

See: M. Milá i Fontanals, prologue, in Verdaguer, Idil. lis i cants mistics; A. Vassal, Mossèn Jacint Verdaguer; sa vie, ses œuvres, sa mort (1903); V. Serra i Boldu, Mossèn Jacint Verdaguer (1915); J. Folguera, Les noves valors de la poesia catalana (1919); J. Amade, Origines et premières manifestations de la renaissance littéraire en Catalogne (1924).

F. de P.

Verde, Cesário (pseud. of José Joaquim Cesário Verde, 1855–1886, Portuguese poet), was born in Lisbon, where he worked as a businessman and collaborated on various newspapers of the capital and of Brazil. His life was confused and uninteresting. He died in the city of his birth at the age of 31.

Verde's poetic production was scattered in occasional contributions to Lisbon newspapers such as the Diário da tarde (Evening Daily) and especially the Diário de notícias (Daily News), in journals such as Renascença (Rebirth) and Occidente (Occident), and in the Ilustração portuguesa e brasileira (Portuguese and Brazilian Illustrated Magazine). At the time of his death the critic Manuel José da Silva Pinto collected some of his best poetry in a small volume entitled O livro de Cesário Verde (1873–1886) (1886; The Book of Cesário Verde), of which there are modern editions (1911, 1926). The importance of Verde in the history of Portuguese literature is based on the fact that he is the first nationalistic poet of his period. He also exerted an influence on the most completely vanguardist poets who, reacting against what had become the artistocratic formalism of modernism, found inspiration and example in his work. His verse is sharply impressionistic, the product of fine analysis and observation of life, and at the same time shows a rich rhythmical facility. He sang of the daily life of Lisbon, of the scenes at its markets and wharves, of the traffic of its streets, of the monotony of its days. From time to time the social revolutionary note in the manner of Proudhon is sounded, as in "Deslumbra-mentos" (Beguilements), in which the return of justice is foreseen, or the anarchical note, as in "Humilhações" (Humiliations), an angry protest against armed authority. The best poetry is in such pieces as "Um bairro moderno" (A Modern Quarter) and "Nos"

(We), in which the local color is balanced by the perfection of the stanza and the clarity of the metaphors.

See: Manuel José da Silva Pinto, introduction to O livro de Cesário Verde (1873–1886), 1926 ed.; Hernani Cidade, Tendências do lirismo português contemporâneo (1939).

R. M. L.

Veresayev, Vikentii Vikentievich (pseud. of Vikentii Vikentievich Smidovich, 1867–, Russian fiction writer and social critic), was born in Central Russia. The date of his birth is important; by the time he was ready to enter the university the last decade of the 19th century was approaching, and with it came the appearance of the proletariat on the political arena in Russia, the ideas of Karl Marx, and the beginning of Social Democracy. Veresayev's father was of Polish extraction, his mother of pure Russian ancestry. The elder Smidovich was a physician by profession, as well as an amateur scientist. The boy adored him, and this fact may later have been influential in his selecting the career of a physician also. The family lived on a very limited income although Smidovich Sr. had a large practice: it was mostly charity practice. He was also somewhat of a crusader for the rights of the people, to the detriment of his own and his family's welfare. This trait too did not fail to leave its imprint on the mind of the young Vikentii. The elder Vikentii Smidovich died in 1894, after having become infected by one of his typhus patients.

Young Veresayev studied at the University of St. Petersburg in the department of history and philology; after receiving his degree, he entered the university's medical school. His early-acquired scientific traits here received further development. In his Zapiski vracha (1900; Memoirs of a Physician) he tells how impressed he was by the scientific scrupulousness and care with which the professors of the medical school approached each problem. Parallel with preoccupation with science, he developed a social philosophy. The time was the early 1890's when the ideas of Social Democracy—the emphasis on the collective effort—had found their way into Russia. In the above-mentioned Zapiski vracha Veresayev summed up from his own professional point of view the formidable problem of mutual aid: the medical man cannot hope for a living wage unless his patients receive adequate remuneration, unless there is economic justice for them too—"the only way out is the realization that we are but a small part of one enormous inseparable whole."

Veresayev saw the Russo-Japanese War of 1904-1905 as an army surgeon in Manchuria. The result of that experience was the book Na voine (1908; In the War), in which, couched in discreet and dispassionate language, the bitterest indictment is sounded of the incapacity and general debility of the tsar's government. In his purely fictional work Veresayev never forgets the social consciousness he acquired early in his life. Sometimes he is sidetracked. In the story "Bez dorogi" (1895; Without Road) a young physician is mobbed and fatally wounded by the ignorant people whom he had tried to help during an epidemic of cholera. The solution Veresayev offers is to accept the violence in the spirit of Christian submission. He was strongly criticized in his own camp for that. In a long story, "Dva kontsa" (1903; Two Ends), the life of the city proletariat is pictured—poverty, drunkenness, fear of the boss and the foreman, the forcing of the women into shameful relations for the sake of holding their jobs, general cruelty of everyone to everyone else. No definite way out is suggested, possibly because of the rigid censorship.

The social credo of Veresayev is summarized in a little symbolic sketch, "Zvezda" (1897; The Star). It deals with the persistence and discouragements of struggle for the improvement of the human lot. The idea of the sketch is that no matter how apparently hopeless and discouraging the struggle, it must go on until the final victory. In all his work Veresayev's style shuns unnecessary adornment, remaining throughout economical and austere while making use of beautiful and precise Russian language.

The Bolshevik Revolution bewildered and disgusted him at first. He set forth these sentiments in a book entitled V tupike (1923, In a Blind Alley; Eng. tr., Deadlock). The story concerns itself with the mental and emotional struggles of a young Russian girl, Katia. She finds herself unable to accept either the revolutionary or the counter-revolutionary way out and is left "in a blind alley." Later, Veresayev made his peace with the Soviet government and was restored to favor.

See: Veresayev, Polnoye sobraniye sochineni (1913); V yunye gody, Vol. XI (1928).

J. P.

Verga, Giovanni (1840-1922, Italian novelist and short-story writer). lived in his native city of Catania throughout childhood and early youth. At the age of 16 he wrote his first novel, Amore e patria, which was never published. By the time he was ready to begin the study of law at the university he had finished his second novel, which his father was persuaded to publish with money saved for his schooling. The work appeared in four volumes under the title I Carbonari della montagna (1861-1862). It was of the nature of the popular historical novel and of very slight literary merit; but it was well enough received to decide young Verga on his career as a novelist. He went off to Florence in 1865 when that city became temporary capital of the new Italy, to settle down seriously to the business of writing novels. In this same year he published his second, Una Peccatrice. During his stay there he finished his third, Storia di una capinera (1871), the very sentimental and pathetic story in epistolary form of a young nun in love. This has proved to be one of his most popular novels, though not for reasons of any genuine literary merit. In 1871 Verga removed to Milan, where he remained most of the time during the next 10 years, participating in the artistic, bohemian life of the city and working very hard at his chosen profession of novelist. His works of this period, Eva (1873), Tigre reale (1873), and Eros (1875), are all very much of one style and one taste. Melodramatic, decadently romantic, sentimental, and overemphatic, they reveal little of value as original creation. They catered to the same taste which enjoyed La Dame aux camélias, for instance, and which continued to demand more of such fare. These works do, however, form a necessary phase in the development of the young artist. Through them he was freed from an excessive subjectivism and from too much use of the autobiographical. They brought him to desire a new style and another content for his art.

These he found by returning in spirit and in person to his native Sicily. While still in Milan he had written the story Nedda (1874), which he called a bozzetto siciliano (Sicilian sketch) and which gives clear evidence of his new direction. The story deals with the very hard life of a young peasant girl. Verga is interested in her primitive attitudes, and Nedda is about as far from the erotic aristocrats and bohemians of the Milanese novels as anything could be. After this his visits to Sicily became more frequent, and after his return there for a period of two years (1878-1880) he produced the works which make him one of the most significant prose artists of the century: Vita dei campi (1880), a collection of novelle of the same world as Nedda's, containing the famous Cavalleria rusticana (which gave its own title to later editions of the volume); I Malavoglia (1881); Il Marito di Elena (1882); Novelle rusticane (1883); and Maestro-don Gesualdo (1889). (D. H. Lawrence has made the following translations of Verga: Maestro-don Gesualdo, 1923; Little Novels of Sicily (Novelle rusticane), 1925; and Cavalleria Rusticana and Other Stories, 1928.) Two volumes of novelle followed these works of a decade, I Ricordi del Capitano d'Arce (1891) and Don Candeloro e Cⁱ (1894), but it was unquestionable that Verga had done his best work in the 80's. The works of that Sicilian period, championed by Luigi Capuana (q.v.) as masterpieces of the school of verismo, established his name. In 1884 Cavalleria rusticana had been rewritten as a play and produced in Turin (the opera by Mascagni, 1890, libretto by Tarzioni-Tozzetti and Menassi, is taken of course from the Verga story). In 1896 La Lupa, which probably can be considered Verga's finest story, was also put on the stage. But Verga appeared unable to go on with his announced series of novels, his own Rougon-Macquart (see Zola), as it were, to which he had given the general title I Vinti. In the introduction to I Malavoglia, Verga had set forth his grandiose scheme. It was to be a series of novels "studying" realistically, even naturalistically, the "flood of human progress" at its several social levels. This "river" makes use of humanity and makes of it its victim, hence I Vinti. In I Malavoglia the first impulses toward progress were to be witnessed in a family of humble Sicilian peasants. Next, the greed for riches was to be studied in a bourgeois subject, Mastro-don Gesualdo. Beyond these (the only two of the projected series ever published), Verga goes on to speak of three more novels to follow, proceeding very much on schedule up the social ladder: La Duchessa de Leyra, L'Onorevole Scipione, and finally L'Uomo di lusso. Verga lived through almost the whole of the first quarter of our century. He enjoyed leisure and good health. But he was never able to more than begin La Duchessa de Leyra, while the other two novels remained purely in concept. Verga had lived well beyond the triumph of verismo and far beyond his own productivity. In his quiet routine life in Catania he was almost forgotten until his death.

The introduction to I Malavoglia remarks that style is inherent in the subject. This conception dominated Verga's important work of the Sicilian decade. Verga's greatness lies in his perfection of an art in this sense.

I Malavoglia, his most significant work in point of style, tends, as do most of the novelle, to the complete elimination of the person of the artist. All perceptions and the narration itself are almost completely rerouted through expressions and ways of perception of the characters themselves and of the particular social group of which they are a part. The effort is to give the illusion of emotions and of a lyricism abiding in the very things and events themselves. The result is a style which, in some instances, is almost a dialect in itself, an idiom so intensified in colloquialism as to make adequate translation into another language quite impossible.

Verga was, above all else, an artist. It was surely an encouragement to him that his art should be championed by such a critic as Capuana, that it should receive a name (verismo) and that parallels could be drawn with Flaubert's (q.v.) and Zola's work. Verga welcomed the doctrines of naturalism and formulated some of his own (see the introductions to I Malavoglia, Amante di Gramigna, Fantasticherie). Moreover, regionalism was in ascendance in Italy, helping to support his new Sicilian manner. But the ideas of program, of school, of theory, and of science do not penetrate into his work as an artist as with Zola. It is a mistake to derive Verga's art from either of the great Frenchmen's work. He is more like Flaubert, of course, with his attention on style in prose art. But he is in no sense, in his great works, an imitative artist.

See: A. Momigliano, Giovanni Verga narratore (1923); T. G. Bergin, Giovanni Verga (1931; in English); L. Russo, Giovanni Verga (1934).

C. S. S.

Verhaeren, Emile (1855-1916, Belgian poet and art critic), acclaimed by certain competent foreign critics the supreme poet of the early 20th century, was born at St. Amand on the Scheldt. His father was of Dutch, his mother of French, origin; French was spoken in his home, and he never knew well any other language. Although thoroughly Flemish by temperament—he shares the tenacity and industry as well as the delight in color and in the life of the senses characteristic of the race—he gained a cosmopolitan view by wide travel in France, Spain, England, and Germany. Germans often claim him as a Teutonic poet; his drama Hélène de Sparte appeared in Russian and German translations before its publication in French (1912; Eng. tr., Helen of Sparta, 1916). He dabbled in law at Louvain, where he associated chiefly with poets and painters. His lifelong passion for plastic art is proved by his verse, by his critical writing in periodicals, and by his monographs on Rembrandt, James Ensor, Rubens, and others. He worked for a time in the law office of Edmond Picard (q.v.), to whose Art moderne he was a regular contributor. The humanitarian interests of his patron fostered his social philosophy. His first volume, Les Flamandes (1883), exalting in colorful description the lusty traditions of Flemish life, was inspired primarily by masters of the brush. In Les Moines (1886) the poet seeks initiation into the mystic side of the heroic past. He spent three weeks in a cloister, participating in the daily life of the inmates; they hoped to make a convert, but his interest was only pictorial. At least he learned from the monks devotion to an ideal; he will carry forward the torch with the same courage they show in preserving symbols—such is the role of “poets born too late to be priests.” The drama Le Cloître (1900; Eng. tr., The Cloister, 1915) treats the same subject in more philosophical vein. Les Soirs (1888), Les Débâcles (1888), and Les Flambeaux noirs (1891), a trilogy of gloom at times approaching madness, present the analysis of a poet’s neurosis. Verhaeren always feels and expresses himself with the maximum of vigor. Albert Mockel (q.v.) once called him a “paroxysist”; these poems justify the epithet. In them he distinctly cultivates suffering as one determined to know by experience all phases of human life. The tone of gloom opens Les Apparues dans mes chemins (1891); at the end, the radiant visions of St. George and of four other saints inspire the poet with the noble duty of identifying himself with broad aspirations for the future. “Les Saintes” seems to be his first tribute to Marthe Massin, whom he married in 1891 and to whom he dedicated the trilogy Les Heures claires (1896; Eng. tr., The Sunlit Hours, 1916), Les Heures d’après-midi (1905; Eng. tr., Afternoon, 1917), and Les Heures du soir (1911; Eng. tr., The Evening Hours, 1918)—love poems of poignant sincerity. In an early symbolic poem, “Le Glaive” (in Les Débâcles), the spirit of negation utters a challenge: “Thou shalt be nothing, and for thy idle soul the future shall be only regret for the past.” The trilogy of sociological trend—the poems Les Campagnes hallucinées (1893) and Les Villes tentaculaires (1895) and the drama Les Aubes (1898; Eng. tr., The Dawn, 1898)—hurls back the answer: “The ancient dream is dead, the new is on the forge.” The poet is terrified as he witnesses the desertion of the countryside—there are seven “Chansons de fou” in the first collection; then he observes the movement objectively and is finally fascinated by the display of energy in the cities. Les Aubes brings the culmination with its vision of reconciliation. Verhaeren is always the poet of energy: the vigor of joy in physical life held him in Les Flamandes, the might of an ideal in Les Moines, and if, in his crisis he provoked despair, it is because “suffering doubles our strength.” Some of his best-known poems, as “Le Passeur d’eau” and “Le Forgeron” (Les Villages illusoires, 1895), which exalt into symbols humble folk he had known in his home town, are throbbing with confidence in human effort. Victory is in sight; he celebrates the triumph in the works of his maturity, Les Visages de la vie (1899), Les Forces tumultueuses (1902), La Multiple Splendeur (1906), and Les Rythmes souverains (1910). The very names are evocative of the unfolding conquest of the universe by man. The poet forces the union of humanity through love and admiration joining men in a common purpose and mustering individuals and nations in one cause, the striving for the onward march of life. Thus he reaches a cosmic spirit akin to pantheism. He is often compared to Walt Whitman; they were kindred minds, but there is no evidence of direct influence. The First World War brought the greater indignation to the poet as he saw his cherished ideals turned to mockery by a nation he had believed in the vanguard of progress. Germany’s capital crime is to have done to death the idea of human solidarity. The ravage of his beloved Flanders offers a concrete vision of universal horror (Les Ailes rouges de la guerre, 1916).

Verhaeren’s first volumes are in conventional verse form—the alexandrine—with no more liberties than those common to the French romantic poets. Sonnets are frequent. During his crisis, beginning with Les Flambeaux noirs, he uses freer verse with varying rhythms to communicate more vividly overpowering feeling. Although bitterly attacked even by early friends who clung to traditional form and language, he never renounced his independence. He spent much of the last two decades of his life in France, and his work then shows fewer eccentricities, yet he remained a champion of free verse. The first three of his dramas combine prose and verse. The value of his prose writings for the interpretation of his poems as well as for their intrinsic worth has been too often overlooked. Here the monograph of André Fontaine is of special interest.

See: Stefan Zweig, Emile Verhaeren, tr. by J. Bithell (1914); A. Mockel, Emile Verhaeren (1923); E. Estève, Emile Verhaeren (1928); A. Fontaine, Verhaeren et son œuvre (1929).

B. M. W.

Verlaine, Paul (1844–1896, French poet), was born in Metz, where his father, an infantry captain, was in garrison. In 1851 the family moved to Paris where, contrary to the legend he tried to create later on in his life, Paul completed substantial studies. At 13 he had discovered Baudelaire (q.v.); at 14 the poet was born in him. In 1864 was formed his close association with Louis Xavier de Ricard, Banville (q.v.), and Leconte de Lisle (q.v.), and he became identified with the Parnassian school; in 1866 and 1869 he collaborated in the first two volumes of Le Parnasse contemporain. His first book, Poèmes saturniens (1866), marked the miraculous advent of a poet, whose personality was asserted through a wide culture and multiple influences. Already, in this first work of an essentially auditory and visual poet—Verlaine exhibited a passion for music and the plastic arts—the turbulent Verlainian song made itself heard; intrepid rhythms were manifested, an impressionism was linked to a taste for the plastic. Already the varied themes of the Poèmes saturniens closely reflected the interior story of Verlaine, the profound distress of his soul. For, in spite of a relatively happy childhood, in a comfortable bourgeois family, Verlaine displayed from early adolescence restless and morbid tendencies. At 14 he was tormented by a sexual crisis which lasted some time. At 18 he began to drink. Later he lost his faith, becoming an atheist, anticlerical, revolutionary. Under a respectable and bourgeois exterior (at that time he was employed in the municipal administration) Verlaine was in a psychological upheaval which influenced his entire future both as man and poet.

In 1869 the Watteau-inspired Fêtes galantes appeared, a "troubled mixture of sensation, sentiment, poetry," where scenes eminently melancholy and sensual abound. If, in spite of sadness and "a persistent feeling of irreality," the work is still Parnassian in its impersonality and its perfection of form, it already announces the penetrating musicality of Verlaine. The same year was marked by the poet's meeting and subsequently marrying Mathilde Mauté de Fleurville. The sweetness of the betrothal, the simple joys of marriage, were the themes of his third book, La Bonne Chanson (1870), full of intimate verse, essentially personal, in unsophisticated forms without apparent technique, which marked his definite break with the Parnasse. Abandoning conventional themes, Verlaine, from this period on, revealed his true self, as the diverse adventures of his life were to make him. Composed during the tormented period of the alliance of the "deux fils du soleil" (in 1872 Verlaine had fled France with Arthur Rimbaud, q.v.) and of the rupture with Mathilde, the following book, Romances sans paroles (1874), is a masterpiece of impressionistic and subjective poetry where thought, feeling, recollection, and sensation, subtly interwoven, are presented in a vibrant state which puts the reader in intimate contact with the dream, the sentiment, without the intellectual intermediary. An eminently original work, far from the direct lyricism of the preceding book, Romances sans paroles illustrates the precepts of Verlaine in his "Art poétique," published subsequently in Jadis et naguère (1884)—neither eloquence nor satire, the union of vague and precise, nuance, odd meters, new rhymes, and, more than ever, that glorious, inexpressible Verlainian music.

Then came a long period tragic and unhappy: Verlaine's imprisonment (he had shot Rimbaud in the wrist and was sentenced to two years in prison, 1873–1875), his conversion, deep and sincere, brought about by absolute solitude, his efforts to reform his life, his failures, his wanderings, the sentimental and financial catastrophes, vagrancy, drunkenness, misery, hovels, sickness, hospitals. Alternatives of debauchery and repentance, indices of a strange and mystic soul, of a weak and vacillating spirit, sensual but yet enamored of purity—all this is to be found in the works which follow Romances sans paroles and which reveal, simultaneously or in succession, the "desolate and magnificent songs of the poet who, now great sinner, now great repentant, sang with an equal innocence his faults and his remorse." In 1881 appeared Sagesse, regarded by some as his masterpiece. This new work embraces sweetly modulated musical pieces where the most intimate secrets of his heart are felt, beautiful hymns where subtle and delicate art puts the poet in immediate contact with those who hear him, where simple and familiar expressions, colloquies, give a note of exquisite intimacy. Then followed, among his most important books, Jadis et naguère, Amour (1888), Parallèlement (1889), and Bonheur (1891).

No work of Verlaine was outstandingly successful. Many, and among the best, passed unnoticed, except in the eyes of a few poets. However, toward 1882, Verlaine once more was in contact with literary circles, and only then did he know success through his studies on Les Poètes maudits (1884) and his "Art poétique." The young poets saw in him the leader of the new school. He was active in all the movements of this period. After 1890 he became widely known, was a candidate for the French Academy (and is now one of the great line, beginning with Molière, whom the Academy never received). In 1894, at the death of Leconte de Lisle (q.v.), the "younger school" conferred on him the title "prince of poets."

A pure lyrical genius, Verlaine is a poet of absolute originality. His was the art of rendering the unique in sensation, the most fugitive in emotion; he is the poet of the subconscious, the incomplete, the turbulent, the vague; he expressed the inexpressible, perceived the unperceivable. Master of the language, he scorned formalism and rhetoric. He knew all the techniques without ever becoming enslaved by them. If he sought a simple, naïve, familiar form, he was not ignorant of the laws of the purest classicism. To express individuality he dislocated the sentence, which became more and more fluid. Master also of all rhythms, his taste directed him to the "odd"; his bold ear sought for the most tenuous sounds and the most discordant. If the Verlainian music is expressed by minor tonalities, it is enriched also by dissonances, in the modern taste. While he far from scorned the traditional meter, he so disarticulated, disguised, "fluidified," the alexandrine that without him free verse cannot be contemplated.

See: E. Delahaye, Verlaine (1919); E. Lepelletier, Paul Verlaine et son œuvre (1923); M. Coulon, Verlaine, poète saturnien (1929); F. Porché, Verlaine tel qu'il fut (1933); A. Adam, Le Vrai Verlaine (1936); A. Fontaine, Verlaine, homme de lettres (1937); C. Cuénot, Etat présent des études verlainiennes (1938).

J. V.

Vermeylen, August (1872-1945, Flemish critic and novelist), was born in Brussels. In the renewal of Flemish literature that took place about 1890, he was the theoretician, the aggressive proponent of a way of writing that would free the artist from complacent provincialism and bigotry. He belonged to the founders of the review Van Nu en Straks (Today and Tomorrow) who wanted romanticism replaced by a moderate naturalism and who tried to stress the intellectual element in writing. His philosophical novel De wandelende Jood (1906; The Wandering Jew), translated into French, Czech, and German, is written in a language of great plastic beauty and conveys its moral message well. As a critic Vermeylen combated the narrow conservatism of his predecessors and offered also sound criticism of the Flemish movement in his book Kritiek der Vlaamsche Beweging (1905; Critique of the Flemish Movement). A professor of the history of art, first at the University of Brussels, then at the State University of Ghent, he composed a remarkable Geschiedenis der Europeesche Plastiek en Schilderkunst (1921-25; History of Plastic Art and Painting in Europe). He wrote an excellent history of modern Flemish literature, Van Gezelle tot Timmermans (1923; From Gezelle to Timmermans). In 1943 his novel Twee Vrienden (Two Friends) was published.

J.-A. G.

Verwey, Albert (1865-1937, Dutch poet, critic, and literary historian), was born at Amsterdam and, after leaving high school in 1883, was employed there in the office of the Maxwell Land Grant Company. He accompanied its vice-president as secretary on an inspection visit to New Mexico. But soon after his return he exchanged this business connection for a literary career. He was among the first editors (1885-1889) of De Nieuwe Gids (The New Guide). His Verzamelde Gedichten (Collected Poems) appeared in 1889. Five years later he founded with Lodewijk van Deyssel (q.v.) Tweemaandelijksch Tijdschrift (Bimonthly Periodical), which in 1902 became a monthly under the title De XXste Eeuw (The 20th Century). In 1905 he severed his association with Van Deyssel and founded a new monthly which he called De Beweging (The Movement). This became the rallying point of a group of younger poets who recognized in Verwey their mentor and master. Without being pontifical he held his followers together by the confidence he inspired in his aesthetic judgment and by their respect for his uncompromising honesty. De Beweging was to demonstrate Verwey's conviction that true poetry has a higher vocation than to express individual moods and feelings in musical and picturesque words. That had been his conception of poetry when he was editor of De Nieuwe Gids. But in his riper years he saw in poetry a social force by which the successive generations and the members of each generation were welded together and made conscious of their unity. All Verwey's later verse has an intellectual quality that reminds one of the poetry of his German friend Stefan George (q.v.). His poems seem to owe their birth to a determined will to compose, rather than to the irresistible urge to sing. De Beweging was discontinued in 1919. But five years later Verwey was given an opportunity to influence the nation's youth by his appointment to the vacant chair of Dutch literature at the University of Leiden. When he was forced to retire on reaching his 70th year, he had the satisfaction of seeing himself succeeded by the poet P. N. van Eyck, the most eminent of the Beweging group. Among Verwey's contributions to literary history Het Leven van Potgieter (1903; Life of Potgieter) deserves mention. His collected Proza (1925) fills 10 volumes.

See: M. Uylert, Albert Verwey (1908); A. Verwey, Mijn Verhouding tot Stefan George (1934).

A. J. B.

Véry, Pierre (1900–, French novelist), reflects in his first literary manifestations (Pont-Egaré, 1929; Danse à l'ombre, 1930; Les Métamorphoses, 1931) certain tendencies of the period in which he began writing. Rather than novels, they could be called poetic fantasies strongly influenced by the surrealist school. However, under their apparent eccentricity could be detected a brilliant imagination, a gift for dramatic effects and suspense, the consciousness of the mystery of the world and of the ludicrous aspects of human life. Shifting to detective stories was a normal evolution for Véry, who could apply to himself the title of his novel Le Meneur de jeu (1934). The games which he invents and directs are the 15 murder stories, filled with his poetical imagination and the whims of his caustic wit. The variety of his inspiration seems inexhaustible. His points of departure are sometimes a popular song (M. Malbrough est mort, 1937), an observation or a reminiscence (the resemblance between human and animal faces, already noticed by H. G. Wells, forms the background of Le Gentleman des Antipodes, 1936). He even uses personal incidents. He conceived the idea of Madame et le mort (1940) after noticing that someone had stolen his wallet. In addition to the novels already mentioned Monsieur Marcel des pompes funèbres (1932), L'Assassinat du Père Noël (1934), Goupi-Mains Rouges (1937), and Série de sept (1938) are among his very best. They all show the same qualities, fertility of invention, originality of details, keen sense of observation, vividness of dialogue, and perfect mastery of technique. With Pierre Véry the detective story becomes a true literary genre.

M. E. C.

Vesper, Will (1882–, German poet, novelist, and editor), was born in Wuppertal-Barmen and spent his earliest youth on a farm. His later literary manner and the fields of his intellectual preoccupation (historical and folklore themes, sagas, etc.) reflect the ancient customs and uses, beliefs and sayings, of his western German peasant background. After completing the humanistic Gymnasium, he received no more formal education other than a year's study in history and philology at the University of Munich. Since 1906 he has been literary counselor to the publisher, C. H. Beck, in Munich and from 1918 to 1920 was manager of the literary section of the Deutsche allgemeine Zeitung. Recently he has edited with much vigor the literary magazine Die schöne Literatur, which became, in 1931, Die neue Literatur.

In spite of the remarkable uniformity and even monotony of subject matter, his work is more varied in form, and more voluminous, than can here be enumerated. Between 1906 and 1943 he published with unceasing energy countless popular editions, translations, and modern poetic adaptations of some of the main works of earlier German and European literature (e.g., Tristan und Isolde, 1911; Die Gudrungsage, 1925). Nearly 15 volumes of his own eclectic, romantic poetry (Die Liebesmesse, 1913; Rufe in die Zeit, 1936) and more than 20 narrative and historical works (Martin Luthers Jugendjahre, 1918; Gute Geister, 1921; Das harte Geschlecht, 1931) represent the fruits of an ever active and eager literary life. At one time his judicious anthology, Die Ernte aus acht Jahrhunderten deutscher Lyrik (1906 ff.), was one of the most widely read collections of German lyrical poetry.

See: K. A. Kutzbach, "Will Vesper" (with bibliography), Die neue Literatur, XXXIII (1932), 435–449; A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Dritte Folge: Dichter aus deutschem Volkstum (1934), pp. 134–148.

V. L.

Viani, Lorenzo (1882–1936, Italian painter and novelist), was born in Viareggio, Lucca, of a very poor peasant family. After a few years of grammar school education he was apprenticed to a Viareggio barber and remained in his shop until, through the interest of a group of clients who had noted Viani's skill in pen and ink drawing (he caricatured everyone who came to the shop), he obtained a scholarship to the Academy of Fine Arts in Lucca. An exuberant youth, acquainted with poverty since childhood, and imbued with revolutionary ideas (his employer had been the Socialist leader in his native town), he soon tired of discipline and quit school, but continued to study. At the age of 23, penniless and friendless, he made his way to Paris and spent several years there in dire poverty, studying and painting. When he returned to Italy, his canvases, some of which had already attracted attention in France, were hung in a number of exhibitions, and his reputation was established. At the outbreak of the First World War, Viani renounced his radical ideas, vigorously urged Italy's intervention on the side of the Allies, volunteered in the army, and served for over three years. As a soldier he continued to use his pen and brush and at the end of the conflict his war drawings were exhibited in Milan. These drawings attracted the attention of Mussolini and resulted in an invitation to Viani to write for the Popolo d'Italia. Viani accepted, became a militant Fascist, and remained such until his death.

Viani began to write in 1922, producing first a biography of the poet Ceccardo Ceccardi Roccatagliata and thereafter an average of a book each year. All Viani's works are more or less autobiographical. Ceccardo (1922) tells of his friendship with the poet Roccatagliata; Parigi (1925) of his experiences in Paris; Le Chiavi nel pozzo (1934) recounts his stay in an insane asylum; Barba e capelli (1939) is a description of his clients in his barber shop, some of whom, like D'Annunzio (q.v.), were famous. These books consist mostly of literary sketches, painted with pen instead of brush—anatomical studies and character dissections—performed with a kind of satanic joy. In these sketches Viani shows a special predilection for lunatics, degenerates, cripples, drunkards, and beggars and a rare mastery in bringing out the grotesque and animal traits of such subjects. He uses a peculiar and expressive language, a jargon of slang and obsolete local terms picked up from the oldest inhabitants of the province of Lucca and at many points incomprehensible to the average reader. He is an adherent of no aesthetic school, he avoids everything that smacks of formal psychology and practices a ruthless and at times cruel realism which does not, however, prevent him from sympathizing with his wretched subjects, feeling for them the solidarity of poverty and suffering. He has had many ardent admirers and some rabid detractors; we are beginning however to have dispassionate appraisal of his work.

See: Krimer (pseud. of C. Mercati) Sodalizio con V. (1938); G. Nervini, L. Viani nella vita e nell'arte (1939); G. Ravegnani, I Contemporanei (1930), pp. 209-223; E. Falqui and E. Vittorini, Scrittori nuovi (1930), pp. 651-658.

G. B.

Viebig, Clara (1860-, German novelist), disciple of Zola (q.v.), outstanding woman novelist of the naturalistic school, was born at Treves and first became famous by introducing into literature her native region, the bleak and volcanic uplands of the Eifel with its pine forests and its dangerous swamps. How perfectly people and landscape are blended may be seen in her story "Am Totenmaar" from Kinder der Eifel (1897), where the austerity of the landscape mirrors the moral rigor of the old shepherd and where its desolation is a symbol of the utter loneliness of his abandoned child. Viebig's early novels could not escape the influence of Gabriele Reuter's courageous and widely discussed novel Aus guter Familie (1895), the story of a sensitive girl of the higher middle class whose life is ruined by the conventional narrow-minded prudishness of her religious and social training. But Clara Viebig is more outspoken in her presentation of the erotic side of life which, to cite an early example, is treated with fine humor in the famous novel Das Weiberdorf (1900). Except for two short periods of the year when the men return from the steel mills, the women are left alone in this village of the Eifel, where the worthless Pittchen becomes the object of their suppressed desires. When the constable takes him away for petty counterfeiting, the women band together to rescue him, but quickly desert him at the sight of the returning menfolk. The masses which act with collective instinct like one monstrous organism, are pictured here in a masterly fashion, as is the religious ecstasy of the pilgrims to the shrine at Echternach in the Eifel in Das Kreuz im Venn (1908) or the suppressed hatred and secret patriotic longing of the servile Polish peasants under German domination, observed during the author's residence in Posen and portrayed in Das schlafende Heer (1904; Eng. tr., The Sleeping Army, 1929). As a young girl Viebig had lived in Düsseldorf, the scene of her historic novel Die Wacht am Rhein (1902). Here the peaceful fusion by marriage of the old Prussian element with the population of the Rhineland is demonstrated in the history of a family through three generations. The novel ends in 1870. Modern Berlin, where Clara Viebig spent her adult years as the wife of the publisher Cohn, is the background of many of her social novels. Among these Das tägliche Brot (1900; Eng. tr., Our Daily Bread, 1908), depicting the life of a servant girl in the lower middle class, is an example of the author's intense human sympathy which lends abiding value to her novels. Viebig is at her best when portraying characters governed by elemental needs and desires, especially women from the lower classes. Her style is strictly visual, a succession of pictures, vivid and concrete in every detail.

See: C. Scheuffler, Clara Viebig (1926).

E. Hof.

Vielé-Griffin, Francis (1864–1937, French poet), whose Huguenot ancestry migrated to the United States at the end of the 17th century, was born in Norfolk, Virginia. His father had been military governor for the Union forces in the Civil War. When eight years old, the boy was taken to France for his education, where he remained the rest of his life, residing now in Paris, now in the provinces, with a preference for Touraine. In his first book of poems, Cueille d'avril (1886), one of his most distinguished works, he tells of the charms of country life on the banks of the Loire with the simplicity and musical tenderness of Verlaine (q.v.). The soft atmosphere of the region, known as the garden of France, permeates to such an extent the poetic works of Vielé-Griffin that he has been called the poet of Touraine. But he is particularly noted as representative of the symbolist movement and the indisputable master of vers libre. In collaboration with Paul Adam, Henri de Régnier (qq.v.), and Bernard Lazare he founded in 1890 the Entretiens politiques et littéraires, which became the principal vehicle of expression for the symbolist poets. In this review were formulated on numerous occasions his theories of a new verse, as he strove with Gustave Kahn, Jules Laforgue (qq.v.), Edouard Dujardin, and others to liberate French poetry from arbitrary rules. The vers libre which Vielé-Griffin adopted after the publication of Joies (1888) is not a mere variation of the alexandrine or any conventional meter, but a rhythmic pattern born out of the emotional movement of the phrase and made perceptible by the appropriate combination of the temporal and quantitative values of syllabic units. His verse thus becomes an original creation expressing by its cadence and musical tonality the whole personality of the poet. It reveals a delicate sensibility which is moved by the multiple aspects of beauty and which a lofty idealism inclines to seek goodness and gladness in man as well as in nature. This optimistic attitude, springing from a belief in life and its spiritual values, is generally maintained in the poetic works collected under the title Poèmes et poésies (1886–1893). One may note also the deep religious feeling of Amour sacré (1900) and the sincere humanitarian faith of Clarté de vie (1897). The frequent use in these poems of the technique of popular song follows a tendency common to the symbolist poets of this period.

Vielé-Griffin's admiration for Keats, Shelley, and particularly Swinburne, whose Laus Veneris he translated, not only affected his love for nature but also his interest in Hellenic and medieval legends as symbols of his philosophical thought. In this vein he wrote several narrative poems, the best examples being Chevauchée d'Yeldis (1893), Phocas le jardinier (1898), and Légende ailée de Wieland le forgeron (1900), all imbued with his Neoplatonic conceptions. Too often in these lengthy compositions verbosity and confusion of images render the thought obscure and its expression inadequate. The verse, however, always retains the fluid rhythm and harmonious qualities which characterize the poetry of Vielé-Griffin.

See: Rémy de Gourmont, Le Livre des masques (1896); Robert de Souza, La Poésie populaire et le lyrisme sentimental (1899); André Beaunier, La Poésie nouvelle (1902); Marcel Raymond, De Baudelaire au surréalisme (1933).

M. D.

Vildrac, Charles (pseud. of Charles Messenger, 1882–, French poet, essayist, and dramatist), was born in Paris. He early began to write poetry. In 1906 he and several of his friends, including Georges Duhamel (q.v.), who was later to become his brother-in-law, decided to live cooperatively. They rented an old house at Créteil in the suburbs of Paris and called it the Abbaye. There they hoped to devote themselves to their vocations, writing, painting, music—and to earn their livelihood at the same time. The group disbanded about a year later; each went his own way, enriched, however, by this life in common.

The first volume of poems by Vildrac,

Images et mirages (1908), was printed on the press of the Abbaye. Another volume, Le Livre d'amour, appeared in 1910 (Eng. tr., A Book of Love, 1923); in 1911 Vildrac published, in collaboration with Duhamel, Notes sur la technique poétique. His poetry has been influenced by that of Whitman, both in form and in ideas. Vildrac sees beauty and poetry in the simplest and most humble manifestations of life. Friendship is one of his favorite themes. It is not the social class of his characters which interests him; it is their purely human value. The simplest, plainest people are capable of the highest feelings, of acts of heroism, of nobility of soul, and of poetry. In his play Le Paquebot Tenacity (Vieux Colombier, 1920; Eng. tr., The Steamer Tenacity, 1921) the plot is almost nonexistent. The character study of the two young men who are about to sail for Canada and the idea of the freedom of the soul form the entire subject of the play. La Brouille (Comédie Française, 1930) is also based on a flimsy plot: two friends, one an idealist and the other a realist, have a quarrel over principles. The action is purely psychological.

As an essayist Vildrac again preaches love of fellow man and faith in humanity. Découvertes (1912; including a one-act play, L'Indigent, of which there is one Eng. tr., The Art of Making Friends, 1933) exalts the beauty of human relations, the hunger for human sympathy. Vildrac also has written a charming book for children, L'Ile rose (1925).

Vildrac was very active in the resistance movement during the Second World War.

See: L. Savitzky, "Charles Vildrac et le théâtre contemporain," Mercure de France, CLXIII (1923), 289-305; C. Sénéchal, L'Abbaye de Créteil (1930); M. L. Bidal, Les Ecrivains de l'Abbaye (1938).

H. H.

Villaespesa, Francisco (1879-1936, Spanish poet and dramatist), was born in Laujar, Almería. He was a typical Spaniard of the South; in his temperament, his life, and his work he was an improviser, facile and brilliant. When he first attracted attention in Madrid about 1897 it was as the leader of the new modernist poetic movement which, inspired by the example of the poets of Spanish America, was taking shape among the young Spaniards. His home was the gathering point of many of those shy, aloof figures, and the literary reviews that he founded were the organs of expression of the new schools. He always was on the closest terms with the poets of America, first through their books, then through his personal relations with those who came to Spain to live, and later through his own travels and long stays in various countries of the New World. Especially in the latter part of his life, as his reputation declined in Spain, he achieved new triumphs in Spanish America with dramas and poems dealing with American subjects.

His complete works comprise over 50 volumes of poetry and some 30 dramatic works, in addition to a number of novels and short stories. His enduring value lies in the poetic works he wrote before 1912, although it is then that he achieved his great success as a dramatic author with a play in verse on an oriental theme of Granada, El alcázar de las perlas. His lyric and poetic gifts are, to be sure, found in this and his other historical dramas of a romantic nature; but they exist in a far purer form in his earlier and essentially lyric compositions. In these appear many of the themes, expressions, and metrical forms of modernism which he took from Rubén Darío and the other Spanish American poets of the period, especially Silva, Lugones, and Herrera y Reissig; it was through them that he received the foreign influences of the epoch already assimilated into Spanish. At times this influence is direct, as in the case of writers akin in language and temperament to the Spanish, such as the Portuguese (especially Eugénia de Castro, q.v.) and the Italians (especially D'Annunzio, q.v.). In Villaespesa's poetry all these new and foreign elements which characterize modernism are brought into complete accord with traditional Spanish rhetoric. For although modernist in form and content, the poetry and temperament of Villaespesa were romantic, and therefore the writer he most closely resembles is Zorrilla, in his predilection for oriental themes, his conventionally poetic vision of Spain, and his ability to achieve his effects through mere verbal sonority. Aside from this value as a representative of tradition and of his epoch, Villaespesa has a value of his own as a lyric poet. The sadness of life, the intimate experience of love, the moving evocation of places, things, and landscapes, the popular flavor, the eternal dissatisfaction, are the subjective notes of his lyrical creation, poured forth in a multitude of volumes. Careful selection is required if one is to do justice to his originality, which is difficult to perceive because in his poetry the muted, limpid part of his work is the best.

See: P. Gener, "Figuras contemporáneas: Villaespesa," Cervantes, Vol. I (Madrid, 1916),

No. 1, pp. 27-40; R. Cansinos-Asséns, La nueva literatura, I (1917), 125-137; J. R. Jiménez, "Recuerdo al primer Villaespesa (1899-1901)," Sol (Madrid), March 10, 1936; F. de Onís, "Francisco Villaespesa y el modernismo," Revista hispánica moderna, III (New York, 1936-1937), 276-278.

F. de O.

Villalón Daoiz y Halcón, Fernando (1881-1930, Spanish poet), was born in Morón de la Frontera, Seville, of an affluent and aristocratic family. From his father he inherited the title of conde de Miraflores de los Angeles and a liking for books. From childhood he lived in close contact with nature in Andalucía la Baja. A vigorous man, an excellent horseman, breeder of fine cattle, friend of bullfighters and of popular singers, he felt and caught all the color and force of his luminous region. His restlessness, born of a penchant for the occult, adds interest to his attractive personality. He was an important figure in the literary journals of his country; a quiet inclination for poetry, familiarity with the classics, contact with the new poets of Spain, as well as articles of his own, were contributing factors. At the age of 46 he published his first book, Andalucía la Baja (1927). This was followed by La Toriada (1928) and Romances del 800 (1929). An appreciation of classical poetry, a feeling for the folk elements of Andalusian life which he shared with the young poets of his period and appreciated perhaps even more directly than they—these make of Villalón the authentic poet of his own region, although his verses are noted more for vitality and content than for facility of expression.

See: Gerardo Diego, Poesía española (Antología) (1934), p. 475; Federico de Onís, Antología de la poesía española e hispano-americana (1934), p. 1066.

A. I.

Villiers de l'Isle-Adam, Jean Marie Mathias Philippe Auguste, comte de (1838-1889, French poet, dramatist, and novelist), was born at St. Brieuc in Brittany. The scion of a noble family illustrious in the annals of French history, he was reared by a chimerical father, who was forever beguiled into quests of impossible treasures he fancied were buried in dungeons, and two saintly women, his mother and his aunt, who idolized him. He grew up into a hypersensitive and dreamy youth inwardly illumined by the splendors of his chivalric heritage and the romantic reflections of an enchanting idyl he had at the age of 17 with a young woman who died soon after, so that henceforth glory, love, and death formed a mystic trinity in his heart.

In 1857, provided with the "sterile riches" of his ancestry, secure in his Catholic faith and legitimist traditions, and his manuscripts in ballast, he followed his literary dreams to Paris. Here the fireworks of his fantasy soon made of him a legendary, but also tragic, figure in the bohemian cafés and cénacles, where his rhapsodic discourses electrified his audiences. He was befriended by the literary élite, especially Baudelaire (q.v.), who introduced him to Richard Wagner (q.v.) and to the writings of Edgar Allan Poe, two kindred spirits whose works have close affinities with his own. He probed coincidentally the Hegelian philosophy of the Absolute and the arcana of the occult sciences, which seemed to him to be consonant with his own idealism.

His Premières poésies (1859) attracted little comment, for he was a great poet only in prose; these verses were but "half a promise," as he himself told Baudelaire, agreeing to send him soon "a prose less immature than his verses." This he did with his novel Isis (1862), of which he had already conceived the idea in his adolescent years. Dating from the same period are his two early dramas, Morgane and Elën. The first to be published, Elën (1865), portrays a Circean woman whose lustful love leads to frustration and death. In the second, Morgane (1866), love is heightened by ambition; in the end both lovers renounce a throne to be united in the bosom of death. In Isis love becomes an unearthly longing which can be fulfilled only in that otherworldliness beyond death which became the omega of all the religious, philosophical, and occult idealisms of the author and which was also the mainspring of his irreconcilable antagonism to modern social and scientific materialisms.

This hostility dictated his sardonic and tragic caricature Tribulat Bonhomet, a kinsman of M. Homais and Bouvard and Pécuchet (see Flaubert). Bonhomet is a pseudoscientific, democratic, and antipoetic symbol of crass "common sense," and a terrifying embodiment of moral and spiritual torpidity, whom he opposes to Claire, the creature of faith, in Claire Lenoir, novelette published (1867; Eng. tr., 1925) in the Revue des lettres et des arts.

Villiers de l'Isle-Adam carried his championship of the spirit to the stage with La Révolte (1870), a play with a theme like Ibsen's (q.v.) in A Doll's House which it antedates, and with his prize-winning play, Le Nouveau monde (1880). In this play, written in 1876 to celebrate the centenary of the American Revolution but produced only in 1883, two idealisms, the feudal and democratic, battle for country and love with equal heroism. Both plays failed although they deserved a better fate.

Neglected by publishers and public alike, he plumbed at this time frightful depths of misery. But, intrenched in his militant spiritualism, he began to publish, at first in fugitive magazines, his series of tales of terror, mystery, and fantasy which he later brought together in collections such as Contes cruels (1883; Eng. tr., Sardonic Tales, 1927) and Histoires insolites (1888). As with the rest of his work some of them "Vera," "Sentimentalisme," "Akëdyssëril"—bespeak his idealistic aspirations, while others—"Les Demoiselles de Bienfilâtre," "La Torture par l'Espérance," "L'Affichage céleste"—echo his irony, humor, and ire against man's spiritual blindness and materialistic presumptions.

Both his high-flown idealism and his humorous realism concurred in the scientific and philosophical novel L'Eve future (1886); science creates a living android whose beautiful soul can be, however, only a reflection of her lover's ideal. Thus all creations of science, and reality itself, are but illusions into which the spirit alone can breathe life.

The purest expression of this rarefied idealism is to be found in his poetic drama Axël (1890; Eng. tr., 1925), largely written by the year 1872. The heroine, Sara, rejecting the call of religion and heaven, and the hero, Axël, that of the occult world, are tempted by that of life which is symbolized by treasure buried in the crypt under the castle of Auërsperg; they discover upon finding it the greater enchantment of each other's love. Rather than outlive its initial ecstasy and see it tarnished and converted into a deceptive illusion, they resolve to eternize it in the bosom of death. Their ideal, like their creator's, was not of this world.

Villiers de l'Isle-Adam's influence over the symbolistic writers was profound. "Everything I have done I owe to Villiers," Maurice Maeterlinck (q.v.) has said, and W. B. Yeats declared that he read Axël in his youth, "slowly and laboriously as one reads a sacred book." Verily, he was a "prince de l'esprit."

See: Fernan Clerget, Villiers de l'Isle Adam (1913); Arnold Whitridge, Critical Ventures in Modern French Literature (1924), pp. 81-101; C. J. C. van der Meulen, L'Idéalisme de Villiers de l'Isle-Adam (1925); Peter Quennell, Baudelaire and the Symbolists (1929), pp. 99-

130; Edmund Wilson, Axel's Castle; a Study in the Imaginative Literature of 1870-1930 (1931), pp. 258-264; Max Daireaux, Villiers de l'Isle-Adam; l'homme et l'œuvre (1936); Vincent O'Sullivan, "The Tales and Stories of Villiers de l'Isle-Adam," Dublin Magazine (April-June, 1940), pp. 25-34.

S. A. R.

Vinogradov, Anatoli Korneliyevich (1888-, Russian novelist, biographer, scholar, and librarian), was born at Polotnyany Zavod in the former Government of Kaluga. Although he is best known as a historical novelist, he has published a number of literary studies—Merime v pismakh k Sobolevskomu (1928; Mérimée in His Letters to Sobolevski) and biographies of Byron (1936) and Stendhal (1938).

Stendhal is also the subject of a novelette, Poteryannaya perchatka (1931; The Lost Glove), based on episodes of the occupation of Moscow by Napoleon's army, and of a long novel, Tri tsveta vremeni (1931; The Three Colors of the Times); the colors, of course, are political, and Stendhal is shown as an atheist and a liberal in conflict with clericalism and reactionism. Vinogradov's Povest o bratyakh Turgenevykh (1932; The Story of the Brothers Turgenev) concerns itself chiefly with the life abroad of Nicholas and Alexander, champions of progressive ideas during a period of social ferment. Interesting as interpretation is the novel about Toussaint L'Ouverture, Chyorny konsul (1933; Eng. tr., The Black Consul, 1935), which portrays the sanguinary conflicts in Haiti in the light of the contemporaneous French Revolution. Here, as sometimes elsewhere, the author combines extravagant narration with the meticulous observation of a historian. Osuzhdeniye Paganini (1936; The Condemnation of Paganini) has as its protagonist the great violinist, who is shown to be a victim of the unholy machinations of the Jesuits. Khronika Malevinskikh (1943; The Chronicle of the Malevinskis), a novel covering the last three generations, offers a view of the development of science and society in Russia. Vinogradov is adept at interpreting sources and presenting his facts in the spirit of socialist realism, now dominant in Russian fiction.

See: Nauchnyie rabotniki Moskvy (1930).

P. A. P.

Vitorino, Virginia (1898-, Portuguese poet and dramatist), was born in the historical city of Alcobaça. Her first poetical compositions were published in the daily newspapers of Lisbon in 1917, and she has collaborated on the most important literary reviews of her native country. The sonnet has been her preferred poetic form, and the collection Namorados (1918; Lovers) has had more than 10 editions. In Virginia Vitorino there is a highly elaborated alliance, very appropriate to the sonnet form, of Renaissance rhetorical devices (paradox, metaphorical parallelism) and erotic passion. At times this reminds one very much of the manner of the great South American women poets, Storni and Ibarbourou, because of the ease with which the most elemental sensations are given a universal and absorbing quality. It is not surprising that these sonnets have met with favor in South America. The one entitled "Amor" (Love) is very well known; other pieces of similar inspiration and structure are "Apaixonadamente" (Passionately) and "Renuncia" (Renunciation).

Virginia Vitorino has also made contributions to the Portuguese theatre, in works characterized, at their best, by energy and naturalness, facile dialogue and national popular feeling. Degredados (1930; Degraded) is the best known; this was followed by A volta (1932; The Return), Fascinação (1933; Fascination), Manuela (1934), and finally Camaradas (1938; Comrades). The last-named work was awarded the Gil Vicente prize by the Secretariado de Propaganda Nacional of her country.

See: A. Forjaz de Sampaio, História da literatura portuguesa ilustrada dos séculos XIX e XX (1939).

R. M. L.

Vivanti, Annie (1868–1942, Italian novelist and short-story writer), was born in London, where her father, Anselmo, an Italian patriot, had been forced into exile on account of his active participation in the revolutionary uprisings and political conspiracies in his native Mantua, for which Austria had condemned him to death. With the aid of her mother, Anna Lindau, who was German, the child studied the German poets, especially Goethe and Schiller; from her English governess young Annie learned by heart long passages from the Bible. The home of the Vivantis in London was a meeting place for many German poets and critics, and the child learned to speak both German and English fluently. When she was nine years of age she was taken to Italy to attend school. On the death of her mother in 1880, Annie was sent to Switzerland where she remained two years. After a brief visit to London, she traveled extensively in the United States and studied vocal music in New York.

Upon her return to Italy in 1887 she composed verses in Italian, published in 1890 in a volume entitled Lirica, for which Carducci (q.v.) wrote the preface. Carducci admired both the poetry and the woman, and a liaison between these two writers lasted for many years. A more impartial criticism of Vivanti's lyrics was made by Benedetto Croce (q.v.) who found that her poems suffered from an inadequate artistic elaboration. In 1890 was published a novel, Marion, artista da caffè concerto, in which Vivanti depicted a character reminiscent of Carmen, with violent passions and insatiable desires; Marion combines qualities of love and selfishness, modesty and immodesty, compassion and cruelty, pride and baseness; in her perversion and cruelty she is guilty of many crimes.

For two decades Vivanti disappeared from the literary scene. In 1908 she married an Irish lawyer, John Chartres, an active supporter of the Irish Free State movement. Then, in 1910, was published a novel in English entitled The Devourers, which she herself translated into Italian under the title of I Divoratori (1911). Critics generally agree that this is Vivanti's best novel. It deals with a devoted mother who undergoes many sacrifices for the sake of a young daughter. The success of this novel encouraged Vivanti to write other novels, dramas, short stories, sketches, and articles on a variety of subjects. The most important of these are Zingaresca (1918), Gioia (1921), Terra di Cleopatra (1925), Perdonate Eglantina! (1926), and Mea Culpa (1927). The quality of her literary production has remained fairly constant. In her stories, always vivid and imaginative, Vivanti enjoys presenting extraordinary events, bewildering and almost fantastic episodes, frightful passions, terrifying wickedness and follies—sometimes combined with extreme kindness, piety, and generosity. Though never great nor profound, she is interesting and most charming. Giuseppe Prezzolini (q.v.) has said that of all recent Italian woman writers, "the most vivacious, the most able is Vivanti."

See: B. Croce, La Letteratura della nuova Italia, 2d ed., II (1921), 326–333; G. Prezzolini, La Cultura italiana (1923), p. 248; L. Russo, I Narratori (1923), pp. 201–202.

H. R. M.

Vivien, Renée (née Pauline Tarn, 1877–1909, French poet), was born in London, her father, John Tarn of England, having met and married her mother, Mary Gillet Bennett of Jackson, Michigan, while on a visit to Honolulu. With the exception of a few unhappy years in England, Renée Vivien spent all her life in Paris, whence she made numerous trips to foreign lands. An ample fortune enabled her to live in luxurious surroundings in a fashionable part of Paris. She loved solitude and study; at 22 she learned Greek in order to read Sappho in the original. While Renée Vivien's prose translations of Sapphic fragments are literal and accurate, her poetic paraphrases are freely fanciful; in fact, her cult of Sappho was purely a pretext for interpreting her own Lesbianism. A fervent disciple of Baudelaire and possessor of a strong inherited strain of Nordic mysticism, she was too obsessed by Christian concepts of chastity and sin to make a convincing pagan. Her Hellenism is anachronistic and artificial, but this does not prevent her evocations of the lives and loves of ancient Greek maidens on the island of Lesbos from having genuine grace and charm. In many of these poems she employs the musical and little-used Sapphic meter. Besides Baudelaire and Sappho, certain poets of her own race contributed to the formation of her poetic manner, especially Swinburne and Rossetti. Furthermore, her symbolism shows the influence of Wagner and Albert Samain (qq.v.). From Baudelaire she learned the artistic control of emotions and superb musical technique that make her poetry superior to that of most women poets. From him also she adopted the poetic use of corresponding sensations and the cult of evil. Renée Vivien's best poetry interprets her own deeply felt emotional experiences. It tells of her intense suffering at being treated as a social outcast because of her love of women, of her refusal to see beauty in modern Christian civilization, and of her longing for the pagan life of ancient Greece. She even rented a villa in Mytilene where, for months at a time, she attempted to relive the Golden Age. It is not strange that Renée Vivien, continually haunted by unattainable desires, should have sought the release of death and made it a frequent theme in her poetry; always delicate, she hastened her end by voluntary fasting and died in Paris at 32.

Because of its exaltation of Lesbian love, the poetry of Renée Vivien has been unjustly neglected. Despite this dominating characteristic, her verse merits respect and admiration because of its delicate purity and perfection of form. Originally published in 12 slim volumes (1901-1910), her Poésies complètes are now obtainable in two (1934). Her prose, consisting of a novel, two collections of prose poems, a book of tales, and several essays, is mediocre and could be ignored except for its autobiographical interest.

See: Yves-Gérard Le Dantec, Renée Vivien, femme damnée, femme sauvée (1930).

C. B. C.

Vogau, Boris Andreyevich, see Pilnyak, Boris.

Vogt, Nils Collett (1864-1937, Norwegian poet), was born in Christiania of a bureaucratic engineering father and a sensitive, artistic mother. Even in early adolescence an impulsive individualism led him to revolt against his family so that he might become "a child of the age." Through Georg Brandes (q.v.) he found the poetry of Byron, Shelley, and Drachmann, and was thereby prepared for the "dedication to life" which possessed him on hearing Björnson's (q.v.) speech at the unveiling of Henrik Wergeland's statue in 1881. His reaction against the "treachery" of the Liberals in 1885 drove him into contact with the radical bohème and a nominal adherence to socialistic doctrine. The passionate intellectual rebellion of the 80's and his experiences then remained a recurrent theme in his writings to the very end. His novels and plays deal with little else, and his poetry reverts to them again and again. Already at the age of 30 the sense of memory, of having lived warmly and intensely, of looking back on youth began to fill his poetry. Even when the passage of time had made him less impetuous, he never regretted his stormy youth, and has often sung the glory of youthful idealism, "the fever in our blood," "the dream above the strife of living." His slender first collection, Digte (1887; Poems), fell in the midst of a naturalistic, unpoetic era and was severely handled by many of his fellow radicals. But with the 90's came a new spirit more congenial to his lyric muse. In volume after volume he unfolded a genius for lyric-reflective poetry unmatched in Norway for rock-hewn strength, for masculine courage and maturity. Fra vaar til høst (1894; From Spring to Autumn) was his first great success, the result of his meeting with the sunlit life of Italy, a warm-blooded confession of pagan faith, the northerner's ego expanding under blue southern skies. But in the long run his meeting with the south led only to a deeper realization of his love for Norway. Although he was frequently critical of his respected contemporaries, he was bound by a mystic sense of identification to the soil of Norway. Already in his earliest collection he wished he might be a "fir tree in the forest"; in Det lyre brød (1900; The Costly Bread) his friends are likened to sea gulls; in Septemberbrand (1907; September Flame) he is the "heather on trackless mountains, flaming most hotly toward rain and autumn"; in Hjemkomst (1917; Homecoming) his soul is the "azure wave" which is rolling "gray and somber into the night." Two further collections in 1924 and 1927 completed his poetic production, only to be followed by prose memoirs, the first volume of which, Fra gutt til mann (1932; From Boy to Man), tells with superb tolerance and humor the story of his youth, a realistic and tender portrait of a great period. His writings express everywhere a noble and humane spirit, sympathetic, earnest, sadly aware of the passing of spring and youth, for which he nourished so passionate a love. His verse forms are not highly musical, but effective for their forthright, un-sentimental vigor. His poems are objective yet personal, thoughtful yet moving, a "unity of perception and reflection" (Winsnes).

See: A. Heiberg et al., "Vogt," Samtiden (1915, 1932, 1934); K. Elster, "Three Lyric Poets of Norway," American-Scandinavian Review, XIII (1925), 653-665; J. Knutzen, "Tre kantater om Norge," Edda, XXVIII (1928), 319-330; bibliography in Norsk bibliografisk bibliotek (1937).

E. H.

Vogüé, Eugène Marie Melchior, vicomte de (1848-1910, French critic), was born in Nice and spent his childhood at the ancestral castle of Gourdan in the Ardèche. He received education at the hands of the fathers of Notre Dame at Auteuil. At 20 he left for a trip to Italy, where he was when the Franco-Prussian War broke out in 1870. Rushing back to France, he entered the army in company with an elder brother whom he was to see shot dead at his side during the battle of Sedan. He was later taken prisoner by the Prussians. With his release from Magdeburg his diplomatic career began. He served as secretary to his cousin, ambassador to Turkey. In 1872 Vogüé visited Ephesus, Rhodes, Byblos, and Jerusalem, in 1875 Mt. Athos. His impressions were collected in one volume in 1876. In that same year Vogüé was sent to St. Petersburg, where he remained until his retirement from the diplomatic corps in 1882. His contribution of Russian studies to the Revue des deux mondes began in 1879. In 1883 there appeared the earliest of those essays on the Russian novel which, in their collected form, became Le Roman russe (1886). In 1889 he was elected to the French Academy; from 1893 to 1898 he sat in the Chamber of Deputies as member for Annonay.

Vogüé, called the Chateaubriand of the Third Republic, was a traditionalist in taste, religion, and politics. The work of Zola (q.v.) and his group was distasteful to him. He wrote Le Roman russe partly to forward the fall of French naturalism (q.v.), partly to exhibit the virtues of Russian fiction from Pushkin to Tolstoy (q.v.). The book turned the attention of France to Russian literature and to its religion of human suffering. To Vogüé is due the reappearance of mystery and illusion in French fiction.

See: E. W. Gosse, Portraits and Sketches (1912); G. Turquet-Milnes, Some Modern French Writers (1921).

P. B.

Voigt-Diederichs, Helene (1875-, German novelist and short-story writer), was born at Marienhoff, a family estate in Schleswig-Holstein, where she received her early education from tutors and lived up to her 14th year, in a rural community, close to nature. Her father died when she was 12. After several years spent traveling, she married, in 1898, the publisher Eugen Diederichs, then of Leipzig, who later moved to Jena. From 1911, she lived, separated from her husband, in Brunswick, but returned to Jena in 1931.

Her literary traits are North German, somber seriousness, relieved occasionally by touches of humor, restraint and aversion to everything strident. In her beginnings she was strongly influenced by the Danish novelist J. P. Jacobsen (q.v.), and this is seen in her only volume of lyrics, Unterstrom (1901). But her own inclinations and the spirit of her generation led her to keep close to reality in her novels and short stories. Thus her main works are confined to the real experiences of her own life, the rural community, marriage, and children. The most original of her novels and short stories are drawn from the life of peasants and landed gentry in Schleswig-Holstein. Such novels are Regine Vosgerau (1901) and Dreiviertel Stund vor Tag (1905), prize winner in a contest directed by the poet D. von Liliencron (q.v.). Her short stories were later collected in two volumes, Schleswig-Holsteiner Landleute and Schleswig-Holsteiner Blut. In Auf Marienhoff; das Leben einer deutschen Mutter (1925), she described the life of her mother. The stories in Mann und Frau (1921) and the novel Ring um Roderich (1929) deal with marriage problems. Stories about children are collected in Kinderland (1907) and Der grüne Papagei (Vol. X of Diederich's Deutsche Reihe). The unassuming sobriety of her style gives value and personal charm to her travel books such as Wandertage in England (1912) and Gast in Siebenbürgen (1936).

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, 10. Auflage (preface 1919), pp. 758–762.

W. R. G.

Vojnović, Count Ivo (1857–1929, Croat dramatist), was born at Dubrovnik (Ragusa). His father was a noted lawyer and politician; his mother, a woman of fine character, had a deep influence on her son. Though his primary interest was always in literature, Vojnović took the legal course at the University of Zagreb and, after holding various judicial and administrative positions, in 1903 became governor of the island of Brač. His extravagant tastes proved his ruin, for in 1907 an investigating commission found him guilty of misusing public funds. His fault was apparently reckless incompetence rather than calculated dishonesty; the government, perhaps loath to disgrace a distinguished author, merely dismissed him from office without instituting criminal proceedings. Left penniless, Vojnović secured an appointment as literary director of the Zagreb theatre. He had only qualified success and in 1911 ceased to discharge the duties of his office, but his salary was continued up to the First World War on his agreement to write for the theatre one play each year. In July, 1914, the Austrian government arrested Vojnović along with other persons regarded as dangerous to the state. Vojnović was allowed to mingle with the other prisoners, to whom he revealed his best qualities as friend and comrade. In 1915 he was transferred to a hospital in Zagreb, where he underwent an operation on one eye. In 1917 he received an ovation at the Zagreb theatre, where his Ekvinocijo (1895; The Equinoctial) was performed in honor of his 60th birthday; the tribute was not only to his literary genius but to the veiled advocacy in his dramas of a union between the Croats and the Serbs in one independent state. From 1919 to 1922 Vojnović was Yugoslav consul at Nice; his last years he spent mainly in Dubrovnik. When friction arose in the new state Vojnović lost some of his popularity among the Croats, but gained in fame among the Serbs, who in 1927 elected him to their Academy and arranged a celebration in Belgrade of his 70th birthday. Vojnović died in a sanitarium in Belgrade. He received a state funeral, after which his body was buried in St. Michael's Cemetery near Dubrovnik.

Vojnović was a man of intense literary temperament, but of rather limited creative power. He did two things with special skill: he portrayed the life of Dubrovnik and its environs, and he paid tribute to motherly devotion and heroism. His far from copious writings consist of seven stories, the longest of which contains less than 150 small pages, of a few sonnets and other lyric poems, and of 15 dramas, seven of which are short one-act plays. In Geranium (1880), his first bit of fiction, using a technique imitated from Flaubert, Zola, and Daudet (qq.v.), he tells the story of an old maid living near Dubrovnik. The tale foreshadows his whole literary career. He was a product of cosmopolitan culture, showing continually the influence of foreign masters, but he was deeply attached to his own people, to the Serbs as well as to the Croats. His first drama, Psyche (1889), is a society comedy of the same type as those by Augier or by Dumas filis; the scene is laid in Vienna, and the characters are Polish, English, and Italian. Its success on the Zagreb stage determined his later activity; henceforth he devoted himself almost exclusively to the drama. The already-mentioned Ekvinocijo, a melodrama of life on the Dubrovnik coast, is the first of the works on which his fame depends. The plot turns on the love rivalry between a father and his illegitimate son; the father is murdered by the woman whom long ago he betrayed and who, despite her sudden crime, wins our admiration. An equinoctial storm symbolizes the conflict of human passions. Certain details show the influence of Ibsen (q.v.).

Dubrovačka trilogija (1902; Eng. tr., A Trilogy of Dubrovnik, 1921) is the masterpiece of Vojnović. The tiny commercial republic of Dubrovnik for centuries maintained its independence against both Turks and Venetians; its people were divided into a small, haughty, highly cultured aristocracy and a toiling populace. The Trilogy—of which the motto might be, "Men are we, and must grieve when even the Shade of that which once was great, is passed away"—includes three one-act plays; the action takes place in 1806, 1832, and 1900. In the first, Allons enfants! (Eng. tr., "The Dying Republic," Slavonic Review, Vol. I, 1922–1923), the patrician Orsat vainly exhorts his fellow nobles to resist the French army advancing on the city; when he fails he and his beloved Deša renounce marriage, refusing to raise children who must be slaves of a foreign power. Similar invincible—and futile—pride of race runs through the other two dramas. An epilogue in sonnet form tells of the Dubrovnik patricians moldering in St. Michael's Cemetery. Two propaganda plays, Smrt majke Jugovića (1907; The Death of the Mother of the Jugovići) and Lazarevo vaskrsenje (1913; Eng. tr., "The Resurrection of Lazarus," Poet Lore, Vol. XXXVII, 1926), glorify the heroic resistance of the Serbs to the Turks at the battle of Kosovo in 1389 and in our own times, shortly before the First Balkan War of 1912-1913. The first, written in verse, is based on the Serbian popular ballads, lines of which are woven into the text. Each drama glorifies motherly heroism as well as patriotism. Gospodja sa suncokretom (1912; The Lady with the Sunflower), on the other hand, is a decadent cosmopolitan play with an atmosphere reminiscent of D'Annunzio (q.v.). Imperatrix (1914; printed 1919) is a symbolic play glorifying mother love and protesting against war. Further dramas, Maškarate ispod kuplja (1922; Masquerades in an Attic) and Prolog nenapisane drame (1929; A Prologue to an Unwritten Drama), show the influence of Maeterlinck and of Pirandello (qq.v.). In all his work Vojnović displays brilliant gifts of style; to this in his best plays he adds fine ability in the drawing of character and in dramatic construction. These plays entitle him to a high place, probably the highest place, among dramatists writing in Serbo-Croatian.

See: E. Aničkov, "Les Méditations poétiques d'Ivo Vojnovic," Monde slave, 1928, No. 4, 52-76; A. Venzelides, "The Plays of Ivo Vojnović," Slavonic Review, VIII (1929-1930), 368-374; J. Golabek, Ivo Vojnović (1932).

G. R. N.

Vollmoeller, Karl Gustav (1878-, German poet and dramatist), was born in Stuttgart, of a wealthy manufacturer's family, studied archaeology and classical philology in Paris, Berlin, Athens, and Bonn, and has lived in Italy. A great part of his life was spent in traveling. He first belonged to Stefan George's (q.v.) circle and contributed to Blätter für die Kunst. This early poetry, abounding in beautiful images, sounds, and rhythm, is collected in Parcival, die frühen Gärten (1903). Later he wrote dramas in the same exaggerated neo-romantic style; a mixture of brutal plot and exuberant lyricism characterizes Catherina, Gräfin von Armagnac und ihre beiden Liebhaber (1904) and Assüs, Fitne und Sumurud (1906). He tried to be more realistic in the didactic legend Der deutsche Graf (1906) and in Wieland (1911), the first play in world literature about a flyer. The success he was not able to achieve with his pretentious tragedies came to him with the popular pantomime Das Mirakel (1912), a pageant-like dramatization of the old legend of the nun who goes temporarily into the world and whose place is meanwhile taken by the Madonna. Max Reinhardt, with the magic of enchanting settings, costumes, and masses in movement and with a group of distinguished actors, carried Das Mirakel through Germany and England as well as to the United States, where the play, set in the gigantic and picturesque decorations by Norman Bel Geddes, was the sensation of New York in 1924. His comedy, Cocktail (1930), and the historical drama, La Paiva (1931), did not receive as much acclaim as his versions of Turandot (1911) and George Dandin (1912) and especially his translation of Aeschylus' Oresteia (1908).

K. P.

Voloshin, Maximilian Aleksandrovich (full name, Maximilian Aleksandrovich Kirienko-Voloshin, 1877-1932, Russian poet, critic, painter, and translator), was born of a noble family at Kiev, spent his childhood in Crimea, and received his education at Moscow. In 1900 he was expelled from the university for participating in "student disorders" and exiled for six months to Tashkent. Until his final return in 1917 to Koktebel, he traveled and lived a great deal abroad. Contact with the West developed his interest in Catholicism and Latin culture and kept him abreast of the current theories of literature and art, for Voloshin was a painter as well as a man of letters. He translated Verhaeren, Henri de Régnier, Barbey d'Aurevilly (qq.v.), and wrote many articles on art and French literature, some of which were collected as Liki tvorchestva (1914; The Faces of Creativeness). Voloshin's poetry, which he began to contribute to Russian symbolist periodicals about 1900, is indebted to French models; in particular, the polished form and visual appeal of his verse remind one of Heredia (q.v.). Returning to Russia (1909), he became an active collaborator in Apollon (Apollo), the organ of the "Acmeists." The publication of his first volume of collected verse established his reputation (1910). The Revolution caused great changes in Voloshin's poetry. Russia and Russian history crowded out esoteric themes; in vigorous verse he indicted the dark forces of destruction and prayed for a spiritual rebirth of his native country (Demony glukhonemyie, 1919; The Deaf-mute Demons). After the civil war he found himself at odds with his Soviet environment, and appears to have published nothing after 1925.

See: B. Deutsch and A. Yarmolinsky, Russian Poetry; an Anthology (1927); "Voloshin," in Literaturnaya entsiklopediya, Vol. I (1929); M. Tsvetayeva, "Zhivoye o zhivom," Sovremennyya zapiski, LII (1933), 238-261, LIII (1933), 215-250.

P. A. P.

Vrchlický, Jaroslav (pseud. of Emil Frida, 1853-1912, Czech poet and dramatist), is the dominant literary figure of the second half of the 19th century in Bohemia. His work is a library in itself: he wrote some 85 volumes of poetry, about 35 plays, and poetic translations filling about 100 volumes. Born in Louny (northwestern Bohemia), the son of a poor tradesman, he studied history at the University of Prague and traveled in Italy as a tutor in 1875-1876. Later he became secretary to the Czech Institute of Technology. In 1893 he was appointed professor of comparative literature in the Czech university at Prague. His health failed in 1908, and four years later he died, paralyzed, at Domažlice. In 1879 he had married Sofie Podlipská, a niece of the writer Karolina Světlá (q.v.).

Vrchlický's historical importance cannot be overrated: he definitely broke away from German romantic influences, creating in Czech poetry a new tradition modeled on the achievements of Victor Hugo and also on those of the French Parnassians. He introduced an enormous variety of new themes and forms from all over the world and tried to write a Czech "Legend of the Ages" which gives in innumerable volumes a whole poetic history of the world. The sheer brilliance of his diction, his generous faith in the future of humanity, the panoramic view of world history, the neopagan morality, the vivid coloring of his grandiose visions, the long cadences of his verse, amazed his contemporaries and made Vrchlický easily the foremost Czech poet of the 70's and 80's. In his best pieces contained in such collections as Epické básně (1876; Epical poems), Duch a svět (1878; Spirit and the World), Myty (2 vols., 1879-1880; Myths), and Zlomky epopeje (1886; Fragments of an Epopee), Vrchlický created an effective Czech analogue to the best in Hugo and Leconte de Lisle. But he failed in his more ambitious attempts to give new epic versions of Faustian themes, as in Hilarion (1882), Twardowski (1885), and Bar Kochba (1897).

Vrchlický is at his best as an intimate lyrical poet of love and nature. His development from the sensuous verse in praise of his own early married love to a concise, hard, and chaste expression of the ultimate tragedy of life eventually freed him from the shackles of his rhetoric and led him back to a style firmly rooted in the native tradition of intimate lyricism. Especially his last collections (Strom života, 1909, The Tree of Life, and Meč Damoklův, 1912, The Sword of Damocles), written under the shadow of approaching death, show a new simplicity of expression, a deepening of tone, a greater clarity of form.

Vrchlický's work as a translator of poetry was also of great importance. He always translated in the exact measures of the originals, however complicated, with great skill and verve, though his overproduction sometimes led him into careless routine performances. He translated practically the entire poetical works of Hugo, Leconte de Lisle, and Vigny, the whole of Dante's The Divine Comedy in terza rima, Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, most of Leopardi and Carducci (q.v.), some 15 plays of Calderón, both parts of Goethe's Faust, and any number of lyrics from other literatures, including secondhand translations from Persian and Chinese. His translations from English include selections from Browning, Byron, Poe, Swinburne, Whitman, Shelley's Prometheus Unbound, and Shakespeare's Sonnets.

Vrchlický also wrote much literary criticism, of the "appreciative" type. His enthusiastic studies of Hugo, Carducci, Leopardi, etc., were important introductions to a world remote from Czechs of his time. Vrchlický was least successful as a dramatist. Many of his plays are lifeless closet dramas, but two, a pseudo-Euripidean trilogy, Hippodamie (1883-1890), especially effective with the music of Zdeněk Fibich, and a comedy, Noc na Karlštejně (1884; A Night on Karlstein), have held the stage.

Vrchlický's brilliant rhetoric, his easy handling of complex verse forms such as sonnets, rondels and sestina, his optimistic pantheism, his strong faith in the future of humanity, his wide range of topics and avid interest in remote countries and ages—all this was at first admired uncritically, but soon evoked sharp reactions. His eclecticism in themes and forms, his faith in progress, came to be rejected by a more fastidious and skeptical generation. Recent critics, however, stress the less flashy side of Vrchlický's work: the expression of his intimate tragedy, the final return to a more chaste and simple diction which continues the tradition of Czech romantic poetry. Vrchlický has suffered from the very vastness of his work and from a lack of self-criticism. But a good anthology like that by Arne Novák (1933), which excludes the derivative and the purely rhetorical, reveals amazing riches and shows him the greatest Czech poet of the 19th century.

See: A. Jensen, Jaroslav Vrchlický (1905, in Swedish); J. Borecký, Jaroslav Vrchlický (1906); F. V. Krejčí, Jaroslav Vrchlický (1913); F. X. Šalda, "Jaroslav Vrchlický," in Duše a dílo (1913) and introduction to Dopisy Jaroslava Vrchlického Žofii Podlipské (1917). Společnost Jaroslava Vrchlického, a Vrchlický society, has published annuals since 1915. There are German anthologies by Eduard Albert (1893) and Friedrich Adler (1895).

R. W.

W

Waggerl, Karl Heinrich (1897–, German novelist), established his reputation with his first book Brot (1930; Eng. tr., Bread, 1931), and his public has grown with each of his successive novels. Waggerl was born and grew up in Bad Gastein and lives in Wagrain near Salzburg. The poverty of his family forced the boy to operate a hotel elevator, but later means were found to send him to school and prepare him to become a teacher. The hardships of his youth and his captivity in Italy during the First World War undermined his health and prevented him from resuming his teaching. In the picturesque Alpine village he composes his delightful books and pursues his "fourteen hobbies"—he is a master of many skills, photography, drawing, wood carving, hand-hammered metalwork, furniture design, and, above all, bookbinding. With the craftsman's knowledge Waggerl writes of the activities that make up village and farm life in his beloved mountains. Out of the fullness and intimacy of his own observation he portrays the daily and seasonal occupations of his people; with the same understanding and attention to vivid detail he narrates also the manifestations of their inner life, their frailties and virtues, in his genial charity never confusing the misdeed with the doer. It is not without significance that his first novel bore the title Brot and that subsequent novels bear the titles Das Jahr des Herrn (1934) and Mütter (1936), for bread and the farmer's year, motherhood and the "year of the Lord," constitute and frame the life of the peasant villager. In Das Jahr des Herrn worship and the Church's ministrations and festivals accompany, hallow, and round out the farmer's year. Bread, children, and freedom of the will in shaping man's destiny—how different from the old naturalistic treatment of such "problems" is Waggerl's understanding of existence and of parenthood. The dark side of life is not wanting. Though Waggerl's people are simple folk, they are in some senses just as complex as their "betters" and just as prone to transgress. The totality of life with the interrelations between individuals, children as sympathetically and as delightfully drawn as those of Booth Tarkington, the problems of chance and of character presented with thoughtful humor and quiet fun—these are Waggerl's subjects. They are treated with a delicate literary art.

See: L. Biermer, "Karl Heinrich Waggerl" (with biography and bibliography), Die neue Literatur, XXXVI (1935), 316–324; H. Arens, Karl Heinrich Waggerl (1938).

J. F. G.

Wägner, Elin (1882–, Swedish novelist and feminist), was born at Lund in the south of Sweden, but her childhood and much of her later life has been spent in Småland in south central Sweden, where also much of her best fiction finds its natural locale. Her first novels (Norrtullsligan, 1908, The North Toll Set; Pennskaftet, 1910, The Penholder; Helga Wisbeck, 1913) deal primarily, however, with urban conditions, particularly with self-supporting young women of the working classes and professions in Stockholm. Though these are "program novels," with a strenuous feminist point of view, they are lively and clear-headed in their fanatical devotion to the contemporary concept of feminine solidarity, and the style, a sharp, clear literary-journalese, sparkles with irony and pointed witticisms, almost invariably at the expense of men. Unlike Sigrid Undset's (q.v.) contemporaneous novels on young working women of Christiania (Jenny, etc.), Elin Wägner's early novels are much more concerned with feminism as an economic, social, and political problem than they are with fundamental psychological and moral problems. Elin Wägner's later development, however, leads more and more deeply into certain central moral and religious problems: first, in a series of family novels (Släkten Jerneploogs framgång, 1916, The Success of the Jerneploogs; Silverforsen, 1924, The Silver Rapids; etc.) in the manner of the contemporary English family novel; and then in that series of Småland novels (Åsa-Hanna, 1918; Den namnlösa, 1922, The Nameless One; and Svalorna flyga högt, 1930, The Swallows Fly High) for which she is chiefly famous. The most significant of the Småland novels is Åsa-Hanna, next to Selma Lagerlöf's (q.v.) Jerusalem and Vilhelm Moberg's (q.v.) later Knut Toring trilogy perhaps the best peasant novel in Swedish literature. Åsa-Hanna is at one and the same time a fascinating study in feminine character and a broad, detailed, sensitive treatment of a whole peasant culture in all of its ancient, deep-rooted ramifications. In 1941 Elin Wägner published Väckarklocka (Alarm Clock), an arresting indictment of the failure of women to exercise any salutary determining moral influence upon a morally disintegrating world; and in the years 1942-1943 appeared the two volumes of her warmly human biography of her great countrywoman, Selma Lagerlöf.

See: F. Böök, Resa kring svenska Parnassen (1926), pp. 237-248; K. Strömberg, Modern svensk litteratur (1932), pp. 170-175; M. Lindqvist, Människor (1938), pp. 27-49.

A. G.

Wagner, Richard (1813-1883, German dramatic composer), was born in Leipzig, the ninth child of Friedrich Wagner, not, as some maintain, the natural son of the actor and painter Ludwig Geyer. Friedrich Wagner died when Richard was six months old. Geyer married the widow and gave the family a new home in Dresden. After Geyer's death in 1821 the family returned to Leipzig, where Wagner in his 15th year heard Beethoven's music to Goethe's Egmont and was so impressed that he determined to compose music to his own first dramatic attempt, a blood-dripping tragedy, Leubald und Adelaide (1828). In school he had shown no musical talent; his tastes were solely literary, his chief interest the classics. Wagner's classical training and his later intensive study of Greek drama determined his subsequent epoch-making conception of the tone drama. His interest in music once aroused through literature, he set out to conquer composition by himself; but fortunately he found a teacher who in six months' instruction, based on analysis of Mozart's and Beethoven's masterpieces, gave him the command of that musical idiom which he perfected in Tristan and the Ring. In 1833 he began his professional career as chorus master of the Würzburg opera company. Here he composed his first opera, Die Feen (1834). He drifted now from one bankrupt opera company to another. At Magdeburg his Liebesverbot, an immature work in the spirit of Das Junge Deutschland and patterned after Measure for Measure, was composed in 1836. In the hope of conquering the German stage via Paris and the Meyerbeerian grand opera, Wagner spent three years of want and discouragement in the French capital. As there seemed no hope of placing his Rienzi, he abandoned the old type opera and completed Der fliegende Holländer in seven weeks (1841). He recognized the novelty of his attempt to create a new art form in which music should not be primarily an entertainment but should derive from and interpret a true drama, and he wrote: "Here begins my career as poet; I cease to be a concocter of opera librettos."

Wagner returned to Dresden, where in 1842 Rienzi was produced with great success. Fame and fortune seemed assured. To the bitter disappointment of his wife, the actress Minna Planer, Wagner continued the reforms begun with the Holländer. At Paris he had read widely in the literature of medieval Germany. This study and his Parisian sojourn had convinced him that his nature was essentially German and that only Germanic sources could inspire him to supreme artistic creation. In Tannhäuser (1845) Wagner, on the background of the dull Wartburgkrieg and the Tannhäuser legend, created a powerful psychological love drama in which, as so often in his works, redemption is achieved through a woman's self-sacrificing love. Lohengrin, a modernization of the Zeus and Semele theme based on the medieval swan-knight legend, had its première under Liszt at Weimar in 1850, after Wagner had fled from Dresden on account of his participation in the May revolution of 1849. In 1848 he had wavered between spoken drama with a historical theme (Friedrich Barbarossa) and a musical treatment of the Siegfried myth. He chose mythical rather than historical sources for his following works (with the exception of Die Meistersinger, produced in 1868) and documented this decision in a series of expository and propagandistic prose works to which the first years of his banishment at Zurich were devoted and which, especially his Oper und Drama (1851), elaborate his theories of the new "tone drama." He hoped to create a drama wherein as in Attic tragedy the separate arts should be united in an artistic whole. Unfortunately Wagner's prose style, largely influenced by the philosopher Feuerbach, is often nebulous or ponderous. Meanwhile the original Siegfried's Tod (1848) was being expanded into the Ring tetralogy. Unlike Hebbel who in writing his drama used only the Middle High German Nibelungenlied, Wagner chose the Scandinavian Eddic poems and the Volsunga Saga and gave a mythical rather than a historical interpretation. The old world of Wotan and Valhalla must perish, a victim of its dishonest greed and lust for power. G. B. Shaw could well call the Ring "the work of a social revolutionary." But exaggerated use of alliteration, verbosity, and inconsistencies would have prevented success were it not for the power and wealth of the music. Here the leitmotif, Wagner's new type of musical pattern, is perfected and masterfully employed. By 1857 Das Rheingold, Die Walküre, and the first part of Siegfried were completed, but Wagner, abandoning hope of any performance of the stupendous cycle and convinced that a single opera might more easily be given a hearing, at the same time inspired by his love for Mathilde Wesendonk and engrossed in Schopenhauer's doctrine of renunciation, turned to the story of Tristan und Isolde (completed in 1859). In seeking the ethical kernel he transformed a medieval triangle narrative into a drama of ethical as well as musical sublimity.

The accession to the Bavarian throne of the youthful king, Ludwig, who had been captivated by Wagner's music and ideas, inaugurated a new era for the composer who now became the friend and guest of a monarch. In 1868 Wagner sat in the royal box with Ludwig to witness the première of Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, that inspired study of renunciation combined with the symbolical depiction of the eternal conflict of genius and caviling pedantry. Court jealousies, Wagner's indiscretions, his liaison with Cosima, Bülow's wife (daughter of Liszt), necessitated his departure to Tribschen near Lucerne, where he resided until 1872. In that year Bayreuth became his permanent home, and in 1876 it was the scene of the festival performances of the entire Ring des Nibelungen. After the performance in 1882 of his last work, Parsifal, he went to Venice and there succumbed to a heart attack on February 13, 1883.

Idolized by friends and bitterly attacked by hostile critics, Wagner was all artist, actuated by a demoniac creative urge brooking no opposition, unwilling to compromise with mediocrity, demanding surroundings sybaritic in their luxury, and subordinating everything to his single creative purpose. Not always of complete integrity in his private life, he presented in his tone dramas the highest ethical values, especially the themes of renunciation and of redemption. Parsifal, which embodies Wagner's conceptions of Christian and Buddhist purity, represents Christlike redemption through self-sacrifice and understanding sympathy. This "sinking down at the foot of the Cross" was largely responsible for Nietzsche's (q.v.) defection from his formerly beloved and admired master.

Wagner's operatic reforms include the requirement that the text be a consistent drama and form a perfect unity with the interpreting, not merely accompanying, orchestra and the stage picture. Poetic language should harmonize with the nature of the drama. Stylistic unity is attained by the skillful use of the leitmotif. All this was demonstrated in the model festival performances at Bayreuth. Their influence and that of Wagner's music and theories in general have been enormous on all aspects of 19th-century culture. In France in particular, from Baudelaire, Wagner's first staunch advocate, to Claudel (qq.v.), writers as well as musicians have been affected. Gide (q.v.), in describing one literary circle, says, "Wagner was their God." Rolland and Proust (qq.v.) represent the height of this influence, which was potent with the prose writers as well as the lyric poets.

See: H. S. Chamberlain, Richard Wagner (1896; Eng. tr., 1897); Max Koch, Richard Wagner (3 vols., 1907-1918); W. J. Henderson, Richard Wagner; His Life and His Dramas (2d ed., revised, 1923); Ernest Newman, The Life of Richard Wagner (4 vols. published 1933-1946); Thomas Mann, Freud, Goethe, Wagner (1937, in English).

P. R. P.

Walschap, Gerard (1898-, Flemish novelist), was born at Londerzeel. After work as a journalist he became inspector of public libraries. He made his debut in literature with dramas written in collaboration with Frans Delbeke. In 1928 appeared his first novel, Waldo, a disjointed book, which gave no indication that he would come to the fore in the following year, 1929, with a masterpiece, Adelaide, the first part of a trilogy which was completed by Eric (1930) and Carla (1931). In 1939 these novels appeared in one volume under the title De Familie Roothoofd (The Roothoofd Family). Walschap has for some time written at least one novel every year. After Adelaide his best works are Sybille (1934) and Houtekiet (1935).

Gerard Walschap is an entirely new phenomenon. From Adelaide on, he manifested an individual and strongly personal style which is characterized by two qualities, conciseness and suggestive power. He is a sharp analyst of the human soul and chooses unusual, timid, tormented, eccentric persons and strange situations. He is generally recognized among the younger authors in Flanders as the most important and most original novelist.

J. G.

Wassermann, Jakob (1873-1934, German novelist), was born in Fürth, near Nuremberg. From 1898 until his death he resided in Austria, first in Vienna and later at Alt-Aussee in Styria. His childhood was unhappy, in the army he was treated with scorn, as a young man he lived in Munich on the verge of starvation. Beginning with 1896, short stories and poems of his were published in the magazine Simplicissimus. With Die Juden von Zirndorf (1897; Eng. tr., The Dark Pilgrimage, 1933) began the long series of novels and Novellen that made him widely known in Europe and America. His travels took him to various European countries, Africa, and the United States. During his later years he was in demand as a lecturer throughout Europe. As a Jewish liberal, to whom life in a true democracy seemed the only dignified form of human existence, he was dropped from membership in the Prussian Academy of Letters in 1933 with the advent of National Socialism. Among his friends Wassermann counted the pianist Busoni and numerous authors, Richard Dehmelt, Alfred Döblin, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Thomas Mann, and Arthur Schnitzler (qq.v.).

Primarily a narrator with the imagination of an oriental fabulist, Wassermann also wrote a few short and undistinguished plays, numerous critical essays, biographies of Christopher Columbus (1929; Eng. tr., 1930) and Henry Morton Stanley (Bula Matari, 1932; Eng. tr., H. M. Stanley, Explorer, 1932, American title, Bula Matari, 1933), and two autobiographical sketches, Mein Weg als Deutscher und Jude (1921; Eng. tr., My Life as German and Jew, 1933) and Selbstbetrachtungen (1933).

In the late 20's and early 30's Wassermann was one of the world's most widely read and translated novelists. Since many of his narratives stress ideas, general problems, and human relationships and are not rooted in German soil, tradition, and customs, they are readily understood by people of different tongues. There are historical narratives, novels of subtle psychological analysis, social novels, imaginative tales, and stories of the First World War and its aftermath. His characters represent various strata of society; frequently they are eccentric, crotchety, impractical, ill-adjusted beings who lead lonely lives of inner torment. Many of them reflect the author's belief that human nature is mysteriously complex and unfathomable. Romantic fancy alternates with crassly realistic portrayal of ugliness and vice. Among numerous recurring motifs are the theme of justice, the general problem of evil, man's slothful indifference to the lot of his fellows, the conflicting views of the older and younger generations, the difficulties confronting post-war youth in Germany, the plight of the Jew, the cruel treatment of criminals in penal institutions, woman's sphere of activity. Such motifs and the author's sense of social mission sometimes stand out too baldly to produce an artistic, harmonious effect. As a result Wassermann's work is of uneven quality. Some of his narratives are of almost exemplary compactness; others are loosely constructed, complex, overcrowded with sensational episodes. Some are couched in simple, refined, restrained diction, while others are marred by extravagance, exaggeration, and violent antitheses. Some are written with objectivity and artistic detachment; others reveal him as an exhorter who would speed social reform by portraying and unmasking human abuses and man's inhumanity to man. As a writer with a strong messianic urge and of great moral earnestness, he aimed to present the deeper significance of life.

Some of Wassermann's more important works are Caspar Hauser (1908; Eng. tr., 1928), Das Gänsemännchen (1915; Eng. tr., The Goose Man, 1922), Christian Wahnschaffe (1918; Eng. tr., The World's Illusion, 1920), Ulrike Woytich (1923; Eng. tr., Gold, 1924), Der Aufruhr um den Junker Ernst (1926; Eng. tr., The Triumph of Youth, 1927), and Der Fall Maurizius (1928; Eng. tr., The Maurizius Case, 1929).

See: S. Bing, Jakob Wassermann (1933); M.

Karlweis, Jakob Wassermann (1935); J. C. Blankenagel, The Writings of Jakob Wassermann (1942).

J. C. B.

Wasylewski, Stanisław (1885–, Polish essayist), was born in Stanisławów, at the eastern extremity of Austrian Poland, of old and distinguished gentry stock long rooted in the Border. He began his literary career as a theatrical reporter on the Lwów Gazeta wieczorna (Evening Gazette) in 1910. After two years with the Polish legions (1915–1917), he founded, and edited from 1918 to 1921, the satirical journal Szczutek (Fillip), getting his start in the meantime in the field of the literary-historical essay thanks to the vision and enterprise of the distinguished Poznań publisher Rudolf Wegner, who issued his first efforts in this field under the title U księżnej pani (1917; With Her Highness). From that time until the end of Free Poland there flowed from Wasylewski's pen an uninterrupted stream of essays "pleasant yet profound," in which were revealed the private lives, habits, and sentiments of a wide variety of figures, from the ladies of King Stanisław's court (Na dworze Króla Stasia, 1919), from the personalities who made Lwów unique in the 19th century (Bardzo przyjemny miasto, 1927, A Charming Town, and Niezapisany stan służby, 1937, An Unrecorded Condition of Service), to the cloistered Queen Cunegunda (Ducissa Cunegundis, 1923) and many others. Often referred to as the Polish Goncourt, Wasylewski owed more in the way of inspiration to Władysław Łoziński (see Polish literature), like himself a Lvovian, than to any other.

See: K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 155–160; Wasylewski, Niezapisany stan służby (1937).

A. P. C.

Wedekind, Frank (Benjamin Franklin) (1864–1918, German dramatist), was born in Hanover a few months after the return of his parents from America. His emotional intensity and his love of the exotic were a natural heritage: the wanderings of his physician father, a fierce democrat who worshiped Washington and hated Bismarck, extended as widely as Turkey and California; it was in San Francisco that he married a young German actress half his age. Wedekind grew up in Switzerland but spent his maturer years in Germany, where he was variously journalist, playwright, and actor. Political poems published in the satirical magazine

Simplicissimus resulted in 1899 in his conviction and imprisonment for lèse-majesté.

The keynote of Wedekind's work is eroticism. This is not poetic dalliance with the tender passion, however, for Wedekind sees love as the elemental driving force to which we are all enslaved. To cover up our slavery we practice hypocrisies, and Wedekind, like Friedrich Schlegel in his Lucinde days, felt called on to attack this ostrich policy of his fellow men. The Mephistophelean Wedekind cuts a queer figure among the moralists, but however paradoxical he and his works are, no one can doubt his serious intentions. In "Über die Erotik," a preface to his stories in Feuerwerk (1905), he sets forth the problem. "Der Brand von Egliswyl" in this volume is an effective example of the power of love. Frühlings Erwachen (1891; Eng. tr., The Awakening of Spring, 1909), Wedekind's first success and one of his most poetic plays, arraigns the adult world for its misunderstanding and mismanagement of children at puberty. Karl Hetmann, in the drama of that name (1904; first called Hidalla), is a fantastic moralist bent on reforming society. Indeed, every work of Wedekind is a thrust at the shams of society, among which moral hypocrisy is the chief.

Wedekind's most notorious creation is his rather appalling version of the eternal feminine whom he presents as the real earth spirit. She is generally known as Lulu, but she answers to any name of Eve's daughters. Through the two dramas Der Erdgeist (1895; Eng. tr., Earth Spirit, 1914) and Die Büchse der Pandora (1903; Eng. tr., Pandora's Box, 1918) she runs her course, consuming one man after another until Jack the Ripper puts an end to her. This ageless, amoral incarnation of the sex urge lives in a seething mass of evil and gets down to the dregs of life, but she remains essentially natural and unchanged. Such triumph of primitive nature over civilization is the formula for all Wedekind's work. In Schloss Wetterstein (1910) Effie, a lesser Lulu, also makes prostitution on a grand scale her career, and dies at the hands of a pervert. Franziska, in the drama of that name (1912), is a variation of the type. She is a feminine Faust experimenting with love and life at their various levels and—unique ending for Wedekind—finding happiness at last in simple domestic love. Wedekind calls this play a modern mystery.

Woman is not always the protagonist, nor is love the exclusive theme: Wedekind has a predilection for men on the lunatic fringe who lead an existence that, in the eyes of society, is decidedly shady. They, too, are "naturals." The masterpiece in this vein is Der Marquis von Keith (1901). Here the hero with his spurious title of nobility is a soldier of fortune, a swindler whose calculations go awry and who at the last curtain, faced with the choice between a revolver and a monetary sop tossed him by his successful rival, grins and takes the money. Into this play the author has smuggled an even weirder collection of people than usual who, in the Wedekind manner, come and go with a happy disregard for probability. Cold, calculating self-interest again inspires Gerardo in Der Kammersänger (1899; Eng. tr., Heart of a Tenor, 1913), a one-act tragicomedy and Wedekind's most effective and popular work, but, unlike Keith, this quondam paperhanger and now operatic tenor and slave to his art is overwhelmed by success. Wedekind erected a real monument to the tragedy of the artist in König Nicolo (1902). The deposed king suffers many humiliations, even to becoming his successor's court fool, but his kingship remains truly inalienable. The play was written in the depression following his imprisonment and is perhaps the most heartfelt of all Wedekind's charges against his fellow man.

Wedekind stood alone in his time. He refused to have truck with the naturalists, and his kind of romanticism had little in common with the prevailing brand. He was a forerunner of expressionism.

See: A. Kutscher, Frank Wedekind (3 vols., 1922-1931).

H. W. P.

Wehner, Josef Magnus (1891-, German novelist), was born in Bernbach in the Rhön Mountains (Hesse-Nassau), the son of a village teacher. He studied in Jena and Munich and wanted to become an actor. In the First World War he was severely wounded. He lives in Munich and is editor of the Münchener neuste Nachrichten.

Wehner began his literary career in 1921 with Der Weiler Gottes, a story in hexameters, praising the Catholic milieu of his Rhön country. Up to 1930 most of his stories were "Heimatkunst," e.g., Der blaue Berg; Geschichte einer Jugend (1922) and Die Hochzeitskuh; Roman einer jungen Liebe (1928). In another manner are Die mächtigste Frau; phantastische Novellen (1923) and Struensee (1924). After years of limited success he became famous through his war novel Sieben vor Verdun (1930). With its glorification of military heroism, the book made him one of the favorite authors of the Nazi regime.

He followed up his success by Stadt und Festung Belgerad (1936), which describes the adventures of the heroes of his Verdun book in the Serbian campaign of 1915. He has written patriotic books for children, A. L. Schlageter (1934) and Hindenburg (1935). A collection of essays and speeches was published under the title Das unsterbliche Reich (1933).

See: H. Brandenburg, "Josef Magnus Wehner," in Die schöne Literatur, XXXVIII (1929), 49-54; K. Kamp, Die Haltung des Frontkämpfers (1940) W. K. Pfeiler, War and the German Mind (1941), pp. 216-227.

W. R. G.

Weigand, Wilhelm (1862-, German poet, novelist, and dramatist), was born at Gissenheim in Baden, but early found a congenial home in Munich. There since 1889 he has led a quiet life only occasionally interrupted by trips to the North Sea or the Mediterranean. Although to some extent Weigand can be classified among the neo-romantics, he essentially belongs in the older Munich tradition represented by Paul Heyse and Isolde Kurz (qq.v.). From the beginning Weigand has been a consistent enemy of radical naturalism (see German naturalism) and instead has always extolled the aristocratic culture of France and Italy of the Renaissance. He started his literary career with several plays; those treating historical subjects (Florian Geyer, 1901; Die Renaissance, 1899) are superior to those dealing with contemporary matters. But Weigand will chiefly be remembered for his novels (Die Frankenthaler, 1889; Die Löffelstelze, 1919) and short stories (Von festlichen Tischen, 1928). In an exquisite style generously tinged with quiet humor and sometimes reminiscent of Gottfried Keller (q.v.), Weigand depicts life in old Franconia and Bavaria. As a lyric poet he has excelled in intimate nature portraits; after the death of his wife a deeper note was added (see Der verschlossene Garten, 1909).

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, 19. Auflage (1928), pp. 734-741.

E. R.

Weinheber, Josef (1892-, Austrian poet), was born in Vienna, the son of a butcher. Losing both parents early in life, he spent six loveless years in an orphanage (see his autobiographic novel, Das Waisenhaus, 1925), but was then taken in by an aunt, in whose home his first poems were written (Der einsame Mensch, 1920). In 1911 he obtained a position in the postal system, where he continued to earn his living for many years. To his profound disgust, the poems he wrote (Von beiden Ufern, 1923; Boot in der Bucht, 1926) were virtually ignored. At last the volume Adel und Untergang (1932; enlarged, 1934) attracted critical attention; with the award of the Mozart prize in 1935 he suddenly became famous, and critics vied with each other in praising him. With gentle irony he named the following book of poems Späte Krone (1936; cf. Späte Ernte by Wildgans, q.v.).

Weinheber's mastery of form is noted by all who mention him at all, and comparison with Hölderlin has become almost a commonplace. One might well call him a neoclassicist, provided this term is not taken to mean imitative dependence; it expresses rather his conscious espousal of formal perfection as one of the external manifestations of high artistry—as a sculptor might consciously emulate the great Greeks before proceeding to mold his own message in stone or bronze. Aside from this formal element, it seems hardly possible to reduce Weinheber's work to any common denominator. His utterance is impressive, often significant, always competent; his best poems achieve a rare beauty.

See: Adolf Luser, ed., Josef Weinheber; Persönlichkeit und Schaffen (1935).

B. Q. M.

Weiss, Jean Jacques (1827–1890, French critic, journalist, and historian), was born at Bayonne, Basses-Pyrénées, where his father, a bandmaster attached to a Swiss regiment, was then stationed. Weiss has related his recollections of his early youth in the preface to Le Théâtre et les mœurs (1889); his father moved from garrison to garrison with the various regiments he served, and the boy's education suffered. When the family came to Paris, young Weiss attended the Lycée Louis-le-Grand. He was then to have entered the military school of Saint-Cyr, but successes in his classical studies made him turn to the Ecole Normale Supérieure, where he obtained his agrégation in history. For a short time he taught history at the Lycée of La Rochelle. In 1855 he returned to Paris and prepared his Doctorat ès Lettres while writing for the press and from 1856 to 1868 occupied with marked success the chair of French literature at the University of Aix. Weiss joined the editorial staff of the Journal des débats as a political writer and contributed articles on literature also. He founded in 1867, with Edouard Hervé, the Journal de Paris, a liberal paper which sometimes got into difficulties with the government. In 1877 he opposed the establishment of the republic in articles signed X.Z., but accepted the republican form of government when it was adopted; he once more joined the opposition in 1879 and in his later years was managing editor of the Gaulois.

Weiss was a vigorous writer and, in belles-lettres as well as in politics, something of a free lance. His chief contributions to literary history are to be found in his Essais sur l'histoire de la littérature française (1865). He professed a great admiration for the society of Louis Philippe's time and regarded the succeeding period as decadent. The year 1857 seemed to him particularly objectionable; it was a year characterized by an unsound pragmatism (faux moralisme), the year of Barrière's Les Faux Bonshommes, of Baudelaire's (q.v.) Les Fleurs du mal, of Flaubert's (q.v.) Madame Bovary. His paradoxical arraignment of Flaubert's style is worth reading. He also contrasts Madame Bovary as a novel with Freytag's (q.v.) Soll und Haben. For a long time he remained true to his favorite age of romanticism. When Nisard began to belittle the romantics, Weiss took up the challenge, asserting that the classical age had been powerless to produce anything comparable to the works of the 18th century, more especially the writings of Voltaire and Rousseau. He even showed a partiality for such writers as Lesage and Gresset, the author of Ver-Vert. In discussing foreign literature he avers that since the French Revolution literature has become European rather than national and that Germany because of its Weltliteratur should be regarded as the "concertmaster." At the same time, however, he claims that no nation can outdo France in the matter of varied artistic production. Weiss's interest finally turned more especially to the theatre, as demonstrated in his Feuilletons de critique théâtrale (1883–1885).

See: B. Stirbey, J. J. Weiss, conférencier, chroniqueur de théâtre, journaliste, portraitiste, écrivain épistolaire (1910).

A. Sz.

Wennerberg, Gunnar (1817–1901, Swedish composer-poet), left his only significant mark on Swedish poetry as the creator of Gluntarne, most popular and original of all Swedish student songs. Born in Västergötland, where his father was a parish priest, the young Wennerberg came to Uppsala University in 1837, and remained there for the following 11 years. After this he settled down to a career in various departments of the civil service, which led ultimately to his holding some of the most important political positions in the kingdom. Upon coming to Uppsala he was of a rather serious religious temperament; but he was deeply interested in music, secular as well as sacred, and by a lucky accident in his last years at the university he became associated with a happy-go-lucky student group (juvenalerna) who spent a good deal of their time at gay musical improvisation, not infrequently under the influence of alcoholic potations. Gluntarne was directly inspired by Wennerberg's contact with this group, though most of the songs included in the collection as ultimately published in 1849 and 1850 were composed after juvenalerna had broken up. Gluntarne consists of 30 pieces, each a duet, sung in part as dialogue, the two singers being Glunten (bass) and Magistern (baritone). The songs, somewhat reminiscent of Bellman's matchless Stockholm ditties, deal with various sides of the student life of the day, its carefree camaraderie, its momentary trials, its relatively harmless bacchanalian excesses, all in keeping with the literary romanticism currently dominant at Uppsala. Both music and text were composed by Wennerberg. Aside from Gluntarne Wennerberg wrote a considerable body of verse, most of which, however, is of no particular consequence. Only Davids psalmer (1861–1887; Psalms of David), which give expression to Wennerberg's deep religious feelings, are of serious literary importance.

See: S. Taube, Gunnar Wennerberg (3 vols., 1913–1916); R. F. von Willebrand, "Gluntarne och deras skald," Finsk tidskrift, LXXXIII (1917).

A. G.

Werfel, Franz (1890–1945, Austrian novelist, dramatist, and poet), was born and reared in Prague. While connected with the Kurt Wolff publishing firm in Leipzig (1912–1914), he was cofounder of the important expressionist collection Der jüngste Tag, 1913–1921. From 1917 he lived in Vienna until driven out by the Nazi occupation of Austria. After the fall of France in 1940 he escaped to the United States.

Werfel's artistic development shows three phases, the first lyric, the second predominantly dramatic, and the third predominantly epic. Rilke and Whitman may have influenced his lyric, but he soon found his own style. In his poetry he first formulated his basic philosophical conceptions—his faith in a fraternization of humanity and his awareness of the omnipresence of the divine which led him to a transcendental interpretation of reality. Music was another source of his inspiration. Best known of the lyrical works are Der Weltfreund (1911), Wir sind (1913), Einander (1915), and Gerichtstag (1919). Forty-nine of Werfel's poetic compositions are translated in a small volume of Poems (1946). During his first period Werfel became the exponent of expressionism, and his version of Euripides' Troerinnen (1915) was a milestone in the history of the expressionist theatre. Of special importance was his polemic controversy with Kurt Hiller about the role of the poet in the world, in the yearbook Tätiger Geist (Munich, 1918). During his second period Werfel wrote a number of dramas which belong to the best of modern German dramatic literature, among them Spiegelmensch (1920), Juarez und Maximilian (1923; Eng. tr., Juarez and Maximilian, 1926), Paulus unter den Juden (1926), and Das Reich Gottes in Böhmen (1930).

But it was through his prose fiction that Werfel first attained international recognition. In Verdi; Roman der Oper (1924; Eng. tr., Verdi; a Novel of the Opera, 1925) Werfel paid tribute to the genius of pure music (see also his edition of Verdi's letters, 1926, and his version of Forza del destino, ca. 1930). Barbara oder die Frömmigkeit (1929; Eng. tr., The Pure in Heart, 1931) rather than the better-known Vierzig Tage des Musa Dag (2 vols., 1933; Eng. tr., The Forty Days of Musa Dag, 1934) is Werfel's war novel; in both works the problem of religion and race, which he had approached again and again after his Paulus drama, overshadows the war motif. Die Geschwister von Neapel (1931; Eng. tr., The Pascarella Family, 1932), epic tale of a family breaking up under the impact of modern times, is perhaps Werfel's purest prose work. An immediate result of Werfel's flight from Europe was his Lied der Bernadette (1941; Eng. tr., The Song of Bernadette, 1942), a tribute to the saint of Lourdes.

See: R. Specht, Franz Werfel (1926).

W. P.

Weyssenhoff, Józef (1860–1932, Polish novelist), was born at Kolano in Podlasie, Russian Poland, of Baltic baron stock long resident in the Eastern Border and thoroughly Polonized. He studied at the University of Dorpat (1884), then settled on an estate he had inherited in Lublin province (Samoklęski) to enjoy for a time the diversions of a country squire. Moving in 1891 to Warsaw, he became associated there with other conservatives and sybarites like himself in the famous Klub Myśliwski (Huntsman's Club). He began his literary career with translations from Heine (1888) and original poems, short stories, and literary reviews in the conservative Biblioteka warszawska (see Polish literature), of which he was literary editor. Weyssenhoff's reputation as a writer rests on two works: the finely satirical Żywot i myśli Zygmunta Podfilipskiego (1898; The Life and Sentiments of Zygmunt Podfilipski) and the magnificent prose poem extolling the beauties of Border life and especially of the chase, Soból i panna (1911; Eng. tr., The Sable and the Girl, 1929). "A Polish courtier" centuries out of his time, Weyssenhoff was unable to adjust himself to the post-war world. His roots were in pre-war feudal, patriarchal Poland and there his heart was also. He spent his last years in Bydgoszcz, northwestern Poland, a virtual hermit.

See: Z. Dębicki, Portrety, I (1927), 33-50; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, I (1934), 110-117, 349-351; A. Bogusławski, "Kobiety Weyssenhoffa," Wiadomości polskie (London), 1941, No. 46.

A. P. C.

Wiechert, Ernst (1887-, German novelist), was born in a lonely forester's home in East Prussia. In Wälder und Menschen (1936) he tells about his own childhood spent in close contact with nature, the great woods, the vast moors. These early impressions, together with his memories of his oversensitive, melancholy mother and the powerful hold which the stories of the Bible as well as the weird tales and fantastic legends of the countryside gained on the imaginative child, were to influence all his later writing. At the age of 11 he was sent to school in Königsberg, where he continued his academic studies and took his degree. Teaching in secondary schools left him dissatisfied. Preoccupation with outstanding Russian and Scandinavian writers increased his original leaning toward self-destructive criticism, and in his first novel, Die Flucht (1916), the hero significantly takes his own life.

The war did not brighten the young author's views. In his novel Jedermann (1931) he gave expression to the enervating experience of endless, despairing waiting, of emptiness and dull patience which scarred every soldier's mind. After the war he did not at first return to teaching but withdrew into the great woods of his homeland. His novels

Der Wald (1922) and Der Totenwolf (1924) reflect the chaotic violence of his reaction against post-war conditions and the spirit of the age. But he soon turned away from hatred and the cult of brutal strength and will power and sought redemption in the universal suffering of man from which love is born. Der Knecht Gottes Andreas Nyland (1926) tries to follow Christ's demands to the letter, the hero devoting himself, like Jakob Wassermann's (q.v.) Christian Wahnschaffe, to all that is miserable and ugly in order to redeem it through love. However, the abundance of human suffering overwhelms his sensitive soul—he realizes the smallness of his attempts and seeks refuge in the woods from the curse of civilization.

From then on, it has been Wiechert's foremost concern to reconcile his deep love of nature, his faith in life close to the soil, with the demands of Christian ethics. Again and again the problem of man's fight against man, be it in war, in politics, or in personal strife, is contrasted with and overcome by the quiet forces of nature which are in league with God. Outstanding among his short stories are Tobias (1932), the story of a student who commits a political murder and of his final confession and atonement under the relentless silent accusation of the peaceful life in the old mill and of his grandmother's old-fashioned faith in the Bible, and Hirtennovelle (1935), the tale of a boy-shepherd in a poor, remote village who leads the villagers to safety at their enemies' approach but dies trying to save a stray lamb. These two short stories show Wiechert at his best—his gift of imagery, his symbolic interpretation of reality, his intensity of mood and yet simplicity of expression.

Wiechert became best known through his novels Die Magd des Jürgen Doscozil (1932) and Die Majorin (1934; Eng. tr., The Baroness, 1936). The former is obviously influenced by Knut Hamsun's (q.v.) Growth of the Soil. It is best in its descriptions of primitive living, less convincing in its somewhat sensational plot. Die Majorin, psychologically more interesting, deals with the fate of two people, representative of the age, the major's widow, disillusioned and lonely yet bravely administering her estate, and Michael, the soldier, returned from years of war and imprisonment, bitter, burnt out, uprooted. The central problem of the novel, the woman's struggle to win this man back to life, is handled with great tact; characters are fitted into the surrounding landscape as parts of one unified mode of existence.

See: H. Ebeling, Ernst Wiechert; der Weg eines Dichters (1937).

E. M. F.

Wied, Gustav Johannes (1858–1914, Danish novelist, dramatist), one of the great humorists in a distinguished comic tradition, was born at Holmegaard, a large farm near Nakskov on the island of Lolland. He died by his own hand a few months after the outbreak of the First World War. His father was a practical, progressive farmer. His mother, who “invented and told the most beautiful fairy tales in the twilight,” sturdily championed his infant muse; her idyllic tales of the Denmark of her youth were published by her son as Bedstemoders Manuscript (1897; Grandmother’s Manuscript). The Lolland farm with its teeming, motley life, both animal and human, supplied material for much of Wied’s best work. Of his happy childhood there, to which he looked back nostalgically all his life, of his adolescent years as a book dealer’s apprentice, clerk in a lawyer’s office, and tutor in a Jutland manor, and of his painful struggle to pass the matriculation examination at the university (he was 28 when he finally succeeded), he has told with charming self-irony in his brief autobiography, Digt og Virkelighed (1914; Poetry and Reality). In the novel Ungdomshistorier (1895; Stories of Youth), he has described his bohemian days in Copenhagen, teaching for a pittance and writing sketches for the notorious newspaper København. One of his stories, judged indecent, landed him in jail for two weeks. There he made up his mind to devote himself henceforth entirely to writing. A few years later he married and settled down in Roskilde, where he built a modest house called “The Castle,” brought up a family, and wrote like the diminutive demon he was.

Now Dickensian, now Zolaesque, and often Rabelaisian, Wied was for 20 years the enfant terrible of Danish letters and a popular favorite in Scandinavia and Germany. Snobbery, smugness, and sham he loathed and ridiculed wherever he found them. He has been justly called “the quintessential Dane.” At bottom he was a Kierkegaardian moralist. The pseudonym “Peter Idealist” with which he signed his first published work, aphorisms on a political scandal almost as grotesque in fact as he made it later in fiction, was significant, as were also two gruesome early tragedies; but few suspected during his lifetime the passionate seriousness and deep pessimism concealed beneath the comic mask. A painstaking craftsman, his industry was prodigious, his creative power phenomenal. Outstanding among his more than 30 published works are the inimitable Silhuetter (1891; Silhouettes); two novels of aristocratic decadence, Slægten (1898; The Family) and Fædrene æde Druer (1908; The Fathers Eat Grapes); two satires of provincial life centering around the now legendary Knagsted, Livsens Ondskab (1899; Life’s Malice) and Knagsted (1902); and the satyr plays, especially Adel, Gejstlighed, Borger og Bonde, Fire Satyrspil (1897; Nobility, Clergy, Bourgeoisie, and Peasantry, Four Satyr Plays), called by Georg Brandes (q.v.) “one of the great books of our literature, one of the wittiest,” and Dansemus (1905; Dancing Mice), his most ambitious work, considered by many his masterpiece. In this peculiar fusion of novel and play forms Wied’s ironic genius found its most perfect expression. Few of his many stage successes stand the test of time. Toward the end of his life his popularity waned and for some years his reputation was in eclipse. The formation in 1938 of two societies for the publication of works by and about him is substantial if tardy recognition of his permanent place in the literature.

See: Ernest Boyd, Studies from Ten Literatures (1925), pp. 267–273; Ebbe Holten-Nielsen, Gustav Wied; en Bibliografi over Arbejder af og om ham (1931); Ebbe Neergaard, Peter Idealist, Studier over Gustav Wieds Ungdom (1938).

J. B. C. W.

Wierzyński, Kazimierz (1894–, Polish poet), was born at Drohobycz, in the oil-bearing foothills of the Carpathians, Austrian Poland, the son of a railroad-station agent. Identified from his earliest youth with conspiratorial activities whose aim was his country’s liberation, Wierzyński served during the First World War in the Eastern Legion until he was captured by the Russians and sent to Ryazan. After the war he settled in Warsaw and became associated with the Skamander group (see Polish literature). From 1931 to 1932 he edited the Przegląd sportowy (Sports Review) and in 1934 became theatrical reviewer for Gazeta polska. In 1927 his Laur olimpijski (Olympic Laurel) won the first international poetry prize at the Amsterdam Olympic games, and from that time on Wierzyński was looked upon as a kind of unofficial poet laureate. His early poems (Wiosna i wino, 1919; Springtime and Wine) were buoyant and spirited, while those of later years, in accurate reflection of the times, were more somber and meditative. A collected edition of his works appeared in 1929, and a volume of his best theatrical reviews, W garderobie duchów (In the Coatroom of Ghosts), in 1938. Of Wierzyński's later works, Gorzki urodzaj (1933; Bitter Harvest) and the three volumes published abroad after the outbreak of the Second World War, Ziemia wilczyca (1941; Earth, the She-Wolf), Barbakan warszawski (1941; Warsaw Barbakan), and Róża wiatrów (1942; Mariners' Rose), are to be noted.

See: K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 293-305, 710-711; A. P. Coleman, "Three Representative Polish Poets," Books Abroad, XIII (1939), 161-162, and "Twenty Years of Polish Literature," ibid., XIV (1940), 244-245.

A. P. C.

Wildenbruch, Ernst von (1845-1909, German dramatist, poet, and novelist), was a grandson of the popular and gifted Prince Louis Ferdinand, nephew of Frederick the Great. His father was in the Prussian diplomatic service, and Wildenbruch, born at Beyrouth, Syria, spent much of his childhood in Athens and Istanbul. Entering a military academy, he became a lieutenant in the Guards. But he was not attracted to a military career and resigned his commission in 1865, though he served in the wars of 1866 and 1870. After legal studies at the University of Berlin, he occupied a minor court post at Frankfurt an der Oder, 1871-1876; he was an official in the Foreign Office in Berlin from 1877 until retirement in 1900. He cared little for the brilliant social life to which his birth entitled him and preferred literary and artistic circles; he married a granddaughter of the composer Weber.

Wildenbruch's work is very extensive; plays, novels, Novellen, and many poems cover a wide range of subjects, but at the center stands an ardent German and Prussian patriotism. After a modest success with two epic poems celebrating the Franco-Prussian War, Vionville (1874) and Sedan (1875), he turned to the drama and with indomitable persistence continued to write plays though failing to secure stage performance for them. In 1881, however, the famous Meiningen troupe produced Die Karolinger, a drama of the time of Louis the Pious; its success brought other plays before the footlights, Harold (Eng. tr., 1891), a tragedy of the Norman Conquest, and two dramas of the Napoleonic period, Der Menonit and Väter und Söhne. The best of Wildenbruch's plays from German history is probably the double drama Heinrich und Heinrichs Geschlecht (1895; Eng. tr. of the first part, King Henry, 1913-1914), depicting the medieval struggle between imperial and papal power. In a series of dramas, Die Quitzows (1888), Der Generalfeldoberst (1889), and Der neue Herr (1891), he sought to revivify the Prussian past and glorify the Hohenzollern dynasty. Among the many other dramas are Christoph Marlow (1884), Die Tochter des Erasmus (1900), and Die Rabensteinerin (1907; Eng. tr., Barseba of Rabenstein, 1909). The last is perhaps the most popular of his plays, presenting the love of a son of the famous Welser family for the daughter of a robber baron. Wildenbruch had a keen sense of theatrical effect; individual scenes contain tense emotional conflicts, but the plays lack structure and concentration and in the portrayal of character are often weak and inconsistent. Many of the plays are in verse; the language is forceful, at times eloquent, but often rhetorical and artificially archaic. Though the dramas enjoyed for a time both critical and popular acclaim, their general style, that of the poetic historical drama of the Schiller tradition, was little in keeping with the naturalistic tendencies of the day. Wildenbruch's attempts to accommodate his dramatic work to the new trend only proved his limitations (Die Haubenlerche, 1891). The novels, like the plays, contain powerful episodes but are diffuse and lack focus (Das wandernde Licht, 1893; Eifernde Liebe, 1893); the novel Schwester-Seele (1894) is in part autobiographical. The best of Wildenbruch's narratives are the pathetic and tragic little stories of childhood and adolescence, Kindertränen (1883; Eng. tr. of one story, "Der Letzte," The Captain's Last Child, 1909), Das edle Blut (1892; Eng. tr., Noble Blood, 1896), Neid (1900; Eng. tr., Envy, 1921). His lifelong love of Mediterranean lands appears in both drama and narrative—in Der Fürst von Verona (1887) and Die Lieder des Euripides (1905), in the charming story Der Meister von Tanagra (1880; Eng. tr., Master of Tanagra, 1886).

See: J. Röhr, Wildenbruch als Dramatiker (1908); B. Litzmann, Ernst von Wildenbruch (2 vols., 1913-1916); H. M. Elster, Ernst von Wildenbruch (1919).

H. W. H.-T.

Wildenvey, Herman (1886-, Norwegian poet), is the troubadour of Norwegian verse, the tireless singer of youth, beauty, and summer. Born of farming stock in the community of Eiker, his real family name being Portaas, he attended secondary school in Norway, then studied for a time at a theological seminary in the United States. His first verse collection after reaching maturity, Nyinger (1907; Bonfires), at once established him as a popular idol, and the standard-bearer of a lyric revival in Norwegian letters. He disclaimed all social purpose, and declared that he was a pagan worshiper of life and beauty: "I was washed into the world by a flood of sunshine, that's the word!" Building on the form and spirit of Hamsun's (q.v.) poetry, he developed an "ambling" verse line all his own, with an easy billowing cadence produced by the alternation of three and four syllable feet and by the enjambement of sentences over several lines. With this technique he was able to relieve Norwegian verse of its usual sobriety, and give it a new lightness, sometimes merely frothy, but often ingratiatingly charming, as well as witty and daring. He enjoyed irritating the staid and the bourgeois, and he treated love with a flippancy that is reminiscent of Heine (whose Buch der Lieder he translated in 1929, Sangen bok), but lacks the latter's tragic undertone. A colloquial, even slangy style, a sudden teasing quip at the end, a glittering, summery love of nature, a ready tenderness for children and the unhappy, these are the qualities his admiring public has come to expect. His prose, chiefly autobiographical, is unimportant, even trivial. But such verse collections as Kjærtegn (1916; Caresses), Ildorkestret (1923; The Orchestra of Fire), and Høstens lyre (1931; The Lyre of Autumn), to mention but a few of his many volumes, reveal a true poet, progressively deepening his formal mastery and the seriousness of his themes. Eternity has begun to play a role in his verse, though still on a poetic, rather than a religious basis: "I believe in the human spirit, that it can reach the stars, and that it yearns for the stars." But along with the new there has persisted the old: "I cannot be profound without a merry smile." One of his frequent visits to the United States led to the appearance of a selection of his verse in English translation by Joseph Auslander, Owls to Athens (1934), but it does not convey much of his airy grace.

See: K. Elster, "Three Lyric Poets of Norway," American-Scandinavian Review, XIII (1925), 653-665; T. Lunden, Samtiden, XL (1929), 578-584; J. Auslander, "Introduction," Owls to Athens (1934); P. Houm, Samtiden, XLVII (1936), 351-363.

E. H.

Wildgans, Anton (1881-1932, Austrian poet and dramatist), was born in Vienna, the son of a cabinet minister. His childhood was embittered by a stepmother, his adolescence darkened by the tragically protracted death of his father. Love finally induced him to complete his law studies in 1908. When the success of his first book of poems (Herbstfrühling, 1909) made him financially independent, he gave up his state position. For a time (1921-1922, 1930-1932) he was director of the famous Burgtheater, one of the leading German theatres. But he devoted himself mainly to writing, in which lyric utterance is prominent; a posthumously published selection of his poems, Späte Ernte (1933), attests the fertility and power of his invention. Even greater was the success of his dramatic production, and his tragedy Armut (1914) won acclaim such as Vienna had not granted a play for years. Only a little less applause greeted the tragedies Liebe (1916) and Dies irae (1919).

Because his dramas are coming to be regarded as restatements of ideas set forth in the poems and because they show rather an eclecticism of structure than any one consistent pattern or trend, it seems probable that his strongest claim to lasting esteem will rest on his poetry, some of the best and most authentic of which is to be found in the Sonette an Ead (1912). Typically Viennese in the softheartedness, fine sensitivity, and mild humanity of his outlook, he avoided the effeminacy which sometimes characterizes the Austrian Francophiles. More and more he turned to the soil and its toilers and found his motifs in the fundamental experiences of human life—man and nature, man and woman, the spirit and the flesh, the urge to communal living and the longing for solitude. A handful of verses will abide; but these will be worth keeping.

See: J. Soyka, ed., Das Anton Wildgans-Buch (1932).

B. Q. M.

Winckler, Josef (1881-, German poet and novelist), was born at Rheine in Westphalia. He studied dentistry at the University of Bonn and started practice in the industrial city of Mörs. At about the same time he founded, with Jakob Kneip and Wilhelm Vershofen, the literary association called Werkleute auf Haus Nyland. Like the workmen poets of the type of Max Barthel and Gerrit Engelke, the "Werkleute" were devoted to spiritualizing modern industrial civilization. Winckler's Eiserne Sonette (1912) was a noteworthy attempt in that direction. Even during the First World War the poet maintained his particular faith in the significance to modern life of the power of the machine (Ozean, des deutschen Volkes Meergesang, 1917), but his hopes were completely shattered by the German chaos after 1918. Then Winckler wrote the burlesque-like extravaganza Irrgarten Gottes (1922) and the popular drolleries of Der tolle Bomberg (1923). The poet now gave up his dental practice and settled in the country. He withdrew to his family traditions (see Pumpen-nickel, 1925) and contemplated the rugged energy of the Westphalian soil (Doctor Eisenbart, 1929; Ein König in Westfalen, 1934) and the homespun gaiety of the Rhine province (Die Weinheiligen, 1935). In his recent epic, Das Mutterbuch (1939), the poet celebrates the spirit of motherhood as a remedy for the materialism of our age.

See: A. Soergel, Dichtung und Dichter der Zeit, Neue Folge: Im Banne des Expressionismus, 4. Auflage (1927), pp. 508-520.

E. R.

Winnig, August (1878-, German statesman and writer of fiction, autobiography, and political essays), is best known for his book Vom Proletariat zum Arbeitertum (1930). This book, together with the three volumes of his autobiography (Frührot, 1924; Weiter Weg, 1932; and Heimkehr, 1935) and his essays in Das Reich als Republik (1928) and Wir hüten das Feuer (1933), offers the most readable and illuminating account of the organization and activities, the personalities and purposes, of the Social Democratic Party in Germany from the promulgation of the laws against the Socialists by Bismarck in 1878 to its dissolution in 1933. But the autobiography contains, besides the politics of half a century, the life story of the most interesting—and, if known to Americans, perhaps the most congenial—figure that attained to distinction in Germany in the period following the First World War. Born in Blankenburg, Harz, youngest of a large family and at an early age fatherless, Winnig experienced in his childhood and youth poverty and disillusionment, which he survived physically and mentally thanks to his mother's wisdom and his own intelligence and character. Organizer of the masons' union and editor of its organ, Der Grundstein, Winnig became in 1917 minister plenipotentiary to the Baltic Provinces, later federal commissioner to East and West Prussia, member of the National Assembly at Weimar, and president superior of East Prussia. He retired from active politics in 1923.

His autobiography quite as much as his fiction—10 short stories in the volume Die ewig grüne Tanne (1927) and a novel Wunderbare Welt (1938)—is written in a style that charms and that would have gained for his Weiter Weg the 1933 Carl Schümann prize had not its classification as autobiography eliminated it from consideration. Winnig's love of nature expresses itself in passages of exquisite lyricism, and his profound religious experiences provide the solid foundation for his deep faith in the German workingman. In 1938 he contributed to Die Stunde des Christentums, together with 24 other well-known writers, a significant declaration in support of Christianity implicitly aimed at the current neopagan tendencies. In the same intention he wrote his Europa (1937) and published a volume containing a collection of passages from his works to which he gave the transparent title Die Hand Gottes (1939).

See: H. Bogner, "August Winnig" (with biography and bibliography), Die neue Literatur, XXXIV (1933), 261-266; Fr. Gudehus, August Winnig (1938) and Ein deutsches Gewissen: Dank an August Winnig (1938).

J. F. G.

Winter, Zikmund (1846-1912, Czech novelist and historian), is, except for Jirásek (q.v.), the most important Czech historical novelist. Winter was born in Prague, studied history at the university, and taught that subject at several Gymnasiums in Rakovník and Prague. He was an excellent historian; his books on the history of costume, of the towns, of the University of Prague, of trades and arts and crafts, are mines of information on the social conditions of Bohemia, especially in the 16th and 17th centuries. Winter put his knowledge to good use in his many stories and novels, placed in these two centuries. Winter's method is strictly realistic, devoid of sentimentality. Burghers, clergy, and clerks are his unheroic heroes. They are frequently tragicomic figures, obsessed with lust for money or power. Winter's composition is closely knit, the style frequently archaic, the whole outlook pessimistic. The best collection of stories is called Bouře a přeháňka (1907; Storm and Rain). Among the longer books, Rozina Sebranec (1905; Rozina, the Foundling) and Mistr Kampanus (1909; Master Kampanus), a picture of the persecution of the university after the Battle of the White Mountain (1620), were the most popular.

Though Winter had not the same national importance as Jirásek, he should be preferred to him as an artist.

See: O. Theer, Časopis Českého Musea (1904); F. X. Šalda, Novina (1912); A. Novák, Duch a národ (1936).

R. W.

Wirsén, David af (1842–1912, Swedish poet and critic), was born in the province of Uppland, studied at Uppsala, and became a teacher at Uppsala and Göteborg. His first collections of lyrics, Dikter (Poems), appeared in 1876 and 1880. His finished and delicate style won him admission to the Swedish Academy, of which he was long the secretary. In subsequent collections, notably Toner och Sägner (1893; Notes and Legends) and Visor, romanser och ballader (1899; Songs, Romances, and Ballads), he continued his original style but now showed a greater preference for religious themes. As a critic he did all in his power to combat the rising tendencies of realism and artistic experiment, and to this end used all his authority in the Academy, so that he soon became highly unpopular with the younger generation.

By present-day standards Wirsén would probably be considered a sentimentalist, a Swedish Mid-Victorian. Indeed he called himself a poet of "white roses," as contrasted with the red roses of Snoilsky (q.v.). In any case there can be no doubt of his entire sincerity. His idyllic and reflective mood has an appeal independent of contemporary fashion. He may still be read with pleasure for his affirmation of the old human verities of simple human feeling and for the limpid grace of his style. It is curious to note that so polemical a critic should be represented in all anthologies as the poet of tenderness.

See: C. W. Stork, Anthology of Swedish Lyrics (1917; revised and enlarged ed., 1930); F. Böök, Sveriges moderna litteratur (1921), also published as Vol. III of O. Sylwan, ed., Svenska litteraturens historia (1919–1921), pp. 39–46.

C. W. S.

Wittlin, Józef (1896–, Polish poet, translator, and novelist), was born at Dmytrów, Austrian Poland, of Jewish stock, and educated in Lwów. A pacifist by instinct and conviction, Wittlin early embodied his intense aversion to war in a series of poems entitled Hymny (1920; Hymns) and endeavored to escape from his horror of war by burying himself in the classical civilization of Greece and by producing eventually a new and admirable translation of the Odyssey (1924). Wittlin's principal contribution to Polish literature is the novel Sól ziemi (1936; Eng. tr., Salt of the Earth, 1939), designed as the initial volume of a long saga devoted to the "patient foot soldier" of the imperial Austrian army. Wittlin's literary work was cut off abruptly by the Second World War, which forced the author to find refuge in the United States.

See: A. P. Coleman, New York Times Book Review, July 5, 1936, p. 18, and Saturday Review of Literature, August 2, 1941, pp. 10–11; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, III (1936), 276–279.

A. P. C.

Woestijne, Karel van de (1879–1929, Flemish poet), was born at Ghent, went to school there, studied Germanic philology at the State University of Ghent, and taught Dutch in various schools until he was appointed to the chair of Dutch literature at Ghent. His poetry was a conscious reaction to the vogue of Guido Gezelle (q.v.). It gives expression to the questioning bewilderment of the generation that came after Gezelle's placid and self-centered age. Gezelle's provincial self-sufficiency could no longer satisfy these moderns who were alive to currents and movements that stirred the literary world abroad. Van de Woestijne has defined his poetry as "autobiography turned into symbolism." In other words, all his verse is an expression of his conscious and subconscious personality. Het Vaderhuis (1903; The Father House) recounts symbolically the story of his boyhood, De Boomgaard der Vogelen en der Vruchten (1905; The Orchard of Birds and Fruit) that of his courtship and early marriage, De Gulden Schaduw (1910; The Golden Shadow) his family life, after a son is born, in the great city. In De modderen Man (1920; The Man of Mud) the aging poet gave expression to the mental pain caused by the struggle between the flesh and the spirit, resurgence of old desires, regret over unrealized dreams. Van de Woestijne's imagery has the quality of sculpture. He carves his figures of speech with bold, powerful strokes from the stone of the language. His poetry is not the kind that one reads for relaxation. His mode of expression is often enigmatic. One has to wrestle with him and wring the meaning from his symbolism. One lives with this poet in a close atmosphere like that of a sultry summer day pregnant with forebodings of an oncoming thunderstorm. His poetry is the expression of a lonely soul tortured by self-analysis and oversensitive nerves. The diction is refined, yet overcharged with decorative imagery. The verse is melodious, but the melody has the somber monotony of organ music. Yet, for all that, he ranks high among Flemish poets, is, in fact, according to present-day estimate, the first among the modern poets of Flanders.

See: A. de Ridder, La Littérature flamande contemporaine (1923); M. Rutten, De Lyriek van Karel van de Woestijne (1934).

A. J. B.

Wolker, Jiří (1900–1924, Czech poet), the leading poet of the “proletarian” group which became prominent just after the First World War, was born in Prostějov, Moravia, of a good middle-class family. He came to Prague in 1919 to study law, but plunged into the literary life of the new capital city. He died of tuberculosis before he was 24, in his native town.

Wolker is the author of two collections of verse which became very popular and influential. Host do domu (1921; The Guest in the House) is a collection of simple poems which dream about the world of the poet's boyhood in the country. Wolker obviously believes in the goodness of man, in the sanctity of poverty, in the complete fundamental identity of all men as it has been preached by French unanimité. The poem “Svatý Kopeček” (The Holy Hill) can be compared with “Zone” of Apollinaire (q.v.): the earth melts into the sky, the shadow of death dissolves, silent matter comes alive—everywhere there is unity and continuity. The second collection of Wolker's poetry, Těžká hodina (1922; The Grievous Hour), is very different. Wolker has found his allegiance; he has discovered the cause of the proletariat and of communism, which he conceives as an earthly paradise, as the fulfillment of his longing for identification with all humanity. We now have effective social ballads, like “Balada o očích topičových” (Eyes of the Fireman), set in a power station, where gradually the eyes of the fireman change into lights of the city. Wolker has rediscovered the style of the Czech folk ballad and of its greatest master, K. J. Erben. A few poems, published after Wolker's death, give moving expression to his personal tragedy of dying in early youth and knowing all too clearly of his approaching death. His tragic fate, his personal charm, and the popular tone of his lyrics have, however, elevated him to a position in recent Czech poetry which the actual substance of his work does not altogether support. The posthumous, over-complete editions including even his earliest verse, some short plays, and some rather crude prose hardly enhance his reputation with critical readers. There is much adolescent naïveté and sentimentality in Wolker's work. But Wolker had genuine talent, and his historical importance—his rediscovery of the style of the folk ballad, his ardent collectivist faith—can scarcely be overrated. There is a simple charm in his best verse which is beyond sophisticated criticism.

See: V. Nezval, Wolker (1925); Z. Kalista, Kamarád Wolker (1933); L. Kratochvíl, Wolker a Nezval (1936).

R. W.

Wyspiański, Stanisław (1869–1907, Polish poet, painter, and dramatist), was born in Cracow, the ancient capital of Poland, where he spent most of his short but fruitful life. The son of a sculptor, the boy was haunted by the many old churches and historical monuments of the “city of living stones.” However, it was the royal castle of Wawel, with its gorgeous Renaissance cathedral, that inspired him most of all. After completing the usual training in the Gymnasium, he entered the Cracow Academy of Fine Arts, became a pupil of Poland's greatest painter of historical subjects, Jan Matejko, and, after winning a scholarship from the Academy, continued his studies in France and Italy. Feverishly he studied painting, sculpture, and architecture, as well as literature and the art of the theatre. He found the great tragedies of Corneille, Racine, and Shakespeare as absorbingly interesting as the Italian and French cathedrals. He also threw himself into the study of Greek art and civilization, under the spell of which he was to remain till the very end of his life. Testimony to the many-sidedness of his gifts and interests can be found in some 500 pictorial works, in his mural decorations, in admirable stained-glass windows, in cartoons for the reconstruction of the ancient royal castle in Cracow, in designs of theatrical costumes, in critical reflections on Shakespeare's Hamlet, in a version of Corneille's masterpiece, the tragedy of the Cid, in illustrations for Homer's Iliad, as well as in bold ideas in the field of decorative, applied, and typographical arts. It was this intense overactivity that was undoubtedly responsible for his premature death at the age of 38.

As to his literary achievement, it was bound with his central vision of the theatre. He believed that dramatic poetry is man's greatest accomplishment, and he looked at the theatre as fundamentally a cathedral of the spirit. His 16 plays may be divided into two groups, those definitely Polish and those based on subjects drawn from the literature of ancient Greece. The majority belong to the former group: four powerful dramas, more or less allegorical in character—Legjon (1900; The Legion), Wesele (1901; The Wedding), Wyzwolenie (1903; Deliverance), and Noc Listopadowa (1904; November Night)—are considered masterpieces by his countrymen. The tragic problems of freedom, political as well as moral, of national and individual greatness, of heroic attitudes toward life, of the secret of man's wholesome spiritual growth—these are some of the timeless issues that absorbed him. A searcher for heroism and beauty, he turned to the mythology and robust early history of Poland, only to feel all the more bitterly the present political degradation. Determined to get at the roots of the problem, he began to explore the darkest recesses of his nation's character and temperament, its hidden faults and weaknesses, its incapacity for organized action, its deep-rooted habit of substituting misty reflection for clear thinking, and its mood of more or less passive resignation. Although an admirer of the great romantics, Mickiewicz and Słowacki, Wyspiański did not hesitate to voice occasionally his passionate protest against those aspects of their poetry which, in his estimation, induced the Poles to acquiesce in the pathos and beauty of political martyrdom. The intensity of his lyrical fervor is enhanced through his occasional use of the racy speech of the countryside, through irregular lines, rapid movement, colorful idioms, and apt figures of speech.

Wyspiański's lifelong and admiring association with Greek art and its qualities of symmetry and universality did not permit him to remain utterly absorbed in national problems. He frequently used Greek imagery in his Polish plays and wrote four poetic plays round purely Greek subjects. Of these, Powrót Odyssa (1907; The Return of Ulysses), Wyspiański's farewell to life, is probably the best.

Austere and rather aloof, completely engrossed in his manifold creative activities, Wyspiański nevertheless exercised a powerful influence upon his generation, having nobly played his role as artist and spiritual leader.

See: S. Srebrny, "Stanisław Wyspiański," Slavonic Review, II (1923-1924), 359-380; R. Dyboski, Modern Polish Literature (1924); Wiadomości literackie, 1928, No. 231 (entire issue); W. Borowy, "Wyspiański," Slavonic Review, XI (1932-1933), 617-630.

T. M.

Wyzewa, Teodor de (1862-1917, French critic), was born on his grandmother's estate in the village of Kalusik, Russian Poland. His father was a physician. When the boy was 10 years old, his father decided to move the family to France so that his son could be educated in the French schools which he had learned to prize, having studied there himself while a political exile. The family settled in a village of Normandy, and the young Teodor was sent as a boarding student to the collège of Beauvais. Except for vacations, the next years of Wyzewa's life were spent, not happily, in the French schools for which he obtained scholarships. A year of teaching philosophy in the small provincial town of Châtellerault disgusted Wyzewa forever with pedagogy. Having returned to Paris and changed his name from Wyzewski to the more easily pronounced form Wyzewa, he undertook to make a living with his pen. The years of solitude and boredom and the sharp contrast created by recollections of his Polish childhood had already taught Wyzewa to find, in dream, a refuge from drab reality.

In 1885 he and Edouard Dujardin founded the Revue wagnérienne, which was to play such an important part in the orientation and the expression of the symbolist movement (see French symbolism). Wyzewa was then one of the most brilliant and certainly the most cosmopolitan of a group of young men who gathered every Tuesday at Mallarmé's (q.v.) to discuss poetry, music, and philosophy. He knew many languages, had traveled extensively, understood the most difficult poets and philosophers. His knowledge of German and of music was to make him the interpreter of Wagner to his contemporaries and one of the most important critics of his school. Consciously or not Wyzewa attributed to Wagner many of his own ideas, and the series of articles on Wagnerian art published in the Revue wagnérienne (1885-1886; later reprinted in Nos Maîtres, 1895) is one of the best expressions of symbolist aesthetics as conceived by a disciple of Mallarmé. The influence of this pseudo-Wagnerian philosophy, with its negation of the reality of the outside world ("Alone the 'I' exists and its eternal task is to create"), has been heavy on the generation. Le Culte du moi of Barrès (q.v.) is an example.

In the Revue indépendante, which in 1886 succeeded the Revue wagnérienne as a vehicle for symbolist doctrines, Wyzewa found the field in which he was to specialize, the criticism of foreign literature. Leo Tolstoy (q.v.) was then superseding Wagner as a model for the idealistically inclined. Wyzewa continued to conduct in the name of Tolstoy and with the label of "anti-intellectualism" the propaganda he had begun in the name of Wagner and with the label of "idealism." His criticism has always been propaganda against naturalism, against materialism, against an undue faith in science. He wrote in Vogue, in the Revue bleu, and after 1891 in the Revue des deux mondes, to which he was called by Brunetière (q.v.). Wyzewa's evolution is a reflection of the evolution of the symbolist movement during these years, the end of which was, of course, for many a return to Christianity. That final stage marked by a new generation of poets, Claudel, Péguy, Francis Jammes (qq.v.), was reached by Wyzewa about 1900 (Contes chrétiens, 1901). At that time, too, he was left a widower, after seven years of dreamlike happiness. Abandoning all worldly pursuits, he withdrew into almost complete seclusion, dividing his life between the work which provided for his living (articles in the Revue des deux mondes, Temps, etc., and translations, many of which were religious in character, such as The Golden Legend and St. Francis of Assisi's Fioretti) and the music of Mozart, his only solace.

In 1916 he published in collaboration with a friend, G. de St. Foix, an exhaustive study, which had occupied his leisure for 10 years, of Mozart's early works, La Jeunesse de Mozart. When in 1917 a sudden illness took him away, his real spirit and all his ambition had long since departed this world.

See: I. de Wyzewa, La Revue wagnérienne (1934).

I. W.

Y

Yesenin, Sergei Aleksandrovich (1895–1925, Russian poet), was the most popular poet of the early Revolution and was called by Gorky (q.v.) the most gifted since Pushkin. A peasant born in Konstantinov, Ryazan Province, he was educated at an ecclesiastical teachers' school and (1912–1913) at the Shanyavski University, Moscow. In 1915 he went to Petrograd, where he soon became the chief exponent of the imaginists, a group nearer to the vorticists than to the American imagists, who insisted on the image as the "primary pigment of poetry." At first one of the Left Wing Social Revolutionaries, who included Ivanov-Razumnik, editor of Skify (The Scythians), Yesenin supported the November Revolution, although he was always more or less hostile to official, orthodox Communism. As an imaginist he declared the independence of poetry and the imagination, a courageous protest against the dictatorship of the early militant period. Later, in Moscow, he became the main attraction of the literary cafés, where his talent together with his rowdiness exercised such a tremendous influence on Soviet youth that "Yeseninism" was declared a dangerous political disease. His marriage to Isadora Duncan (1922) caused world-wide comment, as did their joint tour of Europe and the United States. They separated (1923) and he returned to the U.S.S.R., where some months later he married a granddaughter of Leo Tolstoy (q.v.). As a peasant and a revolutionary mystic imbued with the messianism of Blok and Bely, Yesenin suffered progressive disillusion under a proletarian, industrial, and materialistic system. His early dream of the resurrection of the old muzhik "wooden" Russia was unrealizable. His inner maladjustment produced a fatal disintegration of personality, and on December 28, 1925, he slashed his wrists, then hanged himself in a Lenin-grad hotel room.

Yesenin's was a powerfully lyric genius springing from a religious nature instinct with love for the soil and landscape of Russia. He knew its rich diversity and vastness from his many journeys to Murmansk, Archangel, Turkestan, the Kirghiz steppes, the Caucasus and the Crimea. From Radunitsa (1915; Rejoicing) through more than 20 volumes of verse he celebrated this passionate and nostalgic love. Many of his poems are tender, wistful, even pietistic, others brutally blasphemous. His finest songs are among the most lovely and poignant of all Russian poetry, memorable for their simplicity, for their exquisite melodic line, and for the feeling of oneness with nature which they evoke. His best-known works include Tovarishch Inonia (1918; Comrade Inonia), which hails the Revolution as the revival of traditional peasant Russia; Ispoved khuligana (1921; The Confession of a Hooligan); Pugachyov (1922), an epic verse tragedy of the peasant rebel in the reign of Catherine II; Moskva kabatskaya (1924; Tavern Moscow); Rus sovetskaya (1925; Soviet Russia); Persidskie motivy (1925; Persian Sketches). In 1926 the Soviet Union of Writers established a Yesenin Museum, and the State Publishing House (1926-1927) issued his collected works in four volumes. His poems have been translated into many languages, and a number appear in anthologies in English.

See: Vladislav Khodasevich, "Yesenin," Sovremennyya zapiski, XXVIII (1926), 292-322; A. Voronsky, "Sergei Yesenin," in Literaturnye tipy (1927), pp. 173-200.

N. S.

Yevreinov, Nikolai Nikolayevich (1879-, Russian dramatist, régisseur, and critic and theorist of the drama), was born in Moscow. His father was an engineer and a government official. His mother was descended from a French nobleman who had emigrated to Russia during the French Revolution. Yevreinov himself had a precocious interest in the theatre. At the age of five he was taken to the theatre to see a play; at seven he had written a play of his own; at 13 he had written a novel. At that same age he acted in a theatre and performed as an equilibrist in a circus. He had also studied music under Rimski-Korsakov. He was sent to the Imperial Law School at St. Petersburg and actually graduated from there with a silver medal in 1901. While there, however, he was not so much interested in law as in the Legal Dramatic Circle, for which he acted, wrote plays, and composed an opera. After graduating, he was given a post in the Imperial Ministry of Ways and Communications which he held for 10 years. During that time he continued to write plays; these included a play called Fundament schastya (1902; The Foundation of Happiness), which was an episode in the life of gravediggers, and Krasivy despot (1906; Eng. tr., The Beautiful Despot, 1916), which was acted both in Russia and in England. In 1907 he directed plays from antiquity at the Starinny or Ancient Theatre in St. Petersburg. He took Meyerhold's place in 1908 as régisseur for Vera Kommissarzhevskaya at her theatre and, among other plays, directed a remarkable production of Oscar Wilde's Salomé. In 1909 he started a theatre of his own called the Merry Theatre for Grown-up Children, where he produced his own play, Vesyelaya smert (1909; Eng. tr., A Merry Death, 1916), often acted in England and America. This was a short harlequinade in which a woman representing death seems to separate the merry Harlequin from the heartbroken Columbine, until Harlequin finally rises laughing from his deathbed. In Predstaulenie lyubvi (1909;

The Presentation of Love) Yevreinov produced a monodrama in which all the different characters are interpreted from the point of view of one central character. In connection with this play he published Vvedenie v monodramu (1909; Introduction to Monodrama), in which he explained his theory of intense subjectivism and artificiality in drama—a theory which in many ways anticipated expressionism.

In 1910 Yevreinov started another theatre of his own in St. Petersburg called the Krivoe Zerkalo or Crooked Looking Glass, which gave an intentionally distorted and grotesque reflection of life. One of the fantasies which he produced there consisted of five different condensed versions of Gogol's famous play, The Inspector-General (or "Revizór"): a classical performance; a lifelike performance in the spirit of Stanislavsky; a grotesque performance in the manner of Max Reinhardt; a mysterious performance in the style of Gordon Craig; a cinematographic performance. He also produced in this theatre some plays of his own. Shkola etualei (1911; The School of Stars) represented a director and a number of different types of actresses. In V kulisakh dusha (1912; Eng. trs., The Theatre of the Soul, 1915, Behind the Curtain of the Soul, 1922, The Back Stage of the Soul, 1925) a professor reveals three different entities of the soul. The Rational Soul wears spectacles and has a quiet, sober manner. The Emotional Soul wears an artist's blouse and a red tie. The Subliminal Soul wears a black mask. Then are seen the different concepts of the Wife and of the Dancer as they appear to these different entities of the soul. This extravaganza has often been performed in England, America, and other countries and has offered an interesting challenge in its fantastic scenic design and acting. Schastlivy grobovshchik (1912; The Happy Coffinmaker), Kukhnya smekha (1914; The Kitchen of Laughter), and Chetvortaya stena (1915; The Fourth Wall), in which a parody of Faust was given, were all experiments written by Yevreinov for the Crooked Looking Glass.

To go with these plays, Yevreinov wrote a number of theoretical books on the theatre, Teatr kak takovoi (1912; The Theatre as Such), Pro Scena Sua (1913), and Teatr dlya sebya (1915-1917; enlarged and translated into English in 1927 as The Theatre in Life). In these treatises Yevreinov explains his theory that all men, whether they know it or not, have a will to dramatize. The child creates his world of make-believe, his theatre. In the childhood of the human race the primitive savage acts out the scene of the hunt in front of the audience gathered around the campfire. All the great men of history have been filled with a desire to act, to play a role before the audience of the world. Religion, revolution, crime—all have something of the theatrical in them. The theatre is greater than life; it heals the wounds that life inflicts.

After the Revolution of 1917 Yevreinov remained in the Soviet Union for several years. In celebration of the third anniversary of the Russian Revolution, he produced his great pageant called Vzyatie Zimnego Dvortsia (1920; The Storming of the Winter Palace). This was performed out of doors in Petrograd, in the very square in front of the Winter Palace where the event celebrated had actually taken place three years earlier; of the 8,000 who took part in the pageant many were reenacting realistically what they had actually done on that earlier occasion. Most of the action, however, was symbolic: it took place on a White Stage to the right and a Red Stage to the left with a connecting bridge between them, where the struggle between the two conflicting forces was acted out allegorically as in a sort of political mystery. Yevreinov's later play, Samoe glavnoe (1921; Eng. trs., The Chief Thing, 1923, The Most Important Thing, 1924), was acted as Quintessence by the Harvard Dramatic Club in 1925, as The Chief Thing by the Theatre Guild in 1926, and as La Comédie du bonheur by the Théâtre de l'Atelier in Paris in 1936. It emphasized the idea that in life, as well as in the theatre, illusion is "the main thing" and showed Mr. Paraclete, the Comforter, with his group of actors, providing the occupants of a drab boardinghouse with those illusions which alone will make them happy. In Korable pravednykh (1924; Eng. tr., The Ship of the Saints, 1926) Yevreinov introduced a series of plays, one inside the other. By this time he had become an émigré from Russia, living in Paris and visiting America, writing Radio-potselui (1926; Eng. tr., The Radio Kiss, 1926) and Teatr vechnoi voinu (1928; The Theatre of Eternal War).

See: V. Kamenski, Kniga o Yevreinove (1917); B. Arbatov, Yevreinov i my (1922); Oliver M. Saylor, The Russian Theatre, 2d ed. (1922), pp. 221–244, 258–261; Leo Wiener, The Contemporary Drama of Russia (1924), pp. 159–163; B. V. Kazanski, Metod teatra (analiz sistemy N. N. Yevreinova) (1925).

H. W. L. D.

Yugoslav literature in the narrowest modern sense dates from the political unification of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes in 1918, following the First World War. It had its beginings, however, more than one hundred years ago when Serbia first attained its independence and when the Croats and Slovenes were still under the rule of Austria-Hungary. From the 14th century on, foreign domination under the Turks, Austrians, Hungarians, and Venetians suppressed the brilliant medieval culture of the South Slavs, formerly one of the most advanced in Europe. Except for the remarkable efflorescence of literature and the arts in Dalmatia during the Renaissance, South Slav civilization suffered extreme retardation until recent times. Rigorous repression of native institutions, even of native language, forced the survival of national identity to depend almost wholly upon oral tradition. This tradition, whose vitality has persisted, forms the matrix of all the modern literature. Today Yugoslavia is one of the few remaining regions of the Western world where oral poetry still lives, in spite of the inevitable decline produced by modern civilization. The Serbian ballads, as seen in the famous cycles celebrating the battle of Kosovo (1389), the medieval hero Marko Kraljević, the guerilla warfare of the Haiduks with the Turkish conquerors, and the romances, were recognized more than one hundred years ago by Goethe, the Grimm brothers, Mérimée, Lamartine, Scott, Bulwer-Lytton, Pushkin, Mickiewicz, and other distinguished men of letters as unsurpassed in their genre. They remain today a living folk expression and a prime source of national inspiration.

The first stirrings of national renaissance were felt in the 18th century under the leadership of Dositej Obradović (1739–1811), the inaugurator of rationalism and one of the first to arouse the aspiration for liberty and the emancipation of the intellect. Early in the 19th century appeared three great figures on whose work modern South Slav literature is largely based: a Serb, Vuk Stefanović Karadžić (1787–1864); a Croat, Ljudevit Gaj (1809–1872); and, to a less degree, a Slovene, Jernej Kopitar (1780–1844). To these men fell the task of effecting literary reforms. These concerned the basic tools of language, the reform of orthography, the compilation of grammars and dictionaries, the adoption of the vernacular as the literary means of expression, the harmonization of the three dialects—Serbian, Croatian, and Slovenian—and the collection of folk materials, legends, tales, fables, proverbs, epic and lyric songs, that constitute one of the richest treasures of oral literature in Western civilization.

The first half of the 19th century was given to such a forging of means and to the development of a literary audience. The period was characterized by an upsurge of nationalism, specifically expressed in the movement known as "Illyrianism," which had as its goal the cultural and political unification of all South Slavs. This signified in literature as in life the passionate aspiration for liberty and a turning to the heroic past as a source of inspiration and self-affirmation. Until the repressive measures following the 1848 revolt, German influence was dominant in all cultural interchange. Thereafter forcible Germanization from above brought its reaction. French and Russian ideas and literature superseded German; realism and naturalism as a mode took the place of the former romanticism. Whereas cultural progress had been confined to a few isolated places, such as Belgrade, Zagreb, Ljubljana, and Novi Sad, a rapid expansion took place throughout the Slav regions. A multiple development and reform occurred in the theatres, in literary reviews and publishing societies, in academic and other institutions. A great number of translations from French and Russian were made in the fields of the novel, drama, and philosophy.

In mid-century appeared the first South Slav writers to merit the term universal: Prince-Bishop Petar Petrović Njegoš, called the Shakespeare of Montenegro, author of the powerful verse drama Gorski vijenac (1847; Eng. tr., The Mountain Wreath, 1930), considered the finest work in all Serbian literature and translated into all the principal European languages; the greatly gifted Slovene, France Prešeren (1800-1872), whose genius appeared fully mature yet without native precedent, like that of Pushkin; and the Croat Ivan Mažuranić (1814-1890), author of the epic Smrt Smail-Aga Čengića (1846; Eng. tr., The Death of Smail Aga, 1925). These were the great poets of romanticism, whose fame is secure. Beside them may be mentioned the Slovenes Valentine Vodnik (1758-1819), Fran Levstik (1831-1887), Simon Jenko (1835-1869), Josip Stritar (1836-1923), and Simon Gregorčič (1844-1906); the Croats Stanko Vraz (1810-1851), Dimitrije Demetar (1811-1870), Petar Preradović (1818-1872), and Janko Jurković (1827-1889); and the Serbs Jovan Sterija-Popović (1806-1850), Jovan Ilčić (1823-1901), Branko Radičević (1824-1853), Ljubomir Nenadović (1826-1895), Djura Jakšić (1832-1878), Jovan Jovanović-Zmaj (1833-1903), and Laza Kostić (1841-1910) (Kostić's translations introduced Shakespeare to the South Slavs). These men were chiefly poets and romantics who used native materials, such as the epic ballads of oral tradition, as the basis of their inspiration, but they were strongly influenced by such foreign writers as Shakespeare, Heine, Herder, Petöfi, Arany (q.v.), Pushkin, Lermontov, Byron, Tennyson, and Goethe. A large number of the works of this period were in verse form, but there was also a considerable body of prose—tales, novels, and essays.

The rise of realism, far from extinguishing the spirit of nationalism and Pan-Slavism, expressed it in new forms. The latter half of the 19th century produced a new social consciousness that reflected the ideas of Western Europe and of the Russians, with whom there had existed a literary affiliation dating from the 18th century. Prose became the favored medium; the Croats became especially accomplished in the novel, while the Serbs excelled in the short story. Writers attacked romantic poetry for what they termed its frivolity and orientalism and insisted on the depiction of the problems of actual, contemporary existence. The old patriarchal, pastoral ways of life were gradually giving way to urban influences. The economic sufferings of the peasantry, the transition from country to town life, the arrogance of the great landowners, the harshness of foreign rule—these were the principal themes of the new realists, whose manner of thought was conditioned by materialist and socialist philosophy, positivism, Darwinism, and the new scientific discoveries.

The precursors of the modern realistic novel among the South Slavs were Jakov Ignatović (1824-1888), August Šenoa (1838-1881), and Josip Jurčič. Ignatović's novels and tales described the society of the Serbian province of Voivodina, especially during the transitional period after 1848, depicting merchants, workers, peasants, students, officers, and churchmen. Šenoa, Croat poet, novelist, and critic, really dominated the literature of his time and effected many reforms. He bitterly criticized German literature and German influence for their suppressive effect on his country and advocated French culture. He was the historian of his epoch and the portrayer of all social classes. His novels give a striking picture of the social and economic decadence of Croat society, showing the conflict of the old patriarchal generation with the new, the struggle of the bourgeoisie with the Church and the nobility, and the relationship of peasant and landlord. Jurčič introduced the realistic novel into Slovene literature. Like others of his generation, he was reared in a romantic, nationalistic atmosphere that instilled in him a belief not only in the ideals of national liberty and unity but also in the usefulness of the struggle and its outcome. His historical novels, his dramatic tragedies, and his novels of contemporary life show a profound insight into the social strata of Slovenia.

Josip Stritar (1836–1923), poet, novelist, and critic, also exerted a powerful influence on the literature of his day. He depicted contemporary Slovene society and predicted the future great role of the Slavs in civilization. In 1870 he founded the review Zvon (Bell), which inaugurated Slovene literary criticism. He was the author of many satirical sonnets on the false leaders of the people.

Janko Kersnik (1852–1897) followed Jurčič in the naturalistic observation of modern Slovene society. He satirized false education, the hypocritical aspect of patriotism, intolerant clericalism, and the slackening of political morality. Greed for money and land form the theme of many of his works. Ante Kovačić (1854–1889), a Croat of peasant stock, was also a bitter satirist of social morality who analyzed the transformation of the peasant into townsman, a process that for Kovačić too often spelled individual and social ruin. Josip Tomić (1843–1906), though of secondary literary rank, exerted a considerable influence in poetry, in criticism of the novel, and in the drama. He was a prolific translator, edited reviews, and studied social problems. Using the documentary methods of Šenoa, he wrote many realistic tales of contemporary life and a number of historical novels painting the heroic past.

Among the Serbs, Glišić (1847–1908), Lazarević (q.v.), and Veselinović (1862–1905) represent the highest artistic attainment in the short story. Milovan Glišić, often compared with the Russian satirist Saltykov-Shchedrin, wrote a number of excellent village tales setting forth the economic problems of the poor peasantry exploited by usurers and landlords. Laza Lazarević masterfully recorded the beauty of the old patriarchal way of life in many short stories that belong to the classics of South Slav literature. Janko Veselinović, second only to Lazarević, was the author of many short narratives and novels glorifying the moral and material strength of the peasant.

In Croatia the realistic novel was best represented by Kumičić and Gjalski (q.v.). Evgenij Kumičić (1850–1904), editor, dramatist, and novelist, dedicated all his work to some 20 novels, plays, and collections of tales, political and literary freedom. Author of he described his native Istria, the life of Zagreb and Vienna, and the fatal role played by foreign cultures in the history of Croatia. Ksaver Šandor Gjalski portrayed the whole social life of Croatia in his many works that constitute a modern épopée and was the founder of the Croatian novel of psychological realism.

Other outstanding writers of the later 19th century include Matavulj (q.v.), Kozarac (1858–1906), Novak (1859–1905), Trešček-Borota (1870–1931), Leskovar (1861–), Ranković (1863–1899), Meško (1874–), Sremac (q.v.), Draženović (1863–), and Tavčar (1851–1923). Simo Matavulj, a Serb born in Dalmatia, created a gallery of types illustrating the transition from patriarchal to modern life. Josip Kozarac also painted the epoch of transition and proclaimed that the only remedy for current decadence lay in economic relief. Vjenceslav Novak similarly showed the evils of the irrational organization of society. Josip Draženović depicted the people of the Croatian coast, fishermen, sailors, peasants, and artisans. Ivan Tavčar, a Slovene novelist and tale writer of a serene and mature talent, was interested in philosophical problems.

The end of the century produced a reaction against naturalism and the development of psychological realism under the influence of Dostoevski, Leo Tolstoy (qq.v.), and contemporary French writers. Man was no longer considered explainable solely by his physiological instincts and his social milieu; more significant were the pattern of his thoughts and the nature of his spirit. The depiction of man in his interior struggle thus enlarged in Yugoslavia, as it did in the rest of Europe, the meaning and scope of literature. The principal writers who represented this new conception of realism were Trešček-Borota and Leskovar in Croatia, Ranković in Serbia, and Meško in Slovenia. Vladimir Trešček-Borota described the crises in the Moslem world brought about through the forcible introduction by Vienna of Western civilization into an oriental milieu fixed in its secular traditions. Janko Leskovar wrote of the fin-de-siècle moral and social lassitude, depicting Hamlet-like figures preoccupied with passive subjective analysis and deprived of active will. Svetolik Ranković wrote novels describing the lawless brigands of the mountains and the corruption of monastery life. Franc Ksaver Meško, a Slovene priest, led the reaction against naturalism in his region, calling for a return to God and the supremacy of the spiritual. Stevan Sremac, one of the best South Slav humorists, stands somewhat apart; his finest works are his tales of Niš and its semioriental, semipatriarchal way of life.

The drama of this period was second to poetry and prose literature in attaining marked originality. The growing activity in the theatre derived first from the very considerable and excellent translations of foreign playwrights, such as Molière, Leo Tolstoy, Gogol, Chekhov (q.v.), Ibsen (q.v.), Björnson (q.v.), Hauptmann (q.v.), and Schnitzler (q.v.). Jovan Sterija-Popović (1806–1856), the first great name in the Belgrade theatre, was the author of many witty and distinguished comedies satirizing society in the manner of Molière. Later Serbian drama developed through the work of Branislav Nušić (q.v.), after Sterija-Popović the most admired writer of comedies, Borisav Stanković (q.v.), and Aleksa Šantić (q.v.). Croatian drama was inaugurated by Julije Rorauer (1859–1912), Marijan Derenčin (1836–1908), Vladimir Mažuranić (1845–1928), Kosta Trifković (1843–1875), Franja Marković (1845–1914), and Stjepan Miletić (1868–1908). Miletić, director of the Zagreb theatre, contributed much through his reforms of repertory, staging, and acting and through his introduction of many European dramas. The name of Count Ivo Vojnović (q.v.) leads modern Croat drama; his romantic and nationalistic plays remain favorites of the Yugoslav stage. Other playwrights include Milan Ogrizović (1876–), and Ante Tresić-Pavičić (1867–), both Croats, and the Slovenes Anton Aškerc (1856–1912), Anton Funtek (1862–1932), Anton Medved (1869–1910), and Ivan Cankar (q.v.). Cankar, the foremost name in modern Slovene literature, was the author of six powerful plays, four realistic, and two symbolic-realistic.

The poetry of the turn of the century had a number of brilliant exponents whose works have been translated into many European languages. Chief among them are Vojislav Ilić (q.v.), Šantić, Silvije Strahimir Kranjčević (q.v.), and Aškerc, who formed the South Slav "Parnasse" under the influence of the French school. There was less difference between the older romantic poets, such as Zmaj, Jakšić, and Kostić, who came to maturity at about 1860, and those of the succeeding generation than between the prose writers of the romantic school and their successors in the realistic genre. Šantić, an accomplished stylist, wrote many lyrics of a familiar, provincial character. Ilić, considered by many the finest Serbian poet and the founder of recent Serbian poetry, wrote elegiac verses, a beautiful meditative cycle, and a series of ballads based on classical antiquity. Kranjčević, a Croat, and Aškerc occupy an important place in the transition between the two centuries. Kranjčević's verse is filled with a tragic conception of life in which man's thirst for justice and liberty is forever thwarted by the permanent phenomena of hunger, slavery, and tyranny; while Aškerc, an ex-priest, and the author of some 15 volumes of ballads and epics, gave a modern social accent to national themes.

At the end of the 19th and in the early 20th century the symbolist movement profoundly affected South Slav poetry, as it did other European literatures (see French symbolism). Out of this trend came much distinguished work that ranks with the best of modern times, that of the Serbs Jovan Dučić (q.v.) and Milan Rakić (q.v.), the Croat Vladimir Nazor (q.v.), and the Slovene Oton Župančič (q.v.). Dučić was accomplished in prose as well as poetry, and his pages belong to the finest of Serbian literature. The originality and harmony of Rakić's verse, though he did not write extensively, place him second only to Dučić. Nazor, both poet and novelist, is prolific and varied; his best work glorifies the heroes of the past, the beauty of the old Adriatic cities, the spirit of man and of nature; the serenity of his philosophy is a contrast to the melancholy of such poets as Kranjčević. Župančič, the director of the National Theatre of Ljubljana until the Second World War, is primarily a lyricist; the force and richness of his language, the complexity and spiritual depth of his thought, make him one of the best of contemporary poets. A place in world literature also belongs to Cankar, whose meditative, lyric poetry clearly falls in the symbolist category, although his wonderful tales and dramas are by turns naturalistic, realistic, and symbolical. To these names must be added those of the Serbian poets Vejlko Petrović (1884–), also known for his short stories, and Sima Pandurović (1883–); the Croats Dragutin Domjanić (1875–1933), Šibe Miličić (1886–), and Vladimir Vidrić (1875–1909); and the Slovene Alojz Gradnik (1882–). The Serb poet and littérateur Svetislav Stefanović (1877–) is renowned also for his translations of Shakespeare, Rossetti, Swinburne, and Browning.

In poetry, the novel, and the drama, South Slav literature now offered materials for comparison and classification, and, moreover, the reading public had reached an adequate degree of intellectual maturity for the development of criticism. Its beginnings had been seen in the work of such men as Šenoa, Stritar and Marković (1846–1875), the first theorists of literature, who were responsible for the introduction of social ideas and the portrayal of actuality. Svetozar Marković was a Serbian publicist profoundly influenced by the ideas of the Russian critics Chernyshevsky, Dobrolyubov, and Pisarev. He was a political and social reformer rather than a true critic, but he did much to found the school of realism. Criticism proper appeared with the work of another Serb, Svetislav Vulović (1847–1898), and after him Ljubomir Nedić (1858–1902), a disciple of German aesthetics and a man of vast culture, who published a series of studies at the end of the century. Surpassing them are Jovan Skerlić (q.v.) and Bogdan Popović (q.v.), whose judgments formed in the French school reflect all the refinement and subtle penetration of their models. Together with the latter's brother, Pavle Popović (1868–1939), renowned for 40 years as the ablest historian of Yugoslav literature, these men represent the best of South Slav criticism and have had a far-reaching effect on the movement for national unity. In this connection may also be mentioned Božidar Knežević (1862–1905), eminent social philosopher and translator of Carlyle and Macaulay, and the political historian and sociologist Slobodan Jovanović (1869–), whose perfection in literary style has made him a model. Among the foremost Croat literary critics and historians are Milivoj Šrepel (1862–1905), Jakša Čedomil (1868–), Dinko Politeo (1854–1903), Djuro Šurmin (1867–), David Bogdanović (1869–), Antun Matoš (q.v.), Dragutin Prohaska (1881–), and Branko Vodnik (1879–); among the Slovenes are Ivan Prijatelj (1875–), Ivan Grafenauer (1880–), Janko Lavrin (1887–), and Josip Vidmar (1895–); other Serb critics include Andra Gavrilović (1864–) and Dragutin Subotić (1887–).

South Slav culture as a whole had by now ripened. Widespread interest existed in philosophy, history, science, ethics, psychology, sociology, and the arts. Cultural interchange with other countries had begun to flourish. Educational institutions had multiplied—Gymnasias, higher schools, and universities—and literary societies, publishing houses, and many reviews all contributed to the enlightenment and refinement of popular taste. The Serbian Academy of Sciences in Belgrade (founded in 1886 as an outgrowth of the older Society of Serbian Letters, founded in 1842 by Sterija-Popović) and the Yugoslav Academy of Science and Arts in Zagreb (founded in 1867 by the great Croat statesman, Bishop Juraj Strossmayer, 1815–1905) printed a mass of historical documents, works of ancient authors, collections of folklore, and at the same time developed closer relations among the provinces. Publishing houses such as the venerable Matica Srpska, the oldest among the South Slavs (founded in Budapest in 1826 and later transferred to Novi Sad), the Zagreb Matica Hrvatska (founded in 1842), and the Ljubljana Matica Slovenska (founded in 1863) issued periodicals and books. From 1900 on, in all South Slavic intellectual centers, the literature began to raise itself to the level of European accomplishment. The years preceding the First World War were a time of aspiration and experiment; nevertheless there was preserved a deep sense of continuity with the tradition of the past.

The Balkan Wars of 1912–1913 produced a fresh impetus, especially in Serbia. Older writers felt a new inspiration, while others hitherto unknown or undistinguished became important. Poetry especially showed the revived spirit of nationalism. Many collections of war poems in the national heroic style were published, as were numerous short stories of the wars. Besides those already mentioned, prose writers who attained recognition before 1918 included among the Serbs Petar Kočić (1877–1916) and Svetozar Ćorović (1875–1919), each the author of many excellent tales and one fine play, Milutin Uskoković (1884–1919), novelist and short-story writer, and Radoje Domanović (1873–1906), a fine satirist; among the Croats were the novelist Viktor Car-Emin (1870–), the poet Milan Begović (1876–), the dramatist, poet, and novelist Josip Kosor (1879–), the dramatist Srgjan Tucić (1873–), and the poet and dramatist Božo Lovrić (1881–); there were besides the Bosnian poet August Harambašić (1861–1911) and the Slovene novelist Ivo Šorli (1877–). Women began to win a place for themselves, e.g., the Croat Ivana Brlić-Mažuranić (1874–1939), whose fairy tales for children have been translated into eight languages, including English; the Slovene feminist and journalist Zofka Kveder (1878–1926); the Serb essayist Isidora Sekulić (1886–); and the Serb poet Desanka Maksimović (1898–).

The immense sufferings and destruction caused by the First World War were reflected in, and to a certain extent counterbalanced by, the upsurge of national enthusiasm created by the political unification of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes in the new state of Yugoslavia. The post-war period raised many new problems in literature and produced many new genres, such as futurism, expressionism, and surrealism. Considerable progress was made along the path of dissolving the historical barriers arising from different alphabets (the Serbs employ the Cyrillic, the Croats and Slovenes, the Latin), different religions (the Serbs are predominantly Orthodox while the Croats and Slovenes are predominantly Roman Catholic), and geographical and political alignments. For centuries Serbian life had been turned toward Russia and the oriental world, while the character of Croatian and Slovenian culture was colored by German and Italian ways and ideas, until the middle of the 19th century when, as pointed out, French culture became an important influence upon all South Slav regions. Many obstacles remain, however, beside ancient prejudice, such as the inadequate knowledge in each of the several regions of the literatures of the others. Before the Second World War a closer relationship was clearly developing, as seen in the more intimate association of different authors, the publication of Croatian works in Serbian periodicals, of Serbian in Slovene, and so on in reciprocal fashion, besides the exchange of literary contributions and growing cooperation between the academies of Belgrade and Zagreb.

Perspective is so far lacking for an adequate appraisal of the great number of young writers who have appeared since 1918. Moreover, conditions of war have made the proper materials for study and comparison inaccessible. Certain general observations, however, may be made. In literature as in life a great ferment has been in progress. The reading public has enormously increased, and the book trade compares favorably in proportion with that of any other European country. The best work has continued to be found in poetry and the short story, particularly in Serbia. The novel has had many exponents, especially in Croatia, but so far, with some exceptions, it is of secondary importance. In general the novel may be said to deal with the manners of the several provinces, with social and psychological implications. Russian influence, so strong in the 19th century, has been to some extent replaced by contemporary French, German, and Scandinavian trends, though the Soviet novel has received considerable attention. Autobiography is a rarity, although the biographical novel is growing in popularity. The drama has become completely modernized. Like the novel, it deals principally with the actuality of existence and with the social and psychological problems of contemporary life. Some historical plays and verse dramas have achieved success.

Certain writers appear already to have won an established place. Foremost among them is Miroslav Krleža (q.v.), dramatist, novelist, critic, and poet. His is perhaps the strongest and most complete personality of the post-war era, widely popular and with considerable influence. His work has been extensively translated. Others include Misko Kranjec (1908-), a novelist of much power; Fran Bevk (1890-), dramatist and short-story writer; Ivo Andrić (q.v.) and Ivan Pregelj (1883-) who have won distinction in the short story; the poets Igo Gruden (1893-), Gustav Krklec (1899-), and Nikola Šop (1904-); and the two novelists Branimir Ćosić (1903-) and Stevan Jakovljević (1890-), whose portrayals of the war years and those following have made them among the most widely read of contemporary Yugoslav writers. This is to name only a few by way of suggestion, rather than as a summary.

A great deal of invaluable work has been done in the collection and study of folk materials, particularly the Serbo-Croatian heroic ballads, while the ballads of Slovenia have received belated attention, and yet more recently studies have been made of the popular poetry of the Moslems of Bosnia and Herzegovina. One of the most important collections of oral poetry in existence was made in 1933-1934 by Professor Milman Parry and Albert Lord on 2,500 double-records of Yugoslav poems, including one of some thirteen thousand lines, about the length of the Odyssey, and another of twelve thousand. This remarkable, not to say unique, collection, sponsored at first by Harvard and then by Columbia University, has been edited by the composer Béla Bartók. In this connection it is an interesting fact that the world-renowned Dalmatian sculptor, Ivan Meštrović, himself of peasant stock, knows by heart hundreds of lines of the ancient ballads and that the subjects of some of his most important work are the heroes of the Kosovo cycle.

At the present time a considerable portion of Yugoslav literature exists in translation in a large number of European languages. It has been late in appearing in English translation, though English and American literature has been liberally presented to Yugoslav readers. There exists a very good representation of the heroic ballads done by a number of competent English and American scholars. A fair number of modern short stories may be found in scattered form in periodicals and anthologies; writers thus represented include Karadžić, Jakšić, Lazarević, Ćorović, Matavulj, Stanković, Cankar, Andrić, and Pregelj, to name only a few. Some of the plays of Ivo Vojnović, Nušić, Kosor and Fran Bevk have received able renderings, as have selections from the poems of Prešeren, Levstik, Aškerc, Dučić, Rakić, Ilić, Kostić, Preradović, Nazor, and others. There exists a not inconsiderable body of critical literature in English, largely in periodicals. It is to be hoped that the post-war era will see a rapid expansion of literary interchange between Yugoslavia and the English-speaking world.

See: S. Šurmin, Povijest kniževnosti hrvatske i srpske (1908); P. Popović, Pregled srpske kniževnosti (1909) and Jugoslovenska kniževnost (1918); J. Skerlić, Istorija nove srpske kniževnosti (1914, 1921); D. Bogdanović, Pregled kniževnosti hrvatske i srpske (1915-1916); I. Prijatelj, Slovenačka kniževnost (1920); D. Prohaska, Pregled savremene hrvatsko-srpske kniževnosti (1921); Vasa Stajic, "The Centenary of the 'Matica Srpska,'" Slavonic Review, VI (1927-1928), 593-602; Josip Vidmar, "Survey of Modern Slovene Literature," Slavonic Review, VI (1927-1928), 618-634; J. Grafenauer, Slovenski biografski leksikon (1928); P. Popovic and M. Ibrovac, "La Littérature yougoslave," Monde slave, 1930, Nos. 7-9, pp. 39-58, 161-185, 335-364; Monde slave, 1931, No. 9, pp. 447-469, bibliography of Yugoslav literature by R. Warnier; D. Subotić, Yugoslav Popular Ballads; Their Origin and Development (1932); N. Kravtsov, ed., Serbskii epos (1933); M. and J. Ibrovac, Anthologie de la poésie yougoslave (1935); B. Unbegaun, Les Débuts de la langue littéraire chez les Serbes (1935); M. Savković, La Littérature yougoslave moderne (1936); A. J. Klančar, "Survey of Yugoslav Literature," Poet Lore, L (1944), 37-44; K. and N. Strelesky, Bibliography of Yugoslav Literature in English Translations and Criticism (in press).

N. S.

Z

Zaitsev, Boris Konstantinovich (1881-, Russian novelist, short-story writer, and biographer), was born at Orel and spent much of his childhood on the Kaluga estate of his father, a mining engineer. Zaitsev studied at Kaluga and Moscow, but left the university for Italy, returning to Russia in 1904. A brief connection with a Marxist periodical in Moscow did not bear much fruit. Zaitsev was never a true realist: his gift is essentially subjective and lyric. His pre-revolutionary stories are delicately sketched impressions almost lacking in plot and sustained chiefly by a mystic atmosphere. Hostile to the Revolution, he left Russia in 1922 and settled in Paris. The stories included in Ulitsa sv. Nikolaya (1923; St. Nicholas Street) and Strannoye puteshestviye (1927; A Strange Trip) show an advance in narrative technique, as well as firmer characterization. At the same time Zaitsev embarked on longer works, tempering his subjectivism by the requirements of the novel form. Zolotoi uzor (1926; The Golden Pattern) is cast in the form of the autobiography of a singer, but also gives a picture of life in Russia and abroad. Anna (1929; Eng. tr., Anna, 1937) is a compact narrative of tragic love, set against the background of the Revolution. Dom v Passy (1935; The House in Passy), a rambling novel of the Russian émigrés in Paris, was a return to an earlier manner, but the unfinished Puteshestviye Gleba (Vol. I, 1937; Gleb's Journey) is another step forward. Of autobiographic inspiration and varied approach, this novel is his most promising achievement. Zaitsev's miscellaneous works reflect well his various interests. His accounts of his visits to Mt. Athos and Valaam, some of his stories, and Prepodobny Sergi Radonezhski (1925; St. Sergius of Radonezh) testify to his devotion to the Orthodox Church. The retrospective Italiya (1923; Italy) and Moskva (1939; Moscow) are autobiography as well as description. The book on Turgenev (1932) deals with a kindred spirit in Russian literature.

See: Y. Aikhenvald, Silueti russkikh pisatelei, Vol. III (1923); "Zaitsev," in Literaturnaya entsiklopediya, Vol. IV (1930); G. Struve, "Boris Zaytsev," Slavonic Review, XVII (1938-1939), 445-451.

P. A. P.

Zamyatin, Yevgeni Ivanovich (1884-1937, Russian novelist, dramatist, and naval engineer), was one of the most original and influential figures of the early Revolution. Always a heretic and a satirist, he clashed many times with government authorities. Born in Tambov Province, he graduated (1908) from the Polytechnical Institute of St. Petersburg, where he lectured on naval engineering both before and after the Revolution. He spent 1916–1917 in England constructing icebreakers, notably the famous Lenin. His first major work, Uyezdnoye (1911; District Tales), markedly influenced by Gogol and Remizov (q.v.), was followed by Nakulichkakh (1922; At the World's End), which led to the confiscation of the review that printed it. A leader in postrevolutionary cultural activities, he gave to many young writers, particularly the "Serapion Brothers," the pattern of their development. His single long novel, My (1922; Eng. tr., We, 1924), sometimes compared with Huxley's Brave New World in its satirical representation of a collective utopia, was never allowed publication in the U.S.S.R., and in 1929, through an unauthorized Prague edition translated from Czech back into Russian, it made its author the object of anathema at home. In 1931 he was allowed to leave the Soviet Union, and the last years of his life he spent in Paris engaged on a long work on Attila, whose era he saw reflected in the present age. His other works include Vzroslym detyam skazki (1922; Fables for Grown-up Children), Ostrovityane (1922; The Islanders), Ogni svetova Dominika (1923; The Fires of St. Dominic), Peshchera (1922; Eng. tr., The Cave, 1923), Mamay (1922; Eng. tr., 1933), and Blokha (1925; The Flea), a dramatization of a story by Leskov. Zamyatin's style is marked for its verbal effects and ornamentalism of speech. Essentially realistic, his work is often characterized by a symbolic grotesquerie and by what has been called a literary "cubism" in its angular, elliptical, and fragmentary structure.

See: G. Struve, Soviet Russian Literature (1935), pp. 17–22; A. Remizov, "Stoyat negasimuyyu svechu," Sovremennyya zapiski, LXIV (1937), 424–430.

N. S.

Zanella, Giacomo (1820–1888, Italian poet), was born in Chiampo, near Vicenza, in Venetia. Soon after his ordination as a priest in 1842 he was appointed to teach philosophy and belles-lettres at the seminary where he had studied. He displeased the Austrian authorities by his open sympathies with the political uprisings of 1848 and was suspended from his post in 1853 in spite of the protection of his diocesan. He was reappointed in 1857; and when Venetia was liberated he became professor of Italian language and literature at the University of Padua, of which he was rector for the year 1871–1872. Following his mother's death in 1872, the poet suffered a serious nervous breakdown and in 1876 abandoned his professorial duties. He spent the remaining years of his life in the modest villa which he had built on the banks of the Astichello, a few miles from Vicenza, engaging in leisurely literary activities and doing charitable deeds for his fellow villagers of Cavezzale.

While translating as class assignments poems from the ancient classics, Zanella developed a taste and style which came to bear the marks of his own sensitive temperament. Among English and American poets he especially admired Gray, Shelley, and Longfellow, making faithful, though never too literal renderings of such well-known poems as "To a Skylark," "Ode to the West Wind," "The Old Clock on the Stairs," "Excelsior," "The Wreck of the Hesperus." His own first collection, Versi (1868), brought him immediate recognition. Besides the usual occasional poems, there were longer compositions revealing the poet's deep concern over the revolutionizing theories of the Darwinian school. Zanella attains perfection of his style and lofty inspiration in the justly famous poem "Sopra una conchiglia fossile nel mio studio," in which, with bold strokes, he paints the successive phases of the evolutionary process, with man appearing on the scene as its culminating point. His unwillingness to accept man as merely an accidental episode in this process is further illustrated in other poems like "La Religione," "La Veglia," and "A mia madre," wherein he reveals a passionate desire to reconcile a deep-seated religious faith with the new scientific theories. Also noteworthy are the dialogue "Milton e Galileo," and the later poems, "L'Evoluzione" and "Le Palme fossili." In the series of charming sonnets, "L'Astichello" (interrupted by his death), the poet reveals a serenity of spirit in the presence of nature, slightly tinged with a kindly irony, which reminds the reader of Horace, Fray Luis de León, and Wordsworth.

Zanella's lyre had a limited number of strings, but his songs on fundamental human themes, social, religious, patriotic, and moral, are characterized by sentiments of profound delicacy, steadied by an abiding faith "in the ways of God to man." His complete Poesie were published in Florence in 1928, with a preface by Arturo Graf (q.v.). His other writings are Scritti vari (1877), Vita di Palladio (1880), Storia della letteratura italiana dalla metà del settecento ai giorni nostri (1880), and Paralleli letterari (1885).

See: F. Lampertico, Giacomo Zanella (1895); A. Zardo, Giacomo Zanella nella vita e nella opere (1905); G. Vitali, "Giacomo Zanella cinquant'anni dopo la sua morte," Nuova Antologia, CCCXCVII (1938), 443-458.

L. E. S.

Zapolska, Gabrijela (pseud. of Gabrijela Korwin-Piotrowska, 1860-1921, Polish novelist and playwright), was born at Kiewierka, a suburb of Łuck in Volhynia, the daughter of Józefa Karska, a famous opera singer and beauty, and Wincenty Korwin-Piotrowski, a well-to-do landowner. In 1878, at the age of 18, she entered into a loveless marriage with Konstanty Śnieżko-Błocki, a cavalry officer, but left him at the end of three years because of the impending birth of a child whose father was Marjan Gawalewicz, the well-known Warsaw writer and editor and founder of the Teatr Mały (Little Theatre). Without means of support, Zapolska turned to the stage, where she made a name for herself in all the cities of Poland. Later, in 1883, she began to write, novels at first and then plays. Her first story, "Jeden dzień z życia róży" (A Day in the Life of a Rose), was published in the Kurjer krakowski (Cracow Courier). The rest of her novels, however, appeared not in Cracow but in more liberal Warsaw, where the Przegląd tygodniowy (Weekly Review) of Wiślicki and Świętochowski (q.v.) was very friendly to her. In 1890 Zapolska left Poland for Paris, where for the ensuing five years she was a member of the famous Théâtre Libre of Antoine. The training she received here stood her in good stead in her later years as the founder and creator of the naturalist school of dramatic writing in Poland.

Zapolska disliked Paris intensely, and in 1896 she was back in Poland, there to make a name for herself as a veritable virtuoso of the theatrical art. Play after play flowed from her pen, the characters and situations of all of them being taken, as their creator declared, from scenes she herself witnessed "behind the window curtains" as she passed along the street. In Kaśka Karjatyda (1883) Zapolska made the humble, "red-kneed" housemaid dramatic material for the first time in Polish literature and with the two plays Małka Szwarcenkopf (1897) and Jojne Firułkes (1899) did the same for the Jew. The most popular of Zapolska's many dramas are the celebrated Moralność Pani Dulskiej (1907; The Moral Code of Madame Dulska), a "tragi-farce of bourgeois-dom," as Zapolska herself called it; Skiz (1909; The Highest Trump); Ich czworo (1912; Four of Them); and Panna Maliczewska (1912; Miss Maliczewska). All these plays, though at first anathematized by the clergy and shunned by the more conservative elements, were frequently revived in Free Poland and always before a full house. Zapolska has been called "the Polish Sacha Guitry, slightly enlarged."

See: Z. Konarzewski, "Zapolska w życiu i w literaturze," Wiadomości literackie, 1936, No. 22; K. Wierzyński, W garderobie duchów (1938), pp. 83-86, 101-103; T. Żeleński (Boy), Romanse cieniów (1935), pp. 154-159, and Murzyn zrobił . . . (1939), pp. 217-223, 264-267.

M. M. C.

Zech, Paul (1881-, German poet, novelist, and dramatist), was born in Briesen Rheinland. His adventurous life has always been the object of much mystery and controversy. The son of a teacher, he studied in Bonn, Heidelberg, and Zurich and later worked as a kind of voluntary proletarian in mines and factories. About 1910 he appeared in Berlin, where he published occasional issues of a luxuriously printed and illustrated periodical, Das neue Pathos (1913-1923). His own poetry is as eclectic as this periodical and is influenced by Rilke and Verhaeren, by Rimbaud (qq.v.) and the poets of German expressionism. In his many books of poetry he always insists upon attention to form and mastery of language; he never indulges in the explosive words of the expressionists. Most of his early verses are recollections of his proletarian experience: Schollenbruch (1910), Die eiserne Brücke (1912), Das schwarze Revier (1913). This is also true of the short stories published under the title Der schwarze Baal (1916). Das Grab der Welt (1918) and Golgatha (1919) evoke memories of his participation in the First World War. Later his poetry embraces larger issues and even strays into cosmic regions: Das Terzett der Sterne (1919), Die Ballade von mir (1922), Die ewige Dreieinigkeit (1924), and Gesammelte Gedichte (1927). Among his novels the following are remarkable: Die Reise um den Kummerberg (1924), Das törichte Herz (1925), Die Geschichte einer armen Johanna (1925), Ich bin du (1926), and "Deutschland, dein Tänzer ist der Tod," which was awarded a prize but has not yet been published. His most successful experiment in expressionism has been the "scenic ballad" Das trunkene Schiff (1924), a combination of music, drama, and film, dealing with a Negro revolt in Africa and a storm on the ocean and introducing aspects of Rimbaud's life. Other plays are Steine (1919), Das Rad (1924), Der Turm (1924), Erde (1925), and Triumph der Söhne (1925). When Hitler came to power Zech went voluntarily into exile and has since lived in South America, where he has published some volumes of poetry and an autobiographical novel, Ich suchte Schmied und fand Malva (1941).

See: W. Omankowski, "Paul Zech," Die schöne Literatur, XXVI (1925), 289-290; "Wer ist Eigentlich dieser Paul Zech?" (autobiography), Deutsche Blätter, 1943, Heft 11.

K. P.

Żeleński, Tadeusz (pseud. Boy, 1874-1942, Polish wit, critic, essayist, and translator), was born in Warsaw, the son of Władysław Żeleński, a noted composer, and Wanda Grabowska, an aunt of Kazimierz Tetmajer (q.v.). After studying at the Jagiellonian University in Cracow, Boy went to Paris in 1895 to study medicine and while there came under the influence of the brilliant fin-de-siècle literary movement. He returned to Poland an unofficial ambassador of French culture. While completing his medical studies in Cracow, he found time to establish the soon famous literary cabaret Zielony Balonik (Little Green Balloon), an imitation of the Parisian Chat Noir. For this he himself provided a stream of witty, satirical, frequently risqué ditties, skits, and lampoons, which were later published in a series of volumes, among them Piosenki i fraszki Zielonego Balonika (1908; Ditties and Trifles from the Zielony Balonik) and Słówka (1913; Mere Words). Boy's contributions were welcomed by the rebellious Young Poland set of Cracow (see Polish literature) as a breath of fresh air in a stifling room.

Boy did not practice medicine for long, but turned rather to translating, producing in this field in the space of three decades some 120 volumes of translations from the French alone (Biblioteka Boya, Boy's Library). Besides rendering into flawless Polish all Molière and most of Balzac, this tireless laborer translated also the works of such widely divergent authors as Villon, Rabelais, Montaigne, Descartes, Racine, Marivaux, Voltaire, Beaumarchais, Chateaubriand, Stendhal, Verlaine (q.v.), Proust (q.v.), and many others, prefacing his translation in each case with an illuminating essay on the author in question. The type of criticism gradually evolved in the course of these essays came to be known as "boyism." Its principal marks were keen psychological penetration, clever and telling use of anecdotes, and great skill in the evocation of personality. Boy's most notable long studies are his Molière (1924), Pani Hańska (1926), a lively portrait of Balzac's Evelina, and Marysienka Sobieska (1938), a somewhat unorthodox interpretation of the French queen of the Polish national hero, King John III.

Boy was as deeply versed in Polish as in French literature and in this field as in the French often shattered time-hallowed interpretations. He did this by a process he himself christened "de-bronzing," which consisted of scraping ruthlessly away from the figures of the great the accumulated patina of tradition, thus exposing all the passions and foibles that lay underneath, as well as all the virtues and true greatness. A major literary tempest was stirred up in the early 30's when Boy applied this process to Mickiewicz, the great 19th-century romantic poet and patriot (Bronzownicy, 1930; Those Who Bronze Over). When the storm had subsided, Boy proceeded to present fresh and revealing side-lights on another great literary figure from the past, namely the dramatist Aleksander Fredro (Obruchunki Fredrowskie, 1934; Settling Scores with Fredro).

Boy was Free Poland's outstanding dramatic critic. His articles in this field fill many volumes (Flirt z Melpomeną, 20 vols.; Romanse cieniów, 1935, Romances of the Shadows; Murzyn zrobił . . . 1939, A Hack's Work . . .) and cover the entire theatrical life of post-war Poland. They are invaluable documents for the study of social trends.

A fearless crusader against hypocrisy whether in life or literature, Boy often aroused public sentiment pro and con by his espousal of advanced causes. In Dziewice konsystorskie (1929; Virgins before the Bar) he stated the case for divorce and for the marriage of the clergy. In Piekło kobiet (1929; Women's Hell) he made a plea for birth control and legalized abortion. The readers of the Warsaw journals Kurjer poranny (Morning Courier) and Wiadomości literackie (Literary News) looked forward to Boy's feuilletons, which were written with French clarity, Polish humor, and a scientist's passion for truth.

Boy refused to leave Poland when the Germans occupied Warsaw in 1939. He fled to Lwów, at first under Soviet occupation, and there continued to write and translate. With the German occupation of Lwów in 1941, he was seized and removed to the concentration camp of Dachau, where he died a martyr's death.

See: F. L. Schoell, "L'Enfant terrible de la Pologne," La Pologne, 1931, pp. 580-600; W. Weintraub, "Tadeusz Żeleński (Boy)," Wiedomości polskie, 1942, No. 37.

H. C.

Zeromski, Stefan (pseud. Maurycy Zych and Józef Katerla, 1864-1925, Polish novelist and dramatist), was born at Strawczyzna in the Kielce district of Russian Poland, of gentry stock lately impoverished as a consequence of the unsuccessful uprising of 1863. He spent most of his childhood on the estate of Ciekoty in the beautiful Holy Cross Mountains on the River Lubrzanka. Descriptions of this countryside and of his school days in the Russian Gymnasium in Kielce appear repeatedly in Żeromski's writings, the latter especially in the Nicholas Nickleby of Polish fiction, Szyfowe prace (1898; Sisyphean Labors). A series of tragic happenings—the death of his adored mother, the collapse of a love affair with his cousin Ludwika Dunin-Borkowska, the scandal of his sister Olesia's severance of home ties (later used by Żeromski as the theme of Dzieje grzechu, 1908, The History of a Sin), his father's remarriage and sudden death, climaxed by his own contraction of tuberculosis—all this plunged Żeromski even deeper into the despair to which he had been born as a child of the post-uprising era and caused him abruptly to flee from the scene of so much unhappiness. Without finishing at the Gymnasium, he went to Warsaw and took a course at the veterinary school, hoping that this would fit him quickly to earn a living. In Warsaw, Żeromski became involved at once in conspiratorial activities with the future leader of Polish national thought, Roman Dmowski, and was for a while imprisoned in the Citadel. After this, half-starved and suffering from tuberculosis, Żeromski abandoned Warsaw, to spend the next few years on various estates in the country, where he was able to earn a living by tutoring. After his marriage in 1892, Żeromski left Poland to travel in Western Europe and eventually to spend four years (1892-1896) in Rapperschwil on Lake Zurich as assistant librarian of the Polish National Museum. On his return to Poland in 1897, Żeromski continued to work as a librarian, serving now as assistant to Tadeusz Korzon in the famous Zamoyski Library in Warsaw. It was not until 1904, when he had reached the age of 40, that Żeromski found himself free from the necessity of holding a routine job and able to devote himself entirely to writing.

Though he made his literary début as early as 1889, Żeromski attracted little attention until 1895, with his Rozdziobią nas kruki, wrony (Carriers for Crows and Ravens), which was followed in 1896 with the even more striking Opowiadania (Tales). The line of thinking marked out in these led naturally to the novel Ludzie bezdomni (1900; The Homeless) with which Żeromski climaxed the first epoch of his development. All the works from this period are case studies of the Polish intellectual of the post-positivist era, of the man who, inspired by a Promethean dream of serving his fellows, meets only with inertia and despair in the execution of his dream and becomes in the end, like Prometheus himself, a victim of his own idealism. The classic example of the type, to which Żeromski himself belonged, is Tomasz Judym of Ludzie bezdomni, a young physician who, returning to his native village full of ideals of social service, quickly becomes aware of the cleavage between his purposes and the practices of the "pillars of society," including his own father.

After completing his portrait of the Pole of his own generation, Żeromski turned to portray in the epic Popioły (1904; Eng. tr., Ashes, 1928) the era of "heroic conflict," as he called it, dominated by Napoleon. A vast, chaotic work, crowded with an immense amount of detail and illuminating every aspect of Polish life in that epoch, Popioły is at its best in the rapturous descriptions of the Polish landscape with which it abounds. In this, as in Wierna rzeka (1912; The Faithful River), a story of the 1863 uprising, in Wiatr od morza (1922; The Wind from the Sea), and finally in Puszcza jodłowa (1925; The Fir Forest), Żeromski demonstrated beyond doubt that his true talent lay in lyric description.

In his final years Żeromski set himself the task of mastering the dramatic form and again succeeded, in the comedy "Uciekła mi przepióreczka" (1924; My Little Quail Has Fled), in depicting his own generation of Poles convincingly. An indefatigable worker till the day of his death, Żeromski was a warrior to the last in the cause of intellectual freedom. Death overtook him in the midst of a bitter controversy over the novel Przedwiośnie (1925; Early Spring), which officialdom charged was pro-Communist. With his passing, however, party animosities were forgotten, and Żeromski was given a state funeral. He will go down in literary history as a great stimulator of Polish thought and a great poet of the Polish landscape.

See: Wiadomości literackie, 1925, No. 103; Z. L. Zaleski, "Etienne Zeromski," Le Monde slave, January, 1926, pp. 25-42; G. Korbut, Literatura polska (1931), IV, 289-295; K. Czachowski, Obraz współczesnej literatury polskiej, II (1934), 188-233, 234-236, 427-439; W. Borowy, "Zeromski," Slavonic Review, XIV (1935-1936), 403-416.

A. P. C.

Zeyer, Julius (1841-1901, Czech poet, novelist, and dramatist), occupies a position roughly analogous to that of the Pre-Raphaelites in England. He was born in Prague, the son of a timber merchant. His father was of Alsatian origin, his mother Jewish. He studied languages at the University of Prague, but soon after left Bohemia to make various journeys—he spent several years in Russia as a private tutor, traveled in Italy and Greece, France and Spain. Later in his life he lived in a southern Bohemian town, Vodňany, in almost complete seclusion. He died in Prague.

As an epic poet Zeyer can best be compared with William Morris. Like Morris he spun out enormously long narrative poems based on themes of medieval literature and legends, in a decorative and even ornate style. One cycle of shorter epics is drawn from legendary Czech antiquity (Vyšehrad, 1880), another is an elaborate rewriting of many of the chansons de geste (Karolinská epopeje, 1896; The Carolingian Epopee), another retells under the title Z letopisů lásky (4 vols., 1889-1892; From the Annals of Love) such stories as those of Aucassin and Nicolette, Ghismonda, and Gabriel de Espinosa. Outside of these large cycles, two longer poems deal with Celtic matters; Ossianův návrat (1885; Ossian's Return) develops a theme which was suggested by Macpherson's poems, and Kronika o sv. Brandanu (1886; The Chronicle of St. Brendan) revives an ancient Irish legend.

Zeyer's prose consists in part of similar retellings of legends and stories drawn from every conceivable country. One volume was appropriately called Obnovené obrazy (1894; Restored Pictures), a title which describes excellently the almost antiquarian method. The longest of these restorations is Román o věrném přátelství Amise a Amila (1880; The Romance of the True Friendship of Amis and Amile) which revives an Old French theme, while other stories range as far as Japan and China. Possibly the more individual and independent Tři legendy o krucifixu (1895; Three Legends of the Cross) represents his greatest success among his short stories. The novels, though loosely constructed and sentimental in tone, express most clearly Zeyer's own personality under the thin disguises of his heroes. Jan Maria Plojhar (2 vols., 1888) is placed in Italy and has a hero after Zeyer's own heart: melancholy, homesick, torn by love for two women, dying of tuberculosis, groping his way towards a belief in God. Dům u tonoucí hvězdy (1894; The House at the Drowning Star), though ostensibly the story of a Slovak lost in Paris, is a self-portrait which attempts a psychological analysis of a weary and sick soul. The many dramas, though remarkable as uncompromising poetic dramas in verse, are much less successful, as Zeyer's talent was too lyrical and decorative for the stage. Two tragedies, Doña Sanča (1889), a Spanish theme, and Neklan (1893), drawn from Old Czech history, are the most impressive on the stage. The other plays, which include fairy tales and legends such as Radúz a Mahulěna (1896), remain closet dramas, enlivened by lyrical beauties.

Zeyer could be called a precursor of decadence: early in his life he was interested in mysticism and the occult, and he has moved in the direction of a highly aesthetic Catholicism. His mind circled round the conflict between earthly and heavenly love and came to rest on a vague, Christian Platonism. But Zeyer was saved from the ivory tower by his intense nationalism which was, however, a purely elegiac mourning for the sufferings of his nation and the glories of its past. His style was highly cultivated and even decorative and overornate, but at his best Zeyer gave expression to a nostalgic neo-romanticism of rare and even rarefied beauty.

See: J. V. Krejčí, Julius Zeyer (1901); J. Voborník, Julius Zeyer (1907); Miloš Marten, Julius Zeyer (1910); J. Viškovatá, Ruské motivy v tvorbě Julia Zeyera (1932). There are German translations of Jan Maria Plojhar and Amis a Amil and an anthology of short stories, Florenz im Schnee, tr. by R. Wellek (1924).

R. W.

Zillich, Heinrich (1898-, Transylvanian-German novelist), was born in Kronstadt, Transylvania. His first literary endeavors deal with childhood recollections, after which he proceeded to treat Transylvanian folklore and peoples, the First World War, cultural relations between Transylvania and Germany, and, most recently, the larger aspects of racial interdependence in Central and Southeastern Europe.

The short story Der Vater (1921) was Zillich's earliest publication. Others of this type include Der Urlaub (1933), Die Reinerbachmühle (1935), and Der baltische Graf (1937). Several collections of short stories, e.g., Der Toddergerch (1930) and Sturz aus der Kindheit (1933), have also been published. Less effective but still indicative of his devotion to Transylvania are the collections of poems, Strömung und Erde (1929) and Komme, was will (1935). Zillich achieved full literary recognition in Germany with the novel Zwischen Grenzen und Zeiten (1936), a semi-autobiographical Bildungsroman depicting the part played by Transylvania in the First World War. A later novel, Der Weizenstrauß (1938), reveals the complete maturity of the author's style. The aftermath of war provides the subject matter. In 1924 Zillich founded the periodical Klingsor (editor, 1924–1936), devoted to German culture in Transylvania. His prose writings incline toward history as it affects and is affected by a small national or racial unit. Zillich represents an active, virulent group of Transylvanian "Heimatsdichter."

See: W. J. Mueller, "Heinrich Zillich," Monatshefte für deutschen Unterricht, XXXII (1940), 198–204.

W. J. M.

Zola, Emile (1840–1902, French novelist, dramatist, and critic), would according to his own terminology be called the product of two geographical factors. Aix-en-Provence ("Plasans" in his novels), where he spent virtually the first 18 years of his life, and Paris, the city of his birth and his permanent residence after 1858, combined to make him a romanticist at heart notwithstanding his naturalistic label.

"I am only a poet," Zola exclaimed once while on trial at the time of the Dreyfus affair. The poetical streak in him, very deep and very real, was a gift from the South: from his father (1795–1847), an Italian engineer and a naturalized Frenchman, whose head was full of grandiose architectural schemes; from his friends—one of them Paul Cézanne, the future painter—in whose company he roamed the countryside and acquired a love of nature and sunlight which was to permeate his aesthetics, thus creating strong affinities between him and the new school of painting (see Mon Salon, 1866; Edouard Manet, 1867); from adolescent dreams which find a naïve and sentimental expression in his first published work (Contes à Ninon, 1864). Later, the petite fleur bleue will never fail to blossom in the corner of even his darkest novels.

Paris, on the other hand, the Paris of the Second Empire, prosperous but politically suppressed, hiding behind a magnificent façade untold depths of vice and misery—Paris stood in his eyes as a symbol of the modern metropolis, where success justifies everything and the Darwinian struggle for life becomes a grim reality. Near-starvation in 1860–1861, then mediocre jobs and journalistic ventures taught him the meaning and value of the word experience. Zola was now ready to appreciate the down to earth quality of such authors as Stendhal, Flaubert (q.v.), and the Goncourt brothers (q.v.), with the all important difference that, unlike them, he felt disinclined to conceal or disguise his personality. He gathered a group of essays and book reviews under the virulent title Mes Haines (1866), stating in the text that a work of art was "a corner of Creation seen through a temperament" and in the preface that his duty as an artist was to come forward and "live aloud" (vivre tout haut). This, of course, was a romantic motto—the very motto of fighters and would-be reformers like Hugo, Michelet, and even to a certain extent Balzac. It was to remain characteristic of Zola's frame of mind, as opposed to that of the so-called "realists" and to the cynicism and despair of his own naturalistic followers (see French naturalism). In the thick of his "campaigns," against a mounting tide of criticism and abuse, he kept on insisting, with seemingly good reason and unquestionable sincerity, that his whole purpose was progressive and educational.

For some 25 years Zola made heroic efforts to double, as it were, his usefulness to mankind by reconciling his reformist zeal with a pretension to scientific accuracy. Having fallen, in more or less orthodox fashion, under the spell of positivism, he fancied himself a practical sociologist or, as he would say, a "physician of the social body." He adapted to his own ends the rigid determinism of Hippolyte Taine (q.v.) and considered Thérèse Raquin (1867), his first "naturalistic" novel, as the literary counterpart of a surgical autopsy. Dr. Prosper Lucas and his far from reliable Traité philosophique et physiologique de l'hérédité naturelle (2 vols., 1847–1850) fired him with the belief that the laws of heredity and the influence of environment could be mathematically ascertained—whereupon he proceeded to draw up the family tree of his Rougon-Macquart, a fictitious collection of 32 individuals, heavily beset with irregularities of blood and nerves, whose "natural and social history under the Second Empire" he would subsequently record in a succession of interlocking volumes. Finally, Claude Bernard's epoch-making Introduction à l'étude de la médecine expérimentale (1865) prompted him to apply and later to formulate the famous theory of the "experimental novel" (Le Roman expérimental, 1880; Eng. tr., The Experimental Novel, 1894). Taken literally, this theory would liken the play and interplay of fictional characters to that of chemical compounds in a test tube. On the strength of these mechanistic premises Zola ingenuously expected to reach definite conclusions which in turn would be of use to the social worker or legislator in wiping out a number of humanity's plague spots.

There is little doubt that the immense cycle of the Rougon-Macquart, comprising 20 volumes (1871-1893; Eng. tr. by E. A. Vizetelly, 20 vols., 1885-1907) and several dramatic and operatic adaptations, represents one of the proudest achievements of French literature. To be sure, some installments of the series are now almost completely neglected, including the first and last (La Fortune des Rougon, 1871; Le Docteur Pascal, 1893), which supply the key to the pseudo-scientific designs of the author. A few survive only because they have an air of scandal about them (Nana, 1880; La Terre, 1887). Enough others remain, however, to reveal, not indeed an experimental novel, but a gigantic prose poem, a sort of "legend of the century" replete with powerful symbols. Such is the barroom in L'Assommoir (1877), Zola's most finished work and that which rightly established his reputation. Such are the central markets of the capital in Le Ventre de Paris (1873) and La Joie de vivre (1884), the paradisiac garden of Paradou in La Faute de l'abbé Mouret (1875), the department store in Au bonheur des dames (1883), the dark, twisting coal mines and the mob of maddened strikers in Germinal (1885), the unfinished masterpiece of painting in L'Œuvre (1886), the locomotive in La Bête humaine (1890), the tread of a defeated army in La Débâcle (1892). To all practical and poetical purposes La Débâcle rather than Le Docteur Pascal forms the closing chapter of the Rougon-Macquart. In the shadows of Sedan a hated regime crashes to the ground and another arises, bringing with it the promise of a spiritual awakening.

After 1893 Zola, now a prominent, controversial figure, left his "laboratory" and emerged openly as a romantic pilgrim and crusader. The trilogy entitled Les Trois Villes (Lourdes, 1894; Rome, 1896; Paris, 1898; Eng. tr. by E. A. Vizetelly, 3 vols., 1894-1898) and the unfinished series called Les Quatre Evangiles (Fécondité, 1899; Travail, 1901; the posthumous Vérité, 1903; and the missing panel Justice; Eng. tr. by E. A. Vizetelly, 3 vols., 1900-1903) were intended to sing the litanies of a kind of Christian socialism after the manner of Tolstoy (q.v.). At the same time the indomitable campaigner entered the Dreyfus fray with his sensational J'accuse, an open letter addressed to the president of the republic and charging the whole War Department with having plotted the condemnation of an innocent man. This document was published in Georges Clemenceau's (q.v.) newspaper, Aurore, on January 13, 1898. Twice brought to trial for "insulting the Army," Zola chose to flee to England in order to escape arrest. He returned in 1899 under cover of a general amnesty, hailed as a hero by the people and by Anatole France (q.v.) as "a moment of the human conscience."

On September 28, 1902, Zola was asphyxiated in his sleep by emanations of carbonic acid issuing from a defective chimney. Several years later (1908) the Third Republic rewarded a life of labor and truly "republican" service by transferring his remains to the Panthéon.

See (besides the bibliography under French naturalism and Zola, Œuvres complètes, with notes and commentaries by Maurice Le Blond, 50 vols., 1927-1929): Henri Massis, Comment Zola composait ses romans (1906); Fernand Doucet, L'Esthétique d'Emile Zola et son application à la critique (1923); Matthew Josephson, Zola and His Time (1928); Marcel Batilliat, Emile Zola (1931); Henri Barbusse, Zola (1932; Eng. tr., 1933).

J.-A. B.

Zoshchenko, Mikhail Mikhailovich (1895-, Russian humorist), was born in Poltava, the son of a provincial painter, and studied at the faculty of jurisprudence of the University of St. Petersburg. During the First World War he served as an officer in the imperial forces, but after the October Revolution joined the Red army. In 1922 he joined the Petersburg literary circle, the Serapion Brothers, and since then his work has appeared in various Soviet periodicals. His chief genre is a satirical short story in which he narrates humorous incidents from the daily life of the lower middle class and the petty officialdom of Soviet Russia. The influence of the early Chekhov, of Averchenko, Remizov (q.v.), and Leskov is apparent in Zoshchenko's narratives, told in the slang of the characters whose philistinism he lampoons.

Zoshchenko's short stories have been published in numerous editions and under various titles, the first one of importance being Uvazhayemyie grazhdane (Vol. I, 1926, Vol. II, 1940; Respected Citizens). He has also written a few short novels (e.g., Vozvrashchennaya molodost, 1933, The Returned Youth) and a few one-act farces (Svadba, 1922, The Wedding; Prestupleniye i nakazaniye, 1932, Crime and Punishment). Several collections of his short stories have appeared in English (Russia Laughs, 1935; The Woman Who Could Not Read, 1940).

See: Zoshchenko, Statyi i materialy (1928).
O. M.

Zuccoli, Luciano (1870–1930, Italian editor and novelist), was born in Milan, the scion of a noble German family (von Ingenheim) transplanted in Italy. He will remain in Italian contemporary literature as a characteristic figure, although his plots are often melodramatic, his love pages reminiscent of those in pulp magazines, and his prose crude and labored. He will endure because in spite of all these shortcomings he possessed so colorful a personality. In politics he had the courage of his convictions, and against the trends of his epoch he was a militant, outspoken tory, in favor of the military tradition and colonial conquests and opposed to any democratic innovation. He was also one of the few who did not succumb to the lure of decadence in literature and paid no homage to D'Annunzio (q.v.), the literary tyrant of his day. Faithful to a half-romantic and half-naturalistic formula, he derived his inspiration from three sources: out of experiences in military life as a cavalry officer he composed one of the few novels sympathetic to soldiers—with certain satirical overtones—Ufficiali, sottufficiali, caporali e soldati (1902); from his life in society he created many types of women, always portrayed with penetration and benign indulgence for their weaknesses; and finally he succeeded, sometimes with more depth than might be expected of him, in exploring the feelings of youth in that exciting period of life when love is first discovered, Le Cose più grandi di lui (1922; Eng. tr., Things Greater than He, 1926). Another of his novels of this genre is L'Occhio del fanciullo (1914). Women were his ardent readers, eagerly awaiting his new novels; and Zuccoli, like a good baker, turned one out of his mental oven almost every year, from 1900 to the year of his death. The most famous remain Il Maleficio occulto (1901), L'Amore di Loredana (1908), La Freccia nel fianco (1913). And if he did not strike at the roots of the upper middle class of Lombardy of that period, he was successful in presenting a faithful picture of how the people in that class imagined themselves to be.

See: L. Russo, I Narratori (1923), pp. 202–206; P. Pancrazi, "Zuccoli o l'amico delle donne," Pegaso, I (1930), 99–101.

G. P.

Zuckmayer, Carl (1896–, German poet, dramatist, and novelist), son of a manufacturer, was born at Nackenheim on the Rhine; he attended the Gymnasium at Mainz until 1914. Four years in the First World War were followed by study at Heidelberg of the natural sciences. Belonging to the young radical literati after the war, Zuckmayer soon devoted his formative years to writing. The inflation forced him to try all kinds of work. After having been a play reader for the Reinhardt theatres he wrote the hilarious comedy Der fröhliche Weinberg, (1925), which brought the author the Kleist prize and the dislike of the Nazi party. Zuckmayer settled down, not far from Salzburg in Austria, to an industrious career with his gifted pen. A drama about Germany's famous outlaw, Schinderhannes (1927), proved a literary success. German pre-war militarism was satirized in Der Hauptmann von Köpenick (1931; Eng. tr., The Captain of Köpenick, 1932), and his anti-war feelings were expressed in a number of adaptations, Rivalen (1929) from the American play What Price Glory by Anderson and Stallings and Kat (1931), a dramatization of Ernest Hemingway's novel A Farewell to Arms. Since Zuckmayer's plays abound in action, they have found their way into the films, and Zuckmayer has a number of successful movie scenarios to his credit. When the political flood reached Zuckmayer's mountain home and Hitler in 1938 overran Austria, Zuckmayer escaped via Switzerland and France to America. Mention must be made of his prose works (although they never attained the success of his plays): Der Bauer aus dem Taunus (1929), Die Affenhochzeit (1932), Salvare oder die Magdalene von Bozen (1936; Eng. tr., The Moons Ride Over, 1937), Herr über Leben und Tod (1938). Recollections in autobiographical form under the title Second Wind (1940; in English only) tell a vivid story of Zuckmayer's interesting career and his finding a haven in the hills of Vermont.

H. Bf.

Župančič, Oton (1878–, Slovene poet), is the best known of contemporary Slovenian lyricists. Writing in a language used by one of the smallest nations in Europe (Slovenians number less than 1,500,000), a language almost beyond adequate translation into, say, French, German, and English, he has nevertheless won international attention and interest.

He was born on January 23, 1878, in the little town of Vinica, in Bela Krajina, a region which is part of Kranjsko (Krain or Carniola), then and until 1918 a province of Austria. His parents were peasants, somewhat above the average in economic standing. They sent him to the Gymnasium in Novo Mesto, a small provincial city, and later to another Gymnasium in Ljubljana, the capital of Carniola and the cultural center of the Slovenian people. After completing these srednje šole (middle schools), he took four years at the University of Vienna, majoring in history and geography, and then continued these studies in Paris. In 1920, after most of Slovenia had been made part of the new state of Yugoslavia, he was appointed art director and manager of the National Dramatic Theatre in Ljubljana, perhaps the most important cultural position in the tiny country. For many years he was also head of the Institute of French Studies in Ljubljana.

While still in the Gymnasium, Župančič began to write little youthful poems about childhood, full of simple charm and unusual insight into the innocently mischievous spirit of very young human beings, communicating their dreamworld to the reader with a beautiful directness. In 1900 some of these early poems were gathered into a volume entitled Pisanice (Easter Eggs). Ten years later, as a mature artist, he returned to this sort of poetry, writing for and about his own children, delighting in them and their experiences; and in 1915 there appeared two collections of this juvenile poetry, which may be read as pleasurably by grown-ups as by youngsters, Ciciban in še kaj (Ciciban and a Thing or Two Besides) and Sto ugank (One Hundred Riddles).

His first book appeared in 1899, Čaša opojnosti (Cup of Intoxication), in which, working under the influence of Central and Western European symbolism and decadent concepts, he was not quite himself. In his next two collections, however, in Cez plan (1904; Across the Plain) and Samogovori (1908; Monologues), he gradually got away from exoticism and artificiality, finally achieving a natural maturity through doubt, unhappiness, and self-examination.

Now, from the late 1900's on, he began to confront his own personal problems and those of his hard-pressed nation with a strange sort of calmness that was much more stirring and stimulating than had been his former symbolic hints of doom. His thought-texture turned confident, almost optimistic; his passions got on an even keel; his poetic form reached a firm lyricism that is a pleasure to read and an intellectual experience. He became a moral force in the life of his people, a very intimate factor in its important spiritual processes, a source of patriotic feeling and thinking, a stabilizing (yet not conservative) influence. This role of the poet became especially clear in V zarje Vidove (1920; Toward the Dawn of St. Vitus's Day).

In 1924 he published Veronika Deseniška (Veronica of Desenice), a play in verse which failed both as poetry and drama and indicated that his creative talent lay largely in short lyrical outpourings. After this, Župančič tried no new forms. He revised his works, which began to appear in Ljubljana in a four-volume edition in 1935. Meantime he translated into superb Slovenian all of the important Shakespeare plays, several John Galsworthy novels, and other books from the English and Russian.

During the first two decades of the 20th century, the average educated person in Slovenia was apt to speak the Slovenian language affectedly. As art director of the National Theatre, Župančič insisted that actors speak naturally, in the manner of the plain people, even when enacting educated characters. This, and the wide reading of his own naturally idiomatic poetry, worked against artificiality and affectation in Slovenian speech—a matter of great moral and national importance to the Slovenian people. There is no doubt that in other respects too Župančič's poetry, written many years before, has played an important part in the development of the amazing Slovenian (and the larger Yugoslav) liberation movement. Much of the success of the Slovenian guerrilla fighting during the Second World War can be traced to Župančič's poems published 15 and 20 years earlier, which were addressed to Slovenian young people, urging them to spend their free days and hours in their native mountains and get acquainted with the cliffs, caves, gorges, and chasms. He himself was throughout his youth and prime a passionate outdoor man and mountain climber.

When, early in May, 1945, Slovenia was liberated by the Slovenian Partisan army, which had come into existence during the four-year Fascist-Nazi occupation, Župančič's poem celebrating the occasion—perhaps his best work—was read by one of the heroes of the War of Liberation to an assembled multitude in Ljubljana as a highlight of the patriotic festivities.

See: A. Cronia, Ottone Župančič (1928); L. Sever, Ottone Župančič (1928); L. Tesnière, Oton Joupantchitch, poète slovène; l'homme et son œuvre (1931); J. Vidmar, Oton Župančič (1935).

L. A.

Zweig, Arnold (1887–, German novelist and essayist), was born in Glogau, Silesia, of a Jewish middle-class family. Master of a superior-ironic style and of an apparently innocent approach to the most daring situations, he shows at first an interest in aesthetic mastery of the delicate and refined problems of modern man with his exaggerated sensibility—problems typical not of the great masses, however, but of a thin layer of intellectuals. His initial success was Novellen um Claudia (1912; Eng. tr., Claudia, 1930), a wreath of short stories that depict the suffering of a young woman from supersensitiveness and inhibitions and the final toilsome conquest of these through instinctive, natural forces. Zweig shows a predilection for the experiences of young people; he detaches himself with an air of benevolent irony, but he is obviously enamored of the world of youth.

The First World War provided the revolutionary experience that turned Zweig away from his preoccupation with the problems of modern intellectualism. It gave substance and ethos to his work and made him the author of one of the greatest war novels, Der Streit um den Sergeanten Grischa (1927; Eng. tr., The Case of Sergeant Grischa, 1927), published as the central panel of a projected "triptych" intended to give a broad picture and criticism of the war as it resulted from and reacted upon a class-torn, capitalistic society. The series now includes three additional novels (the author has promised still more): Junge Frau von 1914 (1931; Eng. tr., Young Woman of 1914, 1932), Erziehung vor Verdun (1935; Eng. tr., Education before Verdun, 1936), and Einsetzung eines Königs (1937; Eng. tr., The Crowning of a King, 1938). In these novels the individual is always the center of interest; from him start all approaches to the problems raised by the war. Community values are recognized in terms of social class and a future socialist society, though references to racial affinities appear not infrequently. A transcendental law is conceived within the teachings of the Torah.

The story of the Russian sergeant, Grischa, who fell victim to a power-intoxicated Prussian war machine, is Zweig's best. While presenting a sequence of events in a well-knit plot, he depicts at the same time the social organism of the German army. Various classes and types appear, from the common man in the labor service to the commander in chief himself. The flight of a Russian prisoner, his adventures, recapture, trial and death sentence as a result of mistaken identity, the establishment of his innocence and his final judicial murder, make up the thread of the plot. It leads with inevitable logic through the various military strata, which thereby become the colorful milieu of a strong narrative.

Here as well as in the other novels, Zweig's mastery of form controls his creative imagination, and freedom of poetic disposition is tempered by his knowledge of persons and situations. Genuine sympathy for suffering humanity is coupled with objective realism. His presentation has that degree of inner probability which reports, describes, and entertains and creates in the reader a true basis for a vicarious experience.

When Zweig was driven out of Germany, the manuscript of Erziehung vor Verdun was destroyed, and it had to be rewritten while he struggled heroically against serious eye disease. Zweig now lives and works in Palestine, which is the setting of his novel De Vriendt kehrt heim (1933; Eng. tr., De Vriendt Goes Home, 1933). Zweig has been successful also as an essayist and editor. He is an active Zionist, and an account of the Jewish contribution to modern German culture is given in Bilanz der deutschen Judenheit 1933 (1934; Eng. tr., Insulted and Exiled, 1937). His latest novel, The Axe of Wandsbeck (1946), deals with the Third Reich and was first published in Great Britain in English translation.

See: W. Mahrholz, Deutsche Literatur der Gegenwart (1930), pp. 189–191; W. K. Pfeiler, War and the German Mind (1941), pp. 129–139.

W. K. P.

Zweig, Stefan (1881–1942, Austrian biographer, novelist, dramatist, and poet), represented a tragically premature cosmopolitan culture. Born into a well-to-do Jewish family, he grew up as a most conscious son of Vienna, the city that harmonized various national, linguistic, and cultural elements into a synthesis of all Western civilization. He found recognition in his teens, when the "Young Vienna" of Schnitzler, Beer-Hofmann, Bahr, Altenberg, and, above all, Hugo von Hofmannsthal (q.v.) ruled the day. At the age of 19 he published the poems Silberne Seiten (1901), the first in a series of works written with the élan of an intellectual and formative playfulness. Not too self-confident as a writer, he began on Dehmel's (q.v.) advice the translation of foreign authors. A turning point toward a deeper conception of his own work came to Zweig in his personal friendship with the Belgian poet Verhaeren (q.v.). Mere literary achievement without an immanent ethos ceased to be an attraction to him. He served this master and other European figures for years, by translating and propagating their work. Meanwhile Zweig was able to follow the urgings of his insatiable curiosity by living and traveling all over the world. He was fascinated, as many of his later works show, by the people who were wasteful and almost disdainful of their lives, their time, their money, their health, and their good name.

The poems Die frühen Kränze (1907) stand in the shadow of Hofmannsthal and Rilke (q.v.). One of his early stories, Erstes Erlebnis (1911), Zweig found good enough 10 years later to head a collection of stories of much more profound strength. Three dramas also appeared, Thersites (1907), Das Haus am Meer (1911), and Der verwandelte Komödiant (1912). In Thersites Zweig confronts the disfigured, ugly, heart-torn Greek with the handsome and strong Achilles. The drama reveals a certain personal trait in Zweig. He almost never championed the so-called hero but rather the man who succumbed to destiny; in his biographies the interest usually lies with the figure who succeeds not in a worldly way, but in the moral sense. So the suffering Thersites becomes the protagonist instead of Achilles, who makes others suffer through his power and self-assertiveness.

The First World War brought a shock to intellectuals like Zweig who had thought they were doing enough when they fraternized as good Europeans. Zweig served at first in the war archives of Vienna, but only after he had personally seen the horrible face of war was he able to give vehement expression to his humanist, anti-war attitude. Between 1915 and 1917 he wrote the nine scenes of the dramatic poem Jeremias (1917; Eng. tr., 1922), the vision of the curse and the bliss of seerhood, his first truly personal creation and a very definite success. Defenseless, misunderstood, and mocked as the fool of God, the prophet stands between the God of his visions and the people who blindly stumble into "sacred" war. In the beginning a warner of the destruction, but in the end the comforter, Jeremiah typifies the fate of all the fighters against the supreme folly of man: war. The drama had its première in Zurich, where Zweig spent the latter part of the war period, in spirited intercourse with leading European minds.

From the post-war debacle Zweig came forth as the interpreter of human greatness, confusion, tragedy, and achievement; the poet and scholar merged, and brilliant biographies and essays were the result. In Drei Meister (1920; Eng. tr., Three Masters, 1930) he treats Balzac, Dickens, and Dostoevski (q.v.) as the encyclopedic geniuses of their respective nations; in Romain Rolland (1921; Eng. tr., 1921) he shows the greatness and kindness of the French writer (q.v.); in Der Kampf mit dem Dämon (1923) he pays homage to the demoniac genius of Hölderlin, Kleist, and Nietzsche (q.v.) which not only grants the exaltation of divine creation but also drives to insanity and suicide. Casanova, Stendhal, and Tolstoy (q.v.) are treated in Drei Dichter ihres Lebens (1928; Eng. tr., Adepts in Self-Portraiture, 1928). Collected under the title Baumeister der Welt (1935; Eng. tr., Master Builders, 1939), these biographies are admittedly books of glorification and enthusiasm. Their purpose is to spread "joy and passion" through devotion and worship and to fathom the secret of the power of the creative process.

In the same spirit Zweig wrote excellent stories and essays, among which are Amok (1922; Eng. tr., 1931), Verwirrung der Gefühle (1926; Eng. tr., Conflicts, 1927) and Sternstunden der Menschheit (1927; Eng. tr., The Tide of Fortune, 1940), a group of historical miniatures depicting fateful moments in the history of man. In his Gesammelte Erzählungen (1936) Zweig tried to present a typology of feeling as it is manifested in various forms in passion, age, and time. In addition Zweig wrote the biography Joseph Fouché (1929; Eng. tr., 1930), which is an ominous portrait to be published in the years just before the rule of the Gestapo. In Die Heilung durch den Geist (1931; Eng. tr., Mental Healers, 1932) Zweig presented Mesmer, Mary Baker Eddy, and Freud. The biography Marie Antoinette appeared in 1932 (Eng. tr., 1933).

Although without material want since 1933, Zweig went through all the agonies of a man without a country. In 1934 appeared Triumph und Tragik des Erasmus von Rotterdam (Eng. tr., Erasmus of Rotterdam, 1934). Like Jeremias it is a work of innermost personal confession. It is the tragic story of the objective, knowing, all-understanding nonactivist spirit who must give way to the man of passion and action. Zweig, like his hero Erasmus, continued silently on the path of creative writing. Further biographies are Maria Stuart (1935; Eng. tr., Mary, Queen of Scotland and the Isles, 1935), Castellio (1936; Eng. tr., The Right to Heresy, 1936), Magellan (1938; Eng. tr., Conqueror of the Seas, 1938), and Amerigo (1942); there are also essays, some stories, and a novel, Ungeduld des Herzens (1938; Eng. tr., Beware of Pity, 1939), which in a psychological approach treats the indolence of the human heart. In a book on Brazil (1941)

he paid tribute to the land that had given him his last refuge. Feeling too old and too tired to start anew, Zweig, the "all-too-impatient one," and his young wife parted voluntarily from life on February 23, 1942. His last work of fiction was the subtle psychological study Schachnovelle (1944; Eng. tr., The Royal Game, 1944).

Zweig's writings have been translated into some 30 languages. His work was based on studious and sharp observation, tempered with wise and understanding sympathy. His style is animated, subtle, and charming by its innate nobility. His resolve to tell only the essential tightened and clarified the inner structure of his works and thus gave sustenance to their narrative attraction.

See: E. Rieger, Stefan Zweig (1928); J. Romaine, Stefan Zweig, Great European (1941); P. Zech, Stefan Zweig (1943); Zweig, The World of Yesterday (1943), his autobiography; S. Liptzin, Germany's Stepchildren (1944), pp. 211-225.

W. K. P.

